PREFACE.

IN my former work I endeavoured to trace, chronologically, the different incidents and changes in the Courts of Westminster that occurred from the reign of William the Conqueror to that of her present Majesty; and I gave an account under each reign of the judicial personages who then administered the law.

The arrangement then adopted, with its palpable historical advantages, had, biographically, one inconvenience, that when information was required for any individual judge, the time of whose existence was doubtful or uncertain, a search became necessary among several volumes or reigns in order to find the narrative.

To remedy this defect, and to facilitate the reference to every name in the judicial record, and also to reduce the bulk to one convenient volume, this publication has been undertaken. It is limited to the biographical portion of the larger work, and comprehends every name therein introduced, with slight abridgments and corrections, adding to them the judges who have been appointed since 1864: the whole number exceeding 1,600 lives.

I have not thought it necessary in the separate lives to refer specially to Dugdale's 'Chronica Series,' because, from the Conquest till the decapitation of Charles I., I have inserted every name that is included in his list. I have even done so when I have ventured to differ from him in regard to the individual filling the particular position, or flourishing at the precise period represented. In all these cases I have been careful to quote the authorities upon which I base the objections I have raised; and I have invariably, as well in the lives above alluded to as in those of the judges who flourished since Dugdale wrote, given such references as will, I trust, justify every fact I have introduced.

In the long period of eight hundred years over which the history travels, there were many changes in the administration of justice and the arrangement of the courts, which when described under the different reigns in which they occurred would naturally account for the terms then used, and the titles then given to the persons commemorated; but some explanation of them seems necessary, or at all events desirable, when their biographies are collected in an alphabetical form, and names appear together which are sundered by centuries, as one in the reign of Henry II., and the next in that of Henry VIII. or William IV. I therefore add a short account of the various alterations in the respective reigns.

In the reign of William the Conqueror the highest court of judicature was the Curia Regis, in which the King himself frequently presided. Its members were the prelates and barons of the realm and certain officers of the palace. Of these the principal was the Chief Justiciary, who in the King's absence was the ruling judge. This office continued till the reign of Henry III., a period of two hundred years, when its judicial duties were transferred to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

Many of the barons, as members of the Curia Regis, soon neglected the legal part of their duties, some from avocations that otherwise engaged them, some from unwillingness so to employ themselves, and some from incapacity to unravel the intricacies of the law. This naturally led to the association with those that remained, and eventually to the entire substitution for them, of persons whose lives had been devoted to judicial studies. These were called justiciaries, and seem to have been first introduced in the reign of Henry I., and their organisation to have been completed in that of Henry II. The justiciaries not only sat at Westminster, but went on circuits or itineria throughout the kingdom. To the commissions by which they were appointed some of the great men of the several counties, whether lay or clerical, were occasionally added, and all were designated as justiciers or justices itinerant; and from the reign of Edward I. to that of Richard II., justices of trailbaston for the trial of certain particular transgressions were appointed.

By the Charter of King John, confirmed and acted upon by Henry III., Common Pleas, being causes between private individuals, were directed to be held 'in some certain place.' This was to remedy the grievance felt by all litigants in being obliged to follow the Curia Regis to whatever distance the King might choose.

to travel. The Court of Common Pleas was thus originated; and in it the ancient advocates of the Curia Regis—the serjeants—had sole audience.

When the office of Chief Justiciary was abolished, the King's Pleas were left to be decided in a separate court, presided over by the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, the first of whom was appointed by Henry III.

The division of the courts, in nearly their present form, of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, was completed by Edward I., the English Justinian.

THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH at first took cognisance of no other suits than those in which the Crown was concerned; but from the increase of private suits, which were a source of great profit to the advocates, means were gradually employed to bring them within its jurisdiction, which was at last effected, so that now every description of cause may be tried there.

THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS has now the same jurisdiction, and remains in nearly the same position, as when it was first established, with the exception that the serjeants, by a recent innovation, no longer monopolise the practice, which is now opened to all barristers.

THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER was, before the division of the courts, an integral department of the Curia Regis, under the name of Scaccarium, in which all cases touching the Revenue were decided, and now continue so to be. But by similar means to those before alluded to, the privileges of the Court of Common Pleas have been encroached upon, and private suits form a great part of its employment. The judges who sit in the court are called barons, the title being continued from the barons of the realm who originally sat in the Curia Regis. They were till the reign of James I. of a much lower degree than the other judges, and indeed were not considered men of the law, nor ever employed to go the circuits. The statute of Nisi Prius, 14 Edward III., enacts 'that if it happen that none of the justices of the one bench nor of the other come into the county, then the Nisi Prius shall be granted before the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, if he be a man of the law.' But the general increase of litigation occasioned by the extension of commerce, with the gradual combination of civil and revenue cases, by the cunning use of the Writ Quo minus, requiring the aid of learned lawyers for their decision, it was determined to place the barons on precisely the same footing as the other judges, and consequently those barons who were appointed after the twenty-first year of Queen Elizabeth were selected from the serjeants-at-law, and were distinguished from their predecessors by the term 'Barons of the Coif.' Robert Shute was the first of these. As soon as the court was filled with these legal barons, none of whom had been instructed in the business of the revenue, it became necessary to appoint a new officer, one who was acquainted with and could attend to the fiscal business of the Exchequer. He was called the puisne or cursitor baron, whose duty it was to inform the other barons of the course of the court in any matter that concerned the King's prerogative. The first of these cursitor barons was Nowell Sotherton, who was appointed in 1606; but the office, after existing 250 years, was abolished in 1856, its duties having gradually been removed to other departments of the State.¹ The Court of Exchequer had also an equitable jurisdiction, which in the year 1841 was abolished, and its suits were transferred to the Court of Chancery.

All the judges of these three courts must be selected from the serjeants-at-law, a practice originating from the advocates in the Curia Regis consisting only of serjeants, and they from their learning being raised to the bench. But as business accumulated, other efficient men, who practised only as barristers, had opportunities of distinguishing themselves, and were gradually advanced to the bench, on which occasions the old custom was still adhered to by investing them with the coif before they received their patent as judges. This change was commenced in the reign of Queen Elizabeth in the person of Robert Monson in the year 1572, and is now the general practice. The judges and serjeants always address one another as 'Brothers.'

The number of these judges from the time of the first division of the courts until the reign of Henry VII. varied considerably, according to the whim of the Monarch, the claims of the Government, or the necessity for additional or reduced assistance. By a reference to a little volume I published, called 'Tabulæ Curiales,' in which I have shown the state of each court under the different reigns, and the judges who sat in them in chronological order, it will be seen that there was no regular number, but that it varied in each court.

sometimes extending to eight and even to nine on one of the benches. In the reign of Henry VIII., however, the number of four in each of the three courts seems to have been established, and by its continuance nearly without change till the reign of William IV., a period of 300 years, the Twelve Judges of England came to be regarded as a sacred institution. This number, however, was increased in the reign of William IV., by whom another judge was added to each court; and Queen Victoria has followed the example; so that instead of twelve there are now eighteen judges of England. It is to be hoped that litigation will not increase so much as to require another extension.

THE COURT OF CHANCERY originated from that department of the Curia Regis called the Cancellaria, in which were prepared and issued the various writs and precepts in reference to the Curia Regis. There also were all royal grants and charters, and other instruments requiring the King's seal, supervised. It was presided over by an officer called the King's Chancellor, who held at first a somewhat inferior rank in the Curia Regis, but who sat with the rest of the judges, and occasionally even went a circuit. He originally was the King's chief chaplain, and little more than his private secretary, being commonly rewarded at the end of his service with a bishopric. His intimate connection with the sovereign naturally led by degrees to a frequent reference to him upon the affairs of state; and gaining thus an ascendancy in council, he at last became, on the extinction of the office of Chief Justiciary and the transfer of the legal duties of that functionary to a court of law, the recognised Prime Minister of the kingdom. This responsible position, after a lapse of several centuries, gradually devolved first upon favourites and next on party politicians; the Chancellor of subsequent times, though losing the lead, still held and now holds a most influential place in the Government and is recognised as the head of the law, but is removable, and always removed, with every change of Ministers. From his first title of the Chancellor of the King, he rose to that of Chancellor of England; soon after he was called Lord Chancellor, a title which has been since increased to that of Lord High Chancellor. A keeper of the Great Seal was sometimes appointed instead of a Chancellor, and it was somewhat difficult to distinguish the difference in dignity between the one and the other; but in the reign of Queen Elizabeth an Act of Parliament was passed declaring their identity in rank, power, and privileges. The Great Seal was also occasionally put into the hands of Commissioners, who held it for a temporary, and principally for a political purpose, till a Chancellor or keeper was appointed.

The duty of the Chancellor to supervise and issue the necessary writs and charters led of course to the discussion before him as to the propriety and expediency of them, but it was a long time before questions of legal wrong were referred to his decision. It was soon found however that there was much truth in the maxim 'Summum jus, summa injuria;' consequently questions involving private wrong were frequently submitted by petition to Parliament, where they were decided. These petitions multiplied to such an extent that it was found necessary to refer them to a separate court—naturally presided over by the Chancellor; and the rules which guided it were gradually moulded into a system of Equity Law. In its administration the necessity of additional assistance was soon apparent, and the clerks or masters in Chancery were resorted to. The principal one who received the title of Master of the Rolls, from these records being specially entrusted to his care, was deputed to exercise the same jurisdiction. The first who was designated by that title was John de Langton, in the reign of Edward I. Commissions also were sometimes issued to some of the judges to ease the Chancellor in hearing causes. The Court of Exchequer also had a similar jurisdiction till 1841, when it was taken away, and its Equity cases were transferred to the Court of Chancery.

More permanent assistance had been previously required as litigation increased, and in the reign of George III. one Vice-Chancellor was appointed. To these three Equity Judges two others were added by our present Queen, on the Court of Exchequer losing equitable jurisdiction; and the decisions of the Master of the Rolls and of the three Vice-Chancellors were made appealable to the Chancellor, and two other new judges, called Lord Justice Appeal. So that the Court of Chancery now consists of seven judges, instead of the two to which it was limited for more than 500 years, from the reign of Edward I. to that of George III.

These short particulars will be sufficient to explain the various designations given to the different judges included in this Dictionary. Those readers who are desirous of more ample details must be referred to my larger work, where I have given a full account only of the Division of the Courts, but also of the origin of the legal Terms and Vacations; the institution and formalities of Serjeants; and the perquisites of the Chancellors, and salaries and robes of the Judges. In it I have also traced the appointment of Attorney and Solicitor General, and the first designation eo nomine of King's Counsel; the various uses to which Westminster Hall has been applied; the origin of the various Inns of Court and Inns of Chancery, and of the different Serjeants' Inns, with other interesting details incidental to the History of the Law.

P.S.—In my eighty-third year I cannot expect to witness either the success or failure of the new scheme for the arrangement of the courts about to be introduced in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the last Session. I own that I cannot predict that much material benefit will result from the intended change; and I am inclined to think that those who are conversant with the history of the past will consider the new HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE little more than a mere revival of the ancient CURIA REGIS, with all its varied powers and privileges, which were distributed into the present divisions so many centuries ago. Another remarkable restoration will be noted in the new statute—that by which the legal Terms are reduced from four to three, as they originally stood in the earlier times. But, be the innovation good or bad, I am sure it is well intended, and I sincerely hope that it may prove as beneficial to the administration of justice as its promoters anticipate.

NOTE.—Although the Bill referred to (which was brought into the Upper House of Parliament by Lord Chancellor Hatherley) did not pass during the Session of 1870, it has been thought well to preserve the author's remarks on it.

THE PRINTING of this volume was far advanced when the Author was attacked by illness, which ended fatally on the following day. In these circumstances it seems proper that the many Lives which are contained in the following pages should be accompanied by some notice of the Biographer.

Edward, the eldest son of Edward Smith Foss and Anne, daughter of Dr. William Rose, of Chiswick, and sister of Samuel Rose, the friend of Cowper, was born in Gough Square, Fleet Street, October 16, 1787. From his mother's side he was nearly related to the Rev. Hugh James Rose, one of the ablest and most eloquent among the English clergy of late times, and to his brother, the present learned Archdeacon of Bedford; and one of his maternal aunts was the wife of the eminent scholar Dr. Charles Burney. His younger brother, Henry, who died in January 1868, was for many years a partner in the firm of Payne and Foss, which stood at the head of the London trade in rare and valuable books, and was distinguished for his great bibliographical knowledge.

Edward Foss was educated under Dr. Burney, at Greenwich, and in 1804 was articled to his father, who was a solicitor in Essex Street, Strand. In 1811 he became a partner, and on his father's death in 1830 he succeeded to the whole business, which he carried on with a high reputation for ability and integrity. In 1827-8, when his friend Mr. Spottiswoode was one of the Sheriffs of London, he filled the office of Under-Sheriff. His professional work brought him into intercourse with most of the leading barristers of the day, so that, while he was able to turn to account his observation of the Judges who then occupied the Bench, he could speak from nearer personal knowledge of many who, by later promotion, were to be included among the subjects of his biographical labours. In 1818 he became a member of the Inner Temple, with the intention of being called to the Bar; but he afterwards relinquished this plan, and continued to practise in his original branch of the legal profession until 1840, when he retired from business.

In 1844 he removed from Streatham, where he had for some time lived at Street End House, about three miles from Canterbury. The climate was one which for most men would have involved no small risk; but too many cases it has been found that a withdrawal from a life of engagements to one of competence and leisure does not bring the happiness which had been expected; and so it might have been with Mr. Foss. He had little taste for country occupations or amusements, and, although he took an active part in the public business of the neighbourhood—among other things, by acting as chairman of the Canterbury bench of magistrates, where his strong sense and his legal know-made his services very valuable—this was not enough to fill up his time. In his own words, he ‘found that full employment was necessary to his existence and his happiness;’¹ and he was fortunately able to provide himself with the means of such employment. He had always felt a strong love of literature; he had already published some volumes, besides many contributions, both in prose and in verse, to periodicals and newspapers; and he had early formed a project of writing the lives of all the English Judges. Through many years of busy London life he had kept this project steadily in view, and had gradually accumulated large stores of materials for carrying it into effect. These he now set himself to arrange, to complete, and to employ in composition; and the first two volumes of ‘The Judges of England’ were published in 1848.²

Although these volumes were at once noticed with high praise by some of the most esteemed critics, the general reception of them was not very encouraging. Lord Campbell, in his ‘Lives of the Chancellors,’ had lately made the public familiar with a very different style of legal biography; and when readers came to take up Mr. Foss’s account of the early judges with the expectation of finding it equally amusing with Lord Campbell’s popular narratives, they could not but be disappointed. The Chancellors were commonly men who had played an important part in the history of their times: of the older Judges, the vast majority were utterly forgotten; as to many of them, it was necessary to enquire whether they ever existed at all, and, if so, whether they were judges or not; and perhaps nothing more could be ascertained, after all possible enquiry, than that their signatures were found attached to certain documents, and so prove them to have been in certain places at certain times. It was unfortunate for the author that the portion of his book which was first published should be that in which the names for the most part had nothing of attraction for the generality of readers, and were incapable of being invested with any other interest than that which arises from skilful investigation and scrupulous correctness.

The two volumes, therefore, could not be regarded as at first very successful. But Mr. Foss knew that he was doing a good and substantial work; he felt that in it he had found a source of continual interest, the chief occupation of his life; and he determined to persevere, even if the publication should involve (as at one time seemed not unlikely) a considerable pecuniary loss. The third and fourth volumes appeared in 1851; the fifth and sixth, in 1857; the last three, in 1864.

In the meantime the reputation of the book had been rising. The subject became more interesting as it advanced; the author’s laborious research, his acuteness in enquiry, his sound and impartial judgment, were discerned, and were warmly acknowledged by the highest critical authorities;¹ and long before the concluding volumes were published, t work had taken its place as (what Lord Campbell's 'Lives' could nev become) one of historical authority. How valuable it is in this charact may be in some degree understood from the continual references to it Dr. Pauli's learned 'Geschichte von England;' nor was this by a means the only testimony which the author received of the appreciat which his work has found among German men of letters. In America a its reputation is well established; and, resting as that reputation does a foundation of solid merits, it is not likely to be disturbed.

From the lives of Judges, Mr. Foss was led on to the compilation of 'Tabulæ Curiales;' and his last years were employed in the re-cast of his old materials with a view to the present publication.

While engaged on these labours, he removed in 1859 from Street to Churchill House, near Dover; and in 1865 he finally settled Frensham House, Addiscombe. The infirmities of age fell gently on l and he retained to the last his powers of sight and hearing, with the vigour of his mind. His death took place at Frensham House July 27, 1870, and his remains are interred in the neighbouring chr yard of Shirley. By those who knew him he will be remembered man of strong understanding, of thorough uprightness, and of kind generous heart.

He was twice married—first, in 1814, to Catherine, daughter of J Martineau, Esq.; and again, in 1844, to Maria Elizabeth, daught William Hutchins, Esq. By his second marriage he has left six son: three daughters. The eldest son, Edward W. Foss, a barrister o Inner Temple, assisted in the revision of this volume, and has comp the task since his father's death.

Mr. Foss was a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, to which h elected in 1822; a member of several other antiquarian and li societies; a member of the Incorporated Law Society, which electe as its president in 1842 and 1843; a magistrate for Kent and S a Deputy-Lieutenant for Kent, &c.

His chief publications were —

BIOGRAPHIA JURIDICA.

1066—1870.

ABBINGWORTH, GILBERT DE, was one of the justices itinerant into the counties of Sussex, Surrey, Kent, and Middlesex, in 3 Henry III., 1218. His name also appears with that designation on fines levied at Westminster in that year; showing that the justices itinerant were accustomed to sit at Westminster. He was employed in the same manner in 1225, for Surrey; and in the next year was at the head of those appointed to collect the quinzime of that county. (Rot. Claus. i, 76, 146.)

ABBOTT, CHARLES, when created Lord Tenterden, far from following the example of many a new-made peer by endeavouring to trace his pedigree to an ancient race, gloried in his descent from parents in the lower ranks of life, as exemplifying the beauty of the British constitution, which excludes no one from its honours, and even opens the door of the peerage to the most humble individual, when merit claims an entrance. When he was at his highest elevation he attended the festival of the school in his native city, at which he imbibed the rudiments of his education, acknowledged the benefits he had received from its foundation, and perpetuated the memory of his connection with it, by founding two prizes for future aspirants. (On his epitaph too, written by his own pen, he records himself as sprung 'humillimis sortis parentibus')

He was born on October 7, 1762, in the precincts of Canterbury Cathedral, where his father, John Abbott, carried on a respectable business as a wigmaker and hairdresser. His mother was Alice, daughter of Daniel Bunce of the same city. Having entered the grammar-school there, called, from its foundation by Henry VIII., the King's school, by his industry and cleverness he gave such satisfaction to his master, Dr. Osmond Beauvoir, and to the reverend trustees of the cathedral, that he received one of the school exhibitions on his admission into Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in March 1781, where he immediately obtained a scholarship. At Oxford he distinguished himself by gaining the only two honours which the university then bestowed, the chancellor's medals for Latin and English compositions. The subject of the former (in 1784) was 'Globus Aërostaticus,' the novelty of Lunardi's balloon occasioning the thesis; and that of the latter (in 1786) 'The Use and Abuse of Satire,' an essay so much admired for its learning and reasoning that it was afterwards published. Having taken his degrees, he was rewarded with a fellowship in his college, and became sub-tutor under Dr. Burgess, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury. Soon after he was selected as the private tutor of Mr. Yarde, the son of Mr. Justice Buller; and that sagacious judge, seeing and appreciating his talents, recommended him to devote his attention to the legal instead of the clerical profession. He accordingly entered himself at the Middle Temple on November 16, 1787; but in May 1793 he removed to the Inner Temple, by which he was ultimately called to the bar. In the meantime, for the purpose of acquiring a practical knowledge of the working of the law, he attended for some months the office of Messrs. Sandys & Co., attorneys in considerable business, and then placed himself under Mr. (afterwards Baron) Wood, the leading pleader of that day. Subsequently Mr. Abbott selected the same department for his own commencement; and for several years devoted himself to this branch of the science, with so much success, that in July 1795 he was enabled to take the important step of marrying. His bride was Mary, daughter of John Lagier Lamotte, Esq., of Basilden in Kent. His call to the bar was in the following February; and he joined the Oxford circuit.

Such was his reputation as a special pleader, that no sooner did he assume the barrister's gown than he was employed as junior counsel for the crown in all the numerous state prosecutions for the next ten years, under the attorney-generalships of Lord Eldon, Lord Redesdale, Lord Ellenborough, and the Hon. Spencer Perceval. In 1801 he was elected recorder of Oxford; and in 1802 he published a work on 'The Law Relating to Merchant Ships and Seamen,' a treatise which was praised by all jurists, and at once became the standard book and practical guide on the subject. It raised Mr. Abbott's reputation so high, and consequently brought him such an accession of employment in commercial and maritime cases, that when an income-tax was imposed in 1807 he returned his professional receipts during the previous year at 8,026*l.* 5*s.*

With such an income as this it is not surprising that he should have declined in 1808 to accept the offer then made him of a seat on the bench. Neither would he apply for the honour of a silk gown, conscious that his temperament and disposition disqualified him as a leader, and that his services as a junior would be more usefully employed and in greater requisition than if he aimed at the higher grade. But after eight years more of laborious but profitable application, he felt that his health would not bear the continued strain upon his faculties, and that he could with prudence accept the comparative relief of a judgeship. On the death therefore of Mr. Justice Heath, Mr. Abbott was raised to the vacant seat in the Common Pleas on January 24, 1816, receiving the customary honour of knighthood.

He remained in that court little more than three months, removing on May 3, very unwillingly, but at the urgent solicitation of Lord Ellenborough, to the court of King's Bench as the successor of Sir Simon Le Blanc. His excellence in a judicial character was so prominent that when Lord Ellenborough resigned two years and a half after, he was elevated to the chief justiceship on November 4, 1818. After having continued in the office for nine years, and established his fame by the exemplary manner in which he fulfilled its duties, the royal wish was intimated to him, that he should be created a peer: and he was accordingly ennobled, by the title of Baron Tenterden of Hendon in Middlesex, on April 30, 1827.

Soon after this elevation his health began to decline, and his infirmities were increased by his anxious exertions to contend with the growing business of his court. He betrayed no diminution of mental energy, and so far from shrinking from judicial duties he died almost in harness: being seized with his last illness while sitting on the third day's trial of the mayor of Bristol, for 'misconduct at the riots in that city. He immediately took to his bed, from which he never rose, but died on November 4, 1832, exactly fourteen years since he was constituted chief justice. He was buried in the Foundling Hospital, and on his monument is a modest inscription written by himself.

Various attempts have been made to analyse Lord Tenterden's mind and character, and a great deal of ingenuity and eloquence have been expended in the endeavour. All allow that both were peculiarly fitted for the judicial office. In practice at the bar and in his opinions answer to cases he exhibited less of an advocate than of the arbitrator. It was not till he was raised to the bench that his full powers were brought into play. Then he soon proved himself one of the ablest judges that ever presided. He was peculiarly a common-sense judge. Competent master of every branch of law, strict, impartial and unprejudiced, and detesting anything that approached to quibbling, he applied himself to discover the justice of the case before him, and by his clear and perspicuous explanations most commonly led the jury to a right conclusion. Strongly against everything that had the semblance of fraud or conspiracy, he was particularly so if an attorney was implicated; by the respectable members of the profession he showed marked respect and urbanity. If he occasionally exhibited impatience at the long speeches and irrelevant arguments of counsel, it should be remembered that he was occasioned by his anxiety to clear the accumulation of business, the extent of which may be estimated by the fact that while Lord Mansfield had to dispose of 200 causes at a sitting, the number increased in Lord Tenterden's time to 800: but as a significant proof of his estimation and respect in which he was held by his bar, notwithstanding the sometimes administered, they paid him an unusual compliment of attending in his introduction as a peer into the House of Lords.

As a member of that house he avoided all party politics, but with Tory principles opposed any attempt at innovation on the constitution. He was against the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, the Roman Catholic Relief Act, and the several bills for reform in the law, as dangerous speculations unlikely to produce the benefits which its advocates prophesied. In his own day he introduced and carried several measures, and to his care and diligence the legal profession is mainly indebted for the statutes 9 Geo. IV. c. 14 and 15, which limited the period of limitation of actions, and for the prevention of a failure of justice by reason of a between records and writings produced in evidence; and also for the statutes 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 39, for uniformity of process.

It is pleasing to find that the relaxations of a mind so overburdened with the labours of a judicial life should be in botanical researches and in literary pursuits. The union of these in him produced some elegant Latin verses of great classical merit, in the composition of which he amused the little intervals of leisure during the latter portion of his life; as in his earlier years he had penned some graceful English trifles.

His was a truly domestic home. His wife survived him only six weeks. Of his four children, John Henry, the eldest son, is the present peer. (Townsend's Twelve Judges, ii. 234; Jardine's Life, in Biog. Dict. Soc. Useful Knowl.)

ABEL, JOHN, was not improbably the son or grandson of a goldsmith named Richard Abel, who, in 27 Henry III., was appointed maker and cutter of the dies for the king's mint (Madox, ii. 88.), as the whole of John's property was situated in the neighbourhood of London. He was engaged in the king's service in 28 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 112), and two years afterwards we find him seneschal of the queen and custos of her lands. (Rot. Parl. i. 146-205.) Both he and his wife were summoned to the coronation of Edward II. among those selected from the county of Kent.

On March 8, 1312, he was constituted one of the barons of the Exchequer, and in the next year he received the office of king's escheator, the duties of which he performed, principally on the south of Trent, for three years. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 195-216.) During that time he was employed to fix the tallage on the city of London and on the king's burghs, &c., in the home counties; and was also directed to attend the council, with instructions to be in readiness to proceed on the king's service beyond the seas.

It would appear that when he entered on the functions of escheator he resigned his seat in the Exchequer, for he was re-appointed a baron on May 4, 1315; and was probably again removed in 14 Edward II., as he was not summoned to parliament beyond that year, and because a new baron was then nominated. He died in 16 Edward II., possessed, among others, of large estates at Footscray and Lewisham in Kent, at Rochford in Essex, and at Camberwell in Surrey, besides the manor of Dington in Oxfordshire, about which there was afterwards a suit in parliament between his three daughters by his wife Margery, and their husbands, and the Earl of Norfolk, who claimed it by a subsequent grant from Edward III. (Parl. Writs, ii. 421; Cal. Inq. p. m. i. 303; Rot. Parl. ii. 301.)

ABINGER, LORD. See J. SCARLETT.

ABNEY, THOMAS. The Abneys were originally seated, almost from the time of the Conquest, at a village of that name in Derbyshire. They afterwards settled at Willesley in the same county; and the judge was the son of Sir Edward Abney, LL.D., of that place, an eminent civilian and M.P. for Leicester in 1690 and 1695, and the nephew of Sir Thomas Abney the famous lord mayor of London in 1701, whose virtues are celebrated in an elegy by Dr. Isaac Watts. (Funeral Sermon, by Jer. Smith, 1722.) His mother was Judith, daughter and co-heir of Peter Barr, a London merchant. He entered himself at the Inner Temple in 1697, put on his bar gown in 1713, and was made a bencher in 1733.

Being placed on the commission of the peace for Middlesex, he was chosen for the chairman of the quarter sessions at Hicks's Hall, in February 1731. In 1733 he was one of the commissioners to enquire into the fees, &c., of the officers of the Exchequer; and in the same year he was appointed attorney-general for the duchy of Lancaster, with the grade of king's counsel. From this he was advanced in December 1735 to be judge of the Palace Court and steward of the Marshalsea, and was then knighted. At the same time he was in full practice, and among the causes in which he distinguished himself was that of Moore v. The Corporation of Hastings, in which he established the right of the eldest son of a freeman to be admitted a freeman of the borough. (Strange, 1070; State Trials, xvii. 845.)

His elevation to the bench of Westminster was not long delayed, being made a baron of the Exchequer in November 1740. In little more than two years he was removed, in February 1743, to the Common Pleas. There he sat for the rest of his life, which was terminated by one of those afflicting visitations, too commonly occasioned by the infamous manner in which the common gaols were then conducted, and the confined construction of the criminal courts. The Black Sessions at the Old Bailey in May 1750 will be long remembered. An unusually large number of prisoners were arraigned, all most uncleanly, and some suffering from the gaol distemper; and a great concourse of spectators were crowded in the narrow court to hear the trial of Captain Clarke for killing Captain Innes in a duel. These, added to the filthy state of the rooms in connection with the court, so tainted the air that many of those assembled were struck with fever, of whom no less than forty died. Of the judges in the commission only the chief justice (Lee) and the recorder (Adams) escaped. Those who fell a sacrifice to the pestilence were Mr. Justice Abney, Mr. Baron Clarke, Sir Samuel Pennant, lord mayor, and Alderman Sir Daniel Lambert; besides several of the counsel and jurymen.

Sir Michael Foster, who in his report of the Trial of the Rebels (p. 75), after designating Sir Thomas Abney as 'a very worthy man, learned in his profession, and of great integrity,' proceeds thus:—'He was through an openness of temper, or a pride of virtue habitual to him, incapable of recommending himself to that kind of low assiduous craft, by which we have known some unworthy men make their way to the favour of the great. . . . In his judicial capacity he constantly paid a religious regard to the merits of the question in the light the case appeared to him; and his judgment very seldom misled him. In short, when he died the world lost a very valuable man, his majesty an excellent subject, and the public a faithful able servant.'

He married Frances, daughter of Joshua Burton, of Brackley in Northamptonshire, and left a son, Thomas, whose only daughter married General Sir Charles Hastings, Bart. Their descendants have assumed the name of Abney in addition to their own, and possess Willesley Hall, the judge's seat. Another branch of the Abney family is seated at Measham Hall in the same county.

ABRINCIS, or AVERENCHES, WILLIAM DE, is one of the twelve barons inserted in Dugdale's 'Chronica Series' as justices itinerant in 1170 for the counties of Kent, Surrey, Middlesex, Berks, Oxford, Buckingham, and Bedford. These barons, however, cannot be properly so considered; they seem, in fact, only commissioners appointed to enquire into the abuses of sheriffs, bailiffs, and other officers.

He was the grandson of a Norman noble of the same name; and the son of Roelandus de Abrincis, a valiant soldier under Henry I., by his wife Maud, the daughter and heir of Nigel de Monville, or Mundevil, who brought him the lordship of Folkestone in Kent, with all the lands and honours she inherited from her mother, Emma, the daughter of William de Arques.

According to the manner of the time, he devoted part of his property to religious purposes. In 1147 he ratified his mother's grant of the lordship of Siwelle in Northamptonshire, to the abbey of St. Andrew in Northampton: and he gave to the church of Our Lady of Merton two sheaves of his whole lordship, with the tithes of his mill, paunage, cheese, calves, colts, lambs, apples, and nuts, in pure alms. To the monks of Essay, in Normandy, he also gave the fourth part of the church of St. Saviour, with the title of the chapelry of his own house, and other benefactions.

He died before 2 Richard I., his son

Simon being then in possession of the estates. The male branch of the family terminated a little before the year 1235, by the death of another William de Abrincis without issue. His sister became his heir and married Hamon Crevequer, lord of Leeds Castle, in Kent. (Dugdale's Baronage, i. 467; Monast. v. 190.)

ABYNDON, RICHARD DE, held the important office of chamberlain of North Wales from the 12th to the 18th Edward, his duty being the collection and disbursement of the royal revenues in that nebulously subjugated country. (Archæol. Journ. 239.) He had no doubt been previously connected with the Exchequer in England, rising by degrees, he was, on October 17, 1290, 27 Edward I., constituted one of the barons of that court, and kept his place there during the rest of that king's life. In 37 Edward I. he and another appointed custodes of the vacant bishopric of Ely. Though at the commencement of the next reign he was not immediately re-sworn a baron, his name being only in the patent of September, 1307, of January 30, 1308, he had a special writ constituting him a baron, 'ita quod dem Scaccario habuit eundem locum habitu tempore Domini Edwardi qui regis Angliæ, patris regis nunc.' A sum of forty marks was attached to his name in which he continued to act for the ten years. (Abb. ev. Rot. Orig. i. Madox, ii. 57, 59, 325.) There is a writ of complaint against William Randolph in 1212, II. for insulting and imprisoning by three others, justices who were summoned to hear and determine certain matters in the city of Bristol. (Rot. Parl. i. 123.) The next year his powers failed him; and a writ of Habeas Corpus was granted to a de Okham was appointed his successor in a patent of 10 Edw. II., dated July 1317, in which his infirmity is described: 'quia dilectus clericus Ricardus de Abyndon, unus baronum et iudicum de Scaccario, adeo impotens existit, quod ea que ad officium illius pertinent non potest commode exercere.' certified in 9 Edw. II. as lord of the manor of Horton in Gloucestershire. (Writs, ii. div. ii. 114, 361.)

ACHARD, WILLIAM, possessed a manor in Berkshire, which was granted to him by his ancestor by King Henry I. He acted in 9 Richard I., 1197-8, as one of the justices itinerant in fixing the boundaries of that county, he does not again appear as a judicial character, nor is he mentioned as an officer of the court. (Madox, ii. 705.)

ACLE, REGINALD DE, having a manor and stable of Marlborough Castle in Berkshire, III., became sheriff of Gloucestershire in 1250, and so continued till the year 1255, when he was allowed to accou-

torney. In 2 Edward I. he was directed to take that office into the king's hands, and commit it to a trusty person; and to go to the Exchequer to receive the king's commands thereon from the barons. (Abbrev. Rot. Orig. i. 12; Madox, ii. 68, 181.) It was no doubt as sheriff that he was added to the list of justices itinerant in 53 Henry III., 1208. In the same year he was custos of the bishopric of Hereford. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 484.)

ADAMS, RICHARD, was the son and heir of a gentleman of the same name residing at Shrewsbury. He was born in 1710, and was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in February 1735. He practised as a common pleader of the city of London, until elected its recorder on January 17, 1748. He obtained this honourable post after a severe contest, in which he was only successful by the casting vote of the lord mayor. During the time he held it he was knighted; and on February 3, 1753, he was promoted to the bench of the Exchequer. Miss Hawkins, in the second volume of her Memoirs, relates that he owed his elevation to the king's admiration of him in his character of recorder. The ministers not agreeing on the person who should succeed Mr. Baron Clive, George II. put an end to the discussion by calling out in his usual English, 'I will have none of dese; give me de man wid de dying speech,' meaning the recorder, whose duty it was to make the report of the convicts under sentence of death.

After a judicial service of twenty years, he died on March 15, 1773, at Bedford, while on the circuit, in the gaol distemper, caught a fortnight before at the Old Bailey. In Lord Chief Justice Wilmot's Common-place Book (Life, 199) his death is thus recorded:—'He was a very good lawyer and an excellent judge, having every quality necessary to dignify the character. I never saw him out of temper in my life, and I have known him intimately for forty years.'

ALAN was made abbot of Tewkesbury on June 16, 1187, having been previously a monk and then prior of the Benedictine Monastery of St. Saviour of Canterbury. In 1 John he fixed the tallage in Berkshire, and in the same year he is named as one of the justiciars before whom fines were levied. (Madox, i. 722.) He was a learned and a pious man, and greatly beloved by Archbishop Becket, to John of Salisbury's Life of whom he added a supplement. He wrote some other works, and died in 1202. (B. Willis's Mitred Abbeyes: Biog. Lit. ii. 365.)

ALAND, JOHN FORTESCUE (LORD FORTESCUE), was the grandson of Hugh Fortescue, the seventh in lineal descent from the illustrious chief justice of Henry VI.

His second son, Arthur, was the grandfather of the first Lord Fortescue, of Castle Hill, to which the earldom now enjoyed by his successors was added in 1789. Hugh's third son, Edmond, by his marriage with Sarah, daughter of Henry Aland, Esq., of Waterford, whose name he added to his own, was the judge's father.

He was born on March 7, 1670. Oxford has been supposed to be the place of his education, as he received from that university the honorary degree of doctor of civil law on May 4, 1733. But the language of that diploma leads to a different conclusion, and no trace is to be found of him in the register of matriculations. In 1688 he became a member of the Middle Temple, but afterwards removed to the Inner Temple; and having been called to the bar in 1712, arrived at the post of reader in 1716. In October 1714, immediately after the arrival of George I., he was appointed solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales (afterwards George II.), from which he was promoted in December of the following year to be solicitor-general to the king. He was chosen member for Midhurst in the first parliament of George I., but only sat during its first session, being raised to the bench of the Exchequer on January 24, 1717, when he was knighted. He occupied that seat for little more than a year; and one of his last duties as a baron was to give his opinion respecting the education and marriage of the royal family, his argument on which is fully reported by himself, and, though he had been one of the law officers of the Prince of Wales, was decidedly in favour of the prerogative of the crown. On May 15, 1718, he was removed to the King's Bench, and sat in that court till the death of George I. in June, 1727; but George II. about the middle of September, perhaps on account of the above opinion against his claim, superseded him. (State Trials, xv. 975, xvi. 1206; Strange, 86; Lord Raymond, 1510.)

After fifteen months' retirement, he was restored to favour, and placed in the Common Pleas on January 27, 1729. There he continued for above seventeen years, when, warned by his age and infirmities, he resigned in June 1746. So long before as 1741 he had petitioned for leave to retire with a pension, accompanied by the inconsistent request that a seat in the House of Commons might be obtained for him. When at last permitted to resign, after a service in all the three courts extending to twenty-eight years, his senatorial ambition was gratified by the grant of a barony in the Irish peerage in August 1746. His title was Lord Fortescue of Credan in the county of Waterford; but he enjoyed it for little more than four months, dying on December 19, 1746.

In addition to his legal reputation, he had the character of being well versed in Norman and Saxon literature. This he fully maintained in the introductory remarks to his edition of the treatise of his illustrious ancestor Sir John Fortescue, entitled 'The Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy,' which he published in 1714, being then a Fellow of the Royal Society. His Law Reports of Select Cases were prepared for publication before his death, but not printed till 1748. Of his manner on the bench the following illustration in Bentley's case may serve as an example. 'The laws of God and man,' he said, 'both give the party an opportunity to make his defence if he has any. I remember to have heard it observed by a very learned man, that even God Himself did not pass sentence upon Adam, before he was called upon to make his defence. Adam (says God), where art thou? Hast thou not eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? And the same question was put to Eve also.' Of his appearance the 'Conveyancer's Guide' (p. 107) gives this description: 'The baron had one of the strangest noses ever seen: its shape resembled much the trunk of an elephant. "Brother, brother," said the baron to the counsel, "you are handling the cause in a very lame manner." "Oh! no, my lord," was the reply; "have patience with me, and I'll make it as plain as the nose in your lordship's face."'

Lord Fortescue's first wife was Grace, daughter of Chief Justice Pratt, by whom he had two sons, who died unmarried in their father's lifetime. His second wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Justice Dormer, by whom he left a son, his successor in his title and estates, one of which was Lamborn Hall in Essex; on whose death in 1781 without issue the peerage expired.

ALBEMARLE, EARL OF. See W. DE MANDEVIL.

ALBINI-BRITO, WILLIAM DE. Two persons named William de Albini lived at this time. One, called Yncerna, whose romantic adventures with Adelaide, Queen Dowager of France, are related by Dugdale in his 'Baronage,' married Adeliza, the widow of King Henry I. The other was surnamed Brito, probably in order to distinguish him from his celebrated contemporary.

He was the son of Robert de Todeni, the standard-bearer of William the Conqueror, who participated largely in the rich rewards distributed by his master, and founded Belvoir Castle, in Leicestershire, as his chief seat. He died in 1088, and by his wife Adela left four sons; the eldest of whom, this William, assumed the name of Albini, in consequence, it is believed, of his having been born in the parish of the name in Normandy.

In the town of Sawbridgeworth in Hertfordshire, which belonged to him, he exercised almost royal power, if we may judge from his charter or writ commanding his vassals there, that if any plaint or quarrel arose among the monks of the church, it should be stayed till it could be brought before him. (Madox, i. 120.)

He greatly distinguished himself, 1106, at the battle of Tenchebrai, and afterwards appears to have been high in King Henry's favour. The county of Rutland was placed under his care as sheriff, or fermour; and the custody of extensive lands of Otuier Fitz-Count entrusted to him. He was also one of the council of the king, attended him in his movements, and was a witness, immediately after Hugh Bigot, and before Richard Basset, to the charter by which Henry I. 1134, granted the office of Great Chamberlain to Alberic de Vere and his heirs. (Madox, i. 56, 297, 327.)

When circuits were established by Henry I. for the dispensation of justice throughout the kingdom, he was naturally selected to act in the county where the largest possessions were situate. The roll of 31 Henry I. gives evidence of his holding pleas in Lincolnshire, and of his justice of the forest in Essex.

From this roll it appears that he was excused from the payment of Danegeld in seven counties in which he had property; an exemption he enjoyed in common with all those who were employed in the administration of justice.

Adhering, under the reign of Stephen, to the fortunes of the Empress Matilda, he was for a time deprived of his estates; but they were afterwards restored to him. His name appears as a witness to this king's charter granting the barony of Hereford to Robert, Earl of Leicester. (Madox, ii. 139.)

He died about 1135, 2 Henry II., by his wife Maud, daughter of Sir Richard Liz, Earl of Huntingdon, and was succeeded by Robert, son of Richard de Tonbridge, sons, William and Ralph.

1. William, who was surnamed the White, had a son, also William, who is frequently mentioned as a justice itinerant.

2. Ralph, whose descendants themselves Daubeney, by which name they were summoned to parliament. Baron Daubeney was created Earl of Bridgewater, but both titles became extinct on his death, without issue. (Magn. Rot. 31 Henry I.; Dugdale's Baronage, i. 111; Collins's Peerage, i. 462, v. 451.)

ALBINI, WILLIAM DE, was the first Earl of Arundel, being grandson of de Albin, surnamed 'with the strong hand,' who obtained the earldom by his marriage with Queen Adeliza, the widow of Henry I., to whom the castle of Arundel had been assigned in dower. His father died in 1190, when he paid 100*l.* for the relief of his lands in Norfolk. With King John he was in high favour, receiving many grants from him; and his almost constant attendance at the court is shown by the fact, that in every year of the reign, except the last, he was a witness to charters or other royal documents. In the earlier contests with the barons, he adhered to the king, and was present, as one of his friends, at Runnymede. Disgusted at last with the tyranny and bad faith of his sovereign, he joined Prince Louis of France on his arrival in England. His lands were immediately ravaged by the royal army, and his whole possessions seized by the crown; but they were restored to him after the death of King John, on his returning to his allegiance in the following July. (Rot. Claus. i. 314.)

His entire restoration to the goodwill of the king, or rather of the protector of the kingdom, is shown by several entries on the rolls, and particularly by his acting as a justicier in 2 Henry III., in which year a fine was levied before him at Westminster. Roger de Wendover relates that in the same year, 1218, he proceeded to the Holy Land, and was at the siege of Damietta; and Matthew Paris adds that, in 1221, he died abroad, as he was returning from the crusade, and that his body was brought to England and buried at the abbey of Wintonham, of which he was a patron. His son William did homage for his lands on April 12, 1221, 5 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 452.)

He is sometimes called Earl of Chichester; and on one occasion he signs himself William of Arundel, Earl of Sussex. (Rot. Chart. 14 John, 186.)

In December 1218, probably just previous to his embarkation for the Holy Land, the sheriff of Sussex was commanded to pay him twenty marks out of the issues of the county, which he ought and was accustomed every year to have by the name of the Earl of Sussex. (Rot. Claus. i. 383.)

He married Maude, daughter of James de St. Sidonio, and widow of Roger, Earl of Clare. By her he left two sons, William and Hugh, who successively held the earldom, and died without issue; and several daughters, one of whom, Isabel, married John Fitz-Alan, Lord of Clun (son of William Fitz-Alan, a justice itinerant under Richard I.), to whom the castle of Arundel, with its appendant title, was apportioned, which has come down in lineal descent to its present possessor, the Duke of Norfolk. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 118.)

was the grandson of the before-named William de Albin, surnamed Brito, and the son and heir of William de Albin, surnamed Meschines, who died in 1167.

In 2 Richard I., 1190-1, he was entrusted with the sheriffalty of Rutland, which he held during the remainder of that reign; in the course of which he was also sheriff of the united counties of Warwick and Leicester, and of Bedford and Buckingham. In 1194 he was with the royal army in Normandy; and in 10 Richard I. he was one of the justiciars before whom a fine was levied at Norwich, but evidently only as a justice itinerant.

Under King John he was frequently employed. In the first year he was appointed one of the bailiffs of the Jews in England. (Rot. Chart. 61.) In 7 John he was sent on some embassy, the Close Roll (i. 56) containing an order for a ship to be provided for him on the king's service. In 10 John a fine was again levied before him as a justicier at Derby. In 14 John he was employed with four others on a commission of enquiry in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire (Rot. Pat. 97); and in the next year in collecting the assize of woad, in the latter county, and the duties on corn, salt, grease, honey, and salmon. (Maador. i. 773.) During the whole of this time he was frequently a witness to charters granted by the king; and on January 14, 1215, he was joined in a commission with the Archbishop of Canterbury and others to give safe conduct to those who came to supplicate the king's mercy for their great offences. (Rot. Pat. 126.) On the granting of Magna Charta, however, he was one of the twenty-five barons who were appointed to enforce its observance; and, though he afterwards neglected the invitation sent by the barons to be present at the tournament on Hounslow Heath, he subsequently joined them in London, and was entrusted with the command of Rochester Castle. There he bravely sustained a siege of three months, but being, in December 1213, compelled at last for want of provisions to submit, he narrowly escaped being hanged, a sentence which the angry monarch had pronounced against all the defenders. He owed his safety to the remonstrance of Savaricus de Malloleone, one of the king's Poitevin generals; and was, with his son Odenel, sent prisoner to Corff Castle. The loss of all his possessions was the consequence of his rebellion, to which was added the pope's excommunication. (R. de Wendover, iii. 329-355.) His wife, Agatha, however, succeeded in obtaining his pardon, with the restoration of his property, on the payment of a fine of six thousand marks. (Rot. Claus. i. 280, 287.)

about a month after the king's death; and it is certain that the whole of the fine was not paid before his liberation, or indeed up to the period of his own decease, nearly twenty years after; because his son was then permitted to pay what remained due by annual instalments of 20*l.* each. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 306.) He was at once received into confidence, and had an early opportunity of proving his loyalty in the battle of Lincoln, fought on May 19, 1217, where he greatly distinguished himself. Entrusted with the castle of Muleton and the lands of Thomas of Muleton, which had been forfeited, and obtaining the valuable custody of the land and heir of Henry de Neville, he enjoyed the royal favour till his death. In 3 Henry III. he was placed high in the list of itinerant justices sent into the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby; and again into Yorkshire in 9 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77.) He died in May 1236. He was a great benefactor to the monks of Belvoir, and founded the hospital of Our Lady, called Newstead, at Wassebridge, between Stanford and Offington, in Lincolnshire, in which his body was buried, his heart being buried at Belvoir.

He married twice. His first wife was Margery, daughter of Odenel de Umfraville, by whom he had several children. With his eldest son, likewise William, the male branch of this family became extinct, but the possessions were carried by his daughter Isabel to her husband, Robert de Roos; and her male descendants continued to hold that barony till the year 1508, when, by the marriage of the heiress with Sir Robert Manners, it devolved on their son George, whose son, Thomas, was created Earl of Rutland in 1525. On the death of this earl's grandson without male issue the two titles became divided: but their present possessors—viz., the Duke of Rutland and Lord de Ros—plainly trace their descent from Isabel de Albini. His second wife was Agatha, daughter and coheir of the Baron William de Trusbot, for whom, with her inheritance, he accounted six hundred marks in 10 Richard I. It does not appear that she bore him any children.

ALCOCK, JOHN, the earliest chancellor of Henry VII., is described by Bale, who wrote about half a century after his death, as so devoted from his childhood to learning and piety, growing from grace to grace, that no one throughout England was more renowned for his sanctity. He was born at Beverley in Yorkshire, where his father, William Alcock, sometime burgess of Kingston-upon-Hull, was in circumstances sufficiently easy to be enabled to send him first to the grammar-school there and then to Cambridge, where he took the degree of Doctor of Laws in 1466. He was collated in 1461 to the church of St. Margaret, New Fish Street, London, and subsequently received two prebends, one of Salisbury and the other of St. Paul's. He was next advanced, on April 29, 1462, to the deanery of the Chapel of St. Stephen, in the Palace of Westminster.

It is not improbable, from the diplomatic services in which he was engaged, that acted as an advocate in the ecclesiastical courts, the members of that branch of law being then commonly selected for that duty. In March 1470, a few months before the restoration of Henry VI., he was one of the ambassadors to the King of Castile (Rymer, xi. 653), and having returned April 29 in the following year, immediately after the battle of Barnet, which re-enthroned Edward IV. on the throne, superseded William Morland in the office of master of the Rolls (Rot. Pat. 11 Edw. IV. p. 24; not 1 Edw. IV. as Dugdale has inadvertently called it), he was appointed August 26, a commissioner to treat with the Scotch ambassadors for a perpetual peace. (Rymer, xi. 717.)

He was made Bishop of Rochester March 17, 1472, having on the previous day resigned the mastership of the Rolls to John Morton, and on September 17 the Great Seal was placed in his hands, and he acted as lord chancellor, Bishop Stillington having been called up to the duties on account of a temporary illness. (Claus. 12 Edw. IV. m. 16.) He opened the parliament as keeper on October 6; and the lord chancellor, having been prorogued it on April 5, 1473. (Rot. Pat. vi. 3, 9, 41.)

King Edward entrusted to him the education of his infant son, and placed him in his privy council, and a curious instance of the royal favour occurred in the year 1475, when both Alcock and Bishop Rotham held the title of lord chancellor for several months together, affording a solid instance, in the history of this king, of two chancellors acting at the same time. The fact is incontestably proved by the existence of numerous Privy Seal bills addressed to both by the same title, from April 28 to September 28, 1475. This extraordinary circumstance may be thus explained. When the king planned his invasion of France, he intended to be accompanied by his lord chancellor, Bishop Rotham, feeling it necessary to provide for the business of the Chancery in England, he nominated Bishop Alcock to take the duties of the chancellor's absence. Instead of pursuing the customary practice of investing him merely keeper of the Seal, he gave him the title of special favour, invested him with the title of chancellor, intending that a regular chancellor should be appointed during the whole period of his absence in France. It happened, however armament was delayed from April till July, so that during those months Privy Seal bills were addressed to both officers in England, frequently on the same day and from the same place. The last writ of Privy Seal addressed to Bishop Alcock is dated on September 28, after which Bishop Rotheram, having returned from France, resumed his functions as sole chancellor.

The see of Worcester becoming vacant, the king was happy in the opportunity of appointing Alcock to fill it; and possession of the temporalities was granted to him on September 25, 1476. (Rymer, xii. 34.) He presided over the diocese for the rest of the reign, during which he enlarged the church of Westbury, and founded a school at Kingston-on-Hull, where he built a chapel over the remains of his parents at the south of the church, endowing a chantry there also. (Cal. Rot. Parl. 324.) In 1478 he was constituted President of Wales, but on the death of Edward he was removed from the preceptorship of his infant successor by the protector Richard, who, however, introduced a clause in the act of attainder passed when he became king, declaring it should not prejudice the bishop in reference to certain property in Kent. (Ibid. Parl. vi. 201, 249.)

The battle of Bosworth, on August 22, 1485, placed Henry VII. on the throne; and Bishop Alcock was his first chancellor.

The date of his appointment does not appear, though Dugdale erroneously states it to be on March 6, 1486, the date of Bishop Morton's appointment; but Alcock was present as chancellor at the coronation on October 30, 1485, and opened the first parliament on November 7, efficiently superintending the difficult questions it had to decide. (Rutland Papers, x. 10; Rot. Parl. vi. 267.) Bishop Morton succeeded him in the office on March 6, 1486, being then Bishop of Ely, to which see Alcock was translated on that prelate's advance to the primacy, and was admitted to the temporalities on December 7, having in the intervening July been employed in treating with the commissioners of the Scottish king. (Rymer, xii. 285, 318.)

The latter years of his life were occupied in building the beautiful hall at his palace of Ely, and in decorating all his manors with new edifices. On the site also of the old nunnery of St. Radegund, in Cambridge, he founded Jesus College, a lasting monument of his liberality and taste. Nor were the claims of literature forgotten. Various compositions connected with his profession issued from his pen, among which was one called 'Galli Cantus ad Confratres suos Curatos in Synodo apud Barnewell, September 25, 1498,' at the beginning of which is a print of himself preaching to his clergy, with a cock (his crest) at each side. In his sermons he must have fatigued his auditors, if they were all as long as one he preached at St. Mary's church, in Cambridge, which is said to have lasted two hours.

The bishop died at his castle at Wisbeach on October 1, 1500, and was buried in a magnificent chapel erected by himself in Ely cathedral. All writers concur in speaking highly of his erudition and his piety. The latter is said to have been carried to an extreme in mortifications and abstinence. He was greatly beloved and respected by his contemporaries, and was named by Judge Lyttelton as the supervisor of his will. Coke in relating this fact calls him 'a man of singular piety, devotion, chastity, temperance, and holiness of life.' (Fuller's Worthies; Angl. Sac. i. 381, 538, 675; Godwin de Presul. 269; Cooper's Ath. Cantab. i. 3.)

ALDEBURGH, RICHARD DE, derived his name from Aldeburgh (Aldborough) in Yorkshire, where he had a grant of lands in 12 Edw. II., and seven years afterwards purchased the manor of Hundeburton and property in Mildeby. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 245, 293.) He is frequently mentioned as a counsel in the Year Books of Edward II., and the first five years of Edward III. In the third year of the latter reign he acted as the king's attorney in the pleas of quo warranto at Northampton; and in the same year he is noticed as one of the king's serjeants. In the fifth year he was a commissioner for preserving the peace between England and Scotland (N. Fadera, ii. 809); and on February 3, 1332, 6 Edward III., he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas, and knighted. Dugdale introduces two other patents, conferring on him the same office, dated November 19, 1333, and January 8, 1341; but I presume that, as on these days new chiefs of the court were appointed, these were merely formal re-nominations without any intervening retirement; especially as Dugdale does not record any break in the fines levied before him. These are stated to terminate at Michaelmas, 14 Edward III., 1340, in which year he had a licence to enclose one hundred acres of land in Righton in Wherredale. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 114, 117, 119, 138.)

He is last mentioned as the head of a judicial commission in Yorkshire as late as May 20, 1343. (N. Fadera, ii. 1225.)

ALDERSON, EDWARD HALL, was the additional judge in the Common Pleas under the new act passed at the commencement of the reign of William IV. His father, Robert Alderson, Esq., was an eminent member of the same profession, recorder of Norwich, Ipswich, and Yarmouth, and his mother was the daughter of Samuel Burry, Esq., of the latter place, where he was born on September 11, 1787. After spending a short time at Scarning School, near Dereham, where Lord Thurlow commenced his education, he was removed to the Grammar School of Bury St. Edmunds, and subsequently had the advantage of the private tuition of Dr. Maltby, afterwards Bishop of Durham. His progress was so great and his intelligence so marked, that the highest expectations were formed of his college career; and so self-conscious was he of his own talents and acquirements that he afterwards acknowledged that if any one had offered him on entering the university the place of second wrangler, he would at once have refused it. Thus well prepared, he entered Caius College, Cambridge, in 1805, and by his indomitable perseverance and extraordinary genius he not only achieved the success his friends had prophesied, but exceeded his own prognostications, obtaining, besides the anticipated place of senior wrangler, the additional distinction of first Smith's prizeman and senior medallist, the highest honours which his university could give both in classics and mathematics, and a triple glory which few had previously obtained. During his progress through the university he also gained Sir Thomas Browne's medal for the best Greek and Latin epigrams, and the members' prize for the Latin essay. In 1809 he took his degree as bachelor, and in 1812 that of master of arts, when he was elected fellow of his college.

Having entered the Inner Temple, in 1811 he was called to the bar, and selected the Northern circuit and York sessions, in which he had no cause to complain of neglect at the outset of his career. In 1817, on the termination of the Reports of Maule and Selwyn, he joined with Mr. Barnewall in their continuation for the five succeeding years, when he felt obliged to relinquish the employment. In 1823 he married Georgina, daughter of the Rev. Edward Drewe, of Broadhembury, Devonshire.

He thence went on with such increase of employment and reputation that in 1828 he was appointed one of the commissioners for the amendment of the law. So much in demand were his services on the circuit that he himself described his position, 'Heir-apparent to the crown, upon the departure of the present holders.' At this time the act before referred to was passed, and, though he never had a silk gown, nor the advantage of a seat in parliament, he was at once selected from the outer bar for his acknowledged ability, as one of the three judges then added to the old number of twelve. He was first placed in the Common Pleas in November 1830, receiving the honour of knighthood. There he remained till February 1834, when he was removed to the Exchequer, where he performed the double duties on the equity and common law side till the former was transferred into Chancery by an enactment in 1841.

The only fault that has been found with him as a judge arose from the quickness of insight into the questions before him which sometimes led him into too rapid judgment of their real merits, producing a degree of impatience against those who duty it was to argue against his preceived opinions. Yet notwithstanding this failing he was in the main a popular judge, especially with juries; and while sitting in Banco he had much influence in the decisions of the court. His reasoning the latter was deep, solid, and acute; his relish of fun and his occasional whims on the bench no doubt made him general favourite at nisi prius. Even in Banco he could not always refrain. On a counsel on applying for a nolle prosequi pronounced the penultimate syllable of 'Stop, sir,' said the baron; 'consider this is the last day of term, and don't let things unnecessarily long.' At an assize town a jurymen said to the clerk who administering the oath to him, 'Speak I cannot hear what you say.' The judge asked him if he was deaf, and on the jurymen answering, 'Yes, with one ear,' replied, 'Well then you may leave the box, it is necessary that jurymen should hear sides.'

With all this spirit of drollery, he essentially of a serious and religious disposition; cordially loved in his private and highly esteemed and respected bar. He employed his leisure in the renewal of his early studies, and was himself a graceful poet. Several of his pieces, some of which are addressed to his literary cousin, Mrs. Opie, are intruded into an interesting memoir of his life published by his son soon after his death. That event occurred on January 27, 1841, in his seventieth year, when he had sat on the bench more than six and a half years. His remains lie in the church of Risby, near Bury, his brother's.

ALENÇON, JOHN DE. was one of the clerks of the Chancery, obtaining ecclesiastical preferment according to the custom of these officers raised to the archdeaconry of Lincoln in 1185. He was selected by Richard I. to accompany him as his vice-chancellor of Normandy on his departure for the Holy Land. There are six charters of his, manum Johannis de Alençon, cono Lexoviensis, vice Cancellarii, granted by Richard in that count for the months of January, March, June, 1190. (N. Federat. i. 48, 51; Monast. i. 485; vi. 1115.) W. Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, was at the time chancellor and chief jus-

England, where, no doubt, according to the course duly recorded on the rolls of subsequent reigns, one great seal was left with him, while another was entrusted to a deputy in attendance on the king, to be used according to the royal pleasure. In the following March the duty was performed by Roger Malus Catulus. In February 1198 Alençon was one of the witnesses to a charter given under the hand of Warine, Prior of Loches, 'tunc agentis vicem Cancellarii nostri' (Neustria Pia, 897; Monast. vi. 1110); and he was appointed treasurer of Vaudreuil on September 6, 1190, 1 John. (Rot. Chart. i. 19.) The last time he is mentioned is when he accompanied Ralph de Furnellis to Rome, and letters of protection were granted to both while there. (Rot. Pat. 3 John, 5.)

ALENCUN, HERBERT DE, possessed property in Suffolk; and a suit previously instituted by him relative to the manor of Dinniveton, in that county, which was to have been heard before the justices itinerant in 9 Henry III., was directed to be removed before the judges at Westminster, in consequence of his being included in the commission for that Iter. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77, 79.) In 11 Henry III. he was employed to fix the tallage for Norfolk and Suffolk (Ibid. ii. 174, 208), and for the next five years he filled the office of sheriff of those counties. (Fuller's Worthies.)

ALEXANDER was the nephew of Roger, Bishop of Salisbury. He was born in Normandy, and, with such a connection, soon received advancement in England. Roger first appointed him archdeacon in his own diocese, and at Easter, 1123, he was advanced to the bishopric of Lincoln. His cathedral being soon after destroyed by fire, he rebuilt it with the greatest magnificence, increasing the number of prebends, and handsomely endowing them. He emulated his uncle in the erection of three castles—those of Banbury, Sleaford, and Newark—the last of which he was incautious enough to declare was designed as much for the security as the dignity of the Church. When King Stephen became jealous of the power of the clergy he shared in his uncle's disgrace, and was compelled to surrender his castles to the monarch. The defenders of that of Newark, however, resisted the royal power, and could not be prevailed upon to deliver it up until they found that the king had sworn that the bishop should not taste food so long as they held out. Even after their submission the bishop was kept in prison for some time; and when he at last was liberated, he quitted the strife of politics, and devoted himself and his property to his religious duties and the improvement of his see. He took two journeys to Rome, and so pleased both the king and the pope by his conduct that he was appointed legate from the latter in England, where he convened a synod, and passed some useful canons for repressing the enormities of the times. In 1147 he made a third visit to the pope, then in France, but, being seized with sickness, he had scarcely time to return ere he died, in the month of August.

Besides the above proofs of his munificence, the hospital of St. Leonard at Newark, the priory of Haverholm in Lincolnshire, and the abbeys of Dorchester and Thame in Oxfordshire, acknowledged him as their founder.

Henry of Huntingdon, who dedicated his History to him, paints him in glowing colours in some verses while living, and in his epistle 'De Mundi Contemptu' when dead.

His introduction into Thynne's and Dugdale's list of chancellors under King Stephen is founded on a passage in William of Newbury, in which, however, no name occurs, and the fact referred to evidently applies to the fate of his cousin Roger, the son, or, as he was often called, the nephew of the bishop, and an undoubted chancellor. No charter or other record mentions Alexander as chancellor. (Godwin de Præsulibus, 284; William of Malmesbury, 715, 716, 744; Angl. Sac. ii. 700; Thoroton's Notes, i. 389, 398, 406.)

ALEXANDER, WILLIAM, of Scottish birth and extraction, possessed property at Airdrie, in the county of Lanark. Born about the year 1761, at the age of twenty-one he was called to the bar of the Society of the Middle Temple; and, selecting the Court of Chancery, he practised there with a high reputation as an equity and real property lawyer for nearly twenty years, and was in 1800 rewarded with a silk gown. Lord Eldon appointed him on November 9, 1809, one of the masters in Chancery; and after filling this comparatively subordinate office for about fifteen years, he was, to the surprise, and somewhat to the dissatisfaction, of the profession, all at once by the same patronage raised to the head of the Court of Exchequer, being constituted lord chief baron on January 9, 1824, and thereupon made a privy counsellor and knighted. He himself hesitated to accept the appointment when offered, being aware of his limited acquaintance with criminal law and the practice of the common law courts. But, notwithstanding his own doubts, and those entertained by the legal world in general, he presided most ably for seven years, his experience in equity, which then formed a great part of the business of his court, being peculiarly valuable.

In January 1831 he was induced to resign, for the purpose of enabling Lord Lyndhurst, who had given up the Great Seal, to take his place as lord chief baron.

About the same time he had a large accession to his fortune from the discovery of iron ore on his estate at Airdrie. He survived his retirement more than twenty years, and dying on June 29, 1842, was buried in the chapel of Roslin Castle.

ALLERTHORPE, LAURENCE DE, derived his surname from the village in Yorkshire so called. There is no account of his family; but it is evident that his early life was spent as a clerk in the Exchequer. In 1370 he was an auditor of that department, receiving 10*l.* a year for his salary, together with sixty shillings for his expenses in going into the northern counties to affer amerements. (Issue Roll, 44 Edward III. 143, 404.) An ecclesiastic, like his brethren, he obtained a canonry in St. Paul's.

On September 27, 1375, he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer. This office he retained during the remainder of Edward's reign, the whole of the next, and for nearly two years of that of Henry IV., during the last twelve years holding the higher position of second baron.

Having now sat upon the bench for above a quarter of a century, he was advanced, on May 31, 1401, 2 Henry IV., to the treasurer'ship, which he held rather less than a year; and then accompanied the king's son, Thomas of Lancaster, to Ireland. (Rymer, viii. 227.) Dying on July 21, 1406, he was buried in St. Dunstan's chapel in St. Paul's Cathedral. Shortly before that event he is stated to have been the sole residentiary there, and to have had the whole revenue of the thirty canons at his own disposal, in consequence of all his brethren being excluded by the pope's bull from participating on account of their non-residence. (Weever, 306.)

ALLEYN, or ALEYN, JOHN, was entered at Lincoln's Inn on February 2, 1476, and was elected reader in autumn 1491, and again in Lent 1496. He is not mentioned as an advocate by any reporter, and probably held some office in the Exchequer. He was constituted fourth baron on February 18, 1504, 19 Henry VII., and was continued in the same position for the first two years of the reign of Henry VIII.

Phillips, in his 'Grandeur of the Law,' p. 69, says that Sir Thomas Allen, Bart., lord mayor of London, was one of the baron's descendants: but evidence is wanting in support of the statement. There is indeed the same difficulty as in former reigns in tracing the pedigree of the barons of the Exchequer, who in general began their career as clerks in the department. He was appointed in 1509 supervisor of the will of John Perlay, draper, of Bury St. Edmunds, who bequeaths 'to hym for hys labor xx s. in mony, and a blak gowne' (Bury Wills, 113): and he was in the commission for the gaol delivery of that town in 1511, and in the commission of the peace for the county till 1514. (Cal. St. Papers 1509-14.)

Blomefield (Norfolk, i. 758) is clearly error when he states that John Wodehouse of Kimberley in Norfolk, married the relict of 'John Aleyne, one of the barons the Exchequer,' inasmuch as John Wodehouse himself died in 1465, and his relict lies buried with him.

ALLIBONE, RICHARD. The grandfather of this short-lived judge was an eminent divine, rector of Cheyneys in Buckinghamshire, whose third son, Job Allibond (for Anthony Wood spells the name), turned Roman Catholic, got a comfortable place the post office, died in 1672, and was buried at Dagenham in Essex. He was the father of Richard, who, born about 1621, rather late in life commenced his legal education at Gray's Inn on April 27, 1663. Thence called to the bar on February 11, 1671, mention is made of him till November 1671, when, being a papist, he was selected by King James to be one of his counsellors knighted. On April 28, 1687, he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench. The summer of that year he went to the Northern Circuit, and Bishop Cartwright relates that at Lancaster, while his colleague Judge Powell, attended at the parish church, Allibone went to the school-house, and preached a mass. In his charge to the grand jury he took notice that only three of the judges came out to meet the judges, and that was a great disrespect of the king's mission—a fact strongly indicative of the general feeling of dissatisfaction in the country.

At the trial of the seven bishops in Trinity Term 1688 Sir Richard laid down the most arbitrary doctrines, and urged himself to the utmost to procure their conviction. On going the Home Circuit in July, immediately after the trial, he was indecent in his charge to the Grand Jury to speak against the verdict of their acquittal, and to stigmatise their petition to the king as a libel that tended to seditious and dangerous death on the 22nd of the following month at his house in Brownlow Street. He saved him from attainder at the request of the king.

He was buried at Dagenham, where a pompous monument was erected in his memory. His wife was Barbara, daughter of the family of Sir Francis Blake of Gibside, in Durham, Bart. (Athl. 440; Bramston, 275; Diary of Cartwright, 71; Luttrell, i. 28; Trials, xii. 190.)

ALTHAM, JAMES, was of civil life, both paternally and maternally his grandfather, Edward, was sheriff of London in 1531; his father, James, of Hall, Latton, Essex, was sheriff of city in 1577, and of the county of Essex in 1570; and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Blanke, citizen and haberdasher, and the sister of Sir Thomas Blanke, lord mayor of London in 1582. (Archæologia, xxvi. 400–417.) After being called to the bar at Gray's Inn, he was chosen reader there in autumn 1600, and again in Lent 1603, on his being summoned by Queen Elizabeth to assume the degree of the coif in the following Easter Term. But her decease happening before that period, King James renewed the writ with the same return.

He represented Bramber in the parliament of 1589, and had acquired such a character in his profession that he was appointed a baron of the Exchequer on February 1, 1607, when he received the honour of knighthood.

Lord Chief Justice Coke seems to have been in the habit of treating the judges rather superciliously, since Justice Williams told Archbishop Abbot, who reported it to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, 'of his utter dislike of all the Lord Coke his courses; and that himself and Baron Altham did once very roundly let the Lord Coke know their minde, that he was not such a maister of the lawes as he did take on him, to deliver what he list for lawe, and to despise all other.' (Egerton Papers, 44s.)

He died on February 21, 1616–17; and Sir Francis Bacon (Works, vii. 267), in a speech to his successor, calls him 'one of the gravest and most reverend judges of this kingdom.' The numerous references to and reports by him in the State Paper Office prove the great respect that was entertained for his judgment by the government. He was interred in the chapel of Oxhey House, near Watford, which he had founded in 1612, under a monument on which he is represented in his robes.

He was thrice married. His first wife was Margaret, daughter and heir of Oliver Skinner, Esq., by whom he had one son: his second was Mary, daughter of Hugh Stapers, Esq., who brought him one son and three daughters; and his third was Helen, daughter of John Saunderson, merchant of London, and widow of John Hyde, citizen and mercer of London, by whom he had no children. His male issue soon failed, but all his daughters married into noble families. One of them was united to Arthur Annesley the first Earl of Anglesea; and her second son by him, christened Altham, was created Baron Altham in Ireland, his descendants eventually succeeding to the earldom. The sixth earl's son failed to make good his claim to the English peerage, which thus became extinct; but he succeeded in regard to the Irish titles, and was created Earl of Mountnorris in Ireland, which title also failed on the death of its second possessor. Another daughter of Sir James Altham married Richard Vaughan, second Earl of Carberry, a title which became extinct in the next generation. The third daughter had three husbands—Sir Francis Astley, of Hill Morton in Warwickshire, knight; Robert, Lord Digby in Ireland; and Sir Robert Bernard, baronet, serjeant-at-law. (Moran's Essex, 505; Wotton's Baronet. iii. 66, 364, iv. 402.)

ALVANLEY, LORD. See R. P. ARDEN.

AMBLY, WILLIAM DE, was one of the many who, having been in arms against King John, returned to their allegiance on the accession of Henry III. After the appointment, in 9 Henry III., of justices itinerant for Norfolk and Suffolk, in one of which his estates were situate, he was joined to those named, in the place of Bartholomew Glanville. (Rot. Claus. i. 340, ii. 77.)

ANDELEY, or AUNDELEY, MAURICE DE, was so called from a town in Normandy. In 17 John he was sent down to Northampton, with Simon de Pateshull and others, to hear a dispute relative to the presentation of the church of Oxenden (Rot. Claus. i. 270); and in Trinity Term 1219, 3 Henry III., he appears as one of the justices at Westminster before whom fines were levied, and as a justice itinerant in various counties, which duty he performed as late as 1230. (Rot. Claus. i. 516 ii. 77.)

ANDERSON, EDMUND. A younger son of the ancient family of Anderson of Northumberland having migrated into Lincolnshire, the first-named as resident in that county is Roger, who had an estate at Wrawby, and was grandfather of Henry, whose son Edward, of Flixborough in the same county, married Joan Clayton, niece to the Abbot of Thornholme. They had three sons—Thomas, who married Ellinor, a daughter of Judge Dalison; Richard, of Roxby; and Edmund, the future chief justice.

Edmund was born about 1530, educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and admitted to the Inner Temple in June 1550. He became reader in Lent 1567, and again in Lent 1574. He was one of seven who were called to the degree of the coif in Michaelmas 1577, and two years afterwards he was nominated queen's serjeant. In this character he went as assistant judge on the Western Circuit in that year, and in November 1581 conducted the trial of Edmond Campion and others for high treason. His introductory speech, which is described as having been 'very vehemently pronounced, with a grave and austere countenance,' is a fair example of the vicious rhetoric of the bar at that period. It seems to be directed more against the pope than the prisoner; and whatever may have been Campion's guilt, he certainly beats the crown lawyers both in eloquence and argument. (State Trials, i. 1051.)

Within six months, on the death of Sir James Dyer, the chief justice of the Common Pleas, Serjeant Anderson was appointed in his place, on May 2, 1582, and soon after knighted. The Recorder Flete-wood, in a letter to Lord Burleigh, relates that on the day of his investiture the Lord Chancellor (Hatton) 'made a short discourse what the dewtie and office of a good justice was;' and that after he was sworn, 'Father Benloos, because he was auncient, did put a short case, and then myself put the next.' To both, he continues, the new chief 'argued very learnedlie and with great facilitie.' Anderson sat as president of that court not only during the remainder of Elizabeth's reign, but for more than two years under James I., a period in the whole exceeding twenty-three years. In the state trials which disgraced the earlier part of his judicial career there is certainly nothing that distinguishes the chief justice from his fellows; all were involved in the disgusting barbarity of the proceedings. He was one of the performers in the farce of Secretary Davison's trial, and was equally puzzled with the rest in drawing that distinction between the propriety of the act itself and the impropriety of its performance, which was necessary for the purpose of justifying the required condemnation. A strenuous supporter of the discipline of the Church of England, he showed himself too severe a condemner of all sectarians; and Browne, the founder of the Brownists, on his trial, and Udall, the Genevan minister, on his examination, felt that the chief justice was not an unprejudiced censor. (State Trials, i. 1229-1271.) He discouraged, however, the 'insolence of office;' and when the mayor of Leicester, who had caused a Maypole to be pulled down, had committed a poor shoemaker for saying that 'he hoped to see more morrice dancing and Maypoles soon,' the chief justice, on coming to the assizes there in 1599, instantly ordered the lover of old customs to be discharged. (Hist. of Leicester, 305.)

As a judge in civil cases he was patient and impartial; his knowledge of law was extensive, and he was ready in its application; and the 'Reports' which he collected, and which were afterwards published, prove the industry and devotedness with which he pursued his profession. His successful resistance of an attempted encroachment on the rights of his place in the case of Cavendish, to whom Queen Elizabeth, at the instigation of Lord Leicester, had granted letters patent for making out writs of supersedeas upon exigents, on the ground that the queen had no power to grant the office, speaks highly for the judicial independence in those arbitrary times.

Sir Edmund died on August 1, 1605, and was buried at Eyworth in Bedfordshire with a handsome monument, on which is represented in his robes.

His first residence was at Flixborough then at Arbury in Warwickshire, where he built a house out of the ruins of the monastery. This he exchanged with the Nidigates for Harefield in Middlesex, to nearer the courts; and there he entertained the queen, who gave him a ring set with diamonds, which was long preserved in family, till one of them had it reset, afterwards gave away the jewels. Losing their identity, the present representatives will not probably be so fortunate. One of the Northumberland Andersons said to have been, who, having dropping into the sea, gave it up for lost, some time after, having bought a cod in market, on opening the fish the ring found in his maw.

The judge married Magdalen, daughter of Christopher Smyth, Esq., of Aun in Hertfordshire, and Ackthorpe in Lincolnshire, and by her had nine children. His eldest son, Edmund, died without issue. His second son, Sir Francis, was the father of Sir John Anderson of St. Ives, who created a baronet in 1628, and the grandfather, by another son, of Sir Stephen derson of Eyworth, who received a baronetcy in 1664; but both these titles have been long extinct. From this Sir Francis also, through another grandson, descended Charles Anderson of Manley, in the county of Broughton in Lincolnshire, who, on inheriting the estates of his maternal uncle, Charles Pelham of Brocklesby in the same county, assumed that name, and was raised to the peerage in 1794 as Charles, earl of Yarborough, a title which was erected in 1837, the second possession of which now represents the chief justice in the House of Lords. The third son of the judge was William, of Lea (a name in Lincolnshire given to him by his father), whose son, Edmund Anderson of Brocklesby, was advanced in 1660 to a baronetcy, and is still enjoyed by his lineal representatives. (Ath. Oxon. i. 753; Wotton's Bar. 191, 427; Collins's Peerage, viii. 30.)

ARCHER, JOHN. Morant, in his history of Essex' (i. 161), relates that the Archers derive themselves from Sir Bois, who attended Henry V. in France, a court, for which he received a pension of five marks a year for his life; and he changed his name to Archer by the command of the king for his excellence at a match before the monarch at Haverhill Bower. John Archer, according to the same authority, was born in 1598.

the son of Simon Archer, an alderman of London, of Coopersale in Theydon-Bois, Essex, by Anne his wife, but his admission to the society of Gray's Inn on January 15, 1617, more correctly described him as the son of Henry Archer, of Haydon Clairon in that county. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and took his degrees of B.A. and M.A. in 1619 and 1622. His call to the bar was in March 1620, and his elevation to the bench of his inn in 1648.

In 1647 he was counsel for the corporation of Grantham, and was engaged in 1651 as one of the counsel for Christopher Love, tried for high treason against the Commonwealth before the High Court of Justice, though he was not allowed to plead for him because he had not taken the engagement. (State Trials, v. 211.) This sufficiently accounts for the fact that he was never employed by Cromwell; though, on his election for Essex in the parliament of 1656, he was one of the members approved by the council. (Parl. Hist. iii. 140.) Soon after the Protector's death he was made a serjeant, on Nov. 27, 1658; and on the restoration of the Long Parliament was one of the judges appointed by that body on May 15, 1659. White-locks does not name the court to which he was then attached, but it may be presumed to have been the Common Pleas, as he is placed there on Jan. 17, 1660, when all the judges are designated with their particular courts. During the short time that elapsed before the return of the king he was assigned to go the Northern Circuit; and though on the Restoration he lost his seat on the bench, he was among the serjeants of the interregnum who were immediately confirmed in the degree by the restored government.

Two years afterwards he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, on Nov. 4, 1663. He sat there for nine years, when his services were interrupted in the Christmas vacation, 1672, by a royal prohibition; the reasons for which were unknown to Sir Thomas Raymond, who reports the fact, and adds that the judge, having been appointed 'quamdiu se bene gesserit,' refused to surrender his patent without a scire facias. As this would not have been a convenient proceeding, he retained his position, and received his share of the fees till his death, though forbidden to sit in the court. His place in the meantime was supplied by Sir William Ellis, who was in his turn removed before Archer's death, to make way for Sir William Scroggs. (Siderfin, i. 3, 163; T. Raymond, 217; T. Jones, 41.)

The only account of Archer as a judge is by Roger North (Life, 45-48), who says that he was one of those 'of whose abilities time hath kept no record, unless in a sinister way;' and he describes him as always desirous of staving off a long cause, relating the mode in which Sir Francis North (afterwards lord keeper) played upon this weakness. He survived his removal more than nine years, dying on Feb. 8, 1682. His burial-place is in the churchyard of Theydon, where there is a monument to him.

He had two wives: one was Mary, daughter of Sir George Saville, Bart.; and the other Eleanor, daughter of Sir John Curzon, Bart. His son John by the latter lived at Coopersale in Theydon Garnon, and was knighted. (Wotton's Baronet. i. 162, ii. 246, 347.)

ARDEN, or ARDERNE, RALPH DE, was son-in-law of Ranulph de Glanville, having married his second daughter, Amabilia. With this connection it is natural that he should have received employment in the king's service; and we accordingly find him sheriff of Hereford, where he had considerable property, from 1184 to 1189. (Fuller's Worthies.) In the latter year he was amerced in the large sum of 65*l.* for thirteen days' neglect in attending at the Exchequer according to his summons. (Mador, ii. 235.) In the same year, probably just before his father-in-law had retired from the place of chief justiciary, he acted as a justice itinerant in Shropshire, Herefordshire, Gloucestershire, and Staffordshire.

The Pipe Roll of 6 Richard I., 1195 (95, 144, 168, 248), charges him as a debtor in Essex and Hertfordshire for 36*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* for his fine, and for having benevolentiam regis. But in 1198 he had recovered the king's favour, and accounts on the Norman Roll of that year as bailiff of Pont-Audemer, in which office he was succeeded, on the accession of King John, by Walter de Ely (Rot. Norm. ii. observations), and probably died soon after. His wife, however, had died before 6 Richard I., for in that year Thomas de Arden, their son and heir, was engaged in a lawsuit relative to the partition of the property of Ranulph de Glanville, who, previous to his departure to the Holy Land, had devised it among his three daughters. (Rot. Cur. Regis, 24.) This Thomas was alive in 14 John, when a compromise was effected between him and the Bohuns, with whom his father and he had been in litigation for some years.

ARDEN, or ARDERNE, RALPH DE, was, there is little doubt, the grandson of the justice itinerant last named, and the son of Thomas de Arden. (Preface to Coke's 8th Report.) He is mentioned by Dugdale as a justicier in 9 John, 1207, and by Mr. Hunter in the next year, when fines were levied before him at Derby.

He had previously incurred the king's displeasure, and in 3 John fined 272l. 12s. 6d. for the royal favour (Rot. Cancell. 147), but in the following year he was employed in the king's service, being sent with Gerard de Rodes to Otho, King of the Romans, with an allowance of five marks for their passage. (Madux, ii. 340.) Two years afterwards he accompanied the abbot of Insula and Eustace de Fauconberg to Flanders, the sheriff of Kent being commanded to provide a good and secure ship to convey them. (Rot. Claus. i. 16.)

He endowed the priory of Butley, in Sussex, which was founded by Ranulph de Glanville, with half the town of Bawdesey, part of the inheritance which he had acquired through that great justiciary; and by his wife Agnes he left a son named Thomas. (Monast. vi. 381; Rot. Cur. Regis, i. 121.)

ARDEN, or ARDERNE, JOHN. To which particular branch of this ancient and numerous family he belonged no means of tracing are left. He was an officer of the Exchequer in the reign of Henry V., under whom and his successor he held the place of clerk and supervisor of the king's works. He received 23l. 6s. 8d. for making the tomb of Henry V. in Westminster Abbey; and various sums were advanced to him for the repair of the Tower of London and the palace of Westminster, and for building the prison in Wallingford Castle. In 7 Henry VI. he was appointed with William Fitz-Harry to enquire respecting certain jewels, gold, and silver which had been conveyed into the castles of Picardy without the king's licence; and so late as July 1443 he was a clerk of the works sent to York to superintend the repairs of 'all that was drowen down belongyng to the church of York,' being the property of the archbishop which had been destroyed in a popular commotion, and which the Earl of Northumberland had been awarded to restore. (Devon's Issue Roll, 376, 384, 385, 436; Acts Privy Council, iii. 64, 243, 329, v. 309, and Introd. cxxiii.)

On February 5, 1444, 22 Henry VI., he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer, an office which seems to have been granted to him as an honourable retirement from active life, as there is no later notice of his name.

His services were requited by the grant of the custody of the priory of Elyngbam in Hants, and the manor of Totyngbek in Surrey, at small reserved rents, which were afterwards assigned by the king to the support of Eton College. (Rot. Parl. v. 48.)

ARDEN, or ARDERNE, PETER, was not improbably the son of the above John Arderne. In 18 Henry VI. he was deputy of William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, the chief seneschal of the king in his duchy of Lancaster. (Plumpton Corresp. liii.) He took the degree of the cof on February 1, 1443, 21 Henry VI., during the two years after which his name frequently occurs an advocate in the cases recorded in the Year Books. He was afterwards made one of the king's serjeants, and was raised to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer on May 2, 1448, 26 Henry VI., and June 7 following was constituted also judge of the Common Pleas; thus, like three of his predecessors—Cokayne, Babbinton, and Juyn—holding both places at same time. (Rot. Parl. p. 2, m. 9.)

On the accession of Edward IV., 14 being then a knight, his patents for his offices were renewed, and he continued to act in the double capacity till September 10 in the following year, when a new baron being substituted for him, he retained the judgeship of the Court of Common Pleas, and fines were acknowledged by him so late as Easter 1467. From a baron in the Year Book 3 Edw. IV., p. 9, which he is called 'late chief baron of the Exchequer, and now justice of the Court Bench et secundar,' it would seem that he also remained in the Exchequer as a baron; but the meaning of the title is very clear. He had a grant of a coat of arms for his life, which was excepted from the act of resumption passed in 4 Edw. IV. (Rot. Parl. v. 528.) He died June 2, 1467.

He and his wife Catherine founded a chantry in the church of Nettlesworth, Essex; and another was endowed in the neighbouring parish of Lattin, a manor of which belonged to him, and a monumental brass now lies over his tomb. (Morant's Essex, ii. 439; Inquis. p. 382; Gough's Monum. ii. 216.)

ARDEN, RICHARD PEPPER (LORD VANLEY), belonged to the same family, but the connection has not been traced. His great-grandfather was John Arderne of Harden; his grandfather was John Arderne, buried at Stockport 1703; and his father was John Arden, who by his marriage with the daughter of Cuthbert Pepper, Pepper Hall in Yorkshire, had a son of whom he was the younger.

He was born at Bredbury in 1661, after attending the grammar-school of Manchester, was admitted a student and commoner of Trinity College, Cambridge, in October 1703, having in the year been entered at the Middle Temple. He was named seventh wrangler in 1709 when he took his B.A. degree, and was elected in 1769 fellow of his college. He proceeded M.A. His appointment to the office of clerk of the peace did not prevent him from joining the True Blue Club, as well college, his gaiety and good-humour gained him the favour of his fellow-students. By the heads of the house he was no less respected, and was entrusted by them with the revision of their statutes. Called to the bar in 1769, he took his seat in the court of Chancery, and, according to the practice of the time, joined the Northern Circuit. At a very early period he was, by family interest, appointed recorder of Macclesfield, near his native place; and in 1778, when he had been scarcely seven years at the bar, he was constituted one of the judges on the South Wales Circuit, in conjunction with Daines Barrington. His chambers were in Stone Buildings, Lincoln's Inn, and it is said that those occupied by William Pitt were on the same staircase; but as he was fourteen years the senior of the great minister, the intimacy that existed between them must have commenced at a later period, and certainly could not have influenced his nomination to the Welsh judgeship, nor probably his advance to the honour of a silk gown, which he received in Michaelmas Term 1780, while Lord Thurlow was chancellor. This advance, especially considering that he was no favourite with his lordship, shows that he had gained a considerable standing at the bar. What was the origin of their mutual dislike is not very clear, since they were equally free of tongue and careless of observation. The chancellor was fond of snubbing Mr. Arden, and one day, the latter having in the excitement of his argument, in a cause in which the age of a woman was in dispute, said to the opposing counsel, 'I'll lay you a bottle of wine she is more than forty-five,' at once, seeing the indecency, apologised to the chancellor, declaring that he forgot where he was. Thurlow growled forth, 'I suppose you thought you were in your own court,' alluding to the free and easy manner in which the proceedings in the Welsh courts were then conducted.

When Lord Shelburne became prime minister on the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, in July 1782, Mr. Arden, no doubt by the instrumentality of his friend Mr. Pitt, then chancellor of the Exchequer, was, notwithstanding the disinclination of Lord Thurlow, appointed solicitor-general on November 7, and was elected M.P. for Newton in the Isle of Wight. On the dissolution of that ministry in the following April he of course retired; but in nine months, the Coalition Ministry being in their turn discarded, and Mr. Pitt entrusted with the conduct of affairs, Mr. Arden was restored to his place, in December 1783. He only held it for three months, when, on March 31, 1784, he succeeded Lord Kenyon, both as attorney-general and chief justice of Chester. During this time he strenuously opposed Mr. Fox's East India Bill, and was an unflinching supporter of Mr. Pitt in his memorable contest with the coalesced opposition immediately after his appointment. For the new parliament of May 1784, which confirmed the ministerial power, Mr. Arden was returned member for Aldborough in Yorkshire, and in those of 1790 and 1796 he represented Hastings and Bath respectively. In all the parliaments he was a frequent and effective, though not a brilliant, speaker. He exposed himself in 1784 to some just censure by proposing a loose enactment with reference to elections; and by indiscreet acknowledgments he laid himself open to the sarcastic taunts of his opponents. The shafts of the writers of the 'Rolliad' and of the 'Probationary Odes' were levelled against him, as well for his want of law as of personal beauty. But the good-humour with which he met these attacks disarmed them of their sting and silenced his assailants.

On the elevation of Lord Kenyon he succeeded as master of the Rolls, on June 4, 1788, notwithstanding Lord Thurlow's opposition, which was only silenced by a significant hint from the king. The animosity and disrespect of the defeated chancellor were unhandsomely shown against the new master on all occasions, and particularly by calling upon Mr. Justice Buller to sit for him when he was ill, or idle, which was frequently the case. The master of the Rolls was too good-natured and too wise to retaliate. He discreetly avoided the slightest appearance of any angry feelings existing between the judges; and the only revenge he took for the chancellor's dislike was by proving his antagonist mistaken in his estimate of him; and indeed at the same time surprising the legal profession by the excellent manner in which he decided the various cases in equity that came before him, his judgments being far the best that were pronounced in the court of Chancery during the period in which he sat. He was knighted at his promotion. After enduring philosophically the roughness of Thurlow for four years, he worked for nine more with complete harmony under Lord Loughborough, on whose retirement from the Seals, and the elevation of Lord Eldon to the chancellorship, Sir Richard was on May 30, 1801, constituted lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, which Lord Eldon had vacated. On the 22nd of that month he had been created a peer by the title of Lord Alvanley, a manor in the parish of Frodsham in Cheshire, which had been in the possession of his family ever since the reign of Henry III.

He performed the judicial functions of his new position with great efficiency and learning for nearly three years; when to the regret of all he was suddenly seized, while presiding in the House of Lords for Lord Eldon, with a violent attack of inflammation, which after three days of suffering terminated fatally, on March 19, 1804. He died at his house in Great George Street, Westminster, and was buried in the chapel of the Rolls.

As a judge he falsified the jokes of his early opponents by proving himself a good lawyer and a conscientious administrator of justice; and to the last he preserved the character he had borne from the commencement of his career, of a hearty, good-humoured, and entertaining companion, and of a simple, steady, and kind-hearted friend. His advance in dignity had not the common effect of rendering him either proud, formal, or reserved; neither did it have the better effect of sobering the quickness of his temper. His occasional irritabilities indeed made the French interpretation of his name, 'Mons. Poivre Ardent,' peculiarly applicable. These however were slight failings, and did not prevent his being universally esteemed, or being looked upon with affection and respect by 'troops of friends,' one of the earliest, most intimate, and steady of whom was the great minister William Pitt.

In 1784 he married Anne Dorothea, daughter of Richard Wilbraham Bootle, Esq., of Lathom Hall in Lancashire, the father of the first Lord Skelmersdale. This lady survived her husband till 1825. Of their children the two eldest sons held the title successively, which on the death of the latter in 1857 became extinct. (Lives by Jardine, W. C. Townsend, &c.)

ARESEY, or D'ARCY, NORMAN DE, was the fifth in descent from his namesake the founder of this noble family, whose chief seat was situate at Nocton in Lincolnshire, where he had thirty-three lordships from the immediate gift of the Conqueror. He was the son of Thomas de Aresey and Johanna, who afterwards married William de Lauda, and succeeded his father in 7 John, giving to the king a fine of six hundred marks, two palfreys, and a complete horse for livery of his lands. (Rot. de Fin. 340, 349.) He accompanied the king on his expedition to Ireland in 1210 (Rot. de Præst. 187-229); but, joining in the confederacy against him in 1215, his lands were seized into the king's hands for the remainder of that reign; nor were they restored under Henry III. till he had given hostages for his future fidelity. (Rot. Claus. i. 249, 311, 320.) That his subsequent conduct was quiet and loyal appears from his receiving in 3 Henry III. the confirmation of the grant of a market at his manor of Nocton, which had been made to him in 16 John (Rot. Pat. 201), presenting to his sovereign a goss hawk of Norway for the privilege, and from his being one of those employed in 9 Hen. III. to conduct the quinsims, which had been collected for the county of Lincoln to Northampton. (Rot. Claus. ii. 74.)

On the circuits which were appointed August 1, 1234, he was placed as a just itinerant for Lincolnshire; and in 12 for the counties of Nottingham and Derby.

He died shortly before October 16, 12 when livery of his lands was ordered to be made to Philip, his son and heir. (cerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 198.)

This barony fell into abeyance among daughters about 1340. Another barony Darcy was created in a younger son of of Norman's successors, in 1332, which fell into abeyance in 1418. A third barony was created in 1509 in another branch of whose descendants was advanced to earldom of Holderness in 1682, which came extinct in 1778; but the barony Conyers, which was also in the family descended to the deceased earl's daughter who married the Duke of Leeds. (dale's Baron. i. 369.)

ARFASTUS, or HERFASTUS, by the Norman, was one of the chaplains of William the Conqueror before his invasion of England. He had previously been abbot in the Abbey of Bec in Normandy, from the greater ignorance of his brethren his slender pretensions to learning were some show. It seems, however, that he was merely lucus inter strabones, a fool among the blind; and it is related after Lanfranc had raised the charter of the abbey, Arfastus, as one of the chaplains, visited it in great pomp. Lanfranc, soon discovering his deficiencies somewhat rudely ridiculed and rebuked them; an indignity which Arfastus avenged by procuring his temporary imprisonment and banishment. (Godwin de Præst.)

After the Conquest, Arfastus came in great favour with King William, and became his chancellor. The date of his appointment does not appear; but it is certain that he held the office at least till 1068, his name with that of Lanfranc being attached to the charter which William then granted to the church of St. Martin-le-Grand in London. (vi. 1324), it is not unlikely that he was William's first chancellor. During his followers, Oldmixon and Lord Somers give the date of 1073 to the same charter, an inspection of which will prove the error. Thynne, Philipot, and Somers state it correctly.

He was chancellor in the follo-
1069, being an attesting witne
William's charter to the church
(Monast. ii. 531); and proba about the middle of the year he received the bishopric of Norfolk—not Helmastadt in C

Oldmixon and Lord Campbell erroneously assert.

In 1075, in consequence of the mandate of the council of London that the episcopal sees should be transferred from villages to the most eminent towns in their dioceses, this see was removed to Thetford; and the bishop made a subsequent attempt to fix it at Bury. Alleging that a great part of the revenues then belonging to the monastery there had been alienated from the see by his predecessor, he took active measures against the Abbot Aylwin; but that dignitary, claiming to be exempt from the episcopal jurisdiction, strenuously defended the rights of his house; and the contest, notwithstanding the bishop's interest with the king, was decided against him in 1081. There are letters of Pope Gregory VII. to Lanfranc abusing Arfastus plentifully for his behaviour to the monks of Bury.

Thynne places Arfastus as chancellor again in 1077 (Holinshed, iv. 348), and Philipot (p. 4) mentions Maurice in the same year, but as they neither cite any authority, and as there is proof that Maurice was chancellor probably in 1078, and certain'ly in 1081, when the above decision was pronounced between the bishop and the abbot, no sufficient ground is offered for reliance on this statement.

That he was not deprived, however, of the royal favour is evidenced by the grant which he received of all the churches and various other possessions in Thetford; where, assisted by Roger Bigod, he rebuilt the church of St. Mary, and spared neither pains nor cost in augmenting and improving his see.

He died in 1084, and was buried in his cathedral. Weever (785, 827) has preserved his epitaph. He bequeathed his possessions among Richard and his other sons, who, no doubt, were born long before the promulgation of the decree of the synod of Winchester in 1076, enforcing the celibacy of the clergy. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 404; Norwich, i. 463.)

ARGENTINE, REGINALD DE, is named by Fuller in his 'Worthies of England' as sheriff of the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon in 6 & 7 Richard I. An entry, however, on the roll of 5 John discharges him from the payment of ten marks 'de dono,' which he had promised for the sheriffalty of those counties, because he never had that office, but only accounted as sub-sheriff to the chancellor (Madox, i. 206), William de Longchamp, Bishop of Ely. He was no doubt, therefore, an officer of the court at that time, and appears to have held Wilmundeles Magna, in Hertfordshire, 'per serjentiam pincerniarum.' (Rot. Cur. Regia, 162.)

His name stands at the end of a list of five justices itinerant who held pleas in

Essex and Hertfordshire in 1193 (Madox, ii. 20), of which counties he was afterwards sheriff; and his presence as a justice in the court at Westminster in the following reign is evidenced by fines in 3 & 4 John, 1201-2, being levied there before him. (Hunter's Preface.)

At the close of the reign he joined the barons and lost his lands; but restitution was made in 1 Henry III., on returning to his allegiance.

ARGENTINE, GILES DE, was the grandson of the above Reginald de Argentine, and the son of Richard, who was one of the justices in Normandy under King John, and steward of the household under Henry III. (Madox, i. 63, 156.) In 1247, on his father's death, Giles did homage for the lands held in capite, and paid 10*l.* for his relief. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 5.) He was a knight of great valour, and had been actively engaged in the wars with the Welsh, by whom he was taken prisoner in 16 Henry III.

He was made governor of Windsor Castle, and in 1253 he was at the head of the justices itinerant for Berkshire, Oxfordshire, and other counties, and was present in that year as judge at Alton, in Hampshire, when William de Insula took John le Falconer by the throat in open court. (Abbrev. Piac. 132.)

After the battle of Lewes, when the king fell into the hands of the barons, Giles de Argentine joined the latter, and was selected as one of the council to govern the realm. While in this office, the chancellor, Thomas de Cantelupe, during a temporary absence, delivered the Seal to Ralph de Sandwich, to be kept by him under the seals of Giles de Argentine and two others. The manor of Witherfield, which he had lately purchased, was seized from him as a rebel, and given back to Robert de Stuteville, its original proprietor. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 39.) He died in 1283, leaving a son, Reginald, who was summoned to parliament in 25 Edward I.; but neither he, nor any of his descendants, afterwards. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 615.)

ARMYN, WILLIAM. See W. ERMYN.

ARNULPH. See RANULPH.

ARUNDEL, EARL OF. See W. DE ALBINI.

ARUNDEL, ROGER, was of the clerical profession, and is generally mentioned with the addition of 'Magister.' He was one of the fermers of the see of York during its vacancy at the end of the reign of Henry II., and he and his colleagues account for it up to 1 Richard I. (Madox, i. 309, 655.) In that year he held pleas with Hugh Pusar, Bishop of Durham, and others, as a justice itinerant in Yorkshire, and in the ninth year of that reign performed the same duty in all the northern counties. (Pipe Roll, 9, 84.) In the following reign he acted as a justicier, his name appearing on fines levied before him in 4 and 8 John. (Hunter's Preface.)

He died a few years afterwards, and his property must have been of considerable amount, as in 15 John his nephew, Thomas de Holm, paid a fine of 500 marks and five palmfrens for having his land in Yorkshire and Leicestershire. (Rot. de Fin. 491.)

ARUNDEL, or FITZ-ALAN, THOMAS DE, the latter being his family name; but according to the common practice of the time, especially among the clergy, he adopted that of Arundel, from his birth-place or his father's title. He was the third son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and Eleanor his second wife, who was the fifth daughter of Henry Plantagenet, third Earl of Lancaster, and the widow of John, Lord Beaumont. Born about 1352, and educated for the priesthood, he soon found the benefit of his noble connections, by being made Archdeacon of Taunton in 1373, and Bishop of Ely in 1374, before he was of canonical age for either preferment.

Attached to the party of the Duke of Gloucester, he assisted that prince in rectifying the misgovernment of King Richard, and opposing the unworthy favourites of that unfortunate monarch. On his application to the chancellor, Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, for the restoration of the temporalities to the Bishop of Norwich, the proud earl rebuked him, saying, 'What is it, my lord, that you now ask of the king? Seems it to you a small matter for him to part with the temporalities, when they yield to his coffers 1,000*l.* a year? Little need has the king of such counsellor to his loss.' Whereupon Bishop Arundel thus roundly retorted: 'What is it that you say, my lord Michael? Know that I desire not of the king that which is his own; but that which, by the counsel of you and such as you, he unjustly detains from other men, and which will never do him any good. If the king's loss weigh with you, why did you greedily accept 1,000 marks per annum when you were made an earl?' On the disgrace of that earl, Arundel was appointed chancellor, on October 24, 1386 (Rot. Claus. m. 35), and in the following month was passed the act which placed the royal authority in the hands of eleven commissioners. In the next parliament he presided, when his predecessor, and the Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neville, Archbishop of York, Chief Justice Tresilian, and Nicholas Brambre were charged with high treason. One of the immediate effects of their conviction was his own appointment to fill the vacant archbishopric of York, the pope's bull for his translation to which was dated April 3, 1388. (Rymer, vii. 574.)

Soon after the temporalities of the arch-

bishopric were restored to him he retired from the chancellorship, being succeeded that office on May 3, 1389, by William Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, on whose resignation, on September 27, 1391, the Great Seal was again entrusted to him (Rot. Claus. ii. m. 5 and m. 34.) On each of his appointments as chancellor he received a patent from the king, stating that as he has no domains or villas pertaining to his bishopric near London, where people, family, and horses can be entertained while he is in the office of chancellor, the king assigns to him for his livings by virtue of his office, the villas and parishes of Hakeney and Leyton on the first division, and Stebenhyth on the second, so his people, &c., may be entertained the liberally and without impediment. (Rymer, vii. 553-708.)

There is a curious instance of the application of the word 'uncle' in a letter to him from Henry of Lancaster, Earl of Derby (afterwards Henry IV.), who dresses him as 'his very dear and entirely well-beloved uncle.' (Prings in Chancery, temp. Eliz. i. 7.) The actual relationship between them was Henry's mother, Blanch, the wife of John of Gaunt, was the granddaughter of the archbishop's grandfather, through his mother's elder brother, and was consequently the archbishop's first cousin; thus appears that it was the custom of age for children to designate their cousins of their parents as uncles and a practice which is still prevalent in the present day.

On the death of Archbishop Courtenay he was translated, in 1396, to the see of Canterbury, being the first instance of a removal from one archbishopric to another. He thereupon resigned the Great Seal, on September 27 (Rot. Claus. m. 22), having held it on this second occasion for five years. With the accession of the highest ecclesiastical position, prosperity forsook him for a time; shortly afterwards King Richard II. in a subservient parliament, threw off the control of the party of the Duke of Gloucester and determined to punish all who were implicated in the proceedings against the former favourites. One of the first was the archbishop's brother, Thomas Earl of Arundel; and immediately his condemnation the Commons on September 20, 1397, to impeach the archbishop of high treason. The principal argument against him was that, being the confidant of the king, his chancellor, he had advised in making the commission in the tenth year of the king's reign, the royal authority was, in fact, in the hands of certain lords there, and that he put the said commission to execution. This fact, which the could not deny, being declared to be treason, he was thereupon convicted and sentenced to be banished the realm, and all his property to be confiscated. The king gave him six weeks to depart (Rymer, viii. 31), with a promise to recall him, which he treacherously broke.

Arundel joined Henry of Bolingbroke in his invasion of the realm, and, on King Richard's arrest, was placed for a third time in the chancellorship, in August 1399, holding it, however, for little more than ten days (Hardy's Catal. 46), when the Seal was placed in the hands of John de Scarle, the master of the Rolls.

The renunciation of the unfortunate king was made to the archbishop at Conway, and afterwards repeated at Westminster on September 30, when Henry was led by the primate to the vacant throne. He opened the parliament six days afterwards, and was in a short time replaced in full possession of the temporalities of his see.

The attempts hitherto made for the suppression of the opinions of Wickliffe having proved ineffectual, a statute was passed in 2 Henry IV. authorising the burning of heretics. Although probably the archbishop was no more guilty than the rest of his episcopal brethren in obtaining this detestable act, he cannot be acquitted of the disgrace of being the first who pressed its execution, and who sullied the English annals by bringing a man for his opinions to the stake. Within a month after the passing of the statute he delivered a priest named William Sautre over to the secular power to undergo the horrible sentence (Rymer, viii. 178), and ere his career was closed some others suffered under his condemnation.

His strenuous support of the rights of the Church was prominently shown in the bold resistance he made to the representation of the Commons to the king in 1405, that the royal necessities might be supplied by seizing on the revenues of the clergy. The king, fearful of offending that order, gave effect to the reprimand pronounced by the archbishop, and the Commons took nothing by their motion. He enjoyed King Henry's favour during the whole of his reign, and was for the fourth time constituted chancellor on January 30, 1407. His continuance in office on this occasion was only till December 21, 1409 (Rot. Claus. m. 35 and m. 3); but after an interval of about two years he was restored to it, on January 5, 1412, and retained it till the death of the king on March 20, 1413. (Hardy, 48.)

Thus did he hold the highest judicial office of the realm no less than five times, the aggregate extent of his tenure being eleven years and about eight months, out of twenty-six years and a half from his first appointment. We want little further evidence to show that he must have been a man of great vigour and capacity for business; and he left a high reputation as well for learning and intelligence as for personal courage.

That he was not re-appointed chancellor on the accession of Henry V. seems to have arisen from a dispute with the king while he was Prince of Wales. Of this we have no other notice than a reference which was made to it in the instructions given to certain lords in the following reign, with the view of accommodating the contention between the Duke of Gloucester, and Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, the chancellor. It is apparent that the prince had then required Arundel's removal; and it looks as if he took the opportunity of his accession to effect his object.

His death took place at the rectory of Hackyngton on the 20th of the following February, at the age of sixty-two, and he was buried in Canterbury Cathedral. His disease was an inflammation of the throat, which increased so much as to prevent his taking any nutriment. The superstition of the time traced its commencement to the day on which he pronounced sentence against Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, for heresy, and asserted that it was a judgment of God that he, who had deprived the people of food for the soul, should himself suffer for want of food for the body. But, whatever may be our own opinions of these persecutions at the present time, we must not judge harshly of those who, brought up with strictness in their religious tenets, would naturally look with abhorrence on, and use every effort to exterminate, those ridiculers of their faith whose constant endeavour was to subvert the principles in which they had been educated, and to slight the authority they had been accustomed to reverence. His liberality to the three cathedrals over which he presided shows that a love of money was not one of his vices; and some Latin verses in 'his grace and commendation,' quoted by Weever (226), afford evidence of the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries.

ASGWARDEBY, ADAM DE, as Abbot of Bardney, was placed in the commission for justices itinerant for Lincolnshire, dated August 1, 1234, 18 Henry III. He was elected abbot in 1225, and resigned the office in 1237. (B. Willis, i. 30.)

ASHE, ALAN DE, is noted as an advocate in the Year Books of the early part of the reign of Edward III. He was made a baron of the Exchequer on July 2, 1346, and he had his robes in 21 Edward III. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 102), but beyond that date all the published records are silent about him.

ASHHURST, WILLIAM HENRY, derived his name from Ashhurst, near Wigan, in Lancashire, where his family was resident soon after the Conquest. It comprehended some famous knights, members of parliament, and merchants, one of whom was Sir William Ashhurst, lord mayor of London in 1693. Henry Ashhurst, one of the younger branches, settled at Waterstock in Oxfordshire, and was created a baronet by James II. in July 1688, but the title became extinct in 1732. The Waterstock property then devolved on Diana, the only child of Sir Richard Allin, Bart. of Somer-Leighton in Suffolk, by the daughter of Sir Henry Ashhurst; and by her marriage with Thomas Henry Ashhurst, vice-chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and recorder of Liverpool and Wigan, the representative of the elder branch, the two estates became united. They were the parents of several children, the third son, and eventually the heir, being William Henry, the future judge.

He was born at Ashhurst on January 25, 1725, and was educated at the Charter House. After his admission to the Inner Temple in 1750 he practised as a special pleader under the bar, one of his pupils being his future colleague on the bench, Mr. Justice Buller. In 1754 he became a barrister, and in that character pursued an honourable career for twenty years, during which he was appointed to the office of auditor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

On June 25, 1770, he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench, and was then knighted. He sat in that court no less than twenty-nine years, preserving the character of an impartial administrator of justice, and a careful expounder of the law, united with a benevolent heart and polished manners. His countenance was expressive of the kindness and amiability of his disposition, but, being rather lank, was often made a subject for the barristers' jokes. Mr. (afterwards Lord) Erskine is said to have indited this complimentary couplet on him:

Judge Ashhurst, with his lantern jaws,
Throws light upon our English laws.

He was twice entrusted with the custody of the Great Seal as one of the commissioners—the first time from April 9 to December 23, 1783, during the interval between the two chancellorships of Lord Thurlow; and the second from June 15, 1792, to January 28, 1793, between that lord's retirement and the appointment of Lord Loughborough. While acting in that capacity he still performed his duties in the King's Bench, and during the latter period he delivered, in November 1792, a very able address to the grand jury of Middlesex on the subject of the seditious meetings and corresponding societies which were consequent on the French Revolution.

On June 9, 1799, being then in the seventh year of his age, he resigned his seat on the bench, and retired to his residence at Waterstock, where, eight years afterwards, he died, on November 5, 1807.

By his wife, Grace, daughter of John Whalley, of Oxford, M.D., and sister Sir John Whalley Smythe Gardiner, Bart. (whom he married after he became a judge, he left several children, the descendant whom now reside on the family estate hold a distinguished position in the country (Croke Family, 377, 559; Blackstone's 719.)

ASKE, RICHARD, belonged to a young branch of an ancient Yorkshire family seated at Richmond. His grandfather Richard Aske of Aughton was high sheriff of the county in 1688; his father was John of the same place; and his mother Christiana, daughter of Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, knight. When admitted member of the Inner Temple in 1660 he was described as of Rides Park in the county. He was called to the bar on January 29, 1614, but did not reach the office of reader till Lent 1636. His connection with the Fairfaxes probably introduced him to the notice of the parliamentary party. He was employed by Mr. Stroud, the imprisoned members in 1629, to oppose against the return to the habeas corpus in several actions on that side of the question. (Rushworth, i. App. 18; Coke's Papers [1625-6], 47.) On October 16, 1643, the Commons specially recommended him to the lord mayor and aldermen of London to be elected one of the special pleaders; and in June 1644 both the commons and attorney of the king presented him with the valuable office of coroner and attorney of the king's Bench. (Journ. iii. 380, 52.) He was next selected as junior counsel in the trial of King Charles; and on October 16, 1649, the parliament nominated him a justice of the Upper Bench. He was made a serjeant for the purpose. (Trials, iv. 1054; White Locke, 405.) A short time, in June 1655, he was made a judge in the court (Style's Rep. 105.) On June 23, 1653, he died. (Pecuniary Cur. B. xiv. 29.)

ASKEBY, ROBERT DE, as early as the reign of Edward I., 1297, held some office in the Chancery, all the writs of Præcipe directed to the chancellor after his embarkation to Flanders were delivered into his custody. (Parliamentary Hist. 56.) Like his fellows, he was an ecclesiastic; and as parson of Halesington in Oxfordshire he was employed in a suit with the abbot of Oates. (Abb. Placit. 246.) In the reign of Edw. I., he was rector of Hale in Oxfordshire, and in the parliament at that time was one of the proctors for the Lincoln. In 8 Edw. II. it was his business to make up the parliament roll; and in the following year, when he was appointed one of the receivers of the petitions for England, he is styled a clerk in the Chancery. (Rot. Parl. i. 189, 290, 350, 460.)

On August 16, 1316, the chancellor, John de Sandale, being about to proceed from York to London, on the business of his election to the bishopric of Winchester, was desired to leave the Great Seal in the custody of William de Ayremynne, the keeper of the Rolls, under the seals of two clerks of the Chancery, of whom Robert de Aakeby was one. The same course was adopted on November 9, 1317, when the same chancellor went to his bishopric on business; and again, from February 13 to 19, 1318, on the bishop's taking a pilgrimage to St. Thomas of Canterbury; and on March 20, when he went to Leicester. (Clau. 10 & 11 Edw. II.)

In the following June, and subsequently under John de Hotham, Bishop of Ely, the new chancellor, the Seal was left in the same manner; with directions to do the business of the Chancery during his absence. Robert de Aakeby, however, obtained leave to return home from Northampton on July 20, and his name does not appear later than the following year.

A Robert de Askby was appointed chancellor of Ireland in 15 Edward III., 1341. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 140.)

ASTON, RICHARD, belonged to the very ancient family of Aston of Aston in Cheshire, dating from the reign of Henry II., to the head of which Charles I., in 1628, granted a baronetcy. The judge was grandson of the second and brother of the fifth baronet, both named Sir Willoughby Aston. His father was Richard Aston of Wadley, the sixth son of the former; and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of John Warren, Esq., of Oxfordshire.

As a barrister, he was so successful in his practice that he attained in 1759 the rank of king's counsel; from which he was advanced two years afterwards to the office of chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland. Here his career was unfortunate. He found that justice was very loosely administered, it being the common practice for grand juries to find the bills without examining witnesses, but upon the mere inspection of the depositions taken before the committing magistrate. Against this and other irregularities the chief justice naturally remonstrated; but his representations of the illegality of these proceedings produced no other effect than to create a prejudice against him, which was considerably heightened by the rude and overbearing manner in which he delivered his admonitions. These disputes frequently occurring, the judge's position became so disagreeable that he solicited a removal. Accordingly, on the death of Sir Thomas Denison, he bade adieu to his Irish antagonists, and was transferred to the English court of King's Bench on April 19, 1765, being at the same time knighted.

In this new arena his brusque demeanour nearly led to more serious consequences. On a motion relative to a libel, a barrister had the imprudence to make an affidavit that he believed it to be no libel. This being a mere matter of opinion, Lord Mansfield and the other judges good-naturedly overlooked the impropriety as a foolish ebullition of the lawyer's zeal; but Sir Richard coarsely declared 'that he would not believe such a man's oath.' The barrister, naturally indignant, watched for an opportunity to be revenged, and, tracing the judge's movements, succeeded in detecting him 'in a sale of lottery tickets, presumed to be received as the wages of judicial prostitution in the memorable trials about Wilkes and Junius.' This evidence of guilt was proclaimed in a manly pamphlet and believed by every one, being unanswered and unnoticed by the subject of the charge.

