Prohibition to Alexander de Nevill, clerk, from attempting anything which might turn to the prejudice of the king or the weakening of the judgment before him whereby he recovered against the bishop of Exeter and Thomas David his presentation to the archdeaconry of Cornwall, then void and in his gift by reason of the temporalities of the bishopric of Exeter being in his hand ; the king having learned that he has obtained a provision thereto from the Roman Court and by pretext thereof has intruded himself into the archdeaconry, and has occupied it in fact, but not of right, and taken the issues and profits thereof for no small time to the damage of the king's clerk, Nicholas de Neuton, whom the king, considering that, since his collation of William de Cusancia thereto did not take peaceful effect in the person of the said William in his life, the right of collating thereto again remains with him entire, collated thereto on the death of the said William, and who has obtained canonical possession thereof. Mandate also to the official, commissaries and other ecclesiastical personages in the county of Cornwall and elsewhere to revoke all things attempted by them, or at their procuration, against the right and possession of the said Nicholas.