Whether these charges were exaggerated, or wholly true, or partially false, they did not prevent Sir Richard Aston from being entrusted with a more responsible office. On the sudden death of Lord Chancellor Yorke he was appointed one of the commissioners of the Great Seal, on January 21, 1770. As neither of them had had much experience in equity, their rule was not a very distinguished one, and their decisions were supposed to be guided principally by Lord Mansfield's advice. Their trust terminated on January 23, 1771, when Sir Richard resumed his duties in the King's Bench, where he continued till his death, on March 1, 1778.

He married, first, a daughter of — El-dred; and secondly, Rebecca, daughter of Dr. Rowland, a physician of Aylesbury, and widow of Sir David Williams, Bart.; but he left no issue by either.

ASTY, HENRY DE, was connected with the county of Lincoln, in which he held the manor of Burwell, and the advowson of the priory there, paying to the king an annual rent of 100 marks. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 348; Cal. & Inv. Evc. ii. 22.)

Of his official position there is no account until he was raised to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer, on November 12, 1375, 49 Edward III., in which he remained till December 6, 1380, 4 Richard II., when Robert de Plessington was appointed in his stead. He however was still retained on the bench, and acted as a judge of the Common Pleas until Hilary Term 1383.

ATKYNS, EDWARD. No less than four generations of this family, which anciently came from Monmouthshire, attained legal honours. Thomas Atkyns was twice reader in Lincoln's Inn in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., was judge of the Sheriff's Court in London, and argued the first case in Plowden's Reports. Richard, his son, was a reader in Lincoln's Inn in the time of Elizabeth, and chief justice of North Wales. Richard's third son by Eleanor, daughter of Thomas Marsh, Esq., of Waresby in Huntingdonshire, was Sir Edward, the subject of the present sketch, whose two sons, Sir Robert and Sir Edward the younger, followed him in the same career.

Edward Atkyns was born about 1587, and, having been admitted to Lincoln's Inn on February 5, 1600, he was called to the bar on January 25, 1613, became a governor of the society in 1630, and autumn reader in 1632. In the following year he was engaged as counsel for William Prynne, on his prosecution for writing the 'Histriomastix,' and when Prynne was prosecuted a second time in 1637, in conjunction with Bastick and Burton; the two latter, on their sentences being called in question by the Long Parliament in 1640, prayed that he might be one of the counsel assigned for them. He was included in the last call of serjeants made by Charles I. on May 19, 1640, and there is a patent in Rymer, dated on October 7 following, appointing Serjeant Edward Atkyns a baron of the Exchequer. Dugdale, however, does not mention it, and it is evident that, if it really passed the Great Seal, it was never acted on, for when in February 1643 the parliament submitted their propositions to the king, they requested he would make 'Mr. Serjeant Atkyns' a justice of the King's Bench. (State Trials, iii. 564, 761, 763; Rymer, xx. 447; Clarendon, iii. 407.)

The Commons, though then disappointed, soon took upon them to fill the vacancies on the bench, and the serjeant, by their selection, was sworn a baron of the Exchequer on October 28, 1645. He continued till the death of the king, when, objecting to act under the usurping government, he courageously declined to accept a new commission. He was, however, induced afterwards to undertake the judicial office, and on October 19, 1649, he became a judge of the Common Pleas. In May 1654 he was one of the presiding judges on the trial of Don Pantaleon Sa, the Portuguese ambassador's brother, for murder. The subsequent mention of him by Whitelocke (178, 378, 590, 678) as having been made a judge with some others in May 1659 arose, probably, from his being re-appointed by the Long Parliament when they resumed their power. On their second return, after the committee of safety had been dissolved, Atkyns was omitted in the nominations; but on the return of the king, so satisfactory had been the proofs of his loyalty, he was at once placed in his old position as a baron of the Exchequer, and was thereupon knighted. One of his first duties was to sit on the trial of the regicides, and one of the last was to assist in the trial of the rioters in 1688, who were charged with high treason; but neither did he take a prominent part; and on the subsequent discussion of the judge whether the latter offence amounted to high treason, he took the merciful view and several of them were in consequence saved. (State Trials, v. 986, vi. 912.)

He died in Michaelmas vacation 1686 at Albury Hall in Hertfordshire, being then above eighty years of age. By his wife, Ursula, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacre, of St. Andrew le Mott in Kent, he had several children, two of whom became judges. His second wife, Frances, daughter of John Berry, of Hackney, whom he married in 1645, who died in 1703, aged 104, brought no issue. (Atkyn's Gloucestersh. Chauncy's Herts, 149, 301; 1 Sid 435.)

ATKYNs, EDWARD, second of the name, was the youngest son of the preceding judge. Born about 1630, he came, like the rest of his family, a member of Lincoln's Inn in 1648; and having been called to the bar in 1653, he attained the post of reader in autumn 1675, and made a very learned reading, and a very bountiful table. (Chauncy's 149.) In Easter Term 1679 he was made serjeant, and on June 22 following constituted a baron of the Exchequer and knighted. On the trial at York, 1680, of Thomas Thwing and Marwick for high treason, both he and Dolben conducted the proceedings, and summed up the evidence with fairness and impartiality.

James II. promoted him to the office of lord chief baron on April 21, 1686, the removal of Chief Baron Montagu agreeing with the royal claim to the dispensing power. It may therefore be assumed that Sir Edward gave his adhesion to his majesty's opinion, and may very well account for his not being re-appointed at the revolution of 1688, the omission of his name from the list of those who for that reason were excepted from the act of indemnity, probably at the king's consideration for his brother Robert Atkyns, who was then appointed to fill his place.

He declined to take the oath of allegiance to William, and retired to his seat at Albury in Norfolk, where he spent mainder of his life in reconciling differences among his neighbours, who had so great a reliance on his integrity and judgment that they confided the most difficult causes to his decision. He died in London of the stone, in October 1698.

ATKYNs, ROBERT, was the eldest son of the first Sir Edward Atkyns, and the elder brother of the second Sir Edward. He was born in 1621. At which of the universities he was educated is disputed, Chalmers (Orford, 60) claiming him as a member of Balliol College, Oxford, and Dyer (Cambridge, ii. 437) as of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. Admitted to Lincoln's Inn in 1638, he was called to the bar in 1645, became a bencher in 1681, and autumn reader in 1664. Long ere that date he commanded a good business as an advocate, his name appearing frequently throughout Hardres' Reports; and so great was his success in his profession that he was enabled to purchase several estates in Gloucestershire.

Though elected member for Evesham in Protector Richard's parliament of 1659, he was so well reputed for loyalty that on the Restoration he was selected as one of the persons of distinction who were created knights of the Bath at Charles's coronation. About the same time also he was chosen recorder of Bristol, and on the king's marriage was made solicitor-general to the queen. His royal mistress some time after rewarded him with a reversionary grant of the mastership of St. Catharine's, which however did not fall in till the year after his removal from the bench, when the grant was disputed, and the decision was pronounced in favour of his opponent. (Luttrell, i. 118, 145.)

He represented Peurn in the parliament that met in 1661, in which he paid assiduous attention to its business; and on the impeachment of the Earl of Clarendon he spoke against its proceeding. (Parl. Hist. iv. 381.) Little more than two years after his father's death, in 1669, he was himself called to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas, on April 15, 1672. During the eight years he occupied that position he presided with fairness and moderation at many of the trials connected with the popish plot, in the existence of which he appears to have fully believed. He had the misfortune to go the Oxford Circuit with Chief Justice Scroggs, to whom his constitutional opinions were so obnoxious that Scroggs retailed them to the court. Whether Sir Robert was dismissed in consequence, or voluntarily resigned on finding that his colleagues and the government were discontented with him, does not precisely appear. But he received his quietus on February 6, 1680; and on his examination before the House of Commons in 1689 he attributed his removal principally to the two chief justices, besides enumerating other causes—viz., his expressed objections against pensions to parliament men; his assertion of the people's right to petition; and his denial of the king's power without parliament to forbid the publication of books. (Luttrell, i. 35; Parl. Hist. v. 308; State Trials, viii. 193.)

The presumed displeasure of the court stirred up the corporation of Bristol to oust Sir Robert from the recordership, first by prepared insults, and next by a prosecution for a pretended riot in an irregular civil election. They succeeded in procuring a conviction; but the judgment was arrested by the court, Sir Robert appearing in person to argue the case. He was however persuaded for the sake of peace to resign the place, which was the real bone of contention.

During the interval of Sir Robert's retirement he naturally took great interest in the political questions that agitated the country. He advised on the line of defence to be taken by Lord Russell, and after the revolution he issued two tracts in assertion of that nobleman's innocence. He resisted King James's attempt to dispense with the penal statutes, in the publication of a lucid argument proving its illegality. He also printed a discourse relative to the ecclesiastical commission issued by that monarch. These and some other of his tracts were collected in a volume, which was published in 1734. It does not appear that he took any further part in promoting the revolution than attending the Lords on their summons as one of their advisers after James's flight. His reputation as a lawyer was so high as to insure the admission of his name into the lists which King William desired the privy councillors to send in, and he was fixed upon to fill the office of lord chief baron. He is said to have declined it for some time, probably from a disinclination to supersede his brother in the place. But when he saw that his refusal would not secure his brother's re-appointment, he was induced to accept the office. In October 1689, the Great Seal being in commission, Sir Robert was appointed speaker of the House of Lords, over whom he presided till March 1693, when Lord Somers was constituted lord keeper. He resigned his judicial seat on October 22, 1694. He lived about fifteen years more, residing quietly at his manor of Saperton, near Cirencester, where, on February 18, 1710, he died, after half an hour's indisposition. (Luttrell, i. 490, 522, 593, iii. 386, iv. 547.) There is a monument to the memory of him and his father and brother in Westminster Abbey.

By his first wife, Mary, daughter of Sir George Clerk, of Watford in Northamptonshire, he had no issue. By his second wife,

Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacre, and great niece of his father's wife, Ursula Dacre, he had a son, Robert, the author of the 'History of Gloucestershire,' and a daughter, who married into the Tracy family. (Atkyns's Gloucestersh.; Jardine's Life.)

ATKYNS, JOHN TRACY, was the third son of John Tracy, Esq., of Stanway in Gloucestershire (grandson of the third Viscount Tracy), by Anne, the daughter of the above Sir Robert Atkyns. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1732. It does not appear at what date he assumed the name of Atkyns, nor when he discarded it, resuming his father's name; but under the former he received the appointment of cursor baron of the Exchequer on April 22, 1755, and under the latter he made a codicil to his will in 1768. He died on July 24, 1773; and left no issue by his wife, named Katherine.

He had earned the office to which he attained by the industry with which he devoted himself to taking notes in court. His Reports of cases in Chancery during the whole period that Lord Hardwicke presided there, which he had the boldness to publish without the judge's usual allocatur, in three folio volumes, are highly valued for their correctness, and have passed through several editions. Chief Justice Wilmot (Life, 199) describes him in his Diary as 'a cheerful, good-humoured, honest man; a good husband, master, and friend.'

AUBERVILLE, WILLIAM DE, was descended either from a baron of the same name, lord of Berlai in Hertfordshire, or from Roger de Auberville, or Otherville, who held divers lordships in Essex and Suffolk; both of whom flourished in the time of the Conqueror.

His father was Hugh de Auberville, on whose death, in 1130, he was a minor, and was placed under the care of Turgis de Abrincis, who gave three hundred marks of silver and one of gold, with a courser, for his wardship, and for the marriage of Wynanc, his mother, Hugh's widow.

He married Matilda, one of the three daughters of Ranulph de Glanville; and in 1182, 28 Henry II., he was present with that great justiciary at Westminster at the passing of two fines there, and evidently acting as a justicier. (Hunter's Preface.)

He was alive in 6 Richard I., 1194-5, being in that year a party to a suit relative to the partition of the inheritance of Ranulph de Glanville, his father-in-law. (Rot. Cur. Regis, 24.) In 1192 he founded an abbey of white canons of the Præmonstratensian order, removed from Leyston in Suffolk, at West Langdon in Kent, and endowed it with the whole of that manor and with other lands. In his charter of foundation he mentions a son, William, and a daughter, Emma; besides whom he had another son, Hugh, who succeeded him. Hugh's son William left only one daughter, named Joan, who married Nicholas de Criol. (Monast. vi. 898; Baron. 499; Hasted, ix. 401.)

AUDLEY, or ALDITELEY, JAMES was the son of Henry de Aldithley, Heleigh in Staffordshire, who adhered to King John in his troubles, and served the office of sheriff of that county under Henry III., besides being entrusted with the custody of various castles on the marches of Wales. Henry founded the abbey of Hilton in Staffordshire, and died at November 1246, having had by his wife Bertred, daughter of Ralph de Meisnil, of Cheshire, besides this son, a daughter named Emma, who married Griffin, son of Madoc, lord of Bromesfield, a person of great power in Wales.

James, the son and heir, was constituted constable of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and did good service against the Welsh, and in 44 Henry III. was made sheriff of Shropshire and Staffordshire, acting as justice itinerant into Huntingdon, and other counties. In 1263 he was appointed justiciar of Ireland, and in the reference made by the King of France relative to the dispute between Henry III. and the barons, the provisions of Oxford, he was one of the peers who undertook for their solemn observance of the award. But in 1264 he joined Prince Edward when he fled from his keepers at Hereford, and is named as a rebel in the letters issued on that occasion. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 36.)

In 54 Henry III. he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and died two years afterwards, as it is stated, by breaking his fall, his eldest son James doing homage for his father's lands on July 29, 1272. (Cal. Rot. Fin. ii. 574.) His descendants regularly summoned to parliament, the male line terminated on the person of Nicholas, the tenth baron, in 1348; but he, however, survived in John the grandson of his sister, in whose scendants it has remained till the present time. The earldom of Castlehaven, in Wiltshire, was added in 1617, but became extinct in 1777. (Baron. i. 747.)

AUDLEY, THOMAS (LORD ATDLEY) was born, according to Morant, the son of his parents at Earl's Colne in Essex. It is believed that he went to several universities, and, if so, the claim of a liberal education may be preferred, from which he afterwards became a great benefactor. He was not founder of, Magdalen College, Oxford. He studied the law at the Inner Temple, and became autumn reader in 1661. He had held the office of town clerk of London, and had been of the Privy Council, and of the Princess Mary, when she court at Ludlow, (Strickland's Queens, v. 156.)

The step by which he raised himself to eminence seems to have been the obtaining a seat in the House of Commons in 1523, as member for Essex. He was elected speaker of the Black Parliament, that met in November 1529, which was signalised by the fall of Cardinal Wolsey, and by the first attack on the papal power. So zealous were the speaker's services that he was rewarded by being in 1530 appointed attorney for the duchy of Lancaster, and in 1531 king's serjeant.

It was then the practice for the king to communicate with the speaker and certain members of the house on subjects which he intended to come before them; and in all these matters he found Audley so willing an instrument that it was not long before he secured the speaker's services in a still more prominent position.

On May 30, 1532, he succeeded Sir Thomas More in the possession of the Great Seal, with the title of lord keeper, which on January 24, 1533, was changed to that of lord chancellor. (Claus. ii. 16, m. 24.) This office he held for the rest of his life; but during his last illness he sent the Seal to the king, who deposited it temporarily with Sir Thomas Wriothesley during Audley's infirmities, which in a few days terminated in his death. (Claus. p. 1, m. 3.)

Audley had the custody of the Seal for nearly twelve years, a period more disgraceful in the annals of England than any of a similar extent. Within it were comprehended the king's divorce from one queen, after a union of two and twenty years, under pretence of a scruple of conscience; the repudiation of another after a few days' intercourse, on the mere ground of personal antipathy; the execution of two others, one of them sacrificed to obtain a new partner; and innumerable judicial and remorseless murders, those of Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher leading the dreadful array. Even the Reformation, the foundations of which were laid during this period, though producing such glorious results to this country, brings nothing but disgrace on its active originators. Commenced by a despotic tyrant in defiance of the religious tenets which he had himself advocated and which he still professed, the power of the pope was abused solely in revenge for the papal refusal to sanction his divorce; his own imposed supremacy was only used to introduce doctrines which it was equally difficult for Catholics or Protestants to adopt, each suffering in turn from the dilemma in which they were placed; and the monasteries were dissolved, not for the professed purposes of purification, but for the sake of the riches they produced to the king's treasury, and to supply the means of rewarding the subservient minions of his power.

Among these, Audley, who all along acted as a thorough tool to the king, and was a most zealous promoter of the suppression, secured no inconsiderable share of the confiscations, 'carving for himself in the feast of abbey lands,' as Fuller humorously remarks, 'the first cut, and that a dainty morsel.' This was the magnificent priory of the Holy Trinity, or Christchurch, in Aldgate, London, founded in the reign of Henry I. He pulled down the great church, and converted the priory into a mansion for himself, in which he resided during the remainder of his life. It was subsequently called Duke's Place, from his son-in-law the Duke of Norfolk. To this were next added many of the smaller priories in the neighbourhood of Colchester. But he was not satisfied with even these extensive spoils; for having fixed his eye on the rich monastery of Walden in the same county, in suing for it he not only lessened its value, but had the meanness to allege that he had in this world sustained great damage and infamy in his serving the king, which the grant of this abbey would recompense. He succeeded in his application, and took his title from the plunder, when the king, on November 29, 1538, raised him to the peerage as Baron Audley of Walden. The order of the Garter was soon after disgraced by his admission among its members.

The consciousness that the odious laws he had introduced might be turned against himself, and that his fate depended on the momentary whim of an inexorable tyrant, may most probably have brought on, only five years afterwards, that illness which terminated in his death on April 30, 1544. His remains were deposited under a magnificent tomb erected by himself in his chapel at Walden, with an epitaph in verse as contemptible as his career. (Weever, 624.)

Audley has acquired the character of undoubtedly equalling, if he did not exceed, all his contemporaries in servility. The only circumstance that rescues his name from entire opprobrium is his appropriation of part of his ill-gotten wealth to the restoration of the college in Cambridge which Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, had left incomplete, obtaining the King's licence to change its name of Buckingham College to that of St. Mary Magdalen. The only example recorded of his wit is in the application of two of 'Isop's fables' to the case of Sir Thomas More, then in the Tower for conscience' sake, which he related to Alice Allington, Sir Thomas's step-daughter, to show that the conscientious prisoner was only 'obstinate in his own conceits.' One of these was the story of the wise men who hid themselves in caves to avoid the rain which was to make all fools on whom it fell, hoping to rule the fools when the storm was over; but the fools were the more numerous, and would not then be ruled. The other was of the confessions of the lion, the ass, and the wolf, intimating that Sir Thomas's conscience was like that of the ass, who confessed that he had in his hunger taken one straw out of his master's shoe, by which he thought his master had taken cold. More, on receiving a report of the interview, showed that the first tale was a clumsy repetition of one often told to the council by Cardinal Wolsey as a reason for going to war, which fable, he adds, 'dydde in hys dayes help the king and the realme to spend manye a fayre peny.' The second tale he proved not to be Æsop's, and wittily turned the application of both from himself to the relater. (Singer's Roper, 127-138.)

His interference with the king to prevent the introduction of More's name into the bill of attainder with reference to Elizabeth Barton, the Holy Maid of Kent, seems to have been dictated rather by the dread of a defeat in the House of Lords than by any friendly interest in More's behalf. His spiteful reminder to Cromwell, to mark in his report to the king that More would not even swear to the succession 'but under some certaine maner;' his omission as president on the trial of the ex-chancellor, when about to pass the dreadful sentence of the law, to put the usual question to the prisoner, 'whether he could give any reason why judgment should not be pronounced against him;' and his ready adoption, after hearing More's argument, of the chief justice's equivocal reply, and hastily proceeding with the sentence, all manifest that he was imbued with the same spirit which prompted his vindictive master to seek for More's destruction.

Of his legal acquirements there is little evidence, beyond the reputation that he gained at the Inner Temple for his reading on the Statute of Privileges, which recommended him to the Duke of Suffolk, his first patron. The judicial decisions in which he was engaged during his period of office were too much mixed up with the political questions of the day, and too clearly controlled by the sovereign whose will he was so ready to obey, to have any weight attached to them. To this perhaps there is one exception; for the privilege that is now exercised by the Commons of punishing those who imprison their own members is said to have been first established under Audley's sanction, in 34 Henry VIII., in the case of George Ferrers, M.P. for Plymouth, for whose arrest the sheriff of London was sent to the Tower.

His interpretations of the law on the various criminal trials at which he presided are a disgrace, not only to him, but to every member of the bench associated with him, while both branches of the legislature are equally chargeable with the ignominy of passing the acts he introduced, perilling every man's life by the new treasons they invented, and every man's conscience by the contradictory oaths they imposed. It is a degradation to the pious and excellent Sir Thomas More to mention him even in contrast with such a man as Audley; and the name of More's less estimable predecessor, Cardinal Wolsey, acquires an additional brightness when the moderation of his ministry, during the earlier years of the reign, is compared with the persecuting spirit which prevailed while Audley held the Seals at its close.

Lord Audley was married twice—first a daughter of Sir Thomas Barnardiston, Kedington, Suffolk, and secondly to Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Grey, Marquis of Dorset. He left no son to inherit his title but by his last wife he had two daughters—Mary, the elder, who died unmarried; Margaret, thus his sole heir, who became the wife, first, of Lord Henry Dudley, younger son of John, the first Duke of Northumberland, and secondly of Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, who had been previously married. By the latter she had a son, Thomas, who erected on the ruins of the abbey of Walden, which he inherited from his mother, the stately mansion called in memory of her father, Audley End. Elizabeth was summoned to parliament by Edward VI. and was created Baroness Howard de Walden, and was created Earl of Suffolk by James I. Both titles still survive in different branches of the family, and were not divided by the death of James, the third possessor, in 1630. The barony then fell into abeyance between the Duke of Essex and Elizabeth, his two daughters, and continued so for seventy-eight years, being terminated in 1784 in favour of the great grandson of the elder daughter, who was created Baron Braybrooke in 1784, dying in the same year without issue, leaving no other descendant of Essex, the daughter, remaining, the representative of the family, Elizabeth, the younger daughter, who was to be Frederick Augustus Hervey, Earl of Bristol and Bishop of Exeter, to whom therefore devolved the barony and the title of Earl of Walden.

The earldom of Suffolk was held by the family until the death of the tenth earl in 1745, when it passed to the descendant of the sixth earl, the first earl, and again in 1784 to the descendant of a younger grandson of the first earl. By this change in the family the titles of Baron Howard of Walden and Earl of Walden were united.

Viscount Andover, and Earl of Berkshire, creations acquired by the second son of the first Earl of Suffolk, have been all united to the latter title. (Baron. ii. 382; Morant's Essex, i. 138; Lingard; Nicolas's Synopsis.)

AUMARI, ROBERT DE, was a regular justiciar before whom fines were levied at Westminster from 10 to 13 John, and acting in the first of those years as a justice itinerant at Lincoln. In 2 Henry III. he was sent into Kent with Martin de Pateshull and Ralph Hareng to take an assize of novel disseisin. In 9 Henry III. he was one of the justices itinerant in Oxfordshire, and in the following year was appointed to collect the quinzime in that county, for his activity in performing which duty he was pardoned a fine of forty shillings, which he owed for permission to plough up part of his wood of Perye, in Oxfordshire, where his property lay. (Rot. Claus. i. 367, ii. 76, 147, 164.) He had been sub-sheriff there in 9 John (Madox, ii. 168); and one of his descendants was sheriff under Edward II.

AUNGERVILLE. See R. DE BURY.

AUNTRESEYE, ROGER DE, was one of the justices itinerant for the county of Wilts in 9 Henry III., 1225. (Rot. Claus. ii. 76.)

AURE, JOHN DE, who was a justice itinerant in 46 Henry III. and the following year in the counties of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, and Somerset, had the custody of the two latter counties, with the castle of Shireburn, committed to him six years previously. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 15.) His family belonged to a place of his name in Gloucestershire, and he was probably the grandson of Walter de Aure, who died in 5 Henry III., and the son of Philip de Aure. (Madox, i. 118, ii. 27; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 70.)

AYLESTON, ROBERT DE, then Canon of Salisbury, in 1323, 17 Edward II., was keeper of the Privy Seal, and was employed in various counties to try the sheriffs and others accused of malversation and oppression. On May 21, 1323, he was nominated a baron of the Exchequer; and on July 18, 1326, was sworn in as chancellor of the Exchequer, by which he seems to have vacated his former seat on the bench, as he was not among the barons appointed on the accession of Edward III.

In the fourth year of that reign, however, he resumed his place as a baron, on December 20, 1330, having in the preceding August been collated to the archdeaconry of Berks. He again vacated his seat on the bench, on being constituted treasurer on March 20, 1332; and while he held that office the king made an unsuccessful application to the pope to procure his nomination to the vacant bishopric of St. Andrew's. He continued treasurer till February 3, 1334. There is no other trace of his death than is afforded by the appointment of his successor in the archdeaconry in September 1338, 12 Edward III. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 428; Le Neve, 279; N. Fœdera, ii. 847, 866.)

AYLOFF, WILLIAM. The town of Wye in Kent belonged in the reign of Henry III. to the ancient Saxon family of Ayloff, whose seat in its neighbourhood was called Bocton-Aloph. In the course of time the representative of the house removed into Essex, where he settled at Hornchurch, and possessed the manors of Brittons, Braxted Magna, &c. William seems to have been the favourite Christian name, and law the ordinary profession, of the family; for among the readers of Lincoln's Inn there are no less than three William Ayloffs from 16 Henry VII. to 10 James I. The first of these was this judge's grandfather. His father, also William, was sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire; and his mother was Agnes, daughter of Sir Thomas Bernardiston, of Ketton in Suffolk. The judge himself was the second of these readers in Lent 1571. He was called to the bar in 1560; and the degree of the coif was conferred upon him in Michaelmas Term 1577, apparently for the purpose of his being raised to a seat in the Queen's Bench, his judgments in which are duly reported by Dyer, Coke, and Savile. Having been present at the trial of Edmund Campion and others for high treason in November 1581, he was made the subject of a fabricated miracle. In a book entitled 'An Epistle of Comfort to the Reverend Priests, and to the Honorable, Worshipful, and other of the Laye Sort, restrained in Durance for the Catholicke Fayth,' it is thus narrated: 'I omitt Judge Alephe, who sitting to keepe the place when the other judges retyled, while the jury consulted about the condemnation of Father Campian and his companye, pulling of his glove, founde all his hande and hys seale of armes bloodye without anye token of range pricking or hurte; and being dismayed therewith wiping it went not away but still returned, he shewed it to the gentle men that sat before him, who can be witnesses of it till this daye, and haue some of them upon theyr faythes and credites auouched it to be true.' He sat on the bench till his death, on November 8, 1585.

By his wife Jane, daughter of Eustace Sulyard, of Fleming in Suffolk, he had three sons—William, Thomas, and George. William was knighted by King James on his arrival in England; and in 1612 he was further honoured with a baronety, which continued in his line till 1781, when it became extinct for want of male issue. (Wotton's Baronet. i. 249; Morant's Essex, ii. 130.)

AYMER, or DANIEL. 'The Abbot of

Chertsey' is the second of the 'barones errantes,' or 'inquisitores,' sent by Henry II. in 1170 to enquire into the conduct of the sheriffs, whom Dugdale erroneously designates 'justiciarii itinerantes.'

It is doubtful whether this abbot was Daniel or Aymer, but probably the latter. The date attached to the former in Manning and Bray's 'Surrey' is 1149. (Vol. iii. 217.) The 'Liber Niger Scaccarii' proves that the latter was abbot in 1175, if not earlier. (Monast. i. 423.)

AYREMYNNE, WILLIAM DE. Presuming that a patent of 2 Edward III. applies to this bishop, we have his pedigree for three generations. By it divers lands, tenements, and rents in the town of Ayrmyrn and elsewhere are confirmed to 'William the son and heir of John the son of Adam the son of Sewall de Ayrmyrn' in fee. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 102.) Another authority leaves out John, and makes him the son of Adam, and states that his mother's name was Matilda. The family was an ancient one, and was then settled at Osgodby in Lincolnshire. (Angl. Sacra, i. 802.) William was the eldest of three sons, his brothers being the under-mentioned Richard, and Adam, Archdeacon of Norfolk.

He is described as one of the clerks in the Chancery in 5 Edward II. (Rot. Claus. m. 27), when, from August 27 to September 28, 1311, the Great Seal was placed in the hands of the keeper of the Rolls during the absence of Bishop Reginald, the chancellor, under the seals of him and Robert de Bardelby. When sent by the chancellor to summon to parliament the Abbot of Oseney, who had used every evasion to avoid obeying the writs, he 'cunningly gained access to the abbot in the disguise of a penitent; but as soon as his errand was disclosed, he received such a salutary discipline from the knotted scourges provided by the monks for the benefit of the visitors to the shrine of St. Brithwold as induced him to decamp most speedily, adopting with entire sincerity the character which he had assumed.' (Pulgrave's Merchant and Friar, 70.)

He was one of the three keepers of the Seal appointed on December 9, 1311, who held it till September 1314. He was clerk of the parliament which met at Lincoln in January 1316, and on the 19th of the following August was raised to the office of keeper or master of the Rolls. (Rot. Claus. 10 Edw. II. m. 28.) In this character the Great Seal was frequently placed in his custody, under the seals of three clerks, to perform the duties of the Chancery, when the chancellors, John de Sandale, John de Hotham, and John Salmon, were absent from court. About 1319, having joined the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Ely, and others at the head of an irregular army of 8,000 men raised for suppressing the incursions of the Scots, they proceeded with so little caution that on being attacked they were quickly thrown into confusion and entirely routed. The two prelates escaped, but William de Ayremynne was taken prisoner (Holinshed, iv. 359), and probably remained in durance till the completion of the truce at the end of the year. From the number of priests and monks in the English ranks, the name of the White Battle was given to this encounter. (Weever 792.)

He resigned the office of keeper of the Rolls on May 26, 1324, when his brother Richard de Ayremynne, received the appointment (Rot. Claus. 17 Edw. II. m. 10). He then became keeper of the king's Privy Seal, and in the following August had the Great Seal again committed to his custody during the temporary absence of Robert Baldock, then chancellor. (Ibid. m. 38.)

His preferment in the Church proceeded no less rapidly than his civil advancement. He held the valuable rectory of the parsonage of Wearmouth, in addition to which he successively received canonries in the cathedrals of St. Paul, Lincoln, York, Salisbury, and Dublin. Not content with these rich benefices, he obtained through the influence of Queen Isabella, to whose cause he was devoted, the papal nomination to the vacant see of Norwich, to which he was consecrated in France, on September 1325, but the temporalities were not yet fused by the king. He still remained in France till he accompanied Queen Isabella on her landing in England, in September 1326; and on November 30 the Great Seal, which the king had in the meantime placed in the hands of Ayremynne, who, with He Clifford, the keeper of the Rolls, retained it till the king's resignation of his crown, was placed in the hands of the crown on January 20, 1327. (Rot. Claus. 20 Edw. II. m. 3.)

Under Edward III. he held no office till April 1, 1331, when he was appointed treasurer (Rot. Claus. 5 Edw. III. p. 1, m. 13), and filled that office for a year. He presided over the bishopric of Norwich nearly eleven years, when he died at his house at Charing, near London, on March 27, 1336, and was buried in the cathedral.

AYREMYNNE, RICHARD DE. younger brother of the above William de Ayremynne. He probably was one of the clerks of the Chancery, as on December 1319, 13 Edward II., he is recorded being present at a delivery of the Great Seal, and as on May 26, 1324, he constituted keeper of the Rolls in the stead of his brother William. On November following, the Great Seal was placed in his custody, under the seals of two other till December 12, the chancellor, Robert de Baldock, being then engaged on a mission to the Scots. He held the keepership of the Rolls little more than a year, Henry de Cliff being substituted for him on July 4, 1325. (Rot. Claus. 13, 17, 18 Edw. II.) No explanation is given of his removal, but it seems not improbable that it was connected with some suspicions then arising as to his brother's fidelity, as it occurred two days after the death of John Salmon, Bishop of Norwich, whose see was then the subject of contention. On his brother's consecration to that bishopric in the following September, Richard, who was then rector of Elvelay, was made chancellor or vicar-general of the diocese. (Blomefield's Norwich, i. 501.)

It seems probable that both he and his youngest brother Adam joined William de Ayremynne in France, inasmuch as the king, in a writ dated March 1320, complains of their refusal to appear before him, and commands the Archbishop of York to enforce their attendance. (Rot. Claus. 19 Edw. II. m. 9.)

On March 1, 1327, soon after the accession of Edward III., he is mentioned as clerk of the Privy Seal (Rot. Parl. ii. 440), and on the 8th of that month he was appointed custos of the House of Converts for life, an office which had been filled by his brother William. Richard resigned it on June 7, 1339. (Rot. Pat. p. 1, m. 13 & m. 10.)

The chancellorship of the church of Salisbury was added to his ecclesiastical preferments on July 16, 1329; and as his successor in this dignity was collated on April 19, 1340, the vacancy was probably occasioned by his death. (Le Neve, 215.)

AYSCOGHE, WILLIAM. The Ayscoghes were a very old Lincolnshire family, and the descendants of the judge for more than two centuries resided at Kelsey in thrt county, several of them filling the office of sheriff. William Ayscoghe's name appears among the advocates recorded in the Year Books from Michaelmas 1429. In about eight years he was called to the degree of the coif, and was raised to the bench as a justice of the Common Pleas two years afterwards, on April 17, 1440, 18 Henry VI. This rapid advance he represented in a petition to the king as a grievance, complaining tha. 'or he had ben fully two yere in that office at the barre [of serjeant] he was called by your heghnes unto the benche and made justice, by which makynge justice all his winnings that he sholde have hade in the said office of serjeant, and alle the fees that he had in England weere and be cessed and expired to his grete empovrysshynge, for they weere the grete substance of his lyvelode.' He therefore prayed, as he was 'the porest of alle youre justices,' that the king would grant him for his life certain tenements he specified of the value of 25*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* a year. He set in the court for sixteen years, the last fine levied before him being dated at Midsummer 1454, 32 Henry VI. (Dugdale's Orig. 46.)

His son married Margaret, the daughter and heir of John Talboys, Esq., of Nuthall, Nottinghamshire.

AYSHTON, NICHOLAS, belonged to a branch of the ancient and knightly family of Ayshton, or Assheton, in Lancashire. He was created a serjeant-at-law in February 1443, 21 Henry VI., and a judge of the Common Pleas about Trinity Term 1444. His judicial career extended through the remainder of Henry's reign, and the first four years and a half of that of Edward IV., the last fine levied before him being on February 3, 1466. (Dugdale's Orig. 46.)

BAALUN, or BALUN, JOHN DE, was a baron, whose estates were in the counties of Gloucester, Hereford, and Wilts. He was descended from Hameline de Balun, who came into England with the Conqueror, and built the castle of Abergavenny. Reginald, the father of John, in the reign of Henry II. made a fine, with Geoffrey Fitz-Ace and Agnes his wife, of certain lands which had belonged to the said Hameline, for the performance of which the son paid a fine to the king of one hundred marks and a paltry in 9 John. (Rot. de Fin. 382.) In 12 John he accompanied the king to Ireland (Rot. de Proditio, 189), but afterwards joined in the wars against his sovereign and forfeited all his lands. On the accession of Henry III. he returned to his duty, and was reinstated in his possessions. (Rot. Claus. i. 278, 280, 311.) In 9 Henry III. he was placed on the list of the justices itinerant for the county of Gloucester. (Ibid. ii. 76.) On his death, in 1235, his son John paid 100*l.* for his relief, and did homage for his inheritance. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 276.) Another son, Walter, succeeded his brother in 3 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 24.)

BAALUN, or BALUN, ROGER DE (who was probably of another branch of the same family), was also one of the justices itinerant in 9 Henry III., being appointed for Hampshire. In the next year he died, and was at that time coroner for the county. (Rot. Claus. ii. 76, 91.)

BABINGTON, WILLIAM, derived his name from a place so called in Northumberland, where his ancestors are said to have resided from the Conquest. His father was Sir John Babington, of East Bridgeford, Notts, and his mother was Benedicta, daughter and heir of Simon Ward, of Cambridgeshire. They had one daughter and five sons, the elder of whom, Thomas, obtained by marriage the rich manors of Dethick and Leachurch in Derbyshire, and several other rich possessions, which remained in the hands of his posterity until 1586, when Anthony Babington was attainted for high treason, and his enormous patrimony passed to a brother, who dissipated the whole. Another branch of this part of the family settled at Rothley Temple in Leicestershire.

William was the second son of Sir John; and by his marriage with Margery, daughter and heir of Sir Peter Martel, of Chilwell, Notts, acquired that and other considerable property. He pursued the study of the law, and on January 16, 1414, 1 Henry V., he was constituted the king's attorney, an office which in those times was inferior to that of a serjeant-at-law, as we find him summoned on July 11, 1415, to take upon himself the latter degree.

He and some others neglecting to obey the mandate, and there being then an insufficiency of serjeants to carry on the business of the courts, complaint was made in the parliament of November 1417, which issued an order that they should, under a great penalty, immediately take upon themselves the degree. Upon their promise of obedience they had a respite till the following Trinity Term. (Rot. Parl. iv. 107.) From that time his name frequently occurs in the Year Books till November 4, 1419, when he was appointed chief baron of the Exchequer. While he held this office he was placed on the bench of the Common Pleas also, on June 30, 1420, holding both places together till May 5, 1423, when he was advanced by Henry VI. to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas, and held the presidency of that court for thirteen years, retiring on February 9, 1436. He survived his resignation for nineteen years; and dying in 1455, 33 Henry VI., he was buried at Lenton Priory in his native county.

The Reports show his active attention to his legal duties, and tradition speaks of his godly life and conversation. His piety is evidenced by his founding a chantry for two chaplains at the altar of St. Catherine, in the church at Thurgarton in Notts; and by endowing the chantry of Babington in Flaforth, in the same county, with several houses and rents. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iv. 163, 298.)

He left two sons and a daughter, but his branch of the family, part of which was settled at Kiddington in Oxfordshire, has been long extinct.

BACON, JOHN, had almost always the title of Clericus Regis affixed to his name before he was raised to the bench. He held the office of 'custos rotularum et brevium de banco' certainly from, if not before May 1288, 16 Edward I.; for among the indentures in the treasury of the Exchequer is one of that date, the earliest existing instrument of the sort, acknowledging the delivery by him of certain 'pedes finium' to the treasurer and chamberlains. They are renewed at various intervals till 1 Edward II. (Cal. Exch. iii. 90-112.) the third year he was directed to have counter-roll of all pleas. The custody of Ledes Castle in Kent was committed to him in 19 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 6) and two years before he is mentioned as one of the executors of Queen Eleanor, record calling him 'attorney.' (De Issue Roll, 98.) His name appears among the advocates in the Year Book in the earlier years of Edward II.; and in the sixth year, on February 19, 1313, he advanced to the bench of that court which he had so long been an officer in; he continued a judge there till October 1320, when John de Stonore was appointed in his place. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 79, 88.)

In 21 Edward I. he received permission to inclose a certain way in Reston in Suffolk. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 56); and in 9 Edward II. he certified as having possessions in the townships of Shouldham in Norfolk, Hemington, Cleydon, and Akenham in Suffolk. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 464.)

BACON, THOMAS, there can be no doubt, was of the same family as that which Sir Nicholas Bacon and Lord Bacon sprang. In 9 Edward II., he was certified as holding property in Suffolk, Baconsthorpe, and other places in Suffolk which formed part of the possessions of those eminent individuals. He was the Thomas Bacon, son of Sir Roger Bacon of Baconsthorpe, on whom that name settled lands in Isbenham, &c., on his marriage with Johanna, daughter of Robert Antringham, in 8 Edward III.; the Bacons were even then so numerous that the different branches can scarcely be distinguished.

Thomas is named in the Year Book of Edward III. both before and after he became a judge. He was raised to that dignified office on September 30, 1332, received the honour of knighthood, and was removed into the King's Bench on January 28, 1332, and he does not appear to have exercised his judicial functions

10 Edward III., 1336; but if he were the son of Sir Roger, as above suggested, he was still alive in 1359. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 303; Drydale's Orig. 102; Rot. Parl. ii. 68, 447; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 99, 109.)

BACON, NICHOLAS. The lineage of this family, so eminent in philosophy, literature, and law, has been traced up to one Grimbalduus, a landed proprietor in Normandy, who accompanied his relative William, Earl Warren, into England at the time of the Conquest, and settled at Letheringset in Norfolk. One of his great-grandsons in the reign of Richard I. first called himself Bacon, an Anglo-Saxon word signifying 'of the beechen tree,' in allusion to which he bore for his arms argent, a beech-tree proper. The family widely extended itself over Norfolk and Suffolk, holding considerable estates in the latter county, among which Monks Bradfield and Hessel belonged to the immediate ancestor of the lord keeper. The two last-named judges, John and Thomas Bacon, doubtless came from the same stock, both having property in these two counties.

Nicholas Bacon was the second son of Robert Bacon, of Drinkston in Suffolk, by Isabel, the daughter of John Coge, of Pakenham in the same county. His father, who held the office of sheep reeve to the neighbouring abbey of St. Edmund's Bury (Masters's Corp. Christi Coll. 220), had four other children, two sons and two daughters. Thomas, the elder of the two sons, died without issue; and James, the younger, was a salter in the city of London, of which he became an alderman, and served the office of sheriff in 1569. (Machyn's Diary, 280, 380.)

Fuller (Worthies, ii. 334) says that Nicholas was born not far from the abbey, meaning, no doubt, his father's residence at Drinkston; but most other writers fix the place of his birth at Chislehurst in Kent, and the date about 1509. He was sent very early to Corpus Christi (Benet) College, Cambridge, where he was one of the Bible clerks, and proceeded A.B. about 1527. At the university he formed that intimacy with Sir William Cecil which, afterwards riveted by their union with two sisters, lasted throughout their lives. On leaving college he pursued his studies at Paris, where he remained till 1532, in which year he was admitted a student at Gray's Inn. He was called to the bar in the following year, and was made an ancient in 1536, that office being distinct from the grade of a teacher, to which he did not arrive till 1550. In 1552 he held the office of its treasurer. That his name does not appear as an advocate in any of the reported cases may be accounted for by his holding the office of solicitor to the Court of Augmentations, to which he was appointed in 1537.

In 1540 he is mentioned as the first of the three commissioners to accept the surrender of the collegiate church of Southwell (Rymer, xiv. 674, 701); and in the same year he is styled solicitor for the university of Cambridge. His name appears as 'student of the laws,' receiving one shilling a quarter in the accounts of the king's treasurer, during the first three years of Edward VI. (Trevelyan Papers), which seems to have been a customary fee to the dependents of the court.

One of the projects which the king had at heart on the dissolution of the monasteries in 1539 was the foundation of a house for the study of the civil law and the formation of young statesmen. A scheme was prepared by Bacon, but the lavish extravagance of Henry having exhausted the means which the monastic lands were to supply, this noble design died in its birth, not, however, without securing the royal favour to Bacon, whose abilities had been manifested in the composition. In 1545 he had a grant of the manors of Redgrave, Bottesdale, and Gillingham, in Suffolk, which had belonged to the monastery of St. Edmundsbury; and in the following year he was promoted to the office of attorney to the Court of Wards, his patent for which was renewed in 1547, on the accession of Edward VI.

During Edward's reign, Bacon purchased the estate of Gorham, which had belonged to St. Alban's abbey, where he fixed his residence, and seeing that all rule and authority in the town of St. Albans was overthrown with the fall of the abbot, he obtained a charter for its incorporation in 1553, being himself nominated high steward. (Newcome's St. Albans, 481.)

The accession of Queen Mary made no change in his official position; but he was so well known to be strongly affected to the reformed doctrines that Queen Elizabeth immediately selected him as her principal legal minister. On December 22, 1558, little more than a month after Queen Mary's death, he was knighted, and the Great Seal was placed in his hands as lord keeper. What was the precise difference between the two offices of lord keeper and lord chancellor few could explain, as the powers of both were apparently the same. Doubts, however, having been raised on the subject, it was deemed expedient to put an end to them in the second parliament of this reign, by passing an act declaring that the keeper of the Great Seal always had, and thenceforth should have, the same rights and powers as if he were lord chancellor. (St. 5 Eliz. ch. 18.)

In the first parliament, which met on January 25, 1559, Bacon contented himself with procuring an act for the recognition of Queen Elizabeth's title, without repealing the statute by which she had been declared illegitimate, upon the maxim that the crown purged all defects, and 'chusing,' as David Lloyd observes, 'the closure of a festered wound more prudent than the opening of it.' Bills for the restoration of the queen's supremacy, and for the adoption of a reformed liturgy, having been then introduced, the queen commanded a conference to be held at Westminster, under the superintendence of the lord keeper as moderator, to settle some of the controverted points; at which a certain number of bishops and learned men were appointed to argue on each side. Those of the popish party, however, refusing to be bound by the regulations which had been made, no discussion took place, and the bills, after considerable debate in the two houses, were passed in both.

Through the influence of the Earl of Leicester, whose dislike to him is evident from some letters in the State Paper Office (Cal. [1547], 235, 237), he was charged with assisting John Hales in the composition of a book showing that the succession of the crown on the death of the queen would devolve on the house of Suffolk. Nothing could be more offensive to Elizabeth than any interference in a question upon which she was notoriously jealous, and the known prudence of Sir Nicholas Bacon might well raise a doubt whether he so far failed in his usual caution as to meddle in so dangerous a matter. It is said, however, that the queen believed the charge, and not only forbade him the court, but even offered the Seal to Justice Anthony Browne, and that Sir William Cecil had some difficulty in persuading her majesty to restore Sir Nicholas to her good graces. Some presumption of the truth of the story is afforded by the following facts. On October 25, 1566, the queen 'understanding the lord keeper's slow amendment' (which looks very like a politic excuse), appointed Sir Robert Catlin, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, to execute the office of lord keeper in parliament. (Parl. Hist. i. 708.) In the same year Anthony Browne was knighted, an honour seldom bestowed by Queen Elizabeth on her puisne judges; and in that session there was much discussion about the succession and the queen's marriage.

The queen's confidence, with this slight interruption, was never withdrawn from him; and to the end of his life he enjoyed her favour so much that he even ventured sometimes to advise her in the form of a joke. When the queen asked him his opinion of one of the monopoly licences, which were then so obnoxiously obtained, he answered, 'Would you have me speak truth, madam? Licentiâ omnes deteriores sumus.' He knew also how to gratify her majesty by a happy repartee. When she remarked on one of her visits to his mansion, that it was too little for him, he answered, 'No, madam, it is you that have made me too big for it.' The queen took great delight in the early wit of Sir Nicholas's illustrious son Francis, whom she called 'her young lord keeper.' The great corpulency which oppressed him in his latter years was subject with which, in good-humoured raillery, she would banter him, saying 'his soul lodged well;' and he would not hesitate to make this infirmity an excuse for writing to her, instead of paying her personal respects, expressing himself thus: 'Oh! madam, not want of a willing heart and mynd, but an unhable and unweibody is the onlie cause of this.' (Cal. Papers [1547], 555.)

So burthensome was this increase of size to him that he could not walk from one court to the other without suffering, and when he took his seat it was the custom for the lawyers to refrain from pleading, he gave the signal with his staff. It is to this infirmity he alluded when he wrote to a certain nimble-witted counsellor, who interrupted him often, 'There is a difference betwixt you and me; it is a pain to me to speak, and a pain to you to hear of my speaking, and a pain to you to see your peace.' In hearing the cases in the Star Chamber he was remarkable for his patience, always saying, 'Let us stay a little, and we shall be done the sooner;' and his judgment was distinguished by soundness and precision.

Sir Nicholas's death took place at the House, on February 20, 1579, after having held the Great Seal for above twenty years. His remains were deposited under a monument erected by himself in St. Dunstons Cathedral, with an inscription perpetuating the name of the famous George Buchanan.

All writers concur in their estimation of his character, which may be summed up by what Camden (in Kennet, ii. 4) says of him: 'He was a man of a great wit, of great acuteness of wit, of great wisdom, of great eloquence, of an excellent memory, and a pillar, as it were, of the privy council.' David Lloyd (Sketches, 472) is equally eulogistic in his conclusion, 'he was, in a word, a blessing to his country, and of Sir Francis Bacon savours something of a bathos in his motto, 'Mediocria firma,' may be attributed to the modesty of his nature, to which may be attributed his long continuance in his position, unharmed, and untouched, by the assaults of envy and rivalry.

His residence in London, before he became lord keeper, was at Bacon House, in St. Dunstons Street, Foster Lane, which he afterwards in York House, near Cross, which belonged to the Archbishops of York, and stood on the site of the streets now known by the name and title of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, to whom it was subsequently granted. The Cursitor's Office in Chancery Lane was erected by him, and he founded a free grammar school at Redgrave, allotting 30*l.* a year for its support, and settling 20*l.* a year for the maintenance of six scholarships in Corpus Christi College, to be chosen out of that school. Towards building the chapel to this college, the place of his education, he was so liberal a contributor that the society presented him with a silver mazer the year before his death. To the library also of his university he was a great benefactor, and his merits were so highly esteemed there that eulogistic verses were published to his memory.

Sir Nicholas married twice. His first wife was Jane, daughter of William Fernley, of West Creting in Suffolk, Esq., whose sister had married Sir Thomas Gresham. By her he had a family of three sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave, was the first person whom King James advanced to the dignity of baronet, on the institution of the order in 1611; and the title has continued uninterruptedly in his descendants to the present time. A second baronetcy, granted in 1627 to Sir Butts Bacon, of Mildenhall in Suffolk, the fifth son of the first baronet, became united to that of Redgrave in 1755; and a third baronetcy, granted in 1661 to Sir Nicholas Bacon, of Gillingham, a grandson of the first baronet, expired for want of issue in 1685.

The date of the death of the lord keeper's first wife does not appear, but his marriage with the second must have taken place some time before he received the Great Seal. She was Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, of Giddy Hall, Essex, and sister of the wife of Sir William Cecil, afterwards the renowned Lord Burleigh. Her father, the learned and pious preceptor of Edward VI., had given to all his daughters a scholastic education; some of the fruits of which, in Lady Bacon, were her translations of twenty-five sermons from the Italian of Bernardine Achine, published in 1550, and of Bishop Jewell's Latin Apology for the Church of England, published in 1564. Her children by the lord keeper were Anthony and Francis, and to her early instructions may doubtless be attributed some of that eminence to which they both attained; the former in the short life to which he was limited, for he died early; the latter, not only in his own time and in his own country, but for all ages and throughout the civilised world.

BACON, FRANCIS (LORD VERULAM, VISCOUNT ST. ALBANS). No user interpretation of a man's transactions, no better explanation of his policy, can be found than that which his own letters furnish; and in the following sketch those of Bacon have been carefully used in order to form an impartial and unbiassed judgment of his real character. His letters have been collected in the edition of his works by Mr. Basil Montagu, and to that edition the references are made.

Francis Bacon was born at York House in the Strand on January 22, 1560-1, when his father, Sir Nicholas, had been lord keeper of the Great Seal for two years. His mother, Sir Nicholas's second wife, to whose early instructions the future philosopher owed much of his celebrity, was Anne, one of the five daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke, tutor of Edward VI., another of whom was Mildred, the second wife of Sir William Cecil, soon after ennobled by the title of Lord Burleigh. Anthony and Francis were the only issue of this union.

As no person has claimed the honour of being Francis Bacon's early instructor, it is to be presumed that he spent the first twelve years of his life at home, where, besides the tuition he received from his accomplished mother, he had all the advantage that could be derived from association with the great and learned men who frequented his father's house. In Queen Elizabeth's occasional visits to Gorbam-bury, she is said to have been so pleased with his readiness that she called him her young lord keeper; and his answer to her question how old he was, 'Two years younger than your majesty's happy reign,' is somewhat too easily accepted as a proof of his early wit.

When little more than twelve years old he was sent with his brother Anthony to Trinity College, Cambridge, then presided over by Dr. Whitgift, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. By the master's books, the account with him began on April 5, 1573, but he was not matriculated till June 10; and according to the same account he paid for sizings up to Christmas 1575. (British Mag. xxxiii. 444.) It is stated that he left the university from disgust at the system of education then adopted there, and which remained without much alteration to the days of Milton; but it seems unlikely that his father should have been induced to listen to such an objection from a boy not yet sixteen. His removal was probably caused by other plans being formed by him, which had diplomacy for their object; for in the course of the next year he went to France with Sir Amyas Paulet, our ambassador there. Sir Amyas having occasion to send to England, entrusted Bacon with the mission; and the queen is said to have expressed her approbation of the manner in which the youthful messenger performed the duty. After spending not quite two years and a half in France, during which his journeys into the interior seem to have been only those in which he accompanied Sir Amyas as his 'companion,' his father's death in February 1578-9 caused him to be suddenly summoned home from Paris.

At this period he was just turned eighteen; and, as the youngest of a large family, the provision that came to his share was not sufficient for his maintenance without some aid from his own exertions. He naturally selected the law for his profession, and entered himself at Gray's Inn, as his father had done before him. The date of his entry is uncertain, but in a questionable MS. of the society it is stated to be November 1576; and, although at that date he was either gone or going to Paris, it is possible that his father might have entered him previous to his departure; but he could not have kept his terms, or began his studies, till his return in March 1578.

Shortly afterwards he made some suit to his uncle Lord Burleigh, the precise nature of which, from the involved language in which he urged it in two letters addressed to his uncle and aunt (Sept. 16, 1580; Works, xii. 471), it is difficult to unravel. It was evidently connected with the law, and required the queen's approval: but his request being, as he acknowledges, 'rare and unaccustomed,' and one which might be deemed 'indiscreet and unadvised,' it will not excite much wonder if a youth not yet twenty should have failed in his application. It has been supposed that a letter without date, which Montagu extracts from the 'Cabala' (Works, xii. 7), thanking Burleigh for his intercession with the queen on his behalf, was written in the next month after this application. But, adverting to the fact that he was then a minor, and to the contents of his subsequent letters to his uncle, it seems to belong to a much later date, speaking as it does of the queen having 'appropriated him to her service,' and of 'her princely liberality,' of which there are no signs at this time, nor were there for a long time after.

He was called to the bar on June 27, 1582, and on February 10, 1586, there is an order that he 'may have place with the readers at the readers' table, but not to have any voice in pension, nor to win ancienty of any that is his ancient, or shall read before him.' (Lansdowne MSS. 51, art. 6.) To a copy of this order some notes of Lord Burleigh are appended, being memoranda of the successive favours shown by the inn to Bacon. These are—1. That he had a 'special admittance to be out of commons, sending for beer, bread, and wine;' which, if he was entered in 1576, might be because he was going abroad. 2. 'Admitted to the Grad. Sop., whereby he hath won ancienty of 40, being bar. of 3 years continuance;' which is perhaps explained by the next. 3. 'Utter barrister upon three years study;' by which he would attain seniority over those who were not to be called till their full term of five or seven years' study had expired. 4. 'Admitted to the high table where none are but readers.' None of these memoranda have any date; but the last refers to the order of February 1586, which proves he was then made a benchet.

For this early call to the bench he was apparently indebted to Lord Burleigh, who was himself a member of the inn. It evidently refers to it in a letter to his lordship in the following May, when speaking of 'a late motion of mine own,' when 'I sought an ease in coming within the meaning simply within the bar of his grace, which he calls in his letter 'not any extraordinary or singular note of favour.' It then alludes to some reports to his prejudice upon which his lordship had admonished him. (Works, xii. 473.) He entered parliament for the first time in November 1586 as member for Melcombe Regis, but no record of the proceedings remains. In the next parliament, of October 1586, he was for Taunton, and was 'vehement against the Queen of Scots,' joining in the demand for her immediate execution, which he does not appear to have taken any active part in the business of the session. (Parl. Hist. i. 837.)

In Lent 1588 he was elected knight of the shire, and double re-elected in Lent 1600, when his reading was on 'The Statute of the 15th of Henry the 8th, which was not published till seven years after his death. In the mean time, however, he had been actively employed in improving and ornamenting the precincts of the society; and various sums were given to him for planting the gardens, &c. (Dixon's Orig. 273.) He took also an important part in promoting those entertainments for which the society was so famous, and with the performance of which the queen was so much gratified.

Soon after this his uncle procured him a grant of the reversion of the office of clerk of the Star Chamber, an office worth 1,600*l.* a year, which 'mended his estate but did not fill his barn,' as he tells us for he had to wait nearly twenty years for the vacancy. (Works, xii. 142.) It is evident that during this time he was getting on in his profession; for the reporters as yet mention his name in a letter to his mother, dated 18, 1591-2 (Dixon, 30), he applied to Lord Burleigh for the wardship of Hayward's son; and in another to his lordship, later in the same year (Works, xii. 5), he says he was 'one and thirty years' old, and threatens 'if his lordship will not carry him on,' to sell his inheritance and purchase some office of gain that shall be executed by deputy, and so 'become a sorry bookmaker.' Though his views were afterwards altered, his petitions do not seem at this time to aim at any active legal place; for he says, 'I confess that I have as vast contemplative ends as I have moderate civil ends, for I have taken all knowledge to be my province.' His suit not receiving so much encouragement from his uncle as he hoped, he applied to his cousin, Sir Robert Cecil, to press it. At last Lord Burleigh, in September 1593, tells him that he had induced the lord keeper (Puckering), who had been required by the queen to give to her the names of divers lawyers to be preferred, to put him down as a meet man, but not equal to Brograve and Branthwait, two other barristers whom Puckering specially recommended. (Works, xii. 72.)

In the parliament of February 1589 he represented Liverpool, and busied himself in promoting the supply, being appointed to confer with the queen's learned counsel thereon. So in the next parliament, in February 1593, being then member for Middlesex, he supported the motion of his cousin Sir Robert Cecil to the same purport (Parl. Hist. i. 855, 881); but on a subsequent day he lost the credit he had gained, by objecting to the course proposed for its collection. Discovering his indiscretion, in the remaining debates, which continued for nearly three weeks, he had the prudence to be silent. For this interference he so deeply incurred the queen's displeasure that it had not subsided when he received Lord Burleigh's favourable note, nor till some time after. (Works, xii. 28, xiii. 275.)

In April 1593 Sir Gilbert Gerard, the master of the Rolls, died; and though this place was destined for Sir Thomas Egerton, it was kept vacant till his successor as attorney-general was determined on. The list of lawyers to be preferred, which the lord keeper had been required to give, had no doubt reference to this vacancy; for though Sir Edward Coke, as solicitor-general, had the first claim to the succession, it is evident that efforts were making to set aside his just pretensions. Bacon put himself forward as Coke's opponent (Works, xiii. 77), endeavouring to break through the accustomed routine; but, as he was then only a young man, and had not yet acquired any reputation either as a lawyer or as a writer, it is difficult to understand on what his claims to an office which had been lately increasing in importance were founded. He could not expect that his legal descent would alone avail him, and his parliamentary character had been lately damaged, so that his principal dependence must have been on the influence of his friends at court. There, in addition to Lord Burleigh and his son, he had enlisted the Earl of Essex in his cause.

The earl became his most strenuous advocate. His letters show that both he and the lord treasurer were zealous pleaders for him; for the queen was strongly prejudiced against him, telling them that none but they thought him fit for the place. It is grievous to be obliged to add that Bacon's letters betray an underhand endeavour to impede Coke's success by depreciating his abilities, and nicknaming him the 'Huddler.' (Works, xiii. 74, 75.) History may be searched in vain for an earlier example of such degrading solicitation for legal honours, and for such unworthy attempts to decry a rival; and it is to be lamented that almost all Bacon's future struggles for advancement were sullied by the same unprincipled accompaniments. Coke, however, could not with decency be passed over. He received the appointment on April 10, 1594; and in filling up the office of solicitor-general, which he vacated, a longer delay intervened, and a similar disappointment awaited Bacon.

This vacancy lasted from April 10, 1594, to November 6, 1595, a period of nineteen months. Bacon exerted every effort to get the place, in letters to Lord Burleigh and his son (Works, xii. 3, 475, xiii. 78, 85), to Lord Keeper Puckering (xiii. 51, 56), and to the Earl of Essex, to whom he says in one of them, 'The objections to my competitors your lordship knoweth partly; I pray spare them not, not over the queen, but to the great ones, to show your confidence and work their distrust.' (xiii. 77, 79, 82.) Notwithstanding the intercessions of the earl and some others of his friends, and his own petitions and new year's gifts to the queen, both of which she refused to receive, she was so disgusted by his pertinacity that she said if he 'continued in this manner she would seek all England rather than take him' (xii. 109, 166, xiii. 73, 81, 83); and in the end the office was given to Sir Thomas Fleming. Bacon was precluded from complaining of this appointment; for in a letter to the lord keeper, written in the previous July, he had said, 'If her majesty settle her choice upon an able man, such a one as Mr. Serjeant Fleming, I will make no means to alter it.' (xiii. 56.)

During this contest the degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon him by the university of Cambridge, on July 27, 1594; and at the end of it, Essex, attributing to himself Bacon's want of success, gave him, as some compensation for his disappointment, an estate at Twickenham, which was afterwards sold for 1,800*l.* (vi. 249.) Lord Burleigh's 'constant and serious endeavours to have him solicitor' he gratefully acknowledges; but in the same letter complains that his lordship does not employ him in his profession in any services of his own. (Works, xii. 162.) The queen, probably through Lord Burleigh's interest, gave him, in July 1595, 60 acres in Zelwood Forest, and in November she granted him the reversion of Twickenham Park.

In May 1596 Egerton was made lord keeper, but as he still retained the mastership of the Rolls, no vacancy immediately occurred in that office. Bacon applied urgently and unsuccessfully for it (Dixon, 383); and Coke and Fleming probably did not aspire to it, as they were common lawyers. They remained in their respective posts during the rest of the reign, so that there was no opportunity for any further intrigue; and Bacon was obliged to content himself with receiving occasional employment in the service of the queen.

He has been represented as the first who held the office of queen's or king's counsel, distinct from the usual law officers; but that he had any special warrant for that purpose from Queen Elizabeth there is no evidence whatever from any existing record. Montagu and Macaulay say that he was so appointed in 1590; but the preceding facts sufficiently prove that it could not have been so early; and the precise time at which he began to be engaged in the queen's causes still remains in doubt. From his correspondence it seems probable that he was first employed shortly after Coke became attorney-general, in April 1594, during the vacancy in the office of solicitor. There is a mysterious expression in a letter to the queen, dated July 20, 1594, which may probably refer to the royal promise so to use him—'a gracious veil, it pleased your majesty to give me.' (Works, xiii. 81.) The undated letter to Lord Burleigh, already mentioned, apparently written about this time, seems also to allude to it. Bacon says in it that it is an exceeding comfort and encouragement to him, 'putting himself in the way of her majesty's service,' and 'seeing it had pleased her majesty. . . . to vouchsafe to appropriate me unto her service.' While engaged in his application for the solicitorship, he writes to Foulk Grevil, 'Her majesty had by set speech more than once assured me of her intention to call me to her service; which I could not understand but of the place I had been named to.' The queen, however, evidently had no such meaning; and it soon appears that she merely intended him to hold some of her briefs; for Bacon tells his brother Anthony, January 25, 1594-5, that the queen, complaining of his pertinacity, says

'she never deals so with any as with me, she hath pulled me over the bar, she hath used me in her greatest causes.' Yet any such regular employment does not seem to be consistent with his absenting himself during that term, as he tells Lord Burleigh he did, in a letter dated in the following March in the latter part of which he adds, 'This last request I find it more necessary for me to make, because (though I am glad of her majesty's favour, that I may with more ease practise the law, which, perchance, may use now and then for my countenance yet, to speak plainly, though perhaps vainly I do not think that the ordinary practice the law, not serving the queen in place will be admitted for a good account of the poor talent that God hath given me' (Works, xii. 160, 475, xiii. 83.) There is also a letter from Lord Burleigh to Robert Cecil, dated February 14, 1594, which plainly proves that Bacon was not then recognised as a queen's counsel. His lordship is advising his son as to some rent to be reserved on the nomination of the Bishops of Winchester and Durham, at which he had spoken to the attorney-general (Coke), who, he says, complains the want of other counsellors, 'seeing there is but one sargeant and no solicitor, ledging that there are many weighty causes of her majesty to be ordered.' (Devent. Cur. b. v. 6.) Thus it is clear that the queen had not then bestowed on any distinct appointment; and that the occasional employment he had for the government was not of such importance as to be his absence inconvenient.

Bacon was engaged in some crown business during the vacancy of the solicitorship, whether as having the independent management of them, or, as junior barrister now employed, in assistance of the attorney-general, it is difficult to say. That the desirous of producing the former impression is evident from two letters to Lord Puckering in 1594 and 1595, during the vacancy, in which he uses it for the purpose of being urged in furtherance of his business. Both of them, curiously enough, are dated the same day in each year, September 1. In the first, he says, 'I was minded to come to the place of employment, that I have of office, wherein I serve, for your direction, and the advancement of my business; to have acquainted your lordship before the term, with such of her majesty's causes as are in my hands; which I find . . . your lordship of your grace is willing to use for my good, and satisfaction you may find in my business.' In the second he says, 'I hope you will not be the less sparing in your judgment of my being studied and employed in the queen's causes.' (Works, 58.) From a letter of his to K certainly written between July 1606 and June 1607, his own opinion as to the time when he was regularly employed may be collected; for in it he urges his 'nine years' service of the crown,' which would not make it earlier than 1597. (xii. 107.)

Whatever was the date, it is clear he was not a sworn adviser, nor had any patent conferring upon him the office of queen's counsel. That he was not so considered when, at the end of the reign, the names of all the existing officers were sent to King James for re-appointment, is manifest from the omission of his. His activity and the interest of his friends, however, soon got this omission remedied, by procuring the introduction of his name in a warrant on a totally different subject, dated April 21, 1603, thus: 'Where[as] we have perceived, by a lettre from our counsell at Whitehall, that Francis Bacon, Esq., was one of the learned counsell to the late queen, our sister, by special commandment, and that in the warrant granted by us to them for the continuance of their places, he is not named, we have thought good to allow him in such sort as she did.' (Egerton Papers, 367.) He held this equivocal position for the sixteen following months, for it was not till August 25, 1604, that he obtained a patent formally appointing him 'consiliarium nostrum ad legem, sive unum de consilio nostro erudito in lege,' with such precedence as any other learned counsel, or as he had 'ratione verbi regni Elizabethæ, vel ratione warranti nostri;' and granting a fee of 40*l.* a year. (Rymer, xvi. 593.) He himself confirms this view of his position by stating in one of his letters to King James, 'You formed me of the learned council extraordinary, without warrant or fee, a kind of individuum vagum. You established me and brought me into ordinary; soon after you placed me solicitor.' (Works, xii. 402.)

This discussion is of more importance than it at first appears, because the judgment to be formed of Bacon's conduct in pleading against the Earl of Essex before the council, and on his trial in February 1601, mainly depends on the question whether the nature of his employment did or did not impose upon him the necessity for such appearance. So general was the disapprobation it caused that he wrote two letters in defence of himself to Sir Robert Cecil and Lord Henry Howard (nearly copies of each other); and so long did the stigma attach to him that he found it necessary, nearly three years afterwards, to address an elaborate apology for his conduct to the Earl of Devonshire, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. (Works, xii. 168, 171, 245.) His justification is but a lame one, and can have satisfied few; and in pleading the necessity of his place as one of the queen's counsel, he forgets that, if his duty was absolute and compulsory, his position must have been so notorious that blame would not have been imputed, nor exculpation needed.

He was on the closest terms of friendship with Essex; the earl had been his most energetic advocate in his aspirations to the offices of attorney and solicitor general, and had even made his success a personal matter with the queen; and when Bacon had been disappointed of both the places, Essex generously presented him with an estate worth 1,800*l.* All this Bacon is forced to acknowledge, but with respect to the latter he asserts, in his apology, that he said to the earl, 'My lord, I see that I must be your homager, and hold land of your gift; but do you know the manner of doing homage in law? Always it is with a saving of his faith to the king and his other lords; and, therefore, my lord, I can be no more yours than I was, and it must be with the antient savings; and if I grow to be a rich man, you will give me leave to give it back again to some of your unrewarded followers.' The reliance that is to be placed on this minute report of a conversation occurring eight years previously may be estimated by the fact, mentioned in the same letter, that, notwithstanding this flourish about giving back the estate, he had already sold it for 1,800*l.* In such intimate relations as existed between the earl and him, both gratitude and common decency ought to have prevented him from taking any active part in the prosecution, unless absolute necessity compelled him. If there was no such necessity, some strong personal object must have prompted him 'officially' to intrude himself into the business.' To prove a necessity, it would be incumbent on him to show that there was a deficiency of the queen's ordinary legal counsel; but, besides the attorney and solicitor general and Serjeant Yelverton, all of whom assisted at the trial, there were two other queen's serjeants, Daniell and Drew, whose services would have fallen within the regular course of their duties. Even if additional aid was required, there was the whole bar to choose from, and the name of 'Nicholas Kempe, counsellor at law,' is actually recorded as taking some of the examinations. (Works, vi. 378, 380.) As to Bacon's services being indispensable, he, according to his own showing, held no office, but a new and extraordinary appointment; and it is a curious fact, that in a memorandum for the order of the arraignment, in Coke's handwriting, preserved in the State Paper Office, Bacon's name was not proposed in the list of counsel to be retained. There is, however, a note from the lords of the council, written the day before the trial, addressed to 'Mr. Francis Bacon, one of her majesty's counsel learned.' (Jardine's Crim. Trials, i. 385.) The non-introduction of his name in Coke's memorandum is a strong proof that his appearance was not a necessary part of his duty. No precedent could be urged against his refusal, if he had been earnest in his resistance; and if his aid was demanded by the council, with the knowledge of his connection with the earl, he ought to have felt that they sought rather to degrade than to advance or honour him. The truth, however, peeps out, even in the apology itself, in his avowal that one of his objects was 'to uphold himself in credit and strength with the queen;' and in another place, that as 'she was constant in her favours, and made an end where she began,' he was resolved to endure his condition 'in expectation of better.' The queen was offended at his friendship for Essex, which, he says, he 'saw would overthrow' him; and consequently he pursued a course by which he incurred the contempt of the world, without producing, as the event proved, any advantage for himself. Had he acted a more honourable part, he would have obtained the credit, without incurring the danger, of Sir Henry Yelverton, who refused to plead against his patron Somerset, and Sir John Walter, who indignantly rejected a brief against Sir Edward Coke.

This disposition to undertake anything with a view to his own advantage is still more manifest in the 'Declaration of the Treasons of the Earl of Essex,' published by him soon after the trial. (Works, vi. 299.) Though he says that he wrote it at the queen's command, 'her majesty taking a liking to my pen,' it is impossible to believe that he might not have avoided the task. In it he vilifies and blackens the earl's character to such an extent that it is surprising he should so long have associated with him without discovering or suspecting his criminal intentions; and it is curious to observe that in the 'Apology,' after the queen was dead, and when the enemies of the earl were in rather doubtful odour, all the criminal imputations against him are softened down to 'his misfortune,' and the designation of traitor converted into 'the unfortunate earl.'

Another remarkable circumstance connected with this conspiracy requires explanation. Catesby, afterwards known as a principal in the Gunpowder Plot, was also implicated in this, but succeeded in obtaining his pardon by the payment of a fine of 4,000*l.* to the queen. By a letter from the council to Mr. Attorney-General Coke, the queen's orders were conveyed to him to divide the said fine money among 'Mr. Francis Bacon, Sir Arthur Gorges, and Captain Carpenter;' and the share appropriated to Bacon was 1,200*l.* The date of this warrant is August 6, 1601, and it is signed by eight privy councillors. (Counc. Reg. xvii. 336.) Whatever may have been the motive with the royal donor inducing this extraordinary gift, it is difficult, under all the attendant circumstances, to draw an inference favourable to the courtly recipient.

To return. Within ten days after the appointment of Sir Thomas Egerton, Essex wrote to him to have a care of Bacon during his absence in Spain. (Works, xii. 91.) The new lord keeper had always been friendly to him, and when he was a candidate for the solicitorship had supplied him with observations for the exercise of the office. (Egerton's Life, 165.) Bacon's crown business no doubt would, with such patronage, be materially increased, and personal access to the queen become more frequent. Her majesty even occasionally honoured him with her presence at his house in Twickenham Park.

This advance in favour had the natural effect of making him think more highly of his position than the actual nature of employment warranted. That he was inclined to encroach beyond his province apparently from the scene that occurred at the Court of Exchequer about 1601, where Bacon having moved for the seizure of certain lands, Coke, probably deemed an interference with his duties, 'kissed at it,' and insulting and scornful words passed between them. Among the things Coke bade him 'not meddle with the queen's business,' and said he 'was sworn.' (Works, vii. 338.)

He had in 1578 been an unsuccessful rival of Coke for the favours of Hatton; and the Earl of Essex, who, by his wonted zeal, had been his advocate both her parents. His disappointment in not obtaining the lady, whose violent temper had not yet been displayed, no doubt increased the feeling of jealousy and which he already indulged against Coke and which did not diminish as years went on.

Whatever reputation Bacon may have acquired among his friends and acquaintances by his private studies, he was not known to the public in his own character; nor was it till the year 1604 that he made his first appearance as an author. In it he published his Works, which, as it was the first, so it still remains, the most popular of his writings.

Notwithstanding all the professions he enjoyed from his legal attainments, they did not keep him from pecuniary pressure. His mother's death had left him for his extravagance in 1592 up a coach, and in 1594 for keeping five or six flouous horses. (Dixon, 31, 58.) His legal involvements at length became so numerous that his credit so small, that he was execution and detained in a house in Coleman Street, in September 1598. He wrote to Lord Keeper Egerton, complaining that it was a breach of privilege, as he was coming from the Tower in 'a service of no mean importance' for the queen. The result of his complaint is not stated; but his letters to Mr. Michael Hicckes and Lord Cecil show that his difficulties were still existing at least as late as 1603. (Works, xii. 275, 278, 478, 479.)

In the last two parliaments of Elizabeth in 1597 and 1601, he was a frequent speaker in support of the queen's measures; and in the interim he had been rewarded, in 1598, with the rectory of Cheltenham and the chapelry of Charlton-Kings.

No sooner was Queen Elizabeth's death announced than Bacon, instead of waiting with a decent and dignified patience for the king's arrival in London, exerted all his influence among persons high and low to get himself favourably mentioned to the new monarch. To Mr. Davis he writes, 'I commend myself to your love and the well-usage of my name, as well in repressing and answering for me, if there be any biting and nibbling at it in that place, as by imprinting a good conceit and opinion of me, chiefly in the king, as otherwise in that court.' To Mr. Foulles he writes two letters, 'to further my being known by good note unto the king.' Dr. Morison, Sir Thomas Challenor, and Lord Kinloss were addressed in the same degrading style; and the Earl of Northumberland (to whom he volunteered a proclamation on the king's entry), the Earl of Northampton, and even the Earl of Southampton, were reminded of his services. (Works, xii. 26, 101, 113, 114, xiii. 24, 29, 48, 63, 102, 115.) It must have been a severe mortification to him to find that he had not been even named among the queen's servants to be re-appointed; but the efforts of his friends were, as already stated, successful in obtaining the warrant issued a month afterwards, allowing him as one of the learned counsel 'in such sort' as Queen Elizabeth did.

That at first he was not much encouraged, notwithstanding a most fulsome letter to the king (Works, xiii. 99), may be judged from a letter in July to Cecil, who was now raised to the peerage, wherein he says, 'I desire to meddle as little as I can in the king's causes, his majesty now abounding in council;' 'my ambition now I shall only put upon my pen, whereby I shall be able to maintain memory and merit of the times succeeding.' He, however, accepted the 'prostituted title of knighthood,' as he calls it, with three hundred others, at the coronation on July 23, 1603, and assigns as reasons for doing so, 'because of his late disgrace' (probably another arrest); 'and because I have three new knights in my mess at Gray's Inn commons; and because I have found out an alderman's daughter, a handsome maid to my liking.' (Works, xii. 278, 279.) This maid was Alice, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Benedict Barnham, an alderman of London, whose widow had married Sir John Pakington, of Hampton Lovet, Worcestershire. Bacon's marriage with Alice, however, did not take place till three years after, in May 1606, when it is stated that the stores of fine raiment drew deep into her portion. (Cal. St. Papers [1603], 317.) The alderman had left a large fortune, the lady's share in which much increased Bacon's means.

Bacon penned another voluntary proclamation touching the king's style, which had the same fate as the former; and in the session of parliament in that and the following year, being member for Ipswich, he made himself usefully prominent, delivering, however, a speech to the king himself, fulsomely flattering (Works, vi. 3, vii. 179), and another with reference to him still more so. (Parl. Hist. i. 1014.)

The only fact which is recorded of him in the second year of James's reign is his redeeming a jewel on August 21, on the security of which Lord Ellesmere had lent him 50*l.* (Egerton Papers, 395.) Four days afterwards he received the patent already mentioned, appointing him king's counsel, with a salary of 40*l.* per annum; and on the same day he had a grant in addition of a pension of 60*l.* for services performed by his deceased brother Anthony and himself. (Rymer, xvi. 597.)

He was not employed in the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh, in November 1603, though, besides the attorney-general, Serjeants Heale and Phillips were; nor in any of the crown prosecutions before he was made solicitor-general, the queen's serjeant being the only assistant to the attorney-general. From these omissions of his services some judgment may be formed as to the necessity of his appearing against the Earl of Essex, the remembrance of which was probably the cause of his being now so much in the shade. He occupied the interval in the composition of works, some addressed to the king himself, and others evidently intended for the king's eye, which, however excellent in their matter, contained more of flattery than became a great philosopher. Such were his letter to Lord Ellesmere, suggesting a History of England, and his letter to King James, 'On the True Greatness of the Kingdom of Britain.' To these may be added his tract on the union of the two kingdoms, and his speech on the subject. (Works, v. 16, 47, 311, xii. 69.) His leisure was not wholly devoted to politics, for he published his 'Advancement of Learning' in 1605.

In spite of his endeavours to force himself forward, Bacon did not obtain the object of his ambition till he had suffered two, or indeed three, more disappointments. He was passed over in October 1604, when Fleming was appointed chief baron, Sir John Doderidge being made solicitor-general. The death of Sir Edmund Anderson, in August 1605, created another vacancy; but, instead of Coke, Sir Thomas Gawdy was selected to supply it. On the elevation of Coke to the chief justiceship, in June 1606, Bacon was again set aside, Sir Henry Hobart being called upon to fill Coke's place, and Doderidge remaining solicitor-general. In a letter to Mr. Matthew, at the coming in of the king, he comforts himself that 'the canvassing world is gone, and the deserving world is come.' (xii. 230.) But he soon altered his opinion, for on this last occasion he renewed his application to Cecil (now Earl of Salisbury), somewhat depreciating the place, but professing to desire it chiefly to increase his practice. (14, 63.) An expedient was suggested by which Doderidge should vacate the solicitorship on being made king's serjeant. This plan he pressed in letters to the king, recapitulating all his deserts, parliamentary and literary; and also to the lord chancellor. (xii. 94, 105.) Chief Justice Popham died in the following year, and Chief Baron Fleming was put in his place; and instead of either the attorney or solicitor general succeeding, Judge Tanfield was placed at the head of the Exchequer. The opportunity was, however, taken to effect the plan of making Doderidge king's serjeant; and Bacon, after fourteen years' expectance, obtained at last his desire of entering the king's service by being created solicitor-general on June 25, 1607. His prosperous star was then in the ascendant, for in the next year his reversion in the Star Chamber fell in.

One of the first fruits of his leisure in his new office was 'Certain Considerations touching the Plantations in Ireland,' which he presented to the king as a new year's offering. (v. 169, xii. 73.) He was employed also in preparing his great work 'Instauratio Magna,' and in 1609 he published 'De Sapientia Veterum,' a collection of fables of the ancients moralised.

In 1611 he was appointed joint-judge of the Knight-Marshall's Court. His cousin, the Earl of Salisbury, died on May 24, 1612; and within a week Bacon wrote to the king, disparaging his abilities, saying 'that he was a fit man to keep things from growing worse, but no very fit man to reduce things to be much better;' and 'that he was more in operatione than in opere.' Comparing this with his letters to the earl himself, full of professions of gratitude and admiration, either they must be taken as mere flattery, or this must be regarded as false and ungrateful. In this and other letters to the king, depreciating the earl's powers, he recommends his own 'little skill' in the House of Commons, where he 'was never one hour out of credit,' and asks 'leave to meditate and propound some preparative remembrances touching the future parliament.' (Works, xii. 281, 285.) He was not till after the earl's death that he had the courage to publish his essay 'De Deformity,' in which, under the semblance of a general description of the mental defect it produces, his cousin is ungenerously depicted. (Dixon, 165.)

Bacon held the office of solicitor-general rather more than six years, during which several puisne judgeships were filled up, which it does not appear that he applied for. He, however, was not idle. On a vacancy in the mastership of the Court of Wards and Liveries in 1612, he applied to the king of Rochester for the post, and felt so certain of success that he ordered new clothes for his servants. Sir Walter Cope, however, for a good sum, got the appointment. Cope laughed and said, 'Sir Walter had the wards, and Sir Francis the liveries' (Dixon, 176.) He sent one of his petitory epistles to the king, begging his promotion to the 'attorney's place whenever it should be void;' and another when the attorney was ill, indecently reminding him of his promise. (Works, xii. 97, 121.) The attorney recovered; but upon the death of Fleming, the chief justice of the Bench, in August 1613, Bacon lost no time in urging upon the king that no one but he should be the attorney and he should be thought for the place, and that, if the king should refuse, he should not be passing intimating that the king would think of a chief justice which is sure to be derogative.' (286.) But before the promotion was supplied, Bacon, perhaps fearing he should be overlooked, took the course, and in a paper presented to the king, pointed out 'reasons why it should be thought much for his majesty's service to remove the Lord Coke from the now holdeth to be Chief Justice of the Bench, and the attorney to succeed him, and the solicitor the attorney.' (vii. 340) 'his ill-feeling towards Coke again appears. He says, 'It will strengthen the king's causes greatly amongst the judges, if the Lord Coke will think himself necessary to the counsellor's place, and thereupon be more obsequious;' and, 'the removal of the Lord Coke to a place of less profit, though with his will, yet will be thought a kind of discipline to him for opposing himself to the king's causes; the whereof will contain others in duty. After this shameless encouragement, he stroy the independency of the court, and proceeds in one breath to speak of the disparagement of his deceased cousin's present senior, thus: 'The general sorteth not well with his present place, being a man timid and scrupulous, both in parliament and other business, and one that in a word was made fit for the treasurer (Cecil)'s bent, which was to do little with much formality and protestation.' Not forgetting himself, however, he takes care to enhance his peculiar adaptation to the office, adding, 'Whereas the now solicitor, going more roundly to work, and being of a quicker and more earnest temper, and more effectual in that he dealeth in, is like to recover that strength to the king's prerogative which it had in times past, and which is due unto it.' This cunning plan was adopted. Coke, two months after, was removed to the King's Bench; Hobart, the attorney-general, went to the Common Pleas; and Bacon obtained, at last, his step of promotion, being made attorney-general on October 27, 1613.

In the two parliaments called by James in the first fourteen years of his reign, the one sitting from 1604 to 1610, and the other from April to June 1614, Bacon was of course an active member. So acceptable had he made himself to the House, and so highly were his qualities as an orator appreciated, that in the second parliament, though it was alleged that no attorney-general had ever been elected a member, he was allowed to sit; but this was not to be a precedent for the future.

Among the first cases in which Bacon exercised his office was his proceeding against James Whitelocke (afterwards the judge) for giving a verbal opinion, or perhaps for arguing as a barrister, on the legality of a commission from the crown. (State Trials, ii. 766.) The defendant probably owed his pardon as much to the bungling efforts of Bacon to justify the absurd charge as to the submission which he discreetly made. The attorney's speech in the following year against Oliver St. John, for writing a letter showing the unlawfulness of benevolences (for which he was fined 5,000*l.*), is loaded with flattery to the king, and futile arguments to prove that a benevolence is not a tax. In reference to the sentence on St. John, he adopted the unusual course of corresponding with the king, a novel practice which he introduced, and which he more particularly continued in the cases of Peacham and Owen. (Works, xii. 62, 123-136, 289, xiii. 64, 108.)

The charge against Peacham was founded on certain passages contained in a sermon which had never been preached, but which had been discovered in his study. The king was most desirous of proving that the mere writing constituted treason, and Bacon interested himself too much to procure a conviction. He wrote several letters to the king, with accounts of his examinations of the prisoner, to whom torture was applied in the course of them; and he describes his artful management in obtaining the separate opinions of the judges. Coke for some time resisted the 'auricular taking of opinions single and apart;' but eventually was forced to submit to this most unconstitutional mode of prejudging the case.

Then followed the trials connected with Overbury's murder, in the progress of which the letters of Bacon show his desire to assist the king in his determination to convict, and afterwards to save, the principal offenders. (vi. 219-241.)

When Sir Edward Coke resisted the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, though Bacon made to the king a fair exposition of the controversy, he could not refrain from aiming a blow at his rival, suggesting that, 'at this time' he should not be disgraced, though 'this great and public affront' to the chancellor, 'thought to be dying, which was barbarous,' and to the High Court of Chancery, may not, he says, 'pass lightly, nor end only in some formal atonement.' His total disregard for the independence of the bench is further shown in this letter; for he proceeds to say that 'if any of the puisne judges did stir this business, I think that judge is worthy to lose his place: I do not think there is anything a greater polychreston ad multa utile to your affairs than upon a just and fit occasion to make some example against the presumption of a judge in cases that concern your majesty; whereby the whole body of those magistrates may be contained in better awe;' and he then recommends 'that the judges should answer it on their knees before your majesty and your council, and receive a sharp reprimand.' (xii. 36.) In the case of the commendams, or 'rege inconsulto,' he not only took the part of the king, but was the principal instigator in calling the judges to account before the privy council (vii. 307-338); a course which has too much the appearance of being influenced by his inveteracy against Coke, especially when connected with a paper he drew up, enlarging on the various 'innovations into the laws' which Coke, as he alleged, had introduced. (vii. 401.)

The chancellor's illness occurring during the progress of these proceedings, Bacon set himself about his usual practice of begging for the reversion of the place. In a letter to the king, dated Feb. 12, 1615-16, he not only boasts of what he would do if he had the Seal, but depreciates those who might be competitors for it; particularly Coke, of whom he says, 'Your majesty shall put an overruling nature into an overruling place, which may breed an extreme: next you shall blunt his industries in matter of finances which seemeth to aim at another place: and, lastly, popular men are no sure mounters for your majesty's saddle.' (xii. 31.) He had taken care to secure the affections, or at least the interest, of Sir George Villiers, the new favourite, by a long paper of instructions how to govern himself in the station of prime minister (vi. 400), containing excellent advice, some points of which it would have been better if he himself had practised. One he evidently forgot: 'If any one sue to be a judge, for my own part, I should suspect him;' for after having sent a paper to Mr. Murray, of the king's bedchamber, 'concerning my honest and faithful services to his majesty,' he applied to Villiers, more than a year before the chancellor's resignation, to get it from him and go on 'with my first motion, my swearing privy councillor, not so much to make myself more sure of the other, and to put off competition.' Six days later he again urges the suit, and repeats it on May 30; and when in the following June the king gave him the choice either to be sworn privy councillor, or to have the assurance of succeeding Lord Ellesmere, he wisely accepted the former (xii. 143, 148, 149), and accordingly took his seat at the board on the 9th of that month.

In the nine months that followed, Bacon kept up a constant correspondence with Villiers, not only on public matters, but with reference also to the favourite's private concerns,—the peerage which was conferred on him in August, and the grants which were made to him to support his title, with the contrivances adopted for his benefit. Even in these, apparently for no other object than that of flattering Villiers, he speaks slightly of 'the Cecils, father and son.' (xii. 59, 60, 152, 237.) During this time also the proceedings took place which expelled Coke from his seat in the King's Bench, in which Bacon, so far from attempting to moderate the king's groundless anger, took every means to justify and inflame it. The minute of council, and the 'remembrances,' prepared by him, are evidently composed in this spirit. (vii. 307-338, 349.) Nor did he show more generosity towards the chief justice, in reference to the absurd direction as to 'expurging of his Reports' (xii. 304); and if the long letter addressed to Coke, as soon as his disgrace had been rendered certain, was, as it has always been considered, the production of Bacon, it exhibits the mean spirit of triumphing over a fallen adversary, by dwelling, under the pretence of friendly admonition, on all his faults and infirmities, and painting them in colours which, however true to the life, reflect on the writer the imputation of their being dictated by cowardly and malicious feelings. (vii. 296.)

Lord Ellesmere's last days were approaching. During the two previous years he had petitioned to be relieved from his office, but could not prevail on the king till March 3, 1616-17. Four days afterwards

Bacon attained the object of his late endeavours, by receiving the Great Seal from the king's hand, with the title of lord keeper (Claus. 16 Jac. p. 15, n. 13.) In another week Lord Ellesmere died; and on May Bacon took his seat in the Court of Chancery, delivering a long speech, stating his resolutions as to the practice. Even in this speech he could not refrain from giving a sly and contemptuous blow at Sir Edward Coke, by saying, in allusion to complaints against judgments at law, 'wherein your lordships may have heard a great noise and a noise of præmunire, and I cannot what.' (Works, vii. 243.) He first removed from Gray's Inn to Dorset House in Fleet Street, and soon afterwards to York House in the Strand, where he was born.

On receiving the Seal he immediately wrote to Villiers (now created Earl of Buckingham), in strong terms of gratitude, stating that he 'shall count every day wherein he shall not 'do your name he in speech, or perform you service in deed' (xii. 241.) The earl made good use of this promise, by writing numerous letters to Bacon in favour of suitors; and the success of his influence may be judged by the frequency of the applications. (Passim, 314 to 411.) Herein both the earl and lord keeper forgot the advice formerly given by the one to the other:—'By no means you persuaded to interpose yourself, by word or letter, in any cause depending in any court of justice.' (vi. 413.)

Within four months, however, the old enemy should again triumph, in a veteracy against Coke, and his fear of him to interfere in a matter which it was likely to resent. He wrote to the king and the earl (then both in Ireland), advising against the projected marriage between the earl's brother, Sir John Villiers, and Coke's daughter, by Sir Hatton, and representing the inconvenience to the state 'if there be but an opportunity of his (Coke's) coming in.' (xii. 245.) The former he received a severe rebuke; when he not only made submission, but reversed his policy, favouring the match, and altering his attitude towards Sir Edward Coke. (237, 327.) Buckingham was not so appeased, but 'professed openly against' as reported in a letter from Sir John Yelverton, who gave him some advice how he should act. The earl, however, soon afterwards appeared conciled (331, 342); and not only his correspondence between them resumed, but Bacon was so entirely restored to favour that he received the title of chancellor on January 4, 1617-18.

The king had indeed much reason to be satisfied with Bacon's industry, but was scarcely a single business tou royal interests to which he did not devote himself. His correspondence with the king was incessant, comprehending all subjects—political, judicial, and, what seems out of his province, economical. It would be more satisfactory if it did not contain too many proofs of his endeavours to conciliate favour by occasional symptoms of his inclination to stretch, and even to overstep, the law for James's benefit (284, 374), and by perpetual flattery and allusions to the superiority of the king's judgment, which are repeated ad nauseam. In reward for his 'many faithful services,' the king, on July 11, 1618, created him Baron Verulam (Rymer, xvii. 17); and Bacon three months afterwards applied to Buckingham to obtain for him a grant of the farm of the Alienation, 'a little to warm the honour.' (Works, xii. 260.) In the following May he received a more substantial favour in the grant of 1,200*l.* a year (369); and in writing to Buckingham on Dec. 12, 1619, as to the appropriation of the fines imposed on the Dutch merchants for exporting gold and silver coin, he says, 'And if the king intend any gifts, let them stay for a second course (for all is not yet done), but nothing out of these, except the king should give me the 20,000*l.* I owe Peter Vanlore out of his fine, which is the chief debt I owe.' He adds, 'This I speak merrily.' Might he not have said 'advisedly' too? (380.)

His efforts in this case of the Dutch merchants, and in several other proceedings which resulted in fines, were dictated, to all appearance, too much by the desire of relieving the king's pecuniary difficulties, and avoiding the necessity of calling a parliament. To this, however, it became necessary at last to resort; and on November 6, 1620, a proclamation, in the preparation of which, both as to the business to be transacted and the members to be chosen, Bacon took an active part, was issued for one in January, being six years and a half since that assembly had met. Bacon was advanced in the peerage, with the title of Viscount St. Albans. (Rymer, xvii. 279.)

Before the parliament met, Yelverton, the attorney-general, who had incurred Buckingham's enmity, was prosecuted in the Star Chamber for introducing certain clauses in a charter to the city of London not authorised by the king's warrant. Bacon, who had been on friendly and familiar terms with him, seems to have pressed the case too hardly against him; and his letters bear the mark of his having been influenced in doing so by a desire to curry favour with Buckingham. (Works, vii. 44-9.)

In the preceding October he published his great work, 'Novum Organum,' which he dedicated to the king, who received it most graciously, promising 'to read it thorough with care and attention, though I steal some hours from my sleep, having otherwise as little spare time to read it as you had to write it.' (154.)

The parliament assembled on January 30; and Bacon, after the king had addressed it, made a short speech in the exaggerated style of flattery he was in the habit of using: 'I am struck with admiration in respect of your profound discourses, with reverence to your royal precepts, and contentment in a number of gracious passages, which have fallen from your majesty in your speech,' &c. The Commons were not so well satisfied with the king nor with his system; and, though they were liberal in their grants and respectful in their language, they resolved to investigate and repress the evils under which the people suffered, and to punish the oppressors. For this purpose they formed a committee of grievances, which proceeded to enquire into the various monopolies, patents, and grants of concealments, which had caused so much suffering and injustice. One of the first objects of their attack was Sir Giles Mompesson, a member of their house, the charge against whom was taken into the House of Lords; and while Bacon, as chancellor, was assisting in the examination, the committee of the Commons, on March 15, made a report, charging him with corruption in his high office, which was communicated on the 18th to the Lords.

Bacon seems to have been wholly taken by surprise at this accusation, which was at first confined to two cases. He immediately took to his bed, and addressed a letter to Sir James Ley, then acting as speaker in his stead, praying that the house would maintain him in their good opinion till his cause was heard, and for time to advise with his counsel, and to make his answer. On March 22nd four more charges were brought against him; and on the 26th the parliament adjourned till April 17, three committees of the Lords being authorised to examine witnesses during the recess. On the renewal of the session the lord chamberlain announced that Bacon had had an interview with his majesty, who had referred him to the Lords; and on the 24th Bacon sent them a general confession, stating that, though not communicated formally from the house, he found in the charges 'matter sufficient and full' to move him to desert his defence. This submission not being deemed satisfactory, the Lords resolved that he should be charged with the several bribes and corruptions, and that he should make a particular answer by the 30th. The charges had been greatly increased in number. They consisted of his having in no less than twenty-two instances received bribes and presents amounting to above 11,000*l.*, from one or the other, or from both, of the parties in suits before him.

On April 30 he sent in his submission, confessing seriatim the receipt of these several sums charged. Some few he acknowledged were given while the suit was depending; but he asserted that others were not presented till after he had pronounced his decree. Some he said were new year's gifts, and some presents towards the furnishing of his house; and that there were 'few or none that are not almost two years old.' On the same day the Great Seal was sequestered, and three days later, Bacon being excused from attending on account of illness, the Lords pronounced sentence against him—of a fine of 40,000*l.*; imprisonment in the Tower during pleasure; incapacity to hold any office, &c., in the state; and prohibition against sitting in parliament, or coming within the verge of the court. They negated the proposition that he should be suspended from all his titles of nobility during his life.

It has been suggested that Bacon was induced to 'desert his defence' at the instigation of the king and Buckingham. What passed at the interview between the former and Bacon cannot of course be known; but it is not improbable that the king, desirous as he must have been of putting a stop to the investigations of the Commons, lest other persons nearer to him should be implicated, advised him, if he had not a clear defence against all the charges, not to lengthen the proceedings. But it is impossible to read the evidence on which the charges were founded, or even the circumstances alleged by Bacon in extenuation of some of them, without feeling that it must have been more the consciousness of guilt than any tenderness towards other parties that dictated the submission that he offered. Indeed, his own letters, both previous and subsequent to this confession, contradict the idea that he sacrificed himself for the sake of others. In his first letter to the king after the charges were made, though he hopes he may not be found to have 'a depraved habit of taking bribes to pervert justice,' he adds, 'Howsoever I may be frail, and partake of the abuses of the times.' (xii. 66.) In another, petitioning his majesty to save him from the sentence, he ventures to say, 'But because he that hath taken bribes is apt to give bribes, I will go further, and present your majesty with a bribe.' And in a third letter pleading for pardon, he instances Demosthenes, Titus Livius, and Seneca, as having been restored after being condemned for bribery and corruption.

(xiii. 30, 32.) To Sir Thomas May also, in acknowledging and qualifying a present he had received from the Apothecaries, he says, 'As it may not be defended, so I would be glad it were not raked up more than needs. I doubt only the chair, because I hear he useth names sharply.' (xii. 406.) The language in these and other letters cannot by any interpretation be read as that of an innocent man.

After his sentence, he expresses in his letters no compunction for his offence, nor exhibits any shame at his exposure. How little he felt his disgrace appears in a letter to the Bishop of Winchester, in which he talks of his consolation being in the examples of Demosthenes, Cicero, and Seneca—'all three ruined, not by war, or by any other disaster, but by justice and sentenced as delinquent criminals; all three famous writers, insomuch as the remembrance of their calamity is now as to posterity but a little picture of night-work, remaining amongst the fair and excellent tables of their acts and works.' (vii. 113.) In another letter also to Buckingham he says, 'I confess it is my fault, though it may be so happiness to me withal that I do not times forget my adversity.' (xii. 4.) Neither was it any impediment to his recovery when Sir Henry Montagu, Earl of Manchester, who had been chief justice and was lately removed from the office of lord treasurer to the less important office of lord president of the council, expressed the fallen chancellor how sorry he was that he had made such an example, Bacon replied, 'It did not trouble him, since his lordship's was made a precedent.' (Aubrey, 225.)

Camden says his imprisonment lasted but two days, and his letters prove one of them was the 31st of May, and the next day he was at Sir John Vaughan's at Parson's Green. (Works, xii. 430, 31.) From this retirement he was allowed at the end of the month to remove to Lambury. (xii. 408.) In the full month of September he pressed his suit for assistance in his fallen fortunes: on October 8 he thanked the king for the remission of his fine, and offered his services to Henry VII. for correction. (410.) His fine was pardoned, and, at the same time, he was assigned to trustees to prevent the opportunity of his creditors; to the effect of which Lord Keeper Williams made some objections, the proposed sentence being, as he said, 'full of knavery and a wicked precedent.' From a letter addressed to him by John Selden in 1621-2, he seems to have at one time contemplated overturning the judgment against him, on account of a doubt he raised at that meeting of parliament whether that meeting of parliament was a session; but he received no encouragement. (421.) He continued his importun-his friends succeeded in March in obtaining a release from his confinement at Gorham-bury, and a permission to go to Highgate. Subsequently he tells the Lord Treasurer Cranfield, who was negotiating with him for the purchase of York House, that he had taken a house at Chiswick (425, 428); and at the end of 1622 Buckingham obtained for him an interview with the king. (xiii. 37.) He continued, by means of friends and letters, his correspondence with Buckingham till the marquis, in February 1623, accompanied the prince on his romantic pilgrimage to Spain, when, as he says, 'the better to hold out,' he retired to his chambers in Gray's Inn. (439.) He never returned to York House, which became Buckingham's in 1624.

During the marquis's absence in Spain, Bacon appealed to the king himself in a long letter, which would have been pathetic but that it is over-laboured, praying his majesty to pity him so far as that he 'that hath borne a bag be not now in his age forced in effect to bear a wallet, nor he that desired to live by study may not be driven to study to live.' So reduced does he appear to be, by all his letters, that upon a vacancy in May 1623 he applied to the king, but unsuccessfully, for the provostship of Eton, 'a cell to retire unto.' (xii. 49, 440.)

To Buckingham, while abroad (then created duke), his letters were frequent and flattering; and to Mr. Toby Matthew, who was also in Spain, his desires to keep him in the prince's and the duke's remembrance show his anxiety to be again received into favour. On their return in October he offered the duke counsel for his conduct, advising him to 'do some remarkable act to fix' his reputation, and reminding him of an old Spanish proverb, 'He that tieth not a knot upon his thread loseth the stitch.' In January 1624 he tells the duke that he is 'almost at last cast for means:' but it was not till November that he succeeded in getting 'three years advance,' to relieve him of his necessities. Shortly before this he had received a full pardon of his whole sentence. (445, xiii. 7, 70.)

King James died on March 27, 1625, and King Charles immediately calling a parliament, Bacon had the firstfruits of his full pardon by receiving a writ of summons. Ill health, which had begun to make inroads upon him, prevented him from taking his seat, and for the whole of that year his correspondence was much curtailed. Such letters as remain show a continuance of straitened means. He writes to Sir Robert Pye 'to despatch that warrant of a petty sum, that it may help to bear my charge of coming up to London;' and at the end of the year he tells the Duke of Buckingham that 'his wants are great.' Even as late as January 18, 1626, he shows that his hopes of court favour are not exhausted, by requesting the French ambassador, the Marquis d'Effiat, to procure for him some mark of the queen's goodwill, and to take occasion to whisper something to his advantage in the Duke of Buckingham's ear. (xii. 460, 482, 483.) Indeed, a great part of the industry which he displayed during the five years that intervened between his disgrace and his death seems to have been employed in attempts to regain his lost consequence, and to forward his personal advantage. The rest of his time was consecrated to higher and better purposes. No moment seems to have been unoccupied; and his industry is manifested in the number of his original productions during that period, and in the publication of translations of his 'Advancement of Learning,' with great additions, and of some other of his works, into Latin.

His death was caused by the trial of an experiment whether flesh could not be preserved in snow as well as in salt. For this purpose, while taking an airing with Dr. Witherspoon, the king's physician, he went to a poor woman's cottage at the bottom of Highgate Hill, and bought a hen, the body of which he stuffed with snow. In doing this the chill seized him so suddenly and violently that he was unable to proceed, and was obliged to be carried to the Earl of Arundel's house in the neighbourhood, where the bed in which he was placed being damp, he caught so severe a cold that he died of suffocation. (Aubrey, 227.) His last letter, addressed to the earl on his deathbed, is preserved in his works (xii. 274); and his last breath was drawn in the arms of his benevolent relative, Sir Julius Cæsar. He expired on Easter Sunday, April 9, 1626, having exceeded the completion of his sixty-fifth year by nearly three months.

He was buried at St. Michael's Church, at St. Albans, where his faithful friend and servant Sir Thomas Meautys erected a monument, representing him seated in contemplation.

His wife, by whom he had no children, survived him till June 30, 1650, and was buried at Egworth in Bedfordshire, having had for her second husband Walter Doble, of Sussex. (xvi. note H H H; Hasted's Kent, v. 304.)

Authors differ in their accounts of Bacon's pecuniary means in the last years of his life. Howell says he died so poor that he scarce left money to bury him. Wilson, the historian, confirms this account, and adds that Lord Brook denied him beer to quench his thirst. Aubrey tells that Sir Julius Cæsar sent him 100*l.* in his necessities; and the perpetual appeals to the king and Buckingham for assistance seem to support the conclusion. But, on the other hand, it is related that the prince, on seeing him in a coach followed by a number of gentlemen on horseback, observed, 'Well, do what you can, this man scorns to go out like a snuff.' Indeed, his income after his pardon was apparently adequate, if prudently managed, to the demands of his station, consisting of his pension of 1,200*l.* and his grant of 600*l.* a year from the Alienation Office, besides the profits of his own estate. Both stories may, however, be true, and their discrepancy accounted for by remembering with what irregularity pensions were then paid, and the negligence and imprudence in money matters generally attributed to him.

As a lawyer Bacon's reputation does not, perhaps, stand so high as it ought. Queen Elizabeth said of him, 'Bacon had a great wit and much learning; but in law showeth to the uttermost of his knowledge, and is not deep;' and hers was probably the echo of the general opinion. But this was said when he was a candidate for the office of solicitor-general; and he had not then had the practical advantages which he afterwards enjoyed. With the knowledge of the principles of law which his writings evidence, it is not improbable that the experience he subsequently obtained made him as finished a lawyer as most of his contemporaries. His acquirements in this branch, whatever they were, were overshadowed by his eminence as a philosopher. He composed several legal treatises, but none of them were published during his life. His speeches which remain are fair specimens of forensic eloquence in his peculiar style, with sufficient mastery of legal learning, and with ample illustration from history.

In the performance of his judicial duties he boasts of extraordinary activity. He tells Buckingham, on June 6, 1617, a month after he took his seat in the court, that there is 'not one cause unheard; the lawyers drawn dry of all the motions they were to make; not one petition unanswered. And this, I think, could not be said in our age before.' (xii. 348.) His boasting might be passed over; but it becomes offensive when depreciating his predecessor, as he does in the following December:—'This very evening I have made even with the causes of Chancery, and comparing with the causes heard by my lord that dead is, of Michaelmas Term was twelve month, I find them to be double so many and one more; besides that the causes which I despatch do seldom turn upon me again, as his many times did.' (340.) Again, in May 1619, he writes, 'Yesterday was a day of motions in the Chancery. This day was a day of motions in the Star Chamber; and it was my hap to clear the bar that no man was left to move anything, which my lords were pleased to note they never saw before.' (xiii. 17.) To this account of his industry should be added his own view of his integrity. When imprisoned in the Tower, he says to the duke, 'I have been . . . the justest chancellor that hath been in the five changes since my father's time.' When writing also to Buckingham of his poverty, he says, 'I never took penny for any benefice or ecclesiastical living; I never took penny for realising anything stopped at the Seal; I never took penny for any commission, or things of that nature.' (xii. 463, 490.) The conviction of Wraynham, prosecuted in the Star Chamber for slandering Bacon, who had pronounced a decree against him in favour of his opponent Sir Edward Fisher, would, on the statement of the case, appear to be just, but for the subsequent discovery that the chancellor had shortly afterwards received from Fisher a suit of hangings worth about 160*l.* (State Trials, ii. 101107.)

The biographers of Bacon have been puzzled how to give to his personal character the praise that he merited for literary attainments and productions. The former he must be judged of as a man, by the latter as the philosopher; who but must regret that there is so much of contrast between them? who but must feel that the system of the one was in direct contradiction to the acts of the other. Bacon as a lawyer, a politician, and a statesman seems to be of a totally distinct nature from Bacon as a writer and propounder of everlasting truths. Considering him in the former view, taking by themselves the incidents of his life and the evidence of his character, as interpreted by his letters, it seems impossible that any biographer can venture to pronounce a verdict upon him. Are there grounds for it? an ardent desire for place, betrayed through every phase of his career? in his unscrupulous and degrading application for patronage? in his depreciation of his rivals? in his adulation of his sovereign in his flattery of the favourite? in his double ingratitude to Essex, in paying against his life and in blackening his memory? in his envy of Coke, in his underhand proceedings against him? in his attacks on the independence of the judges? in his encouragement of the spotic principles of James? in his defence, however extenuated, of those principles which he acknowledged? in the eagerness to shame which he exhibited in disgrace? or in the unblushing ambition which he made to regain his ascendancy? Would not these, if he had been a man and undistinguished as a writer, have been visited with the contempt and censure which a nation they merited? And how position as an author alter the feeling thus forcibly impressed? Must it not be more deeply imprinted by the conviction that he was acting contrary to his principles, that he had not the moral courage to withstand any temptation, and that in every act of his life he was pursuing a course which his conscience condemned? There is scarcely a fault of which he has been guilty against which he has not written strongly and truly; and he stigmatises the vices to which he is subject at the very time he is committing them. To himself may be applied the close of his twenty-third essay, 'On the Wisdom for a Man's self:—'Wisdom for a man's self is, in many branches thereof, a depraved thing. It is the wisdom of rats, that will be sure to leave a house somewhat before it falls. It is the wisdom of the fox, that thrusts out the badger who digged and made room for him. It is the wisdom of crocodiles, that shed tears when they would devour. But that which is specially to be noted is, that those which (as Cicero says of Pompey) are "sui amantes, sine rivali," are many times unfortunate; and whereas they have all their times sacrificed to themselves, they become in the end themselves sacrifices to the inconstancy of fortune, whose wings they thought, by their self-wisdom, to have pinioned.'

BACON, FRANCIS, owed his origin to the same root from which the four preceding judges sprang, being of that branch of the family which settled at Hessel in Suffolk. His great grandparents are stated to be Thomas Bacon, of that place, and Anne Rowse, and his father was John Bacon, of King's Lynn in Norfolk, gentleman.

He was born about 1587, and commencing his legal studies at Barnard's Inn, he pursued them at Gray's Inn, where he was admitted a member in February 1607, called to the bar in 1615, and became reader in autumn 1634. His name does not appear in any of the contemporary reports; his practice probably being in Chancery or the provinces.

In 1638 he had a grant in reversion of the office of drawing licences and pardons of alienations to the Great Seal. (Rymer, xx. 123.) In May 1640 he was included in the batch of serjeants then called; and on October 14, 1642, he received the then dangerous promotion to a seat in the King's Bench, his patent being dated at Bridgenorth (Ibid. 541), on the king's march towards London, when he was knighted. That the new judge was not obnoxious to the parliament may be inferred from their request in the propositions made to the king, in February 1643, that he might be continued in his place. He does not appear to have joined the king at Oxford, but he attended his duty in his court at Westminster Hall, where, in Michaelmas Term 1643, he was the only judge sitting (Clarendon, iii. 407, iv. 342); and on the trial of Lord Macguire for high treason, as the fomentor of the great rebellion and horrible massacre in Ireland in 1641, before that court in Hilary Term 1645, he alone appears to have been present. (State Trials, iv. 606.) He is next mentioned in September 1647 as having, with Serjeant Creswell or Cresheld, committed James Symbal and others for speaking words against the king, with whom negotiations were proceeding. He continued to act till the king was beheaded, when he had the courage to refuse the new commission offered him by the Commons. (White Locke, 269, 378.)

He spent the remainder of his days in privacy, and died on August 22, 1657. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of William Robinson, he had several children. His eldest son, Francis (who was a reader in Gray's Inn in autumn 1662), raised a handsome monument over his grave in St. Gregory's Church, Norwich.

BAINBRIDGE, CHRISTOPHER (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), sprang from an ancient family seated at Hilton, near Appleby, in Westmoreland, where he was born. Educated at Queen's College, Oxford, he took his degree in laws, and having been admitted at the same time into holy orders, he obtained early preferment in the Church. This he probably owed to the patronage of Archbishop Morton, his intimate friend, with whom he had suffered under Richard III. He became almoner of Henry VII., and was rector of Aller, in the diocese of Bath and Wells. In 1485 he received a canonry, first in Salisbury and afterwards in York. In 1495 he was elected provost of his college, to which he was a liberal benefactor. In 1497 he was presented to the treasuryship of St. Paul's; in 1500 to the archdeaconry of Surrey; and on December 9, 1503, to the deanery of York. He held the latter dignity when he succeeded William Barons as master of the Rolls, on November 13, 1504; and on February 18 in the following year he was made Dean of Windsor. (Le Neve.)

He resigned his judicial office on his being preferred to the bishopric of Durham, the temporalities of which were granted to him on November 17, 1507. Scarcely thirteen months had elapsed ere he was translated to the archbishopric of York, receiving the temporalities of that province, which had been in the king's hands for above a year, on December 12, 1508. It was probably in preparation for this removal that he obtained on November 11 a charter of general pardon (Rymer, xiii. 171, 233, 235); a caution rendered peculiarly expedient in times when the extortions of informers were almost openly encouraged.

King Henry VIII., soon after his accession, deeming it politic to have a representative at the Roman court, Archbishop Bainbridge was selected for this honourable post; and his patent, with full powers as procurator of the king, was dated on September 24, 1509. (Ibid. 264.) How much of his future life he spent at Rome does not precisely appear; but while there he so negotiated in the war against the King of France as to please both his sovereign and the pope, from the latter of whom he received the reward of a cardinal's hat in March 1511, with the title of St. Praxedis. But, not exercising in his own family the prudence which he exhibited in diplomacy, he is said to have fallen a sacrifice to the violence of his temper. Having, in a fit of passion, given a blow to Rinaldo de Modena, a priest in his household, the malicious Italian, according to this account, avenged the insult by poisoning his master. The letters, however, of William Burbank and Richard Pace, the cardinal's secretaries, give a very different complexion to the transaction. They mention nothing about the blow, but state that the priest, in his first confession, acknowledged he was instigated by the Bishop of Worcester, Silvester de Gligis, the cardinal's known enemy, who gave him fifteen ducats of gold, and that, though he was afterwards induced to deny the bishop's complicity in the murder, the doctors and learned men to whom the case was referred would not admit the contradiction. Richard Pace (afterwards principal secretary of state) seems to have had some difficulty in saving the bishop, 'having respect unto him as your grace's orator,' from the execution of the judge's determination that he 'should not only be put in prison, but also suffer torments and be compelled to show the truth.' The poison was administered at Spoleto; and the cardinal's death took place on July 14, 1514. It was announced to the king in a letter, dated the same day, from the Cardinal de' Medici, afterwards Pope Clement VII.; and it is added in another letter that the priest 'smote himself with a small knyff,' and died twelve days afterwards. (Rymer, xiii. 404; Ellis's Letters, First Series, i. 100-108.)

The archbishop was buried in the cloister of the church of S. Tommaso degli Inglesi at Rome, under a fine monument, still to be seen, with a full-length recumbent figure of his handsome person. He bequeathed 20,000 golden ducats towards the building of St. Peter's. (Four Years at the Court of Henry VIII. ii. 146; Surtree's Durham, i. lxiv; Gwinod, 699, 753, 796; Ath. Oxon. ii. 702.)

BALDOCK, RALPH DE (BISHOP OF LONDON), was collated Archdeacon of Middlesex in 1276, 4 Edward I., from which he was raised, on October 18, 1294, to the deanery of St. Paul's, and was elected Bishop of London, February 24, 1304; but, owing to some dispute, his consecration was delayed till January 30, 1306. (Le Nere.)

He received the Great Seal as chancellor on April 21, 1307, from Edward I., who died on the 7th of the following July, at Burgh-on-the-Sands; and there is a curious entry on the Fine Roll, showing that Ralph de Baldock, being then in London, and ignorant of that event having occurred, continued to seal writs of course till July 25. On the following Saturday he received the new king's commands to send him the Great Seal, which was accordingly delivered to the king at Carlisle on August 2. (R. Fin. 35 Edw. I. m. 1.)

In 3 Edward II. he was appointed one of the ordainers for the management of the affairs of government and the king's household.

He commenced the erection of the choir of St. Mary in his cathedral, and bequeathed a sum sufficient for its completion. He died at Stepney, on July 24, 1313, and was buried in that chapel. He left some works which proved his devotion to literature; among which was one entitled 'Historia Angliæ a History of British Affairs down to his Time.' He also made 'A Collection of Statutes and Constitutions of the Church of St. Paul's.'

BALDOCK, ROBERT DE, was probably some way related to the last named, Ralph de Baldock. The earliest notice found of his history is a grant to him, in 1274, of all the king's right in the kyle fees, which Roger de Clifford held jointly with John de Crombwell and his wife, and also of the manor of St. Andrew in Surrey, lately belonging to Roger de Clifford, who was attainted. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 91.) The next entry, however, is of a different character, being a fine of twenty marks imposed upon him in Durham, in 1276, for some unadvised obedience to a papal bull without notice given to the king's council, the Archdeacon of Cleveland, at the same time fined 100*l.* for the same offence. (Abb. Placit. 258.) It is presumed, therefore, that Master Robert Baldock (as he is always called) took some ecclesiastical benefice in the reign of Edward I.

In 1314, 8 Edward II., he became Archdeacon of Middlesex (Le Nere), in which office Ralph de Baldock had held for several years before. Probably at that time, or certainly two years afterwards, he held some office about the court, as in February 1317 he was regularly summoned to the council and parliaments as a judge and other legal personages. In 1320 he was keeper of the king's Great Seal, and in the following year was the king and council, with other solemn envoys, to treat for a peace with the Scots at Bamborough; for his expenses in which mission he was allowed the sum of 60*l.* in the wardrobe accounts. (Archæologia, xxvi. 34.) The Despencers, father and son, were then in the height of their ascendancy; and, by his connection with their councils, he shared in the aversion with which they were regarded by the nobles and the people.

He was at last raised to the chancellorship on August 20, 1323, 17 Edward II., but had little cause to rejoice in his advancement. Though the defeat and execution of the Duke of Lancaster had produced a temporary quiet, within a few months after he had received the Seal a conspiracy by Roger Mortimer and others was discovered, or invented, the object of which was the murder of Baldock and the royal favourite. Though he escaped from this danger, he could not but experience many misgivings as to the results that were likely to follow from the arrogant indiscretions of Despencer.

He was elected to the bishopric of Norwich on July 28, 1325; but a rumour having reached him that the pope had reserved the presentation for himself, he renounced the election on September 3, an act which speaks well for his moderation, and his anxiety to prevent a collision between his sovereign and the papal court.

Baldock's concurrence in the advice which prompted Edward to fall into the trap laid by the French king, by which Queen Isabella was permitted to proceed to France, and the weak king was induced to give up Guienne and Ponthieu to his son, and to send the latter to do homage for them, is conclusive evidence that he cannot be considered a wise counsellor; for though perhaps the plan had not yet been formed that led to results so fatal to his sovereign and himself, there were sufficient indications of danger at home, and of treachery in the conduct of Charles le Bel, to have induced more cautious proceedings.

The invasion of Queen Isabella quickly followed. She landed on September 24, 1326; and the king, deserted by almost all parties, fled to Wales with the chancellor and the two Despencers. The elder of these was taken and executed at Bristol, and on November 10 the king and his two remaining companions fell into the hands of the queen's friends. The fate of the favourite was soon sealed, and that of the king was delayed till a resignation of his crown had been forced from him. Baldock had been specially denounced in the queen's first proclamation (State Trials, i. 35); but, being an ecclesiastic, was committed to the custody of Adam de Orleton, Bishop of Hereford. He remained at Hereford till February following, when he was removed to the bishop's house in London. His prison there was soon invaded by an outrageous mob, who treated him with violence, and thrust him into Newgate, where, after languishing about three months, he died, on May 28, 1327. All his possessions had been previously seized, and among them were the manors of Heibrigge and Tylingham in Essex. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 304.)

As he was never brought to trial, the precise charges against him do not appear; but in the mandates from the queen and prince, both before and after his capture and death, his name is always united with those of the Despencers, ascribing to them the guilt of estranging the king from his wife and real friends by false suggestions and evil procurement, and designating them as 'enemies of God, of the Church, and the whole kingdom.' Remembering, however, how great was the inveteracy between the contending parties, and how little there is to approve in the conduct of that which was successful, we must hesitate before we join in the popular cry against the chancellor without more substantial proof of his demerits. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 472; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 303.)

BALDOCK, ROBERT, son and heir of Samuel Baldock, of Stanway in Essex, bore the same arms as those of the last-named, Robert de Baldock, Bishop of Norwich. He became a student at Gray's Inn on July 7, 1644, was called to the bar on February 11, 1651, and arrived at the degree of ancient in May 1667. By his first marriage, with Mary the daughter of Bacqueville Bacon (of the family of Redgrave), he became settled at Great Hocham in Norfolk. This lady died in 1662, after which he took a second wife, whose name has not been handed down. Of his early legal career there is no other record than that of Roger North (233), who says of him that he 'had wit and will enough' to contrive a fraudulent conveyance. In 1671 he was recorder of Great Yarmouth when Charles II. visited that place, on which occasion he was knighted. He took the degree of serjeant in Michaelmas Term 1677, and was included in the list of king's serjeants on the accession of James II.

He was one of the counsel employed by the crown in the prosecution of the seven bishops; and showed himself so thorough-paced a stickler for prerogative that within a week after the trial he was appointed, on July 6, 1688, a justice of the King's Bench, in the place of Sir John Powell, who had declared his opinion in favour of the prelates (Bramston's Autobiog. 311); but he had very little opportunity of showing his judicial qualifications, for before the next term the Prince of Orange had embarked for England, and the king was on the point of flying from it.

In the new appointments he of course was not thought of. He died three years afterwards, on October 4, 1691, and his monument still remains in the church of Great Hoocham.

BALDWIN, JOHN, was the son of William Baldwin, and Agnes the daughter of William Dormer, Esq., of Wycombe in Buckinghamshire, the ancestor of Lord Dormer. At the Inner Temple, where he studied the law, he attained so high a reputation that he received the uncommon distinction of being thrice appointed reader—in autumn 1516, in Lent 1524, and in autumn 1531. The last occasion was on account of his having been called upon to take the degree of the coif, which he accordingly assumed in the following November, when he was immediately constituted one of the king's serjeants. In 1530 he held the office of treasurer of his inn.

He probably practised in the Court of Chancery, as he was one of the persons assigned in June 1529 to aid Cardinal Wolsey in hearing causes there. He and Serjeant Willoughby were knighted in 1534, being the first serjeants, as is noticed in Spelman's MS. Reports, who ever submitted to receive that honour. In 1535 he was elevated to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas. Within a few weeks he was called upon to act as a commissioner on the trials of Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher, in which, however, he does not appear to have taken any active part. He continued chief justice for ten years, resigning between Trinity Term 1545, the date of the last fine levied before him, and November 6. He died on December 22 following.

Notwithstanding his early promise, he does not seem to have been much esteemed as a judge. He differed frequently from his brethren, and was certainly thought little of by Chief Justice Dyer, who on one occasion says in his Reports, 'But Baldwin was of a contrary opinion, though neither I, nor any one else, I believe, understood his refutation.'

He possessed the manor of Avlesbury in Bucks, and in the last year of his life he obtained some valuable grants from the king. All his property, for want of male heirs, was divided among his daughters, one of whom, Catherine, was married to Robert Pakington, M.P. for London (assassinated in the streets in 1536), who was ancestor of the baronets of that name, of Aylesbury, whose title became extinct in 1830.

BANASTER, THOMAS, described as a 'clericus,' was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on November 4, 1423, 2 Henry VI. (Acts Privy Council, iii. 121); but his name nowhere else appears.

BANASTREE, ALARD, was sheriff of Oxfordshire in 20 & 21 Henry II., 1174-5; and in the former of those years his name is found as one of the justices itinerant fixing the assize for that county. But in reference to the ordinary proceedings of the court, he is never mentioned; nor indeed is any other information given concerning him.

In the four previous years that sheriffship was held by Adam Banastre, probably his father. (Fuller's Worthies; Madox, i. 12-13.)

BANISTER, WILLIAM, was of a family which resided at Turk Dean in the county of Gloucester, in possession of a very considerable estate. He received his education at the Middle Temple, and was honoured with the degree of the coif in 1706, was then appointed one of the judges of South Wales; from which position was advanced, on the recommendation of Lord Harcourt, to be a baron of the exchequer, on June 8, 1713, when he was knighted. He occupied this seat for more than a year, being superseded October 14, 1714, not three months after the accession of George I., having been reported by Lord Cowper as 'a man in all qualified for the place.' (Atkyns's cesterah, 413; Lord Raymond, 1261, 1262.)

BANKE, RICHARD. The barons of the Exchequer in the early reigns were of little comparative importance, getting rising to the bench from being clerks in that department, and not engaged in the general judicial business of the court. That little information can be obtained regarding them either from records or tradition. Of the legal career of Richard Banke nothing is known, except that he was made a baron of the Exchequer June 11, 1410, 11 Henry IV., continuing in his place to the end of the reign, was re-appointed in the reign of his wife Margaret, the daughter of William de la Rivere, were buried in the Priory of St. Bartholomew, London (419.)

BANKE, THOMAS, who was person of the preceding, is another instance of the paucity of materials respecting barons of the Exchequer of this reign. The sole mention of Thomas Banke is that he received that appointment on May 2, 1411, 2 Henry VI. (Acts of Privy Council, 147.)

BANKS, JOHN, was of Keswick in Cumberland, where his father of the same name was a merchant, and his mother Elizabeth, daughter of—Hassell. He entered the Inner Temple in 1589, and in 1604 he entered the Middle Temple, and without taking any degree there, he became a student of the law in May 1607, and, after being called to the bar on November 30, 1614, he occupied the bench of the society in 1629, he reader in Lent 1631, and treasurer in the following year. He had previous to arriving at these posts acquired a high reputation in his profession.

Returned to the parliament of 1628, he confined himself to legal questions (Parl. Hist. ii. 480), and was selected in July 1630 to be attorney-general to the newly born Prince Charles, Duke of Cornwall (Rymer, xix. 254), afterwards Charles II., whereupon he was knighted. On the death of William Noy, he was appointed attorney-general to the king, on September 27, 1634, and it is some proof of the estimation in which he was held, that a contemporary letter-writer says, with somewhat of exaggeration, that he was commended to his majesty as exceeding Bacon in eloquence, Ellesmere in judgment, and Noy in law. (Corfe Castle, 54.) He had then a residence at Hanwell, near Staines, but soon after his advance he purchased the manor of Corfe Castle in Dorsetshire, of Sir Edward Coke's widow, Lady Hatton.

Under his official direction the questionable proceedings in the Star Chamber were taken against Bastwick, Burton, and Prynne, against Bishop Williams, and against John Lilburn; and though he did not originate the plan for the imposition of ship money, he was employed in preparing and advising on the writs and to support them as the prosecutor against John Hampden. (State Trials, iii.) These duties he performed so satisfactorily to the court that upon the elevation of Sir Edward Lyttelton to the post of lord keeper, he received that of chief justice of the Common Pleas on January 29, 1641. (Rymer, xx. 447.)

Very soon after his appointment a commission was granted to him to sit as speaker in the House of Lords, in consequence of the illness of the lord keeper; and in that character he had the melancholy duty of presiding when the Earl of Strafford, who had been his client, and with whom he was in habits of friendly intimacy, was brought to the bar on his impeachment by the Commons. (Corfe Castle, 83.) Early in the next year, on the king retiring to York, Banks was among the first to join him, when he was admitted into the privy council, and subscribed the profession made by the lords of their belief that the king had no intention to make war upon the parliament, but that his anxious desire was to preserve the peace of the kingdom. (Clarendon, iii. 72.)

Notwithstanding the part which Sir John had formerly taken in the prosecution and in the case of ship money, and his present assistance to the royal counsels, he does not seem to have been an object of enmity to the parliament: for in the propositions they made to the king for peace in February 1643 they desired that he should keep his place in the Common Pleas. (Parl. Hist. iii. 70.) This recommendation he owed to his having friends in both houses, the Earls of Northumberland and Essex, the Lord Wharton, Denzil Holles, and Green, who were aware that Banks by his moderate counsels had hazarded the king's indignation. (Corfe Castle, 122-124.) Sir John's real devotion to the royal cause was proved by his liberal subscription to the king's necessities, and by his wife's noble defence of Corfe Castle in 1643, and after his death again in 1645.

The former good feeling of the parliament towards the chief justice was totally changed by his steady adherence to his royal master; and their inveteracy against him was excited by his charge to the grand jury at Salisbury in the summer assizes of 1643, denouncing the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, and Salisbury, and several members of the House of Commons, as guilty of high treason in taking up arms against the king. Though the bills were not found, he was ordered to be impeached for his charge, an order which was repeated in the following year on the occasion of his condemning Captain Turpin to be hanged at Exeter. (Whitelocke, 78, 96.) Though by his absence he escaped the consequences of these votes, he paid the price of his loyalty by the forfeiture of all his property. Even his books were seized and given by the parliament to Mr. Maynard.

Sir John did not live to see the destruction of his castle. He died at Oxford on December 28, 1644, and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral. Lord Clarendon describes him as 'a man of great abilities and unblemished integrity,' but at the same time intimates that he wanted courage to meet the exigencies of the time. All agree that he was thoroughly versed in the learning of his profession, and his whole conduct shows that, though cautious and moderate, he was steady in his attachment to the crown. He made a settlement of 30*l.* a year, and other emoluments, on the poor of Keswick, and chiefly to set up a manufacture there of coarse cottons. (Fuller, i. 237.)

His wife, who was Mary, the daughter of Ralph Hawtrej, Esq., of Ruislip, Middlesex, by compounding got rid of the sequestration. By her he had a numerous family, whose descendants represented Corfe Castle as long as that borough returned members to parliament.

BANKES, GEORGE, was the lineal descendant of the great chief justice, whose family introduced into the name the penultimate letter e. He was the third son of Henry Bankes, Esq., of Kingston Hall, Dorsetshire, who represented Corfe Castle from 1780 to 1826, and then was elected member for the county till 1831. His mother was Frances, daughter of William Woodley, Esq., governor of the Leeward Islands. He was a member of Trinity Hall, in the University of Cambridge, and studied the law at first at Lincoln's Inn, and then at the Inner Temple, by which society he was called to the bar in April 1815, but had little opportunity to acquire any eminence in the profession. He succeeded Francis Maseres in the office of cursitor baron in July 1824, and continued to perform the duties of his office (which at last consisted of little more than joining in the Michael-massolemnities of the sheriffalty of London) till his death, in 1856, having held the position of judge advocate general during the short administration of Lord Derby in 1852. No one was appointed to succeed him as cursitor baron, and the office was immediately abolished.

Succeeding eventually by the death of his brother to the family estates, he was chosen member for the county of Dorset, which he represented till his death; and was further honoured by being placed on the privy council. He died on July 6, 1856, leaving issue by his wife Georgina Charlotte, daughter and heir of Admiral Edmund Charles Nugent.

BANKWELL, or BAUKWELL, JOHN DE, whose name is variously spelled Bakwell, Bacwell, Bauquel, Bankwell, or Banquelle, was so called from a place formerly written Bankwell, but now Bankers, at Lee in Kent. Besides this, he had other property in the county, and in 31 Edward I. obtained for himself and his wife Cicily a grant of free warren over all their lands in Lee, Lewisham, Bromley, and Brokisham. (Hasted, i. 460, 493.)

In 1297 he was appointed to perambulate the forests of five counties, and was paid at the rate of six shillings a day; and in the next year he acted as one of the justices itinerant into Kent. (Parl. Writs, i. 396, 397.)

Shortly after the accession of Edward II., on November 10, 1307, he was nominated a baron of the Exchequer, but must have died within a few months, as his wife Cicily was assessed at four marks in the city of London for the quinzime imposed in 1308.

He left two sons, named Thomas and William, and perhaps others, to whom the property descended in gavelkind. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 265.)

BANKWELL, or BAUKWELL, ROGER DE, was most probably of the family, and perhaps a younger son, of the above John. Roger is noticed as an advocate in the early part of the reign of Edward III. In the sixth year he was employed to tallage the counties of Nottingham and Derby (Rot. Parl. ii. 147); and from his being assigned in 14 Edward III. to enquire into a conflagration at Spondon, in the latter county (N. Fœdera, ii. 1133), it would seem probable that he was settled there; the more especially as Sir Godfrey Foljambe, one of his associates in that enquiry, many years afterwards gave a messuage and land to a clergyman named Roger de Bankwell (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 286), who, it may be presumed, was this Roger's son.

He was constituted a judge of the King's Bench before Easter in 1341, and is mentioned in the Year Books as late as 2 Edward III.

BARDELBY, ROBERT DE, is designated in various records, from 30 Edward I. 1302, to 16 Edward II., 1321, as a clerk of the Chancery, and acting under no less than eight chancellors. During that period he was one of those who were entrusted with the keeping of the Great Seal in the chancellor's absence, or in a temporary vacancy of the office. He is often styled chief clerk of the 'gardiens du Seal.' He is afterwards mentioned as a clerk of the Chancery as late as July 5, 1325.

In 9 Edward II. he was selected as assessor of the fifteenth in the city of London; and in the previous year he was appointed keeper of the hospital of St. Thomas the Martyr of Acon in London, until the death of his brother, Richard of Southampton, returned to England; and he held the ecclesiastical rank of canon of Chichester. (Rot. Parl. 287, 357; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 227.)

BARDOLF, HUGH, was a younger son of Baron William Bardolf, of Stoke Bardolf, who was sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk from 16 to 21 Henry II. The inclination of his youth may be collected from the fact that in 22 Henry II. he was amerced for trespassing in the king's forests. In a few years, however, his talents were discovered. In 30 Henry II., 1184, he was dapifer regis in conjunction with Hugh Morewick, and afterwards with Hugh Rufus. It is sometimes considered that he was seneschal or steward, and, indeed, he was occasionally designated by the latter title, and probably his appointment had reference to the Duchy of Normandy only, as he is mentioned in a Norman roll of that year he and Hugh Morewick are allowed 100*l.* for expenses disbursed for the king's expenses in the Gisors. In the same year he received a gift of one hundred marks from the king. (Madox, i. 51, 168.)

From this time till the end of the reign he acted as a justicier, being present at Curia Regis when fines were levied, and assisting as a justice itinerant in assessing the tallage of Wiltshire, and he was sheriff. (Ibid. 634.) He was also the sheriffalty of Cornwall, and was knight of the honor of Gloucester (Madox, i. 63, 67), and was nominated chief lieutenant of the kingdom during his absence in Normandy.

Richard I., after his accession

he forced him as well as others to contribute to the expenses of the crusade under the name of a fine for not joining in it, treated him with equal distinction. He was appointed of the council to assist the two chief justiciaries in the rule of the kingdom and the administration of the laws; and his pleas on the itinera in several counties are recorded on the great rolls of 1 & 2 Richard I. When also the complaints against William de Longchamp became too loud to be disregarded, he was one of the persons whom the king nominated in the bishop's place. Although some historians question the authenticity of the letter containing this order, the insertion of the names in the forged document (if forged it were) shows the high position of the parties, and the estimation in which they were held at the period. There is no doubt that he joined Prince John and the barons in the removal of the unpopular bishop, and that the king (who never withdrew his confidence from the chancellor) punished him on his return by discharging him from the sheriffalty of York and Westmoreland. That he did not, however, remain long in disgrace is proved by his subsequent employments. His name frequently appears as a justicier in the Curia Regis on fines levied from the 5th to the 9th Richard I., and in the last four years of that reign he acted as a justice itinerant in various counties. (Madox's Exch. i. 25, 699, 704, 733.) He was one of those sent to York to determine the controversy between the archbishop and the monks there, and was also entrusted with the sheriffalty of the counties of Northumberland, Dorset and Somerset, Stafford, Wilts, and Leicester. In some of them he continued under King John, with the addition of Derby, Nottingham, Devon, and Cornwall. In the first year of King John's reign he was constituted custos of the castle of Tickhill, and had a grant of the manor of Brumegrave-cum-Norton, for which he procured the privilege of a market, together with a fair for it, and also for Carleton and Grimeston. (Rot. Chart. John, 65, 61, 91.)

In all the three reigns his scutage in the several counties of Warwick, Leicester, Kent, Oxford, Norfolk, and Suffolk, where his property lay, was excused 'pro libertate residentium ad Scaccarium;' and in the reign of John the records show that he continued to act on the circuits as a justice itinerant, and in the Curia Regis as a justicier before whom fines were levied till the fifth year.

About that time he died, as in the next year Amabilis de Limesey, who was his wife, fined in two thousand marks and five pairreys that she should not be compelled to marry again; and that she should be quit of all aids to the sheriff, &c., as long as she should be a widow after the death of John de Braiosa, her late husband. (Rot. de Fin. 82.) This seems to show that soon after the death of Hugh Bardolf she had married a second husband, who had since died; and it appears that in the previous year William de Braiosa had given a fine to have her for the wife of one of his sons. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 415.)

BARKER, EDWARD, was born at Wandsworth in 1678, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, of which he was not admitted a member till 1724; but was one of the benchers of that society when he was appointed cursitor baron of the Exchequer on May 9, 1743. He resigned the place on April 19, 1755, and died in 1759. (Lytsons, i. 507, 570.)

BARKING, RICHARD DE, was raised from the office of prior to that of abbot of Westminster in September 1223. (Monast. ii. 282.) He is first mentioned by Madox (ii. 318) among the barons of the Exchequer in 27 Henry III., 1242; and as he stands immediately after William de Haverhull, the treasurer, he no doubt occupied a high position there. In this, however, his ecclesiastical dignity would necessarily place him; and it by no means follows that he was, as Dugdale and Weever describe him, chief baron, according to the signification by which they evidently interpret the term. There is nothing to show that at that time there was an officer bearing that title; and if it had then existed, the rolls would not have been silent on the subject, nor would Madox have failed to notice it.

In the same year he alone tested the mandates issued to the sheriffs of the different counties, directing them to get in the scutage-money granted for the king's voyage into Gascony. This shows that he stood high in the royal confidence, and was in immediate attendance on the king; and about 1245 he was at the royal intercession excused from his attendance on a general council called by the pope, because he and the Bishop of Carlisle were the king's deputies or regents of England when he went abroad. (Dart's Westm. ii. xx.) He died on November 23, 1246 (Weever, 486), having, during his long presidency, greatly increased the revenues of his house. His character was that of a prudent, learned, and religious man.

BARNEWELL, THOMAS, was appointed second baron of the Exchequer on October 1, 1494, 10 Henry VII., and a successor was put in his place on May 2, 1496. Beyond this fact history is silent.

BARONS, WILLIAM, or, as he is sometimes called, William Barnes (Bishop of London), took the degree of Doctor of Laws at Oxford; but in which of the colleges or halls he studied has not been discovered. He became commissary of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; and having entered into orders, he received in 1500 the livings of East Peckham in Kent, and of Beaconsfield in Buckinghamshire; in 1501, that of Gedney in Lincolnshire; in 1502, that of Bosworth in Leicestershire, and in 1503, that of Tharfield in the archdeaconry of Huntingdon.

He was appointed master of the Rolls on February 1, 1502. In June he was one of the negotiators of the treaty of marriage between Prince Henry and Catherine of Arragon; and on the 24th of the following January he assisted in laying the first stone of Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster Abbey. He succeeded Bishop Warham as Bishop of London on August 2, 1504, but did not obtain the restitution of the temporalities till November 13. On the latter day he resigned his judicial office, and died in less than a year afterwards, on October 9 or 10, 1505. He was buried in St. Paul's. (Godwin, 190; Athen. Ox. ii. 694; Rymer, xiii. 78, 111.)

BAROWE, THOMAS, was appointed master of the Rolls on September 22, 1483, 1 Richard III. He was rector of Olney in Buckinghamshire; and three weeks after the accession of Richard had the grant of a prebend in St. Stephen's Chapel in the palace of Westminster. How he had ingratiated himself with that monarch does not appear; but perhaps by some services he had rendered in the Exchequer, of which he probably was a clerk. He was the first master of the Rolls who had a grant of the tun or two pipes of wine, which has been continued ever since, and nominally exists at present. His patent for it is dated December 6, 1483. (Rot. Pat. 1 Rich. III.) On August 1, 1485, he was appointed keeper of the Great Seal (Rot. Claus. n. 5), and it was in his custody at the time of Richard's death on the field of Bosworth, on the 22nd of that month, when it was of course given up to the conqueror.

His possession of the mastership of the Rolls seems to have been considered an intrusion; for his predecessor, Robert Morton, resumed his place without a new patent. Barowe's punishment for his adherence to the fallen party, however, extended no further; but on the contrary he appears very soon to have conciliated the goodwill of the new king; for on September 21 he obtained not only a general pardon, but a confirmation of his prebend in St. Stephen's Chapel, and his appointment as one of the masters in Chancery. (Rot. Pat. 1 Henry VII. p. i. m. ii.) In the latter character he attended parliament in the accustomed duty of receiving the petitions as late as 12 Henry VII., 1497, after which his name no more occurs.

BARRE, RICHARD, was a diligent and zealous servant of Henry II. After the peace concluded between that monarch and Louis of France in January 1169, he was sent with the Archdeacon of Salisbury to Beneventum to negotiate with Pope Alexander in relation to Archbishop Becket; and while there he succeeded in obtaining from the pontiff a new letter to the Archbishop of York, commanding him to crown Prince Henry at any time the king required him. After the murder of the archbishop, he was again appointed one of the ambassadors to the papal city; and when their passage through the mountain was impeded by the severity of the weather, he was selected to proceed without his companions and urge the king's innocence of the murder. Though on his arrival the pope refused to admit him to his presence, he at last contrived to mollify the indignant feelings of the pontiff, and by his representations, backed by the proofs he produced, his royal master escaped excommunication.

In recompense for these and other faithful services, the king appointed him chancellor to his son Henry when he crowned him; but on that prince rebelling against his father in 1173, Richard Barre proved his loyalty by restoring the Seal to the king. In 1184 he was raised to the dignity of Archdeacon of Ely.

In 7 Richard I., 1195-6, he was one of the justices itinerant holding pleas in Devonshire; and from that year till 1199 inclusive his name appears among the justices taking fines in the Curia Regia at Westminster. (Madox, i. 502.)

BARTON, JOHN DE, is the second of two justices (Ralph Fitzwilliam being first) to whom the commission of oyer and terminer in Yorkshire, and in Spelman (Glossary) is directed. His date is there omitted; but in Hemming (p. 208) it is placed under the year 1300. Among the parliamentary writs (i. e. one dated November 23, 1304, addressed not only to these two, but to two others) so that it is probable there were two commissions, and that the first was before the great extent of the offences was known; especially as in April 1300 more formal appointment of justices for almost every county in England took place. (N. Federa, i. 970.)

In the above commission he is erroneously called 'de Ryton,' as he is afterwards designated 'de Fryton,' not only in the parliamentary writ, but also in several commissions. He was summoned to form military service against the Scots in 24 Edward I., and in the 28th year of that reign was named in the commissions of array in Yorkshire Writs, i. 277, 345, 370; and in 8

he was assigned to collect and levy the scutage of the county of York. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 214.)

BASSET, RALPH, was baron of Welden in Northamptonshire, and had large possessions in several of the midland counties. He was a Norman by birth, but is stated to have been raised from an ignoble family by King Henry at the beginning of his reign.

Spelman places him as chief justiciary in the reign of William II., and states that he succeeded Ranulph Flambard, Bishop of Durham, in that office. But this is contradicted by the fact that the bishop had certainly all the power usually attributed to the chief justiciary at the time of William's death. Dugdale does not introduce him as chief justiciary till the reign of Henry I.; but it may be doubtful whether he was even then distinguished by that precise designation, notwithstanding the assertion of Henry of Huntingdon in his epistle 'De Mundi Contemptu,' as it is unquestionable that the principal power was exercised by Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, for the greater part of the reign, and especially during the king's frequent absences from England. The place he takes as last of fifteen subscribing witnesses to King Henry's charter to Westminster Abbey (Monast. i. 308), granted either in 1121 or 1122, demonstrates that he could not then have held the office.

He, however, certainly filled a very high position in the administration of justice, and seems to have been selected to carry into execution the just and severe laws enacted by Henry for the suppression of the system of rapine and robbery which the last reign had introduced. He is mentioned in 1124 as presiding over a court of the barons held at Huncote in Leicestershire for the trial of offenders, where he caused no less than forty-four men convicted of robbery to be hanged.

By the roll of 31 Henry I. it appears, not that he was chief justiciary, for that title never occurs in it, but that he had been justice of the forests in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Surrey; and that in the itinera which were appointed by King Henry for the purpose of relieving the Curia Regis, and of administering justice to the people almost at their own doors, no less than six counties, and probably more, were placed under his direction. He was manifestly dead before the date of that roll; and the entries in it, in which his name occurs, have reference to debts due to the crown from his pleas in previous years.

The precise date of his death is uncertain: but it took place at Northampton, where, falling sick, he called for a monk's habit of the order of those of Abingdon; and after disposing of his estate and sending no small sum to that abbey, with a grant of four hides of land in Chedelesworth, he died, and was honourably buried in the chapter-house there. He left several sons, some of which were justiciars; and from their issue various baronies sprang, the last of which lately became extinct. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 378; Madox, i. 12, 146, 541, ii. 224; Thoroton's Notts, i. 161; Mag. Rot. 31 Henry I., Hunter's ed., 31, 101, 124, 145.)

BASSET, RICHARD, was one of the sons of the above Ralph Basset, and succeeded him in the barony of Welden in Northamptonshire. From an early period of his life he was attached to the court, and assisted in the administration of justice in the Aula Regis. It is probable that during the life of his father he had advanced to a considerable position; for in the great roll of 31 Henry I. the same number of counties are mentioned as under the judicial superintendence of both; and the father could only have been recently deceased.

He is introduced as chief justiciary to Henry I. in Dugdale's list, on the authority of Henry of Huntingdon and Ordericus Vitalis; but some doubt may be entertained whether he can be correctly so described. If he had held the office in 31 Henry I., the roll of that year would have afforded some evidence of it; but it makes no distinction between him and the other justiciars, whose pleas it records. In the grant, also, of the office of great chamberlain of England to Alberic de Vere, his name stands so low on a list of twelve witnesses as to preclude the possibility of his being invested with the title. That grant is dated 'apud Fernham in Transfretatione Regis.' This must have been on occasion of the king's last visit to his Norman dominions in 1134; as is apparent from the fact that Geoffrey, Bishop of Durham, the chancellor, whose name stands as the second witness, was not elected to that see till 1133. The first witness is Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, which is strong presumptive evidence that he was then first minister or chief justiciary of the kingdom.

The expression of Ordericus Vitalis goes no further than that he had great power in this reign, 'utpote capitalis justitia.' Dugdale's opinion, also, that he held it jointly with Alberic de Vere is probably founded on the fact that they were joint sheriffs of no less than eleven counties. Although the latter author says in his 'Baronage' that he also held the office during the whole of King Stephen's reign, he does not so insert his name in his 'Chronica Series.'

He married Matilda, the daughter and heir of Geoffrey Ridel, the justiciary

(whose land appears to have been in his custody), and increased his already large property by her possessions. Of these he devoted a great portion to pious uses. The priory of Laund in Leicestershire, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was founded by him and his wife, and munificently endowed by them with the town and manor of Lodington, in which it stands; with Friseby also; besides no less than fifteen churches in the neighbourhood, and one in Rutland. He died about 1154. His eldest son, Geoffrey, assumed his mother's name of Ridel. Another son, Ralph, who continued the surname of Basset, was lord of Drayton in Staffordshire; and a third son, William, subsequently mentioned, was lord of Sapcote in Leicestershire. (Angl. Sac. ii. 701; Thoroton's Notts. i. 161; Monast. vi. 189; Mag. Rot. 31 Hen. I.; Madox.)

BASSET, THOMAS, was the son and heir of Gilbert, a grandson, or, as Dugdale believes, a younger son of the above Ralph Basset. His military services in divers wars were rewarded by King Henry II. at an early period of his reign with the lordship of Hedendon in Oxfordshire, together with the hundred of Botendon, and that lying without the north gate of the city of Oxford. He was sheriff of that county in 10 Henry II., and in the 14th year of that reign, 1168, he was one of the justices itinerant for the counties of Essex and Hertford. (Madox. i. 587.)

From the year 1175 his name frequently appears among the barons acting judicially in the Curia Regis; and the superior character of his abilities is evident from his being employed as a justice itinerant for the six following years in no less than fifteen other counties; and in his having been one of those selected by the great council held at Windsor in 1179, when the kingdom was divided into four parts for the better administration of justice.

He married Alice, the daughter of — de Dunstanville, and died before 1183, in which year his elder son, Gilbert, had come into his possessions, and founded the priory of Burcester, or Bicester, in Oxfordshire.

Besides Gilbert he had two other sons, Thomas and Alan, the latter of whom is hereafter mentioned. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 383; Madox. i. 94, &c.; Pipe Rolls, Hen. II.)

BASSET, WILLIAM, lord of Sapcote in Leicestershire, was a younger son of the above Richard Basset and Matilda Ridel, his wife.

From 9 to 16 Henry II., 1163-1170, he executed the office of sheriff of the united counties of Warwick and Leicester, and was afterwards fined by the commissioners appointed in the latter year in the sum of one hundred marks for some transgressions he had committed in performance of his duties. He, however, afterwards held the sheriffalty of Lincolnshire in 24 Henry II., and the six following years.

His pleas as a justice itinerant commence in 14 Henry II., 1168, and extend till 26 Henry II., 1180, during which time he acted in twenty-four different counties. From 1175 he is frequently mentioned as assisting in the judicial business of the Curia Regis, in which he continued to sit till 1184. (Madox. i. 94, 103, 143, &c.)

He died about the latter date, and was succeeded in the barony by his son Simon next mentioned.

BASSET, SIMON, is named among the justices itinerant who fixed the tallage for the counties of Nottingham and Derby in 9 Richard I., 1197-8. (Madox. i. 738) He was the son of the last-named William Basset, lord of Sapcote. His connection with Derbyshire arose from his marriage with Elizabeth, one of the daughters and coheirs of William Avenel, of Haddon the Peak in that county. In 7 John he fined eighty marks to the king to have inheritance, which the king had seized after her husband's death, and that she should not be compelled to marry. (Rot. de 307.)

His male descendants failed in 1371 the death of Ralph, the then baron, leaving two daughters only. (Baronage. i. 38)

BASSET, ALAN, was the third son of the before-named Thomas Basset, of Hedendon. Under Richard I. and John he appears to have been a frequent partaker of the bounty. In the former reign he had a share of the manors of Woking and Mapelewell (Rot. Chart. 37); and in the latter those of Wycumb and Berewick. In these, King John granted him the custody of the lands and heir of Hugo de Lisle, and excused him his scutage in Oxfordshire, and Berkshire. An order of Stephen de Turnham and him, in 1171, to deliver a sum of 2,250 marks for the treasury, shows that he was connected with the Exchequer; and in 15 John he was bearer of 100*l.* from the treasury to the king at Oxford. That he was a personal favourite of the king may be inferred from the fact that he received from him of a dolium of the best wine. (Rot. Claus. 59, 99, 100) He accompanied his sovereign in his expedition to Ireland in 12 John (Rot. de Ir. &c.), attended him at Runnymede at the king's death, and was a faithful adherent to his fortune.

On the accession of Henry II. he was equally favoured and equally employed. In 2 Henry III. he acted as a justice itinerant, a fine being levied by him (Dugdale's Orig. 42); in 4 Henry III. he was sent on a mission to France, and in 5 Henry III. he and Emericus de appointed to meet the King of Jerusalem on his landing in Kent. He was sheriff of Rutland from 2 to 12 Henry III., had the custody of the land and heir of William de Montacute given to him, obtained a grant of a market at Wutton in Wiltshire, and was allowed two bucks out of Windsor Forest. (Rot. Claus. i. 313, 385, 410, 460, 559.)

He died about October 1232, leaving several children by his wife Alice, the daughter and heir of Stephen de Gray. To judge from an entry on the Close Roll (i. 104), she was one of the ladies attached to the person of the queen.

Three of his sons were successively in possession of his honours and estate—viz., Gilbert, whose son died soon after him; Fulk, who was raised to the deanery of York and the bishopric of London; and Philip, who is the subject of the next notice. (Choumcey's Herts. 348; Atkyns's Gloucestersh. 420; Brydges' Collins's Peerage, iii. 2, vii. 335.)

BASSET, PHILIP, was the third son of the above Alan, and eventually succeeded to the barony of Wycombe.

In 1233, the year after his father's death, he joined the insurrection of Richard, Earl of Pembroke, but returned to his allegiance in the following year (Baronage, i. 384), and from that time seems to have been high in his sovereign's favour. In 1242 he was appointed one of the commanders of the knights who were sent to the king in Poitou (Cal. Rot. Pat. 20), and in 1243 he had a grant of the custody of the lands and heir of Matilda de Luci; in 1252, that of the lands and heir of Richard de Ripariis; and in 1257 the manor of Dimmock was granted to him and his wife, Ela, Countess of Warwick. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 407, ii. 148, 248, 249.)

Besides being called upon to attend the king in his wars in France and in Wales, he was in 29 Henry III., one of the ambassadors sent to the Council of Lyons to complain of the papal exactions in England; and in 44 & 45 Henry III. he was constituted governor of the castles of Oxford, Bristol, Corff, and Shireburn, with the sheriffalties of the counties in which they are situate, and of Berkshire. He is called bailiff of the King of the Romans in an entry of 43 Henry III. (Abb. Placit. 146.)

When the king, in July 1261, openly resisted the control under which the barons had placed him since the parliament of Oxford of 1258, he appointed Philip Basset chief justiciary of England. The barons' chief justiciary was his son-in-law, Hugh le Despenser; and they both seem to have acted at the same time till the short accommodation that took place between the contending parties in the following April, when Philip Basset's appointment was fully esta-lished. Between July 15 and October 18, 1262, while the king was absent in France, all the mandates on the fine roll were signed by him, and he presided at a council, when the Earl of Leicester, taking advantage of the king's absence, is said to have produced a brief from the pope confirming the provisions of Oxford, and recalling the king's absolution. (Rapin, iii. 146.) His name appears on the plea roll of the Exchequer as justiciary of England at the end of June 1263. (Madox, i. 100.)

Another temporary reconciliation took place in the following year between the king and the earl, the effect of which was the reinstatement of Hugh le Despenser, whose name appears as justiciary of England to a mandate dated October 1, 1263; while Philip Basset is named without that addition in the reference of the Oxford provisions to the King of France, dated in December following. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 405; Brady, i. App. 233.)

Philip Basset, however, adhered firmly to the king, and in the outbreak of the London citizens, led by Hugh le Despenser, at the beginning of 1264, his house and possessions in London fell a sacrifice to their fury. (Chron. Rishanger, 22.) In the following March he greatly assisted the king in taking Northampton; and at the battle of Lewes, on May 14, valiantly fighting near the royal person, he continued the contest until he fell through loss of blood, when he shared the fate of his sovereign, and was taken prisoner. (Lingard, iii. 138.) He was placed in Dover Castle, under the custody of Simon de Montfort, younger son of the Earl of Leicester; but how long he remained in durance does not appear.

After the triumph of the royalists at the battle of Evesham, on August 4, 1265, there is nothing to show that Philip Basset was replaced in his office of chief justiciary, although there is ample evidence to prove that he continued to enjoy the king's favour and to hold a high place in his counsels. He was one of those who were appointed to carry into execution the Dictum of Kenilworth, in October 1266 (Rapin, iii. 171); and his name appears as one of the king's council in February 1270. (Madox, ii. 170.)

He died about the end of October 1271, 56 Henry III.

He married two wives: the first was Hawise, or Helewise, daughter of John Gray, of Eaton; and the second (who survived him) was Ela, daughter of William Longspee, Earl of Salisbury, and widow of Thomas, Earl of Warwick. By the former he left an only daughter, Alyna, or Aliva, who had first married Hugh le Despenser, the chief justiciary, but was then the wife of Roger Bigot, Earl of Norfolk, the son of Hugh Bigot (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 551), being thus connected with three chief justiciaries, as the daughter of one, the wife of a second, and the daughter-in-law of a third.

BASSET, THOMAS, was probably the grandson of the before-mentioned Thomas Basset, lord of Hedendon, by his second son, Thomas; and the nephew of Alan Basset, above mentioned. Dugdale introduces him as a justice of the King's Bench, on the authority of a charter of 46 Henry II., 1202; but none of the customary proofs appear of his so acting, either by his going any iter, or having any writs of assize directed to him. He died, however, shortly after that date, as his widow Johanna is mentioned on the fine roll of 52 Henry III. (ii. 470.)

BASSET, WILLIAM, was the son of the above Simon Basset, lord of Sapcote, by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of William Avenel, of Haddon in the Peak in Derbyshire. In 10 Henry III. this lady died, and all the land which she held of the honour of Peverel, in the county of Buckingham, was ordered to be put into the possession of her son William, to whom she had given it 'as her heir.' (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 140.) From the terms of this entry, however, it may be inferred that he was not her eldest son. Long previous to this event he was possessed of property in the counties of Leicester, Derby, Lincoln, and Stafford; all which was forfeited for his adherence to the barons in 18 John, and restored in the following year, when he acknowledged his fealty to Henry III. In the tenth year of that reign, 1226, he was appointed one of the justices itinerant for Nottingham and Derby, and for various other counties up to 1232. (Rot. Claus. i., ii.) In July 1240 Robert Basset, his nephew and heir, did homage for his land in Buckinghamshire. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 57.)

BASSET, WILLIAM, was a native of Staffordshire, but of what branch of the family has not been traced. He was an advocate in the reign of Edward II., and in the first ten years of that of Edward III. In the latter of these, 1337, he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas. When the king, in December 1340, dismissed some of his brethren for malpractices, he escaped, and was comprehended in the new patent issued on January 8, 1341. On October 28 he changed his court for that of the King's Bench, where he remained till 24 Edward III., his name occurring up to that date in the 'Year Book' and 'Book of Assizes' of that reign. (Dugdale's Orig. 45; Rot. Parl. ii. 164.)

BASSINGBORNE, HUMPHREY DE. Several fines were acknowledged at St. Edmunds, Cambridge, and Bedford in 8 John, 1206, before Humphrey, Archdeacon of Sarum, and Richard de Seing.

The Archdeacon of Sarum at that time was Humphrey de Bassingborne. (Le Nere, 276.) He suffered with the rest of the clergy on account of the interdict, his rents being seized into the king's hands; but they were restored to him in April 1208. At the end of the reign he again got into disgrace, and was obliged to pay a fine of one hundred marks and a palfrey for his restoration to the king's favour, and he then had a royal letter of protection. (Rot. Claus. i. 113, 251; Rot. de Fin. 582.)

BASTARD, WILLIAM, was the third of five justices itinerant, appointed in 29 Henry II., 1174, by writ of Richard de Luci to set the assize of Hampshire (Mador, 125), but who he was cannot be traced with sufficient certainty.

BATESFORD, JOHN DE, was one of the eight justices appointed by Edward I. in 1203, to take assizes, jurats, and certificates throughout the kingdom in aid of the judges of each bench and the itinerant judges, who were often prevented from attending at the regular times and places. On February 18, 1307, he was the fourth of the justices of Trailbaston then nominated for ten of the midland counties (1. Parl. i. 99, 218); and as in 4 Edward I. 1310, he was sent as a justice of assize in Hampshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, Cornwall, and Devonshire, he may be presumed to have continued to act the interim, the more especially as he was regularly summoned among the judges of parliament from the beginning to the eleventh year of that reign. He died after, his executors being commanded by 13 Edward II., to bring all process before him into the Exchequer. (Writs, ii. 490.)

BATHONIA, HENRY DE, according to Prince (55), was a native of Devon, a younger brother of Walter de Bathon of Bathe House, in North Tawton, near Colebrook, near Crediton. There does not appear any proof, nor indeed much probability, that this statement is well founded. The roll of fines shows that in 20 Henry III., 1236, the king directed the sheriff of Dorsetshire to appraise all the lands which had belonged to Hugh de Bathonia and to deliver them to Henry, taking security that he would answer for them in discharge of the debts due from them to the crown. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i.) In this record, as Hugh is frequently mentioned as 'clericus,' it must be conjectured that he was Henry's uncle, and indeed the designation 'clericus' is attached to his name merely with an allusion instead of an ecclesiastical signification. Hugh de Bathonia was an officer in the king's wardrobe in the reign of John, and was sheriff of Buckinghamshire in 1 Henry III., and of Berkshire in 1 Henry III.; and was afterwards one of the of the Jews. (Rot. Claus. i. 569, ii. 196; Mador. i. 134.) This official position which Hugh held in the court will account for Henry de Bathonia being brought up to the legal profession; and accordingly, so early as 10 Henry III., his name appears as the representative or attorney for Warin le Despenser in a suit against Nicholas de St. Bridget, for a debt of four marks and a half. (Rot. Claus. ii. 156.)

It was not till after Hugh's death that Henry de Bathonia was advanced to the bench. In 1238, 22 Henry III., his name first appears to the acknowledgment of a fine. Two years afterwards he was one of the justiciars on the circuit then sent through the southern counties. In that commission he stood second on the list; and from that time the fine roll teems with payments made for writs of assize to be taken before him. In November 1247 he stands in a higher place, an amerciament being mentioned as being made before him and his companion justices of the bench (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 23; Abb. Placit. 125, 126); and in the circuits of that and the two following years his name is inserted at the head in every county which he is appointed to visit. In 1250 he had a grant of 100*l.* a year for his support 'in officio justiciarum,' an expression which would seem to show that the term 'capitalis,' or chief justice, as subsequently used, was not yet adopted, as it is quite manifest that he then sat as the senior of his fellows.

Not long after this grant he was accused by Philip Darcy of bribery and extortion, whereby he had raised a great estate on the ruin of others. Four-and-twenty knights became security for his appearance to answer the charge before the parliament summoned for February 17, 1251. On the day of hearing he was charged with incensing the barons against the king, and promoting a general rebellion; and among various complaints urged against him was one that he had received a bribe to allow a convicted criminal to escape. The vehemence of the king's anger may be estimated by his brutal exclamation, 'If any man will slay Henry de Bathonia, he shall not be impeached of his death; and I now pronounce his pardon.' This violence, however, was prevented by John Mansel's timely interference, and the threats of the Bishop of London, and the justiciar's other friends, of ecclesiastical and temporal revenge.

The intercession of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, at last procured him a pardon, on a fine of two thousand marks, the whole of which was not paid at the time of his death. His disgrace continued more than two years—viz., from November 1250 till August 1253, after which date applications to him for writs of assize are frequent for the rest of his life.

A grant of land, also, in the latter year, addressed 'Henrico de Bathon. et sociis suis, justiciariis assignatis ad tenendum placita coram rege' (Manning, 298), proves that he had been restored to his former high position. Comparing the title here used with that in the amerciament in 32 Henry III. already referred to, 'coram Henrico de Bathon. et sociis suis, justiciariis de banco,' it would appear, according to the modern interpretation of the terms, that he had changed his court; but this seems to be contradicted by an entry in 20 Edward I., which refers to a proceeding in 41 Henry III., 'coram H. Bathon. et sociis suis, justiciariis regis de banco.' (Abb. Placit. 228.) In the preceding year he and his companions are mentioned without any designation to distinguish the court, the words used being 'et sociis suis, justiciariis regis.' These changes suggest the caution with which such appellations should be used in support of an hypothesis.

So late as 1260 he went the circuit through eight counties.

He died before the 22nd of the following February, as on that day the king, 'intuitu laudabilis obsequii quod Henricus de Bathon. R. impendit in vita sua,' grants to John de Bathon, his son and heir, that the arrears which remained due of the fine of two thousand marks which he made for having the king's favour, and of all other debts which he owed the king at his death, might be paid by instalments of twenty-five marks at each of the yearly Exchequer terms, Michaelmas and Easter. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 345.)

His widow, Aliva, afterwards married Nicholas de Yatingdon, and died in 1273. The above-mentioned John de Bathonia had a son, also named John, whose only child Joan was married to John de Bohun, and died in 1316. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 185.)

BATHURST, HENRY (LORD APSLEY, EARL BATHURST). The Bathursts were originally seated at Bathurst, near Battel, in Sussex, but afterwards removed into Kent. One member received a baronetcy (of Leachdale in Gloucestershire) in 1643, which is now supposed to be extinct; and several others were merchants and aldermen of London. The immediate ancestor of the chancellor resided at Staplehurst in the reign of Henry VIII., and one of his grandsons was the father of the celebrated Dr. Ralph Bathurst, president of Trinity College, Oxford, and dean of Wells. The dean's brother, Sir Benjamin, was the father of Allen, who, after serving in two parliaments for the borough of Cirencester, was one of the twelve peers created by Queen Anne in 1711, for the purpose of obtaining a majority in the House of Lords. To his title, Baron Bathurst of Battlesden in Sussex, he received sixty-one years afterwards the additional rank of an earl, as an acknowledgment and reward for his services to the state, and his eminence in the social and literary world. He died, at the age of ninety-one, in 1775, having lived to see his son elevated to the peerage and to the dignity of lord high chancellor of Great Britain. That son was one of the nine children he had by his wife Catherine, daughter and heir of Sir Peter Apsley, of Apsley in Sussex.

Henry Bathurst, the second but eldest surviving son of the earl, was born on May 20, 1714. He took the degree of B.A. at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1733, and was called to the bar by the Society of Lincoln's Inn in Hilary Term 1736. He had already been returned to parliament in the previous year as member for Cirencester, which he continued to represent till 1754. Though his business in the courts was by no means commanding, he was in 1746 chosen solicitor-general, and shortly after attorney-general, to Frederick, Prince of Wales, after whose death, in 1751, he filled the same office to the princess till his elevation to the bench. He had on entering the prince's service been honoured with a patent of precedency: and in 1752 he was the leading counsel for the crown in the trial at the Oxford Assizes of Elizabeth Blandy for the murder of her father, his speech in which has been praised for its eloquence, but is too exaggerated an appeal to the feelings of the jury to be approved by modern ears. Soon after he was raised to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas, on May 2, 1754, at the age of forty; and in the case of the sham patriot John Wilkes in 1763 he concurred in the constitutional decisions of his chief, Lord Camden. After occupying his seat for sixteen years, on the sudden death of the Hon. Charles Yorke, the Great Seal was, on January 21, 1770, placed in the hands of three commissioners, the second of whom was Mr. Justice Bathurst. They held it for a year, but their rule met with so little approbation that the minister found it necessary to appoint a lord chancellor. Though very limited in his choice, the profession was greatly surprised on finding Judge Bathurst, who was considered 'the most incapable of the three' commissioners, selected to fill that high and responsible post. The Seal was delivered to him on January 23, 1771, and he was on the same day created Lord Apsley. He naturally found himself in a wrong position, and it was said that he never entered his court with a firm and dauntless step. Overawed by Thurlow, Wedderburn, and other counsel practising at his bar, he was so little conversant with either the principles or practice of equity that his decisions have no value in the profession. But, being a staunch supporter of Lord North's measures, he was retained in his place for more than seven years; at the end of which, from a failure in his health, or perhaps a consciousness of his inefficiency, he resigned the Seal. on June 3, 1778, one of his last and most praiseworthy acts being the appointment of his nephew, Francis Buller, to a vacant judgeship. He declined any retiring pension, and was in the following year continued in the cabinet with the office of lord president of the council, which he held till Lord North's ministry terminated, in 1782. In the twelve years he survived he gradually retired from political life, and died from natural decay at his seat, Oakley Grove, near Cirencester, on August 6, 1794, in his eighty-first year.

In his public life he was honourable and sincere; as a judge, he was esteemed by the bar for his kindness of manner; and in private life he was thoroughly amiable. Though of a cheerful and good-humoured disposition, he was not quite so jovial as his father, who took his wine freely to the last day of his long life. On one occasion at a party at Oakley, the chancellor having retired somewhat early from the conviviality, the old earl chuckled and said to the rest of the company, 'Now, my good friends, since the old gentleman is off, think we may venture to crack another bottle.' Neither was he so liberal a patron to literature as his father; but it should be remembered to his credit that he was the first to encourage Sir William Jones by substantial tokens of regard.

In 1775, while he was yet chancellor, he succeeded to his father's earldom. He married twice. By his first wife, Anne, daughter of — James, Esq., and widow of Charles Phillips, Esq., he had no issue; but by his second wife, Tryphena, daughter of Thomas Scawen, Esq., of Maidwell, Northamptonshire, he left six children. His successor held a distinguished place in the government, and the House of Lords still graced by his descendants.

BAUKWELL. See J. and R. DE BAUKWELL.

BAUMBURGH, THOMAS DE, is among clerks or masters in Chancery mentioned from 1 to 14 Edward III., and was named from the place now called Baumborough in Northumberland, where he had property. He seems to have been an especial favourite with the king, who presented him with the church of Easington and made him various beneficial grants of lands in that county. He acted as lord chancellor of the Great Seal on several occasions, 1332, 1334, 1336, and 1339. In the year, 14 Edward III., he was one of the receivers of the petitions to parliament, and probably died soon after, as he subsequently named. (Rot. Parl. ii. 22, 68, 112; Cal. Inq. p.m. ii. 53; Cal. Rot. Pat. 118; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 27, 75, 79.)

BAYEUX, JOHN DE (BAIOCIS), was the son of Hugh de Baiocis, a baron in Lincolnshire, by Alienora his wife. Before his father's decease he was outlawed for the death of a man, and his property in Bristol and in Dorsetshire, being forfeited, was given away in 16 and 17 John. He contrived, nevertheless, to make his peace; for in 3 Henry III. he was admitted to take possession of his paternal estates in Lincolnshire on payment of 100*l.* for his relief; and in the same year he was added to the list of justices itinerant for the counties of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, and Dorset. (Rot. Claus. i. 237, 404; Rot. Chart. 201; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 32.) It would appear, however, that he was not even then entirely cleared of the charge, unless indeed he had subjected himself to a new accusation; for in 4 Henry III. he and his mother Alienora, his brother, and three others, fined for having an inquisition before the chief justiciary, whether the appeal against them by Robert de Tillebroc for the death of his father was malicious, or they were guilty. That the result of the enquiry was favourable may be presumed from his being again selected as a justice itinerant in Devonshire in 1225, and from his holding several responsible appointments about the same time, as justice of the forests, and constable of the castle of Plimpton. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 45; Rot. Claus. i. 622, &c., ii. 76, &c.) In 18 Henry III. another charge of homicide was raised against him; and he paid a fine of no less than four hundred marks for permission to accommodate with the widow of Roger de Mubray for the death of her husband, in which he was some way concerned.

On his death, in 1249, his brother Stephen did homage for his lands as male heir. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 264, ii. 51.)

BAYLEY, JOHN. No judge since the act was passed in 1790 granting a pension on retirement after fifteen years' service has declined to avail himself of the privilege for so long a period as Sir John Bayley. He occupied the bench for no less than twenty-six years, with the highest reputation as a lawyer, and undiminished respect and esteem from every one who acted either with or under him.

He was born on August 3, 1763, at Eton in Huntingdonshire, the residence of his father, John Bayley, Esq. His mother was Sarah, the daughter and heir of the Rev. White Kennett, prebendary of Peterborough, and granddaughter of Bishop Kennett, of that see. He was educated at Eton under the superintendance of his father's elder brother, Dr. Edward Bayley, fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, and rector of Quinton and Courtcenhall; to whose cultivation of his taste and talents for classical composition the judge always ascribed his future success in life. The 'Musæ Etonenses' contain some favourable specimens of his proficiency. Though he was nominated in 1782 for King's College, Cambridge, it does not appear that he was ever matriculated.

He entered Gray's Inn in November 1783, but was not called to the bar till June 22, 1792. In the interim he probably practised as a special pleader, as in 1789 he published the 'Summary of the Law of Bills of Exchange,' &c., which has ever since been the standard work on the subject, and of which many editions have been issued. He also edited Lord Raymond's Reports, with valuable notes, in 1790. The fame he acquired by these publications naturally insured him, when he became a barrister, ample employment, which did not diminish when he was raised to the degree of the coif in 1799. About this time he was elected recorder of Maidstone. After successfully pursuing his profession as a serjeant both on the Home Circuit and in Westminster Hall, he was appointed in May 1808 a judge of the King's Bench, and was knighted.

There his peculiar adaptation for the judicial office was at once seen, and his professional erudition soon placed him in the first rank. Though his quickness of apprehension enabled him to see the true bearings of a case, he was always open to conviction, and most patient in listening to the arguments raised by counsel in opposition to his opinion. No one who has attended the courts can forget the seven little red books which he always carried with him, to which he could instantaneously turn for every reported case. The ease and delight with which he got through his work at Nisi Prius caused M. Cotte, the French advocate, to exclaim, 'Il s'amuse à juger.' In this court he sat for more than twenty-two years, for seventeen of which he held the next place to the chief justice, pronouncing the judgments of the court upon delinquents with characteristic mildness. But at length he found the increasing labour too much for him, but still was willing to undertake a lighter duty. He therefore took advantage of the act authorising the appointment of a fifth judge in each court, and on November 14, 1830, was removed into the Court of Exchequer as the additional baron, taking his place however according to his seniority next to the chief baron.

On the new stage of the Exchequer he played the same prominent part for above three years more, when his advancing age prompted him to retire, before his mental powers decayed. He therefore resigned the position he had so long graced in February 1834, receiving in the next month the well-merited honour of a baronetcy, and an opportunity being given him of still serving the state in the character of a privy counsellor. He survived nearly twelve years, and died on October 10, 1841, at the Vine House, near Sevenoaks.

Few men in his prominent position ever passed through life with such unmingled respect. He had all the requisites of a good judge—clearness of intellect, integrity of purpose, urbanity of manner, strict impartiality, and a total absence of political bias. He was a favourite with all classes—his colleagues on the bench, the advocates over whom he ruled, and the litigants, whether he decided for or against them. Amiable and benevolent in his private life, he was deeply impressed with religious feelings, which were manifested in an edition of the Common Prayer Book published by him in 1810.

By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John Markett, Esq., of Meopham Court in Kent, he left, besides three daughters, three sons, the eldest of whom now enjoys the title; the second is a clergyman; and the third a barrister, who edited one of the editions of his father's work on Bills.

BAYNARD, FULCO, was of the noble family of that name, the ancestor of which, Ralph Baynard, possessed in the Conqueror's time various rich lordships in the counties of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Hertford. By the conspiracy of his grandson, William, the elder son of Geoffrey, against Henry I., the barony was lost; and its castle, called Baynard's Castle, near St. Paul's, in London, was granted to Robert, the son of Richard Fitz-Gilbert, from whom descended the Fitz-Walters. Fulco traced his lineage from a younger brother of Geoffrey. He held eight knights' fees and a half in Norfolk under Robert Fitz-Walter, and obtained a market in 1226 for his manor of Merton. (Rot. Claus. ii. 105.) In November of that year, 11 Henry III., 1226, he and three others were constituted justiciars to try some prisoners charged with murder in the custody of the Bishop of Ely. (Ibid. ii. 159.) In four previous instances he had been one of four appointed to take particular assizes of novel disseisin in the county of Norfolk: a practice then not uncommon, but which would not warrant the insertion of those so employed among the justices itinerant, from whom they were clearly distinct. Fulco's case is varied by his nomination to try the felonies above mentioned. Both in 2 and 11 Henry III. he was one of those selected to assess the tallage in Norfolk. (Ibid. i. 350, ii. 78, &c.)

In 1256 he fined for not being knighted, but was afterwards obliged to take that honour. In the reign of Edward I. he was nominated one of the conservators of the peace for his county, and died at a great age in 1306. By his wife, Alice, the daughter of John le Ditton, he left a son, the next-mentioned Robert. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 557.)

BAYNARD, ROBERT, the son of the above Fulco Baynard, so early as 18 Edward I. was returned as knight of the shire for Norfolk, and represented that county till 20 Edward II. In 5 Edward II the custody of Norfolk was committed to him (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 186), and in the two following years he was among the magnates who were specially summoned to parliament. Several of these were not barons and were never afterwards summoned; and he, in all the subsequent entries, is merely called 'Miles.' He was one of the conservators of the peace for the county, and was employed as a commissioner of array and in assessing the various grants made to the parliament. To him also was entrusted the custody of the bishopric of Durham, 1311, on the death of Anthony Bek.

On the accession of Edward III. he was appointed, according to Dugdale, a judge of the King's Bench; and it is curious to find the writ directing the payment of expenses as knight of the shire, in parliament of the preceding January, dated on March 9, 1327, the same day which he was raised to the judicial bench. He died in 4 Edward III., in possession of Hautboys, Whatacre, and five other manors in Norfolk, leaving a wife named Maud and a son named Fulk, among whose daughters the inheritance was afterwards divided. (Cal. Inq. p. m. ii. 30, 148.)

BEALKNAP, ROBERT DE, had very considerable possessions in the county of Norfolk before he could have acquired them; yet there is no certainty who his parents were, except that their names were John and Alice. Probably his father was a lawyer, as an advocate of that name occurs in the Year Book of 20 Edward III. Robert's career commences in 36 Edward III. in 40 Edward III. he became a king's justice, for which he had a salary of 100 marks a year, with another of the same amount as justice of assize—a duty which he frequently performed till his elevation to the bench at Westminster. (Liber Assise) This event occurred on October 10, 1368, 48 Edward III., when he was appointed chief justice of the court of Common Pleas. Three months before, he had been treated with the pope's nuncios as to the former Wicliff. (N. Furler, iii. 100) He was knighted in 1385.

Retaining his place on the bench in the reign of Richard II., he continued in the performance of his duties in court and in parliament for thirteen years. Only one incident of importance varied the quietness of this period of his life. In May 1381 he was sent into Essex with a commission to bring to trial and punishment the insurgents who had risen against the poll-tax recently imposed. No sooner had the grand jury begun to find the indictments than they were broken in upon by the rioters, their heads chopped off and carried away on poles, and the chief justice was compelled to swear that he would hold no more such sessions. (Turner's Engl. ii. 245.) The circumstance that no personal injury was offered to him proves the respect with which he was regarded, and that the outrages of the people were not directed against lawyers as lawyers.

In October 1386 the parliament insisted on the removal of the king's favourites, impeached and convicted the chancellor, Michael de la Pole, and passed the ordinance by which the executive government of the country was substantially placed in the hands of eleven commissioners, with a complete control over the public revenue. The Archbishop of York afterwards charged Bealknap with having devised it; but this was evidently without foundation.

In the following year that prelate, with the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and Chief Justice Tresilian, having stirred up the king to resist the encroachment on his authority, the judges were summoned to Sirewsbury to support this purpose by declaring the ordinance to be illegal. There a series of questions, with answers, as some allege, ready prepared, were submitted to them for signature. Bealknap refused for some time to sign the document, but the duke and earl threatening his life if he persisted, he at last submitted, exclaiming as he did so, 'Now hers lacketh nothing but a rope, that I may receive a reward worthie for my desert; and I know if I had not done this I might not have escaped your hands; so that for your pleasures and the king's I have doone it, and deserved thereby death at the hands of the lords.' (Holinshed, ii. 72.) The seals of all the judges present were accordingly attached to an act of council, dated at Nottingham, August 25, 1387, 11 Richard II., containing the questions and answers, by which they declared the whole proceedings to be contrary to the king's prerogative, and all the promoters of them to be guilty of high treason, thus in effect condemning the commissioners and all the lords of parliament to the death of traitors.

The lords were not idle in securing themselves from the danger to which they were thus exposed; and adding this charge to many others, they appealed the four favourites, together with Nicholas Brambre, of treason, of which they were all convicted in the next parliament. It is said that on February 3, the day of its meeting, Sir Robert Bealknap and the rest of the subscribing judges were arrested while sitting in court; but this could not be, as Bealknap was removed, and Robert de Charleton appointed his successor, three days before. He was, however, conveyed to close imprisonment in the Tower. At the trial, on March 2, Bealknap pleaded the compulsion under which he signed, and prayed mercy; but the temporal lords, not admitting that excuse, found him and the others guilty, and adjudged them to be drawn and hanged as traitors, their heirs to be disinherited, and their lands and goods to be forfeited to the king. The spiritual peers, who had previously retired from the house, the case being capital, now came forward and interceded for the lives of the unfortunate judges, whose sentence was ultimately commuted to that of banishment for life. The town of Drogheda, with three miles round it, was fixed as the retreat of Bealknap, and an allowance of 40*l.* was granted to him for his support. There he remained till January 1397, when the parliament remitted this part of his punishment, and he was allowed to return to England; and in the following year the whole of the judgment was reversed, and the restoration of such of the forfeited lands as had not been alienated was decreed. (Rot. Parl. iii. 233-244, 346, 358.) But all the acts of this parliament were annulled immediately on the accession of Henry IV., so that the forfeiture remained in full force.

The date of his death is not precisely known. His wife was next of kin and heir of Thomas Philipp de Baldock, and is called sometimes Sybell, and sometimes Juliana. Their son Hamon did not obtain the complete removal of the attainder till 4 Henry VI., when he recovered possession of his estates, which descended eventually to his grandson Sir Edward Bealknap, who was a privy counsellor in the time of Henry VII. and VIII. Dying without issue, the property was divided among his three sisters, one of whom married Sir William Shelley, a judge in the latter reign.

BEAUCHAMP (BELLO-CAMPO), ROBERT DE, was the son of a baron of the same name, of Hache in Somersetshire, on whose death, about 7 John, he was left a minor, under the guardianship of Hubert de Burgh. In 17 John he was sheriff of Oxfordshire, and constable of the castle of Oxford. The manor and park of Woodstock were also committed to his charge, and in reward for his adherence to his sovereign in that time of revolt, he received various grants of land. (Rot. Pat. 62, 178; Rot. Claus. i. 220, 235, 251, 267.)

On July 6, 1234, 18 Henry III., he was constituted one of the king's justices of the Bench, and in 26 Henry III. he paid eighty marks to be exempted from attending the king into Gascony.

He died in 36 Henry III., his son and heir, Robert, being admitted to do homage February 1, 1252, on paying 100*l.* for his relief. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 123.)

After a long succession of honours granted to his descendants, the judge is represented in the House of Lords by the Dukes of Norfolk and Somerset and the Marquis of Hertford.

BEAUCHAMP (BELLO-CAMPO), WALTER DE, the family of Walter de Bello-Campo was settled at Elmley Castle in Worcestershire, of which county his ancestors were hereditary sheriffs. His father, William, died before 13 John, leaving him as yet a minor. Roger de Mortuo Mari, and Isabella his wife, had a grant of his wardship and marriage on a fine of three thousand marks. He had attained his majority in February 1216, 17 John, for he was then entrusted with the sheriffalty of Worcestershire; but a few months afterwards he joined the barons' party for a short time. He soon, however, recovered the king's favour, but, having been excommunicated for his secession, he was obliged to apply to the pope's legate for absolution before his lands were restored to him; and from that time, with a short interval, till his death he retained the sheriffalty.

In 7 Henry III. he obtained the grant of a market for Kibworth in Leicestershire, and was allowed to have the scutage of his knights and tenants. He was twice selected to perform the duties of justice itinerant, in 1226 and in 1227. For some offence, which is not stated, he was disseised of his sheriffalty in 14 Henry III., in which year he was summoned to show cause why he had not accounted for the preceding year; but before the close of that year he was reinstated in his office on a fine of six palfreys. He died in 1236, when William, his son, on April 16, did homage for his father's lands, and paid the usual baronial relief of 100*l.* for the livery of them. The son of this William became Earl of Warwick, and one of his descendants was created Duke of Warwick, a title now extinct, as are several baronies derived from the same source. The only peers who can now claim a descent from this judge are the Earl of Abergavenny and Earl Beauchamp.

BEAUCHAMP (BELLO-CAMPO), WILLIAM DE, would seem to be the lord of the barony of Bedford, for livery of which, on the death of his father Simon, in 9 John, he gave five hundred marks and six palfreys. Although he was with the king's army in the expeditions to Scotland in 13 John, and to Poitou in 16 John, he afterwards deserted the royal cause, and entertained the rebellious barons at the castle of Bedford, which, in the following December, was captured by Faukes de Breauté. He was one of the barons who were excommunicated by name; and even on King John's death he did not return to his allegiance, but was taken in arms by the royal forces at the siege of Lincoln, in May 1217. Before October in that year, however, he made his peace and had restitution of his lands. When the castle of Bedford was destroyed, in 1224, in consequence of the resistance of Faukes de Breauté, William de Beauchamp had the site restored to him with part of the materials to erect a mansion there. In the previous year, 7 Henry III., he was in the expedition to Wales for his support in which he had a grant of the scutage of the tenants of his different possessions, which were situate in eight counties. (Rot. Claus. i. 325, 326, 571, & 654, ii. 23.) He was again engaged in the country in November 1233, and was present when Richard, earl marshal, surprised the king at the castle of Grosunt, when and many of his barons narrowly escaped with their lives.

In the following summer, on July 1234, he was assigned to sit at the Exchequer 'tanquam baro;' and his attestation in that character appears three years after that date. (Madoc, ii. 54, 317.) In Henry III. he was constituted sheriff of the united counties of Bedford and Buckingham, which he held for the next years. (Fuller.)

He lived to a good old age, the fine containing an entry of his lands seized, as usual, into the king's hands on his death, on August 21, 1262. He five years previously settled his estate on his son William, for the king's confirm of which the latter paid a fine of five hundred marks. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 254)

He married three wives—Gunnora, sister of William de Lanvallei, and with her the town of Bromley; Ida, whom he had the manor of New Buckinghamshire; and, thirdly, in the years of his life, Amicia, to whom after his death, the manor of Belch committed in tenancy. (Ibid. ii. :

Both his sons, William and John, without issue, the property was undivided among his daughters. (I Baron. i. 223; R. de Wendover, iii.)

BEAUFORT, HENRY (BISHOP OF CHESTER). When the statute was passed in January 1397, legitimating the children of John of Gaunt by his mistress Katherine Swinford, whom he had married in the preceding year, Henry Beaufort, the son, was probably just of age, and called clericus on the roll, and his brother, Thomas, is styled deacon. (Rot. Parl. iii. 343.) He was educated at Aix-la-Chapelle, and was a member of Queen's College, Oxford; and was little more than a boy he formed an amatory connection with Alicia, daughter of Richard, Earl of Arundel, sister to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and nearly related by marriage to John of Gaunt himself, and had by her an illegitimate daughter named Joan. The amour did not impede his future fortunes, nor prevent his brother, King Henry IV., from placing his own son, afterwards Henry V., under his tuition in the same college. This was about the year 1339, when Beaufort had been appointed chancellor of the university, an office which he held only one year. In the capacity of tutor he no doubt ingratiated himself with his pupil, and certainly was not a very severe preceptor, if we may judge from the money which he advanced to him while Prince of Wales; being no less a sum than 82*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, the whole of which was repaid as soon as Henry came to the throne. (Devon's Issue Roll, 329.)

Bred up as an ecclesiastic, he received in the year of his legitimation the deanery of Wells, together with a prebend in the church of Lincoln, and was elected bishop of the latter see on July 14, 1398. He accompanied King Richard on his fatal expedition to Ireland, during which Henry of Lancaster came back from his exile; and he was one of three bishops who were with the king at Milford on his too long delayed return. His indifference to the event and the politic character which he then bore are shown by his appearing in the first parliament of the usurper, and consenting to the perpetual imprisonment of his late master. (Rot. Parl. iii. 426.) His presence at the earlier councils of Henry IV., and his being entrusted with the education of the young prince, prove that there was no interruption in the intercourse between him and his royal brother. In 1402 he was sent to escort the king's second wife, Joan of Navarre, Duchess of Brittany, to England. This marriage took place on the 7th and her coronation on the 25th of February 1403, within four days of which the young bishop received the Great Seal as chancellor of England. For his accommodation in attending the court the towns of 'Woltonstowe and Old Stratford' were assigned for his livery, and 'pro herbergiagio' of his servants and horses. (Rymer, viii. 324.)

The death of William of Wykeham occurring about this time, the king procured his election to the vacant bishopric of Winchester, the temporalities of which were restored to him on March 14, 1405. (Ibid. 322.) On his translation to this see he vacated the office of chancellor; but during the remainder of the reign he acted as one of the council; and on January 27, 1410, there being then no chancellor, he declared the causes for which the parliament was summoned. (Rot. Parl. iii. 622.)

On the accession of his pupil and nephew Henry V., March 13, 1413, the Great Seal was immediately replaced in his hands. He retained it during the whole of the first four years and part of the fifth year of the reign, opening all the parliaments that were held during that period, and having the satisfaction to announce to that of November 1415 the glorious victory of Agincourt, won little more than a week before. (Ibid. iv. 62.)

Just previous to the king's next expedition into France, for the support of which the bishop had advanced him the sum of 14,000*l.*, secured on certain duties, and for the repayment of which a golden crown was deposited with him as a pledge on July 18, 1417 (Ibid. iv. 111), the Great Seal was resigned by Beaufort on the 23rd of that month, when he obtained a grant of pardon for all crimes and offences. (Rymer, ix. 471.) The apparent cause of this retirement was to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; but the probable one was to proceed to the Council of Constance, then sitting, for the purpose of settling the claims of three contending popes, and of arranging certain reformations in the Church. Though not originally appointed on the part of England to attend this council, he deemed his appearance there necessary in order to terminate a struggle which had already lasted too long. He reached Constance in the garb of a pilgrim, and his presence was deemed by some to be very prejudicial to the cause of the reform of the Church. The question then agitating was, whether that or the election of the pope should take precedence. By his suggestion, and on the promise of the cardinals not to delay the consideration of reform, the election was proceeded with; but on its falling on Martin V. every attempt to renew the question of reform was frustrated, and the council was dissolved without any sound improvement being effected. (Tyler's Henry V. ii. 61.) In November following, the new pope named the bishop cardinal and apostolic legate in England, Ireland, and Wales; but by the remonstrances of Archbishop Chicheley, who considered this an encroachment on his authority, the king forbade him to accept the dignity. From Constance the bishop proceeded on his pilgrimage to Jerusalem, of his adventures in which, or of the precise date of his return, we have no certain information.

We find the bishop again in England in 1421, when he was one of the sponsors for the king's son, afterwards Henry VI.; and again lent his sovereign 14,000*l.* towards the prosecution of the war, for which and for the arrears of the former loan a golden crown was again given in pledge. (Rot. Parl. iv. 132.)

On the death of Henry V. the bishop and his brother Thomas, Duke of Exeter, were appointed governors of the person of the infant king, their great-nephew; while John, Duke of Bedford, the king's uncle, was made protector of England when within the kingdom; but when absent his brother Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, was to execute the same office. The Duke of Bedford being in France at the accession, the immediate government fell on the Duke of Gloucester; but jealousies arose, which soon resulted in a determined hostility between the duke and the bishop, to whom the former attributed the checks which were placed by the council on his exercise of the supreme authority. Historians differ as to which was in fault; but probably both were in some measure to blame in the commencement of their disputes, and certainly in the extent to which they were carried.

The bishop's ascendancy in the council was naturally very great. The records prove that he never failed in his attendance there; and in February 1424 he assisted the government by advancing 4,000*l.*, afterwards increased to 11,302*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, for which he received certain crown jewels in pledge for repayment. On July 6 in the same year he was, by the advice of the council, invested for a third time with the office of chancellor; and his labours being greatly increased by the absence of both the dukes from the kingdom, the council assigned him 2,000 marks per annum beyond his accustomed salary. (Acts Privy Council, iii. 146, 165.) He opened the parliament of April 1425; but before that of the following year the disputes between him and the Duke of Gloucester ran so high as to require the presence of the Duke of Bedford, who came from France to endeavour to effect an accommodation. The immediate necessity for this interference arose from the refusal of the governor of the Tower to admit Gloucester on his return to England into that fortress, in consequence of an order of council to exclude every one more powerful than himself. Gloucester, attributing this order to the bishop, caused the gates of the city to be closed against him, whereupon the retainers of both prepared to attack each other, and were with difficulty prevented by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Coimbra, a cousin of the king's. By their intercession the parties were induced to keep the peace till the Duke of Bedford was referred to.

The protector on his arrival seems to have acted most fairly, although his impressions were evidently in favour of the bishop. He issued instructions from St. Albans to the Archbishop of Canterbury and others to see the Duke of Gloucester, and endeavour to induce him to attend at Northampton, and be reconciled to the bishop previous to the parliament which had been summoned for the 18th of that month. But, the duke being inflexible, it became necessary, in order to prevent collision between the followers of the angry parties, to forbid any arms to be brought to the place of meeting. Evading this mandate, they attended with bats and clubs on their shoulders; from which circumstance the parliament was called the Parliament of Bats. The bishop opened the session as chancellor; and on the Commons praying that the differences might be settled, and the protector and the lords having taken an oath to judge with impartiality, the two contending parties thereupon agreed to submit to the arbitrament of certain lords then named. The rolls of parliament do not contain the charges made by the duke against the bishop as stated by the historians, but only the award made by the lords, by which they unanimously acquitted him; and he, by their award, made a public denial in parliament of their truth, as a public declaration of his having no will to the duke; who in his turn was required by the award to say, 'Fair and since you so declare you such a man as I say, I am right glad that it is so, and such I take you.' The two then, according to the award, took each other by hand. This occurred on March 12, 1425, and on the next day the bishop at his request was exonerated from the office of chancellor. (Rot. Parl. iv. 296-299.) May 14 he prayed for permission to undertake a pilgrimage which he had deferred, and accompanied the Duke of Bedford to Calais. His mortification in some measure diminished by the nouncement of his nomination as cardinal by Pope Martin V., with that of Presbyter of St. Eusebius, Cardinal of England. He returned to England in September 1428, having been previously appointed legate of the pope, and general of the crusaders against the Bohemian Hussites. Here the Duke of Gloucester, who still retained his enmity, an opportunity of annoying him by inducing the council to refuse to allow him to officiate on St. George's Day as chief of the order of the Garter, on the ground that it was unusual for a cardinal to be the bishopric of Winchester. The petition submitted for the time, but had not been enough to obtain permission to raise 10,000 lances and 2,500 archers for that purpose. These forces, however, in less than a night were, by reason of 'the grievous adversities and fortunes' which happened to the king's subjects in France, directed to proceed under the Duke of Bedford for his permitting which the cardinal receive a reward of 1,000 marks.

Privy Council, iii. 330-345; Rymer, x. 414.) The pope's displeasure at this equivocal transaction was well compensated by the popularity it procured for the prelate in England, where he was allowed to resume his seat at the council, notwithstanding his being a cardinal. He accompanied the young king to France, and performed the ceremony of his coronation at Paris on December 17, 1430.

The Duke of Gloucester died on February 28, 1447, previous to which the cardinal had for some years retired from court, and his own dissolution took place on April 11, within six weeks of the duke's. So powerful, however, has been the enchantment of Shakspeare's genius, that his dramatic picture of the cardinal's character is too often accepted as historic truth, without reflecting that the simple object of the bard was to enliven scenes developing political events, and to create a powerful interest in his audience by exhibiting the great actors of the time in strong and exciting contrast. No doubt the cardinal was not exempt from the frailties which were then too common; he was evidently fond of money, ambitious of power, jealous of rivalry, and more attentive to his political than his episcopal duties. But looking at the public evidences that are still extant, not excluding the multiplied charges with which the duke perpetually assailed him, there is little that can affect his character as a man anxious at once to serve his sovereign and to promote his country's welfare. The popular voice had been strongly in his favour; and when it is recollected that during his ministerial career France was both won and lost to England, it is not surprising that the prejudice excited against him towards the close of his life should extinguish the memory of his former praises, and that, being the last popular impression of his character, it should alone survive him, and form a tradition sufficiently recognised to warrant its introduction into a dramatic representation.

Cardinal Beaufort was a bishop for forty-nine years—seven at Lincoln, and the rest at Winchester. No works of his are mentioned in the former diocese; but in the latter he expended vast sums in completing the cathedral, and particularly in his new endowment of the hospital of St. Cross, which owes many of its present buildings to his munificence, and to which he added the means of supporting an increased number of poor brethren. The charity which he dispensed among the poor during his life was continued under his will; and the pious dispositions which he made in his first codicil, dated only four days before his death, are a sufficient contradiction to the allegation that he died in despair. (Godwin de Præsul. 231, 296; Testamenta Vetusta, 249.)

BEAUFORT, THOMAS (DUKE OF EXETER), was the younger brother of Cardinal Henry Beaufort, being the third and youngest son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his mistress Catherine Swinford, whom he afterwards married, and whose children by him were all legitimated by a statute passed in January 1397.

Thomas was then a minor, being called 'domicellus' in the record; but two years afterwards he received a grant from the king of the castle and town of Castle Acre in Norfolk. The first notice of his knightly career is in 1402, when he was custos of Ludlow Castle, and received 88*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, for the wages of himself and his garrison, to resist the invasion of the rebels there. In the following year he was appointed admiral of the fleet towards the north, an office which he held for many years; and in 9 Henry IV. was made captain of Calais. That in these commands he exhibited considerable ability as a statesman may be inferred from his being selected as the successor of Thomas de Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the office of chancellor, being the only lay chancellor of that reign.

Sir Thomas received the Great Seal on January 31, 1410. From an entry in the following year it would seem that the duties were not agreeable to him, as he humbly prayed to be discharged. This, however, was refused by his royal brother (Rot. Claus. 11 & 12 Henry IV.); and he had completed nearly two years of service before he was allowed to retire, on January 5, 1412. During his tenure of office he had a grant of 800 marks per annum, besides the accustomed fee. (Acts of Privy Council, i. 338.) Little other record of his proceedings as chancellor remains than of his opening and adjourning the parliament of November 1411, and as an assistant of the Archbishop of Canterbury in trying John Badby for heresy. (State Trials, i. 219.)

On the 5th of July following his resignation of the Great Seal he was created Earl of Dorset; and during the remainder of his life he devoted himself to pursuits more congenial to his taste than the law, distinguishing himself to the last, in the wars of Henry V., as a brave knight and a wise commander. In the first year of that reign he was made lieutenant of Aquitaine. He next was appointed governor of Harfleur on its surrender to the English; and after the battle of Agincourt, October 25, 1415, in which he commanded the rear of the forces, he was constituted lieutenant of Normandy. On the 18th of November 1416 he was raised, in full parliament, to the title of the Duke of Exeter; and was also made a Knight of the Garter. Scarcely a year of Henry's reign was unmarked by his prowess, either in Scotland or in France. In all of these encounters he was victorious, except in the battle of Anjou, on April 3, 1421, when the Duke of Clarence was killed, and he was unfortunately taken prisoner.

He was an executor of the will of Henry V.; and on the death of that monarch, in 1422, he was one of the counsellors appointed by the parliament to assist the protectors of the kingdom during the minority of his successor.

The four remaining years of his life were employed in this duty, and in acting in the field in the foolish and unjust war which the English carried on against France; adding to his other honours the office of justice of North Wales.

He died at his manor of Greenwich on January 1, 1427; and, as he left no issue by his wife Margaret, the daughter of Sir Thomas Nevill, of Horneby, his titles became extinct. He was interred at the abbey of St. Edmund's Bury, where, 350 years after (see Times, Oct. 19, 1841), his coffin was discovered among the ruins, and his body was found to be 'as perfect and entire as at the time of his death.' (Dugdale's Baron. ii. 125.)

BEAUMONT, ROBERT DE (EARL OF LEICESTER), succeeded, as the elder of two twin sons, his father of the same name, who, as Earl of Mellent in Normandy, was one of the principal ministers of Henry I., and acquired the reputation of being the first statesman in Europe. He was allied to the family of the Conqueror; and, accompanying him as a young man in his expedition to England, he distinguished himself by making the first onset in the battle of Hastings. He reward was the grant of above ninety lordships in the counties of Warwick, Leicester, Wilts, Northampton, and Gloucester. Adhering to King Henry I. in his contests with his brother Robert, he was created Earl of Leicester; and, dying in 1118, Waleran, the younger of the twins, succeeded to the earldom of Mellent, and the lands in Normandy; while those in England, with the earldom of Leicester, devolved on this Robert, who was surnamed Bossu.

Although this earl was also in great favour with Henry I., and was with him at his death in 1135, he supported King Stephen in the early part of his reign, and obtained a grant of the town, castle, and county of Hereford. On the arrival, however, of Henry, Duke of Normandy, he declared for that prince, supplied him with necessaries, and assisted him with powerful military aid. He was a witness to the convention between the prince and King Stephen, which terminated this intestine warfare.

On Stephen's death, the earl was among the principal counsellors of his successor; and being as eminent for the qualifications of his mind and his knowledge of the law, as he had shown himself in state policy and civil affairs, he was immediately raised by Henry to the office of chief justiciary, or president of the Exchequer, which he retained during the remainder of his life. This appointment is said by some to have been held by him in conjunction with Richard de Luci; and there are some writs which seem to show that it was so.

Throughout the king's contest with Becket, he aided his royal master in maintaining the rights of the state against the encroachments of the clergy. His prudence was so great, and his piety so notorious that even the violent archbishop did not venture to include him in the sentence of excommunication which he pronounced against several of the king's counsellors, although he had been one of the principal actors, and had joined in prevailing on Becket to sign the Constitutions of Clarendon.

Before that contest was terminated the murder of Becket, the Earl of Leicester died, in 1167, at the abbey of Leices which he had founded in 1143. He is stated to have been a canon regular of the abbey for fifteen years before his death; but if so, his employments prove that he had a dispensation from the observance of the strict rules of the order. Besides the abbey, he founded three other religious houses, and was also a liberal benefactor many more.

He married Amicia, daughter of Ivo de Waet, Earl of Norfolk, and had by her a son, Robert, surnamed Blanche-Main, whose son and successor, Robert Fitznoll, dying in 1206 without issue, the branch of the family became extinct (Madox. i. 34, ii. 138, 394; Lord Lytton's Henry II.; Dugdale's Baron. i. 84.)

BEAUMONT, JOHN, belonged to an ancient family whose barony dated from the year 1309, but which in 1507 fell into an abeyance which was not terminated until the year 1840, when the father of the present baron (Miles Thomas Stapleton) was summoned to parliament as the representative of the eldest daughter of the lord's sister.

The immediate ancestor of John Beaumont was Sir Thomas, the second of the fourth baron, whose grandson, Thomas, was seated at Thringston, near Colchester, and died in 1530, leaving, by his wife Harcourt, two sons—this John, the first baron, whose representatives still sit at Barrow-on-Trent in the county of Derby.

John Beaumont began his legal career at the Inner Temple, and, gradually the bench of that society, filled the office of reader in autumn 1537, and a second time in Lent 1543, and was elected treasurer in 1547. As his name does not appear in any of the Reports, he probably did not practise in the common law courts, but confined himself to the Chancery and the Star Chamber, and to such duties as devolved upon him as surveyor of Leicestershire for the crown. In 1550 he was chosen recorder of Leicester; and his elevation to the mastership of the Rolls took place on December 13 of the same year.

On February 9, 1552, according to King Edward's journal, he 'was put in prison for forging a false deed from Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, to the Lady Anne Powis, of certain lands and leases;' and it appeared by his subsequent confession that, in a cause before him in Chancery between the succeeding duke, Henry, and the lady, he had bought her title, and had forged the hand of the late duke to support it. In addition to this, he was charged with speculation to a large extent, an offence which was then too prevalent. In his submission, which is dated May 28, he designates this by the softer name of a debt charged upon him in the Court of Wards and Liveries, amounting to 20,871*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, in satisfaction of which he was 'pleased and contented' that the king should have all his manors and lands, and all his goods and chattels, with the issues and profits of the same, provided that all just allowances out of the said debt were made to him. To this submission the surrender of his office was added. The king records his subsequent denial of his guilt, and his ultimate confession of it in the Star Chamber on June 20. Sir Robert Bowes was designated as his successor as early as May 10; and the patent of his appointment on June 18 contains an entry of the disgraceful nature of Beaumont's dismissal. Hayward adds that 'he was a man of a dull and heavy spirit, and therefore the more senselessly devoted in his sensual avarice.' (Burnet, Reform. ii. pt. ii. 68, 80-3; Kennett, ii. [319].)

He was evidently treated with much leniency. The monastery of Grace-Dieu, with a considerable estate in Charnwood Forest in Leicestershire, given to him and his wife and their heirs by Sir Humphrey Foster in 1539, which he had given up at his disgrace, was in the following year granted by the king to Francis, Earl of Huntingdon, and his heirs. As the earl was uncle to John Beaumont's wife, it may be readily supposed that this was a merciful mode of restoring the estate to the family; and consequently, on Beaumont's death five years afterwards, the lady entered on the land, which was confirmed to her by the then Earl Henry (Coke's 9 Rep. 183), and was enjoyed by their son, to whose posterity it descended.

She was Elizabeth, the daughter and heir of Sir William Hastings, the younger son of William, Lord Hastings; and by her he had two sons—one of whom, Francis, is the subject of the next article. (Wotton's Baronet. iii. 235.)

BEAUMONT, FRANCIS, the eldest son of the last-named, John Beaumont, was a fellow-commoner of Peterhouse, Cambridge, in 1564, when Queen Elizabeth visited the University. He represented Aldborough in 1572, and in 1581 he was elected autumn reader in the Inner Temple, and though neither Dugdale nor Wynne include him among the serjeants, yet Nichols, in his 'History of Leicestershire' (iii. 655), quotes a letter from him to the Earl of Shrewsbury, which proves that he took that degree. It is dated at Normanton by Derby, one of his manors, on July 3, 1589, and in it, after apologising 'for omitting to pay 100*l.* on a certain day, he requests the earl's permission to name him as his chief patron in his introductory speech in the court of Common Pleas as a serjeant-at-law, such being the custom on those occasions.' He was evidently, therefore, included in the call of that year.

He was promoted to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas on January 25, 1593; but sat there little more than five years, his death occurring at his paternal seat of Grace-Dieu on April 22, 1608. He was buried in the church of Belton, within which parish his seat is situated. (Ath. Cantab. ii. 246.) Burton, the historian of Leicestershire, who was three-and-twenty when Beaumont died, calls him a 'grave, learned, and reverend judge;' and it may well be believed that his legal attainments alone would not have procured his elevation to the judicial ermine, had not his character for integrity been such as to remove the stigma attached to his father's name. It would be curious to discover the origin of an absurd story told by Nichols from a manuscript note to Burton's work, which states that two men came before the judge at Grace-Dieu for justice, and one of them prayed that the ground might open and he might sink if what he attested was not true; that the ground immediately did open, but the judge, by pointing with his finger, ordered them to go off, and it closed again; and that, according to the affirmation of his great-granddaughter's son, the place sounded in his time, being struck on.

By his wife, Anne, daughter of Sir John Pierrepont, of Holme-Pierrepont in Nottinghamshire, and relict of Thomas Thorold, of Marston in Lincolnshire, he had three sons. His eldest son, Henry, was knighted, and died at an early age, leaving only a daughter. His second son, John, then succeeded to Grace-Dieu (Beaumont's Case, Coke's 9 Rep. 138) and obtained a baronetcy in 1626, which expired in 1686, after having been enjoyed by his two sons in succession. Sir John, however, has a better claim to memory than his title, in being the author of 'Bosworth Field' and other poems, which not only were admired by his contemporaries Jonson and Drayton, but have received high praise in our own time from Campbell and Wordsworth. The judge's third son, Francis, has given an immortality to the name of Beaumont which, it cannot be denied, the highest legal attainments fail to secure. Fletcher, the partner of his labours, was, curiously enough, the son of a bishop; and unbecoming as it might then have been deemed that the representatives of two respected members of the episcopal and judicial bench should devote themselves to the theatre, yet, such is the power of genius over learning, the twin stars of dramatic excellence have so entirely eclipsed the glories of their fathers, that little more is known of the bishop or the judge than that the poets were their sons.

BECKET, THOMAS (ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY), was a native of London, having been born in the parish of St. Mary Colechurch, on the north side of Cheapside, in the year 1118. (Monast. vi. 646.)

His ancestors, according to his own account, were citizens there, somewhat above the lowest rank, 'non omnino infimi;' but the condition of the family had evidently improved in the time of his father, Gilbert, since he had filled the office of sheriff or portgrave of the city. His mother's name was Matilda, and the story of her union with Gilbert, of which neither Becket nor any of his contemporaries state anything extraordinary, was enlivened about two centuries after his death with a romantic addition, which soon after was popularly accepted as an undoubted truth. Gilbert was said to have become a captive in the Holy Land, and to have inspired with love his master's daughter, by whose assistance he escaped; that she followed him to England, and, with no other knowledge of the English vocabulary than the words 'London' and 'Gilbert,' was lucky enough to work her way to the metropolis, and to discover the object of her search; that Gilbert forthwith procured her baptism, at which six bishops assisted, and rewarded her devotedness by making her his wife.

Omitting the omens of future greatness by which Thomas's birth was said to be attended, and the miraculous incidents which were attributed to his youth, it will be enough to relate the simple course of his early years.

Intended for the Church, he was placed at the age of ten under Robert, the prior of Merton, and afterwards studied at the schools in London. He next proceeded to Paris to finish his education, and on his return is said to have been employed as a clerk to the sheriffs of London, an occupation not unlikely for him to obtain, considering that his father had held that dignity, and was now reduced in his circumstances.

The superiority of his parts and the captivating grace of his manners had already procured him the friendship of those who frequented his father's house. From one of them, a rich baron, he obtained little more than a zest for the amusements to which he was introduced; but to two Norman ecclesiastics he was indebted for most solid advantages, and in fact for the means by which he ultimately raised himself to his highest position. They procured his admittance about 1145 into the family of Archbishop Theobald, who, soon discerning his abilities, took him into his favour, and obtained for him canonries in St. Paul's and Lincoln, besides presenting him with the livings of St. Mary-le-Strand (as some say St. Mary-at-Hill) in London, and of Otford in Kent. By the primate's kindness, also, Becket was sent to the schools of Bologna and Auxerre, to study the canon and civil law; and, returning to England no mean proficient in them, was employed by his patron in several embassies to the court of Rome. Among these was one to obtain the restoration of the legatine power to the see of Canterbury, and another to procure a bull prohibiting the coronation of Eustace, the son of King Stephen. The abilities which evinced in these negotiations, and his success in both of them, not only confirmed the archbishop's goodwill towards him, but formed the groundwork of the favour with which Henry, when he ascended the throne, immediately distinguished him.

In the meantime, however, he was rewarded with the archdeaconry of Canterbury, about 1153. Whether this dignity was followed or preceded by the provostship of Beverley is uncertain, but the date, 1139, as it stands in the lists, is obviously erroneous.

The death of Stephen, on October 25, 1154, enabled King Henry to show the appreciation of Becket's talents; and seems very little doubt that immediately on his coronation he appointed him chancellor, although Thynne, Peter Oldmixon, and even Dugdale affix the date to his nomination; inasmuch as a charter has been found, granted in the year of Henry's reign, among the writings to which is 'Thomas the Chancellor' (Archæol. Journal, xii. 235.)

Credit is taken on behalf of that for naming an Englishman to the office, and thus breaking through the practice, which had obtained from the time of the Conquest, of conferring all places of trust and confidence on Normans. It is, however, impossible not to see that the amalgamation of the two races, which one hundred years had produced, must have necessarily tended to destroy the exclusive system, and that the reason upon which it was founded no longer existed. Although the monarch might naturally regard his native land with affection, he would consider England as his dearest inheritance; and the disputed successions of William Rufus, Henry I., and Stephen must have shown how little ground there was for fearing opposition from an Anglo-Saxon claimant. Becket was undoubtedly an Englishman in reference to his own birth, and probably to that of his father also; but whether he was of Norman or Saxon descent is an undecided question. Though he speaks of his progenitors as citizens of London, it does not follow necessarily that they must therefore have been Saxons; and Fitz-Stephen, his chaplain and biographer, states that a Norman origin was the bond of connection between Gilbert and Archbishop Theobald. But even were he unquestionably a Saxon by lineage as well as by birth, the mere desire to flatter that race by his appointment had probably little operation on the mind of Henry, who was much more likely to be influenced in his selection by the recommendation of Theobald, by his own observation of Becket's character, and by his conviction that his acknowledged abilities and popular manners best qualified him to meet the exigencies of the time.

During the eight years of Becket's chancellorship, Robert de Beaumont, Earl of Leicester, and Richard de Luci were chief justiciaries; and to the united efforts of these three, aided and encouraged by the wisdom of the king, is to be attributed that amelioration in the state of the country which became visible before many years of the reign had elapsed, in the removal of private oppression, the suppression of robbers, the restoration of property wrongfully withheld, the improvement of agriculture, and the encouragement of all peaceful arts.

His more laborious occupations were relieved by those diversions in which the court indulged, his apparent devotion to which could not but be gratifying to a youthful and joyous king, and is said by some to have been assumed for the purpose of riveting the influence he possessed over the royal mind. Nor are less innocent amusements omitted to be charged against him, which, on the other side, are met by an indignant denial. His intimate footing with Henry, however it may have been gained, is undoubted. The free and happy intercourse between them, which bore the appearance of fraternal concord, is enlarged upon by Fitz-Stephen, who relates their playful contest when the king transferred Becket's rich cloak to the shoulders of a beggar; and dwells upon the familiarity with which the king would appear without ceremony at his table, and either take a cup of wine in passing, or seat himself uninvited as a guest.

Henry in these visits could not be ignorant of the extent of Becket's liberality, nor of his general magnificence and profusion. He must have seen the extravagance in which he lived, the number of his attendants and the gorgeousness of their appointments, the splendour of his furniture and the richness of his apparel, the hospitality of his table and the luxurious delicacy of his wines and his viands. He must have been aware that the expenses of such an establishment could not be defrayed solely from the profits of the Chancery and the produce of his ecclesiastical and other preferments; and yet the knowledge produced no dissatisfaction, nor any alteration in Henry's behaviour. On the contrary, he loaded Becket with new benefits, granting him the prebend of Hastings and the wardenship of the castles of Eye and Berkhamstead, to the former of which one hundred and forty knights were attached. The custody also of various vacant bishoprics and abbeys was entrusted to him, from the proceeds of which much of his lavish expenditure was no doubt supplied.

The external dignity of the office of chancellor must have been considerably enhanced by the publicity of Henry's favour, and by the profuseness of the favourite. They formed in fact the first step towards that advanced position which the possessor of the Great Seal eventually obtained in the councils of the kingdom. It would almost seem that it was with some view of promoting such an advance that, in the embassy Becket undertook to the court of France in 1158, to ask the Princess Margaret in marriage for Henry's eldest son, he redoubled his habitual magnificence, and exhibited so pompous a cavalcade, the details of which are minutely described by Fitz-Stephen, that the inhabitants of the French towns through which he passed, on hearing that it accompanied the Chancellor of England, loudly speculated on the power of the master whose officers made such a display. At Paris he pursued the same course. He prevented Louis from paying him the customary compliment of providing for the ambassador's expenses, by contriving to anticipate the supply; he distributed his gold and silver, his jewels and plate, and even his rich apparel, in gifts around him; and the sumptuousness of his table surprised even the Parisians, by whom a dish of eels which cost a hundred shillings was not soon forgotten. But he attained his object, and brought back a favourable answer.

In the following year he appeared in a new character. The war of Toulouse broke out, occasioned by Henry's claim to that duchy in right of his wife Eleanor, whose former husband, Louis, King of France, insisted on his side of his power to dispose of it. It was on this occasion that, under the advice of Becket, a payment for every knight's fee, under the name of scutage, was first substituted for personal military service; and a new element was thus introduced into national warfare by the employment of mercenaries. Becket at his own expense led to the field no less than seven hundred knights, and a numerous and splendid retinue, heading them on every enterprise, and performing many acts of personal bravery. A French knight named Engelram de Trie was unhorsed by him in single combat, and left his steed as a trophy to the victor. After the retreat of King Henry, Becket remained behind, and with the aid of Henry de Essex took Cahors and other towns, and supported the king's name by his valour and conduct.

These acts, though somewhat inconsistent with his clerical character, and productive therefore of some remarks among his contemporaries, do not appear to have detracted from the general estimation in which he was held, nor to have raised any doubt as to his being elevated eventually to the highest ecclesiastical dignity. On the death of Archbishop Theobald, in April 1161, the king resolved to advance his favourite to the primacy; but the election did not take place till May in the following year. The delay is attributed by some to Becket's own repugnance to accept the appointment, and the conviction he felt that it would place the king and himself in collision. By others it is ascribed to the remonstrances of the English bishops and the Canterbury monks, together with the warnings of Matilda, the queen-mother, against the nomination of a man of so active and resolute a disposition. Nevertheless, the king, who considered that his own views would be forwarded by this promotion, persisted in his purpose; and Becket was consecrated on June 3, 1162, having been ordained priest on the day before.

Henry soon discovered his mistake. He at once lost a companion, a friend, and a counsellor; and obtained in their stead an opponent to his claims, a rival to his greatness, and a disturber of his peace. To which of the two the blame is to be principally attached will be decided according to the views of their several partisans, and as they may consider the claims of the state or of the Church should have the ascendancy.

Whether the sudden change which Becket made in his mode of life on his attaining the archbishopric, from a free enjoyment of the luxuries of the world to a course bordering on asceticism, extending to the wearing of horsehair and the infliction of flagellation, which even his contemporaries attribute to him, is or is not to be entirely credited, there is no doubt that a considerable alteration in his conduct was soon apparent. The sacred nature of his office would demand an abstinence from all that would savour of irregularity, and a stricter attention to his external demeanour; and of these the king was not likely to complain. But it must be allowed that he had reason to consider himself deceived when, almost without notice, and certainly contrary to his expectation, Becket shortly afterwards set in his resignation of the chancellorship, to the pretence of his incompetence to perform the duties of the two offices. As this doubt of his own powers could not have been the result of experience, inasmuch as sufficient time had not elapsed to try them, and the two offices could not be considered compatible, several bishops having already held the Great Seal, Henry might be justly indignant that Becket, far-sighted as he was, should not have anticipated the difficulty, and prepared him for such a determination. He could not, therefore, avoid expecting that it was a foregone conclusion, and that some other cause had produced the stricter course of life which he had already adopted, and the resumption of some of the Church's ancient rights which he had then beginning to attempt, in conjunction with his resignation of the Great Seal, had led the king to fear that, instead of an able assistant in his plans of government, which he had expected, the archbishop was about to become a declared antagonist. All those improvements connected with the clerical order which he contemplated.

The precise time of his retirement from the office of chancellor has not been mentioned; nor do any of the numerous chronicles that bear his name in that character afford any evidence by which the date may be ascertained. To none of these is he attached as bearing the two offices of bishop and chancellor; and it is generally believed that he resigned the latter the close of the year 1162. The time of his successor has not been discovered; there is an hiatus of about eleven years in the list of chancellors, which has been filled up.

The history of his after-years presents many problems difficult to solve, and both parties agree upon the fact that many discrepancies where they differ in the pursuit of the enquiry is a labour to one indifferent to the result of either of the combatants, say such pretensions can never again come into controversy, and feeling that, with whatever justice each side was originally supported, the contest eventually became, as most contests do, an alternate exhibition of pride, temper, suspicion, and folly on both parts.

That Becket in the first instance claimed privileges for the Church to which no good government could submit few will attempt to deny; but it must also be admitted that Henry was aiming at a royal independence of papal authority, for which the time was not yet ripe. The first opposition of Becket no doubt led to an increased demand by the king, unaccustomed to be thwarted in his views; and thus those ultimate proceedings were caused which, by the violence of both parties, introduced the French king for his own political objects into the contest, and terminated in the catastrophe which not only obliged Henry to desist from his efforts, but made the crown for a time more than ever the slave of the papal power. Without entering into all the details of the conflict, it will be enough to notice the principal incidents in the order of their occurrence.

On Becket's resigning the chancellorship, the king required him to give up the archdeaconry of Canterbury, which he wished to retain; but at the same time he continued to entrust him with the education of Prince Henry, his eldest son, who for several years had been under his care; and the prince remained with him till the following May, when Becket proceeded to the Council of Tours.

The archbishop having resolved to resume all the possessions which had ever belonged to his see, claimed among others the custody of the castle of Rochester, because it had been bestowed on his predecessor; and required the Earl of Clare to do him homage for the castle of Tunbridge, though it had been held by that family of the crown for nearly a hundred years. He went further: on the pretence that he had a right to bestow all churches situated on the manors of his tenants, he presented one of his clerks, named Lawrence, to the church of Eynesford. William, the lord of that manor, however, who was also a tenant of the king, and possessed the advowson, immediately turned out the intruder, whereupon the archbishop incontinently excommunicated him; and it was not without some hard words between the prelate and the king that the sentence was taken off.

This kind of procedure, violent and intemperate as it was, would of course be displeasing to the king, and prompt him to dwell upon and endeavour to restrain other encroachments of the clergy. That he claimed the privilege of having every case in which any member of it was engaged tried before its own tribunals, however gross in its character or however obnoxious to the peace of the community. The sentence in the ecclesiastical courts was that of deprivation and loss of orders; was that of deprivation and loss of orders; operating, of course, as a very slight restraint. The consequence was, that murders and other atrocities by claimants of clerical exemption were sadly numerous. As a remedy for the evil, the king proposed that clerks should for such offences be subject to the same jurisdiction as lay offenders; and that, on conviction, they should be degraded by the Church before the secular sentence was executed. This the archbishop resisted as an innovation, contending for these immunities as an inherent right of the Church; but, a horrible case of the kind just then occurring, Henry determined to bring to issue a question in which all who were interested in preserving the public peace joined in wishing him success. Had he confined his endeavours to that object, he must have overcome all opposition.

At a meeting of the prelates at Westminster in October 1163 he stated his views; and on the bishops, at the instigation of Becket, hesitating to concur, the king asked them whether they would obey the customs of his ancestors. All of them, save one, Hilary, Bishop of Chichester, in answer that they were willing to do so, added the words 'saving their order.' On hearing this reservation, the king angrily broke up the council, and deprived the archbishop of the custody of the castles of Eye and Berkhamstead.

After some little time the bishops withdrew their opposition, and even Becket consented to retract the objectionable salvo. A council was accordingly held at Clarendon in January 1164 in order to record their assent. There the king required that the ancient customs of the kingdom should be reduced to writing; and they were forthwith drawn up in the form now known as the Constitutions of Clarendon. They not only made clerks accused of crimes amenable to the king's courts, and referred all questions of presentation to benefices to be decided there, but prohibited all ecclesiastics from leaving the kingdom without the king's licence, and forbade communication to be pronounced against his tenants in chief, and the members of his household. They brought also the patronage of the sees and abbeyes more under the royal control, and gave the king power to compel the archbishop to do justice to the suitors in his court.

The barons gladly adopted them, and the bishops acquiesced. Becket alone resisted for some time; but eventually, on the pressing remonstrance of his brethren and others, went at their head to the king, and promised to keep the laws 'legitime et bonâ fide.' In doing this he can scarcely be excused from the charge of deliberate perjury, committed, as he himself previously said, 'to be repented hereafter as I may.' His successful solicitation for the pontiff's absolution from his oath would receive its natural interpretation from the king, and would at once show the insincerity with which he joined in the application for the pope's confirmance of the constitutions.

It is not to be wondered at that Henry should feel indignant at conduct which Becket's warmest admirers do not pretend to justify, or that the archbishop's request for an interview with the king at Woodstock should be refused. The royal displeasure was greatly increased by two attempts then made by Becket to proceed to Rome in defiance of the constitutions. On both occasions he was baffled by contrary winds; and in a subsequent conference with the king he was asked whether one kingdom had not room for both, and was advised to return to the duties of his province.

His friendly biographer, Herbert of Bosham, shows that his subsequent proceedings were far from temperate, and not conducted in a manner to soften the anger of the king. In a short time they came again into conflict. John the marshal, an officer of the Exchequer, having a suit in the archbishop's court relative to the manor of Pagham in Sussex, obtained a writ to remove it, requiring Becket to answer him in the king's court. Instead of appearing personally according to the law, he sent four knights with excuses, which the king deemed frivolous and insufficient. Another day was appointed, namely the 6th of October (1164), when a great council of the bishops and barons had been summoned to meet at Northampton. He was there charged with treason for his omission, and was condemned to be 'at the king's mercy,' or, in other words, to a forfeiture of all his effects, which was commuted for a fine of 500*l*.

Henry was not satisfied with this, but somewhat unfairly caused him to be arraigned on other charges, of which, as far as it appears, he had received no previous notice. He was called upon to refund 500*l*. which he had received as constable of the castles of Eye and Berkhamstead. He submitted, though he alleged that he had spent more in their repair, and gave security for the amount. It is curious that one of his bondsmen for this money was William de Eynesford (Brady, i. 385), the subject of his former excommunication. The next charge was for 500*l*. alleged to have been lent to him by the king during the war of Toulouse. For the payment of this also, though he declared it was a free gift, he was obliged to bind himself. And lastly, a demand was made upon him to account for the moneys he had received from the vacant sees and abbey while under his charge, the amount of which is variously stated as 230,000, 30,000, and 44,000 marks. To answer a charge of such magnitude, he demanded, and obtained, a day for deliberation, during which his anxiety produced an illness which delayed the meeting till the following Tuesday. He then proceeded to the council, bearing his cross in his own hands; an unusual proceeding, caused by foolish reports that violence was intended him. The king, however, came not into the hall, but sent to him to know his answer. He declared that he had expended all he had received in the king's service; and that, on being raised to the primacy, he had been expressly discharged from all secular liabilities in the name of the king, by Prince Henry, and Richard of Luci, the chief justiciary. He refused therefore, to account, and appealed to the pope. The bishops endeavoured to dissuade him, but he prohibited them from interfering in the cause. Others attempted to intimidate him, but without effect; when the Earl of Leicester, at the head of the barons, came to pronounce judgment against him, Becket interrupted the earl, and, refusing to hear him, referred the case to the pope, and slowly retired from the hall.

Stigmatised by several of the court as a perjurer and a traitor, he showed his replies that he was by no means deficient in the grosser language of vituperation. Whether he really believed that the king would resort to personal violence he doubted, but upon this pretence he contrived to escape in the middle of the night from St. Andrew's Monastery, where he lodged, and by a circuitous route to Sandwich about a fortnight after, where he embarked in a small boat, and safely landed near Gravelines.

Both Pope Alexander and King of France attached themselves to Becket's interests—the one warmly, from personal rivalry; the other with more caution. Henry should unite himself to the cause of the anti-pope. From both of them he had a most honourable reception—Soissons from Louis, who furnished him with a train of 300 knights to protect him on the pope at Sens. There he is reported to have resigned the archbishopric into the hands of the pontiff, and he had been immediately reinstated. Alexander committed him to the care of the abbot of Pontigny, a Cistercian monastery twelve leagues from Sens.

King Henry, on Becket's flight, sent ambassadors to Louis to demand archbishop should be given up, and to Pope Alexander to pray for his deprivation. No sooner had he heard a report of the failure of both missions, than he ordered all the archbishop's property and revenues to be seized, banished all his kindred and attendants, and deprived the clerks attached to him of the income of their preferments. These orders were rigorously executed, chiefly by Ranulph de Broc, an old enemy of Becket; and the unfortunate relations, without regard to age or sex, were transported beyond sea in the depth of winter, but were hospitably received and provided for in Flanders and France.

Becket remained at Pontigny nearly two years, habited as a Cistercian monk, but served as became his dignity. In this asylum he pursued a course of study ill-suited for one of his temperament and austere habit of life. Although his friend, John of Salisbury, remonstrated with him, and, pointing out his inflammatory tendency, recommended the perusal of the Psalms and St. Gregory's Books of Morals, wisely asking him, 'Who ever rises pricked in heart from reading laws or even canons?' the prelate still persisted; and the fruits were soon apparent.

The correspondence during this period was most voluminous. According to the opinion of one who has read much of it, it does not 'give a favourable idea of the time. There is abundance of violence, fraud, and insincerity; mean selfishness and artifice trying to veil themselves under fine professions and language; cant, too evidently known by those who used it to be nothing better than cant; strange tossing to and fro of Scripture perverted by allegory and misapplication; on the part of the pope there is temporising and much that must be called duplicity; the cardinals and other high dignitaries appear corrupt and crafty; Becket is arrogant, intemperate, and quarrelsome; Henry at once violent and slippery; Louis weakly hypocritical; and Foliot smooth, politic, and tricky.' (Robertson's Becket, 172.)

A negotiation opened between the king and archbishop had failed. It began in smoothness, proceeded in heat, and ended in threats and fury. Becket had been restrained by the pope from taking any steps against the king until after Easter 1166; and Henry, when that time arrived, thought it best to anticipate the sentence of excommunication which he expected Becket would pronounce by appealing to the pope. Envoys were sent to Pontigny to serve the notice of appeal, but were obliged to content themselves with reading it aloud, as Becket had gone on a pilgrimage to Soissons. There he remained a few days, and then proceeded to Vezelay, where, on the Sunday after Ascension-day, after preaching at high mass, he, in the presence of a vast concourse of people, without any previous communication to his clerks of his intention, pronounced sentence of excommunication against John of Oxford, Richard de Luci, and others; anathematised six of the Constitutions of Clarendon, and all who should act upon them; suspended the Bishop of Salisbury; and summoned King Henry to repent on pain of being anathematised if he should persist in his courses. The English bishops appealed to the pope, fixing the following Ascension-day as the term for hearing.

It was not to be supposed that Henry would permit such a provocation to pass unnoticed; and accordingly, in the following September, he caused an intimation to be given at a general chapter of Cistercians that if the archbishop were admitted into any of their monasteries, he would confiscate all the English possessions of their order. The consequence, of course, was his retirement from Pontigny; and the French king having desired him to choose a residence in his dominions, he selected a monastery near Sens.

The pope had by this time removed to Rome, whither Henry despatched a mission. At the head of it was John of Oxford, who contrived not only to procure a reversal of his excommunication, and a confirmation of his appointment to the deanery of Salisbury, but also to obtain the nomination of two cardinal legates, William of Pavia, and Otho, during the continuance of whose commission Becket's power was entirely inoperative; and the pope prohibited everybody but himself from excommunicating the king. Becket's indignation appears in violent and most offensive letters, in which the pope himself is not exempted from his vehemence. The cardinals made some efforts to procure a reconciliation, but through the obstinacy of both parties failed, and returned to Rome.

These proceedings occupied nearly a year, during which the term assigned for the appeal of the English bishops had expired. Becket refused a second appeal they wished to enter, and towards the close of 1167 extended his excommunications to the Bishop of London, Geoffrey Ridel, his own archdeacon (whom, as an instance of his choice of expressions, he called, in one of his letters, 'Archidiabolus noster'), and a long list of others, among whom were so many about the court of King Henry that 'there was hardly one that could offer him the kiss of peace at mass, but such as were excommunicated either by name or implicitly.'

The Roman pontiff was puzzled what to do between Henry's remonstrances and Becket's representations, supported as the latter were by the French king. Irresolute to act firmly on either side, he took a middle course. He endeavoured to effect a reconciliation; and, despatching envoys for the purpose, he suspended the sentence Becket had pronounced till the following Lent; that is, Lent in 1169, for great part of the preceding year had been then exhausted in the diplomatic negotiations.

The world had now begun to be tired of the quarrel. To the pope, Becket's pertinacity could be productive of nothing but annoyance; Henry, feeling that his kingdom and his clergy were kept in a state of continual anxiety, was sincerely desirous of some accommodation; Louis was not unwilling to get rid of a troublesome guest; and Becket's own friends and dependents were sighing after a restoration to their former ease. Becket alone refused to make any concession. At an interview between Henry and Louis at Montmirail, in January 1169, Becket was admitted, when, after lamenting the differences which had arisen, and throwing himself upon the king's mercy, the inflexible archbishop qualified his submission by the words 'salvo honore Dei.' Henry was indignant, justly considering that the reservation was intended to, or at least would, warrant any future resistance; but, after reproaching him with his pride and ingratitude, declared that he would be satisfied if Becket would act towards him with the same submission which the greatest of former primates had shown to the least powerful of his predecessors. Becket, however, evaded the proposal. Even the King of France was disgusted, and the meeting terminated without further colloquy.

Becket accordingly prepared to retire from the French territory, when Louis, from a new quarrel with Henry, again changed his policy. On the termination of Lent, therefore, Becket resumed hostilities by renewing at Clairvaux the excommunications, and including among the denounced the Bishop of Salisbury and others. Notwithstanding the efforts made to prevent the admission into England of any letters from Becket, he contrived that the sentence against Foliot, Bishop of London, should be delivered at the altar of St. Paul's on the next Ascension-day.

The pope was annoyed, and directed that further proceedings should be stayed till he had tried the effect of another mission. This led to a second interview between Becket and the two kings, which took place at Montmartre, near Paris, on November 18, 1169, and had nearly led to a friendly result, when Becket demanded the kiss of peace, which Henry, in consequence of a foolish oath he had taken, having refused, the treaty was again broken off. Becket now threatened to place the kingdom under an interdict, and even to excommunicate the king; and the pope renewed his efforts to produce a reconciliation. Rotrou, Archbishop of Rouen, one of the new papal commissioners, absolved the Bishop of London; and Becket's letter of complaint shows that he was as little inclined to pay respect to the pope as to the king, when his own cause was not supported. He says, 'In the court of Rome the Lord's side is always sacrificed; Barabbas escapes, and Christ is put to death.'

Becket soon found a new grievance in the Archbishop of York having officiated at the coronation of the king's eldest son Henry, which was solemnised at Westminster on Sunday, June 14, 1170, that privilege rightfully belonging to him. This, however, did not prevent a meeting taking place near Freteval, on the 22nd of the following July, between him and Henry, when a formal reconciliation was concluded, the king promising to give him the kiss of peace in his own dominions, a full restoration of Becket's possessions, and those of his adherents, the advance of a sum of money to pay his debts, and amends for the injury he had sustained in the late coronation, were among the articles agreed on; and the archbishop was to return to the exercise of his functions, and to show all due obedience to his earthly sovereign.

The performance both of the king's promises and Becket's return was delayed, but, after two more interviews at Tournefort, the last of which was a friendly one, Becket resolved to set out, although Louis advised him first to insist on receiving the kiss of peace. Disappointed of meeting Henry at Rouen, as promised, and of receiving a supply for his expenses, he was obliged to submit to the escort of his warmest adversary, John of Oxford, to borrow 300*l.* from the Archbishop of Rouen.

In the meantime he had received from Rome letters suspending the Archbishop of York and other prelates for assisting in the coronation, and renewing the excommunication which had been pronounced against the Bishops of London and Salisbury. Receiving these after the reconciliation, he might have suppressed them, and little doubt can exist that had he acted with sincerity and good faith, he would have taken measures for their removal. On the contrary, however, he forced them to England before he embarked, exhibiting the intolerance of his spirit, and exciting the greatest exasperation. He sailed from Witsand, near Calais, on December 1, 1170, at Sandwich, where John of Oxford protected him, and the threatened interruption of the peace of Kent and others.

His reception at Canterbury, after an absence of more than six years, was most enthusiastic; and his progress in the following week to see the young king was something in the nature of a triumph. His conduct, however, with reference to the bishops being known, he received orders to return to his diocese, without obtaining an interview. When there, he occupied himself till Christmas in exercising his archiepiscopal functions, Ranulph de Broc and his other enemies still offering him every species of annoyance.

On Christmas-day, at high mass, he preached to the people, and after affecting them by a reference to one martyr among their archbishops, and the possibility that there might be a second, he concluded with one of those furious denunciations by which he dealt 'damnation round the land;' uttering, in a tone 'fierce, indignant, fiery, and bold,' a vehement invective against his enemies, and pronouncing sentence of excommunication against Ranulph de Broc and his brother Robert, and also against Nizel de Sackville, a court chaplain.

The Archbishop of York and the excommunicated bishops had not been idle. They had sailed to Normandy, and meeting the king near Bayeux, had communicated to him the recent proceedings of Becket. Henry's anger knew no bounds, and in the heat of it he unguardedly dropped words reflecting on the cowardice of his courtiers for suffering him to be so long insulted by a turbulent priest. Four knights then present—Reginald Fitz-Urse, William de Tracy, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito—interpreting these unhappy words too readily, at once embarked for England, and repaired to Saltwood, the castle of Ranulph de Broc, where they arrived on December 28. Henry, on their departure from the court, suspected their intention, and instantly despatched the Earl of Mandeville and two others, with orders to overtake them and to arrest the archbishop. But they did not arrive till the tragedy was completed.

On Tuesday, December 29, the knights arrived at Canterbury, and intruding into the chamber of the archbishop, they demanded of him the withdrawal of the bishops' excommunication. Becket's answer was proud and firm. He offered to absolve the Bishops of London and Salisbury if they would swear to submit to the determination of the Church; but he said the pope alone had jurisdiction over the archbishop. On reminding three of the knights that they had been his vassals, they broke into fury, and the discussion ended with most violent threats on their retirement from the room.

It was now the hour of vespers; and the monks and clergy, thinking he would be more safe in the church, hurried him through the cloisters. But the knights also, regardless of the sanctity of the place, had obtained an entrance, fully armed; and calling out, 'Where is the traitor?' and then, on receiving no answer, 'Where is the archbishop?' Becket replied, 'Here I am; no traitor, but a priest of God.' They repeated their demand for the bishops' absolution, which he met by a repetition of his denial, adding that he was ready to die, but commanding them not to touch his people. The knights then endeavoured to remove him from the church, but, finding their efforts to drag him away unavailing, Fitz-Urse struck him on the head with his sword, wounding at the same time Grim, his cross-bearer and biographer; and Tracy and Brito repeating the blows, the archbishop was soon a breathless corpse at their feet. Hugh de Moreville did not strike Becket, being employed in keeping off interference; and the four, rushing out of the church, repaired to Hugh de Moreville's castle in Yorkshire.

Though the above four knights only are recorded, other persons were apparently engaged in the atrocious project. Robert de Broc, who joined them, pointed out the private passage to the cloisters; and Robert Fitz-Ralph, or Fitz-Ranulph, is spoken of by Dugdale as having been concerned in it. William, the son of the latter, was a justicier in this reign, and will be mentioned in a subsequent page.

Thus terminated the life of one whose character, though distinguished by sterling qualities, was alloyed with many human imperfections: to which the preponderance is to be given is still, and seems likely to be, a question to be agitated by historians and biographers. Too frequently they become the advocates of the one or the other party, instead of being impartial judges between them; and the difficulty must be admitted of defining the precise line which divides firmness from obstinacy, energy from intemperance, and an honest zeal in claiming the privileges of one order from an insidious encroachment on the prerogatives of another. Whatever opinion may be formed of the claims made by Becket on behalf of the Church, few will praise him for temperance in his enforcement of them, or consider that he adopted the wisest course to obtain their recognition; and, while none will deny the extent of his acquirements or the brilliancy of his talents, many will attribute his canonisation more to the swords of his murderers than to the virtues of his life.

Two years after his assassination he was canonised; and his body, which the monks had hurriedly buried without ceremony in the crypt, from fear that it might otherwise be exposed to indignity, was removed in 1221 to a chapel prepared for its reception, where his shrine for many subsequent ages was visited by pilgrims from all parts, whom the successive popes, to keep alive the natural horror which his martyrdom had excited, and to connect it with religious zeal for papal supremacy, assiduously encouraged by granting them extraordinary indulgences. The riches which superstition lavished on this shrine were enormous, and continued to flow in, till Henry VIII., assuming the title of 'Defender of the Faith,' and deeming Becket's example a provocation to opposition, ordered the shrine to be destroyed, seized the accumulated treasures, and, directing his bones to be burned and his ashes to be scattered to the winds, stigmatised him as a rebel and traitor to his prince, and struck his name from the calendar of saints.

Becket had two sisters who survived him. One of them, Mary, was made Abbess of Barking in Essex, in 1173; and the other, Agnes, was married to Thomas Fitz-Theobald de Helle, by whom, about the end of Henry's reign, was founded a hospital in London, on the land which had belonged to Gilbert Becket, and where Thomas was born. It was called the Hospital of St. Thomas the Martyr, of Acon, and consisted of a master and several brethren of a particular order, professing the rule of St. Augustine, about that time instituted in the Holy Land. It of course did not escape the dissolution under Henry VIII., and now belongs to the Mercers' Company, part of it being called the Mercers' Chapel. (Monast. i. 437, vi. 645.)

BECKINGHAM, ELIAS DE, was one of the two judges who alone were found pure, when all the others were convicted of corrupt practices, and dismissed in disgrace from the seat of justice. Nothing is recorded of him beyond this fact and the dates of his judicial career. He is first mentioned at the bottom of the list of justices itinerant into Middlesex in 2 Edward I., 1274; but he clearly was not then a regular justicier, as he is mentioned in a liberate of the following year as a king's serjeant. In 4 Edward I. he was one of the justices of assize then appointed.

He afterwards filled the office of keeper of the records and writs of the Common Pleas; and an allowance of twenty shillings was made to him for the expenses of their carriage from Westminster to Shrewsbury, where the king, on his expedition to Wales in 11 Edward I., had ordered the court to be held. (Madox, ii. 7.)

It was not till Michaelmas, 13 Edward I., 1285, that he was raised to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas; and when the judges were all apprehended by the king on charges of bribery and corruption, he and John de Mettingham only were honourably acquitted. This occurred towards the end of 17 Edward I., 1289; and the Parliament Roll of 20 Edward I. contains an honourable record of his purity. (Rot. Parl. i. 84.)

He retired from the bench, or died, in 34 Edward I., 1305, the last fine levied before him being dated in fifteen days of St. Martin in that year. (Orig. Jurid. 44.)

He was buried at Bottisham Church in Cambridgeshire, and on his sepulchral memorial he is designated 'Justiciarius Domini Regis Angliæ.'

BEDINGFIELD, THOMAS, was the second son of Thomas Bedingfield, Esq., of Darsham Hall in Suffolk, which he afterwards purchased from his elder brother, Philip. He was born about 1593, and, having been admitted a student at Gray's Inn in 1608, was called to the bar on February 17, 1615, and was reader there in Lent 1636. He acquired such eminence in his profession that he was made attorney-general of the Duchy of Lancaster, and was thereupon knighted.

He was assigned by the House of Lords in 1642 to conduct the defence of Sir Edward Herbert, the attorney-general against the impeachment of the Commons, but declining to plead, in consequence of the latter threatening any counsel who presumed to appear against them with their displeasure, he was committed to the Tower by the peers for his contempt of their commands. He did not, however, long suffer under this choice of predicaments, being released from his incarceration in three days. (State Trials, ii. 11, 1129.) The Commons showed their estimation of him in 1648 and 1647 by several times inserting his name as one of the sons they proposed as commissioners of Great Seal; but the appointment was not completed, in consequence of the disagreement of the Lords. But both he concurred in October 1648 in a vote pointing him one of the judges of Common Pleas. Not long, however, did he retain his new dignity, for on the death of the king, in January 1649, Thomas refused to act under the commission offered by the executioners. (Locke, 224, 278.) Retiring into private life he outlived the interregnum, and on the return of Charles II., in 1660, he resigned immediately and in legitimate manner the degree of the coat. He died at Darsham on March 23, 1660-1, where his monument still remains. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Charles Hoskins, of the county of Surrey, he left a son of the same name and three daughters. (Suckling's ii. 222, 226.)

BEDINGFIELD, HENRY, was the fourth of five sons of John Bedingfield, Esq., of Darsham in Suffolk, the younger brother the above Thomas, and himself a benchor of Lincoln's Inn, by his wife, Joyce, daughter and coheir of Edmund Morgan, of Lambeth. He was born in 1633, and, having been called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn on May 7, 1657, was raised to the degree of the coif in 1663; being made king's serjeant some time after, and knighted. In 1684 he was elected sub-steward of Great Yarmouth.

Roger North calls him 'a grave but rather heavy lawyer; but a good churchman and loyal by principle.' He relates (p. 240) that Lord Guildford 'had cast his eye upon him,' and informed him of his intention to nominate him for a vacancy on the bench. The serjeant gratefully declared he would 'ever own his preferment as long as he lived to his lordship, and to no other person whatever.' But on hearing this, Chief Justice Jeffreys, jealous of the lord keeper's power, sent to the serjeant's brother, a woollen-draper in London, afterwards lord mayor, who was one of his creatures and boon companions, and told him that if his brother so much as went to the lord keeper, he would oppose him, and he should not be a judge at all. The poor serjeant, whose 'spirits were not formed for the heroics,' was obliged to conform, and accordingly was not raised to the bench during Lord Guildford's life. He however received the promotion soon after that nobleman's death, being appointed a judge of the Common Pleas on February 13, 1686. It is to be presumed that, either from his own conviction or the arguments of Jeffreys, he acknowledged the king's power to dispense with the penal laws, as two months after, upon the recommendation of the same arrogant patron, he was raised to the head of that court, on April 21, on the discharge of Chief Justice Jones. He did not enjoy this dignity much more than nine months, dying suddenly while receiving the sacrament in Lincoln's Inn Chapel, on Sunday, February 6, 1687. A mural monument of white marble was erected to his memory in Halesworth Church. (Suckling's Suffolk, ii. 337; Bramston's Autobiog. 221, 223, 268.)

BEK, THOMAS (BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S), was second son of Walter Bek, or Becke, baron of Eseeby in Lincolnshire; and Mr. Hurd (p. 12) places him in his 'Catalogue of Keepers of the Great Seal,' on the questionable ground that when John de Kirkeby, in whose possession it was left by Robert Burnel, the chancellor, was commanded to attend the king in May 1279, 7 Edward I, he was directed to leave the Seal, sealed up with his own seal, in the custody of Thomas Bek; and that in the same month they were both ordered to attend with it at Dover, and there to await the king's messenger. Bek was no doubt at that time, as he certainly was three years before (Issue Roll, iii. 91), keeper of the king's wardrobe, the usual place of the Seal's deposit. In the same year, also, he was constituted treasurer; but remained so a short time only, as Joseph de Cancy, prior of St. John of Jerusalem, held it very soon after.

Like most of the officers of the court in those days, he was an ecclesiastic, and in 3 Edward I. was in possession of the archdeaconry of Dorset, which he held till he was elected Bishop of St. David's, on June 3, 1280. He sat there for thirteen years, during which time he founded two colleges in Wales—one at Aberguilly, and the other at Landewy-brevy. He died on April 14, 1293. (Godwin, 580; Le Neve, 218, 512.)

His brother, Anthony Bek, was an officer in the Exchequer, and ultimately became Bishop of Durham.

BELEB, ROGER, whose family was fixed at Kirkby, on the Wrethek, in Leicestershire, in which and in the neighbouring counties they held large possessions, was the son of William Beler and Avicia his wife, and the grandson of another Roger Beler, who was sheriff of Lincolnshire in 40 Henry III. (Monast. vi. 511; Madox, ii. 142.) In 12 Edward II. the king granted him the hundred of Framelond, and certain farms in Leicestershire, for his laudable services. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 230.) It is not stated in what capacity they were rendered; but in the same year he received a general pardon as an adherent of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, and was confirmed in his office of bailiff and steward of Stapelford in Leicestershire. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 86.)

He was afterwards occasionally employed in judicial commissions till July 20, 1322, 16 Edward II., when he was raised to the Exchequer bench.

He came to a violent end, being attacked and murdered on January 29, 1326, on his journey from Kirkby to Leicester, by Sir Eustace de Folville, lord of the neighbouring manor of Ashby, who was himself mortally wounded with an arrow. A commission was issued to try the offenders; and the goods of Roger la Zousch, lord of Lubesthorp, and Robert de Helewell, charged as accessories and flying from justice, were thereupon ordered to be seized into the king's hands. Sir Roger was buried in the chantry chapel he had erected at Kirkby, where his tomb, with a fine alabaster effigies of him in complete armour, still remains. By his wife, Alicia, he left an infant son. (Madox, ii. 60; Parl. Writs, ii. 522; Rot. Parl. ii. 432; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 6-171; Royal Progresses to Leicester, by W. Kelly.)

BELET, MICHAEL, was the second son of Hervey Belet, and eventually succeeded to the lordship of Wrokeston in Oxfordfordshire, and to the manor of Shene or Richmond, which King Henry I. had granted to the family by the serjeanty of chief butler or cupbearer to the king.

The sheriffalty of various counties was entrusted to him—of Worcestershire, Wiltshire, Gloucestershire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire—at various dates from 22 Henry II. to the end of the reign. (Fuller's Worthies.)

In 23 Henry II., 1177, and the two following years, he acted as a justice itinerant in various parts of England; and when the great council of Windsor, in the last of those years, divided the kingdom into four parts, and sent judges into each to administer justice, he was one of the five selected for the circuit comprehending ten counties of the home district. There are records of his acting in this character, not only in these but other counties, through many succeeding years, as late as 3 John, 1201-2. Many instances occur, also, of his partaking in the judicial duties of the Curia Regis at Westminster, fines being levied before him from 28 Henry II., 1182, through the reign of Richard, till the third of John.

About this period he died, leaving by his wife, Emma, daughter and coheir of John de Keynes, several sons, two of whom, Hervey and Michael, succeeded in turn to his honours. Hervey died without issue, and Michael is the subject of the next article.

BELET, MICHAEL. There were two Michael Belets in the reign of Henry III.—one, the son of Robert Belet, of Cumbe, who died in 3 Henry III.; and the other, the subject of this notice, who, from his profession, was always called Magister Michael Belet. He was the second son of the above Michael Belet. In 2 John the king granted to him, as his 'dilecto et familiari clerico,' the church of Hinclesham; and in 5 John that of Setburgham, in the diocese of Carlisle. (Rot. Chart. 75, 134.) In 3 John he paid forty marks for having the marriage of Robert de Caudos 'ad opus sororis suae;' and on the death of his brother, Hervey Belet, he fined 100*l.* for having the king's butlery, which he inherited as attached to his manor of Shene or Richmond in Surrey. (Rot. de Oblatis, 180, 358.)

He was some time afterwards disseised of his lordship of Wroxton in Oxfordshire, having incurred, as the record says, the king's 'malevolentiam' for some offence which is not named; but in 14 John he recovered his lands and the king's goodwill by a timely fine of five hundred marks. In the next year, however, the roll says that he is not to be summoned for sixty marks which he still owed for the butlery, 'because the king keeps that office in his own hands, and as yet holds it.' (Madox, i. 402, 474.) During King John's troubles

he remained faithful to the royal cause, and in the last year of his reign had a grant of the land of Wischard Ledet, who was with the king's enemies. In 8 Henry III. he was custos of the rents of the bishopric of Coventry; and in the tenth year was appointed to audit the accounts of the justiciars of the quinzieme, being himself one of those assigned to collect it in Northamptonshire. (Rot. Clav. i. 266, 583, 585, 599, ii. 95, 147.) These offices indicate that he was then in the Exchequer, and Madox (ii. 317) includes him among the barons of that court, on the authority of a writ attested by him in 22 Henry III., 1238.

He executed the office of chief butler at the marriage of King Henry in the twentieth year of his reign; and founded the priory of Wroxton, for canons of the order of St. Augustin. The date of his death is not stated.

BELL, ROBERT, a barrister of the Middle Temple, became reader there in autumn 1565. Though he is afterward occasionally noticed in the Reports of Dyer and Plowden, he seems to have been more sedulously engaged in senatorial than in professional duties, having been a member for Lyme Regis in all Elizabethan parliaments from 1562 till the period of his death. In October 1566 he was one of the committee appointed to petition the queen about her marriage, and express himself, as some other members did, with considerable boldness, on the unsatisfactory nature of her majesty's answer. This to a dissolution in the following January and no new parliament was called. In April 1571, when Mr. Bell was named among those who were assigned to confer with the spiritual lords for the reformation of the abuses in religion. In a debate on the subsidy, having urged 'that the petitioners were galled by two means, . . . namely, licences and the abuse of promoters, having pressed 'for the calling in of licences granted to four courtiers to utter undoing of 6,000 or 8,000 of the poor subjects,' he was sent for by the queen 'and so hardly dealt with, that he came into the house with such an amazed countenance, that it daunted all the other members of such sort, that for several days there was not one that durst deal in any matter of importance.' Another parliament was summoned in the following year, in which Mr. Bell was elected speaker May 10. (Park. Hist. i. 715-719) Various prorogations this parliament kept alive till February 8, 1576, when it again met, and the session was remarkable by the committal of Mr. Wentworth for the boldness of his speech on the first day. At the close of the disagreeable duty was imposed speaker of moving the queen on the subject of marriage. This he seems to have done with a great deal of skill, artfully interlarding his address with graceful flattery, and concluding it with the welcome offering of a subsidy. It is evident, from the lord keeper's answer, that her majesty was not offended, for she gave a conditional assent to the prayer, and with gracious words prorogued the parliament on May 14. This prorogation lasted nearly five years, and the interval was an eventful one to the speaker.

Notwithstanding the freedom of his language in the earlier part of his parliamentary life, his conduct in the speaker's chair had been so satisfactory to the queen that she took the first opportunity to reward him. A vacancy occurring in the office of chief baron, he was invested with it on January 24, 1577, and was at the same time honoured with the order of knighthood. His judicial career, however, was brought to a fatal termination within a very few months. At the summer assizes at Oxford, on the trial of one Rowland Jenkes, 'a sawcy foul-mouthed bookteller, for scandalous words uttered against the queen, every person in court was seized with such a malady, arising, it was believed, from the stench of the prisoners, that they all died within forty days, to the number of three hundred. Among the victims were Chief Baron Bell, the sheriff, and several knights and gentlemen of the county, Serjeant Barham, and other lawyers. (Camden's Elizabeth, in Kennett, ii. 459.) The chief baron was buried at Leominster.

Sir Robert's elevation to the bench rendered him incompetent to sit in parliament, and he consequently could no longer fill the speaker's chair; but, as the prorogation still continued, neither of the vacancies could be supplied till the next session, which did not occur till nearly four years after his death, when the first act of the House of Commons was to elect a speaker in his place. (Parl. Hist. i. 809.)

Camden describes him as 'a sage and grave man, and famous for his knowledge in the law.' He was of a respectable Norfolk family, and by his marriage with Dorothy, daughter of Edmund Beauprè, of Outwell in that county, he became possessed of Beauprè Hall. His male descendants long flourished in the county. (Anecdotes and Traditions, Camden Soc. 2, &c.: Blomefield's Norfolk, iv. 133.)

BELLA FAGO, ROGER DE, is proved by the Rolls of Parliament (i. 160, 218) to be one of the justices of assize for Warwickshire in 33 Edward I., 1305, and to have been afterwards appointed a justice of trailbaston for Cornwall and nine other counties. His harshness and cruelty in performing this duty are commemorated in a contemporary song. (Wright's Pol. Songs, 233.) He resided in Oxfordshire. It does not appear in what manner he was related to the opulent family of his name, which was settled in Norfolk, and which traced its lineage to Ralph de Bella Fago in the time of the Conquest.

BENDINGS, WILLIAM DE. When the great council which met at Windsor in 1179, 25 Henry II., divided the kingdom into four districts, and sent wise and learned men into each for the administration of justice, William de Bendings was selected as one of the six justiciars to whom the northern counties were appropriated, and who were also specially constituted to sit in the Curia Regis, to hear the complaints of the people. This seems to have been the first instance of the nomination of extra judges in the king's courts; the prelates and barons of the kingdom, with the great officers of state, having hitherto acted almost entirely in that capacity.

Previously to his elevation to the bench, he was one of four commissioners sent to Ireland in 1174 to settle the differences there, and to bring over Raymond, whom the king had recalled.

He was alive in the beginning of the reign of Richard I. (Madox, i. 94, 138, 285; Brady's England, 363; Pipe Roll, 1 Richard I.)

BENEFACTA, RICHARD. See R. FITZ-GILBERT.

BENET. The only notice recorded of Benet, 'Magister Benedictus,' is the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him by the chancellor, William de Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, because he presumed to hold the Great Seal against the statutes of the king and kingdom, as the denunciator asserts, and contrary to his prohibition. (Madox, i. 77.) This no doubt was when Prince John and the barons removed Longchamp from the government, and forced him to quit the kingdom, in 1192. The Seal was probably then placed in the hands of this Benet, to perform the necessary duties during the vacancy.

BENSTEDE, JOHN DE, was in frequent employment under Edward I. and Edward II. He was clerk, or secretary, to the former, whom he accompanied to Flanders on August 22, 1297, on which occasion the Great Seal, which the king took with him, was placed in his hands, and another seal left in England with the chancellor. On the king's return in the following March, John de Benstede was the messenger employed by him to carry this latter seal to the Exchequer, the Great Seal being then given back to the chancellor. (Madox, i. 72.) He afterwards held a place in the king's wardrobe, when the Seal was several times deposited with him.

His closeness to the king's person in 33 Edward I. is shown by a letter addressed to him by Edward, Prince of Wales, requesting him to present to the king a petition which he enclosed from the Earl of Ulster and others, and to pray, on his part, that such justices should be assigned as would redress the grievances they complained of. He was advanced to the post of chancellor of the Exchequer in the same year (Cal. Rot. Pat. 65); but he resigned it in 1 Edward II., when he became keeper of the wardrobe. (Madox, ii. 29.)

In 2 Edward II. he was again in the Scottish wars, and was sent with Roger Savage to the King of France to arrange a meeting between him and the King of England. (Baronage, ii. 91.)

On October 6, 1309, in the third year, he was constituted one of the justices of the Common Pleas, and fines were levied before him from the next year till 1320; in which, on October 16, William de Herle was appointed a judge in his place. (Orig. 44; Madox, ii. 7, 31.) He probably resigned then, as, according to the inquisition (Cal. i. 319), his death did not occur till 1323 or 1324.

In 8 Edward II. he was sent on the king's service to Scotland, and in the tenth year had been selected as an envoy to Rome on the Scottish affairs; but the mission being stopped, he had a payment of 1*l.* per diem for the eleven days he was employed, together with an allowance of 12*s.* 5*d.* for a loss he had in the purchase and sale of 159 florins provided for his journey. (Archæol. xxvi. 322.) In the following year he was one of the commissioners to treat for peace with Robert de Brus; and in 12 Edward II. he was sent with the Bishop of Hereford and others to the papal court, to solicit his holiness for the canonisation of Thomas de Cantilupe, chancellor and Bishop of Hereford in the reign of Henry III.

He had large possessions in various counties, with a manor-house called Rosemont, at Eye, near Westminster, which he had licence to fortify with walls of lime and stone, and in 15 Edward II. he was returned by the sheriff of Hertford as a knight banneret. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 591.)

He was married twice: his first wife was named Isabella, and his second Petronilla, who survived him. His son Edward succeeded him, whose descendants were living in the county of Essex till the reign of Henry VII. (Morant's Essex, i. 34, ii. 495; Chauncy's Herts, 335; Hasted's Kent, v. 149.)

BEREFORD, RICHARD DE, was not improbably the brother of the undernamed chief justice, William de Bereford; and the only trace of the place of his residence while in England is in his being appointed assessor and collector in the county of Worcester for the thirtieth granted in 10 Edward I., 1283.

He was treasurer of the Exchequer of Dublin from the twenty-eighth to the last year of that reign, and probably at the beginning of that of Edward II.; but in the fourth year of the latter (1310) he was the last named of the three justices of assize assigned for six counties.

In 7 Edward II., 1314, he was raised to the chancellorship of Ireland, and retained that office till August 1317, after which date there is no mention of his name. (Parl. Writs, i. 404, ii. p. ii. 526; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 112; Abb. Placit. 255; Cal. Rot. Pat. 61, 77.)

BEREFORD, WILLIAM DE. Mr. Nicholls, in his 'History of Leicestershire' (343), commences the pedigree of William de Bereford, or Barford, with his father, Osbert de Barford, whom, on the authority of a descent taken from Mr. H. Ferrens' 'MSS. of Antiquities,' he calls chief gentleman of Ralph de Hengham, the chief justice. It seems, however, more probable from two entries on the Plea Rolls, that this Osbert was his brother, and that both were the sons of Walter de Bereford. (Abb. Placit. 215, 280.)

He was a justice of the Common Pleas. Prynne (on 4th Inst. 20) gives two commissions to him, in conjunction with Robert de Hertford and Robert Malet, to enquire as to a murder in 20 Edward I.; and in parliament that met after Easter in the following year Eustace de Parles and John his brother were convicted of insult to the king, in the Aula Regis, by imputing to him corrupt and improper conduct during his iter into Staffordshire; and they were imprisoned in the Tower for their contumacious behaviour. (Rot. Parl. i. 95.)

He continued to act during the remainder of the reign, and was one of those selected to treat with the Scots in 33 Edward I. and was placed in the commission of itinerant justices for the northern counties in the year of the reign. (Rot. Parl. i. 218.) On the accession of Edward II. his commission in the Common Pleas was renewed, holding the second place.

He was raised to the office of chief justice of that court, as the successor of Ralph de Hengham, on March 15, 1322, 2 Edward II.; and the last fine that he acknowledged before him in that character is dated in the first week of 20 Edward II., July 1326. (Orig. 44.) In the same year he died, leaving large possessions in several counties, the principal of which were in Warwickshire and Oxfordshire. (Quis. p. m. i. 333.)

By his wife Margaret he left two sons named Simon and William.

BEREFORD, RALPH DE, was in all probability not very distantly connected with the above William de Bereford. According to the certificate in 9 Edward II., he possessed property in the townships of Bourton, Milcome, and Bereford, or Barford, in the county of Oxford. In the same year he was appointed one of the custodes of the vacant bishopric of Winchester; and on several occasions during the remainder of that reign was employed on commissions of Oyer and Terminer in various counties. In 1329, the third year of the reign of Edward III., he was the second of five justices itinerant into Nottinghamshire, and was named in a similar commission for five other counties. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 526; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 227, 257, ii. 24; N. Fœdera, ii. 537, 574.)

BEREWYK, JOHN DE, was an officer of the court, as appears from the nature of his various employments. In 7 Edward I. he was appointed custos of the vacant abbey of St. Edmund, and in the next year had a similar grant over the bishopric of Lincoln. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 33, 35.) In 11 Edward I. he was assessor in Dorsetshire of the thirtieth granted by the counties south of Trent. (Parl. Writs, i. 13.) In 13 Edward I. he was keeper of the queen's gold (Madox, i. 361); and in 18 Edward I. he delivered into the wardrobe the Roll of Peace and Concord between the chancellor and scholars of the university of Oxford and the mayor and burgesses of that city. (Rot. Parl. i. 33.) His high character is evidenced by his being one of the executors of Queen Eleanor. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 80.)

Although it does not appear that he was a judge at Westminster, he held a high place among the justices itinerant. In all the circuits in which he was named over various counties, extending from 20 Edward I., 1252, to nearly the end of the reign, he was invariably at their head. He was summoned also among the judges to parliament during the same interval, and on one occasion was appointed to receive and answer all petitions from Ireland and Guernsey which could be answered without reference to the king. (Parl. Writs, i. 468.)

That he acted as a justice itinerant under Edward II. there can be little doubt, as he is summoned among them to the parliaments of the first two years of that reign. (Ibid. ii. 536.)

He died in 6 Edward II., 1312, and was possessed of several manors and other lands in the counties of Essex, Hants, Wilts, Norfolk, and Suffolk. (Cal. Inqns. p. m. i. 250.) His heir in one entry is called 'Roger, his son,' and in another, 'Roger Huse, consanguineus.' (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 194, 195.)

BERKELEY, MAURICE DE, was the son of Robert Fitz-Harding, who, having obtained a grant from Henry II., while Duke of Normandy, of the castle and lordship of Berkeley, of which Roger de Berkeley had been deprived for his adherence to King Stephen, assumed the surname; but Roger still urging his claim to the lordship, an agreement was entered into between them, with the consent of the duke and King Stephen, that Maurice, the son of Robert, should marry Alicia, the daughter of Roger. This taking effect, Maurice on his father's death, on February 5, 1170, succeeded to the barony, which he enjoyed till his own decease, on June 16, 1190, having just previous to that event added one thousand marks to the purse which King Richard was making for the support of his holy war, under the pretence of a fine for the confirmation of his title.

In the last year of his life he acted as a justice itinerant in Gloucestershire, his pleas appearing on the roll of that year. (Pipe Roll, 1 Ric. I. 168.)

He was buried in the church of Brentford, Middlesex, to the building of which he had greatly contributed. He was a liberal benefactor also to several religious houses, and founded two hospitals—one at Lorwing, between Berkeley and Dursley; and the other, that of the Holy Trinity, at Long-Brigge in Gloucestershire.

By his wife, the above-mentioned Alicia, he had six sons, the eldest of whom is the next-mentioned Robert. The present holder of the barony is his lineal descendant, with the title of earl.

BERKELEY, ROBERT DE, the eldest of the six sons of the above Maurice de Berkeley, on the death of his father, in 1190, succeeded to the large inheritance, paying a fine of 1000*l.* for livery thereof. In 10 John, 1208, he was one of the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged at Derby.

He was among the principal movers in the contest between King John and his barons, and was accordingly included in the sentence of excommunication pronounced against them by Pope Innocent III. (Wendover, iii. 297, 356.) His castle of Berkeley and the whole of his lands were also seized, but by his submission at the commencement of the next reign they were all restored, except Berkeley and its castle, which were retained till his death. This event occurred on May 13, 1220, 4 Henry III., when he was buried in a monk's cowl, in the abbey of St. Augustin, near Bristol, to which he had been a munificent benefactor, as well as to many other religious houses. He also founded the hospital of St. Catherine at Bedminster, near Bristol, and two chantries.

He married twice. His first wife was Julian, daughter of William de Pontearch, and niece to William Mareschall, Earl of Pembroke. The name of his second was Lucia, who after his death married Hugh de Gurney. Leaving no issue by either, he was succeeded by his brother, Thomas, to whom Berkeley and its castle were restored. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. 4 Hen. III. i. 52.)

BERKELEY, ARNALD DE, was a baron of the Exchequer, attesting a charter with that title in 48 Henry III., 1264 (Madox, ii. 1319); but nothing further has been discovered about him, except that he had manors in Merkele, Bradefeld, and Brokhampton, in Herefordshire, and that a process was issued to the sheriff in 51 Henry III., to enquire if Henry de Calde-well came and took his goods and chattels there. (Abb. Placit. 160.)

BERKELEY, ROBERT, traces his descent from the above Maurice and Robert de Berkeley, through a succession of a multitude of younger sons. His grandfather, William, was mayor of Hereford in 1545, whose eighth son was Rowland Berkeley, who, having little to begin the world with, by his industry became a very eminent and wealthy clothier at Worcester, and purchased, among others, a considerable estate in the neighbouring parish of Spetchley. By his wife, Catherine, daughter of Thomas Hayward, Esq., he had a family of seven sons and nine daughters.

Robert Berkeley, the second son, was born at Worcester in 1584. He was admitted at the Middle Temple in 1600, and called to the bar May 6, 1608. On the death of his father, in 1611, he became possessor of the Spetchley estate, and in 1613 he was sheriff of his native county, and thirteen years afterwards, in 1626, he became autumn reader of his inn of court. At the commencement of the next year he was called to the degree of the coif, and on April 12 was nominated one of the king's serjeants. From this time his name appears in the Reports; and it fell to his lot in 1629 to argue for the king that the return made to the Habeas Corpus obtained by William Stroud and the other members imprisoned for their conduct in the last parliament was good and sufficient in law, his argument showing great ability. (State Trials, iii. 844.)

On October 11, 1632, having been previously knighted, he was created a judge of the King's Bench. He had a deep feeling in favour of the king's prerogative; and, though he agreed that the king could not on all occasions impose charges on his subjects without consent of parliament, saying, 'The people of this kingdom are subjects not slaves, freemen not villains, to be taxed de alto et basso,' yet he contended that his majesty might do so when the good and safety of the kingdom in general are concerned, and that he is the sole judge of the danger. He therefore in the great case of ship money, after a most elaborate and learned argument, which, however wrong it may be thought in its foundation, at least showed his conscientious conviction of its truth, pronounced his opinion against Mr. Hampden. (Ibid. iii. 1087-1125.)

For this he was called to severe account by the Long Parliament. He was one of the six judges whom the Lords, on December 22, 1640, bound in 10,000*l.* apiece to answer the charges which the Commons were preparing against them. On February 13 he was singled out for the first example, and, being impeached for high treason, was arrested in open court while sitting on the bench, to 'the great terrour of the rest of his brethren, and of all his professional' (Whitelocke, 40.) He was kept in custody of the sheriff of London till October 20, 1641, when he appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and, pleading 'Not guilty,' obtained permission to go with a keeper to Serjeants' Inn to look out papers and advise with his counsel. The trial, which was fixed for November 2, was put off the instance of the Commons for want of witnesses. In Michaelmas Term 1642, of the three judges of the King's Bench that were then left, Heath being with the king, Mallin in the Tower, and Berkeley under impeachment, the two houses at a conference resolved 'That Judge Berkeley, having carried himself with modesty and humility and inoffensively to both houses, be pitched upon for keeping the essoigns.' (Parliament.)

The Lords in the following September that is, the ten that remained—sentenced the judge to pay a fine of 20,000*l.* and to be forever disabled from holding any office in the commonwealth. But, the parliament being then pressed for money to pay instalment of their subsidy to the Scots was let off on payment of half to their own officers. (Clarendon, iv. 286.) In the conflict that afterwards took place Robert Berkeley suffered much from plundering and exactions of both the parties. Even Whitelocke represents him 'moderate in his ways,' and acknowledges him to be 'a very learned man in our age and a good orator and judge.'

He outlived his sovereign above 70 years, dying on August 5, 1656, at the age of 72. He was buried under a handsome monument, with an excellent marble effigy of the judge upon it, in a chancel built to the church of Spetchley.

He married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Conyers, Esq., of East Herts, by whom he had one son, whose descendants still enjoy the estate.

BERNINGHAM, RICHARD DE.

were two families of this surname, and two individuals of both names flourishing in the reign of Edward II.; one connected with the county of York, and the other with that of Norfolk. The former was son of John de Berningham, or Barningham; and the latter not improbably was the son of Walter, who, in 1316, was lord of the manor of Hautevyns in Barnham, Norfolk.

Sir Francis Palgrave considers that the presumption is somewhat in favour of Richard de Berningham, of Yorkshire, being the person who was so often summoned to council among the justices and others, and the first entry among the Parliamentary Writs in which his name appears seems amply to justify this opinion. He is therein required to lay aside the caption of certain assizes in the northern counties, which had been fixed during the meeting of parliament, and to repair to Westminster instead. This was on September 6, 1313, 7 Edward II., and his summonses continue till the fourteenth year, during which period he is included in several commissions in the county of York, to which, perhaps, his judicial functions were confined. He is mentioned as a knight in that county in 17 Edward II., and his death is recorded in 3 Edward III., possessing property therein. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 836; Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 534; Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 19.)

BERSTEDE, WALTER DE, was sheriff of Kent to Reginald de Cobbeham when he died, in December 1257, 42 Henry III., and was appointed to act as sheriff for the remainder of the year. In 1262 he was appointed constable of Dover Castle, and custos of the Cinque Ports (Cal. Rot. Pat. 33); and also went as one of the justices itinerant into Leicestershire, and the next year into Norfolk, Suffolk, and Lincolnshire. He is placed among the justices of the bench in 50 Henry III., on the authority of a fine levied in February 1290; and a writ of assize to be taken before him occurs in the following September. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 268, 446.)

BERTIE, VERE, was the fourth son of Montagu, second Earl of Lindsey, lord chamberlain, by his first wife, Martha, daughter of Sir William Cockayn, of Rush-ton in Northamptonshire, and widow of John Ramsay, Earl of Holderness. To the devoted loyalty of both his father and grandfather he probably owed his professional advancement, which was somewhat rapid. He was called to the bar of the Middle Temple on June 10, 1659, and, though chosen a bencher in January 1673, the law reports are silent as to his forensic merits. Though this may be accounted for by his employment by government as secretary of the treasury and treasurer of the ordinance, it may be presumed that he was not altogether deficient in legal acquirements, inasmuch as he was appointed a baron of the Exchequer on June 4, 1675.

From that court he was removed, on June 15, 1678, to the Common Pleas, where he sat for only ten months, being discharged from his place in April 29, 1679, with three other judges—viz., Sir William Wilde, Sir Edward Thurland, and Sir Francis Bramston. It is a remarkable circumstance that, five days previous, all these four judges were in the commission for the trial of Nathanael Reading, indicted, on the testimony of the infamous Bedloes, for endeavouring to stifle and lessen the king's evidence against the lords then in the Tower; and it may be a question how far their conduct or opinions on that trial caused their dismissal. Vere Bertie died unmarried ten months afterwards, on February 23, 1680, and was buried in the Temple Church. (State Trials, vii. 261.)

BERTRAM, ROGER. There were two noble families of this name in Northumberland—one Bertram of Mitford, and the other Bertram of Bothall—and the Christian name Roger was common to both. The subject of this notice belonged to the former family, and was the son of William de Bertram and Alice de Umfraville his wife. (Baronage, i. 543.) His father died about 1 John, for in that year the guardianship of Roger was granted to William Briwer, but was afterwards transferred to Peter de Brus, who fined thirteen hundred marks for the same. Towards the end of the reign, being found in the ranks of the insurgent barons, his lands and castle of Mitford were given into the custody of Philip de Ulecot, who seems to have resisted the royal order for their restoration when Roger returned to his obedience on the accession of Henry III. He was obliged, however, to submit, and Roger was reinstated on a fine of 100l. (Rot. Chart. 48; Rot. Claus. i. 70, 246, 316, 336, 342, 357.)

From this time he acted the part of a loyal subject, and was frequently employed as a justice itinerant in the northern counties, from 9 to 18 Henry III. He died before May 24, 1242, on which day his lands were delivered into the custody of Walter de Crepping on behalf of his son Roger, who did homage for them on June 28, 1246, on attaining his majority. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 379, 456.) In the reign of Edward II. the barony terminated by the failure of male issue.

BEST, WILLIAM DRAPER, did not obtain his title of Lord Wynford till he had retired from the bench. He was born on December 13, 1767, at Haselbury Plunknett in Somersetshire, and was the third son of Thomas Best, Esq., by a daughter of Sir William Draper, well known as the antagonist of 'Junius.' Left an orphan in infancy, he was sent to the school of the neighbouring town of Crewkerne, and at the age of fifteen was removed to Wadham College, Oxford, where he was educated with the view of entering the Church. This plan he relinquished in consequence of coming to the possession, by the death of a near relation, of a considerable estate; and, entering the Middle Temple, was called to the bar on November 6, 1789, and joined the Home Circuit.

Very early in his career he had the good fortune to extract a flattering eulogium from Lord Kenyon in a case which he argued in the court of King's Bench. This was so unwonted in the chief justice that it was sure to attract attention; and he consequently soon received ample employment. Though superficial in legal knowledge, his readiness of comprehension and fluency of speech enabled him to avail himself of his early success, and his increase of business warranted him in accepting the degree of the coif in 1800. His services were in great requisition, in all the courts of Westminster Hall; and he sometimes appeared on important criminal trials.

He entered parliament in 1802 as member for Petersfield, and took a prominent part in its proceedings, particularly in reference to naval affairs and public accounts. He was one of the acting managers on the impeachment of Lord Melville, and, with Sir Samuel Romilly, answered the legal objections taken by the counsel for the defence. In 1814 he represented Bridport; and from that time till his death, leaving the liberal party with whom he had hitherto acted, he was a zealous supporter of conservative principles.

In 1806 he had been appointed one of the king's serjeants, and recorder of Guildford; and in Michaelmas 1813 he was selected as solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales, then regent, succeeding in 1816 to the attorney-generalship to his royal highness. With that prince he was a great favourite; and by the royal patronage he became successively chief justice of Chester and a judge of the King's Bench, the latter promotion taking place in December 1818. He was knighted in the following June.

After sitting in that court rather more than five years, he was advanced in April 1824 to the head of the Court of Common Pleas, from which his increasing infirmities obliged him to retire in June 1829. By the continuance of royal favour he was at the same time raised to the peerage as Baron Wynford, the title being taken from an estate he had purchased in Dorsetshire; and he was then appointed a deputy speaker of the House of Lords. In that house and in the privy council he took his due proportion of labour in the judicial business, as often as his violent attacks of the gout enabled him to attend. In the debates he strenuously opposed the Reform Bill through all its stages, and was always found in opposition to the party who supported it. He lived for sixteen years after his retirement, and died at his seat called Leasons in Kent on March 3, 1845.

Lord Wynford's countenance, though not handsome, was very attractive. It indicated great cordiality and good humour, with much intelligence; but it also showed something of a hasty temperament. As an advocate, he was fluent if not eloquent, acute if not learned, and his zeal for his clients left no means untried for insuring their success. As a judge, he was apt to form hasty and questionable opinions, and when presiding at Nisi Prius to lean in his summing up so much to one side that he was nicknamed the 'judge advocate.' Though he was remarkable for the clearness and terseness of his decisions, he was considered by the profession as an indifferent judge, and brought himself into bad odour as well by the political bias he often displayed as by his occasional irritability and intemperance on the bench. His disposition as a man was essentially kind, amiable and charitable.

He married very early in life Mary Ann the daughter of Jerome Knapp, Esq., Haberdashers' Hall, London, and had her ten children.

BETHELL, RICHARD (LORD WESTBURY) was born at Bradford in Wiltshire June 30, 1800, and his father, Dr. Richard Bethell, who was a descendant from an old Welsh family of Ap-Ithell, practised as a physician at Bristol. From Bristol Grammar School he proceeded at the age of fourteen to Wadham College, Oxford, which he was afterwards elected fellow having distinguished himself by attaining place in the first class in classics, and the second class in mathematics. He received his B.A. degree when only eighteen, then became for some time a favourite in the university. Entering the Middle Temple, he was called to the bar on November 28, 1823.

For seventeen years he laboured as junior counsel in the Court of Chancery where his practice was very considerable and in 1840 he attained the rank of queen's counsel, in which character he soon became a most prominent leader. His university employment him as their advocate; and he filled the office of vice-chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster. When engaged in his vicarious duties as a barrister he devoted himself to the improvement of the mode of legal education, his exertions in which are beyond all praise. He was a member of all the societies of the committee of the benchers of all the faculties, of which he was the mover and selected chairman; and of rules was issued for the admission, regulation, and instruction of the students, which promise the most satisfactory results.

From 1851 till his elevation to the peerage he was a member of the House of Commons, at first for the borough of Aylesbury, and then for that of Wolverhampton. Throughout his senatorial career he supported the liberal party; and on the retirement of Lord Derby's ministry he was knighted on his appointment as solicitor-general, on December 28, 1852, and was nominated attorney-general in November 1856; but resigning in February 1858 on the change of ministry, he resumed it sixteen months after, in June 1859, on his party returning to power. On June 26, 1861, he succeeded to the office of lord high chancellor. During the existence of the ministry of which he formed a part he resigned his high position, under circumstances which, though he was acquitted of personal corruption by the two houses of parliament, his judges in those houses were of opinion exhibited so much laxity of principle, and so little consideration for the public welfare, that in those respects he was a fit object for their censure; and the general feeling of the people confirmed their decision. Without entering into the details of the cases of Edmunds and Wilde, upon which the charges were founded, or of the disclosures then made, Lord Westbury found it was impossible to contend against the resolution of parliament, and he accordingly resigned the Seal on July 7, 1865.

By his wife, the daughter of Robert Abraham, Esq., he has a numerous family.

BEYNVILL, RICHARD DE (OR BAYVILL), was of a knightly family of the county of Huntingdon, where he held lands of the honor of the Earl of Chester. He was appointed one of the justices itinerant for that county and Cambridgeshire in 9 Henry III., and died in 1238, 23 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 77, 209.)

BICKERSTETH, HENRY (LORD LANGDALE), was born on June 18, 1783, at Kirkby Lonsdale, and was the third of five sons of Mr. Henry Bickersteth, a medical practitioner of considerable repute in that town, and of Elizabeth, the daughter of Mr. John Batty, a farmer of the same place, and the sister of Dr. Batty, afterwards so eminent as a physician in London. To the moral and religious feelings impressed on his mind by his mother he always ascribed what was praiseworthy in his future career. After concluding his studies at the Free Grammar School of his native place, with the highest prize, he entered his father's business at Midsummer 1797, and in the autumn of the next year went to London to walk the hospitals under the guidance of his uncle

Dr. Batty. To perfect himself in the science of his profession, he went to Edinburgh in October 1801, and had the advantage of attending the lectures of the eminent professors who then presided over the medical schools. He became a member of the Royal Medical Society, and distinguished himself in their debates by his eloquence, ingenuity, and energy. In the summer of the next year he was called home for the purpose of supplying the place of his father, whose health required a temporary absence from his professional duties. This experience confirmed his dislike to becoming a mere country practitioner, and induced him to decline his father's offer to give up the whole of his business to him.

With the intent, therefore, of preparing himself for the London practice of a physician, he entered Caius College, Cambridge, in October of that year, with a scholarship on Mr. Hewitt's foundation. The application to his studies there was so intense that he was seized with a serious illness when he went to London at the end of the term. His recovery was slow, and total relaxation became necessary to insure it. With this view his uncle Dr. Batty, fully satisfied as to his qualifications for the office, recommended him as medical attendant to the family of the Earl of Oxford, then on a tour in Italy, whom he started to join at the end of March 1803.

While at Florence the war with France broke out, and he and his noble friends had some difficulty in escaping the clutches of Bonaparte in his disgraceful seizure of all English travellers. After remaining some little time at Venice, Vienna, and Dresden, the continuance of the war induced Lord Oxford to return home, when his lordship experienced the benefit of the medical selection he had made, by being safely brought through a serious illness under the care and skill of his youthful adviser. Though proving himself a great proficient in the science, and taking great delight in the investigation of its mysteries, as is particularly apparent in his correspondence with Dr. Henderson, Mr. Bickersteth retained his dislike to the profession, and, determining to relinquish it, returned to Cambridge in 1805, where, after abandoning a passing desire to enter the army, he resolved to study for a degree in arts; though his long absence was much against him, and his want of practice in mathematics raised a temporary obstacle to his success. But his indefatigable industry and quick perception overcame all disadvantages, so that in January 1808 he graduated B.A. as senior wrangler and senior Smith's prizeman, in a year when he had no mean competitors to conquer, his principal opponents being Miles Bland, Bishop Blomfield, and Professor Sedgwick. He was of course immediately rewarded with a fellowship in his college; and, fixing upon the law as his new profession, he entered the Inner Temple as a student in 1808, and became a pupil of Mr. Bell, one of the most eminent counsel in the Court of Chancery.

The tendency of his mind was always to the liberal side of politics, and though his extreme opinions were much moderated by witnessing the tyrannical sequence of the French revolution, he still continued something more than a whig. Becoming also a friend and disciple of Jeremy Bentham, Mr. Bickersteth received from his conversation the first impressions of the necessity of amendment in the administration of the laws. He was thus enlisted into the band of law reformers, eventually producing those efforts to which his name is allied.

He was called to the bar on November 22, 1811; and for the next three or four years he had to contend against the usual slow progress of a barrister at the outset of his career, and even meditated giving up the profession rather than put his father to further expense. His circumstances were somewhat improved in 1814 by becoming a senior fellow of his college, and his business gradually increased. But his known connection with the philosopher Bentham and the politician Burdett, then deemed radicals, and particularly his support of the latter against Sir Samuel Romilly at the Westminster election of 1818, for a time proved an impediment to his success, which, however, by steady perseverance and moderation he was soon enabled to remove.

With his business his reputation advanced, and he was considered so conversant with the practice of his court, and so alive to its defects, that he was called upon to give evidence before the commissioners appointed in 1824 to investigate the subject. In his examination, which lasted four days, he boldly pointed out the evils that attached to the whole system, and suggested several remedies, some of which were eventually adopted. His evidence, though thought by some to be too comprehensive and visionary, was generally regarded with attention and respect, and was particularly lauded by the great oracle of legal reform, Bentham; and from that time all parties really desirous of amending the course of justice applied to him as an authority. Among others Sir John Copley, then attorney-general, requested his assistance in 1820, when preparing a bill for reforming the Court of Chancery, and in 1827, when appointed lord chancellor, recommended him to the king as one of his counsel, which he was appointed in May, and was then called to the bench of his inn.

In this character he was so fully employed that he was at length obliged to give up all practice in other courts, and to confine himself to the Rolls, and he actually refused to break his resolution, though tempted to go into the Exchequer in the great case of Small v. Attwood, by a fee of 3,000 guineas.

When the ministry of Lord Grey came in, and an act passed for erecting a Court of Bankruptcy in 1831, Mr. Bickersteth was offered the chief judgeship of it; but he at once declined it, as he disapproved its establishment, and thought it would be wholly inefficient; and in February 1834 he also refused to accept the vacant office of a baron of the Exchequer, which Lord Lyndhurst, then lord chief baron, was desirous that he should fill, from a conscientious feeling that as an equity judge of that court, for which he was intended, he could not efficiently perform the common-law duties which would in addition devolve upon him. In April of that year he created no slight sensation by a bitter rebuke he gave to Lord Chancellor Brougham in his answer to his lordship's question, What was to prevent the University of London conferring degrees, without the authority of an act of parliament? to which he replied, 'The utter scorn and contempt of the world.' This and the following year were remarkable in Mr. Bickersteth's history. In September he refused the offer of the solicitor-generalship made to him by Lord Brougham, though it was afterwards more regularly urged upon him by Lord Melbourne, the prime minister. On the dissolution of that ministry at the end of the year he was pressed by a large body of electors to stand for the borough of Melbourn, but, finding that he was expected to pledge himself to support certain measures, he not only refused to be nominated, but wrote a letter denouncing the device of pledges and promises from any candidate as both improper and impolitic.

In April of the next year he drew up Lord Melbourne's request, a valuable comprehensive paper containing excellent suggestions for the relief of the lord chancellor, which in a few years led, among other things, to the removal of the business of the Court of Exchequer, and the appointment of two additional vice-chancellors. In August Mr. Bickersteth married Lady Jane Harley, the daughter of his friend and patron the Earl of Oxford; the following December Lord Melbourne communicated to him the intention to point the master of the Rolls, Sir John C. Pepys, lord chancellor, offering Mr. Bickersteth Sir Charles's vacant seat on the Rolls, and urging him to accept it in order that he might in parliament be in carrying into effect his views on the reformation of the courts of equity. Mr. Bickersteth, though agreeing to ac-judicial office, hesitated to do so if united with a peerage. His objections however were ultimately removed, and he consented to enter the House of Lords upon the express terms, fully understood and agreed to by the minister, of perfect political independence. He was sworn of the Privy Council on January 16, 1835, and on the 19th and 23rd he received his two patents, the former constituting him master of the Rolls, and the latter creating him Baron Langdale of Langdale in the county of Westmoreland.

Acting on the understanding on which he had accepted the peerage, he abstained in parliament from interfering in party conflicts as inconsistent with his judicial office to do so; and devoted himself wholly to the consideration of the various schemes of legal reform, not hesitating, when they did not meet his approval, to state his objections, whether introduced by liberal or conservative legislators. To every bill that tended to render justice more easily accessible, and to diminish its expense, he gave a most hearty support, and urged with unanswerable arguments the injustice and impolicy of taxing the suitor with fees towards the establishment and support of the courts and their officers. He himself introduced several bills of great moment, some effecting substantial changes in the law and its administration, and others making important alterations in the mode of transacting Chancery business; but he never undertook the management of any of them without carefully considering whether the evil complained of would be effectually remedied by the supposed improvement, and without taking care that the holders of offices abolished were duly compensated for their loss. It was a pleasure to witness the extreme care he exercised in their preparation, and the great interest and anxiety he evinced in their progress and success. He lived to see the good effects of many of the measures he promoted.

As a judge he was remarkable for the strictness of proof he required on every point submitted to his decision, for the unwearied attention he paid to all the arguments urged on either side, and for the careful preparation and logical correctness of his judgments. By his own dignified example he made his court a model of propriety and respectful demeanour, and all attempts at professional fraud, or trickery, or any inexcusable neglect, were effectually suppressed by the dread of his stern denunciation. His judicial duties were not confined to his own court, but were greatly increased by his attendance on the judicial committee of the Privy Council, of which he was often the presiding member. The case which occasioned him most trouble and anxiety there was that of the Rev. Mr.

Gorham v. the Bishop of Exeter (Dr. Phillpotts), relative to the bishop's refusal to institute Mr. Gorham to the vicarage of Brampton Speke, on account of a certain difference of opinion on a disputed point of doctrine with relation to baptism. The judgment pronounced by the committee, with the concurrence of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, in favour of Mr. Gorham, was prepared by Lord Langdale, in a very learned and elaborate paper, and naturally occasioned a severe controversy between the parties interested on one side or the other.

Not contented with these labours, he devoted himself with indefatigable industry to cleanse the Augean stable of the public records, which justly gained for him the title of Father of Record Reform. His continued endeavours through the whole of his official life to induce the government to devote the proper attention to, and to provide the requisite funds for, this important and national object, are fully recorded in the memoir of Mr. Duffus Hardy, who was one of his most efficient assistants in the undertaking. The perseverance with which he pressed the necessity of providing an adequate repository for the preservation of the monuments of the kingdom, and the unwearied patience with which he met the difficulties and answered the repeated objections raised, were at last rewarded by the adoption of the plan he proposed. By the application of his discriminating judgment and patient perseverance he subjected the chaotic mass to an arrangement which, with the facility of reference afforded, must ever claim the gratitude of the statesman, the biographer, and the historian.

As a trustee and commissioner of the British Museum, and as the head of the Registration and Conveyancing Commission, he devoted himself with the same ardour to the several questions submitted to them respectively.

This continued exercise of the brain had such a detrimental effect on his health that when, on Lord Cottenham's retirement in May 1850, the office of lord chancellor was pressed upon him, he refused to accept it, convinced that he could not adequately perform the multifarious duties attached to the place, nor hope to effect the reforms which he contemplated. But during the chancellor's previous illness Lord Langdale undertook his duties as speaker of the House of Lords, and on his resignation consented to act as the head of the commission temporarily issued for the custody of the Great Seal till a lord chancellor was appointed. The Seal was delivered to him and to Sir Lancelot Shadwell and Baron Rolfe on June 19, 1850, and they held it till July 15, when Sir Thomas Wilde was appointed lord chancellor and created Lord

Truro. The great labour thrown on Lord Langdale by this addition to his ordinary duties, with the unfortunate illness by which his brother commissioner Sir Lancelot Shadwell was incapacitated, had a palpable effect on his health and strength, and brought on a serious illness. On his partial recovery he found that he must relieve himself from the burden of office, which, with the sincere regret of his bar, affectionately expressed by Mr. (afterwards Lord Justice) Turner, he resigned on March 23, 1851, after more than fifteen years of judicial life. No sooner was the sorrowful parting completed than his health wholly succumbed, and in three weeks he closed his mortal career. He died at Tunbridge Wells on April 18, 1851, and was buried in the Temple Church.

A man with higher principle, greater integrity, more fixed in his purpose to do right, more unwearied in his attempts to discover the truth, more regardless of self, and with a kinder nature, it would be difficult to find. Whether in the capacity of an advocate, a judge, a legislator, or in the sacred seclusion of private and domestic life, he secured the admiration, the respect, and the devoted affection of all.

He left no son to inherit his honours; but his lady and an only daughter still survive to venerate his memory.

BIDUN, WALTER DE, is inserted in Dugdale's list as chancellor to Henry II.; but, on looking to the authority to which he refers, it seems more likely that he was chancellor to the King of Scotland. All doubt, however, of Walter de Bidun being a Scottish chancellor will be removed by the fact that he is a witness, as chancellor, to a charter, dated Jedworth, of William the Lion, King of Scotland, granted to William de Veteri Ponte. (Robertson's Index to Scottish Royal Charters, 179, No. 137.)

BIGOT, ROGER, second Earl of Norfolk, was the grandson of a Norman knight of the same name, whose lordships are recorded in Domesday Book as six in Essex and 117 in Suffolk, and the eldest son of Hugh, who was created Earl of Norfolk in 6 Stephen.

Richard I. appointed him one of the ambassadors to Philip, King of France, to make arrangements for the crusade; and during his sovereign's absence on that enterprise he supported his authority against the attempts of Prince John.

His name appears on the records as a justicier after the return of King Richard from the Holy Land, fines being levied before him from the fifth year of that reign till the third of John. (Madox, ii. 21.) That king sent him to summon William, King of Scotland, to do homage at Lincoln, and made various grants in his favour. But towards the end of the reign he was imprisoned on some account or other, as his wife Aelina fined in fifty marks for his release, the payment of part of which was excused, in 15 John. (Rot. de Fin. 465.) In that year he seems to have been restored to his sovereign's good graces, as he attended him into Poitou; and for a fine of two thousand marks obtained a respite for his whole life from the service of 120 knights, and from all arrears of scutages. (Madox, i. 190, 687.)

In 17 John he joined the barons, and was one of the twenty-five who were appointed to enforce the observance of Magna Charta. His name was accordingly included in the sentence of excommunication fulminated by Pope Innocent III., and his lands were cruelly ravaged among the last attempts of the tyrannic king. In the first year of the reign of Henry III. he returned to his allegiance; and, being again taken into favour, a disputed question between the king and him as to the stewardship of the household was finally settled on May 1221. (Rot. Claus. i. 322, 455, 469.)

Before the following August he died, and was succeeded by his son Hugh, who son Roger, the fourth earl, is the subject of the next article. (Wendover, iii. 297, 353, 381.)

BIGOT, ROGER, the fourth Earl of Norfolk, and the grandson of the preceding Roger, was at the head of the commission of justices itinerant into Essex and Hertfordshire, issued in 1234, 18 Henry III. He was son of Hugh the third earl, and Matilda his wife, one of the daughters of William Mareschall, Earl of Pembroke. His father died in 1225, 9 Henry III., when he, being a minor, was placed under the wardship of William Longspee, Earl of Salisbury. The following May he married Isabel, the sister of Alexander, King of Scotland, to whom, on the Earl of Salisbury's death in the following year, the guardianship of Roger was transferred. (Excerpt. c. Fin. i. 125, 128, 168; Rot. Claus. ii. 5.)

He became eminent for his knightly skill, and was with the king in France 1242. When the barons determined in 1245, no longer to submit to the oppressive exactions made on the kingdom by the pope, he headed those who addressed a letter of remonstrance to the general council then sitting at Lyons, and joined in the dismissal of the papal nuncio from the shores of England.

By the death of the last of the family of William Mareschall, Earl of Pembroke, in 1245, their inheritance devolved on five sisters, of whom his mother, Matilda, was the eldest. To her share the duchy of Normandy fell, which she transferred to Roger Bigot as her eldest son, and soon after confirming him in the office of great council held at Westminster in May 1258, when, on the barons appearing in complete armour, the king asked of them, 'Am I then your prisoner?' 'No, sir,' replied Roger Bigot, 'but by your partiality to foreigners, and your own prodigality, the realm is involved in misery. Wherefore we demand that the powers of government be delegated to a committee of barons and prelates, who may correct abuses and enact salutary laws.' The provisions of Oxford were the consequence of this procedure, under which his brother the under-mentioned Hugh was nominated chief justiciary. After the battle of Lewes, Earl Roger was appointed by the barons governor of the castle of Oxford.

He died in 1270, leaving no issue.

BIGOT, HUGH, the younger brother of the above-mentioned Roger, fourth Earl of Norfolk, married two wives, the first of whom was Joanna the daughter of Robert Burnet, and the second Joanna the daughter of Nicholas de Stuteville and widow of Hugh Wake.

He received many marks of the king's favour, being made chief ranger of the forest of Farnedale in 39 Henry III., and governor of the castle of Pickering in the next year. He accompanied the king in 41 Henry III. in his expedition against the Welsh. On June 22, in the next year he was selected by the council nominated at the parliament of Oxford to fill the high station of chief justiciary, and at the same time the Tower of London was committed to his charge (Brady, App. 218), to which was afterwards added the command of Dover Castle, and the chamberlainship of Sandwich. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 31.)

In 1259 he selected Roger de Thurkelby and Gilbert de Preston, two of the principal judges, as his companions on a circuit from county to county to administer justice throughout the kingdom; and during the king's absence abroad, from November 1259 till April 1260, he attested all the mandates on the fine roll. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 319-324.) He is described by Matthew Paris as 'militem illustrem, et legum terræ peritum, qui officium justitiarum strenue peragens, nullatenus permittat jus regni vacillare.'

Although no complaint was made against him, and he seems to have been zealous and active in the execution of the duties of his office, he resigned it about the end of 1260, possibly in order that the council of barons might carry into effect their desire to make it an annual appointment, but more probably because he was dissatisfied with their proceedings, as he afterwards joined the royal party. He was immediately succeeded by Hugh le Despenser, one of his coadjutors on the council.

He was engaged in the battle of Lewes on May 14, 1264, on the king's side; and when the rout began, he escaped with the Earl of Warren and others. Their flight is thus described by Peter Langtoft:—

The Erle of Warene, I wote, he scaped over the se,

And Sir Hugh Bigote als with the erle fled he.

After the battle of Evesham, in the following year, he was replaced in the government of the castle of Pickering.

His death occurred about November 1266; his son Roger on the death of his uncle Roger became Earl of Norfolk, but dying childless in 1307, the title became extinct.

BILLING, THOMAS. Fuller (ii. 166) inserts Sir Thomas Billing among the worthies of Northamptonshire, where are two neighbouring villages of the name, adding that at Ashwell in that county the judge 'had his habitation in great state.' Unsupported by any authority yet discovered, Lord Campbell (Ch. Justices, i. 145) represents him as in every respect a contemptible and worthless person. In conformity with this view of his character, he remarks that Fuller 'is silent both as to his ancestors and descendants.' This omission, however, is not uncommon with Fuller; nor is there anything in his account of Billing to indicate, as Lord Campbell asserts, that he 'is evidently ashamed of introducing such a character among worthies.' Fuller was not a man to conceal a truth, though discreditable to the subject of his notice; and of this we have two instances immediately following the account of Billing, besides many others throughout his work.

The family was of great antiquity in the county. A Henry was certified to hold a sixth part of a knight's fee in Rushden in the time of Henry III.; a Robert Billing of Cuquenho was vicar of Brayfield in 1348; and a John Billing, probably the father of the judge, was one of the feoffees of Sir William Porter, knight, and presented to the rectory of Collyweston in 1430.

No certain memorial of Billing's ancestors or of the personal history of his early years has been found; but no authority exists for the supposition made by Lord Campbell that he had been 'the clerk of an attorney;' nor if he had been, would it justify the improbable conclusion, which his lordship invents, that he would thus necessarily become well acquainted with 'the less reputable parts of the law.'

He was a member of Gray's Inn, and if MS. preserved in that society is to be taken as authority in this instance, it appears not merely that 'he contrived to keep his terms and to be called to the bar,' as Lord Campbell insinuates, but that he was so well reputed as to be made a reader in that house.

That he distinguished himself in his early professional career appears certain, since he was returned in 1448 by the citizens of London as their representative in parliament, and was elected their recorder on September 21, 1450, an office which he resigned at the end of four years on account 'of his manifold labours, as well at Westminster as at the assizes in different counties.' The corporation voted him a present of 'cloth engreved . . . for his diligent services in the office of recorder,' and retained him as one of their counsel. (City List of Recorders.)

If this does not raise a sufficient doubt of Lord Campbell's assertion, that his business was 'not of the most creditable description,' further proof may be found in a letter in the 'Paston Correspondence' (i. 53), that he had already acquired a high reputation, that his advice was deemed valuable, and that his personal position was such as to warrant an intimate intercourse with the families of Paston and Lord Grey de Ruthyn. So high indeed was his reputation that Bishop Grey appointed him his chief justice in the Isle of Ely. (Cole's MSS. xxv. 47.)

Billing was summoned to assume the degree of the coif in 1453, and was appointed one of the king's serjeants in 1458, 36 Henry VI., a month after the hollow accommodation between the two contending parties in the state.

Lord Campbell quotes a treatise of Billing on the subject of the claims of the royal antagonists, without stating where it is to be found, and asserts that the Rolls of Parliament mention his name as appearing 'at the bar of the House of Lords as counsel for Henry VI., leading the attorney and solicitor-general,' and that on that occasion it was 'remarked that his fire had slackened much, and that he was very complimentary to the Duke of York, who since the battle of Northampton had been virtually master of the kingdom.' On referring to the Rolls of Parliament, however, no such entry is recorded, but, on the contrary, it appears that not only the judges, but the king's serjeants and attorney, none of whom are mentioned by name, excused themselves altogether from giving any opinion or advice on the question. (Rot. Parl. v. 376.)

Lord Campbell states, without giving his authority, that on the accession of Edward IV. 'instantly Sir Thomas Billing sent in his adhesion: and such zeal did he express in favour of the new dynasty that his patent of king's serjeant was renewed, and he became principal law adviser to Edward IV.' He then designates him as 'this unprincipled adventurer,' although Coke speaks of him among 'other excellent men' who flourished at the time. (Preface to First Inst.) Mr. Serjeant Billing did nothing more than exactly what not only the other serjeants, but every one of the judges except Fortescue, very naturally and very properly did on the change of dynasty,—he retained his legal position in the courts of law. In the very first parliament of Edward IV. we find that, besides Billing, the famous Lyttelton (who is named before him) and William Laken, serjeants in precisely the same position, were nominated by the parliament as referees in a case between the Bishop of Winchester and his tenants; but the Rolls do not supply any authority for the very improbable fact which Lord Campbell introduces, that Serjeant Billing 'assisted in framing the acts by which Sir John Fortescue and the principal Lancastrians, his patrons, were attainted;' or that he took an active part in the subsequent measures of hostility against King Henry and Queen Margaret.

No materials exist which would justify us in ascribing to Billing the private suggestions of which Lord Campbell makes him the author, or in judging of the correctness of the motives assigned for his elevation to the bench. Neither is any evidence to be found of his presumed dissatisfaction with the office of puisne justice, nor of his resolution that 'mere scruples of conscience should not hold him back' from the woolsack. The simple fact is that on August 9, 1464, 4 Edward IV., he was added to the three judges of which the Court of King's Bench then consisted.

Lord Campbell, quoting from Baker's 'Chronicle' and Hale's 'Pleas of the Crown,' mentions Billing as the judge who tried Walter Walker for saying he would make his son 'heir to the Crown,' meaning his inn so called; and he gives the judge ruling on the case, with the conviction and execution of the unfortunate prisoner. It is curious, however, that his lords' when five pages before he cites Sir Nicholas Throgmorton's address to Chief Justice Bromley, omits there the chief justice's answer referring to this very 'Crown case'; by which it appears that Mark was the judge, and that an acquittal was the consequence of his honest ruling. (State Trials, i. 804.)

But if this omission is curious, it is remarkable that neither Baker nor Stow states the case as occurring in Billing's time, and further, that Stow (p. 415) gives the precise date of Walker's trial—viz., 12, 1460, more than four years before Billing was on the bench; adding that the case was against him was for words spoken against the title of King Edward when he was claimed; and Fabyan (p. 639) credits him in the date.

On January 23, 1468-9, 8 Edward IV., Billing received his promotion to the Justice of the King's Bench. 'T and conviction of Sir Thomas Burdet, for wishing a favourite buck of his which the king had killed in hunting, horns and all, was in the king's belly, is said by Lord Campbell to have taken place before Chief Justice Billing in the very next term after his appointment, and that 'a rumour was propagated that the late virtuous chief justice (Markham) had been displaced because he had refused to concur in it.'

It has not been discovered whence Lord Campbell extracted the ruling of Billing in this or in Walker's case, which he has printed with inverted commas as quotations; but undoubtedly his lordship could not have been aware that Burdet's case had been lately referred to in Westminster Hall; that the record of his attainder was searched for, and found in the 'Baga de Secretis'; and that this labour might have been spared by looking into Croke's 'Charles' (p. 120), where the proceedings against him are published. The result of all this would have proved that the whole story of the buck and the belly was a figment, and that the charge against Burdet was for conspiring to kill the king and the prince by casting their nativity, foretelling the speedy death of both, and scattering papers containing the prophecy among the people. By the record it appears also that, instead of the trial taking place in 'the very next term' after Billing became chief justice, no part of Burdet's crime was committed before 1474, and he was not tried till 1477.

Little more than two years after Billing had attained the chief judicial seat Henry VI. was restored to the crown, which he retained for about six months, when he was again expelled by his successful rival. It is a strong proof of the seat of justice being considered exempt from the consequences of the civil strife, that on both these occasions the judges, with a few exceptions, were all replaced in their seats by new patents issued immediately after each of these kings had gained the ascendancy; so that all the conjectures as to Billing's deportment at either crisis in which Lord Campbell indulges must be deemed applicable, if at all, to his brethren as well as to himself. It seems more natural to infer, from Billing's double re-installment, that he had not made himself obnoxious to either party by extreme partiality or 'outrageous loyalty.'

Sir Thomas Billing presided in his court up to the day of his death, which took place on May 5, 1481. He was buried in Bittlesdon Abbey, under a large blue marble slab, on which are the figures of the chief justice in his official robes, and his lady. This slab, after the dissolution of the monastery, was removed to the church of Wappenham, in Northamptonshire, where it now remains.

The name of the wife here represented with him is Katerina, the daughter of Roger Gifford, of Twyford in Bucks, a junior branch of the noble family of Gifford, Earls of Buckingham, whom he married so early as 1447. His second wife was equally well allied, being Mary, the daughter and heir of Robert Wesenham, of Conington in Huntingdonshire, whose first husband was Thomas Lacy, and her second, William Cotton, of Redware in Staffordshire.

By his first wife Sir Thomas had five sons and four daughters; and there is another slab recording the death of Thomas, his son and heir, in 1500, who left no male issue, but whose elder daughter, Joan, married John Haugh, the after-mentioned judge, and whose younger daughter married Richard Tresham, of Newton, the progenitor of the conspirator in the Gunpowder Plot. (Baker's Northampton, 730; and ex inf. of R. E. Waters, Esq., a connection of the family.)

BINGHAM, RICHARD. This family was established at Carcolton, in the hundred of Bingham, in the county of Nottingham. Richard was a younger son, and pursued the study of the law. He was called to the degree of serjeant-at-law on February 14, 1443, 21 Henry VI. His last appearance as an advocate in the Year Book is in Easter, 22 Henry VI.; and there is certain proof of his advance as a judge of the King's Bench before February 10, 1447, 25 Henry VI, he being among the judges who acted as triers of petitions in the parliament that met on that day. (Rot. Parl. i. 129.) On the deposition of Henry VI. in 1461 he was retained by Edward IV., and was continued in his place during the temporary restoration of Henry in 1470-1, being then described as a knight. On the return of Edward IV., however, he was not included in the new patent, being probably omitted by his own desire, as he must have then been considerably advanced in age.

He married Margaret, the daughter of Sir Baldwin Frevill, of Middleton in the county of Warwick, and widow of Sir Hugh Willoughby, of Wollaton in Nottinghamshire; and dying on May 22, 1476, he was buried at Middleton, where there is a monument representing him in his judicial robes. His son Richard married Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Remston, uncle by the half blood to Sir William Plumpton. In the 'Plumpton Correspondence' is a letter from the judge to the latter knight, in which, 'be the advise of my master, Sir John Markham, chief justice,' he proposes that a variance between Sir William and Henry Pierpont should be submitted to their arbitration. (Archæol. Journ. ii. 250; Thoroton's Notts, i. 240; Plumpton Corr. 3, 250.)

BIRCH, JOHN, would at first sight appear to have been the earliest puisne baron of the Exchequer who was selected from among the serjeants-at-law; but a little closer enquiry makes it very doubtful whether he was the John Birch who took the degree of the coif. There were evidently at that time two members of Gray's Inn of that name. In autumn 1551 a John Birch was appointed reader, and was re-elected in Lent 1552; and there was also a John Birch who held the same office in autumn 1558, and again in Lent 1560, being on the latter occasion called 'duplex reader,' which could not have been his title if all the four readers had been the same man. One of these John Birches was made a serjeant on April 19, 1559 (Machyn's Diary, 373), and consequently then became a member of Serjeants' Inn; so that it could not have been he who was the reader in Gray's Inn in Lent 1560. It follows, therefore, that the reader of 1551 must have been the serjeant, and he may possibly have been, as Dugdale designates him, 'afterwards baron of the Exchequer.' But as, according to the baron's monumental inscription, he was born about the year 1515, it is far more probable that he should have been the reader of 1558, when he would have been in his forty-fourth year, than that he should have attained that rank in 1551, when he would have been only thirty-six. As it was not then the custom for the barons to be serjeants, and as there is no fact to show that any change took place on this occasion, there is little doubt that Dugdale applied the designation to the wrong man, and that John Birch the reader of 1558 and 1560, and not John Birch the serjeant, was the person who was promoted to the bench of the Exchequer on May 9, 1564, and who sat there for the next eighteen years; especially as in his patent of appointment he is described as 'Arm.,' and not as serjeant. (Rot. Pat. 6 Eliz. p. 8; Cal. State Papers [1547-80], 594.)

He died on May 30, 1581, at the age of sixty-six, and was buried in the old church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, where this unique inscription (Stow's London, 867) was placed on his tomb:—

Interr'd the Corps of Baron Birch lies here,
Of Greyes Inn sometime, by Degree, Esquire.
In Chequer Eighteen Yeers a Judge he was,
Till Soule from aered Body, his did passe.
Alive his Wife, Eliza, doth remaine
Of Stydfolke stocke; one Sonne, and Daughters
Twaine,

She bore to him: the eldest, in his Life,
He gave to Thomas Boyer, for his Wife.
Hisbody sleeps till Angels Trumpe shall sound;
God grant we all may ready then be found.

BIRCH, JOHN, of the ancient family of Birch, of Ardwick, near Manchester, was the nephew of the famous Colonel John Birch, who in the Great Rebellion distinguished himself on the parliament side, and the son of the Rev. Thomas Birch, rector of Hampton Bishop in Herefordshire, and afterwards vicar of Preston in Lancashire, by his wife Mary. He commenced his legal career at Gray's Inn in 1680, but in 1686 he transferred himself to the Middle Temple, by which society he was called to the bar in 1687. He was elected for Weobly in the parliament of 1700, and in all the subsequent parliaments, except one, till his death. The only mention of his name in parliamentary history is connected with a disreputable transaction. He had been appointed one of the commissioners for the sale of the estates forfeited by the rebels of 1715, and in reference to those belonging to the Earl of Derwentwater had assisted in a most corrupt and illegal transfer. The transaction was declared void, and for the notorious breach of trust Birch was expelled the house in March 1732. He however had sufficient influence with his constituents to be re-elected in the new parliament that met in January 1735, but he died before the end of the year.

In the progress of his profession he had been included in the batch of serjeants called in 1708, and before the discovery of the above disgraceful transaction had been on December 11, 1729, made curstior baron of the Exchequer, in which office he remained till his death in October 1735.

After the death in 1701 of his first wife Sarah, the daughter of his uncle Colonel John Birch, he married secondly Letitia Hampden, of St. Andrew's, Holborn; but had no children by either.

BIRCH, THOMAS, descended from the family of Birch, of Birchfield in the par of Handworth, near Birmingham, who flourished in the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was born at Handborne in the same neighbourhood in 1640, and was the eldest son of George Birch, Mary his wife, the daughter of Thomas Foster, Esq. Destined for the law, he took his barrister's degree at the Inner Temple, and, receiving the coif in June 1730, made one of the king's serjeants on November 23, 1745. He is so named going up with the judges' address to the king on occasion of the rebellion, and received the honour of knighthood. In the year he served the office of high sherrif of Staffordshire, and in June following was raised to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas, and retained his office eleven years. He resided at Southwark near London, and died on March 1, 1756, leaving by his wife Sarah, daughter and co-heir of J. Teshmaker, Esq., three sons and two daughters. (Gent. Mag.) was born at Levenside in Dumbartonshire in 1813, being the second son of John Blackburn, Esq., of Killearn in Stirlingshire. After passing through Eton College he matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was eighth wrangler in 1835, and took his degree of M.A. in 1838. In Michaelmas Term of that year he was called to the bar by the society of the Inner Temple, and joined the Northern Circuit, attending the Liverpool Sessions. Though with no considerable business as a counsel, he was esteemed a sound lawyer, and after above twenty years' experience at the bar he was appointed a judge of the Queen's Bench in June 1859, and received the customary knighthood.

BLACKSTONE, WILLIAM. The name of Blackstone is inseparably connected with the law of England. What Lyttelton and his crabbed expositor were to our legal ancestors, Blackstone is to modern students; and though some of the more earnest or more ambitious of them may seek honours by endeavouring to fathom the mysteries of the 'Tenures,' the οι πολλοι of the profession are content to earn an easy degree by mastering the more attractive lessons conveyed in the 'Commentaries.' So popular have they become that, where the study was confined in former times to those who pursued it as an avocation, few men of rank or fortune now consider their education complete without gaining an insight into the constitution of the country through Blackstone's easy and perspicuous pages, and abridgments are even introduced into schools for the instruction of the young. Whether this facility is productive of better lawyers must be left as a question for our critical descendants.

William Blackstone was the fourth and posthumous son of Charles Blackstone, a respectable silkman in Cheapside, London, descended from a family originally settled in the neighbourhood of Salisbury. His mother, who was Mary, daughter of Lovelace Bigg, Esq., of Chilton Foliot in Wiltshire, also died before he was twelve years old. He was born on July 10, 1723, and from his birth his education was undertaken by the brother of his mother, Mr. Thomas Bigg, an eminent surgeon in Newgate Street. In 1730 he was put to school at the Charter-house, and in 1735 was admitted on the foundation there, becoming the head of the school at the age of fifteen, and distinguishing himself not only in the customary oration in commemoration of the founder, which he recited on December 12, 1738, but also by obtaining Mr. Benson's prize medal for verses on Milton. He had in the preceding month been entered at Pembroke College, Oxford, and elected to a Charter-house exhibition, to which in February following was added one of Lady Holford's exhibitions, unani- mously given by the fellows of the college.

In the university he did not confine himself to the classics, but devoted himself to those sciences the investigation of which tended so much to the simplicity and clearness of his writings. Among these he was peculiarly fond of architecture, and before he was of age he composed a treatise on the subject, which, though never published, was much admired. His partiality for the Muses, already shown by his prize poem on Milton, and afterwards exhibited by several elegant fugitive pieces, he found too fascinating and engrossing for the profession to which he was destined; and, resolving upon 'total abstinence,' he wrote, on entering the Middle Temple, a 'Farewell to his Muse,' in strains which induced many to regret he should leave the flowery path of poetry for the more rugged and sterile ways of the law. Notwithstanding this formal adieu, he could not altogether refrain; and among other pieces he wrote some verses on the death of the Prince of Wales in 1751, which were published in the Oxford collection as the composition of his brother-in-law, James Clitherow. He amused himself also by annotating Shakspeare, and communicated his notes to Mr. Steevens, who inserted them in his last edition of the plays.

He was admitted a member of the Middle Temple on November 20, 1741, and was called to the bar on November 28, 1746. But in the intervals of his attendance on the courts he still continued his academical studies at the university, where he was elected in November 1743 into the Society of All Souls, of which he was afterwards admitted a fellow, and delivered the anniversary speech in commemoration of the founder. There also he took his degree of B.C.L. in June 1745. On being appointed bursar of his college he reduced the confusion in which he found the accounts into lucid order, and left a dissertation on the subject for the benefit of his successors. He not only arranged the muniments of their estates, but greatly assisted in the re-edification of the Codrington Library and in the classification of its contents; in gratitude for all which services the college appointed him in 1749 steward of their manors. In 1750 he commenced doctor of civil law, and in the same year published an 'Essay on Collateral Consanguinity,' with the view of removing the inconvenience felt by the college of electing any person who could prove himself of kin to the founder in preference to any other candidate. His arguments had so much weight that soon after a new regulation was introduced limiting the number of founder's kin.

His progress at the bar in the meantime was so slow and unproductive that, though he had been in 1749 elected recorder of Wallingford, he determined in 1753 to retire to his fellowship, and only practise as a provincial counsel. About this time the professorship of civil law in the university became vacant, and the solicitor-general, Mr. Murray (afterwards Lord Mansfield), with a just appreciation of Dr. Blackstone's abilities, strongly recommended him for the place. The Duke of Newcastle promised it, but it is believed was not satisfied with the devotion of the candidate to his grace's politics, for after a short interview with him it was given to another. Mr. Murray was naturally disgusted, and advised the doctor to read the lectures on law he had long been preparing to such students as were disposed to attend him. He at once adopted the plan and met with immediate success. These lectures form the basis of that work upon which is founded his imperishable fame; and, as a guide to those who listened to them, he published in the next year 'An Analysis of the Laws of England,' clearly methodising the intricate science.

One of the earliest fruits of the acknowledged excellence of his lectures was his unanimous election to the first professorship of law, on the foundation established under the recent will of Mr. Charles Viner, the laborious compiler of that 'Abridgment of Law and Equity,' the twenty-four volumes of which must necessarily occupy the shelves of a lawyer's library. The election took place in 1758, only two years after Mr. Viner's death; and the new professor in the same year published, not only his admired 'Introductory Lecture,' but also a treatise entitled 'Considerations on Copyholders,' which produced an act of parliament establishing their rights in the election of members of parliament. The fame of his lectures was so great that he was requested to read them to the Prince of Wales, an application which, though his engagements obliged him to decline it, he so far complied with as to transmit copies for his royal highness's perusal. Justly conscious that his legal character was now established, the professor resumed his attendance at the bar in Michaelmas 1759, but declined the honour of the coat that was offered to him, and afterwards that of chief justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland.

During the whole of this period he had exerted himself in various ways for the benefit of his alma mater in the different positions by which his efficiency was recognised. He was appointed the archbishop's assessor as visitor of All Souls' College: he was elected visitor of Michel's new foundation in Queen's College, and by his tact and management put an end to the disputes which had long frustrated the original intentions of the donor; and as one of the delegates of the 'Clarendon Press' he introduced new regulations, the good effect of which is seen at the present day. From that press one of the earliest and best specimens of its reformed typography was his publication in 1759 of a new edition of the Great Charter and Charter of the Forest, which led to a controversial correspondence on the authenticity of a particular copy between Dean (afterwards Bishop) Lyttleton and him, addressed to the Society of Antiquaries, of which he was a fellow.

By his marriage in 1761 with Sarah, daughter of James Clitherow, Esq., of Boston House, Middlesex, he vacated his fellowship of All Souls'; but in the same year the Earl of Westmoreland, then chancellor of the university, appointed him principal of New Inn Hall, by which he was enabled to continue his residence at Oxford for the delivery of his lectures. In the early part of that year he had been elected member for Hindon in the parliament then called; and also received a patent of precedence in the courts, to which he was well entitled, not only by the fame he had acquired, but by the increase of his business. The specimens preserved of his advocacy prove the excellence of his argumentative powers. In 1763 he was constituted solicitor-general to the queen, and became a bencher of his inn.

To repress the encroachments of pitiful booksellers, who were selling imperfect copies of his lectures, he determined to issue them himself in the form of 'Commentaries on the Law of England,' accordingly published his first volume in 1765, and the three succeeding volumes the four following years; and from time to the present the work has formed a textbook for all students, admired equally for its expositions and the eloquence and purity of its language. With the approval which it deservedly attained, it was likely that it should escape some amount of critical detraction. Some political differences from his views of the principles of the constitution; Dr. Priestley's animadversions on certain of his ecclesiastical positions which were defended by the author to an attack upon him by a member of parliament for some observations he had in the house, which were alleged contrary to the principles laid down; he also published a reply upon the position he had taken, which was very commented on by Junius. Whether opponents or supporters of the doctrine, joined in a universal eulogium on the clearness and beauty of his style, and the richness of his classical allusions, and the elegance with which it enriched a work which had previously repelled the eye by its rugged exterior. It has been will for ever remain, the student's manual; and the continued demand for it has found employment for a long succession of accomplished editors, who by introducing the subsequent changes in the law have made it as necessary and useful to its latest, as it was to its earliest, readers.

In the new parliament of 1768 he was returned for Westbury, but sat in it only two years; for, though from a disgust at political controversy he declined the place of solicitor-general in January 1770, he readily accepted a judgeship which was offered to him in the following month on the death of Mr. Justice Clive. He actually kissed hands as judge of the Common Pleas on February 9; but at the request of Mr. Justice Yates, who wished to escape collision with Lord Mansfield, he consented to take that judge's place in the King's Bench, and again kissed hands for that court on the 16th of the same month, when he received the honour of knighthood. Mr. Justice Yates died four months after, when Mr. Justice Blackstone removed into the Common Pleas, on June 22.

Whoever reads the reports of the period during which he sat upon the bench must acknowledge that he was equally distinguished as a judge as he had been as a commentator. Some of the judgments that he pronounced are remarkable for the learning they display, and for the clearness with which he supports his argument; and in the few instances in which he differed from his colleagues his opinion was in general found to be right.

He devoted his latter years to the improvement of prison discipline, and, in conjunction with Mr. Howard, obtained in 1779 an act of parliament for the establishment of penitentiary houses for criminals. The beneficial effects of the system, though not at first sufficiently perceived, are now universally acknowledged; and the amended condition of our gaols, in the cleanliness, classification, and employment of the prisoners, is the best proof of the wisdom and benevolence of the projectors. In the same year, having agitated the necessity of a surmountation of the judges' salaries, to meet the increased taxation and expenditure of the time, he obtained for them an addition of 400*l.* to their stipend.

Ere he had been long on the bench he experienced the bad effects of the studious habits in which he had injudiciously indulged in his early life, and of his neglect to take the necessary amount of exercise, to which he was specially averse. His corpulence increased, and his strength failed; and, after two or three attacks of distressing illness, he expired on February 14, 1780. He was buried in a vault at St. Peter's Church at Wallingford, where he possessed a seat called 'Priory Place.' A statue of the judge, by Bacon, was placed soon after his death in the hall of All Souls' College.

The Reports which he had taken and arranged for publication, commencing with the term in which he was called to the bar, and continuing with some intervals through the whole period of his life, were given to the world in the year following his death, under the editorship of his brother-in-law and executor, James Clitherow, Esq., with an introduction detailing all the incidents of his career, which from its fairness and impartiality has formed the groundwork of every future memoir. His investigation of the quarrel between Pope and Addison, which was published with the author's permission by Dr. Kippis in the 'Biographia Britannica,' is spoken of by Mr. Disraeli in high terms of praise.

He left behind him seven children, the second of whom held all the university preferments of his father, and eventually succeeded to the estate at Wallingford, which is still possessed by his representative.

Henry Blackstone, who reported cases from 1788 to 1796, was the judge's nephew, and his Reports were more popular than those of his uncle, three editions having been called for.

BLAGGE, ROBERT, was made king's remembrancer in the Exchequer for life on December 6, 1502. He was advanced to the bench of that court as third baron on June 26, 1511, 3 Henry VIII., with confirmation of the patent of remembrancer, the duties of which he still continued to perform by deputy. In 1515 he was one of the surveyors of crown lands and purveyor of the king's revenues, and received a grant of an annuity of eighty marks during pleasure. In that year he obtained a patent of the remembrancership for his son Barnaby for life, in reversion on his own death or other vacancy, which patent was the subject of discussion in Dyer's Reports (197), and the result was that it was annulled and revoked in 3 Elizabeth as insufficient and not good, because Robert Blagge had no legal estate at the time of its date, nor at any other time after he was constituted a baron. He is stated in the case to have been in possession of his place on the bench in 1523-4. He died in London, and was buried in St. Bartholomew's.

He was the son of Stephen Blagge, of an ancient family in Suffolk, and Alice his wife. He afterwards established himself at Broke Montagu in Somersetshire; and by his marriage with Katherine, sole daughter of Thomas Brune, or Brown, he became possessed of Horseman's Place in Dartford, and of considerable property in the county of Kent, which descended to his sons Robert and the above Barnaby. His second wife, Mary, daughter of John, Lord Cobham, survived him, leaving a son, Sir George, who was gentleman of the bedchamber to Henry VII. (Cal. St. Papers [1509], 263; Hasted's Kent, ii. 312, 375; Gage's Suffolk, 520.)

BLASTON, THOMAS DE, was probably of Leicestershire, where there is a hamlet of that name. The custody of the honor of Peverell, in that and two other counties, was committed to a Thomas de Blaston in the reign of Edward I.; and he may have been the father of the baron of the Exchequer. The latter is first mentioned in 3 Edward III., when, under the title of 'clericus regis,' he was constituted the king's chamberlain in Chester. He was raised to the Exchequer bench on November 2, 1332, 6 Edward III. A new patent was granted to him on January 20, 1341, when the king had weeded the court, on his return from Tournay, of those whom he considered to have failed in their duty. He held the rectory of Solihull, in Warwickshire. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 39, ii. 17; Rot. Parl. ii. 105; Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 85.)

BLENCOWE, JOHN, was born in 1642 on the manor of Marston St. Lawrence, on the Oxford border of Northamptonshire, which was granted in the reign of Henry VI. to Thomas Blencowe, whose family originally came from a place of that name in Cumberland. He was the eldest son of Thomas Blencowe, by his wife Anne, the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Francis Savage, of Ripple in Worcestershire. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, admitted a student at the Inner Temple in 1663, called to the bar in 1673, and elected a bencher in 1687. Raised to the degree of the coif in 1689, he was elected member for Brackley in 1690. Though not a prominent debater, he was a firm supporter of the government. To his marriage with Anne, the daughter of Dr. John Wallis, the celebrated Savilian professor of geometry and 'custos archivorum' of Oxford, and the great decipherer of his day, he probably owed in some measure his advancement to the bench. When the professor was offered the deanery of Hereford in 1692 he declined the advancement, but in his letter of refusal he intimated that a favour to his son-in-law would be more acceptable to him. 'I have,' he said, 'a son-in-law, Mr. Serjeant Blencowe, of the Inner Temple, a member of the House of Commons, an able lawyer and not inferior to many of those on the bench, of a good life and great integrity, cordial to the government and serviceable in it.' (Baker's Northamptonshire, 630-646.)

It was not, however, till four years afterwards that, in September 1696, the serjeant was constituted a baron of the Exchequer; but in Michaelmas Term of the following year he was further promoted to the Court of Common Pleas and knighted. He sat in that court for the next five-and-twenty years, though several memorialists of the judge, as Baker, Noble, and others, have represented him as having been removed to the Queen's Bench, for the whole of Queen Anne's reign, from 1702 to 1714. Luttrell (v. 183) records that in the beginning of her reign such removal was intended; but it is clear from Lord Raymond's Reports (760, 1317) that he was then re-appointed to the Common Pleas, and that he was still in that court at the end of it, and he is never mentioned as acting in the Queen's Bench. On the accession of George I. he was replaced in the same seat, and in 1718 he concurred with most of the other judges in favour of the king's prerogative over the marriage and education of the royal family. On June 22, 1722, being then eighty years of age, he obtained permission to resign, and a pension was granted to him for the remainder of his life, which terminated on May 6, 1726. He was buried at Brackley, where there is a monument to his memory.

Sir John is represented as an honest, plain, blunt man, with no brilliancy of genius nor any extraordinary attainments. He outlived his faculties, and conceived that he had discovered the longitude. A story is told of him that once he ordered his servant to lay him out, insisting that he was dead. Indulging his whim, the trusty fellow laid him on the carpet, and after some time came to him and observed that he thought his honour was coming to him again, to which the old judge, tired of his position, assented. A proof of his considerate kindness of heart appears in another anecdote. Lady Blencowe having suggested to him to pension off a hewer of stones who was so old that he spoiled the work he was employed on, he replied, 'No, no, let him spoil on; he enjoys a pleasure in thinking that he earns his bread at fourscore years and ten, but if you turn him off he will die of grief.'

He left a numerous family. His third son William was taught the mystery of deciphering by his maternal grandfather Dr. Wallis, and was employed to give evidence of the letters written in cipher which were produced on the proceeding against Bishop Atterbury. He was the first person to whom a salary was granted as deputy to the government, his allowance 200*l.* a year. The judge's second daughter became the wife of Chief Baron Pratt. The estate of Marston St. Lawrence remained in the possession of Sir John's lineal descendant, (Noble's Granger, ii. 180; Noble's Lit. Anecdotes, ix. 273.)

BLOCKLEY, JOHN DE. The parish of this name in Worcestershire was probably the native place of John de Blockley, who endowed the chantry of the church of Mary there with some of his land.

Edward III. and subsequent years. He was an auditor of the Exchequer in 44 Edward III., with a salary of 10*l.* a year; and he at the same time received an annual pension of twenty marks for certain good services he had performed to the king and the late queen Philippa; besides which he had a grant of the custody of the manor of Exhulne in Warwickshire during the minority of the heir. Like most of the other officers, he was in holy orders. He was raised to the bench as a baron of the Exchequer in 47 Edward III., and so continued till the last year of the king's reign. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 194, 263, 352; Issue Roll, 49, 92; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 310; Cal. Rot. Pat. 189.)

BLOET, ROBERT (BISHOP OF LINCOLN), is stated by both Risdon (67) and Prince (84) to have belonged to a family of that name which held the lordship of Ragland, and which for many generations lived at Holcombe Rogus in the county of Devon, where it still flourishes. The name is often spelled Bluett. He is described by Prince as the second son of Sir Rowland Bloet, and great-grandson of William Bloet, Earl of Salisbury, of which earldom however, before the Conquest, Dugdale gives no account. But Godwin's editor, Richardson (283), calls him the brother of Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, quoting Claud. A. 8, f. 118, MSS. Hutton, and referring in corroboration to his grant of the manor of Charleton to the priory of Bermondsey, wherein he says, 'quod pro salute animæ Dom. mei Willelmi Regis, et fratris mei Bajocens. Episcopi, &c., confirmavi Monachis de Bermondsey Cherletonam,' &c. But this charter is of very doubtful authenticity; and with all these contradictory accounts, his birth, his lineage, and even his country, must remain in obscurity.

It seems very probable that he was the Bloet who is mentioned as accompanying William Rufus to England upon the death of the Conqueror. (Lingard, ii. 76.) The name of Robert Bloet, without any addition, appears as the witness to one of William's charters to the monastery of Durham, granted in 1088 or 1089; and the signature 'Roberto Dispensatore' is attached to another to Chichester Cathedral, which was probably granted about the same time, and may perhaps be his.

He was appointed chancellor before July or August 1080, a charter to the cathedral of Lincoln of that date bearing his attestation; another to Salisbury, dated in 1191, and several without date (Monast. i. 174, 241, ii. 208, vi. 1167, 1177, 1271, 1295), but no doubt granted about the same time, record his name as chancellor; but no instance occurs of his signature as chancellor after he was raised to the bishopric of Lincoln. On his elevation to that see he was compelled to pay a large sum, varying, according to different authors, from 500*l.* to 6000*l.*, as the price of his advancement, or, perhaps, for exempting the see from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York.

He was consecrated by Archbishop Lanfranc in 1093, and no doubt then resigned the Great Seal.

That he exercised considerable influence, not only over King William, but over his successor King Henry also, all writers agree; but it does not appear that he held any official character under William after he retired from the chancellorship.

Neither Spelman nor Dugdale introduces him in their list of chief justices under Henry I., but Henry of Huntingdon, who was one of his archdeacons, and had lived long in his family, expressly states that he was 'justitiarius totius Angliæ.' Whatever doubt may be felt with regard to this author's attribution of the title to some others, it is impossible entirely to discard his authority here, considering the intimacy of his connection, and the consequent means of knowledge that he had. The period when he held the office is not mentioned, but he is further described as having been twice prosecuted in the last year of his life by the king's suggestion, and as having been fined so severely as to produce the lamentation that he was now compelled to dress those about him in woollen, who had formerly been clothed in rich garments. Even to the last, however, the king pretended kindness towards him; but when some royal flatteries were reported to him, he exclaimed with a sigh, 'He praises no one whom he does not mean to destroy.' He was in the king's company at Woodstock on the occasion of a royal hunt, when he was struck with apoplexy, and, falling off his horse, was carried to his bed, and died on January 10, 1123. His bowels were buried at Eynsham in Oxfordshire, a monastery which he had restored, and his body was deposited at Lincoln.

He had an illegitimate son named Simon, born to him when he was chancellor, whom he appointed, while yet in his nonage, dean of his church. Though this does not speak well of his morals, the character given him by his contemporaries in other respects is much in his favour. Henry of Huntingdon describes him as mild and humble, a raiser of many, a depressor of none, the orphan's father, and the delight of his family; and Matthew Paris testifies to the beauty of his person, and the sweetness and affability of his manners and conversation. (Angl. Sac. ii. 694; Wendover, ii. 41, &c.; Turner's Engl. i. 167; Daniel's, 58.)

BLUNDEVIL, RANULPH (EARL OF CHESTER), surnamed Blundevil (or, as Dugdale says, Blandevil, from the town where he was born, then called Album Monasterium, now Oswestry), was the son of Hugh Cyvelloc, Earl of Chester, and Bertra, daughter of the Earl of Evreux. He succeeded to the title in 1181. While King Richard was in the Holy Land he resisted Prince John's attempts to obtain the government, and distinguished himself in the sieges of the castles of Marlborough and Nottingham, held by the prince's adherents.

In 1193 his name appears as one of the justiciars before whom a fine was levied; but there is no other trace of his having acted in a judicial capacity.

He loyally assisted King John throughout the troubles of his reign, and was equally conspicuous in securing the throne to his son Henry III. As soon as the rebels were defeated, and the kingdom was at rest, he departed for the Holy Land, and was present at the siege of Damietta. After his return in 1220 the activity of his disposition was frequently displayed, sometimes in opposition to the king, but more frequently in his support. He died in October 1231, having presided over the county of Chester above fifty years.

His first wife was Constance, daughter and heir of Conan, Earl of Brittany, and widow of Geoffrey, the son of King Henry II. Being divorced from her, 'by reason that King John haunted her company,' he then married Clemencia, daughter of Ralph de Feugers, and widow of Alan Dinant. He left no issue by either of them.

BLYTH, JOHN (BISHOP OF SALISBURY), was son of William Blyth, of Norton in Derbyshire, by a sister of Archbishop Rotheram. He and his brother Geoffrey were sent to the university of Cambridge, where each of them successively became master of King's Hall, each also being eventually raised to the episcopal bench—John as Bishop of Salisbury, on December 22, 1493; and Geoffrey as Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, on December 26, 1503.

At the time of his elevation to the pre-lacy John Blyth was archdeacon of Richmond, to which he had been admitted on October 8, 1485. He was also master of the Rolls, having been appointed on May 5, 1492. This office he resigned on February 13, 1494, a few days before his consecration; and in the same year he was elected chancellor of the university in which he was educated. He enjoyed his honours only five years, dying about August 23, 1499. His remains were deposited in a handsome tomb behind the high altar in his cathedral. (Rymer, xii. 552; Le Neve, 326; Godwin, 323, 352.)

BOBI, HUGH DE, was sheriff of Yorkshire under Hugh Bardolph from 4 to 6 Richard I, and was one of the five justices itinerant who set the tallage in Lincolnshire in the eighth year of that reign, 1196-7.

(Madox, i. 704.) For the first four years of John's reign he acted as a justiciar as well at Westminster as on the circuit.

In 2 John he was associated with Hugh de Wells in the custody of the bishopric of Lincoln during its vacancy (Rot. Chart. 99); and in the next year he accounted for the rents of Baldwin Wace's lands, then in the king's hands. (Rot. Cancell. 193.) The 'Rotulus de Oblatis' of 2 John (101, 212, 271) contains an entry of his gift of one hundred pounds and a palfrey to the king; and among the fines of 6 John is one of two hundred marks paid by him rather than trust his son as a hostage 'pro domino suo.'

BOCLAND, HUGH DE, was a canon of St. Paul's, and is mentioned by Dugdale and Spelman as chief justiciary at the commencement of the reign of Henry I., on the authority of that king's charter of liberties, as cited by Matthew Paris, being addressed to him in that character. Both Roger de Wendover and Matthew Paris give two copies of that charter—the first when it was promulgated by Henry in the first year of his reign; and the second when it was produced to the barons, 113 years afterwards, by Archbishop Langton. The first, therefore, would more probably be the correct copy, and that is addressed to him as sheriff of Hertfordshire, while the latter is addressed to him as Justiciarius Angliæ. The continuation of the address in both is 'et omnibus fidelibus suis, tam Angliæ quam Franciæ, in Hertfordsyre,' words which show that similar copies were sent to each county, addressed no doubt to its particular sheriff, as this was—according to the royal direction at the time of its grant—recorded by both these historians, 'that many copies of it were to be made as the were counties in England, to be deposited in the abbeys of each county as a public record.' A charter by which King Henry made a grant of land in Essex to Othel 'aurifabro,' addressed to Maurice, Bishop of London, and Hugo de Bocland, 'omnibus baronibus suis et fidelibus, Franciæ et Angliæ, de Essexiâ' (N. Fœdera, i.) affords a corroboration that he was at the time sheriff of Hertfordshire, inasmuch as the two counties of Essex and Hertford were then, and for several centuries afterwards, united under one sheriff, and the shire was frequently held for many years together by the same individual. No charters prove that he was also sheriff of the portgrave of London, but his position, none of them affords the slightest evidence that he ever was chief justiciary. He never held that high and responsible office is rendered more probable by the total silence of the historians with reference to him, a silence which is wholly unaccountable in reference to an officer whom describe as the prime minister of the realm, and the next to the king in dignity.

BOCLAND, HUGH DE, may have been a descendant from the above-named Hugh de Bocland. The first mention of him is in 4 Henry II., 1158, when he was excused from the donum of Berkshire. In 1166 he certified that he held two knights' fees and a half in that county, and was sheriff of it from 1170 to 1176. He acted as one of the justices itinerant in 1173, to set the assize on the king's demesnes in Devonshire, and in the following year in his own county of Berks. (Pipe Roll, 124; Madox, i. 124, 701.)

His son William was sheriff of Cornwall.

BOCLAND, GEOFFREY DE, appears as a justicier from 7 Richard I., 1195, to 3 Henry III., 1218, during which years fines were levied before him at Westminster, and in 5 Henry III. he was one of the justices itinerant into Hertfordshire. There are also several entries on the rolls showing that he was connected with the Exchequer in the beginning of King John's reign. (Rot. Claus. i. 473; Rot. Chart. 99, &c.)

About the year 1200 he was appointed to the archdeaconry of Norfolk, which he held till he was advanced by the king to the deanery of St. Martin's-le-Grand, a benefice which he certainly enjoyed in 1216, having received grants in the interim of the churches of Tenham and Pageham. (Le Nere, 219; Rot. Chart. 156; Rot. Pat. 61.)

If he were the 'G. de Bocland' to whom a mandate was directed in 15 John, commanding him to let the king have, at the price any others would give for them, the corn, pigs, and other chattels at Berkhamsted which belonged to Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, his brother, recently deceased (Rot. Claus. i. 134), he was probably a younger brother of William de Bocland, who married the sister of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter's first wife, the daughter of Geoffrey de Say. As there was no other connection between Fitz-Peter and Bocland than this marriage, it would appear that in those times the title of brother was extended by courtesy to the brothers of the wife's sister's husband.

Geoffrey de Bocland seems to have committed himself with the barons in 17 John, as time and safe-conduct were granted to him to come before the king, which were twice afterwards renewed (Rot. Pat. 172, 174, 182); and in the same year his manor of Tacheworth in Hertfordshire was given by the king to Nicholas de Jelland. (Rot. Claus. i. 257.)

On the accession of King Henry, however, he soon returned to his duty, and was restored to his judicial position. He died before February 4, 1231, the date of a charter to Walter de Kirkham, then dean of St. Martin's. (Maitland's London, 767.)

BOHUN, HUMPHREY DE (EARL OF HEREFORD). Henry de Bohun, the father of Humphrey, was great-grandson of the after-named Milo of Gloucester, the first Earl of Hereford, whose eldest daughter, Margery, married Humphrey de Bohun, the grandson of another Humphrey, who accompanied the Conqueror into England. After the death of Mahell, Earl of Hereford, her last surviving brother, her grandson Henry de Bohun, in 1199, was created Earl of Hereford, and was constable of England. He married Matilda, the daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex, and died in 4 Henry III., 1220.

Humphrey de Bohun, then succeeding to the earldom of Hereford, was, on the death of William de Mandeville, his mother's brother, without issue, created in 1237 Earl of Essex.

His life was one career of activity, now boldly demanding from the king a redress of grievances, and now supporting his sovereign in resisting his enemies. He was sheriff of Kent in 23 Henry III. and the two following years; in 34 Henry III. he took the cross and went to the Holy Land; in 37 Henry III. he was present in Westminster Hall when the formal curse was pronounced, with bell, book, and candle, against the violators of Magna Charta. In 41 Henry III. he had the custody of the marches of Wales, and it was during the time that he held this office that his name appears, in 1260, as a justice itinerant for the counties of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford. In the troubles which shortly followed he joined Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Evesham, August 4, 1265. His former services, however, availed him to obtain a restoration of his lands and honours, with additional marks of favour. He lived till September 24, 1275, 3 Edward I., and was buried in the abbey of Lanthony. He founded the church of Augustine Friars in Broad Street, in the city of London.

He married first, Maud, daughter of the Earl of Ewe, by whom he had a son Humphrey, who died during his lifetime, leaving a son, also Humphrey, who succeeded to the earldoms of Hereford and Essex. His second wife was called Maud de Avenbury, by whom he had a son, John de Bohun, lord of Haresfield.

BOLEBEC, HUGH DE, was the son of Walter de Bolebec, a great baron in Northumberland, by his wife Margaret, one of the sisters and co-heirs of Richard de Montfichet. He was a frequent attendant on the court, witnessing several charters, assisting his sovereign, King John, in his contentions with the barons, and receiving his reward from the lands of their adherents. In 4 Henry III. the county of Northumberland was placed under his charge (Rot. Claus. i. 421), and he was again sheriff of it in 20 Henry III., when he held it for ten years. Though placed at the head of the justices itinerant for the liberties of Durham in 1228, he does not seem to have had any subsequent judicial appointment till 1262, when he was named as one of the justices itinerant for pleas of the forest. He died in October in that year, leaving his wife Theophania surviving. By her he had a son Hugh, who died unmarried during his father's life, and four daughters, who succeeded to his property. (Rot. Chart. 179, 220; Rot. Claus. i. 246, 314; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 385-393; Baronage, i. 452.)

BOLINGBROKE, EARL OF. See O. ST. JOHN.

BOLINGBROKE, NICHOLAS DE, judging from his name, belonged to the county of Lincoln. In 4 Edward II. he was the last of three judges of assize sent into that county and five others, and in the tenth year was named in a special commission to try some rioters in Lincoln. In 12 & 13 Edward II. he was commanded to cause all proceedings before him as a judge of assize to be estreated into the Exchequer.

He certified as one of the lords of the township of Gargrave in Yorkshire. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 561.)

BOLLAND, WILLIAM, was the eldest son of a London merchant of the same names, and was born in 1772. He was sent for his education to Dr. Valpy's school at Reading, then noted for producing scholars of high literary attainment. While there he was a great favourite with his master, and wrote several prologues and epilogues for the annual dramatic performances for which the school was renowned. He thence proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he formed a life-long intimacy with John Copley, afterwards Lord Lyndhurst, and took his degrees with him in 1794 and 1796. In the latter and two following years he gained the Seatonian prize for his poems on 'The Epiphany,' 'Miracles,' and 'St. Paul at Athens;' and subsequently evinced considerable poetic powers in several pieces of great elegance. But soon his devotion to Astræa compelled him to desert the Muses. He entered her (Inner) Temple, and placed himself under her priest George Holroyd, and, after some initiation into the mysteries, was permitted to join in the ministrations.

To descend from these altitudes, he was called to the bar on April 24, 1801, having previously acted for some time as a special pleader. He joined the Home Circuit, practising at the usual sessions attached to it, but principally at the Old Bailey, and in 1804 he became one of the four city pleaders. In all of these he commanded a large share of business, and acquired so good a reputation that in 1815 he was selected to join Mr. Holroyd in a commission to Jersey to enquire into the existence of certain 'doleances' complained of by the inhabitants. In 1817 he was made recorder of Reading, the place of his pupilage; and in 1822, when, from the respect he had obtained as senior city pleader, he would certainly in ordinary times have been elected common serjeant of London, he was, from the political excitement arising from the trial of Queen Caroline, defeated by a small majority in favour of Mr. (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) Denman, who had acted as one of her majesty's advocates.

After eight-and-twenty years' labour at the bar, he was called to the bench of the Exchequer on November 16, 1829. The nature of his business had not led him to that abstruse learning which is so necessary for a judge, except in regard to criminal law, with which he was intimately conversant. But, gifted with good sense and discriminative judgment, he fulfilled his duties with great discretion. He occupied the judicial seat for nearly ten years, when disorders and infirmities obliged him to resign in January 1839, after which he lived little more than a year, his death taking place on May 14, 1840.

He was one of the most popular men of his time. His eminently handsome and benevolent countenance made the first favourable impression, which his pleasant cordiality, and kind disposition more than confirmed. He had a mania for old English literature, and everything which was ancient and rare. The Roxburgh Club originate at a dinner party given by him, and he furnished the first book circulated among his associates, being a reprint of Lord Surrey's version of the second book of the Æneid, the first specimen of blank verse in our language. He figures as Hortensius in Lord Diddin's 'Bibliomania;' and his curious collection of books, pictures, and coins saved after his death for more than 3000*l.*

He married in 1810 his cousin Elizabeth, one of the daughters of John Bolland, E. of Clapham, and left several children.

BOLLING, WILLIAM, was appointed third baron of the Exchequer on Oct. 11, 1501, 17 Henry VII., and was continued in his place for the first four years in following reign. He was in the commission of the peace for Essex and Kent. (St. Papers [1509], 60, 101.) He was one of the ancients of the Middle Temple, were present when three members of society were called serjeants in Nov. 1503, thus plainly showing that bar that time sat on the bench who, not of the degree of the coif, still remained in the society in which they had been brought up. (Dugdale's Orig. 113.)

BONQUER, WILLIAM, or BONGOUR, was employed in 1255 and 1259 on missions to the pope relative to the election of Prince Edmund to the crown of Sicily, and upon the peace with the King of France. In the letter of credence on the latter occasion he is called 'milite et mariscallo regis.' (Rymer, i. 337, 386.) In 46 Henry III., 1202, a salary of 40*l.* was granted to four justices of the bench, of whom he is the last named; and in that and the next year he acted as a justice itinerant. The fines in which his name appears do not occur beyond Easter 1265.

BOOTH, LAURENCE (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), to use the words of Dugdale (Baronage, ii. 481), was of 'a very antient and knightly family,' possessing property in Cheshire and Lancashire. From the reign of Edward I. there were five generations before John Booth, or Bouth, of Barton, who by two wives had twelve children—two of whom, William and this Laurence, became Archbishops of York; one, John, Bishop of Exeter; the son of another was raised to the peerage as Baron Delamere, and afterwards created Earl of Warrington; and the daughter of another of the twelve children married Ralph Nevill, the third Earl of Westmoreland.

Laurence was the youngest son, and the only child of the second wife, Maude, daughter of Sir John Savage, of Clifton, or Rock-Savage, in Cheshire. He pursued his studies at Cambridge, becoming master of Pembroke Hall in 1450, and afterwards chancellor of the university. Ecclesiastical preferments flowed quickly upon him. From the rectory of Cottenham in Cambridgeshire he was successively advanced to the provostship of Beverley in 1453; canonries in York and Lichfield; the archdeaconry of Richmond in 1454; the deanery of St. Paul's in 1456; and the bishopric of Durham, by papal bull, on September 15, 1457. (Monast. vi. 1307; Le Neve.)

Although Fuller describes him as 'neither for York or Lancaster, but England,' there is no doubt that until the Lancastrians were deprived of all hope he was zealously attached to their interest and employed in their service. In 1454 he was Queen Margaret's chancellor, and keeper of King Henry's privy seal. The battle of Towton in the following year sealed the fate of his party; but that he had not made himself obnoxious in his adherence to his royal master is apparent from the fact that he was not only not included in the act of attainder then passed by the conqueror in 1461, but that by the same statute his right to forfeitures within the palatinate was expressly excepted in his favour. Within a short period, however, he had incurred the king's displeasure for some offence which is not recorded. His temporalities were seized into the king's hands on December 28, 1462, and were not restored to him till April 17, 1464, when he had so far reinstated himself in the royal favour that all grants to him were excepted from the act of resumption passed in the parliament of that year. (Rot. Parl. v. 319.) From this time till the second imprisonment and death of Henry VI., in May 1471, he seems to have been convinced of the inutility of further resistance, as in the following July he united in the oath by which Edward, Prince of Wales, was accepted as heir to the crown, and he took his place as a trier of petitions in the next parliament. (Ibid. vi. 3, 234.)

He was so confirmed in King Edward's confidence as to be selected for his chancellor on July 27, 1473, and retained the office till February 1475. We may presume that his removal from it was occasioned by no dislike of the king, inasmuch as within ten days of the death of Archbishop Neville, in June 1476, the temporalities of the see of York were placed in his custody, and he was translated to that province on the 1st of the following September. He presided as primate less than four years, dying at Southwell on May 19, 1480. His remains were deposited in the collegiate church by the side of his brother, Archbishop William Booth, who had been interred there sixteen years before. (Godwin, 697, 752; Angl. Sac. i. 777; Surtree's Durham, i. lix.)

BOREHAM, HARVEY DE, was of a family which took its name from the village so called in Essex. He was an officer of the Exchequer, and also belonged to the ecclesiastical profession, being a canon of St. Paul's. In 49 Henry III., 1264, fines were levied before him from November till the following Easter. Dugdale (Orig. 21, 42) accordingly introduces him at that time among the justices of the Common Pleas, but he does not appear to have acted afterwards in that character. He is, however, recorded as a baron of the Exchequer in 1 Edward I., and probably continued so till his death in the fifth year of that reign. (Madox, ii. 28, 320; Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 62.)

BOSANQUET, JOHN BERNARD. The family of Bosanquet left France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, and settled in England, where several of its members flourished among the most eminent merchants of London. The judge's grandfather, Samuel Bosanquet, became lord of the manor of Low Hall in the county of Essex, and resided in Forest House, in Waltham Forest; and his father, also Samuel, who added to the property the estate of Dingestow Court in Monmouthshire, was sheriff of the former county in 1770, and governor of the Bank of England in 1792. The judge was the youngest of three sons, the issue of his marriage with Eleanor, daughter of Henry Lannoy Hunter, Esq., of Beechill in the county of Berks. He was born at Forest House on May 2, 1773; and, after passing some years at Eton College, he completed his education at Christchurch, Oxford. Being called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1800, he joined the Home Circuit, and attended the Essex sessions, of which his father was the chairman; but three years before his call he had commenced his legal career as a reporter of decisions in the Common Pleas, Exchequer Chamber, and House of Lords, in conjunction with Mr. (afterwards Sir Christopher) Puller. Of these reports there were two series, one from 1797 to 1804, and the other from 1804 to 1807. After a steady progress for seven years more, he was selected as counsel both for the East India Company and the Bank of England.

The extensive business in which he was thus engaged compelled him to quit the circuit; and taking the coif in Michaelmas Term 1814, he became from that time well known to the public in the numerous bank prosecutions which the then frequent forgeries of one-pound notes rendered necessary, and which he conducted with great discretion and effect for a period of thirteen years. In 1824 he was offered the chief justiceship of Bengal, but declined it; and in 1827 he became king's serjeant.

He was appointed a judge of the Court of Common Pleas on February 1, 1830, and was thereupon knighted. The ability and impartiality with which he exercised his important functions may be estimated by his being chosen one of the lords commissioners of the Great Seal, in conjunction with Sir C. C. Pepys and Sir Lancelot Shadwell, which they held from April 23, 1835, to January 16, 1836, after which date Sir John sat in the Common Pleas for six years more, when the failure of his health compelled him to resign in Hilary Term 1842.

His appointment as head of the Commission for the Improvement of the Practice and Proceedings of the Common Law Courts, and his selection as arbitrator between the Crown and the Duke of Athol, to fix the amount of the unsettled claims of the latter after he had resigned the sovereignty of the Isle of Man, are a sufficient proof of the high estimation in which he stood.

In other respects his reputation was equally established. He published without his name a 'Letter of a Layman' on the connection of the prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse, embodying in a small compass a great amount of research. He was a very considerable linguist, of accurate and various learning, and particularly fond of scientific enquiries. In these pursuits he occupied the six years which he lived after his retirement. He died on September 25, 1847, and was buried at Llantilio-Crossenny, Monmouthshire, in the vault of the family of his wife, Mary Anne, daughter of Richard Lewis, Esq., of that place. A monument to his memory is erected in the church of his own parish of Dingestow.

BOSCEHALL, WILLIAM DE. If Dugdale had not inserted his name among the justices itinerant, it would not have been introduced here; because he never appears to have acted in that capacity, except for pleas of the forest in the northern counties in 54 Henry III., 1270; the more especially as nothing has been ascertained relative to him.

BOSCO, JOHN DE, was an advocate who was employed in 18 Edward I. to plead on the part of the king. (Abb. Plac. 284.) On the appointment of the eight justices of assize in 21 Edward I., 1293, he was selected as one of them. In the same year he claimed, with his brothers-in-law, the manors of Toleshunt, Tregoz, and Bluntes-hale in Essex, as son of Lucy, one of the four sisters of Nicholas de Tregoz. (Rot. Parl. i. 92.) He was summoned among the judges to parliament in the 23rd and 25th years of that reign; but his career seems to have terminated disgracefully, as he was convicted in 6 Edward II. of abstracting a king's writ, and substituting a false one in its place. (Parl. Writs. i. 252; Abb. Plac. 316.)

BOTELER, ALEXANDER LE, or PINCERN. The history of the peerage shows several baronies which were held by individuals who were called by this name, from the office they filled in the families of royal noble persons. The butler of the great house of Leicester, in the first Henry's reign, the founder of the now extinct barony of Oversley and Wemme, and the ancestor of the baron of Sudley; and from the butler of the Earl of Chester in the reign of Henry II. the barony of Warrington derived. In the present Duke of Norfolk the blood of William de Albini, the pin-cern or butler of King Henry I., continues to flow; and five titles in the English and Irish peerage, commencing with the Marquis of Ormond, owe their origin to Theobald Boteler, the chief butler of Ireland in the reign of Henry II.

In what family Alexander le Pincern held that office does not appear, nor do Madox give any further information concerning him than that he, with Fitz-Stephen the sheriff, and Philip Ermise, were the justices errant to the assize of the king's demesnes in Leicestershire in 20 Henry II., 1174, to which appears by the record they were appointed by a writ of Richard de Luci, the chief justiciary. (Madox, i. 123.)

held land in Filby in Norfolk, and claimed the right of presentation to the church there, which was decided against him in 2 John. (Abb. Plac. 31.) In 17 John he forfeited his possessions for his adherence to the barons, but they were restored to him on the accession of Henry III. In the ninth year of that reign he was added to the list of justices itinerant for the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. (Rot. Claus. i. 334, ii. 77.)

BOTELEB, JOHN. This judge may be presumed to derive his name from the office which he originally filled in Lincoln's Inn. In the Black Book of that society he is described as being admitted a member of it in 8 Edward IV., 1468, because 'bene et fideliter se gessit in officio pincernæ'—a practice of which another instance will be found in the life of Judge More. He became reader in autumn 1482, and read a second time in Lent 1488.

In 9 Henry VII., 1494, he was called to the degree of the cof with Humphrey Coningsby and several others, who held their feast at Ely House on November 16, 1494, which is the first recorded instance of this solemnity being honoured with the presence of the king and queen.

His elevation to the bench of the Common Pleas took place on April 26, 1508, just a year before the king's death; and receiving a new patent from Henry VIII., he continued in the exercise of his judicial duties for the next nine years.

BOTETOUBT, JOHN DE, was appointed one of the justices of trailbaston in 33 Edward I., 1305, and in the same year received his first summons to parliament, and was sent to treat with the Scots on the affairs of that kingdom. Dugdale states nothing of his origin, but mentions his appointment as governor of St. Briavel's Castle in Gloucestershire, and as warden of the Forest of Dene in 19 Edward I. Two years afterwards he was a justice of gaol delivery in the counties of Warwick and Leicester; and in 22 Edward I., being then admiral of the king's fleet, he was summoned to serve in Gascony, and was in the expedition there in the twenty-fourth year, during which period various sums of money were paid to him on the king's account. (Rot. Parl. 95-478, ii. 432; N. Federa. i. 970.) In the following years he accompanied the king in his Scottish wars, and was present in June 1300 at the siege of Carlaverock, the metrical chronicler of which describes him as 'light of heart and doing good to all.' (Nicolas's Siege, 32, 202.) He was a party to the barons' letter to the pontiff in 29 Edward I., in which he is styled 'lord of Mendlesham' in Suffolk. Two years afterwards he was nominated the king's lieutenant in Cumberland, Westmoreland, &c., and in 33 Edward I. he was assigned with two others to hear and determine certain transgressions committed at Bristol. (Parl. Writs. i. 368; Rot. Parl. i. 168.)

Under Edward II. he was equally distinguished, being appointed one of the peers to regulate the royal household, and afterwards to treat with the Earl of Lancaster. He was again admiral of the king's fleet and governor of the castles of St. Briavel and Framlingham; he also served again against the Scots, besides being engaged in several commissions of a civil character. He died in 18 Edward II. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 319), leaving, by his wife Matilda (the daughter of Beatrice de Beauchamp, widow of William de Beauchamp), several children. The barony, after many abeyances, is now held by the Duke of Beaufort.

BOUDON, WILLIAM DE, of a Northamptonshire family, was appointed second baron of the Exchequer on February 4, 1327, a few days after the commencement of the reign of Edward III.; but, as there is no subsequent entry whatever concerning him, he probably died within a few months, Robert de Nottingham succeeding him as second baron on October 15 following. (Parl. Writs. ii. p. ii. 527.)

BOURCHIER, or BOUSSEE, JOHN DE, whose name underwent several variations, but at last settled down to Bouchier, is first mentioned as one of the attorneys of the Earl of Oxford, to appear in his place at the parliament held in May, 34 Edward I., 1306. (Parl. Writs. i. 166.) He was one of the justices of assize in the counties of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex in 8 Edward II. (Rot. Parl. i. 449), and was named in several other judicial commissions from that time till May 31, 1321, in the fourteenth year, when he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas. In this court he continued to act for the remainder of that reign; but some short delay seems to have taken place in his re-appointment on the accession of Edward III., his patent not being dated till March 24, 1327, two months afterwards, while those to his brethren were immediately granted.

He was the son of Robert de Bousser and Emma, his wife; and by his own marriage with Helen, the daughter and heiress of Walter de Colchester, became possessed of Stansted in Halsted, and other manors in Essex. The last fine levied before him was dated on the morrow of the Ascension, 3 Edward III., 1329. Dying soon after, he left two sons, Robert and John, the former of whom is the under-mentioned chancellor.

He was the head of a curious commission in 19 Edward II. to hear and determine a charge made by the Bishop and Dean and Chapter of London against certain persons for taking and carrying away a great fish,

'quifidicitur cete,' found on their manor of Walton, the prosecutors alleging that King Henry III. had, by his charter, granted them 'totum crassum piscem' which should be taken on their land, 'except the tongue, which the said king retained to himself.' (N. Fœdera, ii. 619.)

BOURCHIER, or BOUSSER, ROBERT DE, the eldest son of the above-mentioned John de Bousser, began his career in 17 Edward II. as a man-at-arms, and was returned in that character by the sheriff of Essex, as summoned to attend by general proclamation (Parl. Writs, ii. p. i. 652); and in 2 Edward III., before his father's death, he was one of the knights returned to parliament for that county, and received for his attendance at the rate of four shilling a day. (Rot. Parl. ii. 441.)

In July 1334, 8 Edward III., he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. (N. Fœdera, ii. 890.) Whether he accepted the place, or how long he remained in it, does not appear; but at the commencement of Edward's claim to the crown of France he was engaged, in 1337, in the battle of Cadsant, where Guy, the brother of the Earl of Flanders, was taken prisoner; and we next meet with him attending at the Parliament held in Lent 1340. (Rot. Parl. ii. 113.)

When the king hurriedly returned from Tournay, at the end of November in that year, and dismissed Robert de Stratford, the chancellor, he resolved to appoint a lay chancellor; and accordingly selected Robert de Bouchier, who was sworn in on December 14, 1340, with a grant of 500*l.* a year beyond the accustomed fees. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 138.) That this appointment was very distasteful to all parties is evident from the petitions in the next parliament, praying that, in consequence of the evils arising from bad counsellors, the king should in future make the chancellor, chief justices, and other officers in full parliament, and that they should there be openly sworn to observe the laws. To this the king gave what appeared to be a consent, and his answer was confirmed as a statute. (Rot. Pat. ii. 128, 131.) Immediately after the parliament had closed its sittings he revoked the enactment as improperly forced upon him; but he soon found it expedient to part with his military chancellor, who gave up the Seal on October 29, 1341, and was succeeded by Sir Robert Parning. (Rot. Claus. 15 Edw. III.)

From this time Bouchier joined the king's army, with so large an array that his allowance amounted to 401*l.* 10*s.* He distinguished himself at the battle of Cressi, and was engaged as one of the ambassadors to treat for the subsequent peace. He was summoned to parliament as a peer from 16 Edward III.

Falling a sacrifice to the plague that raged in 1349, he was buried in Halsted Church, where his monument still remains.

By his wife, Margaret, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas de Preyers, he had three sons—Robert, John, and William. Two of the grandsons of William are the next mentioned as entrusted with the Great Seal, in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV.

BOURCHIER, THOMAS (ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY), was great-grandson of the last-mentioned Sir Robert, through his younger son William, whose son, also named William, was created Earl of Ewe, in Normandy, by Henry V., and married Anne, the daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, sixth son of Edward III., and widow of Edmund, Earl of Stafford. Their eldest son Henry was created Earl of Essex in 1461; and their second son was this Thomas, the future archbishop.

Soon after his father's death in 1420 he became a student in Nevill's Inn, at Oxford, in which university he afterwards held the office of chancellor from 1434 to 1435. His relationship to the royal family had already procured him the valuable deanery of St. Martin's, London, to which he was admitted in 1433; and in November of the same year his 'neghnesse of blood,' as well as the desire of the Commons in parliament is urged by the king to the prior and convent of Worcester as a recommendation of his election to fill the vacancy in that see. (Rot. Parl. v. 435.) The pope, however, appointed Dr. Thomas Brouns; and it was eighteen months before the king succeeded in placing Bouchier there, on March 1435. Even at that time his profession was obliged to be delayed for a month, account of his not being of sufficient age. In the same year the monks of Ely, in doubt with the view of gratifying the king, chose him as their bishop, on the death of Philip Morgan, and the pope confirmed the election; but, for some cause the king refusing his assent, and the bishop being the fear of a præmunire before his new election became necessary, which was on Lewis of Luxemburgh. On the death of that prelate, however, in 1443, Bouchier was re-elected without royal or papal licence, and was translated to Ely on December 20. The monkish historian of the diocese states that during his ten years he never performed mass in the church, once, on the day of his installation, that he heavily oppressed the prior and other of the brothers by fines, and tenants by imprisonment. (Angl. 671.)

Eight days after the death of Archbishop Kempe, on March 22, 1454, the commons requested of the Commons, 'for his merits, virtues, and grete blood shewyd,' joined in recommending Bish-

chier to the pope as successor to the primacy. (Rot. Parl. v. 450.) This is the second time that the Commons are stated to have interfered in his favour, which, if honestly recorded, evidences the popularity of his character, and tends to throw some discredit on the representation of the monk of Ely. He was elected on April 22, 1454; and having thus attained the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the kingdom, he was within a year entrusted also with the highest secular employment. On the king's recovery from his illness, the Earl of Salisbury, whom the Duke of York had appointed chancellor, was removed, and Archbishop Bouchier was put in possession of the Great Seal on March 7, 1455. (Rot. Claus. 83 Hen. VI.) He retained it not quite eighteen months, during which the Lancastrians and the Yorkists were alternately in power. He had not enjoyed his appointment by the former much above two months before the first battle of St. Albans, on May 22, gave the Yorkists again the ascendancy. Still the chancellor was not removed, but opened the parliament that met in July. Even when their power was more firmly established by a renewal of the king's illness, and the reappointment of the Duke of York as protector in November following, the archbishop still continued in his place. And again when the king, resuming his authority, dismissed the protector on February 25, 1456, the chancellor was found to be as ready to act on that side as he had been on the other. (Rot. Parl. v. 278, 285, 321.) It is not therefore to be wondered at that Queen Margaret should be dissatisfied with so lukewarm a friend, and should seek a more steady adherent to her husband's cause. This will account for the removal, otherwise unexplained, of the archbishop, and the appointment of Bishop Waynflete as chancellor on October 11 in that year.

A temperament so easy could not be expected to make much resistance to the deposition of his royal patron. Accordingly we find him at once reconciling himself to the ruling power, and crowning Edward IV. on June 29, 1461, and four years afterwards entertaining the king and his new queen, Elizabeth Woodville, for several days at Canterbury, on their visit there to pay their devotions at Becket's shrine. By that time he had received the last honour he obtained in the Church, having been created cardinal-presbyter by the title of St. Cyriacus in Thermis on September 18, 1464. He was not, however, invested with the red hat till May 31, 1472; and he is first called cardinal in the Rolls of Parliament (vi. 3) of November in that year. In 1475 he was one of the arbitrators between Edward and the French king. (Rymer, xii. 15-19.)

On the death of Edward IV. he was induced by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, to urge the queen to give up her younger son into the protector's care, the elder being already in his charge; and there is no reason to doubt that the archbishop's endeavours were conscientiously made, without a suspicion of the tragic fate to which both were doomed. His coronation of the usurper Richard III., and of his successful rival Henry VII., offers a curious exhibition of the facility with which in those perilous times minds could accommodate themselves to political changes; but it savours too much of heartlessness and careless indifference, or perhaps too much of consideration of personal safety, not to create a degree of disgust, which, however, is somewhat tempered by the recollection that the archbishop had arrived at a period of life when feelings are not acute, and the desire of peace predominates. He did not survive the accession of Henry VII. above six months, his death occurring on March 30, 1486, at the manor of Knole, near Sevenoaks. He was buried in the choir of his cathedral.

He has the reputation of having been a learned man, and was certainly a most cautious one, guiding himself through the difficulties of a most troublesome period with infinite discretion. To judge from a letter in the 'Paston Correspondence' (l. 94), he did not dislike the diversion of the chase. We there find him going 'to hunt and sport at Hunsdon.' His two sees of Worcester and Canterbury benefited largely by his liberality, and to the poor he was a kind friend. But his memory is principally respected for having been an active instrument in introducing the art of printing into England. It is related that, having heard of its invention, he induced King Henry VI., towards the close of his reign, to send an officer of his wardrobe, Robert Turnour, to Haarlem, where John Guttenberg had set up a press, he himself supplying a considerable part of the expense. Turnour succeeded in bringing over Frederic Corcellis, one of the compositors, with a fount of types, which the archbishop caused to be taken to Oxford, where the first press was accordingly, through his means, established in, or soon after, the year 1464. (Godwin, 129, 268, 466; Angl. Sac. i. 63, 537; Chalmers's Biog. Dict.)

BOURCHIER, HENRY (EARL OF ESSEX), was the elder brother of the last-mentioned Thomas, the archbishop. The earl held the Great Seal after the retirement of the chancellor, Bishop Stillington, from June 23 to July 17, 1473, acting during the whole of Trinity Term, and bills in Chancery being addressed to him by the title of keeper of the Great Seal.

The father of the earl was William,

Earl of Ewe, in Normandy, son of Sir Robert Bouchier's youngest son, William. He married Anne of Woodstock, granddaughter of Edward III., and widow of Edmund, Earl of Stafford, and had by her several sons, one of whom was the archbishop.

On his father's death in 1420 he became Earl of Ewe, being then about twenty-one, and having served under the king in France for three years previously. He succeeded to the barony of Bouchier in 1435, and for his distinguished services in the French wars was created Viscount Bouchier in 1446. His marriage with Isabel, daughter of Richard, Duke of York, naturally made him a devoted adherent to that party; and after their success at the first battle of St. Albans, in May 1455, he was constituted treasurer of England, retaining the office about eighteen months. When his nephew, Edward IV., had assumed the throne, he was reinstated in it for one year, and in the following June was advanced to the earldom of Essex. He held the treasurership for the third time from 1472 till his death, and in 1473 he was temporarily employed, from June 23 to July 17, as keeper of the Great Seal till Edward had fixed upon his chancellor. He died on April 4, 1483, five days before the king, and was buried in the abbey of Bylegh, near Maldon, in Essex.

He had many children, the eldest of whom, William, died in his lifetime, leaving a son, Henry, who succeeded to the earldom, which on his death in 1539 became extinct. The barony, however, survived, and is now supposed to be merged in the Marquisate of Townshend.

BOURNE, or BURNE, WILLIAM DE, was appointed to superintend the collection of the fifteenth granted in 29 Edward I. in the county of Wilts. In the new commission assigning justices of the Common Pleas, issued on September 29, 1309, 3 Edward II., he was one of the two who were added to that bench. He seems to have been frequently engaged in assizes in the country, principally in the western counties. One of these occasions, in 10 Edward II., was for the trial of persons accused of conspiring to bring a false appeal of robbery against John de Treiagu, with whom it is somewhat curious to find that he was in the same year united in a commission to enquire into the transgressions alleged against the taxors in Devonshire. In 12 Edward II. he was appointed to perambulate the forests of Devon, and was commanded to cause all proceedings before him, as a justice of assize or otherwise, to be brought into the Exchequer to be estreated, and in 14 Edward II., when a commission into Guernsey, Jersey, &c., for the trial of certain offences, which had been directed to him and another, but which had been superseded, was, on the petition of the inhabitants, renewed. (Parl. Writs, i. 110, ii. p. ii. 578; Rot. Parl. i. 378; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 239.)

BOUSSEE. See BOUCHIER.

BOVILL, WILLIAM, the present lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, is the second son of B. Bovil, of Durnsford Lodge, Wimbledon. He was born at Allhallows, Barking, London, on May 26, 1816, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on January 15, 1841. Joining the Home Circuit, he soon acquired an extensive practice both there and at Westminster. On attaining a silk gown in 1855 he was elected a bencher of his inn, and ultimately its treasurer. He entered parliament in 1857 as representative of Guildford, for which he continued member till his elevation to the bench. He invariably advocated Conservative principles, and was selected by Lord Derby as solicitor-general on July 6, 1866, and was thereupon knighted. Within five months after his appointment he was called upon to resign it, and to fill his present high office. November 29, as the successor of Chief Justice Sir William Erle, being about the same time made a member of the privy council.

By his wife Maria, the daughter of J. Bolton, Esq., of Lee Park, Blackheath, has several children.

BOVINGTON, WALTER DE, is mentioned as a justicier before whom fines were levied in 8 John, 1206. He held property in Yorkshire, and was one of two 'indenters' named by the king to Robert Stuteville, sheriff of that county. (See to Fines of Rich. I. and John; Rot. Oblatis, 106, 107, 109.)

BOWES, ROBERT, belonged to a distinguished family seated at Strete Castle, Durham, for more than three centuries. He was the second son of Ralph Bowes, by Margery, daughter of Richard Conyers, of South Cowton, who eventually succeeded to the paternal estate.

So experienced was he in all the liabilities of border warfare that negotiations were pending with the king in December 1541, his presence being required by the council in London, who could advise them on the subject. (Acts Privy Council, vii. 285.) In the following year he led a body of cavalry against the Scots, by whom the Earl of Huntley, he was defeated at Haddenrig, and, as some say, made prisoner. (Lingard, ii. 333.) The war was terminated by the death of King James, and Robert became warden of the Forest of Middle Marches. During the Edward he compiled his 'Informations' on the state of the marches and their laws and customs, addressed to Henry, Marquess of Dorset, the warden-general, and full of curious and interesting details. In June 1551 he was one of the commissioners to conclude the convention with Mary, Queen of Scots (Rymer, xv. 265, 272), and in the following September was sworn a member of the privy council.

The intelligence he had exhibited as a diplomatist and as an author probably pointed him out as the successor of John Beaumont in the office of master of the Rolls, for which he received his patent on June 18, 1552. In that character he was one of the witnesses to King Edward's will, fixing the succession of the crown on Lady Jane Grey, and he acted on her council during the short continuance of her nominal reign. On July 19, 1553, he signed the letter to Lord Rich on her behalf, but on the next day he signed another to the Duke of Northumberland, commanding him to disarm. (Queens Jane and Mary, 100, 109.) This probably saved him from the punishment with which several of Lady Jane's partisans were visited, and founded a claim on Queen Mary's favour. He was evidently continued in his office for two months of the new reign; and even then he seems to have retired voluntarily, the entry being that his patent was cancelled 'pure, sponte, et absolute,' on September 6. Resuming then his duties on the border, he was sent by the council to Berwick in the ensuing April, to assist Lord Conyers in taking the musters, with a warrant for 100*l.* as a reward from the queen.

By his wife Alice, the daughter of John Metcalfe, of Nappa, he had four sons; but these all dying in infancy, his property devolved on his younger brother Richard, the father of Sir George Bowes, the knight-marshal.

BOYLAND, RICHARD DE, probably the son of Roger de Boyland and Alice his wife, purchased in 1268 part of the manor of Brixingham in Norfolk, which was afterwards called by his name. In part payment he gave eighty acres which he had previously held in Pulham in the same county. He was then a successful lawyer, and in 7 Edward I., 1279, was appointed one of the justices itinerant into Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire, an office which he continued to execute in various other counties, until, for his corruption in the administration of justice, he was disgraced in 1299, and was fined 4000 marks for his extortions.

After his discharge he retired to his manor of Boylands, and built a noble mansion there, famous for the moat that surrounded it, and for the magnificent conduit which he constructed. He lived for six years afterwards, dying in 24 Edward I. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 129.)

The name of his first wife was Matilda, and his second was Ellen, the daughter of Philip de Colville. The extent of his possessions, comprehending many manors and lands in Norfolk and Suffolk, over part of which he had a grant of free warren in 1285, may show either his success as a lawyer or his corruption as a judge; but it would be unjust to attribute his riches to the latter, considering that King Edward was not likely to be lenient, or to discourage complaints against him. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 38.)

BRABAZON, ROGER LE. Jaques le Brabazon, the first of this family who was established in England, was so called from the castle of Brabazon in Normandy. He came over with the Conqueror, and his name is inserted on the Roll of Battle Abbey. His great-grandson Thomas became possessed of Moseley in Leicestershire, by his marriage with Amicia, the heiress of John de Moseley. Their son, Sir Roger also described of Eastwell in the same county, married Beatrix, eldest of the three sisters and co-heirs of Mansel de Bisset, and by her had two sons, the elder of whom was Roger le Brabazon, the judge.

He is first mentioned in that character in 15 Edward I., 1287, when he acted as a justice itinerant for pleas of the forest in Lancashire; and two years afterwards, on the removal of the judges convicted of extortion and other corrupt practices, he was constituted a justice of the King's Bench in the place of one of them. That he held a high rank in the estimation of the king appears from his being employed to attend the meeting of the Scottish nobility and clergy at Norham on May 10, 1291, when Edward I. took upon himself the arbitration between the competitors for their crown. There, in a studied address in the French language, he required from the assembly an absolute recognition of King Edward's title as Lord Paramount of the kingdom of Scotland, which they were not in a condition to refuse. The prominent part taken by him in this transaction has led writers to speak of him as if he were then the chief justiciary. That office, however, no longer existed, and it was not till four years afterwards that he became chief justice of the King's Bench, to which he was advanced about 24 Edward I., 1295. He presided in the court till the end of the reign, when he was immediately re-appointed by the new king, and continued to perform the functions of this honourable post till February 23, 1316, 9 Edward II., when, pressed by age and infirmities, he applied for and obtained his discharge. The patent of that date is expressed in the most eulogistic terms, and records the king's commands that he should be retained 'de secreto consilio' during his life, and should be admitted to all the king's courts, councils, and parliaments as often as he might choose to be present. He died in the following year. Leaving no issue by his wife, Beatrix, the daughter of Sir John de Sproxton, his property devolved on his brother Matthew, whose descendant was created Lord Brabazon of Ardee in Ireland in 1616, to which, in 1627, was added the earldom of Meath, a title which is still borne by his lineal representative, whose father received an English peerage in 1831 with the title of Baron Chaworth. (Thoroton's Notes, i. 294; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 238; Hist. of the Family of Brabazon, 1825.)

BRABOEUF, WILLIAM DE, whose ancestor came into England with the Conqueror, and held lands in Surrey, Hampshire, and several other counties, acted as assessor for Hampshire for the fifteenth granted in 3 Edward I., and in the sixth year that county was committed to his charge as sheriff. He held the office for the next two years, in the latter of which he was the last named of the four justices itinerant in Hampshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Wiltshire; a duty which he again performed in Cornwall in 10 Edward I. Two years afterwards he died. (Manning and Bray's Surrey, i. 86; Abb. Placit. 48, 78, 164.)

BRACKLEY, LORD. See T. EGERTON.

BRACON, or BRETTON, HENRY DE. In Dugdale's 'Chronica Series' the names of Henry de Bracton and of Henry de Bretton are separately introduced as justices itinerant, with an interval of fourteen years between them, and with nothing in either insertion leading to a supposition that the one or the other was a justicier at Westminster, or that they were the same person. There is no reasonable doubt, however, that both names belonged to one individual, and that he was for many years a judge of the superior court.

Dugdale makes Henry de Bracton a justice itinerant in 1245 and 1246, 29 Henry III., and Henry de Bretton a justice itinerant in 1260. In 1250 Henry de Bracton was evidently on the bench at Westminster, as he was present as one of the 'justiciarii' at a final concord made 'before the king himself' respecting common of pasture at Cheshunt. (Harleian MS. 371, p. 71.) In every year from 1250 also the entries on the fine roll prove beyond contradiction that there was a regular justicier, whose name is spelled indifferently Bratton and Bretton, and more frequently in the former mode. These are entries of payments made for assizes to be taken before him; and they continue, principally with the name of Bratton, till July 1267. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 92-458.) It is thus clear that Bratton and Bretton are synonymous; and there can be little question that Bracton is the same with both. Prince, in his 'Worthies of Devon,' designates the village in that county in which he supposes Bracton to have been born as 'Bracton, now Bratton-Clovelly,' a name it still retains. Colinson (Somersetsh. ii. 32) derives the name from Bratton, a hamlet of Minehead, where the family had property, and states that he lies buried in the church there, under an arch, with his effigy in long robes. Thus is Sir Edward Coke's assertion, in the Preface to the 8th Report, that Bracton was 'a justice of this realm,' corroborated, as he would hardly have given him that title had he been only a justice itinerant. He styles him, in the Preface to the 9th Report, 'Curis de Banco Judex;' but if the Common Pleas is to be understood by this expression, its correctness may be doubted, inasmuch as among the fines there levied none appear to have been acknowledged before him. It seems more probable, if the division of the courts had then been finally arranged, that he was a justice of the King's Bench.

According to Prince, he studied at Oxford, where he took the degree of doctor of both laws. He was certainly of the clerical profession: he is designated 'dilectus clericus noster' by the king, in a grant dated May 25, 1264, made to him of the use of a house in London belonging to William, late Earl of Derby, during the minority of the heir. (Dugdale's Orig. 56) On January 21, 1263, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Barnstaple, but he resigned it in the following year. (Le Neve 98.) He died about 1267, as in that year his judicial duties evidently terminated.

Although Lord Ellesmere (State Trials ii. 693), in his argument on the subject of the Postnati, calls him chief justice in the reign of King Henry III., and some other authorities so describe him (Bale, &c.) there does not appear a single proof that he ever attained that elevation. The interval, however, after the death of Hugh le Despenser, in 1265, during which he might possibly have held the office; it may be remarked, as giving some weight to the suggestion, that the appointment of Robert de Brus as chief justice did not occur till March 1268, a few months after the supposed conclusion of Bracton's career.

Without enlarging, as Prince has done, on his personal reputation, he undoubtedly deserved the character he has obtained as a great lawyer and a learned and able writer. His work 'De Legibus et suetudinibus Angliæ' is a finished systematic performance, giving a complete view of the law in all its titles, as it then it was written.' Reeve (Hist. of Law, ii. 86), from whom this extract is taken, gives an analytical abstract of the several divisions of his chapters, and assists the student by an ample digest of their contents. He considers Bracton as far superior to Glanville; praises his style as clear, expressive, and nervous; and resists the attempt to throw discredit on his fidelity as a writer on the English law, which has been grounded on his reference to the Roman code, showing that it is rather alluded to for illustration and ornament than adduced as authority. His omission of the regulations made by the statute of Marlbridge affords internal evidence of his work having been written before the fifty-second year of Henry's reign, and greatly corroborates the preceding suggestion as to the period of his death.

Mr. Selden's opinion that the work called 'Britton' is only an abridgment of Bracton derives weight from the name of the latter being very frequently called Bretton. (Ibid. 281.)

BRADBURY, GEORGE, the eldest son of Henry Bradbury, of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Middlesex, was called to the bar of the Middle Temple on May 17, 1667. Acting as junior counsel in the famous trial in 1654, in which Lady Ivy attempted to establish her claim to lands at Shadwell by certain deeds of very doubtful authenticity, he alleged that their forgery was manifest, from the description of the year in Philip and Mary's reign, in which they professed to have been executed, being by a title which was not assumed by the king and queen till after the date they bore; and Chief Justice Jeffreys applauded him for the ingenuity of the discovery. Not content with this unaccustomed compliment from his rough chief, he by reiterating his remark later in the trial brought down upon himself this silencing castigation: 'Lord! sir,' exclaimed Jeffreys, 'you must be cackling too. We told you your objection was very ingenious; but that must not make you troublesome; you cannot lay an egg, but you must be cackling over it.'

That he must have been considerably distinguished as a lawyer may be inferred from his being summoned in December 1668, with the chiefs of his profession, to consult with the Lords as to what was to be done on the emergency that had then occurred. In July of the next year he was assumed by the House of Lords as counsel for Sir Adam Blair, Dr. Elliott, and others, the impeachment of whom for dispersing King James's declaration does not appear to have been afterwards prosecuted. On the 9th of the same month he was appointed cursitor baron of the Exchequer, and held the office till his death, which occurred on February 12, 1696. (State Trials, x. 616, 626; Luttrell, i. 490, 555, 557, iv. 17; Parl. Hist. v. 362.)

BRADSHAW, HENRY. Fuller fixes the nativity of Henry Bradshaw in Cheshire, judging from his surname, but evidently knows nothing of his family. He received his legal education at the Inner Temple, and was twice reader to that society—viz., in autumn 1536, and in Lent 1542. In 1540 he was appointed solicitor-general, and became attorney-general in 1545—a period so full of criminal prosecutions that it is remarkable so little is said of his conduct of them. Being created chief baron of the Exchequer on May 21, 1552, he witnessed King Edward's will, settling the crown on Lady Jane Grey, and would probably have been removed from his place by Queen Mary had not death overtaken him three weeks after her accession. He died on July 27, 1553. By his wife Johan, daughter of John Hurst of Kingston-upon-Thames, and widow of William Mainwayringe of Estham in Essex, he had four sons and four daughters. (Dugdale's Orig. 164, 170, 172; Chron. of Queen Jane, 100; Gent. Mag. lix. 1011.)

BRADSHAW, JOHN, as it is now satisfactorily established, was a younger son of Henry Bradshaw, of Marple Hill, in the parish of Stockport in Cheshire, descended from a family of considerable respectability in Derbyshire, his mother being Catherine, daughter of Ralph Winnington, Esq., of Offerton.

Born at Marple in 1602, and baptised in the parish church of Stockport on December 10 in that year, he received his education first at the free school there, and then at Bunbury and Middleton, to all of which he bequeathed large sums for their endowment. Designed for the law, he was called to the bar at Gray's Inn on April 23, 1627, and to the bench of that society on June 23, 1645, when appointed judge of the Sheriffs' Court in London. He probably acted for some years as a provincial counsel, as he lived at Congleton, and served the office of mayor there in 1637, and was afterwards high steward; and at one time of his life he resided in Bradshaw Hall in Bolton, on a stone over the door of which his family arms remain. (Gent. Mag. lxxxviii., i. 328; Baines's Lancashire, i. 640.)

In the year 1643 he became a candidate for the office of one of the judges of the Sheriffs' Court of the city of London, then vacant, his antagonists being Richard Proctor and William Steele, afterwards chief baron. The right of election was claimed by both the Courts of Aldermen and Common Council, and Bradshaw was chosen by the latter on September 21. Immediately afterwards the Court of Aldermen elected Proctor, who thereupon brought an action in the King's (afterwards the Upper) Bench, which, however, did not come to a final hearing till February 1655, when the right was determined to be in the Common Council, with whom it has ever since continued. Bradshaw in the meantime had performed the duties of the office, for in February 1649 he was permitted to appoint a deputy at Guildhall 'in regard of his employment in the High Court.' (Whitelocke, 377.)

Clarendon says (vi. 217) he was 'not much known in Westminster Hall, though of good practice in his chamber and much employed by the factious.' In October 1644 he was assigned as one of the counsel against Lord Macguire for the rebellion in Ireland; and he probably assisted Prynne in his argument to prove that Irish peers were amenable to trial by an English jury. He next appears in the following year as leading Lilburn's appeal to the House of Lords for reparation against the iniquitous sentence of the Star Chamber in 1638; and in the discussions which arose in the two houses in 1646, as to placing the custody of the Great Seal in commissioners who were not members of parliament, he was among those voted by the Commons, but objected to by the Lords. The appointment of chief justice of Chester, however, was given to him in March 1647. In June he was retained as one of the counsel to assist in the prosecution of Judge Jenkins; and on October 12, 1648, he was included in the batch of serjeants then made by the parliament. (Whitelocke, 100, 224; State Trials, iii. 1347.)

When the Lords rejected the ordinance for the trial of the king, and the Commons determined to proceed without their concurrence, the names of the peers and judges who had been appointed were struck out of the commission, and those of Bradshaw, Nicholas, and Steele were substituted; and Bradshaw was dignified with the title of lord president of the so-called High Court of Justice. (Whitelocke, 366, 368.) The selection of a man of so little weight in his profession can only be accounted for by the supposition that the concocters of the tragedy could not prevail on any of the more eminent lawyers to undertake the obnoxious service. Whitelocke and Widdrington had refused the commission; neither Rolle nor St. John, the two chief justices, nor even Chief Baron Wilde, could be entrusted to obey their behest; and their own law-officer, Prideaux, either from objections on his part, or want of confidence on theirs, was displaced, while creatures of their own were appointed temporary attorney and solicitor general to conduct the charge. The trial began on January 20, 1649; and Bradshaw's conduct throughout its continuance fully answered the description of Clarendon (vi. 218), that he administered the office 'with all the pride, impudence, and superciliousness imaginable.' Whatever may be the differences of opinion on the material point of the trial—and great will be the differences among men—no doubt can be entertained that it was ordained by usurped authority, that its end was determined before its commencement, that its proceedings were illegal and undignified, and that the conduct of the president was insolent and overbearing. During the sittings of the court lodgings were provided for him at Sir Abraham Williams's house in New Palace Yard, and all provisions and necessities were ordered to be supplied. He was treated with all the forms of judicial state, decorated with a scarlet robe, a sword and mace were borne before him, and twenty gentlemen were appointed to attend him with partizans. When, after a long speech, he had pronounced the sentence, he was the first to sign the warrant for execution. But, however willing an instrument, he was not altogether a free agent; for all that he did, and almost all that he said, seems to have been directed and dictated by the majority of the commissioners, consisting of the king's most determined enemies. (State Trials, iv. 1008-1154.) In the subsequent trials of the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, and others, he was continued lord president of the court; and the dean's house at Westminster was given to him for ever for his residence and habitation, with a donative of 5000*l.* He became one of the council of state, and being elected its president, is noticed by Whitelocke for his lengthened argument and the inconvenience they occasioned. vote to settle 2000*l.* a year in lands out the Earl of St. Albans' and Lord Cottin ton's estates on him and his heirs was passed and his appointment of chief justice of Chester was renewed, to which the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster afterwards added. He does not seem to have acted as lord president of the High Court of Justice beyond 1650, Serjeant Keeble presiding in 1651, and Serjeant L'Isle in 1654. (Whitelocke, 390, 414, 529; State Trials, v. 43, 518.)

Bradshaw was a staunch republican, looked with a jealous eye on Cromwell's attempt to gain the sole authority. When the ambitious general ejected the Parliament on April 20, 1653, and called the council of state to put an end to the sitting, Bradshaw, who still presided, and boldly addressed him in these words:—'Sir, we have heard what you did this house in the morning, and before twelve hours all England will hear it; but, as you are mistaken to think the parliament dissolved, for no power under heaven can dissolve them but themselves; they will take you notice of that.' (Ludlow, i. 100.) He was not, of course, one of the men selected by the general to sit in what was called Barebone's Parliament; but in it an act was passed for continuing in him the jurisdiction of the county of Lancaster. (Whitelocke, 565.) Cromwell, when he became protector, summoned him to the council, and required him to take out a new commission for his office of chief justice of Chester; but he refused to do so, alleging that he held that place by a grant from the parliament of England, to continue quandiu se bene gesserit; and whether he had carried himself with that integrity which his commission exacted of him he was ready to submit to a trial by twelve men to be chosen by Cromwell himself. Cromwell was silenced, and, though an order was actually signed dismissing him from the office, did not think it safe to prevent him from proceeding on his circuit. In Cromwell's parliament of 1654 Bradshaw was elected member for Cheshire, notwithstanding the protector's attempts to keep him out, and distinguished himself against the court party in the debate whether the government should be in one single person and a parliament. (Parl. Hist. iii. 1428, 1445.) That parliament was soon dissolved; and on summoning another, in September 1658, Cromwell was more successful in his efforts, and Bradshaw was not returned. The distaste between them continued to increase, and Bradshaw was omitted from the list of peers nominated by the protector.

On the death of Cromwell, Bradshaw was returned for Cheshire to Richard's parliament of January 1659. With its dissolution in April the protectorate terminated from mere imbecility, and the remnant of the Long Parliament, nicknamed the Rump, resumed its sittings. Bradshaw, a determined commonwealth's-man, was named on the council of state, and on June 3 was appointed one of the commissioners of the Great Seal, in conjunction with Tyrrell and Fountaine. He had been for eight months suffering from the ague, and was then in the country. His attendance, therefore, was dispensed with at that time, but on July 22 he took the oaths in the house. Ere four months had elapsed this Rump was again dismissed by the army, and Bradshaw, still sick and suffering, attended in the council of state, and almost with his last words expressed 'his abhorrence of that detestable action,' as he called it. (Ludlow, Godwin, Whitelocke.) He then withdrew, and survived the scene about a fortnight, dying on October 31, with the declaration that if the king were to be tried and condemned again, he would be the first man that should do it. His death occurred in the Deanery at Westminster, and he was buried with great pomp in the abbey, his funeral sermon being preached by John Rowe. (Athen.

Oxon. iii. 1129.) On the restoration of Charles II. his body, and those of Cromwell and Ireton, which had been deposited in the same place, were disinterred, and, with every mark of obloquy, were dragged on sledges to Tyburn, where they were hanged on the several angles of a triple gibbet, then beheaded, their trunks thrown into a hole under the gallows, and their heads exposed on poles on the top of Westminster Hall. (Harris's Lives, iii. 520.)

The partisans of the royal and the republican party of course differ essentially in their estimate of Bradshaw's character. The laudation of it during his life by Milton (whom he had patronised, and to whom he bequeathed 10*l.*) is too exaggerated, and Clarendon's description of him after his death is perhaps too severe. Whitelocke's (with whom he was evidently no favourite) is pithy, and nearer the mark: 'A stout man, and learned in his profession, no friend to monarchy.' The best part of his character is his consistency, for he showed as much resistance to the semblance of royalty as to the reality, opposing the usurpation first of Cromwell, and then of the army, as firmly as he had stood against the king.

BRAIOSA, WILLIAM DE, was one of the justices itinerant to impose the assize on the king's demesnes in Herefordshire in 20 Henry II., 1174, but seems to have only been so appointed as sheriff of the county, an office which he held in that and the following year. (Madox, i. 124.)

He was the grandson of a Norman baron of the same name, who, besides his honor of Braiose and other large possessions in Normandy, is recorded in Domesday Book as holding between fifty and sixty lordships in Sussex, Berks, Wilts, Surrey, and Dorset. His successor was Philip de Braiosa, who, by his wife Berta, the daughter of Milo, Earl of Gloucester, was father to this William.

In 3 Henry II. he fined one thousand marks for part of the honor of Barnstaple (Pipe Rolls, 183); and in 1164 he was one of the subscribers to the Constitutions of Clarendon. His favour with King Henry may be estimated by the grant, which he received in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, of the whole kingdom of Limerick. How far he deserved that favour depends on the truth or falsehood of an historian of Wales, who relates his horrible murder of Sitsylt ap Dynswald and a large company of Welshmen, whom he had treacherously invited to a feast in the castle of Ber-gavenny.

In 7 Richard I., 1195-6, he again acted as a justice itinerant in Staffordshire (Madox, i. 546); and for the last seven years of that reign he held the sheriffalty of the county of Hereford.

The preservation of his influence in the early part of King John's reign is shown, not only by his continuance in the office of sheriff of his county, but also by the special charter he received from the king in his second year, exempting the lands of the honor of Braiose from the interference of any of the king's sheriffs or other officers, and giving William de Braiosa sole jurisdiction there. (Ibid. 150.) About the ninth or tenth year of that reign he was the subject of royal persecution. One states the cause to have been that he refused to give the hostages which the king demanded to secure the obedience of his barons; another, that the king banished him for carrying war into Wales, and killing above three thousand men in the battle of Elvel; while the king's own narrative, as recorded in the Red Book of the Exchequer, attributes his outlawry to the nonpayment of five thousand marks, which he owed for the province of Munster, in Ireland, and of five years' arrears of the ferm of Limerick; to the repeated evasion of his promises to pay these moneys; to his resistance to the processes of distress sent against his castles; and to his rebellious conduct throughout the proceedings. The result was the capture of his wife and their eldest son, William, whom King John in 1210 barbarously commanded to be famished in their prison in Windsor Castle. The baron himself escaped, in the habit of a beggar, into France, where he died about 1212, and was buried in the abbey of St. Victor at Paris.

His wife was Maud de Haya, or St. Valerie, to whose instigation the murder of the guests at Bergavenny is attributed, and on whose violence is charged all the subsequent misfortunes of her family. Her husband, though a bold and active soldier, seems from some accounts to have been of a pious and kindly disposition, making grants to the monks with no niggardly hand, and remarkable for his charity and courtesy to the poor.

His issue consisted of three sons and four daughters. William, the eldest son, called Gam, perished by starvation with his mother, at Windsor; Giles was brought up to the Church, and became Bishop of Hereford; and Reginald succeeded in assuaging the wrath of the king, and regaining part of his father's possessions. (Lord Lyttelton's Henry II. iii. 339; Wendover, ii. 384, iii. 129, 225, 234, 237.)

BRAMSTON, JOHN, whose ancestor, William Bramston, was sheriff of London in 18 Richard II., 1394-95, was grandson of John, a mercer in the same city, and son of Roger Bramston, of Whitechapel, who first established himself in Essex. His mother was Priscilla, daughter of Francis Clovile, of West Haningfield Hall, and widow of Thomas Rushee, of Boreham, both in that county.

John Bramston, their eldest son, was born on May 18, 1577, at Maldon, and after receiving his early instruction in the free school there, he finished his education at Jesus College, Cambridge. Having entered the Middle Temple, he was duly called to the bar in 1602, and chosen in 1607 by his university as one of their counsel. In the preceding year he had married Bridget, daughter of Dr. Thomas Moundeford, an eminent physician of Milk Street, London. He was selected as Lent reader in 1623, when his reading was on the statute 32 Henry VIII. c. 2, concerning limitations; and again in the following autumn, when he took the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, as his subject, treating on fraudulent conveyances. In Michaelmas Term he was one of the fifteen who took the degree of the coif; not, however, without contributing, as all the others did, 500*l.* to King James's purse. Obtaining great practice, as well in the courts of law as in Chancery, the Court of Wards, and the Star Chamber, he was selected in 1626 by the Earl of Bristol to defend him; in 1627 he pleaded for Sir John Heveningham, who was imprisoned for not contributing to the loan (State Trials, ii. 1380, iii. 6); in 1628 he was retained by the city of London as their counsel, with a fee pro consilio impensum et impendendo; and in 1630 he was constituted chief justice of Ely, on the nomination of the then bishop of that see, which was confirmed by his successor. He was made the queen's serjeant on March 2, 1632, and King Charles advanced him on July 8, 1634, to be one of his serjeants and knighted him.

After the death of his first wife, leaving a numerous family, he married in 1631, his second wife, Elizabeth, the daughter of Lord Brabazon, and the relict already of two husbands, the first being George Mobergomerie, Bishop of Clogher, and the second Sir John Brereton, the king's serjeant in Ireland. He had no children by her, and she died in 1647, leaving him a second time a widower. Soon after his second marriage he purchased the estate of Skreenes, in Roxwell, Essex, for 500*l.* from Thomas Weston, afterwards Earl of Portland.

On the death of Sir Thomas Richardson he was called upon to fill the then very enviable place of chief justice of King's Bench, and received his patent April 14, 1635. The people were discontented and seditiously inclined; Charles was raising money by various means without the aid of parliament, which had not met for six years; the war for ship money had just been issued, created general excitement. Bramston, who evidently was conscientious in considering that it was legally impossible, chief justice headed the opinion favour that was given by all the judges, in answer to the case which the king had laid before them. In the prosecution of Hampden he supported that opinion upon the general principle that the defence of the realm must be at the subjects' charge; but, notwithstanding, gave his vote against the crown upon a technical point, that by the record it did not appear to whom the money assessed was due. (State Trials, iii. 1243.)

One of the earliest proceedings of the Long Parliament, which met in November 1640, was to impeach Chief Justice Bramston and five other of the judges who had given this answer to the king; and he was obliged to give security in 10,000*l.* to abide his trial. The principal charge against him was for signing the opinion, and did not touch his judgment in the case of Hampden. His answer, which his son thinks, though prepared and signed by counsel, was never called for, was that he, like Croke and Hutton, subscribed only for conformity, for he was overruled by the rest of the judges in his wish to insert that the charge could not be made except in case of necessity, and only during the time and continuance of that necessity. When the king went to York in July 1642 he commanded the attendance of the chief justice, and, though Bramston sent his sons to excuse him on account of the danger which those who had become bound for his appearance before the parliament would incur, the injunctions for his presence were reiterated. Bramston, however, from the same motives determined to stay away.

The consequence was, that on October 16, 1642, the king revoked his appointment (Rymer, xx. 536); but, as if to show that it was not from royal displeasure, sent him a patent as king's serjeant on the 10th of the following February. It is curious that this patent was granted a few days after the king had received the propositions of the Lords and Commons for an accommodation; one of which was a prayer that he would make Sir John Bramston chief justice of the King's Bench. By this it is evident that the parliament were not very inveterate against Sir John; and it seems probable that the king appointed him his serjeant as an earnest of his intention, if the negotiation had succeeded, to replace him in his office in compliance with the parliament's request. As a further proof that that body held him absolved, and esteemed him to be, as Lord Clarendon calls him, 'a man of great learning and integrity,' they made several attempts to induce him to resume his judicial duties, and when he refused, as another had superseded him, they ordered him to be advised with on some legal business before them. In January 1646-7 the Commons named him as one of the lords commissioners of the Great Seal; but by his interest with the peers he induced them to pass him over. In the following March the same attempt was made with the like result. In the interim the Lords had voted that he should sit in their house as an assistant; but without refusing the appointment he managed to avoid the attendance; and in April a vote was passed that he should be one of the judges of the Common Pleas (White Locke, 108-245), which he also declined. His son says that Cromwell, after he became protector, urged Sir John in 1654 to take the office of chief justice again, but that he excused himself, pleading his old age, then verging on seventy-seven. On September 22 of that year he died at Skreens after a very short illness, and was buried in Roxwell Church.

Fuller (i. 349) gives him the character of being 'accomplished with all qualities requisite for a person of his place and profession, . . . deep learning, solid judgment, integrity of life, and gravity of behaviour;' adding that 'he deserved to live in better times.'

Six children survived him, three sons and three daughters. The present representative of his eldest son now resides at Skreens, which took its name from Serjeant William Skrene, in the reign of Henry IV., and was afterwards possessed by Richard Weston, judge of the Common Pleas in the reign of Elizabeth, from one of whose family it was purchased by Chief Justice Bramston. (Bramston's Autobiography.)

BRAMSTON, FRANCIS, the third surviving son of the above-named Sir John Bramston, was removed from a considerable school in Goldsmith's Alley, Cripplegate, London, kept by Mr. Farnabie, to Queens' College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1640. He was so feeble and unhealthy at this time that Dr. Martin, the master, wrote to his father that 'it was a great pitie so great a soul should have so weak a body;' and, to prove that this was no flattery, chose him in 1642 fellow of his college. He was admitted of the society of the Middle Temple in 1634, and was called to the bar on June 14, 1642. The troubles that followed putting a stop to his professional pursuits, 'the drumming trumpets,' as his brother expresses it, 'blowing his gown over his ears,' he travelled for four years into France and Italy, associating with Mr. Henshaw, Mr. Howard, and Mr. Evelyn. On his return he is not mentioned in the reports till the Restoration, when his steadiness to the royal cause secured him employment.

In August 1660 he was made steward of some of the king's courts in Essex, and of the liberty of Havering; and in 1665 his university chose him for their counsel, with a fee of 40s. a year. He was chosen reader of his inn in 1668. The extravagance of the feast on this occasion is noticed by Evelyn, who relates that there were present at it 'the Duke of Ormond, privy seal, Bedford, Belaysys, Halifax, and a world more of earles and lords.' (Evelyn, ii. 303.)

In the following year he was one of the large batch of serjeants who were created, and he received the stewardship of the Court of Pleas at Whitchapel, with a salary of 100*l*. His next advance was to the bench of the Exchequer, being constituted a baron on June 17, 1678. Within a year, however, he was summarily discharged from this seat with three other judges—Wilde, Thurland, and Bertie—all of them being dismissed on April 29, 1679, for no express cause, but upon the king's forming a new council of thirty, and admitting Lord Shaftesbury into the ministry as its president. Though a pension of 500*l*. a year was assigned to him, he 'was never paid but only three terms,' so low was the Exchequer then; and so difficult was it to obtain any payment that the arrears were not received till above three years after his death; and of the various delays and excuses in obtaining it his brother gives a very amusing account in his interesting autobiography. The judge did not resume his practice at the bar, but, keeping his chamber at Serjeants' Inn, he died there four years afterwards, on March 27, 1683, and was buried in Roxwell Church. Never having been married, he left his brother, Sir John, his heir, who in his biography gives a very pleasing character of him.

BRAMWELL, GEORGE WILLIAM WILSHIRE, is the son of George Bramwell, a banker. He was born in London, and was called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn in May 1838. He travelled the Home Circuit, and gained so good a reputation in his profession as to be appointed on the commission of enquiry into the process, practice, and system of pleadings in the superior courts. In 1851 he received a silk gown, and was raised to the bench in January 1856 as a baron of the Exchequer, and was thereupon knighted.

He married, according to Dod's Peerage, a daughter of Bruno Silva.

BRANCESTREE, JOHN DE, is introduced by Sir T. D. Hardy (Cat. 6) among the keepers of the Great Seal in 1203 and 1205 on the authority of charters of 5 and 7 John. Those charters are subscribed with the words 'Data per manum J. de Brancestree, Archid. Wigorn.' If this be sufficient to ground the title, he should have been so designated at an earlier date, as there are some charters given under his hand in September 1200, 2 John, as well as others so signed by him in conjunction with Hugh de Wells in August and September of that year.

He also subscribed several in the same manner in May, June, and July 1203, 5 John; but in 7 John there is only one charter so authenticated, which happens to be the first after the death of Archbishop Hubert, the chancellor, and is dated July 24, 1205.

On all these occasions the charters were authenticated by him in the form specified; but that he could not be a vice-chancellor or keeper is shown by the fact that during the same period he attested several charters as a witness, when the name of some other person was attached to the form of authentication. And this occurred not only then, but both at an earlier and a later period also, commencing from March 1200, 1 John, proceeding throughout the second year, and continuing at intervals up to May 5, 1208, 9 John.

There seems very little doubt that the persons whose names appear upon these authentications of the charters, when not otherwise described, were merely clerks of the Chancery, or officers in the treasury of the Exchequer. (See Judges of England, ii. 8 et seq.)

He received the reward usually accorded to these officers, by being advanced to the dignity of archdeacon of Worcester some time in 1200, and also grants of the church of Frotheham, in the diocese of Lincoln, in 3 John; of the perpetual vicarage of Brancestree in Norfolk, probably his native place, in 9 John; and of the prebend of Lidington in Lincoln Cathedral, in 10 John. In these grants the king calls him 'his clerk,' and in 6 John two sheaves of corn (garbas) out of the king's demesne of Wich ton, in Norfolk, are conferred upon him, which are described as having been before granted by Henry II., 'cuidam clericorum suorum.' (Rot. Claus. i. 4.) Again, in 7 John the custody of the abbey of Malmesbury, and in 7 John that of the abbey of Ramsey were entrusted to him, charge in which the officers in question were frequently engaged. In 6 John he went to Flanders on the king's service, and twenty marks allowed for his expenses (J. i. 14); and there are entries on the Rot. de Prestitis of 12 John (211, 2:37) showing that payments from the royal treasury were made through his hands. That was of a joyous disposition, and that king understood his character, may be surmised from the grant in 7 John of a dole of good wine of price, and of two moles in 9 John. He died in 1218. (Le Neve, i. 104.)

BRAYBROC, ROBERT DE, so called from the place of his residence in Northamptonshire, was the son of Ingebard, by his Albrede, one of the daughters and co-heiress of Ivo Newmarch. In 9 Richard he accounted for the ferm of Bitebroc in Northamptonshire (land (Madox, i. 235)); and in the following year he was sheriff of the united counties of Northampton and Northampton.

of Bedford and Buckingham under William de Albini, an office which he continued to hold, with an interval of two or three years, till 15 John. His county of Northampton, also, he held as sheriff from 10 to 15 John, and that of Rutland from 12 to 15 John. (Fuller's Worthies.) That he filled some office in the court at Westminster appears by a notice on the great roll of 11 John that certain accounts were rendered 'in camera regis' before Richard de Marisco and Robert de Braybroc (Madox, ii. 252); and in the same year the Rotulus Misse (148) records a payment to him of three hundred marks to be placed in the treasury at Northampton.

His name appears among the justiciers before whom fines were acknowledged in 1 and 8 John.

From some cause not explained, he got into disgrace with King Richard, in the tenth year of whose reign he fined 180 marks to be restored to his favour; but it is clear, from what has already been stated, that King John did not remove his confidence. He granted him in 7 John the manor of Coreby in Northamptonshire, and Dugdale (Baronage, i. 728) states that he made him master of his wardrobe and one of his council, distinguishing him with the special favour of allowing him to hunt in the royal forest. Roger de Wendover (iii. 237) names him as one of John's 'consiliarios iniquissimos' in the time of the interdict.

His death occurred during the last year of his sheriffalty, 15 John, when he was succeeded by his son Henry.

BRAYBROC, HENRY DE, was the eldest son of the last-named Robert de Braybroc, with whom he was united in the sheriffalties of Rutland, Northampton, and Buckingham and Bedford for the last two or three years of his father's life, but in 16 John he held them alone. Up to this period he had supported the king throughout his difficulties, but in that year (probably on his father's death) he united with the barons, and took so leading a part that he was excommunicated by name, and the whole of his possessions seized into the king's hands. At the death of John he still continued in rebellion, and successfully resisted the royal forces at the castle of Montorel. (Wendover, iii. 237, 301, 356.) On the ultimate retirement of Prince Louis, however, he returned to his allegiance, and in September 1217 his lands were restored to him. (Rot. Claus. i. 321.)

Having been appointed, in 8 Henry III., one of the justices itinerant to take the seizures of novel disseisin for the counties of Buckingham and Bedford, at Dunstable, he and his associates fined Faukes de Breaute 100*l.* on each of more than thirty verdicts: and against him for violent seizure of the property of his neighbours. Faukes, having hitherto acted with impunity, was too self-willed to submit tamely, but on the instant directed his brother William, with all the garrison of Bedford Castle, to seize the judges and put them into strict confinement. They all escaped, however, except Henry de Braybroc, who was taken and carried to the castle, where, though no injury was done to his person, he was treated with the greatest indignity. His wife Christiana, daughter of Wiscard Ledet, immediately appeared before the parliament then sitting at Northampton, and, loudly calling for justice, the indignant king took the most active measures to avenge the affront. Proceeding with a formidable force at once to Bedford, he demanded the release of the incarcerated judge, which was boldly refused. A regular siege then commenced on June 16, and so stoutly was the castle defended that it was not till August 15 that the garrison were forced to submit, when, so high was the king's indignation raised, that he ordered Faukes's brother William, who had been left in command, with several other knights, to be hanged on the spot. (Wendover, iv. 94.) Henry de Braybroc was thus released, and was afterwards employed to see the castle totally destroyed and the materials distributed according to the king's order. In the following year he was again appointed justice itinerant for the same counties, and in 10 Henry III. for the counties of Lincoln and York, in the former of which his wife had property. He is mentioned as 'Justiciarius de Banco' in a record of 11 Henry III., and Dugdale quotes a fine levied before him two years afterwards. (Madox, ii. 335.)

He died before June 1234, 18 Henry III., as in that year his widow paid a fine for permission to marry whom she pleased. They had two sons—Wischar, who afterwards took his mother's name of Ledet; and John, who retained the name of Braybroc. One of the descendants of the latter was Robert de Braybroke, Bishop of London, subsequently noticed; and another was Sir Reginald Braybroc, who in the reign of Henry IV. married the heiress of the Lord Cobham. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 728.)

BRAYBROKE, ROBERT DE (BISHOP OF LONDON), a lineal descendant from the above Henry de Braybroc, was a younger son of Sir Gerard Braybroke, who died in 1359, by Isabella his wife. Educated for the Church, he successively became a canon of Lichfield, archdeacon of Cornwall in 1376, dean of Salisbury in 1380, and ultimately Bishop of London on September 9 1381, as successor to William de Courteneye. (Le Neve.)

He was appointed Chancellor of England on September 9, 1382, 6 Richard II., but did not receive the Seal till the 30th. Of his acts while in that office nothing is recorded beyond his opening the parliament in October, and his tenure of it was very short; for, in consequence of some disagreement between him and John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, he was removed on March 10, 1383, the record delicately suggesting that he 'desired with great earnestness to be exonerated from the office.'

The remainder of his life, which extended till August 27, 1404, was devoted to his episcopal duties. He was buried in his own cathedral. Pepys records (iii. 9) the discovery of his body in a complete state of preservation after the fire of London in 1666; and in 'Notes and Queries' (2nd s. iii. 186) there is a curious account of its subsequent mutilation.

BRAYTON, or DRAYTON, THOMAS DE, had a grant of the prebend of Fynglas, in the church of Glasgow, in 13 Edward II. In 3 Edward III. he accompanied the king to France, and was engaged in various missions of trust for several of the following years. His appointment as a clerk in the Chancery, it would appear, occurred about 6 Edward III., as in the parliament of that year he was a receiver of the petitions. (Rot. Parl. ii. 68.) From 14 to 27 Edward III. he was frequently one of those entrusted with the custody of the Great Seal, either during the absence of the chancellors or in the intervals of vacancy in the office from 1340 to 1453. He continued to act as a clerk of the Chancery till 33 Edward III., 1359 (New Fadera, iii. 452), after which his name is not mentioned.

He is frequently called Thomas de Drayton in the Rolls of Parliament. (ii. 146-264.) If this was his right name, he was probably connected with a Norfolk family having possessions at Great Yarmouth. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 103, 242.)

BREAUTE, FAUKES DE, frequently acted as a justice itinerant, and Fuller says that he was a native of Middlesex, and that his family were named 'de Brent,' from the rivulet so called in that county. Matthew Paris, on the only occasion in which he gives him a surname, also calls him 'de Brent,' but he describes him as a bastard, born in Normandy. This seems to be supported by the fact that for eight years after 7 John (when he is first mentioned) he is never described except by his Christian name, Falcasius or Fulco. Neither does Roger de Wendover add any surname. Dugdale, both in his 'Baronage' and 'Chronica Series,' calls him 'de Breant;' but the rolls after 15 John invariably name him 'de Breaute,' or 'de Braute.' The probability is that this name was given him from a town so called in the department of the Lower Seine.

In 7 John he was sent with others to Poitou with one thousand marks (Rot. Parl. 59); in 10 John he was sheriff of Glamorganshire, and was actively employed in the Welsh marches until the fifteenth year of that reign. He then was sent with the Earl of Salisbury and others on a mission to Flanders, taking with them ten thousand marks. (Rot. Claus. i. 139, 145.) Zealously supporting King John in the wars with his barons during the last years of his reign, he was one of the generals left to check them in London when the king marched to the north in 1215. In the following November he took the castle of William Malduit, of Hamslope, and a few days afterwards that of Bedford. (Wendover, iii. 347, 349.)

In reward for his energetic proceedings the king granted to him the latter castle, and also gave him in marriage a rich but unwilling bride, Margaret, daughter of Warin Fitz-Gerold, and widow of Baldwin de Ripariis, or de Betun, Earl of Albemarle, the son of William, Earl of Devon, together with the wardship of her son Baldwin, and the custody of his lands. Part of these were in South Lambeth, where he built a hall or mansion-house, which was called by his name, and is termed Faukeshall, or 'La Sale Fawkes,' in 10 Edward I. It is mentioned in the charter of Isabella de Fortibus, Countess of Albemarle and Devon and Lady of the Isle of Wight, dated in 1293, by which she sold her possessions to King Edward I. (Archæol. Journ. iv. 275.) Edward the Black Prince, by licence from his father, gave it in 1363 to the chapter of Canterbury for permission to found a chantry in the crypt of the cathedral, where two priests were to pray for his soul. (Stanley's Hist. Mem. of Canterbury, 1131.) It still belongs to the chapter; and preserving its name ever since, it was known as a favourite place of suburban retirement, but has been lately converted into building land. Faukes was also appointed seneschal to the king, and obtained a mandate for all constables to treat him hospitably when he came to their castles. (Rot. Claus. i. 190; Rot. Pat. 135.) On favours flowed in upon him; the castles, sheriffalties of Oxford, Northampton, Bedford and Buckingham, and Huntingdon and Cambridge, were entrusted to him; and continued to hold them for the first 40 years of King Henry's reign.

On the accession of Henry III. his brother was instrumental in securing the throne to him. But, although valiant and courageous, he was brutal and oppressive. Not during the war was he cruel in his actions, but even after the peace with France had been completed, and the rebels barons had returned to their allegiance, the desire of plunder would not allow him to desist from the most arbitrary claims. When the king was declared of full age, and was advised to resume the custody of his castles, Faukes was one of those who joined with the Earl of Albemarle in resisting the mandate; but he was at last compelled to submit. During the whole of this time, however, he received many proofs of royal favour, showing that his services were too valuable, and he too powerful, to permit his delinquencies to be examined with strictness. His reliance on this impunity increased his boldness, until his presumption betrayed him into excesses which were fatal to him. His tyranny and violence became so oppressive that his neighbours at last resisted, and, proceeding against him in the King's Court, three judges were sent down to try the cases at Dunstable, where no less than thirty verdicts were found against him, and fines of 100*l.* in each of them were imposed.

The haughty baron resolved to be revenged, and sent his brother William with a band of his followers to seize the judges. Two of them, Martin de Pateshull and Thomas de Muleton, escaped; the third, Henry de Braybroc, was unluckily captured and taken to Bedford Castle, where he was treated with every indignity. When this outrage was communicated to the council, then sitting at Northampton, they proceeded on the instant to his chastisement. His castle at Bedford was taken, though not till after two months' siege, and William, the brother of Faukes, with twenty-four other knights, was hanged. Faukes himself escaped into Wales, but, not succeeding in enlisting any powers in his cause, and hearing that the king had confiscated all his possessions (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 117), he prepared to return. The king issued an order to the sheriffs of Shropshire and Staffordshire to seize him and his followers. He however reached the court in safety, and, placing himself at the royal mercy, gave up into the king's hands all his property and possessions. (Rymer, i. 175.) Delivered into the custody of Eustace de Fauconberg, Bishop of London, his case was heard in the following March, 1225, whereupon the nobles, preserving his life in consideration of his former services, banished him the realm for ever. On landing in Normandy he was taken before the King of France, where he again narrowly escaped a disgraceful death; but, being signed with the cross, he was permitted to proceed on his journey to Rome. There he induced the pope to interfere with King Henry on his behalf; but that monarch was inexorable; and the life of Faukes, about 1228, was terminated by poison administered in a tub at St. Ciriac.

The manor of Whitchurch, in Berks, was assigned to his wife for her support, and she was allowed to answer to the king for all the debts owed to him at the rate of three hundred marks a year. The Close Rolls contain numerous entries of the restoration of lands to their possessors, from whom Faukes had unjustly seized them.

His daughter Eve married Lewellyn-ap-Jorwerth, Prince of North Wales. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 743; Wendover, iv. 10-137; Rapin, iii. 10-26.)

BRENCHESLEY, WILLIAM, by his marriage with Joane de Benenden, became lord of the manor of Benenden, near Cranbrook, in Kent. There is little account of his early career as a lawyer, except that he is mentioned in Richard Bellewe's Reports, and that he was one of the king's serjeants in 14 Richard II.

He attended the parliament of 21 Richard II., and was called upon to say what he thought of the answers which had been given by the judges to the questions proposed to them by Chief Justice Tresilian. He replied that they seemed to him to be good and loyal, and that he should have given the same. (Rot. Parl. iii. 358.) His fear of the consequences of expressing a different opinion, and still more his immediate prospect of advancement, probably prompted him upon the occasion; for in Trinity Term in the following year we find a fine acknowledged before him as a judge of the Common Pleas.

On the deposition of Richard II., King Henry made him a knight of the Bath on the day of his coronation, and continued him in his place in the Common Pleas, which he retained till Easter 1406.

He died on the 20th of May following at his house in Holborn, and was buried in Canterbury Cathedral, where his widow, who lived till 1453, built a small chapel or chantry. They left no children. (Hasted, xi. 347; Weever, 235.)

BREREWOOD, ROBERT. The family of Brerewood were flourishing citizens of Chester. The judge's grandfather is called a wet-glover there, and was thrice mayor. His uncle, Edward, was a famous scholar, and became the first Gresham professor of astronomy. His father, John, the mayor's eldest son, was sheriff of Chester; and the judge himself was born there about 1588. He was admitted into Brazenose College, Oxford, in 1605, and two years afterwards became a member of the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar on November 13, 1615. After a lengthened practice of two-and-twenty years, during which he published several of his uncle's works, he was appointed a judge of North Wales in 1637, was chosen reader to his inn in the Lent following, and at Easter 1639 was elected recorder of his native city. The degree of the coif was conferred upon him in 1640, and in Hilary Term 1641 he was made king's serjeant. Receiving the honour of knighthood in December 1643, he was advanced to the bench at Oxford on the 31st of the next month. The exercise of Sir Robert's judicial functions was, however, of short continuance, and he never performed them in Westminster Hall.

Witnessing the extinction of regal authority, and lamenting his royal master's untimely death, he passed the remainder of his days in the retirement of his home, and dying there on September 8, 1654, he was buried in St. Mary's Church at Chester.

He married, first, Anna, daughter of Sir Randle Mainwaring, of Over Pever in Cheshire, and, secondly, Katherine, daughter of Sir Richard Lea, of Lea and Dernhall, in the same county, and left several children by each of them. (Ath. Oxon. ii. 140.)

BRETON, JOHN LE (afterwards BISHOP OF HEREFORD), is stated to have been the son of a knight of that name, who, with his wife, was buried at Abbey Dore in Herefordshire. (Archæol. Journ. xix. 35.) Brought up to the double profession of the law and the church, he had the county and castle of Hereford committed to his custody in 38 Henry III. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 13), and was raised to the judicial bench at the latter end of 50 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 430.) In the next year the keeper of the wardrobe was directed by the king to supply 'Johanni le Breton et Henrico de Monteforti, justiciariis suis,' with the full robes which the other judges were accustomed to be provided with. (Selden's Hengham Magna, 5.) The entries of assizes before him continue till the end of December 1268, or beginning of January 1269. On the 13th of the latter month the king consented to his election as Bishop of Hereford, when he no doubt retired from the bench. He was consecrated in the following July, and presided over the see about six years, dying in May 1275, 3 Edward I. (Godwin.)

The work called 'Britton,' which is a compendium of the English law, was at one time attributed to this judge and bishop. But from the contents it is manifest that it must have been written after 13 Edward I., inasmuch as the author cites a statute passed in that year, as well as another enacted in 6 Edward I., both of which periods were subsequent to the bishop's death. The work has been considered by others, and this seems the better opinion, to be little more than an abridgment of Bracton, with the addition of the subsequent alterations in the law; and the probability of this acquires greater weight when it is remembered that Bracton's name was sometimes written Britton or Bretton.

(Hengham, ut supra; Reeves's Engl. Law, ii. 280.)

BRETON, JOHN LE. The family of Breton held considerable possessions in Norfolk, but to what branch of it this John le Breton belonged is uncertain. He was probably the 'Dominus de Sporle' of that name who joined in the barons' letter to Pope Boniface VIII. in 29 Edward I. On January 9, 1305, 33 Edward I., he was one of the justices of trailbaston, then appointed for the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and again in 1307. In 3 Edward II. he was an assessor of the twenty-fifth granted in Norfolk, and he died in the next year. (Parl. Writs, i. 497, 592; Rot. Parl. i. 218.)

BRETON, WILLIAM LE, OR BRITO, as he is frequently called in the earlier part of his life, was the brother of the after-mentioned Ranulph Brito, and was engaged in various ways in the service of Henry III. Fifty marks were paid out of the treasury to him and another in 6 Henry III. to purchase robes for the use of the king; and two years subsequently he held a judicial appointment in the court at Durham, he and his associates being commanded not to hold plea on any writ of the bishop which his predecessors had not been accustomed to issue. In 10 Henry III. he seems to have had some regulation of the ports, as he is directed to allow a person to send his corn in a ship to London, taking security that it is carried nowhere else. (Rot. Claus. i. 492, 631, ii. 118.)

From 11 to 16 Henry III. he held the sheriffalty of Kent in conjunction with Hubert de Burgh. (Hasted, i. 180.) His next advance was to the office of one of the justices or custodes of the Jews on July 1234, 18 Henry III., which he held three years afterwards. (Madox, i. 234, ii. 317.)

He evidently became a regular justice, and it is probable that he was appointed in the same year he acted as a justitinerant in the county of Surrey, 32 Henry III., 1248. In the next year there are only writs of assize to be taken before him, but he was also united with the same associates as in the last, in three several commissions. The writs of assize have name inserted as late as August 1259.

He died in 45 Henry III., 1261, having considerable property in Northampton and other counties, for which his son John le Breton did homage, paying 100 for relief. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 573, 349; Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 20.)

BRETT, WILLIAM BALIOL, one of the present justices of the Common Pleas, appointed as an additional judge under statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, for amending the laws relating to petitions.

He is the son of the Rev. Joseph C. Brett, of Ranelagh, Chelsea, by Do daughter of George Best, Esq., of Chilton Park, Kent. He was born at Chelsea on August 13, 1815, and educated at Westminster School, and Caius College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1840, and distinguished himself both as a mathematician and as a boating man. Entering Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar in January 1846, and joined the Northern Circuit. His success is evidenced by his soon becoming leader in the Passage Court of Liverpool, and by his being appointed a revising barrister in the districts adjacent. He was employed also on several government commissions and by the Court of Admiralty. His practice in London was very extensive, and continued so after he was raised to the rank of queen's counsel in March 1861. From July 1866 till his elevation to the bench he sat in parliament as member for Helston, for which he was re-elected on being appointed solicitor-general by the Derby ministry in February 1868. He was then knighted. The act above alluded to was passed on July 31 of that year, and Sir William was one of the three new judges appointed under it on August 24.

He married Eugenie, daughter of Louis Mayer, Esq.

BRETTON, HENRY DE. See BRACTON.

BRIDGEMAN, ORLANDO, belonged to the family of Bridgeman originally settled in Gloucestershire, a younger son of which, having removed to Exeter, became the father of Dr. John Bridgeman, who, after holding the living of Wigan in Lancashire, was made Bishop of Chester in 1619. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Helyar, canon of Exeter and archdeacon of Barnstaple, he was the father of several sons, the second of whom was the judge.

Orlando Bridgeman was born at Exeter on January 30, 1608. He entered Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1621, and he took his master's degree at Midsummer 1624, and was elected fellow of Magdalen College. In November of that year he was admitted a member of the Inner Temple, and, having been called to the bar on February 10, 1632, became a bencher a few weeks before the restoration of Charles II. He was made king's counsel in the duchy of Lancaster and judge of the county palatine of Chester in 1638; and was in 1640 appointed attorney of the Court of Wards, and solicitor-general to Charles, Prince of Wales, when he was knighted. He also had a grant in reversion of the office of keeper of the writs and rolls in the Common Pleas. (Rymer, xi. 447, 541; Bp. Bridgeman's MS. Ledger.)

In the Long Parliament of 1640 he was returned for Wigan, his father's former rectory, in which the family seems to have had some interest, as Anthony Wood relates that Sir Orlando about 1662 conferred the living upon John Hall, Bishop of Chester. He showed himself a strenuous supporter of monarchical government, voting against Lord Strafford's attainder, and opposing the ordinance by which the militia was taken out of the hands of the king. (Parl. Hist. ii. 611, 756; Whitelocke, 59.) When the civil war commenced he left the parliament and assisted his father the bishop in keeping the city of Chester firm in its adherence to the royal cause. In 1645 he was one of the king's commissioners in the fruitless endeavours to conclude a treaty of peace at Uxbridge, where Charles was somewhat dissatisfied at his carriage, expressing his surprise that the son of a bishop should have been willing to make any condescensions in matters of the Church. Clarendon (iii. 448) also joins in this censure, and, though giving him credit for excellent parts and honest inclinations, says, 'he was so much given to find out expedients to satisfy unreasonable men that he would at last be drawn to yield to anything he should be powerfully pressed to do.' On the ultimate success of the parliamentary party Sir Orlando discontinued his practice at the bar, but, as Ludlow relates (p. 401), 'upon his submission to Cromwell, was permitted to practise in a private manner.' He devoted his time to conveyancing, in which department he became, it is said, the great oracle, not only of his fellow-sufferers, but also of the whole nation in matters of law—his very enemies not thinking their estates secure without his advice. After his death his collections were published under the title of 'Bridgeman's Conveyancer,' which had so high a reputation that five editions were issued from the press.

His learning insured him immediate employment on the Restoration. Two days after the king's return he was invested with the serjeant's coif, followed on the next day by his promotion to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer. In the same week his loyalty was rewarded with a baronetcy, in which he is described of Great Lever in Lancashire, a property not far from Wigan. Pepys speaks of another seat in the county called Ashton Hall, near Lancaster, in which he caused four great places to be left in the great hall window for coats of arms. 'In one he hath put the Levers', with this motto, "Olim;" in another, the Ashton's, with this, "Heri;" in the next, his own, with this, "Hodie;" in the fourth, nothing but this motto, "Cras nescio cujus." (Pepys, i. 349.)

The principal duty that he had to perform as lord chief baron was to preside at the trials of the regicides, which lasted from the 9th to the 19th of October 1660. Three days after their termination Sir Orlando was promoted to the chief seat in the Common Pleas. He sat in that court for nearly seven years, in high esteem as an able exponent of the law and an impartial administrator of justice.

That he was sometimes too precise in his legal interpretations is exemplified by a story told by Roger North (p. 97), that when it was proposed to move his court, which was placed near the door of Westminster Hall and exposed to the wind, into a back room called the treasury, the chief justice would not agree to it, declaring it was against Magna Charta, which enacts that the Common Pleas shall be held in certo loco (in a certain place), with which he asserted the distance of an inch from that place is inconsistent, and that all pleas would be coram non iudice.

On the removal of Lord Clarendon the Great Seal was given to Sir Orlando on August 30, 1667, as lord keeper; but no successor was appointed to take his place in the Common Pleas till May 1668. He, therefore, during the interval filled both offices, which it was said were not incompatible; and though he did not sit in his old court, fines appear to have been levied before him during the whole of the time. (Siderfin, 2, 338; Dugdale's Orig. 49.) While he held the Seal, both Pepys (iv. 88) and Evelyn (ii. 376) state that he resided at Essex House in the Strand.

It is to Lord Clarendon's credit that he writes not a word in depreciation of his successor. Neither Burnet nor Roger North are so abstinent. The former says (i. 253, 307) that in his new office he did not long maintain the esteem he had previously acquired, and that his study and practice had lain so entirely in the common law that he never seemed to apprehend what equity was; nor had he a head made for business and for such a court. Roger North (Lives, 88; Evamen, 38) is more particular in his animadversions. He described the lord keeper 'as timorous to an impotence, and that not mended by his great age. He laboured very much to please every body, a temper of ill consequence to a judge. It was observed of him that if a cause admitted of diverse doubts, which the lawyers call points, he would never give all on one side; but either party should have something to go away with. And in his time the Court of Chancery ran out of order into delays and endless motions in causes; so that it was like a fair field overgrown with briars.' After holding the Seal for about five years, he was made the victim of the strong parties which opposed him, and was removed on November 17, 1672. He died on June 25, 1674, at Teddington in Middlesex, where he lies buried. All parties unite in acknowledging his amiable disposition, his honest principles, his piety, his moderation, and his learning; to the last of which the late Lord Ellenborough (14 East's Reports, 134)—himself a great authority—bore honourable testimony, in calling him 'that most eminent judge,' and speaking of 'the profundity of his learning and the extent of his industry.'

He married, first, in 1627, Judith, daughter and heir of John Kynaston, Esq., of Morton in Shropshire, who died in 1644; and secondly, Dorothy, daughter of Dr. Saunders, provost of Oriel College, Oxford, and relict of George Cradock, Esq., of Carswell Castle in Staffordshire. By his first marriage he had a daughter and one son; by his second two sons and a daughter. The baronetcy, of course, devolved upon Sir John, his son by the first venter; but a second baronetcy was granted in 1673, the year following Sir Orlando's retirement from the Seal, to the eldest son by the second venter, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, of Ridley in Cheshire. The latter became extinct on the death of the third baronet in 1740; but the former still survives. The fifth baronet was ennobled by the title of Baron Bradford in 1794, his father having married Anne Newport, the sister and heir of the last Earl of Bradford of that name. The son of this baron was advanced to an earldom in 1815.

BRITO. See W. LE BRETON.

BRITO, RALPH, had the custody of the honor of Bologne and of the land of Henry of Essex for many years, and the rolls from 15 to 31 Henry II. contain entries of his accounting for them. In 1177, Robert Mantel and he, as justiciars, fixed the aid to be paid in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Hertford, and in 1179 he was selected for the hundred counties to act as a justice itinerant in one of the four divisions into which the county of Windsor then apportioned the king's (Mador, i. 130, 263, &c., ii. 200, &c.) the roll of 1 Richard I. (he being then dead) it appears that Lageford and Cwell in Essex belonged to him.

BRITO, RICHARD, was an officer of Exchequer, to whom was committed receipt of the rents of the vacant bishoprics of Lincoln and London while in the king's hands, the former in conjunction with Master Gregorius, and the latter with Ralph, archdeacon of Colchester. He was called archdeacon of Coventry in the reign of 31 Henry II., 1185.

In 1 Richard I. he was one of the justices itinerant in the counties of Dorset, Somerset, Wilts, Hants, and Oxford; and as he acted in so many counties all probably in one circuit, without being recorded as a justiciar at Westminster, seems likely that officers of the court were sometimes sent on these itinera in addition to the regular justiciars. He was continued to act in subsequent years.

roll of 7 Richard I., 1195-6, contains an entry of the payment of sixty marks 'Ricardo Britoni et sociis suis.' (Madox, i. 309, 311, ii. 284.)

BRITO, RANULPH, or LE BRETON, the brother of the before-mentioned William le Breton, or Brito, was chaplain to Hubert de Burgh, the chief justiciary, in 1221, when a payment was made to him under that designation, besides many others up to 11 Henry III. He afterwards became a canon of St. Paul's. In 7 Henry III. he assessed the tallage in Wilton, and appears to have been about the king's person, as in the ninth year he had an order for the repayment of ten marks, with which he had accommodated the king to pay some messengers. A grant was made to him in 11 Henry III. of part of the wood of Engayne, in Blatherwick, and in Dudinton, Northamptonshire, to hold by the service of a pair of gilt spurs. (Rot. Claus. i. 457, ii. 47, 173, 184.)

Having, by the influence of his patron, Hubert de Burgh, been raised to the treasurer-ship of the chamber of the Exchequer, he was, at the instigation of Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, dismissed from the office in 1232 for fraud and corruption, and fined in no less a sum than 1000*l.* (Wendover, iv. 244.) Henry in his first anger had banished Ranulph Brito from the kingdom, but within two months, on payment of the fine, restored him to favour, though not to his place, with a condition, however, that he should not appeal to Rome. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 15.)

His death occurred in 1247, and the words 'cancellarius specialis,' used by Matthew Paris in recording that event, seem the only warrant for Dugdale and others introducing him into the list of chancellors, although, according to the construction of the sentence, the words appear rather to intimate that he was chancellor to the queen. None of the records describe him as the king's chancellor, and Sir T. D. Hardy has accordingly omitted the name in his catalogue. Lord Campbell, by mistake, calls him Bishop of Bath and Wells.

BRIWER, WILLIAM. This great man, who was in the confidence of four successive monarchs, is said by Camden to have been a foundling, and to have received his name from having been discovered by Henry II. on a heath (bruyère) while hunting in the New Forest. The king, he says, caused him to be taken up and placed under proper care, and when he arrived at man's estate employed him in his service. Unfortunately for this romantic tale, Dugdale's account of him, if correct, proves that it is not founded on truth. He says his father was Henry Briwer, and quotes a charter of Henry II. confirming to William Briwer and his heirs certain possessions and privileges, with the forestship of the forest of De la Bere, in as ample a manner as his father held them in the times of King William and King Henry I. However this may be, in 26 Henry II., 1180, he was entrusted with the sheriffalty of Devonshire, which he continued to hold till 1 Richard I.

His judicial career commenced in 33 Henry II., 1187, when he was associated with two others in fixing the tallage in Wiltshire. He acted in the same character in 1 Richard I. in Cornwall and Berkshire, and in 9 Richard I. in Nottingham and Derby. After the introduction of fines his name is found among the justiciars before whom they were levied at Westminster and other places, during the last four years of Richard's reign, and most of the years of that of John; and he is mentioned as a baron of the Exchequer as late as 5 Henry III., 1221. (Madox, i. 634, 733; Pipe Roll, 115, 185.)

That he attained an early character for wisdom and prudence may be inferred from the fact that King Richard, on his embarkation to the Holy Land, although he exacted from him a fine for not joining in the crusade, named him as one of the council to assist the Bishops of Durham and Ely in the government of the kingdom. Acting against the latter when the king's letter authorised the council to assume the government, he was included in the sentence of excommunication which the bishop induced the pope to pronounce against the supporters of the Earl John. All doubt of his loyalty, however, was removed by the hearty assistance he gave to release his sovereign from captivity; and the king's confidence in him is proved by his being selected as one of the ambassadors then sent to make a league with the King of France. In this and the subsequent reigns he was sheriff of several counties. The rolls also teem with grants of all kinds—of manors, lands, markets, custodies, wardships, licences for building castles, and of various other privileges, besides presents of wine, and on one occasion of a captured ship.

In frequent attendance on King John, he accompanied him to Ireland, dined with him at his table, eating flesh on certain prohibited days, for which indulgence money was given to the poor; and, adhering to him in all his troubles, he was a witness to his renunciation of the crown to the pope. In 15 John he was made seneschal to the king in conjunction with W. de Cantelupe (Cal. Rot. Pat. 4), and when the king marched northwards in 1215 he was one of those entrusted with the command of one of the forces left to check the barons remaining in London; and on several occasions till the end of the reign justified the royal confidence by the exertions which he made on behalf of his sovereign.

These exertions were continued on the accession of Henry III. till Prince Louis was forced to retire from the kingdom. Rewards still flowed upon him, and at various times he was appointed governor of the castles of Bolsover, Lidford, Devizes, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

He seems to have been an uncompromising supporter of the king's prerogative. Wendover relates (iv. 83) that when Archbishop Stephen and the nobles in 1223 urged the king to confirm the liberties and rights for which they had contended with his father, William Briwer exclaimed that 'those liberties, having been violently extorted, ought not to be observed.' The archbishop, however, mildly reprimanded him, and the king wisely promised to keep the oath he had taken to grant them.

His career of prosperity was only terminated by his death, which occurred in 1226, 11 Henry III. He was buried in the abbey of Dunkeswell in Devonshire, which he had founded for Cistercian monks.

His riches and his piety may be estimated by the following works. Besides the above abbey of Dunkeswell, he founded that of St. Saviour at Torre, in the same county, for Præmonstratensian canons; the priory of Motisfont, in Hampshire, for canons regular of St. Augustin; and a hospital for twelve poor people, besides religious and strangers, at Bridgewater in Somersetshire, where he also built a castle, constructed a haven, and began a handsome bridge.

He married Beatrix de Vallibus, by whom he had two sons and five daughters. On the death of the sons the inheritance was divided among the five daughters and their heirs. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 700.)

BRIWES, JOHN DE, is introduced as a justicier in Mr. Hunter's Preface to the Fines of Richard I. and John in the eleventh year of the latter reign, 1209. That he was in some office connected with the Exchequer appears from several entries on the Rot. de Finibus. (417, 442.) He died in 1229. (Rot. de Oblatis, i. 184.)

BROCLESEY, WILLIAM DE, of that place in Lincolnshire, was an ecclesiastic, who devoted much of his property both in that county and in Yorkshire to pious purposes. He held the office of remembrancer of the Exchequer in 1338 (Hospitaller in Engl. 203) till he was promoted to be a baron of that court on January 20, 1341, 14 Edward III. He is mentioned as being alive in 25 Edward III. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 91, &c.; Rot. Parl. ii. 453.)

BROK, LAURENCE DEL, was an advocate in the reign of Henry III., evidently standing very high in his profession. As early as 1253 he was employed on the part of the crown, and there are no less than seventeen entries in that year in which he acted for the king in suits before the court. For an interval of seven years his name does not again occur, but in 1260 he seems to have resumed his position, and to have been regularly engaged on the king's behalf until Christmas 1267. He was raised to the bench before the following February, and continued there till the end of the reign, in the last year of which a judgment is mentioned. (Rot. Parl. i. 4.) He died in 3 Edward I., in possession of considerable property in the counties of Buckingham, Kent, Hertford, and Oxford. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 54.)

BROME, ADAM DE, was a clerk or master in Chancery, and filled the office of a justice itinerant in the county of Nottingham in 3 Edward III., 1330. He probably was of the family settled at the manor of Brome Hall in Norfolk, and is first mentioned in 6 Edward II., 1312, when he was assigned to talliate Warwickshire and other counties. From that time up to 3 Edward III., besides being frequently mentioned in connection with his duties in Chancery, he was several times employed in judicial commissions. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 602; Abb. Placit. 337.) Like his brethren in the Chancery, he received many ecclesiastical preferments. In 1315 he was rector of Hamworth in Middlesex; in 1316, chancellor of Durham; in 1319, archdeacon of Stow and rector of St. Mary, Oxford. In 17 Edward II. he had licence to erect a school in that university by the name of 'Rectoris Domus Scholium Beatæ Mariæ, Oxon,' which, when founded, he presented to Edward II., who further endowed it, and appointed him the first provost. From a large messuage, called la Oriole, bestowed on it by Edward II. received its present name, Oriol College. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 94; Chalmers's Oxford, i. Le Neve, 171.)

BROMLEY, THOMAS. The ancient fan of Bromley, established as early as the reign of King John at Bromleghe in Staffordshire, has supplied the ranks of the law with the three following judges. The first is Thomas Bromley, who was the son of Roger Bromley (a younger brother of the immediate ancestor of Queen Elizabeth's chancellor), by Jane, the daughter of Thomas Jennings. He was placed at Inner Temple, and became reader there in the autumn 1532. In June 1540 he was created to the degree of the coif, and was appointed one of the king's serjeants on the 2nd of the next month.

Succeeding Sir John Spelman, he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench November 4, 1544. That he was highly esteemed by Henry VIII. is apparent from his having a legacy of 300*l.* under the will, and being appointed one of the cutors of it. (Testam. Vetust. 43.) He thus became one of the council of regency under Edward VI., but seems to have avoided the political difficulties of that reign till its close, when he was most unwillingly involved in the project of the Duke of Northumberland to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. His being sent for by the duke to prepare the king's will, and the conduct pursued to overcome his resistance, is subsequently detailed in the life of Chief Justice Montagu. Having submitted, under the compulsion to which he was subjected, to settle the instrument, it would seem that he was no further called upon to interfere; for his name does not appear among those who witnessed the will, and, instead of being committed to prison, as the two chief justices were, he was raised by Queen Mary to the head of his own court on October 4, 1553, in the place of Sir Roger Cholmley, from which it may be naturally inferred that he was, as Burnet says, 'a papist in his heart.'

He presided at the extraordinary trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton on April 17, 1554, when, though the prisoner had so much greater liberty of speech allowed to him than in any previous trial on record that the queen's attorney openly complained in court and threatened to retire from the bar, yet was he hardly pressed by the judges, who refused him the examination of a witness he produced, and denied him the inspection of a statute upon which he relied. The chief justice's summing up too was so defective, 'either for want of memory or good will,' that 'the prisoner craved indifference, and did help the judge's old memory with his own recital.' (Holinshed, iv. 31-55.) Throckmorton's acquittal and the iniquitous punishment of the jury followed; and the impression which the whole proceedings leave upon the mind is anything but favourable to the lawyers who were concerned in them. Sir Thomas Bromley cannot escape from the charge of undue severity, though probably he was complained of at the time for giving too great licence to the prisoner. He was succeeded as chief justice on June 11, 1555, by Sir William Portman; but it does not appear whether the vacancy was occasioned by his death or by his being superseded. Wroxeter Church contains his remains, over which is a handsome altar tomb.

He left an only daughter, Margaret, who married Sir Richard Newport, the ancestor of the late Earls of Bradford, a title which became extinct in that family in 1762, but was revived in 1815 in the descendants of Sir Orlando Bridgeman, one of whom married the sister and heir of the last earl.

BROMLEY, THOMAS, descended from the same ancestor as his last-mentioned namesake. Established at Bromleghe in Staffordshire under King John, the family flourished in that and the neighbouring counties throughout the succeeding centuries. Roger Bromley, of Mitley in Shropshire, a lineal descendant, had, besides other children, two sons, William and Roger. The chief justice was son of the latter, and the lord chancellor was grandson of the former, his father being George Bromley, the only son of William, who was of Hodnet in Shropshire, and his mother, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Lacon, of Willey in the same county. His father was himself distinguished in the law, being a reader at the Inner Temple in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., and his brother, Sir George Bromley, attained in the same profession the rank of justice of Chester under Queen Elizabeth.

Sir Thomas was born about the year 1530, and, being destined for the law, was sent to the same inn at which his father had studied, where he was reader in autumn 1566, having been just previously elected recorder of the city of London. He held this honourable post till he became solicitor-general, to which office he was appointed on March 14, 1569, and filled it for ten years, during which, in 1574, he was elected treasurer of his inn.

He acted in 1571 on the trial of the Duke of Norfolk for high treason, and managed that part of the prosecution which had reference to Rodolph's message. (State Trials, i. 957, 1015.) As an advocate he arrived at great eminence, but was scrupulous in undertaking a suit till he was satisfied of its justice, 'not admitting all causes promiscuously,' says David Lloyd (State Worthies, 610), who adds that 'never failing in any cause for five years, . . . he was the only person that the people would employ.' An anecdote is told of him in 'Bacon's Apophthegms' which shows that he had a ready wit in escaping out of a dilemma. Having offered in evidence a deed which the counsel on the other side impeached as fraudulent, arguing that it had not been produced in two former suits on the same title, but some other conveyance relied upon, Justice Catlin, who inclined to that opinion, said to him, 'I pray thee, Mr. Solicitor, let me ask you a familiar question: I have two geldings in my stable, and I have divers times business of importance, and still I send forth one of my geldings and not the other; would you not say I set him aside as a jade?' 'No, my lord,' replied Bromley, 'I would think you spared him for your own saddle.'

Retained by Lord Hunsdon and patronised by Lord Burleigh, it is not surprising, with the professional character he had acquired, that Bromley, though not yet fifty years of age, should have been selected as the successor of Sir Nicholas Bacon. He received the Great Seal on April 20, 1579, with the rank of lord chancellor, a title which his predecessor had never enjoyed. It is not improbable, however, that there was some doubt which of the two titles should be given to him, for more than two months elapsed after Bacon's death during which, according to the entries on the Close Roll (24), the Great Seal remained in the queen's possession; and two speeches are preserved which, if both of them are rightly attributed to Bromley, would seem to have been prepared by him to deliver to the queen in the event of either determination. (Egerton Papers, 81.) Fuller says (Worthies, ii. 259), 'Although it was difficult to come after Sir Nicholas Bacon, and not to come after him, yet such was Bromley's learning and integrity that the court was not sensible of any considerable alteration.' He seems to have pursued a steady course in the performance of his official duties, without respect to persons. He presided as chancellor over the commission issued in October 1586 for the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, in which he conducted himself with great decency and personal respect towards the unfortunate prisoner, though in the subsequent proceedings in parliament he was the organ of the house to represent to Elizabeth their unanimous request that the judgment might be executed. Before the next session, which was opened on February 15, 1587, he was seized with an illness which necessitated the appointment of a temporary speaker of the House of Lords, and by which he no doubt escaped being a performer in the despicable proceedings against Secretary Davison on March 28. This illness terminated in his death on April 12, at the age of 57. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where his son, Sir Henry, erected a splendid monument to his memory.

By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Adrian Fortescue, K.B., he had four sons and four daughters. One of the latter married Sir Oliver Cromwell, the uncle of the Protector, and another married John Lyttelton of Frankley, whose eldest son was advanced to the peerage as Baron Lyttelton of Frankley.

Sir Thomas's eldest son, as well as several of his descendants, sat for the county of Worcester in parliament, and eventually, on May 9, 1741, the representative of the family was created Baron Montford of Horseheath, Cambridgeshire, a title which became extinct in 1851 by the death of the third lord without surviving issue.

BROMLEY, EDWARD, the third member of the same family who has been adorned with the judicial ermine, was the son of Sir George Bromley, justice of Chester, the elder brother of the chancellor.

He kept his terms at the Inner Temple, where he was a reader in Lent 1606. He was made a serjeant for the purpose of his being raised to the bench, his call taking place on February 5, and his patent as baron of the Exchequer being dated February 6, 1610. During the remaining sixteen years of James's reign, and for above two years in that of Charles I., he performed the functions of his office, and, according to Croke (Car. 85), he died in the summer vacation 1627.

BROMPTON, WILLIAM DE, whose name is sometimes spelled Burnton and Burton, was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas in 1278, 6 Edward I., and fines were levied before him from that year till Michaelmas, 17 Edward I., 1289. (Parl. Writs, i. 382; Dugdale's Orig. 44.) Soon after this he was disgraced and imprisoned in the Tower for corruption in his office. (Stow's London, 44.) One of the charges against him was that he impeded the prior of Huntingdon in an assize of darrein presentment to the church of Suho, whereby the bishop took it by lapse of time. (Rot. Parl. i. 48.) Another implicated the judge in cruel treatment towards Nicholas de Cerny, imprisoned in Newgate, by directing him to be put in irons and injured as much as possible. But his offences must have been of a far more heinous nature than either of these, as the fine of 6000 marks, which he was compelled to pay for his enlargement was one of the highest that was imposed upon those who shared in his disgrace.

A William de Brompton is named as one of the king's councillors in the Statute Escaetoribus, 29 Edward I., 1301, and one of the justices of the Bishop of Durham in the same year (Parl. Writs, i. 10) and in the following a justice itinerant in Cornwall called William de Burnton occurred, but whether they were the same person is uncertain.

BROOK, DAVID, was a native of Glastonbury in Somersetshire, his father John serjeant-at-law, being principal seneschal of the famous monastery there. David was a reader at the Inner Temple in 1534, 1540, when he was also treasurer. At the first week of the reign of Edward VI., 1547, he was admitted to the degree of the having been summoned thereto by Henry VIII., and in 1551 he was made one of the king's serjeants. Queen Mary, after her accession advanced him, on September 1, 1553, to the office of chief justice of the Exchequer (Dugdale's Orig. 170), and on October 2, the morning of her coronation, he and a number of other sons were 'dobyd the knightes carpet.' (Machyn's Diary, 335.) His decisions are reported in Dyer till 1557, about a year after which he died.

David Lloyd, in his 'State Worthies' (386-390), gives the judge a highly eulogistic character, and concludes with :

phthegn which is worth remembering. 'A fat man in Rome riding always upon a very lean horse being asked the reason thereof, answered that he fed himself, but he trusted others to feed his horse. Our judge being asked what was the best way to thrive, said, Never do anything by another that you can do by yourself.'

Sir David left a widow, Margaret, daughter of Richard Butler, of London, who had previous to her marriage with him been already the wife of two husbands, Andrew Fraunces and Alderman Robert Chartsey, and who, after the death of the chief baron was married, for the fourth time, to Edward, Lord North, whom also she survived, and dying in 1575, was buried in St. Lawrence Jewry. (Collins's Peerage, iv. 458; Fuller, ii. 283.) This lady was the chief baron's second wife, his first being Katherine, daughter of John, Lord Chandos, who in a patent of 1553, granting to her and her husband the manor of Canonbury, is described as having been the suckling nurse of Queen Mary. (Tomlins's Yaeidon.)

BROOKE, ROBERT, or BROKE, was the son of Thomas Broke, of Claverley in Shropshire, by Margaret, the daughter of Hugh Grosvenor, of Farnot in the same county; and he was buried in the church of that parish. (Athen. Oxon. i. 267.) He was reader at the Middle Temple in 1542 and 1551. His readings on these occasions were 'On the Statute of Limitations, 32 Henry VIII. c. 2,' and 'On Magna Charta, c. 16,' both of which were afterwards published. Between these dates—viz., in 1545—he was advanced from the office of common serjeant of the city of London to that of recorder in the room of Sir Roger Cholmley. In that character he is frequently mentioned in Dyer's Reports. In Michaelmas 1552 he was made a serjeant, and was several times returned to parliament as representative of the metropolis.

He was elected speaker in that which met on April 2, 1554, during which the marriage of the queen with Philip of Spain was solemnized. A new parliament was then called, and between the date of the summons and the day of meeting Brooke was put in the place of Sir Richard Morgan as chief justice of the Common Pleas on October 8. He was knighted by King Philip on January 27, 1555, but he enjoyed his judicial dignity little more than four years, dying on September 6, 1558, about two months before the death of the queen. On his tomb at Claverley he is represented in his official robes, with a wife on each side of him in splendid dresses. One of his wives was named Anne, and the other Dorothy; and between them they produced him seventeen children. (Machyn's Diary, 342.)

His name has a high reputation in Westminster Hall, not only on account of his great learning and his just administration of the law, but as the author of an 'Abridgment' or abstract of the Year Books till his own time, which Coke calls 'an excellent repertory,' and of 'Ascun's Novel Cases' in the three last reigns.

BROOKE, RICHARD, or BROKE, whose family was established at Leighton in Cheshire as early as in the twelfth century, was the fourth son of Thomas Brooke of that place, by the daughter and heir of John Parker of Copen Hall. He studied and practised at the Middle Temple so successfully that, dreading a summons to take upon him the degree of the coif, the usual reward of eminent advocates, he obtained a royal permission in July 1510, 2 Henry VIII., to decline the honour in case it should be offered to him. It would appear, however, that he soon altered his mind, and did not avail himself of the exemption; for he was one of the nine who were made serjeants in the following November. In the same autumn he was reader at his inn of court. In that year also he was raised from the office of under-sheriff to that of recorder of the city of London, and was elected its representative in parliament, a trust which was repeated in 1515.

In 1520 he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, receiving the customary knighthood on the occasion; and on resigning the recordership the corporation complimented him with a tun of wine at Christmas.

On January 24, 1526, he was constituted chief baron of the Exchequer, and performed the duties of that office in addition to those of the judgeship of the Common Pleas till April 1529, about which time he died.

He erected the mansion still called Broke Hall, at Nacton, near Ipswich, in Suffolk. From Sir Richard's son Robert descended another Robert, of Nacton, who was created a baronet in 1661, but dying in 1693 without male issue, the baronetcy expired, and the estates descended to a nephew, Robert, who had married one of his daughters. This Robert's great-grandson, Captain Philip Bowes Vere Broke, was raised to the same dignity in November 1813, for his victory as commander of the 'Shannon' over the American frigate the 'Chesapeake.'

BROUGHAM, HENRY, though born in Scotland, was the representative of one of the most ancient families in Westmoreland, in whose possession the manor of Burcham, now Brougham, can be traced uninterruptedly from the time of Edward the Confessor. By the intermarriage of one of his ancestors with the heiress of the family of Vaux of Catterlyn, he also represented that noble house. Before the death of his grandfather, John Brougham, his father resided at Edinburgh, where he married Eleanor, the only child of the Rev. James Syme, by Mary, the sister of Dr. Robertson the historian. Of that marriage the eldest son was the future chancellor, who was born in St. Andrew's Square, Edinburgh, on September 19, 1778.

In passing through both the High School and University of Edinburgh he distinguished himself by his rapidity and intelligence in receiving the instruction afforded, and in the latter he more particularly addressed himself to philosophical enquiries. The first fruit of his studies was a paper 'On the Inflection, Reflection, and Colours of Light,' written at the early age of seventeen, and forwarded by him to the Royal Society, and published in its 'Transactions' in 1796. To this he added in the next year some 'Further Experiments;' following these with 'General Theorems, chiefly Porisms of the higher Geometry,' which likewise appeared in successive years in the same publication. These successful exertions in physical science led him to an intimacy with Sir Joseph Banks, the president, and were rewarded in 1803 by his election as a fellow. In the meantime his pursuits introduced him into the best literary circles of Edinburgh, where he joined the 'Speculative Society,' and formed the more select association called 'the Academy of Physics.' He visited Norway and Sweden before he settled himself as an advocate in the Scottish law courts. In a letter to his friend, Sir Joseph Banks, dated December 10, 1800, he expresses his aversion to that profession, and his resolution to attempt an opening in the political world; but at the same time to cultivate its duties to secure a retreat, in case his plan should fail. He showed his capacity for the province he preferred by publishing in 1803 'An Enquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers;' and in 1806 he exhibited his first acknowledged effort in behalf of the persecuted blacks, by issuing a pamphlet entitled 'A Concise Statement of the Question regarding the Abolition of the Slave Trade.' In 1802 he had joined with Lord Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Horner, and other talented men then residing at Edinburgh, in founding the 'Edinburgh Review,' which up to the present time, after more than sixty years' existence, preserves the popularity it obtained on its first establishment. To this he was a most indefatigable contributor, advocating on all occasions the most liberal principles, in support of which it always took so prominent a part.

With an established reputation as a politician, a jurist, and an orator, he felt that Edinburgh was too confined a stage, and therefore, coming to London, he became for some time a pupil of Mr. (afterwards Chief Justice) Tindal, and, being called to the English bar in 1807 by the society of Lincoln's Inn, joined the Northern Circuit. His practice was less in the courts than in appeals to the House of Lords and the Privy Council, and before parliamentary committees. In 1808 he signalled himself at the bar of the House of Commons by his energetic advocacy of the application of the British merchants to obtain a repeal of the famous orders in council issued in opposition to the aggressions of Napoleon. His earnest exertions and his overpowering eloquence procured him a seat in parliament in 1810 for the borough of Camelford. He continued a member of that house till he was advanced to the other, twenty years later, except for four years from 1812, Mr. Canning having then defeated him in his attempt to be returned for Liverpool. In 1815 he was elected for Winchelsea, for which he sat till he succeeded in an arduous contest for the West Riding of Yorkshire in 1830, the year in which he was called to the House of Peers.

It is impossible in the present sketch to particularise all the incidents of his parliamentary career, so wide was the range of subjects which he discussed. No question found him unprepared, and whether the debate was upon African slavery, Catholic emancipation, or foreign politics, or upon the more domestic questions of charity abuses, distress in the agricultural districts, free trade and the laws that restrained it, the extravagance and corruption of our military and civil establishments, and the thousand other topics that agitated that assembly, he threw into them all that spirit and fervour for which his speeches were remarkable. He soon acquired the lead of the party to which he was attached and was allowed to be a most brilliant debater, and to be an exception to the almost universal experience, that the eloquence of a lawyer did not succeed in the House of Commons. At the same time was admitted that in the warmth of his addresses he was apt to exceed the limit of discretion, and sometimes to injure the cause he was advocating.

His reputation as a lawyer had so advanced, aided, no doubt, by his political status, that he was occasionally consulted by the Princess Charlotte, and on her elopement from Warwick House in 1817 he was summoned by her to her mother's house at Connaught Terrace, to which had fled, and it was by his advice that she returned home. But the great event which his legal fame was to be established in the popular mind was now approaching. On the accession of George IV. in 1820 his queen, from whom he had been separated, determined to return to England to assert her rights, and summoned Brougham, whom she appointed her torney-general, as her adviser. A bill of pains and penalties was immediately brought into the House of Lords, charging her with adultery committed abroad. Mr. Brougham was the leading counsel for her defence against the bill, and by his extraordinary exertions and powerful advocacy produced such an effect, not only on the public mind, but on the noble jury who were to decide on her fate, that ministers were obliged to withdraw the bill. So severe had been his invectives against the king, not only in this defence, but in parliament also, on that and on other occasions, that, though his position at the bar had long entitled him to the usual precedence, his majesty refused to allow him the honour of a silk gown, the death of the queen depriving him in the next year of that which he wore as her attorney-general. Against Lord Eldon, to whom he attributed his exclusion, he took every opportunity of aiming the most pointed shafts of wit and sarcasm. His lordship refers to one of his direst attacks in 1825, in a letter to his daughter, Lady F. J. Banks, with cool indifference.

Of course the cause of Brougham's severity, and the assertion of Eldon's indifference, must be both taken with some allowance; but while his lordship remained chancellor, Brougham was obliged to content himself with a stuff gown. Under Lord Lyndhurst, who succeeded Lord Eldon, he received in 1827 a patent of precedence. At that time so conscious was he of his parliamentary powers that he refused the place of lord chief baron offered him by Mr. Canning, the new minister, objecting that it would exclude him from the house; and on Mr. Canning's suggestion that he would be only one stage from the woolsack, he replied, 'But the horses would be off.'

Soon after the accession of William IV. the ministry of the Duke of Wellington was obliged to succumb, and that headed by Earl Grey took its place. So strong were Mr. Brougham's claims on the Whigs that no lower place than that of lord chancellor could be offered to him, and he accordingly received the Great Seal on November 22, 1830, and on the next day was created Lord Brougham and Vaux. During his chancellorship his utmost energies were applied in the House of Lords to the carrying of the Reform Bill, and to the support of all the measures suggested by the ministry; and in the Court of Chancery to the introducing many extensive reforms, some of doubtful value, but others of essential and permanent benefit. Among others, he swept away a host of insecure places entailing great expense to the suitors, and, as a compensation for so great an annihilation of the patronage of the office, he procured for his successors an addition of 1000*l.* a year to their retiring allowance. He went out with his party, after exactly four years' enjoyment of the office, on November 22, 1834; but when in the next year its successors were obliged in their turn to give way to the whigs, for some cause or other, hitherto unexplained, Lord Brougham was not restored. Perhaps it was for the same reason which was adduced by Sir Robert Walpole just one hundred years before, that he would not 'make a man lord chancellor who was constantly complaining of the grievances of the law, and threatening to rectify the abuses of Westminster Hall.' (Lord Hervey's Memoirs, i. 434.)

Lord Brougham was now in his fifty-seventh year, a period of life at which many a man having filled the highest office in the state would have thought himself justified in resting upon his laurels. But he was of no such disposition; he did not approve of slothful inaction, but preferred exercising his talents, whether in or out of office, with a view to the benefit of the state, and to the improvement of his fellow-creatures. He continued regularly to attend the hearing of appeals in the House of Lords for many years; and for his indefatigable labours in that judicial capacity he was rewarded by Queen Victoria in 1860 with a new patent, entailing his title in default of male issue upon his brother, William Brougham, Esq., lately a master in Chancery. Time moderated his political feelings and tempered his party virulence, and he was charged by disappointed bigots with having joined the tory ranks. But the imputation arose from his not choosing to desert old friends of that party, with whom, amidst the most violent political contests, he had still kept up his intimacy. But no one could accuse him of any decay or discontinuance of his exertions for the extension of knowledge and instruction among the poor, or in the pursuit of the patriotic and benevolent objects it had been his life's endeavour to promote. Both before and after his exaltation these objects were numerous. Among the principal were the formation of the 'Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge,' by which many valuable publications were issued; and the foundation of University College, London, extending the benefits of a superior education to a class of men who were incapable of incurring the customary expenses of Oxford or Cambridge, or who were unwilling to subject themselves to the tests or discipline required at those universities. To these may be added as a consequence the University College Hospital. He was also greatly instrumental in the establishment of the Social Science Association; and as its president, even so lately as 1863, in his eighty-fifth year, he delivered a lengthened address at Edinburgh, the scene of his earliest triumphs, which surprised all who heard it by its vigour and variety. His various contributions to the press have been collected in ten octavo volumes; and it is to be hoped that to these may be shortly added, as promised, 'His Life and Times.' He was elected lord rector of the University of Glasgow in 1825, and, retaining his popularity to the last, he was chosen chancellor of the University of Edinburgh in 1860. He purchased an estate at Cannes, in Provence, on which he built a mansion, to which he retired for several weeks of the last years of his life, and where he died on May 7, 1868.

By his wife, Mary Anne, daughter of Thomas Eden, Esq., and niece of Lords Auckland and Henley, the widow of John Spalding, Esq. (whom he married in 1819), he had two daughters, both since deceased, and no son; and his title has descended by the special limitation before mentioned to his brother, William Brougham, now Lord Brougham and Vaux.

BROWNE, ANTHONY, was the son of Wistan Browne, of Abbesroding and Langenhoo in Essex, and Elizabeth, the sister of Sir John Mordaunt, of Turvey in Bedfordshire, serjeant-at-law, who became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and whose son was created Lord Mordaunt. (Testam. Vetust. 402.) Anthony was born about 1510, and studied at Oxford, where he did not take a degree, entered the Middle Temple, and became reader there in autumn 1553 and in Lent 1554.

Being a strict Roman Catholic, he made himself active in carrying into effect the new orders of religion promulgated under Queen Mary; and, being then a justice of the peace in his native county, a letter was sent by the council in August 1554 directing him and others to put those in ward who kept themselves from church and were not in other respects conformable. Among the persons brought before him was William Hunter, 'an apprentice of nineteen years,' who, according to the printed relation of his brother Robert, was 'pursued to death by Justice Brown for the gospel's sake.' Robert enlarges on the justice's 'fury' and 'rage,' and seems to lay more blame on him for sending the unfortunate youth to Bishop Bonner than on that brutal prelate for condemning him to be burnt. In the next year Justice Browne and his fellows sent up another prisoner, whom they called 'an arrogant heretic;' and in August 1557 a special letter was written to him by the council, 'geving hym thanks for his diligent proceeding against Trudgeover [whom he had taken and executed in Essex]; willing him to distribute his head and quarters according to his and his colleagues' former

These energetic exertions were not unrequited. He was called to the degree of the coif, and on the very day that he assumed it, October 16, 1555, he was appointed one of the queen's serjeants, and on October 5, 1558, was made chief justice of the Common Pleas. Within six weeks Queen Mary died, and on the day succeeding that event he received a new patent from Elizabeth; but before Hilary Term it was deemed expedient to remove both the Catholic chief justices from their more prominent positions, still, however, retaining their legal services. Chief Justice Browne was accordingly removed into the seat of Mr. Justice Dyer, who was placed at the head of the court. This change having been completed on January 22, 1559, he continued to perform the duties of a puisne judge of the Common Pleas till the day of his death. Anthony Wood states that he was offered the Great Seal when the Lord Keeper Bacon was in temporary disgrace on the suspicion of having assisted John Hales in a pamphlet arguing that, in the event of Queen Elizabeth's death without issue, the crown would devolve on the house of Suffolk; but that Browne refused it, 'for that he was of a different religion from the state.' It was perhaps in connection with this offer that he received the honour of knighthood in 1566.

He died on May 16, 1567, at his estate of Weald Hall, or South Weald, in Essex, which he had purchased from Lord Chancellor Rich. He was buried in the church of that parish, and to his remains were added, within the same year, those of his wife Joan, daughter of William Farington of Farington in Lancashire, and widow of Charles Booth, Esq. He left no issue.

His devotion to Queen Mary did not prevent him from resisting her encroachments on the rights of his chief justiceship. In the interval between Sir Robert Brook's death and his own appointment the queen had filled up the vacant place of exigent London, &c., the presentation to which he longed to his office. As soon as he was installed he at once admitted his nephew Skrogges, whose right was decided by judges to be good against Coleshill, queen's nominee. (Dyer's Reports, 17.)

Plowden, his contemporary (Reports, 376), calls him a judge of profound learning and great eloquence, and gives several eulogistic verses composed on his death. He is said to have supplied Bishop Ibbotson with the legal arguments for his pamphlet in favour of the succession of Mary, Queen of Scots, published under the name of Morgan Philipps, and answered by Nicholas Bacon. (Athen. Oxon. i. 405, 433; Moran's Essex, i. 118.)

BROWNE, HUMPHREY, of Ridley Hall, in Terling, Essex, was the uncle of the foregoing Anthony Browne, being the younger brother of Wistan Browne. Their father was Robert Browne, of Langenhoo in that county, and their mother Mary, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Charlton. Humphrey was of the Middle Temple, where he was chosen reader in 1516, and again in 1521. He was not called to the degree of the coif till ten years afterwards, nor made a king's serjeant till Easter 1536. On November 20, 1542, he was elevated to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas, a seat which he retained in four reigns. Although his name appears as a witness to King Edward's deed altering the succession, Queen Mary very properly considered the act as one more of compulsion than of choice, and Queen Elizabeth, on her accession, made no immediate change in the judges, whatever were their religious opinions. The quiet and unostentatious performance of his duties was undistinguished by any remarkable incident. Plowden relates that in a case in Hilary Term 1559 he 'did not argue at all, because he was so old that his senses were decayed and his voice could not be heard;' yet he acted for nearly four years after he had thus lost his judicial powers, the last fine levied before him being dated at the end of November 1562, and his death occurring on the 5th of the next month. (Dugdale's Orig. 47, 215; 1 Plowden, 190.)

His remains were removed from a house which he had built in Cow Lane, St. Sepulchre's, with great funeral pomp to the church of St. Mary Orgars in Cannon Street, where one of his wives had been buried, and to which parish he bequeathed several houses. (Machyn's Diary, 297, 393.)

His first wife was Anne, daughter of Sir Henry Vere, of Great Adlington; and his second wife was Anne, daughter of John, Lord Hussey. (Morant, i. 118.)

BROWNE, ROBERT, does not appear to have been related to either of the preceding judges, nor has any certain trace been found of the family to which he belonged. All that is known of him is that he was promoted to the bench of the Exchequer as second baron on May 6, 1550, 4 Edward VI., and that he retained his seat during Mary's reign and for the first two months of that of Elizabeth, when he was replaced by George Freville.

BROWNE, SAMUEL, was the son of Nicholas Browne, Esq., of Polebrook in Northamptonshire, by Frances, daughter of Thomas St. John, Esq., of Cayshoe, Bedfordshire, the grandfather of Oliver St. John, the chief justice of the Common Pleas during the Protectorate. Samuel was admitted pensioner of Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1614, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn in 1616, where he was called to the bar in 1623, and elected reader in autumn 1642. He was returned member for the boroughs of Clifton, Dartmouth, and Hardness, in the Long Parliament of November 1640; and in February 1643, no doubt by the influence of his cousin St. John, who was then solicitor-general, he was recommended by the parliament to be a baron of the Exchequer, in the propositions made to the king for peace, which came to nothing. In the following November he and St. John were two of the four members of the House of Commons to whom, with two lords, the new Great Seal was entrusted. (Parl. Hist. ii. 606, iii. 70, 182.)

The commoners so appointed still continued to perform their parliamentary functions. Lord Commissioner Browne was most active in the proceedings against Archbishop Laud, summing up the case in the House of Lords and carrying up the ordinance for his attainder passed by the Commons in November 1644. (State Trials, iv. 576, 596.) His position did not exempt him from the inconveniences of the civil war. He had to complain to the parliament in December 1644 that his house at Arlesley in Bedfordshire was used for quartering troops, and he procured an order for their removal out of the county. (Journals, iii. 734.) After remaining in office for nearly three years, the lords commissioners were removed in October 1646, and the Great Seal transferred to the speakers of the two houses. Resuming then his practice at the bar, where by a vote of the house precedence was given him, he was included in the batch of twenty-two who were made serjeants by the parliament on October 12, 1648, when both he and his cousin were also elevated to the bench, he as judge of the King's Bench, and St. John as chief justice of the Common Pleas. Just previous to this he had been sent as one of the commissioners to treat with the king in the Isle of Wight, and what he witnessed there of his majesty's bearing, and the unseemly return with which it was met by the parliament's subsequent proceedings, tended no doubt to open his eyes to the violent objects of the party to which his cousin St. John was attached. He resolved, therefore, no longer to follow in his footsteps; but when the king, three months later, fell a victim to its machinations, he boldly refused to act as a judge under the usurped government, and, with five of his colleagues, resigned his seat on the bench. (Whitelocke, 154, 158, 226, 334, 342, 378.)

This conduct so effectually atoned in the eyes of the royalists for everything that might be deemed objectionable in his former acts, that on the Restoration he was not only immediately reinstated as a serjeant, but within six months was replaced on the bench, being constituted on November 3, 1690, a judge of the Common Pleas, where he retained his seat till his death in Easter Term 1698. (1 Siderfin, 3, 4, 365.) He was buried under a monument still existing in the church of Arlesley.

He married Elizabeth, daughter of John Meade, Esq., of Nortofts, Finchingfield, Essex.

BRUCE, EDWARD (LORD KINLOSS). The third son of Robert de Brus, the first chief justice of the Court of King's Bench as newly constituted under Henry III., and one of the competitors for the crown of Scotland in the following reign, was John de Brus, to whose grandson his cousin King David II. granted in 1359 the castle and manor of Clackmannan, with various other manors in the county of that name. In the middle of the sixteenth century Sir Edward Bruce, the second son of one of the lineal holders of this property, acquired the estate of Blair Hall, and by his marriage with Alison, daughter of William Reid, of Aikenhead in the same county, and sister of Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, had three sons, the second of whom, Edward, became master of the Rolls.

He was born about 1548, and was, according to the most probable accounts, brought up to the law, and practised at the Scottish bar. In 1607 he was preferred to be one of the senators of the College of Justice, and in 1600 was selected by King James as his ambassador to the English court, for the professed purpose of congratulating the queen on her escape from the Earl of Essex's insurrection, but with the secret mission to forward James's views on the succession, and to sound the disposition of the people in regard to it. He effected this object with so much judgment and address that he obtained the private assurance of most of the leading men of the country that they would support James's pretensions; and he opened a secret correspondence with Sir Robert Cecil (afterwards published by Lord Hailes), which insured the earliest communication of every detail that would aid the conjuncture. (Robertson, iii. 136; Burnet, i. 8.) Even before his royal master had reaped the fruits of his diplomacy he received, in reward for his services, a grant of the dissolved abbey of Kinloss in the shire of Elgin, and was created Lord Bruce of Kinloss by patent dated February 22, 1603.

On Queen Elizabeth's death, Lord Bruce of course accompanied his sovereign to witness that peaceful accession to the English throne which he had been so instrumental in securing. He was not long in being placed in a post which had some slight relation to his early studies, receiving in less than three weeks after King James's arrival in England the appointment of master of the Rolls on May 18, 1603.

Lord Bruce was at the same time admitted into the king's new council, and in the first parliament obtained an act of naturalisation for himself and his family. King James showed his continued favour to him, by making him large grants of money and lands, and by promoting the marriage of his daughter Christian with William, afterwards second Earl of Devonshire, giving her away with his own hand, and making up her fortune to 10,000*l.* In July 1604 the king also created him an English peer by his former title. He sat at the Rolls for nearly seven years, and his remains are deposited close to his court in the chapel there, where his effigy in his official dress is represented on a monument, the inscription on which states that he died on January 14, 1610-11, and concludes with these two lines:—

Conjuge, prole, nuro, genero, spe, reque beatus ;
Vivere nos docuit, nunc docet, ecce, mori.

By his wife, Magdalen, daughter of Alexander Clerk, of Balburnie in Fife, Esq., he had, besides the daughter already mentioned, two sons, who successively possessed the title. Edward, the elder, was killed in a duel with Sir Edward Sackville, afterwards Duke of Dorset. Thomas, the younger, was created Earl of Elgin in Scotland in 1633, and Lord Bruce of Whorlton in England in 1641. To the last title his son received the addition of the earldom of Aylesbury in 1684. This title, though it failed in 1747, was re-granted to the last earl's nephew in 1770, to which a marquise was added in 1821. The title of Earl of Elgin devolved, according to the Scotch patent, on the heir male, who was the Earl of Kincardine, a descendant from Sir George Bruce of Carnock, younger brother of Edward, the master of the Rolls, and the two titles of Elgin and Kincardine are now enjoyed by the present peer, who has also an English barony of the former name, granted in 1849.

BRUCE, JAMES LEWIS KNIGHT, descended from an old Shropshire family long settled near Ludlow. His father John Knight, Esq., of Llanblethian in Glamorganshire, and Fairlinch in Devonshire, by his wife Margaret, the only married child of William Bruce, Esq., the former place, a descendant from the junior branch of the ancient house of Bruce of Kennet, and granddaughter (by mother) of Gabriel Lewis, Esq., of Llanblethian in Glamorganshire, had a family, of whom the lord justice was the youngest son. He was born at Barnstaple in 1791, and bore his father's name for fifty-four years of his life: but in 1 he added by licence that of his mother, upon the occasion of his eldest brother, John Bruce Bruce, Esq., assuming the surname of Pryce on succeeding to an estate.

He finished his education at Exeter College, Oxford, and, entering at Lincoln's Inn in 1812, he was called to the bar in 1817. In the first instance he attended the Welsh Circuit, where he is said to have had great success in handling the native juries. But in the Court of Chancery, to which he ultimately attached himself, his talents and industry were soon rewarded by so large a business that in 1829 he received a silk gown. From that time till he was raised to the bench he enjoyed the most extensive practice, through the labours of which he fought with unflinching energy and imperturbable good humour.

In 1831 he was elected member for Bishop's Castle, shortly before its disfranchisement by the Reform Act. In parliament he was a supporter of conservative principles. In 1834 the University of Oxford honoured him with the degree of D.C.L.

When the legislature decided that two additional judges were necessary for the assistance of the lord chancellor, Mr. Knight-Bruce, with the approbation of the whole bar, was selected for the first place. He became vice-chancellor on October 28, 1841, and was thereupon knighted, and soon afterwards was called to the privy council. Indefatigable in the performance of the duties that devolved upon him, no amount of labour seemed to distress or disconcert him. Before the long vacation of 1850, by the illness of the two other vice-chancellors, the whole business of the three courts at the most pressing period of the year having been thrown on his hands, he despatched it with so much discrimination, ability, and good temper that a public expression of respectful admiration was elicited from the whole bar, in an address from the attorney-general.

It seemed naturally to follow, when the Court of Appeal in Chancery was organized in October 1851, that Sir James should at once be selected for the senior lord justice; a position which he held for above fifteen years, when, suffering under a severe illness, he sent in his resignation in October 1866, which within a fortnight was followed by his death on November 7. The loss of few men on the judicial seat has been more regretted than that of Lord Justice Knight-Bruce, whose judgments, always well weighed and profound, were frequently enlivened with quiet humour and chastened wit.

He married Eliza, the only daughter of Thomas Newte, Esq., of Duval in Devonshire, by whom he had several children.

BRUDENELL, ROBERT, lineal descendant of an ancient family established at Dodington in Oxfordshire as early as the reign of Henry III., and of which Edmund Brudenell, attorney-general to Richard II., was a member, was born in the year 1461. He was the second son of Edmund Brudenell, Esq., of Agmondesham, Buckinghamshire, where he had large possessions, by his second wife Philippa, daughter of Philip Englefield, Esq., of Finchingfield in Essex. After spending some time at the University of Cambridge, he studied the law at an inn of court which is not recorded; but his name occurs as an advocate in the Year Books in Hilary Term 1490, and he was called to the degree of the coif in Michaelmas Term 1504, receiving the appointment of king's serjeant in 1505. In eighteen months he was raised to a judicial seat in the King's Bench, on April 28, 1507, two years before the death of King Henry VII.

On the accession of Henry VIII. he was removed into the Court of Common Pleas, but afterwards returned to the King's Bench, where he sat as one of the puisne judges. At the end of twelve years he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas on April 13, 1521, and presided there till his death on January 30, 1531. He was buried in the church of Dean in Northamptonshire, under a beautiful alabaster monument, on which his effigy was placed between those of his two wives. The first of these was Margaret, the widow of William Wivil, Esq., of Stanton in Leicestershire, and daughter and co-heir of Thomas Entwissell, Esq., of Stanton-Wivil. The second was Philippa Power, of Beckampton. By the latter he had no issue; but by the former he had two sons—Thomas and Anthony. The descendants of the elder of these were elevated in the peerage to the highest from the lowest rank. Among those which have become extinct are the Duke of Montagu, Marquis of Monthermer, Earl of Cardigan, Baron Montagu of Boughton, and Baron Montagu of Dean; and the only one which still remains in the House of Peers is the Marquis of Aylesbury.

BRUNDISH, ROBERT, probably derived his name from a parish in Suffolk, which is also frequently called Burnedish. A John de Burndish acquired the manor of Morton, near Ongar in Essex, in the reign of Edward I. His son Nicholas was probably Robert's father or brother. Of Robert there is no other mention than that he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench on April 4, 1338, 12 Edward III. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 141, ii. 98, 129; Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 70, 159, 184.)

BRUS, PETER DE, or BRUIS, was descended from Robert de Brus, a valiant

Norman knight, who accompanied William the Conqueror on his invasion of England, and whose prowess was rewarded with no less than ninety-four lordships in Yorkshire, of which Skelton was his principal seat. The lordship of Annandale was afterwards added to the family by the marriage of Robert's son Robert to the heiress of that large property, which on his death devolved on William, the eldest son of that marriage, from whom descended Robert de Brus, or Briwes, afterwards noticed; while the English estates became the inheritance of Adam, the second Robert's eldest son by a first marriage. After two Adams, there were four Peters in succession, of whom the subject of the present notice is the third. His father was a strong adherent to Prince Louis of France when he was introduced by the barons in rebellion against King John, and gave him powerful aid in Yorkshire. His mother was Helewise, one of the sisters and coheirs of William de Lancaster, of Kendal, a justice itinerant. He did homage for his father's estates in February 1222, 6 Henry III., and married Hillaria, the eldest daughter of Peter de Mauley.

He was one of the justices itinerant appointed for the county of Northumberland on June 30, 1226, 10 Henry III., after which no further mention is made of him till November 15, 1240, 25 Henry III., when his son, the under-mentioned Peter, fined two hundred marks on having livery of the lands of which his father was seised on the day when he commenced his journey to the Holy Land, where, probably, he died. (Rot. Claus. ii. 151; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 80, 332.)

BRUS, PETER DE, the son of the preceding Peter, by Hillaria his wife, was joined in the commission issued to the justices itinerant for Yorkshire in 52 Henry III., 1268. In the next year he was appointed constable of the castle of Scarborough, and died on September 18, 1272. He left no issue, so that his four sisters divided his property.

BRUS, ROBERT DE, was the fifth lord of Annandale, to which he succeeded in 29 Henry III., 1245, on the death of his father, Robert the Noble, who, by his marriage with Isabel, the second daughter of Prince David, Earl of Huntingdon and Chester, grandson of David I., King of Scotland, became one of the greatest subjects in Europe. From June till October 1250 there are entries of payments made for assizes to be taken before him, and his name also appears upon fines, showing that he acted as a justicier at that time. There is then an interval of seven years; but from 1257 to 1263 he acted in the same manner, and on the circuits of the two last years he was placed at the head of the commissions.

In 1263, during the contest between the king and the barons, he stood firm to his royal master, with whom he was taken prisoner at the battle of Lewes, on May 14, 1264. (Rapin, iii. 154.)

In October 1266 the payments for assizes before him are resumed, and on March 8, 1268, he was appointed 'capitalis justiciarius ad placita coram rege tenenda,' being the first who was distinctly constituted chief justice of the King's Bench. He had a salary of one hundred marks assigned to him.

King Henry died in the following November, but Robert de Brus does not appear to have been replaced on the judicial bench on the accession of Edward I. Nothing is related of his career during the eighteen years which intervened before he became a competitor for the crown of Scotland on the death of Queen Margaret in 1290. The several claimants who then came forward were eventually reduced to two—John Balliol, the representative of the eldest daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon; and Robert de Brus, the descendant of the second, but one degree nearer the common stock. The decision was referred to King Edward, who, in 1292, determined in favour of Balliol, who was accordingly declared king. Robert de Brus, however, would never acknowledge his title; but retiring in disgust, he died at his castle of Lochmaben in 1295, and was buried at the monastery of Gisburne in Cleveland, which had been founded by his ancestor, the first Robert.

By his wife Isabel, the daughter of Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, he had three sons—Robert, Bernard, and John. Robert's son, Robert, eventually succeeded in securing the Scottish crown, by the signal victory obtained at Bannockburn over the forces of Edward II., on June 24, 1314.

The third son, John, was the progenitor of a long line of eminent knights, from whom descended the Earls of Elgin and Cardigan and the Marquis of Aylesbury.

BRYAN, THOMAS, studied the law in Gray's Inn, and is mentioned in the Year Books as an advocate so early as Hilary 34 Henry VI., 1456. His call to the degree of the coif was in Michaelmas 1468, and his practice seems to have been considerable, both during the next seven years of Edward's reign and the short restoration of Henry VI. that followed. He was raised to the head of the Common Pleas on May 29, 1471, a few weeks after Edward's return. In 1475 he received the honour of knighthood on the same day as the Prince of Wales (Holinshed, iii. 38), and he continued to perform the duties of his office for the remainder of the reign.

There is evidence of his not being removed under Edward V. and Richard III. and from the latter he received a grant of the tail male, of the manors of Wyllesford

Uphaven in Wiltshire, of Over in Gloucestershire, and of Calverton in Buckinghamshire (9 Report, Pub. Rec., App. ii. 12, 122), properties forfeited to the king by persons attainted. These grants are stated to be for unnamed services against the rebels; but that they were judicial, and not political, may be presumed from his immediately receiving a new patent as chief justice on Henry VII.'s accession, and from his being appointed one of the commissioners to execute the office of steward at that king's coronation. (Rymer, xii. 277.)

He presided in his court till his death, about October 1500. His will was proved on December 11 in that year; and, inasmuch as both he and his son Thomas desired to be buried in the religious house of Ashridge, and the son of the latter was buried there, it may be presumed that he was seated in Buckinghamshire. The name of his wife does not appear; but he left a son named Thomas, whose son Francis was the intimate friend of Sir Thomas Wyatt, and was himself a scholar and a poet. His poetical powers are thus celebrated by Drayton in the 'Heroical Epistles':—

And sweet-tong'd Bryan, whom the muses Kept,

And in his cradle rock'd him while he slept.

BUBBEWITH, NICHOLAS (BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS), was born at Menethorpe in Yorkshire, and was brought up in the neighbouring township of Bubbewith, from whence he acquired his name. The earliest notice of him is as a clerk or master in Chancery receiving petitions in parliament in 1397, 21 Richard II. (Rot. Parl. iii. 348.) He had been admitted prebendary of Hayes in the church of Exeter in 1396, and was collated to the archdeaconry of Dorset in 1400, to which was added in the following year that of Richmond, which he held, however, for only two days. (Le Neve, 281, 325.)

He succeeded Thomas de Stanley as master of the Rolls on September 24, 1402, but continued in that office less than two years and a half, resigning it on March 2, 1405.

It was not long before he was raised to the episcopal bench; and he affords a curious instance of one individual presiding over three sees in less than two years. He was elected Bishop of London on May 13, 1406; was translated to Salisbury on August 14, 1407, and to Bath and Wells on April 1, 1408. He was raised, during these changes, to the office of treasurer, which he held for about two years.

He presided over the diocese of Bath and Wells more than sixteen years; and his character for wisdom was so well established that he was one of the prelates sent to Rome in 1414 to assist the cardinals in deciding between the three candidates then contending for the papal chair, when the choice fell upon Martin V. While on that mission he joined in inducing Giovanni di Serravalli, Bishop of Fermo, to undertake the translation of Dante's 'Commedia.' (Tiraboschi, Poes. Ital. ii. 46.)

He is described as a man discreet, provident, and circumspect, both in temporal and spiritual affairs; and his charity and munificence were evidenced both in his life and the disposition of his will. He died on October 27, 1424, and was buried in his chapel at Wells. (Godwin, 379; Rymer, viii. 451, 496, 512; Notes and Queries, 3rd S. iii. 406.)

BUKYNGHAM, JOHN DE, OR BOKYNGHAM (BISHOP OF LINCOLN), was educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity. He was collated archdeacon of Northampton in 1350. In 1351, 24 Edward III., he was appointed keeper of the king's great wardrobe. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 211.) In 1357 he was a baron of the Exchequer, but it may be presumed that he resigned his seat on that bench on his becoming keeper of the privy seal two years afterwards, an office which he retained till the middle of the thirty-seventh year. In 1360 Robert de Herle and he were constituted the king's lieutenants and captains of the duchy of Brittany.

In the meantime he had been advanced successively to the deanery of Lichfield, about 1361, and to the bishopric of Lincoln on April 5, 1363. After ruling that diocese for thirty-four years, Pope Boniface IX., in revenge for certain contests between them, thought proper to remove him from it in 1397, offering him the see of Lichfield instead. The offended prelate, however, refused to accept what he considered as a degradation, but chose rather to retire to the cloisters of Canterbury, where in less than six months he died on March 10, 1398. (Le Neve; Godwin, 295.) His works are mentioned by Bale and Pits, and prove him to have been an able disputant and profound scholar.

BULLER, FRANCIS, is equally celebrated among both females and males, but not with equal admiration. While he is considered by the latter as one of the most learned of lawyers, he is stigmatised by the former as one of the most cruel of judges, since to him is attributed the obnoxious and ungentlemanly dictum that a husband may beat his wife, so that the stick with which he administers the castigation is not thicker than his thumb. It may perhaps restore him to the ladies' good graces to be told that, though the story was generally believed, and even made the subject of caricature, yet, after a searching investigation by the most able critics and antiquaries, no substantial evidence has been found that he ever expressed so ungallant an opinion.

Francis Buller was of an ancient and renowned Cornish family, the members of which were famous in the senate, in the Church, and in many distinguished posts in the service of the state. One of his uncles was father of Admiral Sir Edward Buller, of Trenant Park, who was honoured with a baronetcy, which expired in 1824. Another uncle became Bishop of Exeter; and the judge himself had legal blood in his veins, some of his ancestors being recorders of boroughs, and another the daughter of Chief Justice Pollexfen. His mother also was Lady Jane Bathurst, the sister of Lord Chancellor Bathurst, the second wife of his father, James Buller, Esq., of Shillingham, M.P. for Cornwall from 1747 till his death in 1765. Francis was born on March 17, 1746, and was entered at the Inner Temple on February 3, 1763. He became a pupil of Mr. (afterwards Judge) Ashhurst, and in 1765 felt competent to set up for himself. For seven years he was in full practice as a special pleader, and his reputation in that character was greatly enhanced by the publication in 1767 of a work (said to be founded on collections made by his uncle, Mr. Justice Bathurst) entitled 'An Introduction to the Law relative to Trials at Nisi Prius,' which was so much esteemed that it went through six editions before his death.

He was called to the bar in Easter Term 1772, and immediately took a high rank among his colleagues. His assistance and advice were in perpetual requisition, and there was scarcely any case of importance in which he was not engaged. The Reports of Henry Cowper and the State Trials amply show, not only the extent of his practice, but the excellence of his advocacy. Lord Mansfield soon recognised his genius and promoted his advancement, which was furthered by his uncle, Lord Chancellor Bathurst. In 1777 he was made a king's counsel and second judge on the Chester Circuit; and on May 6, 1778, he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench, being then only thirty-two years of age. Lord Mansfield's expectations were fully realised by the effectual assistance he received during the ten years he remained chief justice, in the last two of which, when his health began to decline, he found a most efficient and active substitute in Mr. Justice Buller, who not only conducted for him the sittings at Nisi Prius, but in the absence of the chief took the lead in Banco, though Judge Ashhurst was his senior. In those two years, in fact, he was little less than chief justice, and in the hope of inducing the minister to make him really so, it is understood that Lord Mansfield delayed his own resignation. Mr. Pitt, however, from political and other motives would not consent, but appointed Lord Kenyon as Lord Mansfield's successor, giving Mr. Justice Buller the very inadequate compensation of a baronetcy in January 1790. Under Lord Kenyon he remained for six years, and in Easter 1794 he removed into the Common Pleas, where he sat for six years more. Being then prostrated by physical infirmity, he arranged with the lord chancellor for the resignation of his seat; but on June 5, 1800, the very day after that arrangement, and before it could be effected, he died at his house in Bedford Square, at the age of fifty-four, and was buried in St. Andrew's, Holborn.

Thus terminated, at an age which had been the commencement of many a judicial life, the career of a judge who had sat on the bench with distinguished merit no less than twenty-two years. No one ever denied his extraordinary legal capacity, though the correctness of some of his decisions might be disputed. Not only was he the recognised substitute of his celebrated chief in his own court, but he won the admiration of that great grugder of praise, Lord Thurlow, who had so great a dependence on him that he frequently, when obliged or inclined to be absent, appointed him to preside in his place in the Court of Chancery, where his decrees excited the rough eulogy of his principal. Yet with all his 'industry, sagacity, quickness, and intelligence,' and notwithstanding his urbanity to the bar, he was not a popular judge. He was considered arrogant in his assumption of superiority, hasty in his decisions and decrees, and which pressed harder upon him in public estimation, prejudiced, severe, and cruel in criminal trials. But his character has outlived all detraction, and at the present day, due allowance being made for occasional mistakes and shortcomings, there are very few deceased judges whose decisions, whose opinions, or whose doubts are received with more respect. Even his own day his penetration and impartiality were so far recognised that it was said him that, though no person if guilty would choose to be tried by him, all persons innocent would prefer him for their judge. Among the young and diffident members of the bar whom he encouraged and befriended were the eminent names of Fearne, Hargrave, and the future chief justice, Gibbs, Law, and Abbott, the latter of whom when tutor to his son, he recommended to adopt the law. He married, at the early age of seventeen, Susannah, the only daughter of Francis Yarde, Esq., and by her he had only one son, who, in compliance with the wish of his mother's brother, assumed the additional surname of Yarde, and who, as the third baronet, was raised to the peerage in 1858, by the title of Baron Churs, of the county of Devon.

BURGH, HUBERT DE (EARL OF K)
This distinguished man traced his ancestry as high as the Emperor Charlemagne.

whose fifth son, Charles, Duke of Ingeheim, descended Harluin de Burgh, who married Herleva or Arlotta, the mother of William the Conqueror, and had by her two sons, both to be hereafter noticed—viz., Odo, Bishop of Bayeux; and Robert, Earl of Moreton. Robert's son, William, who rebelled against Henry I., and, being defeated, was not only deprived of his eyes, but imprisoned for life, is stated to have left two sons, one of whom was John de Burgh, the father (or more probably the grandfather) of Hubert. (Biog. Universelle.)

From an early period of his life Hubert was in the service of Richard I., and in the first year of King John's reign he was sufficiently prominent at court to be one of the pledges on his sovereign's part that the convention with Reginald, Earl of Bologne, should be faithfully kept, and to be a witness to a royal charter. In the same year he was raised to the office of king's chamberlain, and is so designated, for the first time, in a charter dated April 28, 1200, confirming a convention made between him and William de Vernon, Earl of Devon, on his marriage with Johanna, the earl's younger daughter, by which the Isle of Wight and Christchurch were assigned as her portion. (Rot. Chart. 30, 36, 52.)

From this period he advanced rapidly in the royal favour. The castles of Dover and Windsor were committed to his charge, he was appointed sheriff of Dorset and Somerset, and he was entrusted with the custody of the county and castle of Hereford and the office of Warden of the Marches, for the defence of which the king gave him a hundred knights. In 3 John the sheriffalties of Cornwall and Berkshire were added to his employments; and he obtained a licence to fortify his castle of Dunestore in Somersetshire. (Rot. Chart. 100; Rapin, ii. 423; Rot. Liberat. 10; Rot. Pat. 6, 11.)

On the defeat of Arthur, Earl of Brittany, in August 1202, that prince was sent to Falaise under the charge, according to some relations (Holinshed, ii. 235), of Hubert de Burgh, whose refusal to obey the king's cruel behest against his royal prisoner is the subject of one of the most beautiful of Shakspeare's scenes. This disobedience and the concealment with which it was covered seem to have been forgiven when the murmurs of the barons on Arthur's supposed death were removed by Hubert's announcement that the prince was still alive. On King John's being summoned, after the completion of the real tragedy, to answer the charge before Philip of France and his peers, Hubert was sent with Eustace, Bishop of Ely, to that court, to demand a safe-conduct for his going and returning, the former of which was readily promised, but the latter, they were answered, would depend on the judgment to be pronounced. John, not venturing to expose himself to such a risk, was condemned for his non-appearance to the forfeiture of his French dominions. (Rapin, ii. 429.)

In 1214 he is mentioned as seneschal, and also as mayor of Niort, and shortly afterwards as seneschal of Poitou, in which character, after the battle at Bouvines, he arranged a truce between the Kings of England and France for five years. (Wendover, iii. 193, 302.)

Having, on the death of his first wife, married Beatrice, the daughter of William de Warenne, and widow of Dodo Bardolf, in 1209, her death occurred before December 18, 1214; for on that day the sheriff of Lincoln was commanded to give Hubert's steward seisin of the land of Finingham, which was Beatrice's dower. (Rot. Claus. i. 181.)

As seneschal of Poitou, he was in attendance at Runnymede on July 15, 1215, 17 John, when Magna Charta was granted; but a few days afterwards he was raised to the high office of chief justiciary of England. To this office were added many grants, and the custody, among others, of Dover Castle.

He was in charge of this important fortress in May 1216, when, at the instigation of the barons, England was invaded by Prince Louis of France, who in the next month began to besiege it. Hubert by his skill and courage successfully resisted the enemy's attacks until the death of King John, when Louis, finding his warlike efforts unavailing, endeavoured to tempt him to deliver up the castle by promises of large rewards. The loyal governor's honour, however, being as impenetrable as his walls, the foiled prince raised the siege and hastened from the scene. (Wendover, iii. 368, 380, iv. 4.)

He next defeated the French armament sent under the command of Eustace le Moyne to aid Prince Louis, the consequence of which victory was the retirement of the French prince and the comparative restoration of peace to the kingdom, under the prudent management of William Mareschall, Earl of Pembroke, the young king's governor. (Lingard, iii. 79.)

That Hubert remained in the office of chief justiciary on the accession of the new king is proved by various mandates addressed to him under that character in 1216 and for many years after that date. A salary of 300*l.* per annum was assigned for his support in the office, and 1000*l.* for the custody of Dover Castle. (Devon's Issue Roll, 2.)

On the death of the earl marshal in 1219 the regency was conferred on Hubert, while the king's person was placed under the care of his rival, Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester. His government was marked by wisdom and firmness, not unaccompanied, however, with some degree of severity. He repressed a dangerous insurrection in London in 1222, and caused Constantine, the ringleader, to be executed; he compelled the barons to surrender their castles into the king's hands, and in 1224 he punished Faukes de Breaute, a ferocious magnate raised by the late king, for imprisoning Henry de Braybroc, one of the judges, by destroying his castle of Bedford, hanging those who had defended it, and banishing the principal offender.

In 1222 Hubert's interest at court had been still further strengthened by his marriage with Margaret, the eldest sister of Alexander, King of Scotland, thus becoming allied to his sovereign, whose sister, the princess Johanna, had been recently united to the Scottish king.

When the king attained his majority he continued Hubert as his minister, and raised him, in 1227, to the earldom of Kent, a title which his ancestor, William, Earl of Moreton, had forfeited his freedom and his life in his endeavours to recover. In the following year his office of chief justiciary was confirmed to him for life; and the numerous grants with which he was enriched, and responsible offices entrusted to him about the same time, are proofs at once of the influence he possessed over the king's mind, and the manner in which he exercised it to his own aggrandisement.

His uncontrolled authority could not fail to excite some jealousy among the barons, nor could his enemies be slow to find instances of rapacity in the rewards which he accumulated. But the success of his ministry and the favour of his sovereign silenced all loud complaints. The feeling of the time may, however, be judged from the derisive title of 'Hubert's Folly,' which was given to a castle, commenced but not completed by him, at Cridia, to overawe the Welsh. (Wendover, iv. 173.) His career was nearly arrested in September 1229 by the irritable temper of the king, who, having collected a vast army at Portsmouth with the object of making an attempt to recover his French dominions, found such scanty naval preparations to transport his armament that in his passionate disappointment he called Hubert an old traitor, charged him with receiving a bribe from France, and would have instantly despatched him with his own hand had he not been restrained by the Earl of Chester. The royal indignation did not long continue, and Hubert was restored for a time to his former power. Even in 1231 he obtained the privilege of appointing a substitute as Justiciary of England in case of illness or absence, and the grant of the office of chief justiciary of Ireland for life.

But the seed of suspicion had been sown, and there were many to encourage its growth. He was charged with conniving at certain depredations which had been made against the Italian clergy, under Robert de Tuinge; and the frequent disturbances on the Welsh frontier were attributed to his incapacity. The restoration of his ancient rival, Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, to favour seemed to foretell the coming storm, and that prelate was not backward in insinuations which he knew would hasten it. He represented that the poverty of the treasury was occasioned by the rapacity of some, and the maladministration of others, of its officers, and used his interest to procure the dismissal of several functionaries who owed their places to the justiciary's protection.

Hubert's fall was not long delayed. He was removed from his office on July 29, 1232, 16 Henry III., and Stephen de Segrave was nominated in his stead. He was called upon to account, not only for the disposition of all the treasure he had received, but for the exercise of all the privileges entrusted to him, both in the reign of John and of the present king; and various criminal charges were brought against him by those who rejoiced in his disgrace.

So inveterate was the king against his former favourite that Hubert did not da to appear at the time appointed, but to sanctuary on two occasions, the sanctity of the latter of which was harshly violated and he was dragged to the Tower.

His imprisonment there did not last long for the king, under the Bishop of London's threat of excommunication for violating the sanctity of the church, was compelled to replace his captive in the asylum he chosen. The church was then encircled and besieged, so that, being deprived of and the means of escape, Hubert was last obliged to surrender himself and return to his prison in the Tower. The exertions of his friend Henry, Archbishop of Dublin, could only obtain authority to offer him the choice of abjuring the realm or perpetual imprisonment, or confessing himself a traitor and putting himself in the king's mercy. He at once rejected all conditions, but replied that, though he had done nothing deserving his presentment, he would, for the satisfaction of the king, retire from the kingdom, although he would not abjure it.

The king being somewhat pacified by submission, and by the remembrance of former services to his father and himself, consented that he should retain his monial inheritance and the lands he held of his meane lords, forfeiting those that he chief from the king, and that he should be kept in safe custody in the castle of Devizes under the charge of four earls. Thither he was accordingly transferred; but in the following year, hearing that his old enemy was about to obtain the custody of his person, he dropped from the wall into the moat, and took refuge in the church of St. John at Devizes. Here he was again violently dragged from the altar, but, the bishops interfering, was obliged to be restored to his sanctuary. On this, however, a precept, dated October 15, 1233, was issued 'to the good men of Wilts,' commanding them, if Hubert de Burgh would not give his abjuration of the realm to Ralph de Bray and Ralph de Norwich, justices whom the king had sent there, or submit himself to be judged by them, to surround the church and the cemetery thereof as they should be instructed. (New Fadera, i. 211.)

He was, a few days afterwards, rescued from his intended starvation by a body of armed men, who, overpowering his guards, led him from the church, and conveyed him to the Earl of Pembroke, then in arms against the king in Wales. His outlawry immediately followed.

The disgrace of Peter de Rupibus occurred in April 1234, and was soon after followed by the restoration of peace between the king and the barons, with the restitution of their forfeited lands. In this reconciliation Hubert participated, but at the same time surrendered his title to the office of chief justiciary. (Wendover, iv. 204-310.)

Even after all these trials, his loyalty to the king was conspicuous. In the confederacy of the barons headed by Richard, the king's brother, in 1238, he alone remained faithful to his allegiance. But with a monarch so weak and fickle, so avaricious and extravagant, it was impossible to remain long in peace. In 22 Henry III. the king took offence at the marriage of Hubert's daughter Margaret with Richard, Earl of Gloucester; and, though it was proved that Hubert had no knowledge of the affair, the royal indignation could only be appeased by a considerable fine. In the following year, upon some frivolous pretence, a new quarrel was fixed upon him, and, many of the old charges against him having been revived, a day was appointed for the trial. His answers to all the eight articles alleged against him were full and satisfactory, but he felt compelled, in order to avoid an unjust sentence, to make a peace-offering to the king of four of his castles. (State Trials, i. 13.)

The few years that he lived afterwards he was suffered to pass in quiet, and his eventful life was closed on May 12, 1243, 27 Henry III., at Banstead in Surrey. He was buried within the church of the Friars Preachers, or Black Friars, in Holborn, to which he had been a large benefactor. His pious donations were too numerous to be recorded here, but among them may be mentioned his grant to that fraternity of his palace at Westminster, which was afterwards purchased by the Archbishop of York, and is now known by the name of Whitehall; and his foundation of the Hospital of Our Lady, and the church of the Maison Dieu, at Dover.

Whatever failings marked the character of Hubert, it cannot be doubted that he was a faithful servant and a wise counsellor to the monarchs whom he served. The distractions of the kingdom after he had ceased to be Henry's minister speak loudly of his power of guiding and controlling the passions of a foolish and capricious prince.

He left two sons and two daughters, but of which of his wives they were the issue is a debateable question.

The eldest son, John, did homage for his father's lands, but never bore the title of Earl of Kent. His branch of the family failed in 1279, by the death of John's son John, without male issue.

Hubert's second son was named Hubert, from whom descended Sir Thomas de Burgh, who in 1487 was created a peer, as Baron Borough of Gainsborough, a title which in 1598 fell into abeyance among the four sisters of Robert, the sixth baron. (Nicolas's Synopsis.)

One of his daughters, Margaret, was certainly by the Princess Margaret, as she is so described in a charter dated April 14, 1227. Her clandestine marriage with Richard de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, in 1237, already alluded to, was quickly followed by her death, as the earl took another wife in the following year. (Archæol. Inst. at York, 1816; Holy Trinity, 129.)

BURGH, HUGH DE. When John de Sandale, the chancellor, went from York to London on August 26, 1316, 10 Edward II., he, by the king's directions, left the Great Seal in the custody of William de Ayre-mynne, the keeper of the Rolls, under the seals of Robert de Bardelby and Hugh de Burgh, clericus, was paymaster of the forces raised in Cumberland and Westmoreland in 27 and 31 Edward I.; and was one of the procurators of the Bishop of Carlisle in the parliament of 16 Edward II., and for the abbot of St. Mary's, York, in that of the following year. (Parl. Writs, i. 506, ii. p. ii. 615.) He held the living of Patrick Brompton in Yorkshire, and died in 2 Edward III. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 21.)

BURGH, WILLIAM, was apparently of a Norfolk family, although he had property in the counties of Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln. His first appearance as an advocate in the Year Books was in 43 Edward III., 1369; and he is mentioned as one of the king's serjeants in 3 Richard II., 1379 (Rot. Parl. iii. 79), receiving in the same year the appointment of seneschal of the domain of Okeham 'ad placitum regis.' (Cal. Rot. Parl. 203, 208, 231.) In Trinity 1383, 7 Richard II., we find him acting as a judge of the Common Pleas, to which he had probably been only just appointed, as in the following Christmas he was knighted at Eltham, having previously received the materials for his robes as a banneret. (Dugdale's Orig. 46, 103.)

He was one of the judges who, in August 1387, were induced, or, as he pleaded, compelled, to sign the opinions stigmatising as treason the ordinance of the previous parliament, appointing commissioners for the government of the kingdom; and, being impeached in consequence, was condemned with his colleagues to die. His sentence, like theirs, was commuted to banishment for life; and the city of Dublin, with two miles round it, was named as the place of his exile, with an allowance of 40 marks per annum to live on. His expatriation lasted till 1397, when he had liberty to return. The reversal of the original proceedings against him and the others, which passed in the next year, was in its turn annulled by the first parliament of Henry IV., two years afterwards. That king, however, in the fourth year of his reign, restored him wholly to the property which he had forfeited. (Rot. Parl. iii. 253-491; Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 107.)

BURGHERSH, HENRY DE (BISHOP OF LINCOLN). The family of Burghersh derived its name from a manor so called in the county of Sussex. Its possessor in the reign of Edward I. was Robert de Burghersh, who was constable of Dover Castle, and warden of the Cinque Ports. He died in 1306, and Henry, born about 1290, is described in the statutes of Oriel College, Oxford, as the son of Robert de Burghasse, knight, and Matilda, his wife.

He owed to his connection with Bartholomew de Badlesmere, of Ledes Castle, Kent, his uncle, that favour which produced the king's intercession with the pope to raise him to the vacant see of Lincoln. In one of the royal letters he is called canon of York. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. i. 405-418.) The necessary bull having been procured, he was consecrated bishop on July 20, 1320, 14 Edward II. In the next year his brother and his uncle were both in arms on the side of the Earl of Lancaster; and it is evident that he was suspected of adhering to the same party, as there is a memorandum on the Roll (Ibid. 550) that he is not to be requested to raise men-at-arms to march against the rebels and adherents of the earl. The strong terms of vituperation which the king uses in his letter to the pope on that occasion, praying for the bishop's expulsion, form a curious contrast with the laudatory expressions in his five letters of recommendation two years before. (New Fadera, i. 404.) The temporalities of his bishopric were, however, seized into the king's hands: but were restored by the first parliament of Edward III. (Ibid. 697.)

Soon after the accession of Edward III. he was placed in the office of treasurer, which he filled till, in the next year, on May 12, 1328, he was appointed chancellor. In 1329 he accompanied the king to France, to do homage to King Philip for the lands held of that crown, and is said to have received some hint of an intention to surprise and seize the person of Edward, who thereupon lost no time in escaping. He retained the Great Seal till the downfall of Mortimer and Queen Isabella, when the king, on November 28, 1330, placed it in the hands of John de Stratford, Bishop of Winchester, but gave Burghersh a general pardon. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 100.)

We find him, however, in the royal confidence, as treasurer, from the eighth year of the reign till the end of his life, and engaged in various negotiations as to Edward's claim to the crown of France, accompanying the king in his expeditions, and becoming bound for him for a loan of 10,000*l.* (New Fadera, i. 803-1134.)

The bishop died at Ghent in December 1340, and his body was removed to England for burial in his own cathedral.

He is reputed to have possessed great natural abilities and extensive learning. His political character must have been high since for ten years after the king had released himself from his mother's domination he was employed, although one of her partisans in embassies requiring skill and prudence as well as confidence and trust. He and his brother founded a grammar-school in Lincoln, to which he left maintenance for 100 poor priests and as many poor scholars ever.

Bartholomew, his brother, was the ancestor of the present Earl of Westmoreland and the Baroness le Despencer and Burghersh. (Godwin, 294; Barnes's Edward 36-210.)

BURLAND, JOHN, belonged to a family which was for a long series of years seated at the manor of Steyning, in the parish of Stoke Courcy in the county of Somerset. His father was also named John Bur and his mother was Elizabeth, the daughter of Claver Morris, of Wells, M.D. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, from 1740 to 1743, when he entered the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in January 1746. The next year he married Letitia, daughter of William Beportman, Esq., of Orchard Portman.

Anne, the daughter of the speaker, Sir Edward Seymour.

In 1762 he was honoured with the degree of the thecoif, and in 1764 was appointed king's squire. After he had held the recordership of Wells for some time with great reputation, the corporation thought fit to remove him, but on application to the Court of King's Bench in 1767 a peremptory mandamus was ordered to be made out for his restoration. He was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on April 8, 1774; but within two years he died by the bursting of a blood-vessel in his brain, on March 28, 1776, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He left a son, who became member of parliament for Totnes. (Collinson's Somerset, i. 217; Genl. Mag. xxxvii. 91.)

BURNEL, ROBERT (BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS), appears to have been (after consideration of the various descriptions of his parentage) the son of another Robert Burnel, and to have been born at Acton-Burnell. In 1265, 50 Henry III., he is described as clerk or secretary to Edward, the king's eldest son (Archæol. Journal, ii. 326), and as being signed with the cross with the prince in 1269, whom he accompanied to the Holy Land. Having returned before him, he held in the first year of Edward's reign a high place in the council during the king's absence (Madox, ii. 207), and there are also several letters addressed by him to Walter de Merton, the chancellor. (Report Pub. Rec., App. ii. 92, 93, 113.) He was at this time canon of Wells and archdeacon of York, and probably held some office in the Exchequer.

King Edward returned to England on August 2, 1274, and was crowned on the 5th. Within a month afterwards Burnel was raised to the chancellorship, the Great Seal being delivered to him on September 21, 1274. He filled this office all the remainder of his life, and never during the eighteen years that it lasted lost the confidence of his royal master; a distinction which he well merited from the wisdom of his counsels, and the zeal and assiduity with which he aided his sovereign's efforts in the improvement of the law.

In January 1275 he was elected Bishop of Bath and Wells, and was consecrated at Merton in the following April. On the abdication of the archbishopric of Canterbury by Robert Aconwardy in 1278, the monks elected Bishop Burnel as his successor, but the pope, not deeming him a man fitted for his purposes, annulled the appointment, and placed John Peckham in the vacant seat.

On his various expeditions into foreign parts he left the Great Seal in the custody of different officers of the Chancery, to transact the necessary business.

Acton-Burnell, the place of his birth and residence, has acquired an interest in historical recollections by having given its name to the Statutum de Mercatoribus, which was enacted there on October 12, 1283, 11 Edward I. The king was then paying a visit to his chancellor, while a parliament, which he had summoned to meet at Shrewsbury, were determining the fate of the Welsh Prince David. When that trial was over, the parliament joined the king at Acton-Burnell, and passed this statute, after which the king extended his royal visit till November 12. Some remains of the room in which the parliament sat still exist. They belong to the old mansion of the bishop's ancestors, which he replaced by a new building, still remaining, but with great alterations.

One of his last acts is his attendance at Norham as chancellor at the meeting of the Scottish peers on June 3, 1291, when King Edward acted as arbitrator between the competitors for that crown. (Lingard, iii. 206.)

On October 25, 1292, he died at Berwick-on-Tweed, when his body was removed to Wells and buried there.

Bishop Burnel was an active and a wise minister, serving the crown with zeal, energy, and prudence. No chancellor before him had ever held the Seal so long or retained so uninterruptedly his sovereign's confidence. The monk of Worcester gives his character in these words: 'Regi tam utilis, plebi tam affabilis, omnibus amabilis: vix nostris temporibus illi similis invenietur.' (Angl. Sac. i. 514.)

BURNET, THOMAS, was not the first of his family who obtained a seat on the judicial bench, his grandfather having acquired high legal eminence in the Scottish tribunal as Lord Cramond. His father was the celebrated whig prelate, Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, whose exertions at the Revolution, the piety of whose life, and the value of whose works have thrown around him a lustre which is rather brightened than diminished by the controversies which the latter occasioned. His mother was the bishop's second wife, Mrs. Mary Scott, a wealthy and accomplished Dutch lady of Scottish and noble extraction. Thomas Burnet was their third and youngest son, and was born about 1694. He was first sent to Merton College, Oxford, and afterwards in 1706 to the University of Leyden, where he studied for two years, and then visited Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. On his return he entered himself at the Middle Temple in 1709.

His student life was divided between law and politics, and he acquired equal notoriety for the wildness of his dissipations and for his genius and wit. Swift, in one of his letters to Stella of 1712, speaking of the Mohocks when they terrified the town by their lawless and mischievous exploits, reports that 'the Bishop of Salisbury's son is said to be of the gang.' This, however, may have been only a current calumny of the day, which the tory dean found pleasure in promulgating. The groundlessness of the report seems the more probable, inasmuch as at this period Burnet was issuing from the press no less than seven pamphlets against the administration, and in defence of the whigs; and was engaged in the composition of several poetical pieces, which were not given to the world till long after his death: occupations which would leave him little leisure for the imputed connection. One of the pamphlets, entitled 'A certain Information of a certain Discourse, that happened at a certain gentleman's house, in a certain county, written by a certain person then present, to a certain friend now in London; from whence you may collect the great certainty of the account,' so stung the ministers that they imprisoned the author. There is no doubt that his course of life at this time was dissolute and licentious. A story is told that his father one day, seeing him uncommonly grave, asked him the subjects of his thoughts. 'A greater work,' replied he, 'than your lordship's "History of the Reformation."' 'What is that, Tom?' 'My own reformation, my lord.' The bishop expressed his pleasure, but at the same time his despair of it.

On the accession of George I. he wrote some other political squibs, now forgotten, and at his father's death he published the 'character' of the bishop, with his last will. In 1715 he and Mr. Duckett wrote a travestie of the first book of the Iliad, under the title of 'Homerides,' which naturally procured them a place in Pope's 'Dunciad.' On the whig party regaining power he was sent as consul to Lisbon, where he got involved in some dispute with Lord Tyrawley, the ambassador, and adopted a curious mode of ridiculing his noble antagonist. Having learned what dress his lordship intended to wear on a birthday, he provided liveries for his servants of exactly the same pattern, and appeared himself in a plain suit. He continued at Lisbon several years, and on his recall to England he published his father's 'History of his own Time,' to the last volume of which he added a life of the bishop.

Resuming his original profession, he was called to the bar in 1729, twenty years after his admission to the Middle Temple. He showed so much ability and met with such success that in 1736 he received the degree of the coif, and in 1740 was appointed king's serjeant. In October of the next year he succeeded Mr. Justice Fortescue on the bench of the Common Pleas, where he administered justice with a great reputation for learning and uprightness for nearly twelve years. He was knighted in November 1745, on the occasion of all the judges, serjeants, and barristers presenting an address to the king expressive of their 'utter detestation of the present wicked and most ungrateful rebellion.' He died unmarried on January 5, 1753, of the gout in his stomach, and was buried near his father in St. James's Church, Clerkenwell.

Whatever were the frailties of his youth, he redeemed them by his after-life, commanding in the latter period the respect of the wise, as he had gained in the former the admiration of the wits who distinguished the reign of Queen Anne. He rejoiced in the esteem of many friends, and his merits and his worth were recorded after his death in several publications.

BURNHAM, THOMAS DE, was the last justice of four to whom the first commission of trailbaston into the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, and Derby, dated November 23, 1304, 33 Edward I., was addressed. (Rot. Parl. i. 407.) On the renewal of the commissions in the following April, he was not reappointed; but he had in the meantime been returned a knight of the shire for Lincolnshire, which he had already represented in three parliaments, and was again elected to that of Edward II.

BURNTON, WILLIAM DE, the last name of five justices itinerant appointed in Edward I., 1302, for the county of Cornwall, may have been the same as William de Brompton, the justice of the Common Pleas in this reign, whose name was sometimes written Burnton; as thirteen years had elapsed since his disgrace.

BURROUGH, JAMES, was the third son of the Rev. John Burrough, of Abbots-Ar in Hampshire, in which county and Wiltshire he possessed considerable property. He was born in 1750, and, showing great ability as a youth, his father determined on bringing him up to the law profession. He was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in 1773, having previously practised for a short time as a special pleader. Joining the Western Circuit he gradually acquired a good share of business, and was particularly noticed for his profound knowledge as a sessional lawyer. In 1792 he was appointed a commissioner of bankrupts, and to Lord Eldon's estimation of his intelligence and worth owed his ultimate elevation.

He was selected in 1794 by the Earl Radnor as his deputy in the recorder's office of Portsmouth, and afterwards became recorder of Portsmouth, both which appointments he held till he was advanced to the bench. That event did not occur till May when he was sixty-six years of age. He was then constituted a judge of the Common Pleas, and knighted.

As a judge he held a distinguished rank. To his legal knowledge he added patience and strict impartiality; and he was particularly esteemed for the kindness and simplicity of his demeanour. He was apt to deal in apophthegms, one of which was, 'Public policy is an unruly horse, which if a judge unwarily mounts, ten to one he is run away with.' His mode of illustration too was especially quaint. He once addressed a jury thus: 'Gentlemen, you have been told that the first is a consequential issue. Now, perhaps you do not know what a consequential issue means; but I dare say you understand nine-pins. Well, then, if you deliver your bowl so as to strike the front pin in a particular direction, down go the rest: just so it is with these counts; knock down the first, and all the rest will go to the ground; that's what we call a consequential issue.'

When he had attained the age of seventy-nine he was obliged by his infirmities to apply for his discharge, which he obtained at the end of 1829. His life was prolonged till March 25, 1839, and his remains were deposited in the Temple Church. His daughter Anne, his only surviving child, erected a monument to his memory in the church of Laverstock, near Salisbury. (Lord Campbell's Chancellors, iv. 666; Law Mag. iii. 249.)

BURSTALL, WILLIAM DE, is first mentioned as a clerk, or master, in Chancery in a document recording that the Great Seal was placed in the custody of four individuals, of whom he is the second named, on March 16, 1371, to hold during the absence of Sir Robert Thorpe, the chancellor. The next time his name appears is in an entry dated the 28th of the same month, stating the delivery by the Bishop of Winchester, the late chancellor, of certain seals which had been left in his possession. He is then called master of the Rolls, and Dugdale fixes that as the date of his appointment. In 49 Edward III. there was a contest in the court of Rome between him and a cardinal relative to the presentation to the parish church of Houghton in the diocese of Durham, which the pope decided in his favour. (New Fadera, iii. 1037.) Under Richard II. he continued master of the Rolls during the first four years of his reign, and died in 1381.

During his time the Domus Conversorum in Chancery Lane was permanently annexed by Edward III. to the office of master of the Rolls.

BURTON, JOHN DE, was appointed master of the Rolls on October 24, 1386, but whether he was the John de Burton who held benefices about this time in Cambridgeshire and Yorkshire, and was very liberal to the institutions of those counties, is uncertain. He held the office till July 22, 1394; and from March 26 to April 19, 1393, he was entrusted with the Great Seal during the absence of the chancellor. There is proof that he died in possession of the place by the mandate to give up the Rolls of the Chancery being directed, not to him, but his executors. (Rot. Pat. 18 Rich. II. p. i. m. 28.)

BURY, RICHARD DE, OF DE AUNGERVILLE (BISHOP OF DURHAM). The real name of this learned and eminent prelate was Richard de Aungerville, a town in Normandy; but he assumed that of de Bury from the place where he was born, Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk. He was son of Sir Richard de Aungerville, and was born in 1281. Being of very tender years when he was left an orphan, the care of his education devolved on his uncle, John de Willoughby, a priest, by whom his youthful studies were well directed. In due time he was removed to Oxford, where he pursued them with so much diligence that he became distinguished for his learning, and at the same time acquired the higher character of a man pure in his life and manners.

On leaving Oxford he entered the convent of Durham as a monk. From this seclusion he was withdrawn by being selected as the tutor of the king's eldest son; but, as the prince was not born till 1312, this event could scarcely have occurred before the year 1319 or 1320, when our monk would have been nearly forty years old. His conduct in his new position was so exemplary that he was rewarded with the treasurer-ship of Guienne, where he was established when Queen Isabella, and his pupil the prince, went to France in 1325. The asylum he gave them there, and the pecuniary aid he afforded out of the royal treasures in his keeping, had nearly proved fatal to him. Although the latter rightly belonged to the prince, as his father had transferred the duchy to him, he was pursued by the emissaries of the Despencers, and, escaping to Paris, was compelled to conceal himself for seven days in the belfry of the church of the Friars Minors in that city.

On the accession of his princely pupil to the throne his services were not forgotten. He was retained near the person of the king, then little more than fourteen years of age, and was rewarded successively with the offices of cofferer, treasurer of the wardrobe, and keeper of the privy seal. Nor was his clerical preferment overlooked. He held at first a small prebend in the church of Chichester; and the king, in a letter to the pope on de Bury's behalf, calls him 'his secretary,' and, speaking of his services, 'a pueritia nostra,' uses these strong expressions: 'Quod novimus ipsum virum in consiliis providum, conversationis et vitæ munditiâ decorum, literarum scientiâ præditum, et in agendis quibuslibet circumspæctum.' The object of this letter was to induce the pope to reserve for de Bury the prebends in the churches of Hereford, London, and Chichester, with the other benefices which Gilbert de Middleton, archdeacon of Northampton, lately deceased, had possessed. Before an answer could have been received to this application, de Bury was collated to the vacant archdeaconry on January 6, 1330-1; but the pope, according to the too common practice of the day, usurped the appointment, and, on the 1st of the following March, granted the dignity to Peter, one of his cardinals; but prebends in the cathedrals of Lincoln, Sarum, and Lichfield were among the grants soon after made to de Bury.

In October 1331 he went with Anthony de Pesaigne on a mission to the pope at Avignon, where he formed an intimacy with Petrarch, among his conversations with whom is one relative to the Island of Thule, on which, however, Petrarch complains that the learned ambassador was either unable or unwilling to offer any elucidation. On his return from this embassy he was sent, with two others, to Cambridge, with a commission to enquire into the conduct and claims of such scholars as were supported in that university by the king's bounty. It was probably during this visit that he became one of the guild of St. Mary's there, to the union of which with that of Corpus Christi the college of the latter name owed its foundation. (Masters, 9.)

In 1332 he was admitted dean of Wells, and in the next year was sent again as ambassador to the pope, by whom he was appointed one of his chaplains. While he was absent on this mission, Lewis Beaumont, Bishop of Durham, died; and the pope used the opportunity at once of exercising his own power, and of gratifying King Edward, by setting aside an election made by the monks of Durham, and placing Richard de Bury in the vacant seat. He was consecrated at Chertsey on December 19, 1333.

King Edward estimated his ability and his promise so highly that he fixed on him to fill the most important offices in the state. He was accordingly constituted treasurer on February 3, 1334, and raised to the chancellorship on September 28 in the same year. Whether he found that he was unqualified for its cares and responsibilities, or that they withdrew him more than he wished from those of his diocese, he resigned the latter office, after holding it less than nine months, on June 6, 1335. He was employed in the following and several subsequent years in frequent embassies to France on the subject of the king's claims—an occupation to which his learning and talents were probably more peculiarly fitted. His allowance on these missions was at the rate of five marks a day. (New Fœdera, ii. 950.)

Though frequently absent, he neglected none of the requirements of his diocese. He had the habit of turning all his time to account, and neither his meals nor his travels were spent idly. During the former he was read to by his chaplains, among whom were numbered some of the most celebrated men of the day, and afterwards he discussed with them the various subjects suggested by the reading. During the latter he occupied himself in forming what became the largest library in Europe, the possession of which was one of his greatest glories, and its accumulation formed his chief delight. He spared no expense in securing the most curious and valuable manuscripts, and speaks with evident glee of the motives which influenced the donors of some, and of the difficulties he had to overcome in obtaining others. The stores he had thus collected he bequeathed to the students of Durham (since called Trinity College, in Oxford, being the first public library that was founded in that university; and in his work called 'Philobiblon' he not only gives instructions for its management, but endeavours to excite a love of literature and a taste for the liberal arts.

His own devotion to books may be estimated by the language he uses regarding them:—'Hi sunt magistri qui nos instruunt sine virgis et ferulâ, sine verbis et coleri, sine pane et pecunia. Si accedis non dormiunt, si inquiris non se abscondunt, non remurmurant si oberres, cachinos nesciunt si ignores.'

His ardour in their pursuit did not end with their attainment. He read and used them; and he relates that the first Greek and Hebrew grammars that ever appeared in England were derived from his labours. He encouraged the acquaintance and assisted the enquiries of all learned and intelligent men, and never enjoyed himself so fully as in the pleasures of their conversation; and his understanding was so cultivated, his wit so piercing, and his spirit of enquiry so eager, that few subjects were beyond his genius and penetration.

His virtues and his charities were equal to his talents and learning. He was beloved by his neighbours, with whom he lived on terms of reciprocal affection; to his clergy he was an indulgent superior; to his tenants and domestics a considerate master. He was most bountiful to the poor, distributing eight quarters of wheat every week for the relief of those around him, and never coming in his journeys to appropriate largess for the indigent in those places through which he passed.

He closed his useful life, in the 64th y of his age, at his palace of Auckland, on April 24, 1345, and was interred in his cathedral.

BURY, THOMAS, the youngest son of Sir William Bury, knight, of Linwood in Lincolnshire, was born in 1655, and, entering Gray's Inn in 1668, was called to the bar in 1676. After twenty-four years' practice, he obtained the degree of serjeant in 1700, and on January 26 of the next year he was made a baron of the Exchequer. Speaker Onslow in his notes to Burnet states that it was said that it appeared by Bury's 'Book of Accounts' that Lord Keeper Wright had 1000*l.* for raising him to the bench. This discreditable story, however, depends on very slight testimony. The new baron was of course knighted, and sat in that court during the remainder of his life; for fifteen years as a puisne baron, and for six as chief baron, to which he was advanced on June 10, 1716. In the famous Aylesbury case in the House of Lords he supported the opinion of Chief Justice Holt, when the judgment which he had opposed was reversed.

He died on May 4, 1722, and was buried at Grantham, where there is a handsome monument to his memory.

BYLES, JOHN BARNARD, one of the present judges of the Common Pleas, was born at Stowmarket in Suffolk in 1801, and is the eldest son of John Byles, Esq., of that place, by the only daughter of William Barnard, Esq., of Holts in Essex.

Called to the bar by the Inner Temple in November 1831, he joined the Norfolk Circuit, and attended the sessions attached to it. In 1840 he was appointed recorder of Buckingham, and in 1843 received the degree of the coif, to which was added a patent of precedence in all the courts in 1846, the year in which the act was passed opening the Court of Common Pleas to all barristers. In 1857 he was promoted to the dignity of queen's serjeant. During the whole period of his career as an advocate his sagacity and sound judgment secured for him a considerable, and ultimately a leading, business.

His professional reputation must have been universally acknowledged to have induced a lord chancellor so much opposed to him in politics as was Lord Cranworth to select him for a judge's place. Mr. Serjeant Byles was not only a tory, or rather a conservative, in his opinions, but had advocated the principles of that section of his party which supported protection in an able pamphlet, called 'Sophisms of Free Trade.' Notwithstanding this apparent impediment to his advance, Lord Cranworth, deeming that a good judge was better than a political partisan, made choice of one who in the estimation of the legal world held the highest place. Mr. Byles was therefore appointed in June 1858 to fill the vacant seat on the bench of the Common Pleas.

He has been twice married. His first wife, a daughter of J. Foster, Esq., of Biggleswade, he lost very early; his second is a daughter of J. Weld, Esq., of Royston.

Besides the above-mentioned pamphlet, he published a work 'On the Usury Laws,' and some others.

BYNTEWORTH, RICHARD DE (BISHOP OF LONDON), had a grant of the manor of Bynteworth, now called Bentworth, in Hampshire, with the advowson of its church, from the Archbishop of Rouen, in 9 Edward III., and probably was a native of the place. He was employed in the previous year as one of the ambassadors to negotiate the marriage of the king's brother, John, Earl of Cornwall, with Maria, daughter of Ferdinand of Spain, and in several subsequent years on other missions, in all of which he is called 'juris civilis professor.' In 11 Edward III. he was keeper of the king's privy seal; and he appears to have been a canon of St. Paul's at the time of the decease of Stephen de Gravesend, Bishop of London. By his conduct in these employments his character had been so firmly established that he was immediately called upon to fill the vacant see, his election to which took place on May 4, 1338. On July 6 the king appointed him his chancellor. But his sudden death put an end to his tenure of both these offices on December 8, 1339, before he had illustrated either by any memorable act. (Godwin, 185.)

BYRLAY, WILLIAM DE (Birlaco), can hardly be considered entitled to the designation given to him by Sir T. D. Hardy as keeper of the Great Seal. He seems to have been merely a clerk in the Chancery, to whom, with two of his brethren, the Great Seal was on some occasions entrusted during the temporary absences of the chancellor, the first occurring in March 1298, 26 Edward I., and the last in 1308.

BYRUN, JOHN DE, was named in a separate commission of trailbaston, issued on March 13, 1305, 33 Edward I., for the county of Lancaster, which in the following month was consolidated with the other northern counties in a new commission, in which his name was not included. (Parl. Writs, i. 407, 408.)

He was a lineal descendant from Ralph de Burun, who at the time of the Conqueror's survey had eight lordships in Nottinghamshire and five in Derbyshire, and whose family subsequently obtained considerable property in Lancashire. His father was also named John, and his mother was Joan, daughter of Sir Baldwin Thies, and widow of Sir Robert Holland.

Seated at Clayton, in Lancashire, his father was one of the conservators of the peace for that county in 15 Edward I., and sheriff of Yorkshire for seven years from 21 Edward I., and actively engaged in raising the forces for the Scottish wars. In 28 Edward I. he held a high place in the commission to perambulate the forests of that and the neighbouring counties. (Parl. Writs, i. 299, 389, 398, ii. 8-17.)

John the son for the first nine years of the reign of Edward II. held an equally prominent position in Lancashire. Some little confusion, arising from the identity of name, renders it difficult to distinguish precisely the acts of the two. The date of neither of their deaths is given. The son married Alice, cousin and heir of Robert Banastre, of Hyndeley, Lancashire, and was succeeded by his son Richard de Byron. In regular descent from him came Sir John Byron, who for his faithful adherence to the fortunes of King Charles I., and his valiant support of his cause, was created Baron Byron of Rochdale on October 24, 1643. The present baron, the eighth lord, is his lineal descendant. The surpassing genius of George Gordon Byron, the sixth lord, has given to the title an immortality which it could have never derived either from the antiquity of the family or the devoted loyalty for which the peerage was granted: his works will remain a lasting monument of his glory, but a sad record of his unhappy disposition and of his unfortunate fate.

C

CAEN, JOHN DE (Cadomo), was one of the clerks in the Chancery. He is mentioned on many different occasions from 1292 to 1302 in connection with the Great Seal, as holding it with other clerks of the Chancery during the occasional absences of the chancellor, and in October 1298 he was acting in the Exchequer as locum tenens for the chancellor. (Madox, i. 421.) He also acted as a receiver of petitions to the parliaments 1305 and 1307, 33-35 Edward I., and as late as 1310, 3 Edward II.

CÆSAR, THOMAS. In the city of Treviso, near Venice, the noble family of Adelmare had long resided, when a member of it, named Peter Maria Adelmare, who was eminent as a civilian, married a daughter of the house of Cesarini, and had three sons, the second of whom was christened, after his mother, Cæsar. This Cæsar Adelmare pursued his studies at Padua, and, having taken the degree of doctor in medicine, came to England to practise in 1550. Here he obtained such repute that he was employed by Queen Mary, and on one occasion received the enormous fee of 100*l.* for his attendance. (Burton's Gresham, ii. 464.) Queen Elizabeth also placed him at the head of her medical department, and granted to him some beneficial leases under the crown. He fixed his residence in the close of the priory of Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, where he died in 1569. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Martin Perin, or Perient, treasurer in Ireland, he left eight children, two of whom obtained judicial appointments—Julius Cæsar, the eldest son, after mentioned; and Thomas, the third son, the subject of this sketch.

Thomas Cæsar was born in 1561, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School in London. In October 1580 he was entered of the Inner Temple, where he was not called to the bench until he was appointed a baron of the Exchequer, and never held the post of reader to the society. He seems to have used his father's name during the early part of his life, and to have afterwards partially adopted that of Cæsar, at first with an alias, and subsequently alone. His first wife, whose mother's name was Chapman, describes herself in her will, 'Susan, wife of Thomas Dalmare, alias Cæsar.' In this he no doubt followed the example of his brother, Sir Julius, who was then holding a prominent judicial situation, and was aiming at higher posts, for which he perhaps imagined his Italian surname might be deemed a disqualification.

Thomas's name does not appear in any of the Reports, and no account is given of his professional career, nor of any office which he held (except that of steward of St. Catherine's Hospital, of which his brother was master), before his appointment as a baron on May 26, 1610. On his receiving it, the Inner Temple ordered that he should not be attended to Westminster by any but the officers of the Exchequer, for as much as none but such as were of the coif ought to be attended by the fellows of the house. He is there described as 'the puisne baron of the Exchequer (commonly called the baron cursitor).' Another order was made on June 10, that, though he be not read, but fined for not reading, he should have his place at the bench notwithstanding a previous act, 'That none who should thenceforth be called to the bench that had not read should take place of any reader, or have a voice in parliament.' (Dugdale's Orig. 149.) It thus manifest that the office of baron which he held was not of the same degree of dignity as the other barons; and that had no judicial function is apparent from the absence of his name from all the Reports of the period.

But whatever was his position, he did not retain it quite two months, during which interval he was knighted. He died on July 18, 1610, and was buried in the church of Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

His first wife died in 1590, leaving three children, who did not live to grow up. He married, secondly, Anne, the daughter of George Lynn, of Southwilk, Northampton, Esq., and widow of Nicholas Beaton, Esq. But she dying early, without children, he took for his third wife Susan, daughter and co-heir of Sir William Ryther, knight, an opulent alderman of London, and had by her three sons and five daughters. (Lodge's Cæsars, 39-41.)

CÆSAR, JULIUS, was the eldest son of Caesar Adelmare, physician to Queens Mary and Elizabeth, by his wife Margaret Perin, or Perient. He was born at Tottenham in Middlesex in 1557, and enjoyed royal patronage from his infancy. He received the names of Julius Caesar, the latter of which he seems very early to have substituted for that of his ancestors, though even so late as 1608 he was designated by both names with an alias in formal documents.

Having lost his father when he was twelve years old, and his mother having married again, he was sent to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1575, and that of M.A. in 1578. In 1580 he was admitted a member of the Inner Temple, and proceeding to Paris, he took the degree there of doctor in both laws in 1581, after which he returned to Oxford, and proceeded to the same degree in that university in 1583. (Wood's Fasti, i. 224.) In 1582 he married Dorcas, daughter of Sir Richard Martin, an alderman of London, afterwards master of the Mint, and widow of Richard Lusher. During the previous year he received two public appointments, and in 1583 he became commissary of Essex, Herts, and Middlesex, from which he was promoted in 1584 to be judge of the Admiralty Court. Although possessed of so important a post at the early age of 27, he was not contented, but made frequent applications for grants and promotion, in which he was only so far at that time successful that in October 1588 he was admitted one of the masters in Chancery, an office which was then frequently filled by doctors of the civil law. He still continued his importunities, alleging that he had spent 4000*l.* above his gains in the execution of his office of judge of the Admiralty, and in relieving the poor suitors of his court. This statement it would be scarcely possible to credit, if his unlimited charity were not evidenced by what Isaac Walton says of him, that when grown old

'he was kept alive beyond nature's course by the prayers of those many poor he daily relieved.'

At last his perseverance procured for him the appointment of a master extraordinary of the Court of Requests in 1591, but it was not till August 1595 that he was admitted one of the ordinary masters of that court, which gave him immediate access to the queen. During this time it is amusing to see how he paid his court to the influential ministers and favourites, and how ingeniously he contrived to remind them of his claims in his letters conveying new years' gifts, some curious specimens of which are preserved among the Lansdowne MSS. In 1593 he was elected treasurer of the Inner Temple, and on December 8 in the same year he was appointed governor of the mine and battery works throughout England and Wales. Having already procured (by a bribe of 500*l.* to Archibald Douglas, the Scottish ambassador, to use his influence with the queen) the reversion of the mastership of St. Catherine's, he succeeded to it on June 17, 1596.

His wife dying in June 1595, he entered in the following year into a second matrimonial connection with Alice, daughter of Christopher Green, and widow of John Dent, a rich merchant of London. In September 1598 her majesty inflicted on him the honour of a visit to his house at Mitcham, the expense of which, with the customary offering, amounted to 700*l.* sterling. No other incident occurred to him in Elizabeth's reign, except that he obtained a verdict of 200*l.* against a man for asserting that he had pronounced a corrupt sentence against him in the Admiralty. (Croke, Eliz. 305.)

King James knighted him on May 20, 1603, and in the same year reappointed him master of the Court of Requests and master of St. Catherine's. He was further favoured with grants of the manor of Linwood in Lincolnshire, and of the Forest of High Peak in Derbyshire, for life. On April 11, 1606, the important office of chancellor and under treasurer of the Exchequer was conferred upon him, and in the next year he was sworn of the privy council. During the eight years in which he performed the onerous duties of his place his main difficulty seems to have been the supplying means to meet the idle profuseness of his master. He obtained from the king, in January 1611, a reversionary grant of the mastership of the Rolls; but he did not come into possession for nearly four years, when he was sworn in on September 13, 1614. In James's reign he sat in parliament for Westminster in 1604, for Middlesex in 1614, and for Malden in 1621.

Having lost his second wife, he married

Anne, the daughter of Henry Wodehouse, of Waxham in Norfolk, by Anne, daughter of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, and widow of William Hungate, of East Brudenham in the same county.

Sir Julius continued master of the Rolls till his death, a period of more than twenty-one years; and during the interval between the disgrace of Lord Chancellor Bacon and the delivery of the Seal to Lord Keeper Williams—viz., between May 21 and July 10, 1621—he had a commission to hear causes in Chancery. To Bacon, with whom he was connected by marriage, he continued a kind friend, assisting him by his bounty, affording him an asylum in his misfortunes, and receiving his last breath in his arms. He had not any great reputation as a judge, and it is said that counsel would occasionally pass 'a slye jeste' upon him.

He died on April 18, 1636, at the age of seventy-nine, and was buried at Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, where his father lay. Over his remains was placed a monument with an inscription written by himself, in the form of a deed with a pendent seal, the connecting silk of which is broken.

He had no issue by his last wife, but his other two brought him eight children. Of the five by his first wife only one survived him—viz., the under-mentioned Charles. His second wife produced to him three sons—John, who was knighted at the age of ten; Thomas, who became a doctor in divinity; and Robert, who obtained the place of one of the six clerks in Chancery. (Lodge's Cæsars.)

CÆSAR, CHARLES, the eldest surviving son of the above Sir Julius, was born on January 27, 1580. Destined to pursue the profession by which his father had risen, he was sent to All Souls' College, Oxford, and was admitted to the degree of doctor of laws on December 7, 1612. (Wood's Fasti, i. 348.) Commencing practice in the ecclesiastical courts, he received the order of knighthood on October 6 in the following year, and was gradually promoted, first to the office of the master of the faculties, and then to that of judge of the audience. (State Trials, ii. 1452.) On May 19, 1615, he was made a master in Chancery, no doubt by the interest of his father, who had been sworn in as a judge of that court in the preceding year; and on the death of Sir Dudley Digges, in 1639, he was appointed master of the Rolls, on March 30; paying however, according to a memorandum made by his son, for that 'high and profitable place' no less than 15,000*l.* 'broad pieces of gold,' with a loan of 2000*l.* more when the king went to meet his rebellious Scottish army. It is difficult to regret that he did not live long enough to profit by this iniquitous traffic of the judicial seat, as disgraceful to one party as the other. In November 1642 the smallpox seized the family, and proved fatal to one of his daughters on the 2nd of that month, to himself on the 6th of December, and to his eldest son five days after. They were buried at Bennington in Herts, where his estate was situate; and his monument there bears an inscription commemorative of his personal worth and his judicial integrity. It records besides that he had two wives—the first, Anne, daughter of Sir Peter Vanlore, knight, an eminent London merchant; and the second, Jane, daughter of Sir Edward Barkham, knight, lord mayor of London—and that he had six children by the first wife, and nine by the second, but of these fifteen no male descendant now preserves the name of the family. (Lodge's Cæsars.)

CAIRNS, HUGH M'CALMONT (LORD CAIRNS), within three years passed through three legal offices—attorney-general, lord justice of appeal, and lord chancellor—rising from a practising barrister to the highest seat in the law, from a simple member of the House of Commons to the speakership of the House of Lords, and, after less than ten months' enjoyment of that honourable office, has been entrusted with the still more responsible position of the leadership of the conservative party in the house of which he had been so short a time a member. Such a rapid advance as this has never been before witnessed, such proof of confidence is almost unparalleled.

He was born in 1819, and is the son of William Cairns, Esq., of Culha in the county of Down. At Trinity College, Dublin, where he was educated, besides other honours, he took the first place in classics. Called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn on January 26, 1844, he soon acquired so prominent a station in the Court of Chancery that he was made a queen's counsel in 1856, when he still maintained it with more than the usual success. Before this date he had commenced his parliamentary career, having been elected member for Belfast in 1852, and in every other parliament till he was raised to the bench. His eloquence and ability in that arena are the best proofs of the statesmanship which is generally attributed to him.

His official life began with the appointment, on February 26, 1858, of solicitor-general, which he held till the change of ministry on June 18, 1859, a little less than sixteen months. Seven years afterwards, on the conservative party resuming power, he was made attorney-general on July 6, 1866, and in less than four months was removed into the important office of lord justice of appeal in Chancery on October 29. On the following February he was called up to the House of Peers by the title of Lord Cairns of Garmoyle the county of Antrim; and on the 29th of the same month in 1868 he received the Great Seal as lord chancellor. This he retained only till December 9 in the same year, when the liberal party gained the ascendancy, but was then immediately selected as the leader of the opposition in the House of Lords, with which office he has been again entrusted in the present session.

In 1867 his alma mater, the University of Dublin, elected him their chancellor.

He married Mary Harriet, daughter of John McNeile, Esq., of Parkmount in the county of Antrim.

CALETO, JOHN DE, or DE CAUX. A fine was acknowledged before John, abbot of Peterborough, in 1254, 39 Henry III., and in that and the following year his name appears at the head of the justices itinerant into several counties. From April till August 1258 also payments were made for assizes to be held before him. In October, 44 Henry III., he was constituted treasurer, and continued so till his death on March 1, 1262. This abbot was John de Caletto, or de Caux, who was elected to that dignity in 1249, being then prior of St. Swithin's at Winchester. He was a relative of Queen Eleanor. (Bruce's Intro. to Chron. Petobury. x.) Browne Willis describes him as a pious and wise man.

CALOWE, WILLIAM, probably descended from a family seated at Holbeach in Lincolnshire in the reign of Richard II., was so short a time a judge that little is known about him. In the Year Books he is mentioned under the name of Collow in 1475, and as having been called serjeant from the Middle Temple in Trinity Term 18 Edward IV. In 2 Richard III., 1484, he was joined in the commission of assize for the county of Dorset, and on January 31, 1487, 2 Henry VII., he was raised to the judicial seat in the Common Pleas. The only fine levied before him is in the following Trinity Term, and from the absence of all notice of him from that time, it would seem that he then resigned or died.

CAMBHOU, WALTER DE, is mentioned in 14 Edward I. as a keeper of the tallies of the Exchequer. He was appointed a justice itinerant in Tindale in 21 Edward I. (Rot. Parl. i. 122), being at that time custos of the castle of Baumburgh; but he does not appear to have acted afterwards. In that year he and Isabella his wife levied a fine of considerable property in Colwell in Northumberland, for which county he was elected a member of parliament in 24 Edward I., and died in the same year. (Parl. Write, i. 39; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 94.)

CAMDEN, EARL. See C. PRATT.

CAMPBELL, JOHN (LORD CAMPBELL), born Sept. 5, 1781, at Springfield, near Cupar, in Fifeshire, was the younger son of Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar, and of Magdelene, daughter of John Haliburton, Esq., of Fodderance. He spent eight of his early years, from ten to eighteen, at the University of St. Andrews, studying for the ministry, and took the degree of A.M. there. Relinquishing, however, his clerical prospects, and aiming at legal distinction, he came to London, and in November 1800 entered the society of Lincoln's Inn, and placed himself under the guidance of Mr. Tidd. With that eminent special pleader he stayed three years, and to the tuition he received during that time he chiefly ascribed his success at the bar. He gratefully records the generosity of his instructor, who, he relates, on finding that it would not be convenient to him to pay a second fee of one hundred guineas, not only refused to take it, but insisted on returning him the first. (Lord C.'s Chanc. v. 484.) Before this, finding that the small allowance which his father could make him was inadequate for his support in the metropolis, he engaged himself for many years as a reporter to the 'Morning Chronicle,' then under the conduct of Mr. Perry, a countryman of his. To this he added occasionally a dramatic criticism, in which after some time he became an adept, though, from the strictness of his Presbyterian education, and consequent inexperience, this must at first have been a difficult task, and probably produced some strictures which in after-years he would hesitate to indorse. The 'Morning Chronicle' was the organ of the whigs, to which party he attached himself at the outset of his career, and it is greatly to his credit that during the whole of his life, whether it was in opposition or in power, he never deserted it. His occupation and his politics introduced him into various society, and among his relaxations were the enjoyments of the Cider Cellar in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden. There he had the advantage of associating with many men of celebrity, among whom was the learned and eccentric Professor Porson, who surprised him by reciting the whole of Anstey's 'Pleader's Guide' from memory. During the period of his novitiate, when Bonaparte threatened to invade the kingdom, he joined the 'Bloomsbury and Inns of Court Association' (Lord C.'s Ch. Just. ii. 604), a corps chiefly composed of members of the legal profession, and he looked back in after-years with so much pride to his position in the ranks that he left the musket he bore as an heirloom to his descendants.

Of Lord Kenyon, who was then chief justice, he relates that at the Nisi Prius sittings at Guildhall the chief used to hand the record to the students, who sat in a box close to him, and point out to them the important issues to be tried. During the latter part of Mr. Campbell's pupilage the chief justice was Lord Ellenborough, with whose 'very dignified, impressive, and awe-inspiring deportment,' especially at the trial of Colonel Despard in 1803 for high treason, he was much struck, and whose 'rough treatment' of him in his future career he regrettingly remembers. (Ch. Just. ii. 329, iii. 94, 177.)

He was called to the bar in Michaelmas Term 1806, and published in 1808 two volumes of 'Reports of Cases Argued and Tried at Nisi Prius, in the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, in the Home Circuit, from Michaelmas Term 1807 to the sittings before Easter 1808,' which he afterwards continued in two additional volumes extending to the year 1816. This publication greatly aided his progress at the bar. Dr. Watt mentions also another publication under Mr. Campbell's name in 1808, 'A Letter to a Member of Parliament on the Articles of a Charge against Marquis Wellesley, which have been laid before the House of Commons,' probably an ephemeral pamphlet which died with the day. It would seem from the title of his reports that he at first attended the Home Circuit, though afterwards, about 1810, he joined the Oxford Circuit, on which, as well as in Westminster Hall, his success was so great that for three years before he obtained a silk gown he was the leader of it. (Chanc. iii. 275.)

In 1821 he married Mary Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of Mr. Scarlett, then one of the most eminent advocates at the bar, who afterwards became lord chief baron of the Exchequer, and was created Lord Abinger. To the influence of his father-in-law, who was appointed attorney-general in 1827, he probably owed his promotion to the post of king's counsel in the same year, Lord Lyndhurst being chancellor.

In the next year he was named the chairman of a commission on the Registration of Deeds, and in 1830 he was placed at the head of the Real Property Commission. (Ch. Just. iii. 324.) In that year he began his senatorial career as member for Stafford, and soon showed himself active and useful in introducing and defending several important measures, among which were the Bill for the Registration of Deeds, and the Anatomy Bill. A friend to parliamentary reform, he gloried in having materially furthered the measure, attributing, not unnaturally, the one vote by which the second reading of Lord John Russell's first bill was carried to his leaving his circuit, 'at a considerable professional sacrifice,' and coming up to London to be present at the division. His speech on the second bill he afterwards published. (Speeches, 49.)

On November 26, 1832, he was rewarded with the solicitor-generalship, and consequent knighthood. In the new parliament then called he was elected member for Dudley, but only retained his seat till 1834, when, on his being made attorney-general, the fickle town would not re-elect him. For nearly a whole session he remained without a seat; but in the following June he succeeded with a more distinguished constituency, being elected member for Edinburgh in the place of Francis Jeffrey, made a lord of session. This city he continued to represent while he remained a commoner. His tenure of office was interrupted after little more than nine months by his party being turned out of the ministry in December 1834, but only to be restored with more confirmed power in April 1835, when Sir John was reinstated in his place.

Before his first period of office as attorney-general expired, Sir John Leach, the master of the Rolls, died. Though according to the usual practice he might have claimed the vacant place, he allowed himself to be passed over in favour of the solicitor-general, Sir Charles Christopher Pepys, who was appointed. On his resuming the office of attorney-general the Great Seal was put into commission, of which the new master of the Rolls was the head, and after so remaining about nine months, Sir Charles was constituted lord chancellor. Thus for a second time the office of master of the Rolls was vacant, and for a second time Sir John Campbell was passed over, Lord Langdale receiving the appointment. The avowed reason for thus overlooking his claims was that he was wholly inexperienced as an equity lawyer: but the real ground was supposed to be that he was so active and serviceable to the ministry in the House of Commons that he could not be spared without danger to its existence. Indignant at first with this usage, he resigned, but a peerage being given to his wife, with the title of Baroness Stratheden, he was appeased and resumed his post.

The whig party retained their ascendancy for the next four years, and no vacancy occurred on the bench which Sir John Campbell was desirous to fill. During the whole period of his parliamentary career he devoted himself, both at this time and after his accession to the peerage, to the improvement of the laws, and statutes owe their existence to his introduction. On the ministry beginning to totter in 1841, they were so determined before their exclusion to reward their attorney-general for his political and professional exertions, that they ventured the bold and questionable step of removing their ancient colleague, Lord Plunket, from the chancellorship of Ireland, for purpose of raising Sir John to that dignity and decking him with a peerage. With reluctance Lord Plunkett submitted; and Sir John, on June 22, 1841, became Lord Campbell of St. Andrews and lord chancellor of Ireland. After sitting only one or two days in the Irish court he made a speech to the bar, in which he plainly intimates his expectation of soon being 'reduced to a private station.' (Speeches, 518.) The ministry succumbed in August, and Lord Campbell, retiring with them, finished his short tenure of office; but though entitled to a pension of 4000*l.*, the job was so gross and notorious that the ministry did not venture to offer nor he to claim it.

During the nine years that followed his retirement he applied himself to his senatorial duties, taking a leading part in the Lords' debates, and assisting greatly in the appellate jurisdiction of the house. But his active habits required further occupation, and in 1842 he found it by publishing his 'Speeches at the Bar and in the House of Commons.' But his ambition was not satisfied with this slight offering; aiming at literary fame, he next chose a subject from the execution of which he hoped to obtain it. This was 'The Lives of the Lord Chancellors,' the first three volumes of which he published at the close of 1845, continuing them in 1846 and 1847, till he had filled seven volumes, concluding with the Life of Lord Eldon. This work acquired an immediate popularity, and, though condemned by some critics for its looseness and occasional incorrectness, it should be remembered that the mere writing of seven volumes, each consisting of between six and seven hundred closely printed pages, in the course of little more than two years, was of itself an extraordinary effort of labour, and that it would be unreasonable to expect any strict investigation of records or authorities, or more than a compilation from previous writers. In 1849 he published two volumes of 'The Lives of the Chief Justices,' to which, in 1857, he added a third gossiping volume, including those of Lords Kenyon, Ellenborough, and Tenterden, in which a tendency to disparage his noble predecessors is too apparent. The only other literary production which he printed was 'Shakespeare's Legal Acquirements,' being an attempt to prove that the great dramatist spent his youth in an attorney's office. This was a mere enlargement of the idea that had been previously suggested by Malone, Chalmers, W. S. Landor, J. P. Collier, and, so lately as in 1838, by Charles Armitage Brown.

When his party came again into power in 1846, Lord John Russell, the prime minister, admitted him into the cabinet, and gave him the appointment of chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This office he filled till March 6, 1850, when, Lord Denman having retired from ill health and advanced age, Lord Campbell was raised to the chief justiceship of the Queen's Bench, although only two years younger than his predecessor. On assuming it he of course relinquished his seat in the cabinet council, as he had expressed his strong disapproval of the union of the two positions by Lord Mansfield in 1757, and Lord Ellenborough in 1806. (Ch. Just. ii. 451, iii. 185.)

Lord Campbell was specially fitted for the office to which he was thus appointed. During the nine years that he filled it he is acknowledged to have performed its important duties in a most exemplary manner, preserving the dignity of the place, and administering the law with apparent ease and strict impartiality. When Lord Palmerston assumed the premiership for a second time in 1859, he offered Lord Campbell the chancellorship; and it surprised the world that he should be tempted to leave a court where he was so much at home, for one in the practice of which he could not be expected to be so conversant, especially when its tenure was so uncertain. But ambition decided, and he received the Great Seal on June 18.

He presided over the Court of Chancery for two years, and the practisers in it were astonished at the readiness with which he mastered the forms of the court, and the discrimination he showed in the judgments he pronounced. In the midst of his duties, in the full tide of his triumph, he was suddenly cut off. On Saturday, June 23, 1861, he had attended a cabinet council, and, after having entertained a party of friends at his house at Knightsbridge, had retired to his chamber in his accustomed health and spirits, and applied himself to preparing a judgment which he had promised on Monday. On Sunday morning he was found dead in his chair with the blood oozing from his mouth, caused by the bursting of one of the great arteries near his heart.

Thus awfully terminated the life of one who, during its whole continuance, never relaxed from his labours, who never was satisfied unless he was doing something, and was indefatigable in all his pursuits. Commencing as a poor and dependent man, he worked his way by industry and perseverance, not only to wealth, but to the highest honours of his profession. In the temporary cessation of his legal life, his love of employment led him to aspire to the acquisition of a literary name. It is not, however, probable that his fame as a lawyer, a legislator, or a judge, will be superseded by his repute as an author. The transient popularity of his works has already in a great measure subsided, for, though they must ever be regarded as an extraordinary effort of laborious industry, and as composed in a pleasant and easy, though somewhat egotistic, style, they are not looked upon as authority by those who are best versed in the history of the various times of which they treat. It has been considered a material deduction from the merits of his works that from the beginning to the end of them he takes every opportunity of referring to the incidents of his own life, and the advice and opinions he gave in his professional capacity. It will be seen that this volunteer information has been serviceable in the preparation of the present sketch.

In the year before his own death he lost his wife, Lady Stratheden, to whose title their eldest son, William Frederick, succeeded, thus taking a place in the peerage which, but for his father's position as chancellor, would have given him precedence in the House of Lords. Lord Campbell left two other sons and four daughters.

CAMVILLE, GERARD DE (de Cana Villa), the ancestor of whose family came into England with William the Conqueror, was the eldest son of Richard de Camville, the founder of Combe Abbey in Warwickshire; and by his marriage with Nichola, the eldest of the three daughters of Richard de Haya, and the widow of William Fitz-Erneis, had in her right the office of constable of the castle of Lincoln. A charter exists among the archives of the duchy of Lancaster (Archæologia, xxvii. 112) which is curious as having been granted by Richard I. between the demise of his father and his own coronation, and as showing that he did not then assume the style and title of 'King,' but only called himself 'Dominus Angliæ.' It confirms to Gerard de Camville and his wife Nichola all the right and heritage of Nichola in England and Normandy, together with the custody and constableness of Lincoln Castle. He was also made sheriff of the county of Lincoln.

On King Richard's departure to the Holy Land, Gerard de Camville having joined the party of Prince John, William de Longchamp, the chief justiciary, laid siege to Lincoln Castle, which Nichola resolutely defended (Madox, i. 22), and compelled Longchamp to withdraw his forces. On the king's return Gerard was not only deprived of the sheriffalty and constableness, but also of his own estate, and was reduced to the necessity of purchasing restitution of the latter, with the king's favour, by a fine of two thousand marks. On the accession of King John he recovered the sheriffalty, which he retained till the end of the seventh year of that reign, and received other proofs of the king's regard. When the kingdom was placed under interdict in 9 John, the king committed to him and to William de Cornhill all the lands and goods of the clergy in the diocese of Lincoln who refused to perform divine service. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 3.) He received the acknowledgment of fines at Cambridge in 10 and 11 John, 1208-9, and he and his associates are there specially called 'justiciarii itinerantes.'

He died in 16 John. (Ibid. 8, 10.) His wife, Nichola, survived him for some years, during which she held the sheriffalty of Lincolnshire, and was constituted governess of the castles of Frampton and Lincoln, the latter of which she gallantly defended against the confederated barons. She died about 15 Henry III., 1230-1.

CAMVILLE, THOMAS DE, was a nephew of the above Gerard de Camville, being the third son of his brother William by Alberta, the daughter and heir of Geoffrey Marnion. He held Westerham, in Kent, of the honor of Bologne, in 2 and 3 John, and paid fifteen marks for three knights' fees in that county, and two marks for one knight's fee in Essex. (Rot. Cancell. 161, 220.) His adherence to the rebellious barons at the close of that king's reign was punished with the loss of all his lands, which, however, were restored on his obedience to the government of Henry III. In 11 Henry III. he had the grant of a market for his manor of Fobbing, in Essex. (Rot. Claus. i. 243, 325, ii. 194.) He is only once named as a justicier, on the authority of a fine being levied before him in May 1229, 13 Henry III. (Dugdale's Orig. 42.) His death occurred in 1235, leaving Agnes, his widow, and a son Robert, who married a daughter of Hamo de Crevequer. (Hasted, iii. 162.)

CANTEBRIG, THOMAS DE (Cambridge) described as of the clerical profession, was an officer in the Exchequer in 29 Edward and his appointment as a baron of the court took place on September 16, 1291, two months after the accession of Edward II. In the following year, on October 2, he had a patent authorising him to take the place of William de Carleton, the baron, when he was absent, and to return to him when he was present—a clear sign of the royal favour, as there were then many barons in the court senior to him in rank. He remained in this place till July 1292, when his removal doubtless arose from his services being more valuable in another character, as during the time he held the office, and for several years afterwards, he was engaged in negotiations tending to 1317, he was employed in negotiations. (New Fœdera, i. 175, 273, 333; Madox, ii. 58; ibid. ii. p. ii. 4, 630, 1408.)

CANTEBRIG, JOHN DE, could be the son of the above Thomas de Cantebri, as Masters, in his 'Corpus Christi' (p. 8), suggests, the latter being a man, though he was probably near to him. From 4 Edward II. he was continually employed in the judicial commissions in the county of Cambridge, and was returned member for it to several of the parliaments from the 14th to the 19th year. He is mentioned as a counsel in the Year Books of Edward II. and Edward III. In the third year of the latter he was one of the king's serjeants, and as such was joined in the commission into Northamptonshire, &c., and on October 22 in that year was made a knight, tanquam banerettus.

In 1331 he was seneschal of the abbot of St. Albans (Neucome, 223), and on January 18 he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, and, for some reason that does not appear, had a new patent on January 30, 1334. His death occurred in the next year.

His property was very extensive in the town and neighbourhood of Cambridge, and both during his life and by his will he devoted a great part of it to the guild of St. Mary, in that town (afterwards Corpus Christi College), of which he was a member, and twice alderman. (Dugdale's Orig. 45; Abb. Rot. Orig. 95; Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 630.)

CANTILUPE, SIMON DE. See S. NORMANNUS.

CANTILUPE, WILLIAM DE. The noble family of Cantilupe, so called from the original Champ de Loup, or Campus Lupi, followed the Norman Conqueror in his enterprise on the English monarchy. William, whose father was Walter de Cantilupe, in 2 John held the office of steward of the household. (Rot. Liberat. 1.) In the following year he was sheriff of Worcestershire, Warwick and Leicester, and Hereford; and over one or the other of these counties he presided for many years. From 5 to 10 John his name appears as one of the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged. (Hunter's Preface.) During the remainder of that reign he was in frequent personal attendance on his sovereign, accompanying him to Ireland, and firmly supporting him both under the interdict and in his wars with the barons. It would be endless to recite the grants which were made to him by King John, even up to the last month of his reign (Rot. Claus. i. 290); and on the accession of Henry III. his loyalty was still conspicuous, both he and his son assisting in the siege of Montsorel in Leicestershire, and in raising that of Lincoln. In 2 Henry III. he was again made sheriff of Warwickshire and Leicestershire, with the custody of the castle of Kenilworth, where he fixed his chief residence; and in the next year he was appointed one of the justices itinerant into Bedfordshire and the neighbouring counties. He still enjoyed the office of seneschal, which his son also held after his death; and during the remainder of his life received repeated marks of the royal favour, the only interruption to which arose from his joining the barons who were dissatisfied with the ministry of Hubert de Burgh. He built a hospital at Studley, at the gates of a priory there, the advowson of which belonged to him.

His death occurred in April 1238, leaving four sons—William, the next-mentioned Walter, John, and Nicholas.

CANTILUPE, WALTER DE (BISHOP OF WORCESTER), the second son of the above William de Cantilupe, was educated for the Church, and in 10 John was presented to the living of Eyton. This was followed in the course of the next eight years by no less than seven benefices, besides a prebend in the church of Lichfield,—Wurefield, Burton, Long Huchendon, Rammcham, Preston, Herdewic, and half of Stokes. (Rot. Pat. 87, 106, &c.; Rot. Chart. 192.)

In 16 Henry III., 1231, he was one of the seven justices itinerant named for several counties, being the only occasion on which he appears to have acted in that capacity. In August 1236 he was elected to the bishopric of Worcester, and in his episcopal character he boldly resisted the papal exactions, influenced probably by the remembrance of his own pluralities; at the same time, however, exhibiting so much zeal 'that, to advance the heroic designs of Christian princes in the Holy Land, he went himself thither, accompanied by William Longspee, Earl of Salisbury.'

Towards the close of his life he sided with Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, for which he was excommunicated by the pope's legate; but he lived long enough to repent of his disloyalty, and to obtain absolution. He died at his manor of Blockley on February 12, 1265. His character, according to the historian of his nephew, St. Thomas de Cantilupe, was that of 'a person of mind and courage equal to his birth.' He founded the nunnery of White Ladies, and was otherwise munificent to his see. (Life and Gests of S. Thomas de Cantilupe, by R. S. S. I. Gant, 1674.)

CANTILUPE, THOMAS DE (BISHOP OF HEREFORD), was the grandson of the above William de Cantilupe, whose heir of the same name was his father; his mother being Milicent, the daughter of Hugh de Gournay, and the widow of Almeric, Earl of Evreux in Normandy, and of Gloucester in England. He was born about the beginning of the reign of King Henry III., at his father's manor of Hameldone in Lincolnshire. Under the advice of his uncle, Walter, Bishop of Worcester, he was brought up with a view to the clerical profession, and studied at Oxford under Robert Kilwarby, who became Archbishop of Canterbury and a cardinal. He afterwards removed to Paris, and applied himself to the study of philosophy, in the College of Sorbonne, whence he proceeded to Orleans to read the civil law with an eminent professor there. Returning to Oxford, he applied himself to the canon law, and proceeded doctor. The nobility of his blood, as well as the eminence of his learning, pointed him out, in 1262, as worthy to fill the office of chancellor of the university, in performing the duties of which in the suppression of a riot between the southern and northern scholars, he is said to have greatly exerted himself, to the injury both of his person and habiliments.

The barons having assumed the ascendancy, and the king being completely under their dictation, he was selected by them to fill the office of chancellor on February 21, 1265. Their power, however, being terminated by the battle of Evesham, and the death of De Montfort in the following August, his removal was the natural consequence.

Having retired to Oxford, he completed a course of divinity by taking the degree of doctor, his ancient friend and master, Robert Kilwarby, then Archbishop of Canterbury, honouring his act with his presence.

His connection with the insurgent barons did not blind King Henry to his merits, and accordingly, in 1266, he was appointed archdeacon of Stafford, to which were added 'many and fatt benefices,' as he held at the same time canonries in York, Lichfield, London, and Hereford. Neither was he in less favour with Edward I., being elected Bishop of Hereford on June 20, 1275.

The remainder of his life was devoted to the sacred duties of his office, on the performance of which his biographer is very eloquent, not forgetting 'his courage in defence of ecclesiastical liberties,' which engaged him in many controversies, and eventually led to his death. Archbishop Peckham having laid some injunctions on the sees within his jurisdiction which were prejudicial to their liberties, and considered to be beyond the verge of his power, our bishop volunteered a journey to Rome to obtain redress. There he was received with great distinction, and having prosecuted his suit to a successful issue, he commenced his journey homeward; but being seized with sickness, he could not proceed further than Monte Fiascone, where he died on August 25, 1282, in the sixty-third year of his age. His flesh was buried at the place of his death, and his bones were removed to England and interred in his cathedral. The miracles which were performed on both these events, and on other occasions during his life, and at his shrine, are stated to extend to the number of 425. The fame of them was so great that he was canonised about thirty-two years afterwards by Pope John XXII., on April 17, 1320, being the last Englishman so honoured.

The Bishops of Hereford in his honour assumed his family coat as the arms of their see—viz., Gules, three leopards' heads inverted, each with a flower de luce in his mouth, Or. (Life and Gests of S. Thomas Cantilupe.)

CARILEFO, WILLIAM DE (BISHOP OF DURHAM), a native of Bayeux, was so named from having been a monk of St. Carilefo, from which he was advanced to be abbot of St. Vincentius: both being monasteries in the province of Maine: the former being a cell at Covenham in Lincolnshire, and the latter one at Abergevenny in Montgomeryshire.

He was elected Bishop of Durham on November 10, 1080, in the place of Walcherus who was slain about six months before. The church of Durham having been greatly neglected, the present edifice was commenced by him, and affords sufficient proof of the munificent expenditure, not only of this bishop, but of his successor, Ranulph Flambard, in its structure.

William of Malmesbury (Gesta Regum, 486, &c.), who describes him as a man of a ready tongue, and very powerful in his time, says that he was appointed by William Rufus to administer the public affairs in 1088, and Roger de Wendover (ii. 32, 34) distinctly mentions that he was made 'justiciarius.' His tenure of that office, however, must have been very short, for Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, is described as holding it at the previous Christmas, and Carilefo in the spring had joined that prelate in the confederacy to depose King William and raise his brother Robert to the throne.

The insurrection being quelled by the defeat of Odo, the king proceeded to Durham to chastise the bishop, who obliged to surrender and to quit the dom. After a banishment of two or three years he was permitted to return, and endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the king by taking part against Archbishop Anselm. He was, however, soon summoned to the court to meet the charges made against himself. Obedient to obey, he reached the court of King Henry with difficulty, and, surviving only a few days, died there on January 2, 1101. His remains were removed to Durham, where they were deposited in his cathedral.

He is described as endowed with the highest mental gifts, with wit, eloquence, and subtlety, and as being distinguished by none in the conduct of business, unbridled ambition, and want of integrity. (Drydale's Monast. Hist. i. 704. Godwin, 731; Angl. Sac. i. 704.)

CARLETON, WILLIAM DE, died in 1144 Edward I. with Henry de Lacy, and was in the custody of the vacant abbey of inserted by Dugdale in his list of barons of the Exchequer in the same year, but he was only at that time one of the justices of the Jews. He is introduced in that character by Madox (i. 236) in the next and three following years, till which time the Jews were in the kingdom.* The justices of the Jews seem always to have sat with the barons of the Exchequer; but their duties of course terminated after the expulsion of that people. William de Carleton and Peter de Leicester, who then held the office, were thereupon appointed regular barons, and the former continued to act from that time till the end of the reign. In 25 Edward I. he was employed by the king with two others to collect a sum of ten thousand pounds from the merchants at Antwerp. (Rot. Parl. i. 169, 194.)

Dugdale says that he was constituted chief baron on July 26, 1303, 31 Edward I.; but the liberate, on the authority of which this statement is made, contains no such designation. (Madox, ii. 62.) The title of chief baron indeed was not adopted till some years afterwards; but William de Carleton was at that time the senior baron, and was at the head of those reappointed on the accession of Edward II., 1307. On October 24, 1308, he had special licence from the king, on account of his long service, to retire to his own house as often and as long as his health or private affairs should require, and to attend at the Exchequer in his place when he should think fit (Ibid. ii. 57), and he does not appear among the justices who were summoned to parliament beyond the following March.

CARR, WILLIAM, in his admission to Gray's Inn in December 1655, is described of Newington, Middlesex. He was called to the bar in May 1663, and succeeded Sir Richard May as cursor baron between 1685 and 1688, retaining his office at the Revolution. He died in 1680. (Luttrell, i. 557.)

CARTER, LAWRENCE, was born at Leicester about 1672, of a family which originally came from Hitchin in Hertfordshire. His father, who bore the same names, having projected the scheme of supplying Leicester with water, was chosen the representative of the borough in several parliaments of William III., of whom he was a firm supporter. His mother was Mary, the daughter of Thomas Wadland, Esq., of the Newwerke at Leicester, an eminent solicitor, in whose office her husband had been articled. Their son, after being called to the bar by Lincoln's Inn, was elected recorder of his native town on September 1, 1747, and entering the House of Commons as its representative in the next year, sat there till the death of William III. In 1710, and in the two following parliaments of 1714 and 1715, he was returned for Beeralston, and at the dissolution of the latter in 1722 he was again elected for Leicester; but history has preserved no record of his senatorial eloquence. His professional career was distinguished by his being appointed in 1717 solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales, afterwards George II., by receiving in 1724 the degree of the coif, and by being made soon after one of the king's serjeants, when he was knighted.

On September 7, 1726, he succeeded Mr. Baron Price as a baron of the Exchequer, retaining his recordership for the next three years. He continued on the bench till his death on March 14, 1745, with the reputation of an upright judge. He was buried in the church of St. Mary de Castro, Leicester, where his monument is still to be seen. (Nichol's Leicester, i. 318.)

CARUS, THOMAS, was of a Lancashire family, and his descendants in 1684 were seated at Horton in that county. His legal school was the Middle Temple, where he became reader in Lent 1556. At the end of Mary's reign he was summoned to take the coif, which he received soon after the accession of Elizabeth, on April 19, 1559. From that time till Trinity 1565 his name occurs in Dyer's and Plowden's Reports. The date of his elevation as a judge of the Queen's Bench is not given, but from the latter author (Plowden, 376) it may be collected that he succeeded Mr. Justice Corbet, who sat in the court as late as Trinity Term 1566. Carus remained there till his death, the date of which has not been discovered; but no successor seems to have been appointed for him till May, 14 Elizabeth, 1572, although his name does not appear in the Reports after Easter in the twelfth year.

He married Catherine, daughter of Sir Thomas Preston of Furness Abbey, a lineal descendant of John de Preston, a judge of the Common Pleas in the reigns of Henry V. and VI.

CARY, JOHN, of an ancient and opulent family, seated in Devonshire, was the son of Sir John Cary, knight, bailiff of the forest of Selwood, and Jane, daughter of Sir Guy de Brien. He was appointed a captain of the Devonshire coast, and a commissioner of array in the same county, soon after his father's death in 1371. (New Fadera, iii. 976, 1046.)

His name does not occur in the Year Books, and there is no proof of his ever having acted as an advocate. According to the practice of that period, neither the chief nor the puisne barons of the Exchequer were necessarily selected from the serjeants or pleaders, nor indeed otherwise connected with the law than as officers of that particular department. It is true that he was called by the king's writ to take upon himself the degree of a serjeant-at-law in 6

Richard II.; but it is equally true that he disobeyed the summons (Manning, 201), and it may not be unreasonably supposed that he refused the honour because he was not a regular pleader in the courts.

Whatever was his previous position, he was raised to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer on November 5, 1386, 10 Richard II.; but it turned out an unfortunate advancement for him. Within a fortnight after his appointment the parliament passed an ordinance placing the government of the kingdom under eleven commissioners, and in effect depriving, not only the king's favourites, but the king himself, of all power in the state. In the efforts made to regain the ascendancy, the plan of obtaining the declaration of the judges that the ordinance was illegal was adopted. The chief baron was one of those who concurred in that declaration, being present with the others on the discussion at Shrewsbury. He, therefore, was included in the impeachment, and was condemned to death with his colleagues, but, like them, had his sentence commuted to banishment. The place of his exile was the city of Waterford and a circle of two miles round it; and for his support he had an allowance of 20*l.* per annum. As his name was not among those of his banished brethren who received permission to return to England in 20 Richard II., he probably died in Ireland, apparently in the previous year (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 196); but his property, including Torrington and Cockington in Devonshire, was restored in 3 Henry IV., 1402. (Rot. Parl. iii. 484.)

He married Margaret, daughter and heir of Robert Holloway, by whom he had two sons, Robert and John.

The latter was Bishop of Exeter for a short space, and died in 1419. The former was a renowned knight, many of whose descendants were honoured with various titles in the peerage, all of which have become extinct, except that of Viscount Falkland and Baron Hunsdon.

CASSY, JOHN, was probably born at the manor of Wightfield, in the parish of Deerhurst in Gloucestershire, which had been held by the family from the time of Edward III., and continued in their possession certainly till the end of Elizabeth's reign. His name occurs among the counsel in Richard Bellewe's Reports of the time of Richard II.; and he was raised to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer on May 12, 1389, in the twelfth year of that reign.

He received a new patent on the accession of Henry IV., but died very shortly afterwards. His tomb affords an example of the practice of placing the royal arms on the monuments of persons holding office under the crown, the three lions of England occurring on the brass over his remain. (Atkyns's Gloucestersh. 202; Genl. Mag. Feb. 1840, p. 141.)

CATESBY, JOHN, of a family settled in Northamptonshire, was apparently the uncle of William Catesby, esquire of the household of Edward IV. and Richard III., who was attainted for his adherence to the latter in the field of Bosworth. (Rot. Parl. vi. 276, 278.)

He was a member of the Inner Temple, or the 'Inner Inne,' as it was then called, and first appears among the advocates in the Year Books in Michaelmas 1458. He was honoured with the coif in 1463, and made king's serjeant on April 18, 1469. He was promoted to the bench of the Common Pleas on November 20, 1481, 21 Edward IV., and was knighted in the following year. The three subsequent changes in the sovereignty of the kingdom made no alteration in his judicial position, though Henry VII. delayed his reappointment for nearly a month after his brethren, probably on account of doubts arising from his relationship to William Catesby, so closely connected with the late king.

The excellence of his character may be inferred from his being the first-named executor in the will of Bishop Warwete (Chandler, 382), whom he survived but a short time, dying in 1486.

He married Elizabeth, the daughter of William Green, of Heese in Middlesex, Esq., and had by her seven sons and two daughters. He was buried in the abbey of St. James, in Northampton, and apparently was seated at his manor of Whiston in that county. (Test. Vetust. 277, 389.)

The conspirator in the gunpowder plot was one of his descendants.

CATLIN, ROBERT. There were two contemporary lawyers of the name of Catlin, Richard and Robert, of different branches of the same family. (Fuller, i. 568; Bilfield's Norfolk, i. 682.) Richard Catlin, Lincoln's Inn, was made a serjeant in 1553, and queen's serjeant in 1556. He was connected with the county of Norfolk, and was steward of Norwich, which he represented in parliament.

The branch from which Robert was descended was anciently the Raunds in Northamptonshire, born at Thrapstone in that county (den, 342), and was elected reader of the Middle Temple in 1547. In 1557 he was admitted to the degree of the coif on November 4, in the following year, and Mary appointed him one of the serjeants. He was raised to the office of judge of the Common Pleas on November 15, 1558, five weeks before the death of Mary, and received a new patent after the accession of Queen Elizabeth. Previous to the following term, he was removed from the office on the removal of the two Catholic chief was on January 22 promoted to the head of the Court of Queen's Bench, and knighted. He continued to preside as chief justice for the next sixteen years, with a high reputation for wisdom and gravity. That he was bold and independent also is apparent from a letter to Lord Burleigh, who had conveyed a message from the queen, complaining of his judgment in a suit in which the Earl of Leicester was a party, wherein he says he 'dares not alter the ancient forms of court.' (Cal. State Papers [1471], 416.)

However high the character of a judge may be, it is not to be expected that those against whom he decides will always join in his praises. In 1566 one Thomas Welsh of London was indicted in the Queen's Bench for saying, 'My Lord Chief Justice Catlin is incensed against me; I cannot have justice, nor can he hear; for that court now is made a court of conscience,' and was fined accordingly.

The chief justice died at his seat at Newenham in Bedfordshire in 1574. He married Ann, the daughter of John Boles, of Wallington in Hertfordshire, and relict of John Burgoyne. (Chauncy, 48.) By her he left an only daughter, Mary, who married first Sir John Spencer, and their son Robert was created Baron Spencer of Wormleighton in 1603, whose grandson was advanced to the earldom of Sunderland in 1643. The fifth earl succeeded under the act of parliament as Duke of Marlborough, his mother being second daughter of the great duke.

The earldom of Spencer of Althorp is derived from the same stock, the first earl having been a younger son of the third Earl of Sunderland. The barony of Churchill of Whichcote also was granted in 1815 to a younger son of the third Duke of Marlborough, and all these titles still grace the English peerage.

CAUX. See J. DE CALETO.

CAVE, JOHN DE, acted as a justicier from 1254 to 1261, 45 Henry III. (Dugdale's Orig. 43; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 331-336.) If H. Phillippis (Grandeur of the Law [1884], 53) is right in stating that the baronets of that name of Stanford in Northamptonshire, a title still existing, are descended from him, his ancestor was Jordan de Cave, the brother of Wyamarus de Cave, who received lands in North and South Cave, in Yorkshire, from William the Conqueror, and transferred them to Jordan.

CAVE, HUGH DE, in 5 Edward I. was clerk to Ralph de Hengham, chief justice of the King's Bench. (Dugdale's Orig. 94.) In 21 Edward I., 1293, he was the last named of four justices itinerant assigned for the county of Surrey; and he was among the justices summoned to the parliament of August, 23 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 29.) He and his brother, probably the under-named John, in 15 Edward I., had a grant of land at Cokefrueddinge in Staffordshire, from Alwyn de Norton and his wife. (Abb. Placit. 213.)

CAVE, JOHN DE, is inserted by Dugdale as having been appointed a justice of the King's Bench in 1283, 11 Edward I. Although there is no absolute impossibility that he may have been the same person as the above John de Cave, the lapse of time from 1261 to 1283 renders it very improbable. There is, however, no subsequent record of his name in connection with the courts.

He appears to have been the brother of the last-mentioned Hugh de Cave, and to have had grants of land made to him till 2 Edward II. (Abb. Placit. 213, 215, 275, 305.)

CAVENDISH, JOHN DE. Notwithstanding the high legal rank which John de Cavendish attained, and the tragical termination of his life, and although his family was afterwards illustrated by two dukedoms, no account remains of his early career except that which may be collected from the Year Books. Nor can the want of any other memorials of him be wondered at, when we advert to the fact that nearly 250 years elapsed after the death of the chief justice before the family was ennobled. John de Cavendish was the son of Roger de Gernum, the grandson of Ralph de Gernum, an after-mentioned justice itinerant in the reign of Henry III. The name of Cavendish was first assumed by either his father or himself, each being said to have acquired it by marriage with the heiress of the lord of the manor so called in the county of Suffolk. John de Cavendish appears in the Year Books as an advocate as early as 21 Edward III., and as late as 45 Edward III., and was made a serjeant in 40 Edward III. Yet Dugdale introduces him in his 'Chronica Series' as chief justice of the King's Bench in 39 Edward III., 1365. This is evidently founded on mistake, for Dugdale, six years afterwards, gives a patent appointing him a puisne judge of the Common Pleas on November 27, 1371, besides showing that Sir Henry Green was chief justice till October 20, 1365, on which day he was succeeded by Sir John Knyvet, who kept the place till he was made chancellor, when Cavendish is again inserted in the list as raised to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench on July 15, 1372. From 40 to 44 Edward III. he was joined in the commissions as a judge of assize, his salary for which was 20*l.* a year (Devon's Issue Roll, 360); and fines were levied before him as a judge of the Common Pleas at the commencement of 46 Edward III., in the term next after his appointment to that court. (Dugdale's Orig. 45.) He was a trier of petitions in every parliament from 1372, and not before, which he undoubtedly would have been had he been then chief justice. He continued to fulfil his high duties with great credit till the end of the reign, when he was immediately reappointed, with the grant of 100 marks per annum, which had been for some years made to his predecessors.

He seems to have been a bit of a humourist. A case being heard before him in which a question arose upon a lady's age, her counsel pressed the court to have her before them, and judge by inspection whether she was within age or not. But 'Candish, Justice,' showing great knowledge of female character, says, 'Il n'ad nul home en Engleterre que puy adjudge a droit deins age ou de plein age; car ascun femes que sont de age de XXX ans voilent apperer d'age de XVIII ans.' (Year Book, 50 Edw. III. fo. 6, pl. 12.)

The chief justice met with an untimely end. The insurrection of Wat Tyler in 1381 extended itself from Kent over various parts of England. In the county of Suffolk the rebels assembled to the number of 50,000, destroying the property and ill-treating the persons of all who would not join them. The principal objects of their vengeance seemed to be all those who had any sort of learning. They attacked Sir John Cavendish's house, and plundered and burned it; and having unfortunately got hold of the venerable man, they dragged him into the market-place of Bury St. Edmunds, and there, after a mock trial, ruthlessly beheaded him and insulted his remains.

Thus perished this amiable judge, after gracing the judicial bench for ten years, without an imputation of having perverted the course of justice, or of deviating from the path of rectitude and integrity, to justify or to palliate the brutal fate which overtook him. Shortly before his murder he was honoured by being elected chancellor of the University of Cambridge.

By his wife Alice, who died before him, he left two sons, the descendant of one of whom, William, became the biographer of Cardinal Wolsey, to whom he was gentleman usher. He was afterwards admitted into the service of the king, by whom his fortunes were greatly enriched by various profitable offices and valuable grants of lands belonging to the dissolved abbeys and priories. One of his sons, William, was ennobled by James I. with the title of Baron Cavendish of Hardwicke in 1604, to which that of Earl of Devonshire was added in 1618. The fourth earl was created Duke of Devonshire in 1694. A younger son of the fourth duke was created Earl of Burlington in 1831, a title which is now held by his grandson, the present Duke of Devonshire.

Another son of Wolsey's biographer, named Charles, was father of Sir William Cavendish, who was raised to the peerage by being created Viscount Mansfield in 1620, to which were successively added the earldom, marquissate, and dukedom of Newcastle, all of which titles became extinct in 1691.

CAXTON, JEREMIAH DE, although omitted in Dugdale's list, was undoubtedly a justicier, being expressly called so in 30 Henry III., as being present at the execution of a final concord 'before the king himself' at Westminster (Harleian MSS. 371, fo. 711a), and also payments being made for assizes to be taken before him in 28 and 31 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Ra. Fin. i. 424, ii. 9.) In the following year he is mentioned as one of the custodes of the archbishopric of Canterbury during its vacancy (Madox, i. 595), after which his name occurs in 37 Henry III. 1253, as holding pleas before the king with Henry de Breton.

CECIL, WILLIAM (EARL OF SALISBURY), was one of the parliamentary commissioners of the Great Seal for less than four months. His grandfather was the renowned Lord Burleigh, and his father was Robert Cecil, the wise minister of Queen Elizabeth and James I., who, after serving both sovereigns, and after passing through the two lower grades of the peerage, was created Earl of Salisbury in 1605. On his death, in 1612, this William succeeded, but did not do much credit to his lineage. At first the obsequious servant of his sovereign, he concurred in every act proposed by the court, and attended King Charles when he retired in his troubles to York, joining his peers in signing the declaration that the king had no intention to take warlike measures. Soon after, without any apparent reason, he fled from court, deserted the king's party for that of the parliament, and forming one of the small knot of men who legislated at Westminster. With the effrontery to appear before the king at Oxford as a commissioner to treat for peace, and was named in the same capacity proposed treaty at Uxbridge, totally without credit with either party, was appointed a commissioner of the Great Seal on July 3, 1646. The parliament, however, withdrew their confidence from him and the other commissioners on October 30, and placed the Seal in the hands of the speakers of the two houses.

On the decapitation of Charles I. he allowed himself to be nominated a member of the Council of State, and, as if this were not sufficient degradation, he got his name abolished of the House of Lords, and as a member of the House of Commons, he was expelled with the rest of the Rump in 1653, he joined the Rump at in 1659, to be again expelled, and again restored. His insignificance probably saved him on the restoration of Charles II., who no doubt thought that the contempt which all men felt for the degraded earl was a sufficient punishment.

He died on December 3, 1668. His descendants have wiped out his disgrace, and, at the end of two centuries, flourish with the additional title of marquis, granted in 1789. (Clarendon; Whitelocke; Parl. Hist.)

CESTRETON, ADAM DE. King Henry III. before the seventeenth year of his reign founded a house for the maintenance of converted Jews, in the street then called 'New Street,' but now known as Chancery Lane, endowing it with many houses and lands, and bestowing on it the church of St. Dunstan, in Fleet Street. Over this 'Domus Conversorum' a custos was appointed, sometimes during the king's pleasure and sometimes for life, who was generally an ecclesiastic, and connected with the legal profession. In the reign of Edward I. this office was first united with that of master of the Rolls; and when, by the banishment of the Jews from England, the object of its foundation gradually ceased, the house was eventually annexed to the office of master of the Rolls, and thenceforward received the name by which it is now distinguished.

Adam de Cestreton, both an ecclesiastic and an officer of the court, received in 50 Henry III., 1265, a grant of the custody of this house for his life; and during the whole of 52 Henry III. he was performing the functions of a justicier. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 465-478.) The short time that he remained on the bench may account for his non-appearance in Dugdale's 'Chronica Series,' inasmuch as his death occurred at the beginning of the following year.

CHACEPORC, PETER. A grant of 30 marks per annum was made in 31 Henry III. to Hugh de Chaceporc and his wife Guidonea, who in the patent is called 'comate regis.' (Cal. Rot. Pat. 22.) Whatever was their relationship to Peter Chaceporc, it will account for his being constituted king's treasurer in 26 Henry III., and for his being keeper of the king's wardrobe from 29 to 37 Henry III. (Ibid. 19; Madai. i. 609, &c.) The wardrobe appears to have been used as one of the royal treasuries, and a certain class of fines was commonly paid into it. On May 15, 1253, William de Kilkenny being ill, the Great Seal was delivered to Peter Chaceporc and John de Lexinton, and there is little doubt that the former merely received it in one or other of the above characters, probably in the former, to be deposited in the wardrobe for safe custody. In that same year Peter Chaceporc received the archdeaconry of Wells, and in the following the treasurership of Lincoln (Le Nere, 43, 151), after which no mention is made of his name, except that he is one of the executors named in King Henry's will. (Rymer, 496.) He is sometimes called Chaceport.

CHAMBERLAYNE, THOMAS, claims a descent from William, Count Tankerville, who was one of the Norman followers of William the Conqueror, and whose son John became lord chamberlain to Henry I.; the same office being held by several of his descendants, its name thus became attached to them. One of the branches of the family, William Chamberlayne, brother of Sir Thomas Chamberlayne, who was employed in diplomacy by Henry VIII. and his three successors, settled in Ireland, and was the father of the subject of the present article.

Thomas Chamberlayne was called to the bar by Gray's Inn in 1585, and became reader in 1607. He was raised to the degree of the coif in 1614, was made a Welsh judge in 1615, and in 1616 was advanced to the office of chief justice of Chester, and knighted. (Cal. State Papers [1611], 289, 363.) From this position he was selected to be one of the judges of the King's Bench on October 8, 1620. In that court he remained only four years; for, whether from feeling the duties too onerous, or from some other cause, he retired from it on October 18, 1624, and resumed his judicial seat at Chester, with a grant of the same precedency in the Court of Common Pleas, to be held without fee or charge, which was made to him within a week after the accession of Charles I. (Croke, Jac. 690; Cal. State Papers [1625-6], 5.) In a commission dated May 12, 1625, he is described not only as chief justice of Chester, but also as a judge of the Common Pleas. (Rymer, xviii. 673.) He is likewise mentioned by Sir William Jones (Reports, 70), under Easter Term, 1 Car., as one of the judges before whom the case of Lord Sheffield v. Ratcliffe was argued in the Exchequer Chamber, in which it appears that after various hearings, extending over two years, the judges were equally divided. Lord Bacon, in his address to Sir James Whitelock on succeeding to the chief justiceship of Chester, recommends him to follow the example of his predecessor Chamberlayne, who, he says, 'for religion, for learning, for stoutness in course of justice, for watchfulness over the peace of the people, and for relation of matters of state to the counsell heer, I have not known (no dispraysse to any) a better servant to the king in his place.' (Liber Famelicus, 80.)

He died on September 17 or 27, 1625, having married, first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir George Fermor, knight, of Easton Nestor in Northamptonshire, and widow of Sir William Stafford, knight, of Blather-wick in the same county; and, secondly, Lady Elizabeth Berkeley, only daughter of Lord Chamberlain Hunsdon, and widow of Sir Thomas Berkeley. (Cal. St. Papers [1619], 346.) His eldest son, Thomas, of Wickham in Oxfordshire, was a loyal adherent to King Charles in his misfortunes, and was by him created a baronet in 1642, a title which lasted 134 years, and expired in 1776. (Wotton, ii. 374.)

CHAMBRÈ, ALAN. The family of De la Chambrè, De Camera, or Chaumberay was of Norman origin, and the name of one of its members occurs on the Roll of Battle Abbey. They settled in Westmoreland, where their descendants have flourished in an uninterrupted lineal succession till the present time. Alan Chambrè was the son of Walter Chambrè, of Halhead Hall in the parish of Kendal, and recorder of Kendal, by his marriage with Mary, daughter of Jacob Morland, of Capplethwaite Hall in the same county.

He was born in 1730, and, being destined to the law, he, reviving an ancient custom which had been long discontinued, first resorted to an inn of Chancery, and paid the customary dozen of claret on admission into the society of Staple Inn, and his arms are emblazoned on a window in the hall. From this inn he removed to the Middle Temple in February 1758, but transferred himself to Gray's Inn in November 1764, and was called to the bar in May 1767. The diligence with which he had devoted himself to his studies was proved by the success which he achieved, and his independent and upright conduct and amiable disposition may be estimated by his popularity among his colleagues. He selected the Northern Circuit, and soon became one of its leaders. In 1783 he was chosen treasurer of his inn, and in 1796 he was elected recorder of Lancaster. On the resignation of Mr. Baron Perryn in 1799 he was named as his successor, the announcement of which was received by the circuit bar with 'acclamations quite unprecedented.' A short act of parliament was passed on July 1, 1799, authorising, for the first time, a serjeant to receive his degree in the vacation, so that the vacant office might be immediately granted to him. In June of the following year he was removed from the Court of Exchequer to the Common Pleas, in which he remained till his resignation in Michaelmas vacation 1815.

In the exercise of his functions he merited and received universal praise both for his learning and urbanity. So extremely careful was he of doing anything that could by possibility be misinterpreted that on one occasion he declined the invitation to a house, at which the judges had been accustomed to be entertained during the circuit, because the proprietor was defendant in a cause at that assize.

Sir Alan lived seven years after his retirement, and, dying at Harrogate on September 20, 1823, was buried in the family vault at Kendal.

CHANNELL, WILLIAM FRY, is one of the present barons of the Exchequer. He is the son of Pike Channell, Esq., of Peckham in Surrey. He was called to the bar by the Inner Temple in May 1827, and was one of the five gentlemen who, in 1840, on the warrant for opening the Court of Common Pleas to all barristers being declared null and void, were the first who were called to the degree of serjeant-at-law with all its former privileges. On February 12, 1857, he was appointed to his present office, and knighted.

He married in 1834 a daughter of Richard Moseley, Esq., of Champion Hill, Camberwell.

CHANVILL, WILLIAM DE (ARCHDEACON OF RICHMOND), was one of the justiciars at Westminster before whom fines were levied. (Hunter's Preface.) That dignity he had enjoyed since 1180. He probably died in 1193, as his successor was then appointed. (Le Neve, 323.)

CHAPPEL, WILLIAM, belonging to a Dorsetshire family, and residing at Waybay House in the parish of Upway, was born in 1677. In 1722 he entered parliament as member for Dorchester, which he continued to represent till he was raised to the bench. History is silent as to his talents as a senator, but as a lawyer his reputation was high. Called serjeant in 1724, he was made a judge on the North Wales Circuit in 1728, and on his appointment as king's serjeant in 1729 he was knighted. On June 16, 1737, he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench, and occupied the seat for nearly eight years with credit and distinction. He died on March 15, 1747, leaving, by his wife Trebena Clifton Green Place, Womersley, Surrey, four sons and two daughters, one of whom married Fletcher Norton, afterwards Lord Grantham. (Hutchins's Dorset, i. 373, 596; N, 1075.)

CHARLETON, ROBERT DE (to branch of the family of Charleton of shire he belongs there is no account) raised to the office of chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas on Jan. 1388, 11 Richard II., and the first before him extend to Midsummer. As his attendance in parliament was noticed at a later period, he probably soon after that date. He received the degree of knighthood as a banneret. (Dugdale's Orig. 46, 103.) Some divisions are in Richard Bellewe's

CHARLETON, JOB, descended of an ancient Shropshire family of and directly from Sir Alan Charleton, of Appley Castle near Wellington, the brother of John, the first Lord Powis. He was the eldest son of Robert Charleton, of Whitton, by his first wife, Emma, daughter of Thomas Harby, of Adston, Northamptonshire; from whose brother, Sir Job Harby (both eminent jewellers who had suffered much in the royal cause), he received his baptismal name. Born in London in 1614, and educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, he was called to the bar by Lincoln's Inn, but does not appear to have practised in the courts during the interregnum, but was elected to Protector Richard's only parliament in 1659, and also to the first two parliaments of Charles II. in 1660 and 1661, as member for Ludlow.

His reputation for loyalty may be inferred from his being included on the Restoration in the first batch of new serjeants, and being made one of his majesty's council at Ludlow for the Marches of Wales. In 1662 he had a grant of 3700*l.* for the services rendered by his father to Charles I. (Cal. St. Papers [1662], 376), and also succeeded Sir Geoffrey Palmer as chief justice of Chester, being thereupon knighted. He became king's serjeant in 1668, but his name is very seldom mentioned by the law reporters of the day.

In the parliament of 1661 he was chairman of the committee for elections; and on February 4, 1673, he was unanimously elected speaker. His claim for the customary privileges was uttered in so neat and brief an address that Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury complimented him on having 'with so much advantage introduced a shorter way of speaking' on the occasion. His resignation of the chair, in a fortnight after, was not unlikely to have been the result of an intrigue of the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was then in the ascendant. By Sir Stephen Fox's confession to the parliament of 1679, Sir Job had a pension of 1000*l.* while he was speaker.

Sir Job retired to his chief justiceship of Chester, in which he desired to die; but after a few years he was disturbed in the enjoyment of it by the ambition of Sir George Jeffreys. That impudent aspirant pressed the king so hard for the place that, to make way for him, it was resolved that Sir Job should be removed to a seat in the Common Pleas. This Sir Job took heavily to heart, and, desiring to see the king to endeavour to divert him from the purpose, went to Whitehall and placed himself where the king must pass; but his majesty, seeing him at a distance and knowing his object, turned short off and went another way. The disappointed judge 'pitied his poor master, and never thought of troubling him more, but buckled to his business in the Common Pleas.' Roger North, who relates these particulars (p. 213), calls him 'an old cavalier, loyal, learned, grave, and wise,' and concludes his narration thus: 'May Westminster Hall never know a worse judge than he was.'

He sat as justice of the Common Pleas from April 26, 1680, till April 21, 1686, when he was one of the four judges who were removed by James II. for giving his opinion in opposition to the king's dispensing power. He was however restored to his chief justiceship of Chester (Bramston's Autob. 223; 2 Shower, 460), and was made a baronet on the 12th of May following. He died on May 27, 1697.

His seat was at Ludford in Herefordshire. By his first wife, Dorothy, daughter and heir of William Blundell, of Bishops Castle, Esq., he had four sons and three daughters; and by his second wife, Lettice, daughter of Walter Waring, of Oldbury, Esq., he had one son and one daughter. The baronetcy became extinct in 1784. (Wotton, v. 13; Wood's Fasti, i. 464.)

CHASTILLON, HENRY DE, or CASTIL-LION, was raised to the archdeaconry of Canterbury in 1195, 7 Richard I., and was then acting as a justicier in the Curia Regis, several fines being levied before him in that year. He probably had previously filled some office in the Exchequer, and may have been the Henry de Casteillon who accounted for the ministry of the chamberlainship ('chamberlengarie') of London in 6 and 7 Richard I. (Madox, i. 775.)

During the controversy which arose in 1202 between King John and the monks of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, concerning the right of patronage to the church of Faversham, the archdeacon contrived to secure some advantage to himself by claiming the custody of the church during the vacancy. (Hasted, xii. 564.)

CHAUCOMB, HUGH DE, in the last three years of the reign of Richard I. was sheriff of Staffordshire, and from the 6th to the 9th John held the same office in Warwickshire and Leicestershire. In 2 John he was employed as a justicier in Normandy, and in 5 John he was one of the justiciers before whom fines were acknowledged in Hampshire and Nottinghamshire, and in the same year the king pardoned him a sum of money which he owed to certain Jews. He was also employed in making inquisition at all the ports as to those who brought corn from Normandy; and the castle of Kenilworth was committed to his custody. He held it for four years, and then for some unrelated cause he lost the royal favour; for in 9 John he was ordered to deliver the castle to Robert de Roppel, and was fined 800 marks to recover the goodwill of the king. His property lay in the counties of Lincoln and Oxford, and his wife's name was Hodierna. (Rot. Pat. 74; Rot. de Finibus, 382.)

CHAYNELL, JOHN, was summoned in 5 Edward II., 1312, among the legal assistants to parliament, in what precise character is not stated, and his attendance continued to be required in most of the parliaments till 1324. He is first mentioned as a justice of assize in 1314, and the last commission in which his name occurs is in 17 Edward II. (Parl. Write, ii. p. ii. 654; Rot. Parl. i. 450.)

CHELMSFORD, LORD. See F. THESIGER.

CHESTER, EARL OF. See R. BLUNDEVIL.

CHESTER, PETER DE, was one of the justices itinerant in 54 Henry III., 1270, for pleas of the forest. He was appointed as a baron of the Exchequer in 12 Edward I., 1284, and continued to act till 1288. In 1282 he received the provostship of Beverley, and died about 1298. (Madox, ii. 322; Monast. vi. 1307.)

CHEYNE, WILLIAM, appears in an apocryphal List of Readers of Gray's Inn, but the Year Books prove that he was in practice as an advocate from 8 Henry IV. till 2 Henry V. In 12 Henry IV. he was called serjeant; and on June 16, 1415, 3 Henry V., he was constituted a justice of the King's Bench, and was reappointed on the accession of Henry VI. In 2 Henry VI., January 21, 1424, he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench (Acts Privy Council, iii. 132) and knighted. He presided in that court till 1439, when he resigned. His death occurred in 1442, and he was buried in the church of St. Benet, Paul's Wharf. (Weever, 686.)

By his wife Margaret he left a son and a daughter, to the former of whom he bequeathed 400*l.* and all his estates at Stoke and Trapeselea. (Testam. Vetust. 249.)

CHISHULL, JOHN DE (BISHOP OF LONDON), in 1264, 48 Henry III., was chancellor of the Exchequer, and records state that the king's signature was made to divers patents while the Seal was in his custody (Cal. Rot. Pat. 35), and that he gave it up in February 1265. He was archdeacon of London in 1262, and became dean in 1268. In the latter year, on October 30, the Great Seal was again committed to his custody, to be held at the king's pleasure, which he retained till the end of the following July, but whether with the title of chancellor does not appear.

In February 1270 he was constituted treasurer, in which office he continued about two years.

He was elected to the bishopric of London on December 7, 1273. He died on February 8, 1280, and was buried in St. Paul's. (Godwin, 183; Le Nere, 177, 183, 324.)

CHOKE, RICHARD, was of a Somersetshire family, and the son of John Choke, of the manor of Long Ashton in that countv. He is first mentioned as an advocate in 19 Henry VI., 1440, and was called to the degree of serjeant in July 1453. Six months after the accession of Edward IV. he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, not however as chief justice, as Dugdale erroneously states, but as 'one of the judges' of that court, according to his patent, which is dated September 5, 1461. That he was a useful judge, and did not unnecessarily interfere with the violent politics of the time, may be presumed from his successive reappointments on the temporary restoration of Henry VI. in 1470, on the return of Edward IV. in the following year, and on the accessions of Edward V. and Richard III. in 1483, in the first year of the latter of whom he died, and was buried at Long Ashton.

His first wife was Joan, daughter of William Pavey, of Bristol, by whom he had several children. His second wife was Margareta Mones, who survived him a year. The family, after three generations, was settled at Avington in Berkshire. (Ashmole's Berks, iii. 318; Collinson's Somerset, ii. 291.)

CHOLMLEY, ROGER, was the natural son of Sir Richard Cholmley, descended from the ancient race of Cholmondeley in Cheshire, who was lieutenant governor of Berwick under Henry VII., and afterwards governor of Hull and lieutenant of the Tower of London. He died in 1522, leaving a handsome provision for Roger, whom he placed at Lincoln's Inn. The date of his first admission there cannot be found; but the fact of his being re-admitted in 1509, which the books of the inn record, gives some substance to the story that the embryo chief justice entered at first rather freely into the frolics of youth. It is evident that he soon reformed, and diligently pursued his legal studies, laying up stores for future use so assiduously that within two years after his father's death he was admitted to the bench of the society, filled the office of reader there no less than three times—in Lent 1524, in Lent 1525, and in autumn 1531, on the occasion of being called to the degree of serjeant, which he assumed in the following Michaelmas Term.

Roger Ascham tells a story of Cholmley used to relate of himself when he was an ancient in Lincoln's Inn, certain students being brought before him to be corrected for their irregularities of them, remembering the old man's career in the same house, said to him, 'we be yong gentlemen, and wise men; fore us have proved all fashions, and have done well.' 'Indeed,' said Cholmley, 'in youthe I was as now, and I had twelve felloses like unto myself; but not one of them came to a good end. And therefore foloe not my example in youth, but foloe my counsell in age, if ever ye think to come to this place, or to this yeares that I am come unto, lesse ye meet either povertie or Tiburn in the way.' (Sevard's Anecdotes, iv. 275.)

In 1530 he was appointed one of the commissioners to enquire into Cardinal Wolsey's possessions in Middlesex (Rymer, iv. 402); and in October 1536 he was knighted, having in the preceding year been elected recorder of London. This office he held for ten years, during which he was twice returned as representative of that city in parliament—viz., in 1537 and 1542. He was named in 1540 as a commissioner in London to search for and burn all heretical books, and to enquire into transgressions against the acts of the Six Articles. His London residence was in the Old Bailey, and probably formed part of the property (now the London Coffee House) which he granted to his school at Highgate.

It was not till 1544 that he was made one of the king's serjeants. He then surrendered the recordership, on which occasion the corporation granted him yearly a new year's gift of twenty angels (nobles) in gold. In the following year, on November 11, he was appointed chief baron of the Exchequer—an office which he retained for the remainder of Henry's reign, and for above five years under Edward VI., when on March 21, 1552, he was promoted to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench.

He had been seated there little above a year before he was called upon to witness the will by which King Edward attempted to exclude his sister Mary from the throne. Although this was probably not a voluntary act, but under pressure of the powers that ruled, yet within a few days after the accession of that princess he was committed to the Tower, where he remained six weeks, at the end of which he was liberated on payment of a large fine. Though never replaced on the bench, he was soon restored to favour, and named in several commissions in the first year of Mary's reign. One of these was for the trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, from whose remarks at the outset, as recorded by Holinshed (iv. 33), it may be inferred that his character for impartiality did not stand very high.

Queen Mary admitted him into her privy council, by the books of which it appears that he was on several occasions appointed to examine certain prisoners in the Tower, with the addition of the horrible discretion of putting them 'to such tortures as . . . shall be thought most convenient.' (Jardine on Torture, 75, 76.)

Sir Roger lived for seven years after Elizabeth's accession, and his name occurs as late as 1562 in a commission for the trial of persons charged with coining. The evening of his life he passed in the calm delights of literary retirement, closing it by establishing and amply endowing one of those useful foundations which then became the happy substitutes for chantries for priests, and which now remain as glorious memorials of the piety and forethought of their originators. This was a free grammar school at Highgate, incorporated on May 6, 1565. One of his last acts was an additional grant in its favour of various premises in the following month, at the close of which he died. He was interred on July 2 at St. Martin's, Ludgate, where his wife Christine had been buried in December 1558. (Machyn's Diary, 181, 200, 368.)

He left only two daughters, who inherited very extensive property, the books of the Augmentation Office showing that the judge had a considerable share in the lands distributed on the dissolution of the monasteries. (Hasted, i. 450, &c.; Ormerod's Cheshire, iii. 208.)

Sir Roger is confounded by Strype and others with his Cheshire kinsman Ranulph or Randle Cholmley, who, like him, was a reader of Lincoln's Inn, a serjeant-at-law, recorder of London, and M.P. for that city. He died two years before Sir Roger.

CHURCHILL, JOHN, and his namesake the first Duke of Marlborough were cousins, each being descended from Jasper Churchill, Esq., of Bradford in Somersetshire, who was the great-grandfather of the duke, and the grandfather of Sir John, whose father was also named Jasper. (Collinson, iii. 580.) He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1647, and elected autumn reader in 1670, having then the title of knighthood. This dignity he had attained by his eminence at the bar, which enabled him to purchase in 1653 the manor of Churchill, near Banwell, in Somersetshire, probably attracted by its name, and caused his selection as one of the king's counsel, and attorney-general to the Duke of York. He practised in the Court of Chancery, and Roger North (p. 199) relates of him that on his walk from Lincoln's Inn to the Temple Hall, where the court sat out of term in Lord Keeper Bridgeman's time, he had taken no less than 284 for motions and defences for 'hastening or retarding the hearings of causes only; a practice greatly amended by Lord Guilford.

He was the first counsel named by the House of Lords in 1675 to manage the famous case of Sir Nicholas Crispe against a member of the House of Commons, which occasioned the absurd contest about privilege between the two houses. In the course of the dispute Sir John and the other counsel, notwithstanding the protection of the Peers, were committed to the Tower by the Commons; and to such an extent was the quarrel carried that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament, when Sir John and his imprisoned colleagues were of course released. He afterwards became a member of this parliament for Dorchester, and in the next for Newtown in Hampshire, and lastly for Bristol, which city chose him as its recorder in April 1683. On the death of Sir Harbottle Grimston he was invested with the office of master of the Rolls on January 12, 1685, less than a month before King Charles died; but an early end was put to his judicial career by his own decease in the summer vacation following. He left four daughters by his wife Susan, daughter of Edmund Prideaux, Esq. (State Trials, vi. 1144 et seq.; Luttrell, i. 254, 324; 2 Showers. 434.)

CLAHAUL, HUGH DE, held a judicial position in 9 Henry III. as one of the justices itinerant for Essex and Hertfordshire, in the latter of which counties his property was situate. He was among those who, having taken the barons' part in King John's reign, returned to his duty at the beginning of Henry's. (Rot. Claus. i. 323, 324, ii. 67, 147.)

CLARE, ROGER DE (EARL OF CLARE AND HERTFORD), was one among the twelve designated as itinerant judges in 1170 by Dugdale. There are good reasons, however, for considering that they did not really bear that character, but that they were rather inquisitors into the abuses attributed to the sheriffs and other officers of the king. This earl was great-grandson of Richard Fitz-Gilbert, called Richard de Benefacta, or Bienfait, afterwards noticed, and son of Richard who was created Earl of Hertford.

In 3 Henry II. Earl Roger obtained the king's grant of all lands he could win in Wales, and accordingly marched a great army there, and fortified divers castles in the neighbourhood of Cardigan.

One of the first acts of Becket, after he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury, was to summon the earl to do him homage for the castle of Tunbridge. He refused to appear, asserting that he held it by military service of the crown, and, as the king abetted him in his plea, the archbishop refrained from pursuing the claim. His grants to religious houses, which were numerous and munificent, are stated in detail by Dugdale. After his death in 1173, Matilda, his widow, the daughter of James de St. Hilaire, married William de Albini, Earl of Arundel, and the earldoms of Clare and Hertford descended to his son Richard, whose son Gilbert became Earl of Gloucester. All the earldoms became extinct in 1313 on the death of Gilbert, the tenth earl, without issue. (Baronage, i. 209; Hasted, v. 159, 203.)

CLAREBALD (ABBOT OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, CANTERBURY) is placed by Dugdale at the head of the twelve whom he calls 'justiciarii itinerantes' into certain counties in 1170, but who were rather inquisitors into the conduct of the sheriffs and other officers of the king.

The abbot was either a secular or, as some say, a fugitive and apostate monk in Normandy. Otruded by King Henry in 1163 on the monks as their abbot, they refused to permit him to sit in their chapter or to celebrate any of the holy offices. Notwithstanding this opposition, he contrived to possess himself of the temporalities and to retain them for fifteen years, when, on the representation of the monks that he was a bad man and had wasted the revenues of the monastery, a papal mandate was directed to the Bishops of Exeter and Worcester and the Abbot of Faversham, under which he was deposed in 1166. During his time the greater part of the abbey was destroyed by a fire in 1165. (Monast. i. 122; Weever, 255; Hasted, xii. 190.)

CLARENDON, EARL OF. See E. HYDE.

CLARKE, ROBERT, was probably of the county of Essex, as he purchased and resided in the mansion house of Newark, or Newlands-fee, in the parish of Good Estre, and as he also possessed the manor of Gibbecrake in Purley, in that county. (Morant, i. 345, ii. 450.) He was called to the bar by Lincoln's Inn in 1568, and was reader in autumn 1582. He was constituted a baron of the Exchequer in Jun. 1587, 29 Elizabeth. (Coke's 3rd Report, p. 16.) In the summer of 1590 he was the judge of assize at Croydon, before which John Udall, the Puritan, was tried for the publication of the alleged libel called 'The Demonstration'—a trial which, notwithstanding the evident wish of the judge to be lenient with him if he would have submitted, is a curious instance of the shallow and absurd manner in which criminal proceedings were then conducted. (State i. 1277.) On the accession of King James his patent was renewed, and on Jan. 1603, he was knighted. He sat on the bench for nearly twenty years, and six months before his death the inquisition against Bates, raising the great constitutional question whether a duty imposed on the subject by the king, was heard in the House of Commons. His feeble argument in favour of the crown is fully stated in 'Lane's Reports' (p. 22).

He died on January 1, 1606-7, and was buried at Good Estre. Though some say that he had only two wives, more must be added, and all of them widows. The parish register of Good Estre records that Mary Clarke, his wife, was buried 'the 26 date of February 1585,' and she appears to have been the widow of — Hills. It further records the burial of Catheran, another wife of the baron, on January 16, 1590, and she appears to have been the widow of — Chapman. By each of these he had several children. The third wife was Margaret, the daughter of John Maynard, M.P. for St. Albans, and grandfather of the first Lord Maynard, and widow of Sir Edward Osborne, lord mayor of London in 1582, and ancestor of the first Duke of Leeds. This lady died in 1602, leaving two daughters by the baron. The fourth wife was Joyce, the widow of James Austen, who survived the baron for twenty years, and was buried in 1626 in the church of St. Saviour's, Southwark.

CLARKE, CHARLES, was the son of Alured Clarke, of Godmanchester in Huntingdonshire, by Ann, daughter of the Rev. Charles Trimnell, rector of Abbots Repton in Hampshire, and sister to the Bishop of Winchester of that name. In 1717 he entered Lincoln's Inn, and was in 1723 called to the bar, at which he was rewarded by so large a share of practice that he amassed a considerable fortune. The neighbouring borough of Huntingdon elected him recorder in 1731, and he was returned member for the county in 1739. In the new parliament of 1741 he was elected for Whitechurch in Hampshire; and in its second session he was raised to the bench, as baron of the Exchequer, in Hilary Term 1743.

His judicial career was terminated seven years afterwards by an infectious fever caught at the Black Sessions at the Old Bailey in May 1750, already described in the memoir of Sir Thomas Abney, another victim of the uncleanness of the prisons. His death occurred on the 17th, and he was buried at Godmanchester. His first wife was Anne, a daughter of Dr. Thomas Green, Bishop of Ely; and his second was Jane, daughter of Major Mullins, of Winchester, and by both he left issue.

His brother, Dr. Alured Clarke, became dean of Exeter. (Master's Corp. Christi Coll., Cambridge.)

CLARKE, THOMAS, was, according to Mr. Nichols (Literary Anecdotes, viii. 507), 'generally supposed to be a natural son, and as having no relations.' Of his early life little is known, beyond his being educated at Westminster School. That he was intimate with the second Earl of Macclesfield, and was a fellow of the Royal Society, devoting himself to philosophical pursuits, appears from a letter of Lord Hardwicke's; and that he was reputed to be deep reader in Roman law, is apparent from the description of him in the 'Causidicade' as a supposed candidate for the vacant solicitor-generalship in 1742:—

Then Cl—ke, who sat snug all this while in his place,

Rose up and put forward his ebony face :
'I have reason,' quo' he, 'now to take it amiss,
That your lordship ha'n't call'd to me long before this.

If the old civil law, on which I would build,
Is in so much neglect and indifference held,
Let your common law dunces go on and apply,
Quoting chapter and sect, insipidly dry !
A student of moderate parts and discerning,
With intense application may master such learning :

But I, as a genius, the office demand,
'That office my qualifications command !'

It is probable that his advance to the post of king's counsel took place before this date. In 1747 he was member for St. Michael's, and in 1754 for Lostwithiel, both Cornish boroughs, but had no seat in the house in 1761.

On the death of Sir John Strange in 1754 Mr. Clarke was immediately pointed out both by Lord Hardwicke and the Duke of Newcastle to succeed him as master of the Rolls; to which place he was appointed on May 29, 1754, and was thereupon knighted. The duke calls him a very deserving man, and intimates that he was greatly before his competitors in the Court of Chancery. He held the office with great credit a few months beyond ten years, dying on November 13, 1764. He was buried in the Rolls Chapel; and by his will he left, among other legacies, 30,000*l.* to St. Luke's Hospital, and appointed the Earl of Macclesfield his residuary legatee, his whole property being estimated at 200,000*l.* (Harris's Lord Hardwicke.)

CLAYER, JOHN, is introduced among the advocates under Edward II. and III. He was a native of Norfolk, and acted as custos of the see of Norwich during its vacancy in both reigns. He tallaged that county and Suffolk in 6 Edward III.; and in the following year he was added to the commission of justices itinerant into Kent. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 679; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 103, 106, 121.)

CLAY, STEPHEN DE, held under King John the manor of Tinden in Northamptonshire, at a rent of 26*l.* per annum. (Rot. Chart. 49.) He was one of the justiciars before whom fines were levied in 2 and 3 John.

CLEASBY, ANTHONY, the additional baron of the Exchequer appointed under the recent act relating to election petitions, is the son of Stephen Cleasby, Esq., of Cragg House, Westmoreland, by Mary, the daughter of George John, Esq., of Penzance.

He was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and came out when he took his degree in 1827 third wrangler and first class in classics, and in 1828 was lected fellow of his college. He studied law at the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar on June 10, 1831, choosing the Northern Circuit. In 1861 he became a queen's counsel; and on August 5, 1868, he was appointed to his present post.

He married Lucy Susan, daughter of Walter Fawkes, Esq., of Farnley Hall, Yorkshire, which county he formerly represented.

CLENCH, JOHN, the son of John Clench, of Wethersfield in Essex, and Joan, daughter of John Amias, of the same county, was called to the bar in Lincoln's Inn in 1568, and was elected reader in Lent 1574. In the same year he was elected the first recorder of Ipswich, and in Michaelmas 1580 he was raised to the degree of the coif, from which grade he was promoted to be third baron of the Exchequer on November 27, 1581, and acted in that capacity till May 29, 1584, when he was removed into the Court of Queen's Bench. He was one of the four judges who were assigned to hear causes in Chancery in November 1591, when the Great Seal was in commission after the death of Sir Christopher Hatton. Tradition says that Queen Elizabeth used to call him 'her good judge.'

He continued to sit till the beginning of 1602, but his death did not occur till August 19, 1607. He was buried in Holbrook Church, and upon his tomb are two full-length marble effigies of the judge and his wife in the costume of the day, with smaller figures on each side of his seven sons and eight daughters. The inscription describes him as the oldest judge of his time. He removed into Suffolk, and is described as of four different places there—Creeting, All Saints, Holesley, and Holbrook.

His wife was Katherine, daughter and heiress of Thomas Almot, of Creeting. Thomas, their eldest son, in 1620 was member for Suffolk. The family is now quite extinct. (Shobert's Suffolk, i. 150; Dary's MSS.)

CLERK, JOHN LE. In 20 Henry II., 1174, the assize or tallage of the united counties of Nottingham and Derby was set by the following itinerant justices—viz., William Basset, John Malduit, 'et Johannem Clericum.' Whether this John was a clerk of the Exchequer sent down to assist, or a clergyman resident in one of those counties, or a person who bore that designation as his surname, it would be useless to enquire.

CLERKE, JOHN. Ford, near Wrotham, in Kent, was the seat of the family of Clerke, or le Clerke, as the name was anciently called. John Clerke the father flourished there in the reigns of Henry V. and Henry VI.; and John Clerke the son was raised to the bench of the Exchequer as second baron on October 29, 1460, little more than four months before the deposition of the latter king. He evidently retained place during the first reign of Edward IV., as he is named as second baron, not only in the new patent of Henry VI., but in that of Edward IV. on his resumption of the crown six months afterwards. From the latter period till February 3, 1481, 20 Edward IV., no other second baron is mentioned. He married one of the daughters and co-heiresses of — Tateshum, of Tateshum; and the estate at Ford continued in the possession of his descendants till 1644, when William Clerke, who had been knighted for his loyalty, was slain at Cropredy Bridge, commanding the regiment he had raised to aid the cause of his sovereign, Charles I. (Hasted, v. 19.)

CLERKE, JOHN (BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS), was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor in divinity. He probably was the John Clerke who, with Richard Pace, was in the service of Cardinal Bainbridge when he was poisoned at Rome in July 1514, and attributed the crime to Silvester de Giles, the Bishop of Worcester. Wolsey, however, took both into favour, making Pace secretary of state, and John Clerke dean of the Chapel Royal in 1516. (Cal. State Papers [1509], 868, 892, [1515], 875.) On October 22, 1519, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Colchester. He must have been recommended by extraordinary abilities to be selected in 1521 for a mission so important in the eyes of its royal author as that of laying at the feet of Leo X. King Henry's book against Luther. His oration on its delivery is not an inelegant composition, and is appended to the published work. His return to England as the bearer, not only of the pope's complimentary reply, but also of the bull conferring on the King of England the coveted title 'Defender of the Faith,' was secure of cordial welcome; and his services did receive a less substantial reward from having acted as Wolsey's private while at the Roman court.

On October 20, 1522, he was appointed master of the Rolls, but held the office quite a year, vacating it on Oct. 1523, in consequence of his elevation to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, which he was elected on March 20.

Despatched to the court of the Cleves with the lame explanation of a variable sovereign's repudiation of Princess Anne, the unwelcome mission is reported to have had poison administered to him in his food, as several of his friends died after partaking of it. The bishop, infected with the venom, survived some time, when he died in London on

3, 1540-1. He was buried in the nunnery of the Minories, whence his remains were removed to the church of St. Botolph, Aldgate, his epitaph in which is given in Weever; (Godwin, 387; Lingard, vi. 104, 304; Rymer, xiii. 758, 792; Weever, 426.)

CLIDERHOU, ROBERT DE, held the manor of Bailey, a township in the neighbourhood of Cliderhou, or Clitherow, in Lancashire. In 35 Edward I. he recovered 200*l.* from three brothers who attacked him at that place, and beat him till they left him for dead.

He was a clerk in the Chancery under Edward I. and Edward II., and in the fourth year of the reign of the latter was appointed one of the three justices of assize for Kent, Sussex, and Surrey. During the eighth and ninth years of that reign he was the king's escheator beyond Trent, and afterwards became parson of the church of Wigan. He took so strong a part in behalf of the Earl of Lancaster that he not only sent his son Adam, and another man-at-arms, with four foot soldiers, to his assistance, but preached at Wigan in his favour, and promised absolution to those who aided him. The punishment he suffered for these offences was a fine of 200*l.* He was alive in 7 Edward III.

As he was a priest, it must be presumed that his son Adam was born before he took orders. (Abb. Placit. 300; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 217-226; Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 686.)

CLIFF, HENRY DE. There were two clerks or masters in Chancery of the name of Cliff or Clyff in the reign of Edward II., who probably were brothers. Henry de Cliff accompanied the king abroad in May 1313 (N. Feadera, ii. 215), and is first mentioned in connection with the Chancery in May 1317, when, during an absence of the chancellor, John de Sandale, Bishop of Winchester, the Great Seal was left in the bishop's house in Southwark, in the charge of Master Henry de Cliff. From this time till the year 1324 he was usually one of the clerks in Chancery under whose seals the Great Seal was secured during the occasional absences of the chancellors. On July 4, 1325 (being then a canon of York), he was raised to the office of keeper or master of the Rolls; and after the virtual abdication of Edward II., in the following year, he was commanded, on December 17, 1326, to add his seal to that of the Bishop of Norwich for the custody of the Great Seal, and they together transacted the business till the appointment of John de Hotham, Bishop of Ely, as chancellor, a few days after the accession of Edward III.

He continued in the office of master of the Rolls for the first seven years of this reign, during which the Great Seal was frequently entrusted to his custody, and died about the beginning of January 1334.

CLIFF, WILLIAM DE, probably the brother of the foregoing Henry de Cliff, was in 3 Edward II. commissioned to prepare certain ships in Yorkshire against the Scots. (N. Feadera, ii. 109.) Two years afterwards he was appointed the king's steward in the forest of Galtres, in the neighbourhood of York. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 189.) In 12 Edward II. he was presented with the prebend of Kylbryde, in the church of Glasgow, and about the same time became one of the clerks of the Chancery, in which capacity he was, from 1319 to 1323, with others of his fellows, frequently entrusted with the Great Seal, in the absence of the chancellors, whose duties they accordingly performed.

It seems not improbable that he shared in the disgrace of the Despencers, inasmuch as a complaint was made, in the first parliament of the following reign, by Elizabeth de Burgh, that she had been arrested, in 16 Edward II., by the conspiracy and crafty plotting of Hugh le Despencer the younger, Robert de Baldock (afterwards chancellor), and William de Cliff; and in the parliament of the second year another complaint was made that Hugh le Despencer and he had disseised John de Larcheley of his manor. (Rot. Parl. ii. 23, 440.) If this were so, however, his offence appears to have been overlooked, as he was one of the commissioners appointed in 3 Edward III. to enquire into the chattels belonging to Hugh le Despencer, in his Lincolnshire manors. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 24.)

CLIFFORD, WILLIAM DE, whose name is frequently abbreviated in the Rolls to Cliff, was the king's escheator on this side Trent from October 1265 till May 1268. Dugdale introduces him as a baron of the Exchequer in 55 Henry III., 1270, about which period he was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, and had a liberate granting him a salary of 40*l.* a year. (Mador, ii. 320.)

CLIFFORD, ROGER DE, traced his descent from Richard, Duke of Normandy, grandfather of William the Conqueror. The duke's grandson became lord of Clifford Castle in Herefordshire, and left a son, Walter (the father of Fair Rosamond), who assumed that surname. Walter's grandson, Roger, married Sibilla, daughter and heir of Robert de Ewyas and widow of Lord Tregoz, and by her had the subject of the present notice, who at his father's death, in 16 Henry III., 1231, was a minor. He attended the king in his expedition into France in 43 Henry III. For a short time he joined the rebellious barons, but, returning to his duty, he gave effective assistance to his sovereign, both at the siege of Northampton and in Wales, and in the decisive victory at Evesham in 1265. In the next year he was made justice of the forests south of the Trent, the duties of which he performed till August 1, 1270, when he went to the Holy Land. Dugdale places him in the year previous to his retirement at the head of the justices itinerant visiting Rutland and five other counties, and he again held the same position in 8 Edward I., 1280.

His bravery and experience in military affairs obtained for him many important governments, among which were, at various times, the custody of the castles of Marlborough, Ludgershall, Gloucester (with the sheriffalty of that county), and Erdesley in Herefordshire. His last office of trust and responsibility was justice of North Wales, to which he was appointed in 8 Edward I.; and his severity in the execution of its duties is said to have induced David, the son of the Prince of Wales, to break out into open hostility. He was attacked by the Welsh in the castle of Hawardyn in 10 Edward I., and taken prisoner; and in a skirmish that followed in the next year his eldest son, Roger junior, was unfortunately slain on November 6, 1282. His own death occurred in 14 Edward I., 1286, when he was succeeded by his grandson Robert, the son of Roger junior.

The name of his first wife is not recorded, but his second, whom he married a few years before his death, was the Countess of Lauretania, who survived him.

Robert, his grandson, was summoned to parliament from 28 Edward I.; and his descendants enjoyed the title till 1525, when Henry Clifford, the then baron, was created Earl of Cumberland. By the death of the fourth earl in 1643 the earldom became extinct. The barony, however, fell to his daughter, and the future succession is remarkable for the frequency with which it fell into abeyance. The present Baroness de Clifford is the heir of the eldest daughter of the previous possessor. Another descendant of the family was created Baron Clifford of Chudleigh in 1872 by Charles II., a title which is enjoyed at the present time.

CLINTON, GEOFFREY DE. There are two accounts of the origin of Geoffrey de Clinton—one that he was of mean parentage and raised to high office by Henry I.; the other that he was the grandson of William de Tankerville, chamberlain of Normandy, and Maud, the daughter of William de Archa.

How early he became in favour with King Henry I. there are no means of tracing. He is a witness, with no title attached to his name, to that king's charter to Westminster Abbey, granted either in 1121 or 1122; and he is also witness to a deed of King Henry, confirming a grant of the Soke of Knighten Guilde to the church of the Holy Trinity in Aldgate, London, executed between 1121 and 1128. In 1123 he calls himself chamberlain of the king; and in one of his grants, dated after 1125, treasurer; and in the charter of confirmation the king gives him both titles. (Monsac. i. 308, vi. 153, 221.)

In 31 Henry I. he is mentioned as holding pleas in no less than eighteen counties in the roll appropriated to that year, and also as being justice of the forest for Huntingdonshire and sheriff of Warwickshire. No presumption, however, can be formed from this fact that he was chief justiciary, as there is very little doubt that Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, was then invested with the highest dignity in the kingdom.

It appears from that roll that his possessions were very large, and extended through no less than fourteen counties; and his exemptions from the Danegeld and other americiaments to which they were liable amount to the large sum of 56*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*

He built the castle at Kenilworth, and gave all the lands he held there, except those attached to the castle and park, to endow the priory of Augustin monks which he founded.

The male branch of his own family failed at the death of his great-grandson, Henry, in 1232; but from his nephew, Osbert de Clinton, descended a long line, which is now represented in the House of Lords by the Duke of Newcastle-under-Lyme and Baron Clinton.

CLIVE, GEORGE, of an ancient and honourable family, deriving their name from the village of Clive in Shropshire, was the son of George Clive, who became possessed of Wormbridge in Herefordshire, by his marriage with Mary, the daughter of Martin Husbands, Esq. They had three sons, of whom the eldest, Robert, was the grandfather of the great Lord Clive, whose son assumed the name of Herbert, and was created Earl of Powis; and the third son, Edward, was the father of Sir Edward Clive, the subject of the next article.

George was born about 1696, and became a bencher of Lincoln's Inn in 1719, though he obtained no eminence in the courts. He was appointed cursitor baron of the chequer on November 6, 1735, and the office for four years. He died upon December 31, 1739, and was buried in Lincoln's Inn.

CLIVE, EDWARD, was the nephew of the last-mentioned George Clive, the eldest son of his brother, Edward Wormbridge in Herefordshire, the daughter of — Key, of the city merchant, and was born in 1704, called to the bar by the society of the Inn in 1725, and was returned to parliament in 1741 as member for St. Michael's Cornwall, for which he sat till his death on the bench, as a baron of the Exchequer, in April 1745. He remained in the office nearly eight years without the knighthood, which he did not receive till January 1753, when he was removed into the Common Pleas. He sat there for seventeen years more, thus extending his judicial service to twenty-five years, at the end of which he resigned in February 1770. The pension of 1200*l.* then granted to him he enjoyed for little more than a year, dying at Bath on April 16, 1771.

He married twice. His first wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Richard Symons, Esq., of Mynde Park in Herefordshire; and his second was Judith, the youngest daughter of his cousin the Rev. Benjamin Clive, a son of his uncle Robert Clive, of Styche in Shropshire, but he left no issue by either.

The judge's brother George was the husband of the eminent actress of that name, unrivalled in her particular walk.

CLOPTON, WALTER DE, descended from a knightly family, established originally at Newenham, in the parish of Ashdon, in Essex, but which afterwards removed into Suffolk, was the son of Sir William de Clopton, a commissioner of array in that county. (Weaver, 695; N. Fadera, iii. 449.) He is named as an advocate in the Year Books in 40 Edward III., 1360, and was one of the king's serjeants from 1 Richard II., 1377. (Rot. Parl. iii. 61, 169.)

On the eve of the parliament in which Sir Robert Tresilian was impeached he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench on January 31, 1388, and received the order of knighthood. Towards the end of the reign he was called upon to say what he thought of the answers given by the judges to the questions propounded to them in 11 Richard II. by Sir Robert Tresilian, by whose removal on that account he had himself been raised to the chief seat. It must be confessed that his answer, that 'had he been asked he should have made the same reply' (Ibid. 377), looks very like an evasion, to be justified, perhaps, by the consideration of the perilous consequences which might have resulted from his pronouncing a more decided opinion.

Notwithstanding this submission to the plant parliament of Richard II., the chief justice, although all the acts of that assembly were repealed two years afterwards, escaped the censure of Henry IV.; for he was in the first parliament of that usurper appointed to investigate the case of Judge Rickhill, whose visit to the Duke of Gloucester while in prison at Calais was made the subject of enquiry, and no doubt felt a real pleasure in receiving the king's commands to acquit him of all criminality therein. (Ibid. 416, 430, 432.) In November 1400 he vacated his seat in the King's Bench; and it is stated that 'by the piety, mildness, and commendable example of Dr. Robert Coleman, chancellor of Oxford, he was induced to condemn all worldly vanity, and to become a friar of the Friars Minors.' (Blomefield's Norwich, ii. 115.) He died about 1410. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 335.)

COBBEHAM, HENRY DE, is the first named member of a noble family, holding large possessions in Kent, of which the lordship of that name near Rochester was the principal. Hasted (iii. 407) mentions him as being one of 'recognitores magnæ assisæ' in 1 John, and in 4 John for not obeying some precept of the king he was obliged to pay one hundred marks to recover the royal favour. (Madox, i. 473.) In 3 Henry III. he was appointed one of the justices itinerant into Sussex, Surrey, Middlesex, and Kent, and in the tenth year of that reign he was in the commission to collect the quinzime there. (Rot. Claus. ii. 147.) At his death, the date of which does not appear, he left three sons—John, Reginald, and William—each of whom occupied the judicial bench. Henry, the grandson of the first, was summoned to parliament by Edward II. The barony, after many changes, is now represented by the Duke of Buckingham.

COBBEHAM, JOHN DE, was the eldest son of the above, and succeeded to his father's manor on his death. In 20 Henry III. he was constable of Rochester Castle (Cal. Rot. Pat. 18), and from 26 to 32 Henry III. held the office of sheriff of Kent, with Bertram de Criol. He was raised to the bench about 28 Henry III., fines being levied before him from Easter in that year, 1244, till Michaelmas 1250 (Dugdale's Orig. 43), during which time also writs of assize were frequently directed to him. He married twice. His first wife was a daughter of Warine Fitz-Benedict, by whom he had two sons—John, afterwards noticed; and Henry, of Roundal, in Shorne, Kent. His second wife, Joane, daughter of Hugh de Nevill, produced to him Reginald, from whom the Cobhams of Sterborough Castle, in Surrey, sprung. (Hasted, iii. 231, 407.)

COBBEHAM, REGINALD DE, the second son of the above-mentioned Henry, was in 32 Henry III., 1248, one of the justices itinerant into Essex and Surrey, and in the next year into Kent, Middlesex, Hampshire, and Wiltshire. In 33 Henry III. he was appointed sheriff of Kent, and continued to hold that office during the remainder of his life, which terminated on December 14, 1257. Some time after, Maria, his widow, had permission to pay the debts he owed to the crown by instalments. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 268, 328.) While he held the sheriffalty he was appointed governor of Dover Castle and warden of the Cinque Ports. (Baronage, ii. 65.)

inherited the manor of East Shelve, or Shelve Cobham, in Lenham, in Kent. Entrusted, as well as his two brothers, John and Reginald, with judicial duties, he was in three successive years, 39, 40, and 41 Henry III., 1255-7, employed as a justice itinerant into a variety of counties. Hasted dates his death in 14 Edward II., 1320; but it seems scarcely possible that this was the same person. (Hasted, iii. 407, v. 435, 525.)

COBBEHAM, JOHN DE, the grandson of the above Henry de Cobbeham, and eldest son of the above John de Cobbeham, was made constable of Rochester Castle so early in life that he was called the young constable, and was entrusted with the sheriffalty of Kent for four years from 44 Henry III. His seat was at Monkton in the Isle of Thanet. In 52 Henry III., 1268, he acted as a justice itinerant for Surrey and Kent, and was advanced to the bench at Westminster in February 1270, 54 Henry III., but in which court is uncertain, as the mode of designating them was then scarcely fixed. In 4 Edward I. he was certainly constituted a baron of the Exchequer, the mandate for which is dated June 6, 1276, with a salary of forty marks per annum, and there are several records showing that he continued in that office during the remainder of his life. By an entry in the Year Book of Hilary, 28 Edward I., 1300, it appears that he was authorised to stay at home at his pleasure, and to come to the Exchequer and remain there when he would. This licence was no doubt granted to him in consequence of bodily infirmity, as he died in the same year. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 156.)

He was twice married. His first wife was Joane, daughter and heir of Sir Robert de Septrans, by whom he left two sons—Henry and Reginald. His second wife was named Methania. (Hasted, iii. 408.)

COCKBURN, ALEXANDER JAMES EDMUND, the present lord chief justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, is the son of Alexander Cockburn, Esq., formerly envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Columbia, by the daughter of the Viscount de Vignier of St. Domingo, and the grandson of Sir James Cockburn, the seventh baronet, of Nova Scotia, created in 1627; whose next brothers, Admiral Sir George, and the Very Rev. Sir William, dean of York, the eighth and ninth baronets, died without male issue.

He became a member of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1822, and in his second year gained prizes for the best exercises in English and Latin, and afterwards for the English essay. He graduated as B.C.L. in 1829, and was elected fellow of his college. He was called to the bar by the Middle Temple on February 6, 1829. Joining the Western Circuit, and attending the Devonshire sessions, he quickly established for himself a considerable business. Soon after the Reform Bill was passed, he and Mr. Rowe commenced the publication of reports of decisions which arose out of that measure, and the volume in which they were collected is of great and substantial merit. He was consequently engaged in several contests before election committees, in which he showed so much ability that in 1834 he was placed on the Municipal Corporation Commission. His parliamentary employments and the more regular business of the courts became of such magnitude that he felt warranted in 1841 in obtaining the precedence of a silk gown. 'Of his powers of advocacy,' one of his most distinguished contemporaries and professional competitors says, 'it is impossible to speak too highly. He was not perhaps so well fitted for the daily work of the profession, because he was always indisposed to bend his mind to it. But when any great occasion called for extraordinary exertion, he excelled all the eloquent advocates who were amongst my contemporaries. Although he soared to a high pitch, he never lost himself in the clouds, and he dealt with the facts of the case in a practical and at the same time in a masterly manner.' The same discriminating critic used to say to him in allusion to his powers, 'You fly better than you walk.'

In the year of his obtaining rank he ably defended his uncle, and assisted in overturning the attempt to deprive him of the deanery of York. Among other cases in which he distinguished himself as a leader was his eloquent and impressive defence in 1843 of M'Naughten, who had shot Mr. Drummond, in which he satisfied the jury that his client was not a responsible being. In the meantime he had been appointed recorder of Southampton, and in 1847 was elected member for that borough, which he continued to represent till he was elevated to the bench. His speeches in Parliament were less professional than those for which the members of the bar are generally noted, and he was of great assistance in supporting the liberal party, with whom he acted.

In July 1850 he was made solicitor-general and knighted, and in the following March he became attorney-general. He held this office till November 1853, with an exception of ten months between February and December 28, 1852, during which Earl of Derby conducted the government. His next promotion was that of recorder of Bristol in 1854, and on November 2 he was constituted chief justice of the Common Pleas. He presided in that office for nearly three years, during which his uncle the dean of York dying, he succeeded to the baronetcy in 1858. On the of Lord Campbell to the office of lord chancellor, Sir Alexander was raised to his present position of lord chief justice of the Queen's Bench on June 24, 1859.

The restriction under which I placed myself of not giving an opinion of my own on the judicial merits of the existing members of the bench ought not to prevent me from recording the estimation in which they are regarded by their eminent contemporaries. It is but justice therefore to quote a portion of the eloquent eulogy of Mr. Serjeant (afterwards Mr. Justice) Shee, in proposing the health of the chief justice, when presiding as chairman of the anniversary festival of the United Law Clerks' Society in 1863. After a few words introducing his name, he proceeded thus: 'He is the successor in, if not the highest, the second post in the law of England—of men than whom, as great magistrates, in no country of the world will men be found their equals, or at least their superiors. . . . To say of him that he surpasses in the great and highest quality of a chief justice—the high legal attainments of some of his predecessors—would be flattery, of which I will not be guilty; but this I will venture to say, that he possesses qualities which have endeared him to us all, in which none of them have surpassed him. . . . We like him because we know that his distinction was achieved by no back-stairs influence, by no political intrigue, by no political subservience. We like him because we know that he did not arrive at the high position which he now occupies without having first obtained, solely by his own endowments and superior talents, the highest position at the bar. . . . We like him because we know that not merely the honour of the profession, but the honour and character of every man who comes before him, are safe in his hands. We like and admire him because we observe every day that the command which he possesses of all the treasures and all the beauties of our noble language enables him, whenever there is occasion for it, to refute whatever fallacies and sophistries are put forward before him at the bar, and to vindicate at the close of every cause the innocence that belongs to those that are tried. But most of all we like him, we respect him, we love him, for this, because, whenever he has occasion to reprove or to rebuke—and no man in his position can be without having some occasion to reprove and to rebuke—he takes care always to temper authority with gentleness, and to rebuke without giving pain.'

collected by Richard Bellewe; and from 18 to 22 Richard II. he was recorder of London. In addition to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer, to which he was raised on November 15, 1400, 2 Henry IV., a puisne judgeship in the Common Pleas was granted to him on June 17, 1406, and he performed the duties of both offices during the remaining seven years of the reign.

On the accession of Henry V. his two offices were again divided, and a new patent was granted to him as a judge of the Common Pleas only. This was renewed by Henry VI., and he continued to perform his judicial functions during the first seven years of that reign. Having then sat on the bench nearly thirty years, he retired to private life, and died about nine years afterwards, in 1438. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iv. 182.) He was buried in Ashbourn Church. (Dugdale's Orig. 100.)

By his wife Edith, sister of Lord Grey de Ruthyn, he had four sons and two daughters. A descendant from his elder brother Edmund, in 1642, was created Viscount Cullen, a title which became extinct in 1810. (Lodge's Irish Peerage, iv. 323.)

COKE, WILLIAM, was born at Chesterton in Cambridgeshire, and was educated at the university of Cambridge. From Barnard's Inn he removed to Gray's Inn in 1523, and was called to the bar in 1530. He became reader there in Lent 1544, and again in autumn 1546. On February 3, 1547, he was called serjeant, and was presented by Gray's Inn with eight pounds in gold on the occasion, nomine regardi. On October 22, 1550, he was made one of the king's serjeants, and on November 16, 1552, he was nominated a judge of the Common Pleas. He had previously been appointed steward of no less than four houses in his university, and in January 1546 had been elected recorder of Cambridge. (Cooper's Ath. Cantab. i. 114.)

The story told by Machyn (Diary, 26, 38), that he was, on July 27, 1553, sent to the Tower for signing King Edward's will the crown on Lady Jane Grey, is evidently a mistake, as Coke's name does not appear among the signatures to that document; and as his death occurred on the 24th of the following month, it is clear that Machyn mistook the name of (Sir Thomas) Wroth for Coke.

On Coke's monumental brass at Milton both he and his wife Alice, together with two sons and three daughters, are represented—he in his judicial robes, and they in the costume of the period. Above his head is a label, the inscription on which—'Plebs sine lege ruit'—was the motto on the rings of the serjeants who were called in the same term in which he was raised to the bench. (Boutell, 45; Dyer, 71.)

COKE, EDWARD. The ancestors of Sir Edward Coke are traced as far back as the twelfth century, Henry Coke, of Dodington in Norfolk, bearing arms and being mentioned in a deed dated 8 John. (Hasted, ii. 479.) In direct descent came Robert Coke, Sir Edward's father, of Mileham in the same county, who was a lawyer and a bencher of Lincoln's Inn. He married Winifred, daughter and coheir of William Knightley, of Morgrave Knightley in Norfolk, and dying at his chambers in Lincoln's Inn on November 15, 1561, he was buried in St. Andrew's Church, Holborn. There Sir Edward erected a monument to his memory, as he did also in the church of Tittleshall to that of his mother, who, after marrying Robert Bosanne and having by him a son named John, died in January 1569.

Edward Coke, who was the only son out of eight children, was born at Mileham on February 1, 1551-2; so that he was ten years old when his father died, and near eighteen at the decease of his mother. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school at Norwich, and was thence removed in September 1567 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained three years and a half. On the 21st of January 1571 he was admitted a student of Clifford's Inn, and was in the following year, on April 24, entered of the Inner Temple. On April 20, 1578, he was called to the bar; and in the very next term he held his first brief in the Court of King's Bench, and was successful in defending Mr. Denny, a clergyman of his native county, in an action brought against him by Lord Cromwell for scandalum magnatum. (4 Reports, 14.) His reputation for learning was already so great that within a year after his call the benchers of his house selected him as reader at Lyon's Inn—an honour usually conferred on an older barrister—where his lectures fully confirmed the character he had acquired.

On August 18, 1582, he married his first wife, Bridget, the daughter and heir of John Paston, Esq., deceased, of Huntingfield in Suffolk, a descendant of Judge Paston. At this time his name was pronounced Cooke, and is so spelled in the registry of his marriage, as also in a special commission ten years later, when solicitor-general. His acquisition of a fortune of 30,000*l.* with his wife, in addition to his paternal inheritance, did not diminish his industry; for from this date he seems to have been engaged in almost every prominent case noticed by the different reporters. About 1585 he was chosen recorder of Coventry; in the next year the same office was given to him by the citizens of Norwich; and in January 1591-2 the corporation of London called him to the distinguished post of recorder of the metropolis. The latter office he retained for six months only, resigning it on being selected by Lord Burleigh as solicitor-general on June 16, 1582. On his being nominated autumn reader of the Inner Temple in 1592, he composed seven lectures on the Statute of Uses, five of which he delivered to 160 auditors in August, when, on the appearance of the plague, he was compelled to withdraw from London. In his progress to his seat at Huntingfield, he says that 'nine of the benchers, forty of the bar, and other fellows of the Inner Temple,' accompanied him as far as Romford. In 1596 he was elected treasurer of his inn.

Hitherto he had confined himself to his legal avocations: he was now to enter on his political career. Before the parliament of 1593 was assembled, and even before Coke had been elected a member of it, the queen and council, on January 28, named him as the speaker. On the 5th of February he was returned as representative of his native county, 'nullo contradicente,' and he proudly adds that it was a free election, 'sine ambitu, seu aliqua requisitione, ex parte mea.' On the meeting of the house he was elected speaker, as had been previously arranged. The parliament lasted only seven weeks, and his speeches in it have the same ponderous verbosity for which they were ever remarkable, and too much of sycophantic subserviency, ill according with the boldness of his later years. But he was then a seeker after advancement, and he felt he had a mistress with whose power no one dared to trifle. Exactly one year after his speakership terminated, on April 10, 1594, he became attorney-general.

Coke had lived happily with his first wife for sixteen years, when he lost her on June 27, 1598. Within five months after this event he entered into another matrimonial speculation, which began innocently, and was fatal to his future peace. His second wife was Elizabeth, relict of William Hatton, and daughter of Thomas Cecil, who had just succeeded his father, Lord Burleigh, and the marriage took place at her house in Holborn on November 1598, without either bans or nuptials is recorded in the register of the church without remark. Even his friend bishop Whitgift could not overlook the irregularity, and it was only by his submission, and the extraordinary ignorance of the law, that Coke and his parties concerned escaped execution. The powerful connections and large fortune of the lady had also to be considered, for Bacon, who had previously become rival to Coke, and the success of her rival did not tend to diminish the feelings between the parties.

Coke continued attorney-general during the remainder of Elizabeth's reign, no vacancy having occurred in the chief seats of the common law courts during the nine years that it lasted. The only important state trial which is reported in the interval was that of the Earls of Essex and Southampton in February 1601. Here he gave the first specimen of that obnoxious and coarse style which makes his oratory so painfully remembered. He designates the prisoners as 'a Catiline, popish, dissolute, and desperate company;' he calls the Earl of Essex 'treason-bird,' and uses these harsh and indecent expressions:—'But now, in God's judgment, he of his earldom shall be Robert the last, that of the kingdom thought to be Robert the first.' (Jardine's Crim. Trials, i. 318-329.) His arrogance and ill-temper were displayed in 1601, when Bacon, in the Court of Exchequer, made some motion which Coke thought trenced upon his duties. Bacon was not backward in reply, and after many disgraceful words on both sides, the scene ended by Coke's threatening to 'clap a cap. utlegatum' on his back.

On the commencement of the new reign, Coke, who had cordially co-operated in the arrangements for the peaceable accession of James, was not only confirmed in his office, but received the honour of knighthood. He soon had ample opportunity of exhibiting his zeal in the prosecution of state offenders. On Sir Walter Raleigh's trial his heartless and unmanly behaviour forms an appropriate introduction to the shameful mode in which the proceedings were conducted, and the disgraceful verdict given by the jury; and his fulsome adulation of the king's wisdom and innocence has an awkward illustration in the absurd farce which the monarch caused to be performed at the intended execution of the lords implicated in the same treason, and in the cruel tragedy which, thirteen years after, he perpetrated in Raleigh's death on that condemnation. To Raleigh, a prisoner on trial for his life, he brutally says, 'Thou art a monster; thou hast an English face, but a Spanish heart;' 'Thou viper, for I thou thee, thou traitor!' 'Thou art thyself a spider of hell!' 'Oh, damnable atheist!' &c. Even Chief Justice Popham felt it necessary to apologise: 'Sir Walter,' said he, 'Mr. Attorney speaks out of the zeal of his duty for the service of the king, and you for your life; be patient on both sides.' And Secretary Cecil endeavoured to soften him: 'Be not so impatient, good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to speak.' On which Coke angrily exclaimed, 'I am the king's sworn servant, and must speak; if I may not be patiently heard, you discourage the king's counsel, and encourage traitors;' and sat down in a chafe. A more disgusting scene had never been witnessed in court.

During the trials of the conspirators in the gunpowder plot, Coke repeated his gross flattery of the king, and his cruel language to the prisoners. Soon after their termination he was elevated to the bench as chief justice of the Common Pleas, on June 30, 1606.

On ascending the judicial seat he discarded all appearance of subserviency, and boldly asserted the independence of the judge. He did not hesitate to oppose James in his attempts to extend his prerogative; and in the very next year after his appointment he told the king, in the case of prohibitions, that his majesty had not power to adjudge any case, either criminal or between party and party, but that it ought to be determined in some court of justice; and upon the king's saying that he thought the law was founded on reason, and that he and others had reason as well as the judges, Coke answered that 'true it was that God had endowed his majesty with excellent science and great endowments of nature, but his majesty was not learned in the laws of the realm of England;' with which the king was greatly offended. In another case, in 1608, when he and the other judges were summoned before the council to account for a judgment they had given, he said to the lords, 'We do hope that where[as] the judges of this realm have been more often called before your lordships than in former times they have been, which is much observed, and gives much emboldening to the vulgar, that after this day we shall not be so often, upon such complaints, your lordships being truly informed of our proceedings, hereafter called before you.' In 1610 he gave an opinion in opposition to the council, that the king could not, by his proclamation, create any offence which was not an offence before. In the next year he and the other judges of the Common Pleas discharged Sir William Chancey, brought before them by Habeas Corpus, who had been imprisoned by warrant from the High Commission in Causes Ecclesiastical, and afterwards justified their decision before the council. When a new commission was issued, in which he was named, he refused to sit upon it. (12 Reports, 51, 64, 74, 82, 84, 88.)

His old enemy, Bacon, did not fail to take advantage of Coke's resistance. On the death of Sir Thomas Fleming, he recommended the king to remove Coke from the Common Pleas to the King's Bench; and, among others, he gave the following reasons for this measure:—'It will strengthen the king's causes amongst the judges, for my Lord Coke will think himself near a privy counsellor's place, and thereupon turn obsequious.' 'The remove of my Lord Coke to a place of less profit . . . will be thought abroad a kind of discipline to him for opposing himself in the king's causes, the example whereof will contain others in more awe.' (Bacon's Works [Montagu], vii. 340.) His craft succeeded; Coke was promoted to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench on October 25, 1613, and was sworn of the privy council on November 4. He received a sincerer and more welcome compliment in the following June, by his unanimous and unsought election as steward of the University of Cambridge. At the beginning of the reign he had obtained for the university the privilege of sending two members to parliament. (Seward's Anecdotes, iii. 390.)

Coke was not more 'obsequious' in his new office than he had been in his old. Some portion of his uncomplying conduct may perhaps be attributable to his being brought frequently into collision with Bacon, now attorney-general, whom he despised, and whom he could not but consider as a watchful spy on his conduct, and a delighted talebearer of his supposed lapses. In Bacon's letters to the king his offences are carefully reported. The infamous case of Peacham was the first of these. The king having desired to have the private opinion of the judges whether Peacham could be convicted of treason, Bacon undertook to procure it. Coke, however, told him 'that this auricular taking of opinions, single and apart, was new and dangerous;' but on being pressed that the other judges had given theirs, he consented; and, to Bacon's disappointment, it was in writing, and was apparently against the prosecution. (Johnson's Life, i. 246.) Notwithstanding the infinite pains he took in regard to the murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury, he offended also on those trials by some mysterious and indiscreet expressions he used in the course of them. In their progress he not only repeated his flattery of the king, but resumed the coarse invectives in which he had formerly indulged, degrading the seat of justice by telling Mrs. Turner before the verdict was given that 'she had the seven deadly sins—viz., a whore, a bawd, a sorcerer, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer.' Guilty as the parties undoubtedly were, Coke conducted the trials most unfairly, and the daily letters that passed between James and him on the subject of them are in strong contrast with his former protest against giving auricular opinions. (Great Case of Poisoning, 360-420.)

But the immediate causes that appeared to determine the court to remove him were his independent refusal to submit to its interference in the case of Commendams, and his more doubtful denial of the power of the Court of Chancery. In the first case, the legality of Commendams having been incidentally disputed by a counsel in his argument in a private cause, the king's pleasure was signified to the judges that they should not go on with the case till they had first consulted his majesty. But the judges thought it their duty, this being only a dispute between party and party, to proceed notwithstanding the king's mandate: and all the twelve signed a letter to the king, stating their reasons and justifying their conduct. They were immediately summoned before the council, and, being reprimanded by the king, they all fell down on their knees, and acknowledged their error, except Coke, who defended the letter; and upon further interrogation, whether they would stay their proceedings on a future command, Coke said, 'When the case should be, he would do that which should be fit for a judge to do.' (Bacon's Works, vii. 307-338.)

In the other case, Coke had not only resisted the power of the Court of Chancery to touch any cause which had been decided in the courts of common law, but had encouraged indictments being presented against all who had been concerned in a case where relief in equity had been applied for, including the counsel and solicitor to the parties, and even the master in Chancery to whom it had been referred. The question was taken up by the king, whose decision, confirming the Court of Chancery in all the powers which it claimed, is acted on to this day.

On both of these occasions Bacon's hand is visible. In the case of the Commendams he enlarges, in his letter to the king, on Coke's contempt; and in the Chancery question he dwells on the time chosen for pressing the indictments, 'that which all men condemn—the supposed last day of my lord chancellor's life,' as if that was the power of the chief justice to see. The result of all this 'turbulent carriage' as the king called it, was, that on June 1616, he was sequestered from the court, and ordered to 'forbear to sit the summer circuit.' This was soon followed by his removal from office, his departure from which, on November 15, he describes by one contemporary letter-writer 'received with dejection and tears; another describes him as bearing his fortunes well,' and as retiring 'with applause.'

On Coke's receiving a hint that compliance with a private job of Bacon would prevent his dismissal, he was tempted, saying, 'A judge must not take a bribe or take a bribe.' His friend Sir Henry Montagu, sent him a purse to purchase the collar of SS: but Coke answered that 'he would not part with it but leave it to his posterity.'

might one day know that they had a chief justice to their ancestor.'

Bacon, while this was in agitation, had the meanness to address a letter to Coke, in which, with an ungenerous and malicious pen, he describes the character of the chief justice. Whatever truth there is in this delineation, who must not wish it painted by another hand, and at another time?

An epigram, by Ben Jonson (Gifford, viii. 430), written about the same time, is a better proof of the estimation in which Coke was then held by his contemporaries as a lawyer and a judge, and affords some evidence that players were not inimical to him, nor he to them. And Milton (Works, ii. 218), years after, thus speaks of him, in a sonnet addressed to his grandson, Cyriac Skinner:—

Cyriac, whose grandsire on the royal bench
Of British Themis, with no mean applause,
Pronounc'd and in his volumes taught our laws,
Which others at their bar so often wrench.

Coke, at the time of his dismissal, was commanded to expunge and retract 'such novelties and errors and offensive conceits as were dispersed in his "Reports."' But he showed that there were no more errors in his 500 cases than in a few cases of Plowden, and delivered in a paper explaining other points. This frivolous enquiry, however, soon ceased, and, though he was not replaced in his judicial seat, he was received into a certain degree of favour. Bacon also, who had become lord keeper, was sharply rebuked by the king on Coke's account, and was nearly losing the friendship of Buckingham for opposing the marriage of Coke's daughter by Lady Hatton with the earl's brother, Sir John Villiers, afterwards Lord Purbeck. This marriage Coke had evidently negotiated for the purpose of securing the interest of Buckingham, and thus furthering his return to court. In this he was partially successful, being restored to the council table in September 1617, and appointed, on July 21. 1618, one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high treasurer. (Pell Records, 211.) During three years he was employed in various commissions, and his assistance was required in the Star Chamber in all cases of difficulty; but he received no substantial proof of the renewal of the royal confidence.

He had not been in parliament since 1583, the office of attorney-general disqualifying him from sitting in the House of Commons in 1597, 1601, and 1604, and during the short parliament of 1614 he was chief justice. But when James summoned that of 1621 Coke was again eligible, and was accordingly returned for the borough of Liskeard in Cornwall. His parliamentary career may be truly said to have then commenced, his mouth being no longer stopped by the silence imposed upon him by his former office of speaker. He at once distinguished himself by taking a prominent part against monopolies, patents, and other grievances, and was one of the principal movers against Sir Giles Mompesson. In the impeachment of his old enemy Bacon, he did not, though one of the managers, actively interfere, nor in the other trials which then took place; but on the adjournment in June he is said to have stood up 'with tears in his eyes,' and to have 'recited the collect for the king and his issue, adding only to it, "and defend them from their cruel enemies."' When the house met again in November it immediately proceeded on the Spanish match and the supply for the palatinate, and Coke was made chairman of a committee to consider these and other subjects. A remonstrance and petition to the king being resolved on, Coke spoke strongly in their support. He made a bold stand also for the privileges of the house, and the protestation, which was then carried, so offended the king that with his own hand he tore it out of the journals. The parliament was again adjourned on December 18, and on January 6, 1621-2, was dissolved by a proclamation enlarging on the 'cunning diversions' of 'some ill-tempered spirits who sowed tares among the corn.' In the interim between the adjournment and the dissolution several of these 'ill-tempered spirits' were visited with the vengeance of the court. Coke had made himself a special mark for the royal indignation. The council debated on the means of excluding him from the general pardon at the end of the year; he was sent to the Tower on December 27; his papers were seized, and prosecutions were commenced against him on trumped-up and frivolous charges. His incarceration lasted seven months, at first without intercourse with his family or friends, and even when he obtained his discharge in August 1622, the king said 'he was the fittest instrument for a tyrant that ever was in the realm of England,' and ordered him to confine himself to his mansion at Stoke Pogis. Yonge, in his Diary (p. 62), records that 'the great cause concerning the Lord Coke, for 50,000*l.*, followed in the king's behalf in the Court of Wards, is adjudged for my Lord Coke by the three chief judges and Justice Doderidge.'

In the new parliament which necessity compelled James to call in February 1623-4 Coke took his seat as member for Coventry. The questions on which he seemed mostly to interest himself were the Spanish match, the means of recovering the palatinate, and the impeachment of the Earl of Middlesex, on each of which he managed the conferences with the House of Lords. The session closed on May 29, and King James died on the 27th of the following March.

In the first parliament of Charles, Coke, who was chosen by his native county, at first dissuaded the house from renewing the committee for grievances, advising a petition for the king's answer to the former application; but afterwards he opposed the grant of a supply without a redress of grievances. This demand, and an evident preparation to bring charges against the Duke of Buckingham, led to a hasty dissolution on August 12, 1625, and to an endeavour to prevent the most unruly members from sitting in the next parliament, which Charles was necessitated to call in the month of February following, by nominating them sheriffs of the counties in which they resided. Coke was made sheriff of Buckinghamshire, but was elected member for Norfolk; and, notwithstanding a message from the king, no new writ was issued, though, in consequence of the parliament being dissolved before his sheriffalty expired, he did not take his seat. Two years elapsed before the third parliament was called, when Coke was returned for two counties, Buckingham and Suffolk, choosing the former because he resided there. It met on March 17, 1628, and in the first session, which ended on June 26, and was the last in which he took any part in public affairs, he advocated the liberty of the subject with an energy that was surprising in a man who had attained the age of seventy-eight. He suggested, and succeeded in carrying, the famous Petition of Right, in the conferences with the Lords being one of the principal managers, and overcoming, by his arguments and perseverance, all the objections and impediments raised against it. In the violent proceedings of the second session of this parliament he took no part; but, retiring to his seat at Stoke Pogis, he occupied the five remaining years of his life in publishing that celebrated work on which his fame is permanently established — 'The First Institute, or Commentary on Littleton,'—and in preparing for the press the three other volumes of the Institutes, treating respectively on Magna Charta, on Criminal Law, and on the Jurisdiction of the Courts. These, with his will and fifty-one other manuscripts, were seized while he was on his death-bed, by an order of the privy council, made by the peremptory direction of King Charles nearly three years before (Cal. St. Papers [1629], 490), under the pretence of searching for seditious papers, and were not published till seven years afterwards, when, by a vote of parliament, they were delivered up to his son. Four years before his decease, one Nicholas Jeffes was indicted and fined in the King's Bench for writing a petition wherein he said that Lord Chief Justice Coke was a traitor. (State Trials, iii. 1375.)

He died on September 3, 1633, being then nearly eighty-two years of age, and was buried in the church of Tittleshall, in Norfolk, in which a marble monument, bearing his effigy at full length, is erected to his memory.

Besides the four books of Institutes, he published eleven volumes of Reports, to which two other volumes were added many years after his death, but not finished or prepared by him for publication. The first part came out in 1600, when he was in the height of his professional fame, and attorney-general to Queen Elizabeth. The others followed in quick succession till the eleventh, published in 1615, about a year before he was deprived of his office of chief justice of the King's Bench by James—an example of perseverance and indefatigable industry which no one occupied as he was with judicial and political duties, and harassed by domestic broils, could have exhibited, had not a cold-blooded temperament made him indifferent to the one, and a habit of early rising enabled him to overcome the other. They are distinguished in Westminster Hall by the name of 'The Reports,' and his jealous enemy, Bacon, is obliged to say of them, 'Had it not been for Sir Edward Coke's reports . . . the law by this time had been almost like a ship without ballast, for that the cases of modern experience are fled from those that are adjudged and ruled in former time.' For some law tracts, also, of minor importance, but of great learning, the profession was indebted to him. They were not published till after his death, and are now, from the alterations in practice, become obsolete.

The early portion of Coke's life was not distinguished from that of any other advocate, except by his deeper studies and more extensive and successful practice. His reputation he attained for legal knowledge pointed him out without a rival for office of solicitor-general, which he filled the age of forty. In less than two years succeeded as attorney-general, and during the twelve years that he held that office raised it to an importance it had never before acquired, and which it has ever preserved. The coarseness and brutality of his language, both at the bar and on the bench, will ever leave a stigma on his memory; but it may be observed that ebullitions occurred till his rival Bacon began, whose underhand endeavours to supplant and annoy him evidently to exacerbate his temper, which was naturally good; and some of his violent and indecent exhibitions—towards Bacon in particular, who was supposed to be friend—may, perhaps, be traced to that influence. His pride and arrogance, however, cannot be doubted, and to them it may be attributed, together with the coldness of his nature and his retired habits, that his biographers record no friendly intimacies, and that fewer sayings of his are repeated than of any person who held so prominent a position in public life. In his station as a judge, which he occupied for ten years, he shone with the brightest lustre; and, making some allowance for his equivocal conduct with regard to Overbury's murderers, he deserves great praise for his resistance of royal interference, and for upholding the independence of the bench. Judge Whitelocke (Liber Famelicus) gives testimony of his freedom from the prevailing vice of the time. 'Never was man,' he says, 'so just, so upright, so free from corrupt solicitations of great men and friends, as he was. Never put counsellors that practised before him to annual pensions of money or plate to have his favour. In all causes before him the counsel might assure his client from the danger of bribery.' By his subsequent career in parliament, and his energetic advocacy of liberal measures, he would have gained the admiration and applause of the world, were it not for the opinion, by some entertained, that his opposition to the court savoured too much of personal discontent and disappointed ambition. This mixed feeling has prevented him from being a popular character, and has led men to doubt his judgment and to deny his authority in matters unconnected with his profession; so that many, who allow his merit as a great lawyer and an incorrupt judge, refuse to acknowledge his claims as a disinterested patriot, or as an estimable man.

Against his private character even his enemies could bring no charge; but the contentions with his second wife, which did not terminate till his death, do not speak well for the temper of either. If his division of the hours of the day, 'Quatuor orabis,' was the rule of his life, he must be allowed to have been a pious man. Of his friendship to the Church he gave many proofs in his settlement of ecclesiastical property, and in his careful selection in the distribution of the patronage attached to his estates. With regard to the first, he threatened a nobleman, who was applying for some lands belonging to the see of Norwich, to put on his cap and gown again and plead in support of its rights; and as to the last he was wont to say that 'he would have Church livings pass by livery and seisin, not by bargain and sale.' He was liberal in his entertainments, but moderate in his household; and when a great man came to dinner without previously informing him, his common saying was, 'Sir, since you have sent me no notice of your coming, you must dine with me; but if I had known it in due time, I would have dined with you.'

Sir Edward, by his first wife, Bridget Paston, had seven sons and three daughters. The succession to the family estates fell finally on Robert, the grandson of Henry, his fifth son. Robert's grandson, Thomas, was created Baron Lovel in 1728, and Viscount Coke and Earl of Leicester in 1744; but, the earl leaving no surviving issue, the titles became extinct in 1759. The estates then devolving on Wenman Roberts, Esq., the son of the earl's sister, Anne, that gentleman assumed the name of Coke, and his son, Thomas William Coke, for many years the representative of Norfolk in parliament, was at last, in 1837, created Viscount Coke and Earl of Leicester, titles which are now borne by his eldest son.

Clement, the sixth son of the chief justice, was the father of Edward Coke of Longford, who obtained a baronetcy in 1641, which became extinct in 1727. (Many of these dates and facts are taken from Coke's 'Vade Mecum,' as he calls the interleaved copy of Littleton's 'Tenures,' written by himself, and extracted in the 'Collectanea Topographica et Genealogica,' by the late John Bruce, Esq.)

COKEFIELD, JOHN DE, so called from a place of that name in Suffolk, and probably connected with a powerful family seated there, is first recorded on a fine levied at Michaelmas 1256, 40 Henry III., and on others till the following Michaelmas, in which latter year he was added to the justices itinerant into the county of Suffolk. After that time payments were made for assizes to be taken before him, commencing in August 1258, 42 Henry III., and ending in June 1259. A long interval of eleven years then occurs, no payments being made for assizes before him till May 1270, 54 Henry III., after which they are frequent till May 1272. During this latter period he had a grant of 40*l.* a year for his support, according to Dugdale, as a justice of the King's Bench. His death is recorded on the Close Roll of 56 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fm. ii. 286-573.)

COKEFIELD, ROBERT DE, or KOKEFIELD, holding a high position in Yorkshire, was selected in 9 Henry III. as one of the justices itinerant for that county. He was constable of the castles of Scarborough and Pickering, for the custody of which he had a salary of two hundred marks per annum. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77, 107, 117.) From 1226, 10 Henry III., to 1229, the sheriffalty of the county was entrusted to him, and he was excused 150*l.* which remained due from him for the profits of the county. He married Nichole, the daughter of Jordan de Sancta-Maria, by Alice, the daughter, or sister, of Geoffrey Hagot. (Archæol. xxx. 485.)

COLEPEPER, JOHN. The Colepepers were of a very ancient Kentish family, which in the reign of Edward III. separated into two branches, one settled at Bay Hall, near Pepenbury, from which descended Baron Colepeper, master of the Rolls in the time of Charles I.; and the other seated at Preston Hall, near Aylesford, to which John Colepeper this judge belonged.

His grandfather was Sir Jeffrey Colepeper, who was sheriff of Kent in 40 Edward III., and his father's name was William. John is first reported in 4 Henry IV., as being appointed a king's serjeant, and as one of that degree who advanced 100*l.* each on loan to the king. (Acts Privy Council, i. 202.) On June 7, 1406, 7 Henry IV., he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, and received a new patent on the accession of Henry V. He died in 1414, and was buried in the church of West Peckham, which manor, together with those of Oxenhoath and of Swanton Court, he gave to the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem.

By his wife Catherine he left a son, William, to whose lineal descendant a baronetcy was granted in 1627, which became extinct in 1723.

COLEPEPER, JOHN (LORD COLEPEPER), was of the same family from one branch of which the preceding judge descended. He was the son of a knight of the same name, living at Wigsell in Sussex; and he spent some years in foreign parts, doing good service as a soldier, and reputed to be of great courage, but of a rough nature, his hot temper leading him too frequently into quarrels and duels. When he married he settled in the county of his ancestors, where he soon became popular among his neighbours, and, in consequence of the knowledge of business which he exhibited, and the ability with which he conducted it, he was frequently deputed by them to the council board, and at length was knighted, and elected member for Kent in the Long Parliament.

Within a week after its meeting he summed up in an eloquent speech the grievances of his country, concluding thus: 'One grievance more, which compriseth many: it is a nest of wasps, or swarm of vermin, which have overcrept the land; I mean the monopolies and polers of the people. These, like the frogs of Egypt, have gotten possession of our dwellings, and we scarce have a room free from them. They sup in our cup. They dip in our dish. They sit by our fire. We find them in the dye-vat, wash-bowl, and powdering-tub. They share with the butler in his box. They have marked and sealed us from head to foot. Mr. Speaker, they will not bate us a pin. We may not buy our own clothes without their brogke. These are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard that it is almost become hectical.' (Rushworth, ii. 917.)

The king, sensible of his value, admitted him of his privy council, and on January 6, 1642, made him chancellor of the Exchequer. (Rymer, xx. 516.) During that eventful year he, with the assistance of Lord Falkland and Edward Hyde, though sometimes disconcerted by the king's hasty measures, did what he could to serve his majesty. He acquired great influence, but his counsels were not always very wise or temperate. To his advice is attributed the king's consent to pass the bill for removing the bishops from the House of Peers, the transference of the court from Windsor to York, and the attempt to obtain possession of Hull. After the royal standard had been set up at Nottingham, Colepeper was one of the bearers of the king's message to the Commons, with an offer to treat, so as to prevent the effusion of blood and the miseries of civil war. He must have anticipated the answer, from the manner in which he was received by the house. They would not permit him to take his seat as a member, but obliged him to deliver his message at the bar, and then withdraw. (White-locke, 61.)

On January 28, 1643, he was promoted to the mastership of the Rolls, an office for which his previous education had in too degree prepared him. He took it as adding to his dignity and profit, without regard to its accustomed duties, for in those troubled times there was less need of lawyers than of counsellors and soldiers. As a counsellor he was used on the most private occasions and was added to the junto which, as cabinet council, managed the king's affairs as a soldier, he was ever by the king's side and took part in all his battles with most distinguished bravery.

In reward for these services, the king, October 14, 1644, created him a peer, title of Lord Colepeper, of Thoresway colnshire, and named him of the county the Duke of York. At the beginning next year he was one of the commissioners on the part of the king in the treaty of Uxbridge. A very unwelcome commencement was made by the parliament's refusing to recognise the Colepeper, or the titles of any of which had passed the Great Seal. Lord Lyttelton had sent it to the commissioners, who wasted their time especially in religious discussions; the treaty was ultimately broken off by calamitous events which followed. Colepeper was zealously and ably engaged in serving the king at the battle of Marston, and was killed there. Charles, the latter of whom, in accompanied to Paris to join the queen. From this time he was the constant companion of the prince in his wanderings; and while at the Hague, in 1648, he had a serious quarrel with Prince Rupert, who was strongly prejudiced against him, which, but for Hyde's interference, might have led to a fatal result. When Prince Charles became king by the tragic death of his father, he sent Lord Colepeper to Russia, to obtain money to supply his necessities; and the mission resulted in the czar granting 60,000*l.* in rich commodities.

At the Restoration he accompanied the king to England, and resumed his place of master of the Rolls; but he was not destined long to enjoy it, for within little more than a month after his landing in England he was seized with an illness, of which he died on July 11, 1660. He was buried in the church of Hollingbourn in Kent, in which and the neighbouring parish the family property, including Leeds Castle, was situate.

Lord Clarendon, though evidently jealous of his ascendancy over Charles I., and certainly not prepossessed in his favour, gives him full credit as well for his great parts, ready wit, and universal understandings, as for his sufficiency in council, his courage in the field, and his devoted fidelity. His letter to the chancellor, just after Cromwell's death, as to the counsels to be pursued, and the probable course of General Monk, confirms the opinion of his wisdom, and seems to be dictated by prophetic inspiration. (Seward, iv. 388.)

By his first wife, Philippa, daughter of — Snelling, Esq., he had one son, who died young. His second wife, who was his cousin, Judith, daughter of Sir Thomas Colepeper, of Hollingbourn, knight, brought him four sons, the three elder of whom enjoyed the title in succession, which then, for want of male issue, became extinct in 1725. (Baronage, ii. 472.)

COLERIDGE, JOHN TAYLOR (a lately retired judge), belongs to a family the name of which never occurs without associations of intellectual eminence—whether as poet, philosopher, biographer, scholar, ecclesiastic, or jurist. In the foremost rank of these, as a scholar and a lawyer, must be placed this retired judge.

John Taylor Coleridge was born at Tiverton on July 9, 1790. His grandfather was vicar of the parish of Ottery St. Mary in Devonshire, and master of the grammar school there. His father was Captain James Coleridge, who retired from the army soon after his marriage with Frances Duke Taylor, the daughter of one of the coheiresses of the family of Duke of Otterton and Power Hayes, one of the most ancient in the county of Devon. After receiving an excellent training from his uncle, the Rev. George Coleridge, then master of the school at Ottery St. Mary, young Coleridge, in June 1803, went to Eton, where he acquired a considerable reputation.

In April 1809 he was elected to a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where his career was most triumphant. In 1810 he won the chancellor's Latin verse prize, the subject being 'Pyramides Ægyptiacæ.' In 1812 he was placed alone in the first class for classics, and in the same year he was elected fellow of Exeter College and Vinerian law scholar. In 1813 he won the chancellor's prizes for prose composition, both in English and Latin, the former having for its subject 'Etymology,' and the latter 'The Moral Effects of the Censor's Office in Rome.' Since the foundation of these prizes it has only happened three times that they both have been gained by one man in the same year, the three conquerors being Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Keble, and Dr. Milman; and on each occasion the chancellor (Lord Grenville) testified his pleasure and approbation by adding to the prizes the gift of a costly and valuable classic. In 1852 the university presented to him the honorary degree of D.C.L.

In the same year in which he was elected Vinerian law scholar he entered the Middle Temple; and, after practising for a short time as a certificated special pleader, he was called to the bar on June 26, 1819, having in the preceding year married Mary, daughter of the Rev. Dr. Buchanan, rector of Woodmanstone in Surrey. For more than fifteen years he was a regular attendant on the Western Circuit, and, though he had for his competitors such eminent men as Serjeant Wilde (afterwards Lord Truro), Sir William Follett, Chief Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Erskine, and Mr. Justice Crowder, he obtained considerable success. As he expresses himself in one of his future lectures, 'The law was not a hard mistress to him, and did not allow him long to languish without business, nor suffer him to be without hope.' During this period he had been appointed, in 1827, a commissioner of bankruptcy; and in 1832 the corporation of Exeter elected him their recorder; the offer of a similar honour from both the boroughs of Southmolton and Barnstaple having been declined by him. In February 1832 he was raised to the dignity of the coif, and when, in April 1834, the attempt was made, under the warrant of King William IV., to open the Court of Common Pleas to all barristers, he, with the other serjeants-at-law, was supposed to be compensated by receiving a patent of precedence, giving him rank after the existing king's counsel.

Engaged as he was in his legal occupations, Mr. Coleridge never deserted his literary pursuits. He contributed occasionally to the 'Quarterly Review,' and on the retirement of its editor, William Gifford, he for one year (1824) undertook the post, but at the end of it, finding that its labours interfered too much with his professional practice, he resigned it into the able management of the late Mr. Lockhart. To professional literature he supplied an excellent edition of 'Blackstone's Commentaries' in 1825.

Mr. Coleridge was soon called upon to take the position which all allowed he was the most competent to fill. On January 27, 1835, he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench, by the recommendation of Lord Lyndhurst, and knighted. For more than three-and-twenty years he administered justice on that bench and on the different circuits in a manner which was most eloquently and truthfully described in the affectionate language of the bar, as expressed by their spokesman, the attorney-general (Sir Fitzroy Kelly, now chief baron of the Exchequer), on June 28, 1858, the day of his retirement. He was immediately admitted to a seat in the privy council, and to be a member of its judicial committee. On the sittings of that tribunal he has ever since regularly attended.

That his character and merits were appreciated most highly by those in power has been fully proved by the varied services that have been required of him. He was selected as a member of many important commissions. Among them was that in 1834, to enquire into the arrangements of the inns of court and Chancery for promoting the study of the law and jurisprudence; that in 1858, to enquire into the expediency of bringing into one neighbourhood the different courts of justice; besides the Oxford University Commission, which sat for four years, and the Education Commission, which sat for three.

In the devotion of his services to the public he has not been unmindful of private and local calls. On his resignation he retired to Heath's Court, Ottery St. Mary, the house in which his father resided, and devoted a good portion of his leisure to the charitable and educational establishments of the county, and by several interesting and amusing lectures (none of them more so than his 'Recollections of the Circuit') delivered to various literary societies, encouraged the efforts to promote rational enjoyment among all classes. The internal restoration of the beautiful priory church in his neighbourhood has been completely effected by his liberality and exertions.

Of Sir John Coleridge's six children, four still survive, the eldest of whom, Sir John Duke Coleridge, is following his father's footsteps in the law, and is now solicitor-general and M.P. for Exeter.

COLEVILL, GILBERT DE, appears on one occasion only in a fine of 28 Henry II. as being present in the King's Court at Westminster when it was acknowledged. (Madox, i. 113; Hunter's Preface, p. xii.) As he is not again mentioned in a judicial character, it is possible that he merely held some official post there which required his attendance.

COLEVILLE, HENRY DE, was employed in 18 Henry III. to assess the tallage in Cambridge and Huntingdon, and was twice appointed sheriff for those counties—in 21 Henry III., when he held the office for six years; and again in 34 Henry III., when he held it for two. (Madox, i. 735, ii. 169.) In 1252 he acted as justice itinerant for Berkshire, Oxford, and Northampton, and in the following year for Cambridge, Huntingdon, Essex, and Hertford. (Abb. Placit. 141.) Whether either of the two belonged to the noble family of Coleville in Yorkshire is uncertain.

COLNEYE, WILLIAM DE, represented Robert de Tateshal in a suit the subject of a petition to the parliament in 18 Edward I., and on the accession of Edward II. he was summoned to the coronation, and to the next two parliaments, his place in the lists being low among those of the legal profession. He was returned as member for Norfolk, and when the justices of assize were appointed for that and the four neighbouring counties in 1310 he was the last of the three who were then nominated. His name does not appear after the next year, but that of his son Ralph is mentioned in 8 Edward II. in which he certified that he was one of the lords of Scottow and Lammus with Little Hautboys. (Rot. Parl. i. 37; Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 708; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 21, 246.)

COLTMAN, THOMAS, was descended from an old and respectable family in the county of Lincoln, where they enjoyed considerable possessions. He was the youngest son of John Coltman, Esq., then resident at Beverley, and was born on July 1781, but ultimately succeeded to the paternal estate. His education was commenced at the Charterhouse in London, from which he proceeded to Rugby, where he obtained an exhibition, and in 1799 removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in January 1803, and in 1805 he gained the 'ribbon' of the university by being a fellow of his college.

Entering the Inner Temple, he was under the tuition of that eminent pleader Mr. Tidd, that mastery of the law which enabled so many of that generation of pupils to rise to high distinction.

to the bar in 1808, he attended the sessions at Manchester, and joined the Northern Circuit, in which he secured so considerable a share of business that eventually in 1832 he was appointed a king's counsel.

On February 24, 1837, he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, receiving the customary honour of knighthood. In that court he remained for the last twelve years of his life, performing his duties in that quiet and calm manner which does not attract the 'million,' but which greatly assisted and was highly appreciated by his colleagues, who, in the language of a graceful tribute to his memory published by one of them (Lord Wensleydale) soon after his death, 'knew and admired his dispassionate, candid, and just mind; his clear, acute, and strong understanding; his sound and accurate knowledge of the law; his even temper, patience, and firmness; his care and skill in investigating cases; his excellent judgment in deciding them.' Though somewhat slow in forming his opinions, they were always to be relied on, and, though not brilliant or dashing, he was essentially a just and right-minded judge.

He fell a victim to the Asiatic cholera at his house in Hyde Park Gardens on July 11, 1849, leaving four children by his wife, Anna, sister of Samuel Duckworth, Esq., master in Chancery.

COLUMBIERS, GILBERT DE, or COLUMBARIIS, was of a Norman family. He is mentioned only once by Madox (i. 131) as a justice itinerant into Wiltshire on the roll of 23 Henry II., 1177. He held a fourth part of a knight's fee in England of William de Roumare; and Philip de Columbiere, probably his son, was fermor of the forest of Roumare, in Normandy, in 1180. (Rot. Scacc. Normannia, ii. clx.)

COLUMBIERS, MATTHEW DE, is confounded by Dugdale (Baronage, i. 633) with three others of the same name and family flourishing about the same time. It seems probable that he was the son of Michael, the brother of another Matthew, by his wife Avicia, daughter of Elias Croc.

In 44 Henry III. he was constituted governor of the castle of Salisbury, and soon after joined the rebellious barons, by whom, after the battle of Lewes, he was made governor of Rockingham Castle. He availed himself of the Dictum de Kenilworth to make his peace, and was appointed warden of the forests south of the Trent. Although Dugdale introduces him as an ordinary justice itinerant in 53 Henry III., 1208, it seems more probable that his duties on that occasion were confined to the trial of pleas of the forest, as well on account of his above-mentioned appointment as because the commission was headed by Roger de Clifford, the chief justice of the forests. If Dug-dale's statement, that this Matthew died in 1 Edward I., be correct, which is not improbable (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 53), there must have been still another Matthew, who was chief assessor in Hampshire of the fifteenth granted in 3 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 3), and one of the king's butlers in the following year, to whom was committed in the sixth year the office of one of the king's chamberlains, and of gauger of the wines sold in England. (Devon's Issues Exch. iii. 92; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 31.) He was a justice itinerant of the forests in 8 Edward I., 1280, and his death is recorded in 10 Edward I., when his brother Michael did homage for the lands he held in capite. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 41.) To make the difficulty still greater, there is among the records a roll entitled 'Compotus Mathæi de Columbariis Camerarii vinorum,' from Michaelmas at the end of the ninth year to the same feast in the thirteenth; and a Matthew is again mentioned as king's butler in 18 Edward I. (2 Report, Public Records, App. ii. 55; Cal. Rot. Pat. 54.)

COMYNS, JOHN, was born about the year 1667. His father, William Comyns, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, was descended from a family of that name seated at Dagenham in Essex; and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of Matthew Rudd, of Little Baddow in the same county. Their son was educated in Queens' College, Cambridge, and became a student in his father's inn in May 1683, where he took his degree of barrister in May 1690. Elected member of the House of Commons in the last parliament of William III. for Malden, he represented that borough (except from 1708 to 1710) till 1726, when he was promoted to the bench.

As a lawyer he early laid the foundation of that character for learning and industry which he ultimately attained. The first case in his Reports is dated so soon as Hilary Term 1695. His reputation was soon established, and in 1706 he was summoned to the degree of serjeant. He travelled the Home Circuit, and in 1719 he was counsel for the defence in the absurd prosecution for vagrancy instituted against a clergyman for preaching a charity sermon at Chislehurst in behalf of the poor children of a parish in London, four or five of them being present.

Notwithstanding his high repute as a lawyer, it was not till twenty years after he assumed the coif that he was promoted to the bench. On November 7, 1726, he was appointed a baron of the Exchequer, where he remained upwards of nine years, when he removed to the Common Pleas in January 1736. Two years and a half after this he was promoted, on July 7, 1738, to the head of the Court of Exchequer, where his presidency lasted little more than two years, his death occurring, at the age of seventy-three, on November 13, 1740. He was buried at Writtle, near Chelmsford, where is a monumental inscription to him, surmounted by his bust. (State Trials, xv. 1412; Lord Raymond, 1420; Comyns' Reports, 587.)

The two works, the labour of his life, on which his fame as one of the greatest lawyers of his time is permanently established, did not see the light till some years after his death. His Reports, which terminate in his last year, were first published in 1744, and his 'Digest of the Laws of England' was delayed till 1762. By the unanimous assent of the most eminent men in the profession, the latter is acknowledged to be the most accurate, methodical, and comprehensive abridgment of the law, profound in its learning and easy of reference to the authorities cited.

Sir John married three times. His first wife was Anne, daughter and coheir of Dr. Nathaniel Gurdon, rector of Chelmsford; his second was Elizabeth, daughter of — Courthope, of Kent; and his third was Anne, daughter of — Wilbraham. Neither brought him any issue. (Moran's Essex, ii. 60; Gent. Mag. x. 571, lx. 390.)

CONINGSBY, HUMPHREY, whose ancestor was lord of the manor of Coningsby in Lincolnshire as early as the reign of King John, was the son of Thomas Coningsby, of Nene Solers in Shropshire, by his wife, the daughter and heir of — Waldyffe.

After pursuing his legal studies at the Inner Temple, he is mentioned as an advocate in the Year Books in 1480, and as being called to the degree of the coif at the end of Trinity Term 1494, 9 Henry VII. During the whole of that reign he had a considerable share of practice, and on October 30, 1500, was made one of the king's serjeants.

Within a month after the accession of Henry VIII.—viz., on May 21, 1509—he was placed in the King's Bench as sole puisne judge and was knighted. The number of judges was afterwards increased, and Sir Humphrey retained his place among them for a very extended period, his seat not appearing to be supplied till the middle of 1532.

He resided, and according to Clutterbuck (i. 444) was buried, at Aldenham in Hertfordshire, but that author evidently errs in dating his death in 1551. By his wife, who was a daughter of — Ferebie, of Lincolnshire, he left three sons and four daughters. William, his second son, was the next-mentioned judge; and one of the descendants of Thomas, his eldest son, was raised to the earldom of Coningsby in 1719, which is now extinct. (Chauncy, 461; Blomefield's Norfolk, vii. 413.)

CONINGSBY, WILLIAM, the second son of the above-named Humphrey, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, whither he went in 1497. He then became a member of the Inner Temple, where he was reader in Lent 1519, and again in Lent 1523. In 1516 he was in the commission for gaol delivery at King's Lynn, and was named in June 1529 a commissioner to assist Cardinal Wolsley in hearing causes in Chancery. He was recorder of Lynn, for which he sat in parliament in 1537, one of the prothonotaries of the Common Pleas, and attorney of the duchy of Lancaster, from the latter of which he was removed on February 1540 on being charged with counselling Sir John Shelton to make a fraudulent will of his lands, and committed to the Tower. That this charge was without foundation may be presumed from his being released in ten days, and being selected within five months to be a judge of the King's Bench, to which he was appointed on July 6, 1540. It would seem that he sat little more than four months, and that Edward Mervin succeeded him on November 20. (Dugdale's Orig. 163, 172; Rymer, xiv. 738.)

He resided in the Woollen Market in Lynn, and at Eston Hall, Wallington, Norfolk. By his wife, a daughter of — Thursby, of that county, he had an only son, Christopher, who was killed at Musselburgh in Scotland. (Ath. Cantab. 76.)

CONSTANTIIS, WALTER DE (ARCHBISHOP OF ROUEN), was a canon of Rouen, and held a responsible post in the Curia Regis under Henry II., but whether as chancellor or vice-chancellor it would be difficult to define.

In 1175 he was raised to the archdeaconry of Oxford; in 1176 he had an allowance of fifty marks for providing for the ambassadors of the King of Sicily, when they came to demand Henry's second daughter, Jane, in marriage; and in 1178 he accounted for the proceeds of the abbey of Wilton and Ramsay, and of the house of Arundel, then in the king's hands, which he had been appointed curator of. (Madox, i. 201, 367, ii. 252.) On none of these occasions is any official title ascribed to his name.

He held the living of Woolpit, belonging to the abbey of St. Edmunds, until 1183, when he was elected Bishop of Exeter, from which see he was promoted the following year to the archbishopric of Rouen. In 1186 he was one of the ambassadors to King Philip of France, succeeded in obtaining a truce with the monarch; and in 1189 he and the Archbishop of Canterbury, were appointed umpires to decide the disputes between them.

On Henry's death he invested Richard, in the cathedral of Rouen, with the sword of Normandy; and attending him into England, assisted at his coronation, and was present at the council held at the abbey of Pipewell. He accompanied that king on his progress to the Holy Land, but returned to England in February 1191, escorting Queen Eleanor on her departure from Sicily. He brought with him a letter from King Richard, appointing him the head of the council for the rule of the kingdom; but a doubt has been raised as to its authenticity, from its not having been produced till some months after his arrival in England. Longchamp, however, was dismissed in October 1191, and the Archbishop of Rouen, by virtue not only of this letter, but of the appointment of Prince John and the barons, was constituted chief justiciary.

Warned, perhaps, by the example of his predecessor, he was moderate in the exercise of his office, and cautious to avoid undertaking any important act without the advice of the barons and the consent of his associated council. (Madox, i. 220.)

When Richard's place of confinement was discovered, and the terms of his enlargement were settled, Walter de Constantiis was summoned to attend him in Germany, and his place of chief justiciary was, in September 1193, conferred on Hubert Walter, the new Archbishop of Canterbury. He accompanied Queen Eleanor with the king's ransom, paid it to the emperor at Mentz, and procured Richard's liberation.

In 1196 a contest arose between Walter and King Richard, in consequence of the latter interfering with some of the property of the church of Rouen. The archbishop thereupon placed Normandy under an interdict, which produced such horrible confusion in the country that Richard, unable to relieve the inhabitants by any other means, was compelled to appeal to Rome. By the pope's interposition the interdict was removed, and a convention was made between the king and the archbishop, exchanging the land in dispute for certain other property and privileges, no doubt greatly to the advantage of the Church. (Nicolas's Chronology, 303.)

On the accession of King John he performed the ceremony of investiture to the dukedom of Normandy in the church of Rouen, as he had previously done to his royal brother; and in the course of that reign his active life was terminated.

Richard of Devizes (27, 31, 45) wrote near his time, and was too much of a partisan, to warrant his readers in placing entire credence on the hypocritical character which he ascribes to the archbishop. On the contrary, his conduct seems to have been guided by prudence and discretion, and not to have been deficient in firmness and courage. A strong proof of the latter would be shown by the admonition which, according to Brompton, he gave to King Richard against the indulgence of his three vices—pride, avarice, and lust; which produced the monarch's jesting reply, that he would give the first to the Templars, the second to the monks, and the third to the bishops. Other writers, however, attribute the rebuke to another divine. (Godwin, 286; Wendover, ii. 435, iii. 2-138; Lord Lyttelton's Henry II. iii. 441; Lingard, ii. 335.)

COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY (EARL OF SHAFTESBURY). The ancestors of this sagacious but versatile statesman were of a class of opulent gentry; but, from the frequent occurrence of the surname, his direct lineage cannot with certainty be traced beyond the reign of Henry VII. His great-great-grandfather, John Cooper, possessed estates in Sussex and Hants, and died in 1495. His great-grandfather Richard, designated Solutarius under Henry VIII., purchased Paulett in Somersetshire, and died in 1566. His grandfather John represented Whitchurch in parliament, and was knighted by Queen Elizabeth. On his death in 1610 he was succeeded by his son, also John, who was created a baronet in 1622, was member for Poole in 1628, and by his first marriage, with Anne, daughter and heir of Sir Anthony Ashley, of Wimborne St. Giles, Bart., became the father of two sons, the eldest of whom was the future lord chancellor.

Anthony Ashley Cooper was born at Wimborne St. Giles, on July 22, 1621, and, having lost his father in 1631, he inherited a large estate before he was ten years of age. From Puritan private tutors he received his early instruction, till, in Lent Term 1636, he was entered a fellow-commoner at Exeter College, Oxford. Under the tuition of Dr. Prideaux, the rector, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, he made such progress as to be accounted, according to the description of his eulogist, 'the most prodigious youth in the whole university.' By his own account he was more famous for putting an end to the 'ill custom of tucking freshmen,' and for preventing an alteration in 'the size of the beer.' (Shaftesbury Papers, 17.) Remaining at college about two years, he then, in consequence of lawsuits in which he was involved with some near relatives, caused himself to be admitted into the society of Lincoln's Inn, on February 18, 1638. His legal studies there were not interrupted till the commencement of the Great Rebellion, for though he was elected member for Tewkesbury in the parliament of April 1640, when he was not yet nineteen, his senatorial duties, during the short time it lasted, could not have been very onerous; and he was not admitted a member of the Long Parliament, which began its eventful sittings in the following November, although elected for Downton in Wiltshire by a double return, decided in his favour by the committee of privileges, that body having omitted, purposely, to report their decision to the house.

At the commencement of the contest between the king and the parliament Sir Anthony was a professed loyalist. In 1642 he acknowledges that he was with the king at Nottingham and Derby, adding evasively, 'but only as a spectator;' yet soon after he accepted a commission from the Marquis of Hertford, the king's general, to treat for the surrender of Dorchester and Weymouth. This he effected, and was thereupon made governor of the latter place, colonel of a regiment of foot, and captain of a troop of horse, both of which he raised at his own charge. And after Hertford's dismissal he received the king's confirmation in his government, and the appointments of high sheriff of Dorset and president of the council of war in those parts.

But the baronet's loyalty was not very deeply rooted. According to Clarendon, when it was thought necessary to substitute Colonel Ashburnham in his place as governor of Weymouth, he took such offence that he deserted his colours, and, immediately joining the other side, gave himself up 'body and soul to the service of the parliament, with an implacable animosity against the royal interest.' He himself says in his autobiography that, notwithstanding a flattering letter from the king, he resigned his government and came away to the parliament, 'resolving to cast himself on God, and to follow the dictates of a good conscience.' Mr. Locke gives a somewhat different account of the cause of his defection; but the uncontradicted fact remains that he went over to the malcontents and was hailed by them as a great acquisition. He was at once entrusted with a command as field-marshal-general of the army in Dorsetshire, and with his forces he besieged and took Wareham, and commanded in chief at the taking of Blandford and Abbotsbury, and in the relief of Taunton, besieged by the royalists. His military career seems to have terminated with the year 1645, in the September of which he was probably renewing his attempt to have his right to his seat for Downton acknowledged. Though he did not succeed in this, he was in such favour and trust with the parliament that in November he was made sheriff of Norfolk, and in January 1647 sheriff of Wiltshire, with the additional favour of permission to live out of the county. During the two months previous to the king's execution he was at his house in Dorsetshire, and that event is not even noticed in his diary, which merely records his arrival at Bagsshot in his journey to London, where he arrived on the following day. He subscribed the engagement in 1650, and in January 1652 he was appointed one of the committee on the abuses and delays of the law, and the remedies to be adopted. For his former connection with the king he had been permitted in 1644 to compound by the payment of 500*l.*, which was afterwards remitted by Cromwell; but he was not entirely cleared of his delinquency till March 1653, when the Commons passed the following resolution: 'That Sir A. A. Cooper, Bart., be and is hereby pardoned of all delinquency, and be and is hereby made capable of all other privileges as any other of the people of this nation are.'

On the forcible expulsion of that body, Sir Anthony was summoned to Barebone's Parliament in July 1650, as one of Cromwell's nominees for Wiltshire, and was elected for the same county, and also for Poole and Tewkesbury, in the subsequent parliament, which met in September 1654, and which was dissolved in the following January. In both these assemblies he was in Cromwell's confidence, acting in his interest in each, and being one of his council of state, both as general and protector. Dryden, in his 'Medal,' with much malice, but with some apparent truth, describes him at this time as

A vermin, wriggling in th' usurper's ear:
Bart'ring his venal wit for sums of gold,
He cast himself into the saint-like mould.
Groat'd, sigh'd, and pray'd, while godliness was gain,

The loudest bagpipe of the squeaking train.

But soon another change took place. From the supporter, he became the enemy of Cromwell, who, according to Anthony Wood and Ludlow, understanding his character, refused to receive him as his son-in-law. Whatever was the cause, it is certain that in the parliament of September 1653, to which he was returned again for Wiltshire, he did not receive the requisite certificate of approval from the council, and he was consequently, with above ninety other members in the same predicament, partly Presbyterians and partly Republicans, excluded from sitting, notwithstanding the bold remonstrance against the tyrannous proceeding addressed by them to the house. Those who remained, having confirmed Cromwell's power, and enabled him to appoint a certain number of peers to the excluded members, taking the oath of fidelity to the protector, were admitted to sit in the session that followed in January 1658, and by their number nearly overtook all that had preceded. A controversy immediately raised, in which Sir Anthony actively joined, as to the title and privileges of the 'other house,' as it was called, which was carried on with so much violence that the protector hurriedly dissolved the parliament after a fortnight's sitting. He never called another during his life, which terminated seven months afterwards.

The short session of Protector Richard's parliament, to which Sir Anthony was returned both for his old county and for Poole, was wasted in tiresome and insidious debates, renewing the old question about the 'other house,' and discussing various points in the new form of government. In these Sir Anthony took a prominent part; and in a published speech of great satirical power he had the bad taste to blacken the character of the protector who had fostered him, and with whose administration he had been intimately connected. (Barton's Diary, iv. 286.) The dissolution of this parliament on April 22, 1659, was Richard's fall; and the Rump Parliament, which then resumed its sittings, appointed a council of state, of which Sir Anthony was elected as a member. His fidelity to the Commonwealth began, however, to be doubted. In May he was publicly charged with holding correspondence with the king, and so loud were his professions of innocence, and his imprecations on himself if he were guilty, that they only added weight to the suspicions against him. Whether he was imprisoned on this charge seems uncertain, but it was some months before he got rid of it. Though there can be little doubt that he was engaged in the plots that were then contriving in behalf of the king, he managed so artfully that he procured his acquittal by the parliament in the following September. On the second expulsion of the Rump by the army, in October, the government was carried on by a council of safety, whose powers lasted only two months, when the Rump was again restored. To this last event Sir Anthony mainly contributed, and was admitted upon his former election to take his seat for Downton on January 7, 1660. Besides resuming his position as a member of the council of state, he was made colonel of the regiment of horse lately commanded by Fleetwood, with which he joined Monk, and continued to act in conjunction with that general till the restoration of the king.

The Long Parliament dissolved itself in March 1660, and to the convention, or Healing Parliament, that met in the following month, Sir Anthony was returned by his old constituents. He was one of the deputation sent by the two houses to the Hague to invite the king to return, and was among the first who were sworn of the privy council; 'the rather,' says Clarendon,

'because, having lately married a niece of the Earl of Southampton, it was believed that his slippery humour would be easily restrained and fixed by the uncle.' When that earl was made lord high treasurer, in September 1660, Lord Clarendon states that Sir Anthony was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer. Other authorities delay his entrance into the office till May 1667; but Clarendon's account is confirmed, not only by several documents addressed to him in that character in the State Paper Office, but by Sir Anthony himself, in his speech in 1672 on Mr. Serjeant Thurland's being constituted a baron, in which he alludes to his 'eleven years' experience in that court.' He has been blamed, though without much reason, for allowing himself to be named on the commission for the trial of the regicides, in the proceedings of which, however, he does not appear to have taken any part. On April 20, 1661, he was called up to the House of Peers by the title of Baron Ashley of Wimborne St. Giles, the introduction to his patent, while it records his loyalty 'in many respects' to King Charles I., and his assistance in restoring King Charles II., carefully abstaining from all allusion to his conduct in the interval, in deserting the former king, in aiding his rebellious subjects, and in joining in the counsels of the usurper.

Till the death of his uncle Southampton in 1667 Lord Ashley took comparatively little ostensible interest in party politics, but showed himself an adept in the business of the state. At the same time he was preparing his way by making himself agreeable to the king, and by encouraging, or at least countenancing, the scandalous intrigues of the court. Ever ready in repartee, in which the king delighted, he once, when his majesty, in reference to his amours, said railingly to him, 'I believe thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions,' replied with a low bow and grave face, 'Of a subject, may it please your majesty, I believe I am.'

On the dismissal of Lord Chancellor Clarendon in that year a new career was opened to Ashley's ambition. He had already been appointed lord lieutenant of Dorsetshire, and president of the new council of trade and plantations; and, gradually ingratiating himself with his easy sovereign, as well by his pliancy and wit as by his facility in the invention of expedients, he soon became one of a secret cabinet with Buckingham, Clifford, Arlington, and Lauderdale, by which every measure was determined before it was brought publicly forward, and which, from the initials of the names of its members, acquired the designation of the CABAL. Their ministry was rendered conspicuous by the shutting up of the Exchequer, the rupture of the triple alliance, and the mismanagement of the religious questions which then agitated the country; but though the discredit of these measures has been generally fathered upon Lord Ashley, Mr. Christie, in the 'Shaftesbury Papers' (ii. 77, 80), has shown satisfactorily that he objected to and opposed the two former. Whether he were the opponent or supporter of them, the king, regarding him with personal affection, and appreciating his abilities, raised him to the earldom of Shaftesbury on April 23, 1672. Not satisfied with this elevation, the new earl aspired to a still higher position, for the attainment of which the removal of Lord Keeper Bridgeman was necessary. His intrigue for that purpose was successful. An opportunity soon was taken, on the lord keeper's resistance to some of the ministerial measures, to represent him as weak and incapable, and the Great Seal, being consequently taken from him, was given to Shaftesbury on the 17th of the following November, with the title of lord chancellor. While he held that office he resided at Exeter House.

Though educated at Lincoln's Inn, he had never practised as a lawyer, his time during the rebellion having been employed in active service, and since the Restoration in court attendance. The consequence was that he had so little respect for the profession for which he had been intended that he despised the forms by which its proceedings were regulated, and even refused to assume the decent habit of a judge. 'He sat on the bench in an ash-coloured gown, silver-laced, and full-ribbed pantaloons displayed, without any black at all in his garb;' and at first, setting all rules at defiance, he was frequently obliged on rehearing to reverse his own orders, so that at last he became more reasonable, and submissive to the formulæ of the court. Without regarding the extravagant praises of his eulogists on the one side, or the adverse insinuations of his detractors on the other, his decrees in Chancery would appear to have met with general approbation; for in Dryden's severe description of him under the name of Achitophel he gives him full credit for judicial integrity. King Charles, too, is reported to have said of him, on deciding a very difficult case, that 'he had a chancellor that was master of more law than all his judges, and was possessed of more divinity than all his bishops.'

It was not in Shaftesbury's nature to be steady; even the high position which he enjoyed could not fix him. Finding the opposition more strong than he expected, and fearing the personal consequences which the leaders threatened, he determined to avert the danger by joining their ranks. Even while chancellor he showed his wavering disposition by gradually deserting the measures he had originated, and endeavouring to thwart the objects of the king. But his immediate hopes were disappointed: his plans being discovered, the parliament was prorogued, and the Seal taken from him on November 9, 1673, after a tenure of less than a year.

Immediately on his disgrace he was the chosen leader of the discontented party, and, without entering into the question as to the policy pursued on either side, for which this is not the place, we can only look to the repeated treachery of the man. From an arbitrary minister he was converted into the head of a popular faction, and from a royal favourite he became the king's enemy, ungratefully repaying the honours and favours he had received by continual attempts to injure and ruin the family of his benefactor. It bears too strong a resemblance to his former defections, and exhibits, if not the perfidy, at least the fickleness of his character.

The remainder of his life was spent in factious opposition, his chief object apparently being to exclude the Duke of York from the succession. For this purpose he entered into all sorts of intrigues and conspiracies, exciting the cry of 'No Popery,' and pretending first that his own life was in danger from the Roman Catholics, and next that the murder of the king was their object. Foremost in opposing all the measures proposed by the court, his manoeuvres at one time subjected him to an imprisonment in the Tower for nearly a year, and at another they were so far successful that he forced himself again into the ministry as president of the new council of thirty. This event was effected in April 1678, on the fall of the Earl of Danby, and during the excitement produced by the pretended Popish Plot, which had been openly nurtured by Shaftesbury, and aided by him through all its ramifications, encouraging its inventor, the infamous Titus Oates, and explaining away his various contradictions, and those of his perjured coadjutors. Ever during his presidency he continued to counteract the wishes of his royal master; and opposing a bill offered by the king, limiting the powers of a Catholic successor to the throne, supported one to exclude the duke from the throne itself. On this the king who had never trusted his mutable minister, designating him (from his stature as his falsehood) as 'Little Sincerity,' dismissed him from his councils in the following October. He then became more violent and less cautious in his endeavours to raze the court. He made an attempt to present the Duke of York as a recusant, which was defeated by the judges suddenly discharging the grand jury; he advocated if he did not originate, another bill exclusion, which, though it passed the House of Commons, was triumphantly rejected by the Lords; and he even proposed a bill divorcing the queen, that the king might marry again and have a Protestant heir.

The violence of his agitation at length caused its own defeat. The people began to open their eyes, and the court ultimately regained the ascendancy. From the popular and patriotic leader, Shaftesbury became the suspected and trembling traitor. He was arrested and committed to the Tower in July 1681; and, though an indictment against him for compassing and imagining the death of the king was thrown out in the following November by a grand jury packed by sheriffs of his own party (a medal to commemorate this event is the subject of Dryden's bitter poem called 'The Medal'), the discovery of a treasonable association, in which he probably was engaged, and the fear lest his connection with other desperate projects should be betrayed, made it advisable for him to fly the country. By various disguises and concealments he eluded a warrant issued against him, and at last succeeded in escaping to Amsterdam, where, two months after, he died on January 21, 1683, of the gout in his stomach. His remains were conveyed to England, and buried at Wimborne St. Giles, where his great-grandson in 1732 erected a noble monument, with just such an encomiastic inscription as might be expected from an admiring descendant.

While on his mission to King Charles in Holland in 1660 he received an injury from the overturning of his carriage, which caused him great inconvenience in his after-life, and obliged him to have continued recourse to medical advice. Among those who attended him was the celebrated philosopher John Locke, then a young man, with whom his lordship was so much pleased that he took him into his household, entrusted to him the education of both his son and grandson, and, when in office, placed him in some responsible and profitable positions. Shaftesbury's publications are confined to speeches and political pamphlets at different periods of his life, and contain abundant evidence, were all else wanting, of his unprincipled mutability and his restless turbulence.

Shaftesbury is charged with participating in all the vices of the time except that of being tempted by pecuniary bribes; and, though all must acknowledge his talents, his eloquence, and his wit, his memory must be regarded with repugnance by all who remember the various desertions and intrigues of his career, and the factious fickleness of his character. His only claim for the respect and gratitude of posterity is the Habeas Corpus Act, which was passed by his instrumentality.

The earl married three times—first, so early as 1639, to Margaret, daughter of Thomas Lord Coventry, lord keeper, who died in July 1649; secondly, in April 1650, to Frances, daughter of David Cecil, Earl of Exeter, who died in 1654; and lastly, in 1653, to Margaret, daughter of William Lord Spencer of Wormleighton, and niece to the Earl of Southampton, who survived him. He had issue by his second wife only, two sons, of whom one survived him. Of his descendants the third earl was the celebrated author of the 'Characteristics;' and the present, the seventh earl, has already acquired a high reputation for his charitable exertions for the good of mankind.

COPLEY, JOHN SINGLETON (LORD LYNDEHURST), was born at Boston in America on May 21, 1772, before the war of independence had commenced, and he lived to see the disseverance of those states, the union of which was the result of that war. His father, John Singleton Copley, of Irish extraction, was then practising in that city the art in which he became afterwards distinguished in England, whither he brought his family when his son was two years old. His fame was soon established as a painter, both in portraiture and history; and the high value at which his works are now estimated is proved by the large prices they produced in the recent sale of the late lord chancellor's collection. The artist died in 1815, aged seventy-four, when his son had already taken the first steps in his successful career; and his wife, who was a daughter of Richard Clarke, Esq., survived till 1836, happy in witnessing the highest honours by which her son was graced.

Young Copley was originally destined for his father's profession, in the elements of which he made some progress, but the plan was happily set aside in consequence of the mental powers he early exhibited. At the age of nineteen he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his studies so energetically that he took his degree of B.A. in 1794, with the honours of second wrangler and Smith's prizeman, and of M.A. in 1797, having in the interim been elected a fellow of his college. His delight in mathematical studies, and also in practical chemistry and mechanics, he retained throughout his long life, and his attainments in them were of infinite service to him in his professional career. This he commenced by entering himself as a member of Lincoln's Inn, and by becoming a pupil of Mr. Tidd, from whose instructions so many men have risen to eminence. He spent part of the following years in visiting the land of his birth.

On June 8, 1804, he was called to the bar, and selected the Midland Circuit. One of his earliest clients was Lord Palmerston, the late prime minister, then first entering into political life, for whom he appeared before a committee of the House of Commons on a double return for the borough of Horsham in 1806, but failed in securing the seat. The only book which Mr. Copley ever published with his name was a report of that case. Both on the circuit and in Westminster Hall he gradually acquired a sufficient practice to induce him to accept the degree of serjeant-at-law in 1813. Entering now in some measure into public life, he avowed tory, or what would now be called conservative, principles, to the surprise of some of his contemporaries, who charged him with having been notorious in the early part of his life for the ultra-liberality of his professions. Whatever were his youthful notions, and however unguardedly he may have expressed them among his private associates, it is hardly fair to refuse a man the exercise of more mature reflection, and to bind him down to the rash phrases of a juvenile imagination, especially when he had never joined any whig society, nor connected himself with any public measure of that party. But the subject of the charge ever denied its truth; and the best proof of the sincerity of his convictions is his steady adherence to them, through good report and bad report, for the long period of fifty subsequent years.

As a leading advocate, by the beautiful simplicity of his style, by the logical arrangement of his arguments, and by the aptness of his illustrations, his speeches were wonderfully effective both on juries and judges. The government were so struck with the talent which he exhibited that in October 1817 he was specially retained for the crown in the indictments against Brandreth and others for high treason tried at Derby. In the next year, besides being made king's serjeant and chief justice of Chester, he was introduced into parliament for the ministerial borough of Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight, which he soon after exchanged for Ashburton; and in 1826 he had the honour of being elected as representative of his own university.

In the senate his great capacity for debate was so efficiently displayed that in July 1819 he was appointed solicitor-general, and received the usual accolade of knighthood. During his tenure of this office the spirit of sedition was prevalent throughout England, and in the legislative remedies that were then introduced, as well as in the prosecution of Thistlewood and the other Cato Street conspirators, Sir John Copley exhibited his extraordinary talent. In the unfortunate trial also of Queen Caroline it was his duty to take an active part, in the performance of which he tempered the conviction he felt of the guilt of the accused lady with the decorum due to her exalted rank, satisfying his employers by his admirable performance, without incurring the obloquy to which they were subjected. At this time Lord Tenterden, in a letter to Sir Egerton Bridges, gives this opinion of him: 'The solicitor-general has less learning than the attorney-general (Gifford), but a much better person, countenance, and manner; a good head and a kind heart, and not deficient in learning. I suppose he will soon fill one of our high offices in the law.' (Lord Campbell's Ch. Just. iii. 296.) In January 1824 he was promoted to the attorney-generalship, and on September 14, 1826, he received the patent of master of the Rolls.

He held the latter office only eight months. On Mr. Canning becoming prime minister Lord Eldon resigned the Great Seal, which was delivered to Sir John Copley on April 30, 1827, as lord chancellor, he having been created Baron Lyndhurst a few days before. This his first chancellorship lasted three years and seven months, during the successive administrations of Mr. Canning, Lord Goderich, and the Duke of Wellington. On the accession of the whigs to power in 1 William IV., he resigned the Seal on November 22, 1830, but did not remain unemployed quite two months. He accepted the appointment of lord chief baron of the Exchequer on January 18, 1831, in the place of Sir William Alexander, with the perfect understanding that he retained his political opinions. His independence of ministerial influence was shown by his resistance, with all his energy and strength, of the bills for reform in parliament, and of various other measures proposed by the party while it remained in power.

When the conservatives regained the administration he was at once replaced at the head of the Court of Chancery, on November 21, 1834, retaining the office of lord chief baron for the next month. His presidency of the Exchequer had exhibited his high judicial capacity, and had been principally distinguished by the luminous judgment which he pronounced in the great case of Small v. Attwood, which though it was reversed on appeal in the House of Lords by a close majority of a single vote, was by most people considered to be well founded, and by all, whether supporters or opposers, greatly admired.

After a short term of five months he again, on April 23, 1835, resigned the Seal to his political opponents, who retained power for the next six years. During that interval he maintained the ascendancy he had gained in the House of Lords, by his powerful opposition to the various innovations introduced by the whig ministers, and by submitting the house useful amendments of the law; and still more by the annual comprehensive exposure of the ineffective legislation at the end of each session, in which he visited the successive failures with alternate rebuke and sarcasm. These regular attacks increasing the general unpopularity of the party, the ministers were at length obliged to resign, and Lord Lyndhurst was installed in his third and last chancellorship on September 3, 1841. His merits had been recognised and rewarded in the previous year by his university electing him their lord high steward.

For nearly five years he devoted himself to his judicial duties, till the retirement of Sir Robert Peel, when he resigned the Seal on July 4, 1846. When the conservative party regained power for short periods in 1852 and 1858, Lord Lyndhurst felt himself too old to undertake the responsible labours of the chancellorship, or to accept the offered seat in the cabinet, being in his eightieth year at the first of these periods; but during nearly the whole time since his resignation to almost the last year of his life, when he had attained his ninetieth year, he entered with his accustomed spirit into most of the constitutional questions that arose, and surprised the house by his intellectual vigour.

No statesman maintained for so long a succession of years a name so unsullied as Lord Lyndhurst, and few have died in possession of more veneration and regard. His death occurred from natural decay on October 18, 1863, in the ninety-third year of his age, at his house in George Street, Hanover Square, where his father had lived and died.

He married, first, Sarah Geary, the daughter of Charles Brunson, Esq., and widow of Colonel Charles Thomas, of the First Foot-guards, who fell at Waterloo. By her he had three daughters. His second wife was Georgiana, daughter of Lewis Goldsmith, Esq., by whom he had one daughter.

CORBET, REGINALD, was descended from an honourable family seated in Shropshire ever since the Conquest, some members of which were barons of the realm from the reign of Henry II. to that of Edward II., and others were ancestors of baronetcies, all of which are extinct except that of Corbet of Moreton Corbet, created in 1408. Reginald was the second son of Sir Robert Corbet of Moreton Corbet, by Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir Henry Vernon of Haddon. He pursued his legal studies at the Middle Temple, and was elected reader there in autumn 1551, but his reading was deferred till the following Lent. On October 27, 1558, he received a summons to take upon him the degree of the coif in the following Easter, but Queen

Mary's death intervening, a new writ became necessary, and the solemnity of his inauguration took place on April 19, 1559. On the 16th of the next October he was constituted a judge of the Queen's Bench, where he sat till his death in 1566. (Plowden's Reports, 356.)

He married Alice, daughter of John Gratewood, Esq., and by her he had a son Richard, who was father of John Corbet, of Stoke in Shropshire, created a baronet in 1627. This title became extinct in 1750 by the death of its sixth possessor without issue; but his nephew, Corbet d'Avenant, succeeding to his estates and assuming his name, had a new creation in 1786, which also became extinct at his death in 1823. (Wotton's Baronet, ii. 74, 272, 274, 312.)

CORDELL, WILLIAM, the son of John Cordell, Esq., and Eva, daughter of Henry Webb, of Kimbolton, was born at Edmington in Middlesex, and, having become possessed of the manor of Long Melford in Suffolk, he fixed his residence there, his family having been long seated in that county. From a branch of it descended Sir Robert Cordell, who received the dignity of baronet in 1660, which became extinct in 1704 by the death of his grandson without issue.

After being educated at Cambridge, he was admitted a member of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1543. He sat in the parliament of March 1553 as member for Steyning, and on September 30, two months after Queen Mary came to the crown, he was made her solicitor-general. On the 1st of the following November the benchers of the society of Lincoln's Inn appointed him their butler, and on February 2, 1554, he was fined in the sum of 'xxvjs. viijd.' 'for not exercising the office.' (Black Book, iv. 270, 272.) This curious entry seems to show that the junior members of the bench had this duty imposed upon them, for in the Lent of that year he was nominated to the post of reader. As solicitor-general he took a part in the prosecution of Sir Thomas Wyatt for his attempt against the queen; and on November 5, 1557, he was promoted to the office of master of the Rolls and knighted. In the last parliament of Queen Mary, being then member for Essex, he was chosen speaker; but her death at the close of it made no difference in his judicial position, which he retained for nearly twenty-four years. (Dugdale's Orig. 231.)

Troubling himself apparently very little with politics, though successively member for Middlesex and Westminster, he was regarded with favour by the court, and Queen Elizabeth paid him the compliment of commencing her progress in Suffolk, in 1578, by visiting him at Long Melford

Hall, where he gloriously feasted her. He died on May 17, 1581.

He married Mary, the daughter of Richard Clopton, Esq., but left no children.

CORNHILL, GERVASE DE, was so called from the ward of that name in London, where probably he resided, and was clearly a man of high note and authority there, holding in 2, 3, 6, and 7 Henry II. the post of sheriff (Madox, i. 204, 602), an officer in whom the temporal government of the city was then vested. After the latter year he is not noticed in connection with the metropolis; but his next residence being in Surrey, he was appointed sheriff of that county in 10 Henry II., 1164, and remained in that office, with the exception of one year, until 1183.

In 15 Henry II., and for the seven succeeding years, he held the same responsible office in Kent, where he had a seat at Luke-dale, in the parish of Littlebourne; and in the contest with Becket he sided strongly with the king.

Among the justices itinerant in the 15, 16, 20, and 23 Henry II., 1169-1177, his name appears as acting in various counties. It does not clearly appear whether at that time he performed the same duties in the Curia Regis, but it is certain that he attended there in 28 Henry II., 1182, as his name is inserted as one of the barons and justiciers before whom fines of that year were taken. (Madox, i. 113, 123, 132, 143, 144.)

From the termination of his sheriffalty in Surrey, it may be presumed that his death occurred in 29 or 30 Henry II.

He left three sons, Henry, Reginald, and Ralph, the two former of whom held the office of sheriff of Kent for several years. Henry was bailiff of London, and also sheriff of Surrey. He was chancellor of St. Paul's, and had the management of the Mint (Cambium) of England in 3 Richard I. Reginald was the next named justice itinerant. (Hasted, i. 178; Lord Lyttelton's Henry II. 583.)

CORNHILL, REGINALD DE, was the second son of the above Gervase de Cornhill, and after the death of his elder brother Henry, in 4 or 5 Richard I., he, or his son of the same name, held the sheriffalty of Kent, with some short interval, until 5 Henry III. His seat at Minster, in the Isle of Thanet, acquired the name of 'Sheriff's Court,' which it still retains; and he himself, discontinuing his own name, was styled Reginald le Viscount, even his widow being designated Vicecomitessa Cantii. (Hasted, i. 178-9.) He succeeded his brother also in the management of the Mint of England, and continued in connection with it and with the Treasury till late in the reign of John. (Madox, i. 459.)

That he acted in a judicial capacity in 1 John appears from the Rotulus de Oblatis (p. 47), where certain persons are summoned before him and John de Gestling and William de Wrotham, also justiciers. In the fines of that reign his name occurs as being present in court till 10 John.

Various other employments show that he was high in the king's confidence. In 5 John he was one of the custodes of the ports of England and the quinzime of merchants; and in the next year he and William de Wrotham were appointed 'superiores custodes,' when the king made an assize 'de moneta custodienda, et retorsoribus et falsonariis monete nostre destruedis.'

He was a staunch adherent of that king in all his earlier troubles, and received many substantial marks of his favour. The Reginald de Cornhill who, in the latter contests of his reign, joined the barons, and who was one of those taken prisoner in Rochester Castle in December 1215, was probably his son, to whom, and to William de Cornhill, the 'Cameraria' was granted in 14 John. His wife, Isabella, paid a fine of five thousand marks for his liberation. (Rot. Claus. i. 241; Rot. Pat. 189.)

CORNHILL, WILLIAM DE (BISHOP OF LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY), either the son or the nephew of the above Reginald de Cornhill, was an officer of the Exchequer, and connected with the Mint of England. (Madox, i. 338.)

Some houses in London were granted to him by the king in 5 John; and in that year Geoffrey Fitz-Peter was ordered to make a provision for him of twenty marks out of the first ecclesiastical benefice of the king's patronage that should drop. In 6 John he had a grant of twenty acres of the wood of Tilgholt in Kent; in 7 John he was made rector of Maidstone by the king's collation; in the same year he was appointed custos of the abbey of Malmesbury; in the next year he had the same office in the bishopric of Lincoln, and in 9 John he was raised to the archdeaconry of Huntingdon. (Rot. de Liberate, 69, 80; Chart. 137, 157; Pat. 57, 65, 73.)

His name occurs as a justicier in fine levied in 10 John, 1208, but not in any other year. In the two next years, and in 14 John, his personal attendance on the king is noticed on the rolls, and in the last year he was presented to the churches of Somerton in Somersetshire, and of Feretby in Yorkshire, and, in conjunction with Reginald, the son of Reginald de Cornhill, received a grant of 'Cameraria nostra' from the king. (Rot. Pat. 95, 96.)

On January 25, 1215, 17 John, he was consecrated Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and dying on June 10, 1223, he buried in Lichfield Cathedral. (Godwin, 315.)

CORNWALL, EARL OF. See ROBERT.

COSSALE, WILLIAM DE, so called from his manor of Cossale in Nottinghamshire, was a benefactor of Newstead Abbey in that county. He was appointed a baron of the Exchequer in 3 Edward III., but is not mentioned after the 14th year. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 106; Rot. Orig. ii. 78, 81; Inquis. p. m. ii. 97.)

COTESMORE, JOHN, resided at Baldwin Brightwell in Oxfordshire. He married Florence, the daughter of Sir Simon Harcourt, ancestor of Lord Chancellor Harcourt. He appears among the advocates in the Year Book till 8 Henry V., and was made a serjeant-at-law in 5 Henry V. In 9 Henry V. he was sent as a justice of assize to Norwich and other places with Justice William Babington. (Cal. Exch. iii. 380.) He afterwards became one of the king's serjeants, and was elevated to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas on October 15, 1429, 8 Henry VI. After sitting in that court for nearly ten years, he succeeded as chief justice there on January 20, 1439, 17 Henry VI., but presided little more than eight months, the executors of his will being on October 14 following commanded to give up the records to his successor. He was buried at Brightwell, where there is a monumental brass to his memory. (Notes and Queries, 1st S. x. 520.)

COTTENHAM, EARL OF. See C. C. PEPTS.

COTYNGHAM, THOMAS DE, was one of the clerks in Chancery for nearly thirty years, from 14 to 43 Edward III., 1340-1369, but only on one occasion is mentioned as keeper of the Great Seal—viz., on the death of the chancellor, John de Offord, when it was placed in the custody of him and others from May 28 till June 16, 1349. (Rot. Claus. 23 Edw. III. p. 1, m. 8, 10.) During part of this period, however, he went to Ireland as master of the Rolls there, to which office he was appointed in 30 Edward III., 1356. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 166.) He was no doubt brought up in the Chancery, as he was presented by the king so early as 13 Edward II., 1319, with the church of Wygton, and acted as the attorney of William de Herlaston, a clerk in the Chancery, in 1325. (N. Fœdera, ii. 401, 606.)

COVENTRY, THOMAS. With John Coventry, lord mayor of London in the reign of Henry VI., and one of the executors of the renowned Richard Whittington, began the prosperity of this family, which derived its surname from the city of Coventry, where it was originally established. One of his descendants, Richard Coventry, was settled at Cassington in Oxfordshire, and by his wife, a daughter of — Turner, had two sons, the younger of whom was Thomas the future judge. He was born in 1547, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. on June 2, 1565, and afterwards was elected fellow of Balliol College. He entered the Inner Temple, and became reader there in autumn 1593. He was one of those named on Sir Edward Coke's preferment to succeed him in the solicitor's place, and Bacon (Works, xii. 157) tells Sir Robert Cecil, though with a profession of disbelief, that it was asserted that Coventry had bought his interest for 2000 angels. Neither of them obtained the promotion, and it was not till two months before the queen's death that Coventry received a writ to take upon him the degree of the coif in the following Easter. On January 13, 1606, he was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas, and knighted. He enjoyed his place less than a year. Dying on December 12, 1606, he was buried at Croome d'Abitot in Worcestershire. His estate, called Earles Croome, he had acquired by his marriage with Margaret, the daughter and heir of — Jeffreys, of that place, and it still is the chief seat of his family.

The judge left three sons, of whom Thomas was the lord keeper.

COVENTRY, THOMAS (LORD COVENTRY), was the eldest son of the above-noticed judge. He was born in 1578, and, having passed the first fourteen years of his life under the tuition of his parents, he was placed as a gentleman commoner at Balliol College, Oxford, at Michaelmas 1592. At the end of three years he was admitted a member of the Inner Temple, and, having been called to the bar, he is mentioned in Coke's Reports as an advocate so early as 1611; he was elected reader in autumn 1616.

By the respect he showed to Sir Edward Coke he entailed upon himself the enmity of Bacon, who sought to impede his professional advance by prejudicing the king against him. When Coventry was a candidate for the recordership of London, Bacon suggested to the king that 'it is very material, as these times are, that your majesty have some care that the recorder succeeding be a temperate and discreet man. . . . The man upon whom the choice is like to fall, which is Coventry, I hold doubtful for your service; not but that he is well learned and an honest man, but he hath been, as it were, bred by Lord Coke and seasoned in his ways.' The shaft fell harmless, and Coventry was not only elected recorder on November 16, 1616, but on March 14, 1617, was taken into the king's own service as solicitor-general, and knighted. Four years after, also, when Sir Henry Yelverton, the attorney-general, was condemned by the Star Chamber, Coventry received the appointment, on January 11,

1621. One of the first duties he had to perform in his new office was to take a message from the Lords to Bacon, requiring him to send specific answers to the charges against him. Soon after he had to prosecute Edward Floyde for his presumption in calling the king's daughter and her husband 'Goodman Palsgrave and Goodwife Palsgrave;' but he was not answerable for the brutal sentence which the Lords pronounced upon the silly speaker. (Parl. Hist. i. 1239, 1260.)

On King James's death he was retained in his office by King Charles, and before the end of the year was called upon to supply the place of Bishop Williams, receiving the Great Seal as lord keeper on November 1, 1625. His letter to Buckingham forms a strong contrast with Bacon's on a similar occasion. It is a manly and modest doubt of his own capacity for the place, a dutiful submission, after full consideration, to the royal will, and a courtly acknowledgment of the duke's favour. But there is nothing in it that shows any previous application, nor any undue reliance on the interference of the favourite.

He had to open the second parliament of the reign, and soon after to deliver the king's reprimand to the Commons for their negligence in completing the supply, and their encouragement of seditious speeches. He had little to do in reference to the imprisonment of the Earl of Arundel and the demand of the Peers for his release, except as the messenger of the king and the organ of the house. The angry dissolution of this parliament, notwithstanding his earnest endeavours to prevent such a termination, soon after taking place, the king endeavoured to supply his necessities by forced loans; but, not succeeding to his wish, he called a third parliament in March 1628. Sir Thomas Coventry opened this in an eloquent speech, which would have been more effective had it not contained an intimation that, if there were not a readiness in voting supplies, the king might resort to other means by the use of his prerogatives. But before the end of the session he had to pray of the king a more explicit answer to the Petition of Right, which was accordingly given on June 7, 1628, in the well-known formula, 'Soit droit fait comme il est désiré.' (Parl. Hist. ii. 218, 409.)

On April 10 the lord keeper was created a baron by the title of Lord Coventry of Aylesborough in the county of Worcester. When Buckingham applied for the dormant office, and almost unlimited powers of lord high constable, Lord Coventry showed a patriotic spirit in opposing the grant, and thus incurring the hatred of the favourite. Peremptorily accosting him, the duke said, 'Who made you lord keeper?' 'The king,' said Coventry boldly. 'It's false,' said Buckingham; 'twas I did make you, and you shall find that I who made you can and will unmake you.' Coventry retorted, 'Did I conceive I held my place by your favour, I would presently unmake myself, by rendering the Seal to his majesty.' Buckingham would have put his threat into execution, and probably have obtained the Seal for Sir Henry Yelverton, had he not been assassinated in the following August. This parliament, after another session, was hastily dissolved like the former, the close of it being distinguished by the forcible detention of the speaker (Sir John Finch) in the chair while the protestation of the Commons against tonnage and poundage was passed.

No other parliament met for the eleven remaining years of Coventry's life—a circumstance which, however impolitic, could not be distasteful to his personal disposition. He was more of a lawyer than a politician, and would no doubt be glad to be relieved from defending measures which he could not honestly justify. The holder of the Great Seal was no longer, as in Wolsey's time, the director of the state; other and more active spirits acquired the ascendancy, and their opinions prevailed. No one can read the history of the time without seeing that Coventry had but little influence in the councils of his sovereign, which were in a great measure directed personally by the king, under the guidance, first of a favourite, and then of unscrupulous and intemperate advisers. In times when all men's actions were open to censure, and none escaped who could be charged with too violent a support of the royal prerogative, or with too manifest a tendency to infringe on the liberty of the subject, the very absence of the name of one who held so high an official position tells strongly in his favour, as showing that his personal demeanour and his imputed principles were not to any great extent obnoxious to those who were assuming the rule and punishing their opponents. In Lilburn's case, though Coventry presided on the condemnation, his estate was not the first instance attempted to be charged with the compensation awarded, and it was not till the estates upon which the reputation was voted were disposed of in another manner, nor till eight years after the lord keeper's death, that the pertinacious offender conceived the idea of coming on as Coventry's heir. The attempt was frustrated, even in the strong excitement of that period, by a large majority; and vote, though perhaps influenced by personal motives, was no doubt directed principally by the conviction that the cruelty and illegality of the sentence against Lilburn could not be justly imputed lord keeper. At the same time it is difficult altogether to excuse his lordship from participation in the iniquitous punishments which were too often awarded in the Star Chamber, except on the presumption that, though presiding, he had but a single voice, and that, by the course of the court, he gave his opinion last, and was compelled to pronounce the censure of the majority. That his inclinations were on the side of mercy the judgment in Chambers's case proves. In Henry Sherfield's case, for breaking a painted glass window, he was, after giving a lenient sentence, actually outvoted; and in the case of Dr. Leighton, for publishing 'A Plea against Prelacy,' and in other similar accusations, it requires not much discrimination to decide to whom the severity of the punishment is to be attributed. (State Trials, iii. 374, 383, 519, 1315.) In April 1635 James Maxwell and Alice his wife were brought before the Star Chamber, for asserting in a petition to the king that the lord keeper disobeyed his majesty and oppressed the subject, and were fined 3000*l.* to the king and the same sum to the lord keeper, the female narrowly escaping a whipping moved for by one of the members. (Cal. St. Papers [1635], 31.)

At the introduction of the imposition of ship-money, in the speeches which he addressed to the judges previously to the commencement of the circuits both in June 1635 and Lent 1636, he enjoined them, in their charges to the grand jury, to urge the people to pay their contributions with alacrity and cheerfulness; but from his position as lord keeper he was precluded from giving any legal opinion on the case of Hampden, who resisted the levy, the judgment being pronounced by the twelve judges alone, and he was not a party to, nor a witness of, the consequences that resulted from these proceedings; for before the next parliament met his death occurred at Durham House in the Strand (where the Adelphi now stands), on January 14, 1640, and his remains were removed for interment in the family vault at Croome d'Abitot. His last message to the king was a request 'that his majesty would take all distastes from the parliament summoned against April with patience, and suffer it to sit without an unkind dissolution.' (Hackel's Bp. Williams, ii. 137.)

He had held the Seal for above fourteen years, and every writer of any authority has refrained from making any specific charge against him. Even Whitelocke, who had evidently no goodwill towards him, can say no more than he was 'of no transcendent parts or fame.' His other contemporaries differ from this judgment, and unite in praising him. Croke calls him 'a pious, prudent, and learned man, and strict in his practice, . . . he died in great honour, and much lamented by all the people.' Clarendon says he discharged all his earlier offices 'with great ability and singular reputation for integrity,' and that in his place of lord keeper 'he enjoyed it with an universal reputation (and sure justice was never better administered).' Of his 'parts' the same author says, 'He was a man of wonderful gravity and wisdom, and understood not only the whole science and mystery of the law, at least equally with any man who had ever sate in that place, but had a clear conception of the whole policy of the government, both of Church and state, which by the unskillfulness of some well-meaning men jostled each the other too much. He knew the temper, disposition, and genius of the kingdom most exactly; saw their spirits grow every day more sturdy, inquisitive, and impatient; and therefore naturally abhorred all innovations.' Anthony Wood, Fuller, and David Lloyd are equally encomiastic; and Lord Clarendon says, in recording his death, that he had 'the rare felicity in being looked upon generally throughout the kingdom with great affection, and a singular esteem, when very few men in any high trust were so.' A charge of bribery was got up against him by a disappointed suitor, but was so palpably unfounded and malignant that the Star Chamber visited the contriver and all his assistants with severe penalties of purse and person. (Rushworth, ii. App. 30.)

Lord Coventry was twice married. His first wife was Sarah, daughter of Edward Sebright, of Besford in Worcestershire; and his second was Elizabeth, daughter of John Aldersey, of Spurston in Cheshire, and widow of William Pitchford, Esq. By both of them he left issue. His grandson, Thomas, was advanced in 1697 to the titles of Viscount Deerhurst and Earl of Coventry, with a special limitation, under which they are now held, the original barony having become extinct in 1719, by the death of the fourth earl without male issue.

COURTENYE, HUGH DE (EARL OF DEVON), was at the head of the commission of justices itinerant into Bedfordshire in 4 Edward III., 1330, but he seems to have been placed there more as one of the principal barons of that county than as in any other way connected with the law. He was also at the head of another commission, for the trial of offenders in the forests, in the same year. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 24.)

He was the eldest son of Hugh de Courteneye, Baron of Oakhampton, and Eleanor, daughter of Hugh Despencer the elder, Earl of Winchester. His father died in 1291, when he was sixteen years of age.

He had no sooner attained his majority than he joined in various expeditions under Edward I., by whom he was knighted. He was summoned, also, to all the parliaments as a baron, both under that king and his two successors, until 8 Edward III., 1334; and on February 22, in the following year, he was created Earl of Devon, as the lineal descendant of Baldwin de Ripariis, the seventh earl. He died in 1340, 14 Edward III., and was buried at Cowick, near Exeter.

By his wife Agnes, daughter of John, Lord St. John, of Basing, he had six children. The title still remains in one of his descendants. The eighteenth earl was created Marquis of Exeter in 1553; but, dying without issue three years afterwards, this additional honour became extinct.

COURTENEYE, WILLIAM DE (ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY), was the grandson of the last-mentioned Hugh de Courteneye, Earl of Devon, being the fourth son of Hugh, the second earl, by Margaret, daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, and Elizabeth, a daughter of Edward I. He was born at Exminster about 1327, was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of Doctor of Civil Law, and was afterwards chancellor of that university. With such connections he soon procured rich benefices, among which were prebends at Exeter, Wells, and York. He was elevated to the bishopric of Hereford in 1369, and thence translated in 1375 to London.

Among the followers of Wickliffe, whose opinions at this time gained so much ground as to alarm the Church, was John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; and when, towards the end of Edward's reign, Bishop Courteneye, in obedience to the pope's mandate, summoned the reformer to be examined, the duke attended him to St. Paul's Church, where the meeting was held. There some violent words passed between the duke and the bishop, which ended in an unseemly threat on the part of the former. The assembled people, who as yet cared little for the religious question, fancying their bishop in danger, prepared to defend him, and by their clamours compelled the duke, who was no favourite with them, to retire. The populace, outside, excited by other reports to his disadvantage, joined in the outcry; and the ferment was not appeased till they had broken open the Marshalsea prison, ransacked the duke's house in the Savoy, and contemptuously dragged his arms through the streets.

On Edward's death, which occurred soon after, it was not likely that the council of the young king, the Duke of Lancaster being at its head, would allow the prosecution against Wickliffe to proceed. His doctrine, accordingly, spread widely through the kingdom; and though he died at his living of Lutterworth in 1384, his followers, under the name of Lollards, rapidly increased.

On the murder of Archbishop Sudbury, the king, on August 10, 1381, appointed Bishop Courteneye Chancellor of England, and assented to his election as Archbishop of Canterbury. Thus it would appear that the Duke of Lancaster no longer felt any animosity against him; yet it is difficult to account for Courteneye's resigning the Seal three months after, on November 30.

During the remainder of the archbishop's life, a period of nearly fifteen years, he was engaged in various contests with his bishops as to the right of visitation, in all of which he was triumphant; but the demand which he made on his clergy, of a sixtieth part of their revenues, being resisted by the Bishop of London, was carried by appeal to the court of Rome, where it was not decided while he lived.

He died at his palace at Maidstone, on July 31, 1396, and was buried in the church there. A monument was erected to his memory in his cathedral church, to which, besides contributing largely to the erection of the nave, he gave various rich presents.

Walsingham declares that he was dignified with a cardinal's hat; but the doubts of others seem to be supported by the absence of all notice of the fact in the epitaph inscribed on his gravestone in Maidstone Church. This edifice he had entirely rebuilt, and had restored the church of Mepham; besides many liberal donations, among others to the church of Exminster, his native town.

He is represented as having a noble presence and courtly manners, with the learning fit for his position, a clear and acute understanding, and a favourite with the monks of his cathedral. (Godwin, 120, 189; Weever, 225, 285.)

COWPER, WILLIAM (EARL COWPER) descended from that branch of the family which held a respectable position in Sussex in the reign of Edward IV., and then resided at Strode in the parish of Slingfield. His immediate ancestor became an alderman in London in Elizabeth's time, and had a son, Sir William, who was created a baronet by Charles I., and suffered imprisonment for loyalty to that unfortunate king. His grandson the second baronet represented Hertfordshire in several parliaments of Charles II. William III., adopting the whig side in politics, and taking a prominent part in proceedings against James II. when Duke of York. By his wife Sarah, daughter of Sir Samuel Hoiled, of London, he had two sons, William and Spencer.

William Cowper was born at Hertford.

Castle about four or five years after the Restoration. He was some years at a school at St. Albans, and became a student at the Middle Temple on March 8, 1681-2. His years of probation were divided between his law-books and his pleasures, the latter it is reported claiming the greatest share, but the former evidently not neglected. Whatever were his excesses during that interval, it may be presumed that before the end of it he terminated them by his marriage about 1686 with Judith, daughter of Sir Robert Booth, a merchant of London living in Walbrook. He was called to the bar on May 25, 1688. Bred up in the principles of political liberty and with a deep hatred of popery, his youthful ardour prompted him a few months later to offer his personal aid in resisting the obtuse tyranny of James II. He and his brother Spencer, with a band of men, joined the Prince of Orange in his march to London: but on the peaceful establishment of William and Mary on the throne he returned to the stage of his profession, on which, whether on the Home Circuit or in the courts of Westminster, he soon became a favourite performer. He was chosen recorder of Colchester, and got into considerable practice within the first five years after his call. Before Easter 1694 he had been raised to the position of king's counsel, and by his assistance to the attorney and solicitor general in the prosecutions arising out of the assassination plot in 1696 he conspicuously demonstrated his superiority as an advocate. In the only other state trial in which he appears—that of Lord Mohun for the murder of Richard Coote—the peers paid him the compliment of naming him particularly to sum up the evidence instead of Sir John Hawles, the solicitor-general, whom from his dulness and lowness of voice they could not understand. But, as it was contrary to the etiquette of the bar, Sir John was allowed to proceed. (State Trials, xii. 1446, xiii. 123, 1055.)

In 1695 he was returned with his father to parliament for Hertford, and tradition reports that on the day of his entrance into the house he spoke three times, and with such effect as to establish his character as an orator. He represented the same constituency in the parliament of 1698, but in the following year the family interest in the borough was disturbed, and his own professional success materially endangered, by the unfounded charge brought against his brother Spencer of the murder of a young Quaker named Sarah Stout. Notwithstanding the acquittal that followed, the influence of the Cowpers in Hertford was so damaged that they did not venture to stand in the election of 1701; but William was returned for Beeralston in that and the last parliament of William III. and in the first of Queen Anne, at the end of which he ceased to be a commoner. The parliamentary history records only two important speeches delivered by him while in the House of Commons—one on the bill of attainder against Sir John Fenwick in 1696, and the other on the Aylesbury case in 1704, in support of the right of the subject to seek redress at law against a returning officer for corruptly refusing to receive his legal vote. He also defended Lord Somers when impeached, and in 1704 he was censured by the house for pleading for Lord Halifax. (Parl. Hist. v. 1007, 1141, vi. 279; Burnet, iv. 480; Luttrell, v. 488.)

When the tory ascendancy began to be diminished, the removal of Lord Keeper Wright, the weakest and most inefficient man of the party, was determined on. Passing over the attorney and solicitor general, Cowper, at the urgent instigation of the Duchess of Marlborough, was selected from the whig ranks to hold the Seal. It was delivered to him as lord keeper on October 11, 1705. The commencement of his judicial career was illustrated by a noble reform. It had been a custom of long standing for the officers of the court and the members of the bar to present new years' gifts to the chancellor or keeper, a practice which, if not actual bribery, he considered looked very like it. These he at once refused to receive; and the extent of the sacrifice may be estimated, if not by his wife's calculation that they amounted to nearly 3000*l.*, by Burnet's more probable computation of 1500*l.* With such a proof of his moderation and delicacy, it is curious that he did not abolish the equally obnoxious custom of selling the offices in the chancellor's gift. By the evidence on the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield it appears that he received 500*l.* on the admission of a master in Chancery. Although it is difficult to perceive the distinction between the two customs, it is clear that he did not consider them as coming under the same category, and that he did not anticipate the evil consequences to which the latter might lead. At the same time he forbade the clerks to demand any extra fee for the performance of their duties. On the death of his father in November 1706 he succeeded to the baronetcy, and on the 9th of the same month he was ennobled with the title of Lord Cowper of Wingham. (Evelyn, iii. 407; Burnet, v. 243; Luttrell, vi. 111; State Trials, xvi. 1154.)

His first wife having died six months before his elevation, he married, secondly, Mary, daughter of John Clavering, Esq., of Chopwell in the bishopric of Durham.

Lord Cowper was one of the commissioners for the Union with Scotland, and zealously assisted Lord Somers in the negotiations. Upon its being completed the queen invested him, on May 4, 1707, with the title of lord high chancellor of Great Britain; and from that time the designation of lord keeper fell into desuetude, only one other possessor of the Great Seal having been so distinguished up to the present day. For the next three years the whig party retained its influence; but at last, by its own folly in the impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell, the popularity it had acquired was transferred to its political opponents. The prosecution stirred up all the dormant feelings of the people, revived the cry of 'The Church in danger,' and so strengthened the efforts of the tory advisers of the queen that the whig members of the government were soon after dismissed. The Duke of Marlborough had during the contest ambitiously demanded to be made captain-general for life; but Lord Cowper, though united with him in politics, represented to the queen that such an appointment would be highly unconstitutional, and by his advice the application was rejected. His lordship, though strongly pressed by the queen to keep the Seal, was firm in his resolve to follow the fate of his colleagues, and resigned on September 23, 1710. He then entered at once into an avowed, and it must be acknowledged sometimes a factious, opposition to the new ministry; and, according to the fashion then prevalent, occasionally supported his views and answered the attacks of his opponents in the periodical publications of the day. He remained unemployed for the four remaining years of Queen Anne's reign; but on her death he was found to be one of the lords justices nominated by the Elector of Hanover, who showed the tendency of his opinions by selecting them principally from the whig party. The queen died on August 1, 1714, and King George, arriving in England on September 18, immediately formed his ministry and reinstated Lord Cowper in the office of lord chancellor on the 21st.

On his appointment he presented to the king a long paper which he called 'An Impartial History of Parties,' but which is anything but what its title imports. In professing to describe the two parties, whig and tory, into which the people were divided, he artfully depreciates all the acts and principles of the latter, and represents the former as the only one which it would be expedient or safe for his majesty to trust. The antipathy of one faction against the other was at its height, and was exhibited by the vindictive course which the new ministry pursued against the leaders of the party they had supplanted. Lord Cowper took too prominent a part in these proceedings, and it may not be improbable that the extremes to which their animosity was carried hurried on the rebellion of 1715. To his energetic representation to the king may perhaps be attributed the speedy suppression of that rebellion. His conduct on the trial of the rebel lords, when he acted as lord high steward, supported his previous reputation.

During his second chancellorship the Riot Act, the Septennial Bill, and the Mutiny Bill, after violent opposition, became law, and to the passing of them he gave his powerful aid. Intrigues were formed for his removal as early as October 1715, and continued in the two succeeding years, till at last, though his party remained in power, he resigned the Seal on April 15, 1718, having been on the 18th of the preceding month honoured, as a special mark of the royal approbation, with the additional title of Viscount Fordwich and Earl Cowper. He lived more than four years afterwards, and continued to the last days of his life to take a prominent lead in the debates, and a deep and impartial interest in the various measures proposed on the one side or the other. He died after a few days' illness at his seat at Colne Green on October 10, 1723, and was buried in the parish church of Hertingfordbury. His wife followed him four months afterwards, literally dying of a broken heart.

Of Lord Cowper's character as a statesman there will always be two opinions. The course of his conduct that would excite Burnet's or Wharton's applause would certainly be decried by Swift and the tory writers. But all would allow that he was a firm adherent to the principles he professed, and that those principles tended to civil and religious liberty, and that the motives which guided him were pure and straightforward, though occasionally tainted with a little too much of party prejudice. Of his extraordinary oratorical powers, of the singular gracefulness of his elocution, of the sweetness of his disposition, and of his integrity and impartiality as a judge there has never been any question. Of his urbanity and consideration for the feelings of others we have a striking instance in his repressing the harsh personal remarks made by a counsel against Richard Cromwell in a cause to which he was a party, by immediately addressing the old protector, and kindly begging him to take a seat beside him on the bench.

Though not particularly eminent for classical learning, he was well versed in the literature of his country, and was a generous patron to its professors, among whom were John Hughes and Ambrose Philips, who devoted some graceful verses to his memory. Among his prose eulogists were Burnet, Steele, Lords Chesterfield and Wharton, and a host of other minor authors.

Even Swift himself, in his 'Four Last Years of Queen Anne,' is compelled to speak of him with as much praise as his crabbed nature and party prejudices would allow.

The earl's London residences were in Russell Street and Powis House, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and subsequently in Great George Street; and his country one was at a spot called Colne Green, in the parish of Hertingfordbury, the manor of which he had purchased. The house which he built there was pulled down in the beginning of this century, and replaced by the present stately mansion of Penshanger, where his successors flourish.

COWPER, SPENCER, was the younger brother of the above William Earl Cowper. Born in 1669, he received his education at Westminster School, and having been called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn, he was immediately appointed by the corporation of London, in June 1690, comptroller of the Bridge House estates, a post of considerable responsibility, which entitled him to a residence at the Bridge House, in the parish of St. Olave, Southwark. There he lived for some years, and gained the respect of his neighbours by his exemplary conduct and social manners. There, too, he executed with great usefulness the duty of a magistrate, having been soon placed on the commission of the peace; and there he filled many offices of trust connected with the locality.

In the midst of these prosperous circumstances he was suddenly charged with a crime which threatened not only to blast the character he had acquired, but to consign him to an ignominious end. In the course of the Home Circuit which he travelled he was in the habit of visiting Hertford, of which both his father and his brother were representatives in parliament. Residing with her mother in that town was a young woman named Sarah Stout, the daughter of a respectable Quaker deceased, who had been a firm friend of the Cowpers; and both the brothers and their wives had shown a kind interest in her welfare. At the spring assizes of 1699 Spencer had dined with her on March 13, and after supper had gone home to his lodgings about eleven o'clock. On the next morning she was found in the river, and an inquest was immediately held on the body, at which Spencer Cowper was present and gave his evidence, which resulted in a verdict that the deceased drowned herself, being non compos mentis. About a month after this, with no further evidence than was submitted to the coroner's jury, the mother and brother commenced a prosecution, charging not only Spencer Cowper, but two attorneys and a scrivener, who had been heard making some loose remarks at their lodgings about the girl, with first strangling her and then throwing her into the water where she was found. The parties were summoned before Lord Chief Justice Holt, who at first dismissed them, but after two subsequent examinations was induced on May 19 to commit Mr. Cowper for trial to the King's Bench prison, where he remained till the next assizes. The prisoners were arraigned at Hertford on July 16, and after a long trial were acquitted, as Luttrell remarks, 'to the satisfaction of the auditors.' Every one who reads the trial must join in this satisfaction, for a more unfounded charge could not be made. Judge Hatsel presided, and by his querulousness at the trial and the stupidity of his summing up, the prisoners had certainly no cause to thank him for their acquittal.

But Cowper's persecution was not yet over. Whether from a conviction of his guilt and a thirst for revenge, which seems scarcely possible; or from a desire to clear the Society of Friends from the imputation that one of their body could be affected by worldly passions, which no doubt in some measure operated; or from the excitement of party spirit prompting the opponents of the Cowpers to endeavour to destroy the interest of the family in the borough, which is far more likely, as a new election was near at hand; for one or the other of these reasons the question was kept alive, at first by pamphlets, and subsequently by much more unjustifiable means. The law allowed an appeal for murder to be instituted within a year and a day after the death by the next heir of the deceased. Such an heir was immediately found, who was an infant; but, instead of at once obtaining the necessary writ, the prosecutors purposely delayed issuing it till three or four days before the expiration of the term; and this they did without the knowledge or consent of the infant heir, the nominal appellant, or of his mother, who were not even made acquainted with the proceeding for a month afterwards. Naturally disgusted at the prosecutors' conduct, they applied for and obtained from the sheriff the writ and return, which they forthwith put into the fire. This the prosecutors endeavoured to remedy by applying to the lord keeper for a new writ, which he, assisted by four learned judges, very properly refused, on the ground that the first writ had been clandestinely and fraudulently procured, that it was absolutely renounced by the pretended plaintiff, and the delay in its issue showed that the prosecutors did not design justice, but to spin out a scandal as long as they could, maliciously and vexatiously. Mr. Cowper during these discussions appeared in court, and declared his readiness to answer. Thus this affair terminated; but the principal object was answered, by the dissolution for the time of the Cowper interest in the town.

(State Trials, xii. 1105; Luttrell, iv. 518-650; Lord Raymond, 555.)

Every impartial man acquitted Cowper, whose professional success was only temporarily impeded. He steadily advanced at the bar, and in 1705, when he resigned the office of comptroller, he succeeded his brother as member for Berealston, which he continued to represent in the two following parliaments. During the last of them he was one of the managers in the impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell, and had to conduct the second article. (Luttrell, vi. 551, 555; State Trials, xv. 152.) This prosecution lost him his election for the next parliament; and he did not sit again till the accession of George I., when he was returned for Truro. He then became, on October 22, 1714, attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, and in 1717 chief justice of Chester.

On George II. coming to the crown he at once promoted his old servant, raising him first to the attorney-generalship of the duchy of Lancaster, and then to the bench at Westminster. He was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas on October 24, 1727, but died in the next year, on December 10, at his chambers in Lincoln's Inn. He was buried at Hertingfordbury, where there is a beautiful monument to his memory by Rou-biliac, erected by order of his second wife, Theodora, widow of John Stepney, Esq. By her he had no issue, but by his first wife, Pennington, daughter of John Goodeve, Esq., he left three sons, the second of whom, the Rev. John Cowper, D.D., was the father of the delightful poet, William Cowper. (Lord Raymond, 1318, 1510.)

CRANWORTH, LORD. See R. M. ROLFE.

CRASSUS, RICHARD, had been prior of Henley in Buckinghamshire before he became abbot of Evesham. On the expulsion of Simon the Norman in 24 Henry III., 1239, the Great Seal is said to have been placed in his custody, and to have continued in his possession till his election as Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (or Chester, as it was then sometimes called) in 1242, when he resigned it. This election took place about November, but before he had received the rite of consecration he died at Riola in Gascony, on December 8, 1242. (Godwin, 317; Le Neve, 124.)

CRACOMBE, JOHN DE, was probably the son of Godfrey de Craucombe, who served King Henry III. as seneschal. (Madox, i. 63.) He was evidently a clerk in the Chancery, and, like most of his fellows, an ecclesiastic, sharing in the dignities usually distributed among that class of officers, by being made archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire.

The Great Seal was deposited in his hands and in those of Master John de Caen and William de Byrley during the temporary absence of the chancellor, John de Langton, in March 1298, and again in December. He continued to be summoned to the parliament among the clerks of the Chancery till February 1305, 33 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 138.)

CRAWLEY, FRANCIS, was of a Bedfordshire family, residing at Someris, near Luton. He received his legal education at Staple Inn and Gray's Inn, to the latter of which he was admitted on May 26, 1598, and, having been called to the bar in the usual time, was elected autumn reader in 1623, on the occasion of his being summoned to take the degree of the coif. In 1626 he was one of the counsel whom the Earl of Bristol desired to be assigned to him on his impeachment, and on October 11, 1632, he was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas, and knighted. In the great case of ship-money he not only joined the rest of the judges in their answer to the king's letter affirming its legality, but in an elaborate argument in the Exchequer Chamber, in February 1638, he gave a decided opinion in favour of the king against Hampden, which he repeated at the assizes, asserting in his charge to the grand jury 'that ship-money was so inherent a right in the crown that it would not be in the power of a parliament to take it away.' For these opinions, and particularly the last, he was impeached by the Long Parliament. In August 1641 the house resolved that the impeached judges should have no commissions to go the circuits; but it appears that they still continued to sit in Westminster Hall. Justice Crawley joined the king at Oxford in 1642, and in the following January was made doctor of civil law. (Wood's Fasti, ii. 44.) The state of the kingdom probably prevented his trial from taking place, notwithstanding his extreme unpopularity; but on November 24, 1645, the Commons passed an ordinance disabling him and four others 'from being judges, as though they were dead.' (White Locke, 181.)

He died on February 13, 1649, and was buried at Luton. His wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Rotherham, knight of that place, by whom he left two sons, the younger of whom was the undermentioned Francis.

CRAWLEY, FRANCIS, second son of the above Sir Francis Crawley, was also at Gray's Inn, being admitted on August 7, 1623, and called to the bar in February 1638. His appointment to the office of cursor baron of the Exchequer took place in 1670, when he must have been nearly seventy years of age, and he held for four years, till his death in 1683.

He is described as having an estate of 1000*l.* a year in Bedfordshire in 1670, when named as one of the knights of the contemplated order of the Royal Oak; but he afterwards resided at Northaw in Hertfordshire. By his wife, Mary, daughter of Richard Clutterbuck, Esq., he had seven children, the descendants of whom now flourish at Stockwood Park in Hertfordshire.

CREPPING, WALTER DE, resided at Crepping, a manor in Essex which belonged to the Earls of Oxford, and was one of the justices itinerant who set the tallage on that county in 8 Richard I., 1186. He was soon after raised to the bench at Westminster, and his name appears on many fines levied during the first eleven years of the reign of King John, and he is named on a record of 13 John. (Madax, i. 704; Abb. Placit., 82.)

CREPPING, RICHARD DE, was of a Yorkshire family, and it seems probable was the son of Robert de Crepping, who for several years in the reign of Henry III. was one of the king's escheators beyond the Trent. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 69.) Richard can scarcely be considered to have been a regular justice itinerant (as Dugdale calls him), as he only acted in reference to pleas of the forest in Lancashire and Nottinghamshire, in 14 Edward I., 1286. He was returned as knight of the shire for York in 18 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 21.)

CRESHELD, RICHARD, is called three times by Whitelocke (269, 342, 378) 'Mr. Serjeant Creswell,' and in the propositions made by the parliament to the king in February 1643, of those whom they desire to be appointed justices of the Common Pleas, his name is so inserted. (Clarendon, iii. 407.)

But there was no serjeant of the name. The person intended is Richard Cresheld, who was summoned to take the coif in 1636 (Rymer, xx. 22), and who is recorded under that name in Dugdale's List of Serjeants. By an abbreviated mispronunciation of the name it became corrupted to Creswell, for even in Sir W. Jones's Reports (390) of the period he is called, when appointed, 'Creswell.'

He was admitted into the society of Lincoln's Inn on June 18, 1608, under the description of 'Richard Cresheld, son of Edward Cresheld, of Mattishall-Burgh in the county of Norfolk,' and was called to the bar on October 17, 1615, and became bencher in 1633. He sat for the borough of Evesham in Worcestershire in King James's last parliament, and was returned member for the same place (of which he was recorder) in all the parliaments in King Charles's reign. (Notes and Queries, 2nd S. i. 460.) In 1628 he led the van in the Committee of Grievances, in a speech sufficiently complimentary to the king, but arguing strongly against the legality of imprisonment without declaration of the cause (Parl. Hist. ii. 240); but he does not appear to have often taken part in the debates.

That he accommodated himself to the views of the popular party is apparent by his receiving the thanks of the Commons on November 2, 1642, for 'the good service done by Serjeant Cresweld in the country upon the matter of contributions and other services' (Commons' Journals, ii. 831), by their proposing him to be a judge in 1643, and by their appointing him one in 1648; but that he disapproved of their violent proceedings is equally apparent from his refusal to act under their usurped authority on the death of the king. He died in Serjeants' Inn in 1652, and was buried in St. Andrew's, Holborn, in the register of which his name is properly spelled.

CRESSI, HUGH DE, was for six successive years of the reign of Henry II., commencing in 1175, employed as one of the justices itinerant, and in 1177 his name appears among the king's regular justiciars at Westminster. (Madax, i. 94.)

He was a Norman by birth, and had been some time previously attached to the king's service; and that he added military to his judicial services is shown by his having the custody of the tower of Rouen in 1180, at a salary of 200*l.* a year, and by a grant which he received in 1184, 30 Henry II., of 100*l.* on the Norman Roll, for the soldiers whom he led in the war of Poictou. (Rot. Scacc. Normannie, i. 70, 115.)

He married Margaret, the daughter and heir of William de Cayneto, or Quesnay, who survived him, and afterwards became the wife of Robert Fitz-Roger, lord of Clavering in Essex. He left a son named Roger, who was in the wardship of this Robert Fitz-Roger till his majority in 1205, when he obtained possession of his father's lands in Suffolk, Sussex, and Lincoln.

The barony does not appear to have continued beyond the fifth generation, finishing with the after-named William de Cressi, justice of trailbaston under Edward I.

CRESSI, WILLIAM DE. His relationship with the above Hugh de Cressi is not known. Though he had a grant of forty librates of the Norman lands in Norfolk in 6 John (Cal. Rot. Pat. 8), he seems to have joined the barons in the last years of that reign, a safe-conduct having been given to him in December 1215 to go and speak to the king as to making his peace. (Rot. Pat. 162.) In this he was no doubt successful, being employed in the next year with others to take a recognition as to the last presentation of the church of Mareseye in Nottinghamshire. In that and the neighbouring counties he was one of the justices itinerant in 3 Henry III., 1219, and again in 1225.

CRESSI, WILLIAM DE, was the lineal descendant of the above Hugh de Cressi, and the son of Stephen de Cressi, and Sibylla, the daughter and heir of John de Braytoft. He was summoned to attend the king on urgent affairs in 22 and 25 Edward I. He was returned as holding lands in Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, and Lincolnshire, and when the commission of trailbaston was issued for those counties, on November 23, 1304, 33 Edward I., he was the second of the three justices then assigned. (Parl. Writs, i. 407-8; Nicolas's Synopsis.)

CRESSINGHAM, HUGH DE, son of William de Cressingham, was an officer of the Exchequer. In 18 Edward I. he is called seneschal of the queen (Abb. Placit. i. 30, 33), and in 1292 he was appointed with two others to investigate and audit the debts due to Henry III. (Madox, ii. 291.) In that and the three following years he was at the head of the justices itinerant for the northern counties. (Year Book, i. 33.) He was a canon of St. Paul's, and held at least nine parsonages. Prynne calls him 'an insatiable pluralist;' and Hemingford gives a similar character, and ascribes to him an immoderate passion for hoarding money. (Archæologia, xxv. 608.)

When the king defeated the Scotch, and Baliol renounced the throne, in 1296, Cressingham was appointed treasurer of that country, and on the disorders which followed Edward's departure was commanded not to scruple to spend the whole money in the exchequer to put them down. Proud, ignorant, and violent, he made himself hateful to the Scots by his oppressions: and on the rising of Wallace in the following year, preferring the cuirass to the cassock, he joined the Earl of Surrey in leading the royal army to Stirling. Wallace left the siege of Dundee, in which he was engaged, and by a rapid march drew up his army on the other bank of the river Forth before the arrival of the English forces. By Cressingham's rashness the latter were led over the bridge, and were terribly defeated, he being among the first who fell. 'So deep was the detestation in which his character was regarded that his body was mangled, the skin torn from his limbs, and in savage triumph cut to pieces.' It is said that Wallace ordered as much of his skin to be taken off as would make a sword-belt, a story which has been absurdly extended to its having been employed in making girths and saddles. (Tytler's Scotland, i. 123-143.) The Scots called him 'non thesaurarium sed trayturarium regis.' (Trivet's Annales, 306, note.) He held the town of Hendon and land in Finchley in Middlesex, with the manor of Coulinge in Suffolk. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 134.)

of English history, a regular succession of male heirs having possessed the estate from the days of Richard I. till the death of John Cresswell in 1781. That gentleman left two daughters, one of whom, Frances Dorothea, married Francis Easterby, Esq., of Blackheath, who, purchasing the other sister's moiety, became possessed of the whole estate, and assumed the name of Cresswell. Of that union Sir Cresswell Cresswell was the fourth son. He was born in 1793, and, passing through the Charterhouse from 1806 to 1810, he went in the latter year to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he had for his tutor the future Justice Maule. He took his degree of B.A. in 1814, and of M.A. in 1818, and then, pursuing his legal studies in the Inner Temple, was called to the bar in 1819, and naturally joined the Northern Circuit. Here he soon showed that ability and power that ever after distinguished him, and long before he became by seniority the leader of the circuit, scarcely any cause was tried in which he was not engaged on one side or the other. In 1830 he was appointed recorder of Hull, and in 1834 received a silk gown.

In 1841 he defeated Mr. William Ewart, the whig member, in a contest for Liverpool, and soon secured to himself that admiration in the house which it is not generally the fortune of lawyers to gain.

Sir Robert Peel, on the very first vacancy that occurred, selected him as a judge of the Common Pleas, whereupon he was knighted. In that court, from January 1842 to January 1858, he discharged the duties in the most admirable manner; and at the latter date he consented to undertake the organisation of the new court then created for deciding testamentary and divorce causes. The manner in which he overcame the difficulties attendant on the new judicature, and met the perpetually increasing demands on its decisions, which unexpectedly accumulated in overwhelming numbers, were eloquently and justly described by Sir Robert Phillimore, the queen's advocate, on the opening of the court after his lamented decease, which occurred on July 29, 1858, from the effects of a fall from his horse two days before.

CREWE, RANULPHE, was a descendant from the younger branch of a family resident at Crew, or Crue, a manor in Chesire in the reign of Edward I. (Cal. Inq. p. m. i. 119.) His father, John Crewe, was settled at Nantwich, where he is said to have been a tanner. By his wife, Alice Maddingwaring, he left two sons, both of whom were the ancestors of noble families. The elder, Thomas, the younger, was a serjeant-at-law, and speaker of the House of Commons in the reigns of both James I. and Charles I., and his son, John Crewe 1661 was created Baron Crewe, of Stene in Northamptonshire, which barony became extinct in 1721.

Ranulph Crewe was born about 1558. He was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn on November 8, 1584, and was elected reader in 1602. In 1597 he entered parliament as member for Brackley; and in 1598 he married Juliana, the daughter and heir of John Clipsby, of Clipsby in Norfolk, with whom he had a fair inheritance. (Fuller, i. 188.) He does not seem to have been much employed in the courts, yet it is evident that his reputation as a lawyer must have been considerable, as he was selected to defend the king's title to alnage in the House of Lords in 1606, for his 'travail and pains' in which he received 10*l.* (Pell Records, Jac. 64), and as his professional income was so considerable that he was enabled, two years afterwards, to gratify the great object of his ambition by the acquisition of the ancestral property from which he derived his name; and thus becoming repossessed of the estate which for nearly three hundred years had had no Crewe for its owner, he built the magnificent mansion there which has ever since been the seat of the family.

He was selected as speaker of that parliament which met on April 5, 1614, and was so hastily dissolved on the 7th of the following June, to which he was returned as representative of his native county, and was knighted the day after the dissolution. Called to the degree of the coif and made king's serjeant in the following month, he sat in 1615 as a commissioner on the trial of Weston for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, and was one of the counsel for the crown against the Earl and Countess of Somerset. (State Trials, ii. 911, 952, 989.) He was also concerned in the shameful trial of Edward Peacham for treason at Taunton. (Walter Yonge's Diary, 28.)

He was not in the next parliament of 1620, but conducted the proceedings in the House of Lords against Sir Francis Michell, the monopolist, Sir Henry Yelverton, late attorney-general, and Sir John Bennet, judge of the Prerogative Court. (State Trials, ii. 1136, 1143, 1146.) In the parliament of 1624 he opened some of the charges against Cranfield, Earl of Middlesex (Parl. Hist. i. 1447); and when Sir James Ley succeeded that nobleman as lord treasurer, Sir Ranulph was selected to fill his place as chief justice of the King's Bench, to which he was promoted on January 26, 1625.

King James died in the following March. His successor, having angrily dissolved two parliaments in less than fifteen months, was compelled to resort to unconstitutional means to replenish his exhausted exchequer. One of these was by forced loans from his subjects according to the amount they would have paid towards a subsidy. The judges, who among the rest were applied to, paid the money demanded, but refusing to subscribe a paper recognising the legality of the collection, Chief Justice Crewe was selected as an example, and was discharged from his office on November 9, 1626. In 1628 he wrote a manly and modest letter to the Duke of Buckingham, pleading for his restoration to the king's favour. Whatever intentions the duke might have had of repairing the injury he had done to the chief justice, they were frustrated by his assassination by Felton, in the August of that year. After another application to the king himself, which produced no result, Sir Ranulph retired from public life. He survived his dismissal more than nineteen years, witnessing the calamitous effects of those illegal measures to which he had refused his judicial sanction, and suffering much from the consequences of the civil war, his revenues being seized and his mansion ransacked by the soldiers of that parliament which had made those measures the ostensible motive of the rebellion. (Hinchcliffe's Barthomley, 238.)

He died at his house in Westminster on January 13, 1646, and his remains were interred in a chapel he had erected in the church of Barthomley, the parish in which Crewe Hall is situate.

As a lawyer he was learned and painstaking; as a judge he was assiduous and patient; of his honesty, independence, and integrity he gave the best proof that man can offer; and of his eloquence he has left a most favourable specimen, in his speech to the Lords on the titles of De Vere. After describing the 600 years of unbroken lineage in the family, he exclaimed: 'I have laboured to make a covenant with myself that affection may not press upon judgment; for I suppose there is no man that hath any apprehension of gentry or nobleness, but his affection stands to the continuance of so noble a name and house, and would take hold of a twig or a twine-thread to uphold it. And yet Time has his revolutions; there must be a period and an end of all temporal things—finis rerum,—an end of names and dignities, and whatsoever is terrene; and why not of De Vere? For where is Bohun? Where is Mowbray? Where is Mortimer? Nay, which is more and most of all, where is Plantagenet? They are entombed in the urns and sepulchres of mortality. And yet let the name and dignity of De Vere stand so long as it pleaseth God!' (W. Jones's Reports, 101.)

By his first wife he left a son, Clipsby Crewe, whose granddaughter (married to John Offley, Esq., of Madeley in Staffordshire) ultimately succeeded to the inheritance. Their son took the name of Crewe, whose grandson was in 1806 created Lord Crewe of Crewe in Cheshire. Sir Ranulphe's second wife was another Juliana, daughter of Edward Fusey, of London, and relict of Sir Thomas Hesketh, Knt., by whom he had no children. (Barthomley, 239.)

CRIOL, NICHOLAS DE, was the son of Bertram de Criol, who was apparently an officer in the Exchequer and sheriff of Kent for many years, being then in such favour with Henry III. that part of the debt he owed to the crown was remitted.

That his son Nicholas retained the influence his father had possessed is shown by his receiving many favours from the king, and by his being entrusted with the sheriffalty of Kent in 48 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 232), and by his being made governor of Rochester Castle and warden of the Cinque Ports. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 34.)

In 1265 he is mentioned as a baron of the Exchequer, and as such sued one of his debtors in that court. (Madox, ii. 13, 319.) He died in 1272. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 20.)

By his wife Joan, daughter and heir of William de Auberville, he left a son Nicholas, who was summoned to parliament by Edward I., but not afterwards.

CROKE, JOHN. The original name of the Croke family was Le Blount. Two brothers, Robert and William Le Blount, younger sons of the Count de Guisnes, held high military commands in the army of William of Normandy on his descent upon England. After the Conquest they were rewarded by extensive grants of lands. The elder branch failed by the death of the sixth baron at the battle of Lewes in 1264; and of the younger branch, Sir Robert Blount, who was deeply implicated in the conspiracy to restore Richard II., was beheaded in 1400. Nicholas, his kinsman, being engaged in the same conspiracy, was outlawed, and took service under the Duke of Milan; but four years afterwards he ventured into England, and escaped observation by changing his name to Croke. On the death of Henry IV. he came out of his retirement, and bought lands in Buckinghamshire, where he resided at Easington, in the parish of Chilton. His great-grandson, John Croke, a master in Chancery in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary, by his wife, Prudentia Cave, left a son, who succeeded to his ample inheritance. His name was also John, and he was knighted by Queen Elizabeth when he was sheriff of Buckinghamshire, which county he also represented in parliament. Marrying Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Alexander Unton, of Chequers in that county, he had by her a numerous family, of whom two, this John and the next-mentioned George, became judges. The fifth son, William, is the only one whose male representatives have continued to the present time. One of them, Sir Alexander Croke, judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court in America, has commemorated his family in an elaborate 'Genealogical History,' of which full advantage has here been taken.

John Croke, the eldest son, was born in 1553, and entered the Inner Temple on April 13, 1570, and, having been in due course called to the bar, was appointed Lent reader in 1596, and treasurer in 1598. At a very early period he had acquired so great a reputation for his professional attainments that he was consulted by Sir Christopher Hatton, who gave him as his fee, 'for his counsell in lawe, a silver gilt bole and cover.' In 1595 he was elected recorder of London, and his biographer gives a copy of one of his speeches on presenting the lord mayor to the Court of Exchequer, which, in its elaboration, puts to shame the curtailed addresses of the present day. The same city chose him for their representative in the parliaments of 1597 and 1601, he having before, in 1585, been returned for the borough of Windsor.

Of the parliament that met in October 1601 he was unanimously chosen speaker, and in his speech on presentation he offered up his solemn prayers to heaven to continue the prosperous estate and peace of the kingdom, which, he said, had been defended by the mighty arm of our dread and sacred queen. Elizabeth, interrupting him, cried out, 'No; but by the mighty hand of God, Mr. Speaker. Early in the session Serjeant Heale, on the question of a subsidy, marvelled much that the house should stand upon granting it, at the time of payment, when all we had, he said, was her majesty's, and she may lawfully at her pleasure take it; 'yea,' added he, 'she hath as much right to all our lands and goods as to any revenue of the crown. At which all the house laughing and humming, the speaker was obliged to call them to order, saying that 'he that is speaking should be suffered to deliver his mind without interruption.' The grievance of monopolies occasioned great debates in this parliament, and the queen having politically anticipated the decision of the Commons, the speaker had the gratification of announcing to the house her resolution to revoke the patents that existed, and not grant any other. On the division upon a bill for enforcing attendance at church, the yeas being 105, and the noes 106, it was contended that the speaker had a vote which would make the votes even. Croke said 'he was foreclosed of his vote by taking that place which it had pleased them to impose upon him, and that he was to be indifferent to both parties.' At the close of the session, on December 19, the lord keeper concluded his speech by saying, 'For yourself, Mr. Speaker, her majesty commanded me to say that you have proceeded with such wisdom and discretion that it is much to your commendations, and that none before you have deserved more.'

About a year after this Croke received a summons to take upon him the degree of the coif on a day which occurred after the queen's death. The writ in consequence abated, but a new one was issued returnable the same day. He was called serjeant in Easter Term 1603, and knighted by King James, one of the king's serjeants on May 29, and a Welsh judge, whereupon he resigned the recordship. In 1604 he was appointed deputy to Sir George Hume, chancellor of the Exchequer. (Cal. St. Papers [1603], 70.)

On June 25, 1607, he was created a judge of the King's Bench, and fully sustained the character he had acquired as an advocate.

After performing his judicial duties for nearly thirteen years, he died at his house in Holborn on January 23, 1620, aged sixty-six, and was buried at Chilton.

His wife was Catherine, daughter of Sir Michael Blount, of Maple Durham in Oxfordshire, lieutenant of the Tower, by whom he had five sons, of whom no descendants remain.

CROKE, GEORGE, was seven years junior to his brother the above Sir John Croke. He was educated at the school at Thame, and at Christ Church College, Oxford. Having been entered of the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar in 1584, and appointed autumn reader in 1590, and again in Lent 1618. He commenced his parliamentary career in 1597 as member for Beeralston.

Though not mentioned in his own Reports as an advocate till Michaelmas 1588, he had commenced his collections for them seven years before, showing an early devotion to the practical part of his profession. He did not attain legal honours, however, till four years after his brother's death, in 1623, when he was made serjeant-at-law and king's serjeant nearly at the same time. King James knighted him on the occasion. Judge Whitelocke, in his Diary, says that he did not receive the coif sooner because he refused to give money, and offence was taken at his saying he thought 'it was not for the king'—so common it was in those days to pay for honours, and so large a part of these unholy payments were known to be appropriated by those about the court.

He was raised to the bench on February 11, 1625, as a justice of the Common Pleas, and in six weeks the death of James I. occurred, when his patent was renewed by King Charles, who, on October 9, 1628, removed him to the Court of King's Bench on the death of Sir John Doderidge. He had no successor in the Common Pleas, the opportunity being taken to reduce the judges from five, to which they had been increased by James I., to the original number of four. (Croke, Car. 127.)

The twelve years that he sat there were those that immediately preceded the Great Rebellion, which the courts of justice were greatly instrumental in hastening. They were used as tools to enforce the unconstitutional behests of the crown, which by the subservient decisions of the judges were declared to have the force of law. This servile spirit did not extend over the whole bench, and Sir George Croke was one of the minority whom neither the threats of power nor the hopes of favour could induce to swerve from the dictates of conscience. He was the only judge of the King's Bench excepted in the vote of the House of Commons from responsibility for delaying justice towards Selden, Holles, and the other members of parliament who were committed to the Tower for their speeches there; and in the great case of ship-money, though he had been induced in the first instance to join the rest of the judges, for the sake of conformity, in signing an abstract opinion declaring its legality, yet when it came judicially before him in Hampden's case he, in opposition to the majority, gave judgment against the crown; and in this courageous conduct he was imitated by Sir Richard Hutton, Sir Humphrey Davenport, and Sir John Denham. About 1640 Sir George, being then eighty years old, had petitioned to be relieved from his duties, and had received from the king a dispensation from his attendance in court or on the circuit, his judicial title, salary, and allowances being continued to him.

Sir George retired to his estate at Waterstock, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died on February 16, 1641-2, in the 82nd year of his age, and was buried at Waterstock in Oxfordshire, under a monument on which he is represented in his judicial robes, with an inscription commemorative of his private virtues and public patriotism, which, unlike the usual language of epitaphs, was acknowledged both by contemporaries and posterity to be a faithful picture of his character. His learning as a lawyer and his bearing as a judge are well described by his son-in-law, Sir Harbottle Grimston, in the preface to his Reports, which were not published till after his death. They were originally written by Sir George in the Norman-French language, but were translated by Sir Harbottle into English, and they consist of three volumes, one being appropriated to each of the reigns of Elizabeth, James, and Charles. The cases comprehend a period of sixty years, and afford an example of persevering industry not to be equalled. In the abbreviated language of the courts they are referred to as 'Cro. Eliz.,' 'Cro. Jac.,' and 'Cro. Car.,' and are always quoted with respect for their learning and accuracy.

He married Mary, the daughter of Sir Thomas Bennet, who was lord mayor of London in 1 James I., and whose brother Richard was ancestor to the noble houses of Arlington and Tankerville. This lady is said to have encouraged and confirmed her husband in his resolution not to be influenced by the persuasions of the king's friends to give a judgment in the case of ship-money contrary to conscience. She survived him fifteen years, and died on December 1, 1657. By her he had one son, who died early, and three daughters, one of whom married Sir Harbottle Grimston, the master of the Rolls.

CROKEDAYK, ADAM DE, was one of the two justices of assize appointed in 21 Edward I., 1293, for Lincoln and nine other counties, and was summoned among the justices to several parliaments. (Parl. Writs, i. 29-138.) He is mentioned in 25 Edward I. as assigned to assess and collect the ninth imposed for the king's confirmation of Magna Charta in the northern counties. (Rot. Parl. i. 230-241.) Three years afterwards he was appointed to perambulate the forests of the counties of York and Cumberland, and in 31 and 33 Edward I. there are writs in his name, showing he was still engaged in legal employments. In the latter year he died, possessed of very considerable property in Cumberland. (Parl. Writs, i. 398; Abb. Placit. 249, 254; Cal. Inq. p. m. i. 198.)

CROKESLEY, JOHN DE, was one of the king's escheators of the forest of Rockingham, and also custos of Skipton and other royal manors. (Rot. Parl. ii. 414; Madox, i. 721.) It was only for pleas of the forest that he was a justice itinerant in Essex, from 20 to 29 Edward I., 1292-1301, where he received six shillings a day for his expenses. (Parl. Writs, i. 88, 307.) He died in the following year.

CROKESLEY, RICHARD DE, succeeded the before-mentioned Richard de Barking as abbot of Westminster on March 25, 1247. (Monasticon, ii. 283.) He is twice named by Madox (ii. 318, 319) in his List of Barons of the Exchequer in 35 and 42 Henry III., taking precedence of the treasurer, instead of being placed, as his predecessor was, after him. In the interval between these two dates he had been despatched by the king as his ambassador to the court of Rome (Rymer, i. 344), and on two other occasions had been sent on missions to the Duke of Brabant, to negotiate a marriage between Prince Edward and the duke's daughter. Matthew Paris describes him as a learned and elegant man, with a handsome person and a pleasing voice. He died about July 21, 1258, as some say by poison (Dart's Westminster, ii. xxi.), leaving such extravagant bequests to the poor that a mandate was procured from the pope limiting the expense. (Paddington, Past and Present, by W. Robins, 1853.)

CROMPTON, CHARLES, was descended from an old family settled at Derby as eminent bankers, several of them having been members for the county, and one of them raised to a baronetcy in 1838, which died with him in 1849. The judge was the third son of Peter Crompton, Esq., M.D., of Eaton, near Liverpool, by his cousin Mary, the daughter of John Crompton, Esq., of Chorley in Lancashire.

It is somewhat remarkable that of the judges of the reign of Victoria there are at least eight who can boast of medical paternity—Lords Denman, Langdale, and Westbury, and Justices Maule, Park, Vaughan, Crompton, and Willea. To these may be added Lord Chancellor Lord Cottenham, who was the nephew of the eminent physician to George III., Sir Lucas Pepys, Bart.

Charles Crompton was born at Derby in 1797, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated with great distinction, obtaining honours in 1814, 1815, and 1816. He then entered the Inner Temple, and was admitted as a barrister in November 1821. On the Northern and the Western Circuits he soon became known as a deeply read lawyer, and consequently acquired great experience in the practical part of the profession both there and in Westminster Hall. He successively filled the posts of tub-man and post-man in the Court of Exchequer, where he was counsel for the Board of Stamps and Taxes. Of the decisions in that court he was a reporter from 1830 to 1836, in conjunction at first with Mr. (afterwards Chief Justice) Jervis, and subsequently with Messrs. Meeson and Roscoe. In 1836 he was appointed assessor of the Court of Passage at Liverpool, and in 1851 he was selected as one of the commissioners enquiring into the proceedings, practice, and jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. On the retirement of Sir John Patteson from the Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Crompton was appointed in February 1852, and received the customary knighthood. He was obliged from illness to resign his seat in October 1865, and on the 30th of the month he died.

He married a daughter of Thomas Fletcher, Esq., of Liverpool, by whom he left several children.

CROMWELL, THOMAS (EARL OF ESSEX), was born towards the latter end of the fifteenth century, at Putney, where his father Walter Cromwell carried on the business, first of a blacksmith, and then of a brewer. His mother, after Walter's death, was married to a cloth-sheerer in London. His education was that of his class, but his activity and intelligence were great, and early in life he had the advantage of going abroad, in what capacity is not known. During this period he so improved his opportunities that he mastered several foreign languages, and acquired that aptness in the conduct of affairs for which he was afterwards distinguished. He seems, from a letter addressed to him by Cecily, Marchioness of Dorset, commencing 'Cromwell, I will that you send to me,' &c., to have been at one time in the household of that lady. (Ellis's Letters, 1st S. i. 218.)

While at Antwerp he was retained by the English merchants there to be their clerk or secretary, and during his employment in their affairs he became acquainted with Sir Richard Gresham, the father of the founder of the Royal Exchange. (Burgon's Gresham, i. 218.) Whether this took place before or after his admission to Gray's Inn in 1524 is uncertain; but there is no doubt that he afterwards went to Rome, since he was present as a soldier at the sacking of that city in May 1527 under the Duke of Bourbon. He is represented as having been engaged at Antwerp by two persons from Boston in Lincolnshire to accompany them and endeavour to obtain from the pope a renewal of the indulgences granted to the guild of Our Lady in their church of St. Botolph, and as having succeeded by gratifying his holiness's palate with some dainty jellies made after the English fashion. Drayton, in 'The Mirror for Magistrates,' intimates that the pope's favour was obtained by Cromwell's singing to him 'freemen's catches,' and further alludes to his playing there, with other of his countrymen, 'as a comedian.' (Notes and Queries, 3rd S. xi. 74.)

Returning to England, Cromwell was admitted into the family of Cardinal Wolsey, who had met him in France and at once appreciated his abilities. What office he held in that household does not clearly appear, but in the two years that he was retained in the family he made himself eminently useful, assisting Wolsey in many important matters, and particularly in the foundation of his colleges at Ipswich and Oxford. This short service was sufficient to create so great an affection as to prompt him to come boldly forward, apparently at the risk of the king's displeasure, in defence of his fallen master. Having procured a seat in the House of Commons, 'there was nothing,' to use Cavendish's words, 'at any time objected against my lord but he was ready to make answer thereunto; by means whereof he, being earnest in his master's behalf, was reputed the most faithful servant to his master of all other, and was generally of all men highly commended.' When the bill of impeachment was sent down to the Commons, 'against it Master Cromwel did inveigh so discreetly, and with such witty persuasions, that the same would take no effect.' It is impossible, however, considering the general subserviency of parliament, not to believe that he had received some encouragement from the king before he ventured on this opposition.

That he had then access to his [majesty] is manifest from his being sent on various comforting messages to Wolsey, among which was the communication of the royal intention to give 10,000*l.* when the cardinal was going into the north. He was almost immediately taken into the king's service. Wolsey died on November 29, 1530; and in less than eighteen months Cromwell had made himself so serviceable to the king that he was rewarded with the post of master and treasurer of the king's jewels, on April 14, 1532. (Auditor's Patent Book, i. 130.)

Stow (Thoms's, 67) tells a story which charges Cromwell with making an oppressive use of the power he had thus attained, in the erection of his house and the enlargement of his garden in Throgmorton Street; but it is not unlikely that there is some exaggeration in the tale, since Cromwell on other occasions showed a grateful and a feeling heart, remembering in his prosperity the services he had received when he was poor. At the gate of this very house also, in Throgmorton Street, which is now the site of Drapers' Hall, two hundred persons were served with bread, meat, and drink twice a day when Cromwell had the means to be bountiful.

On July 16, 1532, he received the profitable office of clerk of the Hanaper, with an annual rent of 40*l.*; and on April 12, 1533, the still more important one of chancellor of the Exchequer. (Rymer, xiv. 456.) It was about this time that Sir Thomas More gave him that excellent advice, which it would have been well for him to have followed, and which was dictated probably by the great man's suspicions that Cromwell was the prompter of those ecclesiastical questions which were then being agitated. After communing together on a message Cromwell had delivered from the king, Sir Thomas, who had lately resigned the chancellorship, said to him, 'Mark, Cromwell, you are now entered into the service of a most noble, wise, and liberal prince; if you will follow my poor advice, you shall, in your council-giving to his grace, ever tell him what he ought to do, but never what he is able to do. . . . For if a lion knew his own strength, hard were it for any man to rule him.' (Singer's Roper, 55.) On October 8, 1534, he was made master of the Rolls, having previously been appointed principal secretary to the king. In the next year he was nominated visitor-general of the monasteries, under the pretence of correcting the known abuses in them, but in fact to lay the foundation of their ultimate dissolution.

There can be no doubt that Cromwell was an early convert to the reformed opinions, and he is said even in his journey to Rome to have learned by heart Erasmus's translation of the New Testament. He had encouraged the writers and promoted the circulation of ballads and books ridiculing the pope and all popish idolatry. (Maitland's Reformation, 236.) His name therefore was naturally held in utter detestation by all those who adhered to the old religion, and every species of wickedness and cunning was charged upon him. We must consequently be cautious in adopting the terms of vituperation with which writers of that church assail his character, and hesitate to give full credit to all the stories they tell to his disadvantage. At the same time there is no doubt that his zeal in the king's service, strengthened possibly by his own convictions of the inutility, if not the evils, of the monastic establishments, betrayed him into measures which even now have the appearance of harshness, making no distinction between well-conducted houses and those which were a pest and a nuisance, nor discriminating between the virtuous and the guilty, but involving all in one common ruin. The personal grants also that he obtained out of the religious plunder of course occasioned, and perhaps justified, the imputation that avarice had a share in prompting his energetic proceedings. And yet, while doubting his motives in reference to these acts of severity, it would be unjust not to advert to that conduct which seems to result from the real feelings of his nature—his tenderness towards Sir Thomas More. He was one of those who urgently pressed the king to exclude the name of Sir Thomas from the bill of attainder in connection with the 'Holy Maid of Kent,' and he it was who sent the comforting message to the fallen chancellor, that he had succeeded. In the examinations which took place as to the oath of supremacy and matrimony, in which Cromwell was a necessary actor as the king's secretary, he exerted himself to save Sir Thomas, who in several letters speaks of him in terms of gratitude. (Singer's Roper, 114–158.)

After holding the office of master of the Rolls for somewhat less than two years, he resigned it on July 2, 1536, for the more elevated one of keeper of the privy seal (Rymer, xiv. 571), and on the 6th of the same month he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Cromwell of Okeham in the county of Rutland. This creation was no doubt made to give greater weight to a higher dignity which was reserved for him. The king having thrown off his obedience to the pope, and assumed the rule in all ecclesiastical matters, required a representative to conduct the business which thus devolved upon him. To this duty he appointed Cromwell on July 18, with the title of vicar-general and vicegerent, in which character he sat in synods and convocations above the whole prelacy of the kingdom—a position which a layman could scarcely be deemed competent to fill. Even in parliament precedence was allotted to him, not only above all peers, but above the great officers of the crown.

It is curious that, though Cromwell was never admitted into holy orders, the king in this very year, as if for the purpose of investing him with some ecclesiastical character, presented him with the prebend of Blewbury, in the church of Salisbury, and in the following with the deanery of Wells (Rymer, xiv. 569; Le Neve, 36)—preferments which he held till his death.

The proceedings which he took in the quality of vicar-general belong more to the history of the Church than to this biography. Suffice it to say that, steering wisely between the conflicting opinions of the king, who, while he repudiated the pope's authority, retained the principal points of the old religion, Cromwell discouraged the obnoxious practices of popery, as the worship of images, &c., and served the cause of the Reformation most effectually by directing the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Commandments to be taught to children in their mother-tongue, and by ordering the Bible in English to be placed in all churches for the parishioners to read at their pleasure. To prevent the publication of corrupt copies of the Holy Scriptures, a patent was afterwards granted to him which prohibited all persons from printing an English edition except those who were deputed to him. To him also is to be attributed the useful introduction into each parish of a register of births, marriages, and deaths. The rapid elevation of a man of so obscure an origin naturally disgusted the nobles, his efforts in suppressing the monasteries, and in promulgating the king's supremacy, and the new tenets, created many against him by a large portion of the clergy; and the extravagance with which the produce of the confiscated abbeyes was wasted, together with the demands which he was in consequence compelled to make on both clergy and laity to supply the deficiency in the king's coffers, rendered him an object of odium in the eyes of all but the king, who, benefiting by his exertions, appreciated his zeal and capacity, and estimated them at a higher value from his resolute defiance of the unpopularity that followed him. He was accordingly rewarded with munificent grants of manors and lands which had belonged to the dissolved houses, a list of which is given in Dugdale; and additional dignities were conferred upon him, among which was the office of chief justice of the forests beyond the Trent.

With these continued proofs of the royal favour, he might still have disregarded the efforts of his enemies, had he not in his anxiety to support his position taken a step which alienated the affections of his only friend. The king's avowed adherence to the ancient doctrines of the Church had encouraged those who continued to be attached to them; they were gradually obtaining an ascendancy in the royal councils, and the advocates of the reformed tenets were consequently placed in a difficult dilemma. Cromwell could not but see the danger that hung over him, and, deeming that his party would resume its power if it had the support of a Protestant queen, he recommended, in an evil hour to himself, the Princess Anne of Cleves as the new partner of the royal bed. The disgust taken by the king to this lady from his first introduction to her is well known, and Cromwell soon became the victim of his resentment. He did not, however, immediately betray his purpose, but, on the contrary, heaped upon the devoted statesman higher honours. The marriage with Anne of Cleves was celebrated on January 6, 1540, and on April 17 Cromwell was created Earl of Essex, which was immediately followed by his admission into the order of the Garter, and his appointment to the office of lord high chamberlain of England.

It would almost seem that Cromwell was raised to this high pinnacle of greatness for the mere purpose of gratifying the capricious malice of the tyrant, for within two months after his elevation to the earldom he was suddenly arrested at the council table on June 10, on charges which must have been for some time in preparation. The principal crime alleged against him was heresy and the encouragement of heretics, and this was embellished with accusations of having spoken heinous words against the king two years before. In order that he might not have an opportunity of answering, a bill of attainder was hurried through the parliament, in pursuance of which he was beheaded on Tower Hill on July 28.

Whatever were the faults attached to Cromwell's character, no one had less cause to complain of them than King Henry. Zealously devoted from his first introduction at court to the royal interests, disregarding public obloquy in his efforts to promote them, and evidencing by all his acts the most sincere affection for his master, his death by that master's hand adds a deeper shade to the aversion with which the whole of Henry's career after the death of Wolsey must ever be regarded.

Archbishop Cranmer, the only one of Cromwell's adherents who had the courage to come forward in his defence, wrote a letter to the king, which in its exposition of the claims the fallen favourite had on the royal mercy would have staggered a less obdurate heart; but both that and the humble and affecting letter of Cromwell himself, though it moved the king to tears, were unavailing.

It would seem, however, that when it was too late the capricious king regretted the haste with which he had sacrificed his active minister, and there is an evident proof of his 'compunctious visitings' in his patent, dated on the 18th of the following December, granting to Cromwell's son Gregory the barony which his father had held. This barony survived through seven generations. In 1687 it and the Irish earldom of Ardglass, which had been granted to the fourth baron, became extinct.

The Protector Oliver Cromwell was a descendant from Thomas Cromwell's sister, who married one Williams, and whose son Sir Richard Williams, one of King Henry's privy chamber, and afterwards constable of Berkeley Castle, assumed the surname of Cromwell, and was the great grandfather of Oliver. (Herbert's Henry VIII.; Baronage, ii. 370; Weever, 505.)

CROWDER, RICHARD BUDDEN, son of William Crowder, Esq., of Montague Place, was born in London about 1795, was educated at Eton, and Trinity College, Cambridge, and, entering the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in May 1821. On the Western Circuit he got into good practice as well as in London, and in both displayed great power and ability. He obtained a silk gown in 1837, and was appointed recorder of Bristol in 1846. For a short time he was in parliament, being elected member for Liskeard in 1840, but was not so eminent as a senator as he was as a barrister. In the latter character he was very effective with the jury and the court, by his sound common sense, and his forcible, if not eloquent, oratory. He held the posts of counsel of the Admiralty and judge advocate of the fleet at the time of his promotion to the bench. That event occurred in March 1854, when he was selected to supply a vacancy in the Common Pleas. There he continued for nearly six years, distinguished by his honourable and manly bearing and his courtesy and urbanity. He died unmarried on December 5, 1859.

CULEWORTH, WILLIAM DE, in 11 Henry III. was engaged in fixing the tallage for the counties of Cambridge and Hertford. (Rot. Claus. ii. 176, 180.) This employment, in connection with his future position on the bench, makes it very probable that he was regularly engaged in forensic occupations. From Easter 1236, 20 Henry III., to Hilary 1242, he was one of the justiciars at Westminster, fines being regularly acknowledged before him; with a salary of 20*l.* per annum.

CUMIN, JOHN, or COMYN (ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN), a monk of Evesham, and then a canon of St. Paul's, was one of the chaplains of Henry II., who employed him in several important embassies. In 1164 he was sent to the emperor on the subject of the anti-pope, and by his long stay there caused considerable uneasiness to Pope Alexander and the adherents of Becket. Again, in 1166, he was one of the three ministers despatched to Rome, where they succeeded, not only in obtaining the appointment of two cardinals to hear and to determine the dispute with Becket, but also in bringing back to the king the letters which Becket had addressed to the pope, and which any other person had written in his favour.

In 1169 and the five following years his name appears as one of the itinerant justices into several counties, and it seems probable that he held a responsible office in the Exchequer, as in 1170 he had the custody of the bishoprics of Hereford and Bath, then vacant; and in 1180 William Malduit, the chamberlain, and he were employed to convey the treasury from Northampton to Nottingham. (Mador, i. 93, &c., 289.)

When the council of Windsor, in 1179, divided the kingdom into four parts for judicial purposes, he was one of the six justiciars who were not only appointed to act in the northern counties, but were also specially constituted to hear the complaints of the people in the Curia Regis. His services were not long unrewarded. In 1182 he was consecrated Archbishop of Dublin. Before this ceremony was performed he received priest's orders from the pope, which, it would seem, neither his canonry nor his chaplaincy required. There are, indeed, several instances of persons holding higher rank in the Church without being priests. He founded St. Patrick's Church in Dublin, and in 1186 he presided at a provincial synod, for the better regulation of the manners and discipline of the Irish clergy. He died about 1213. (Brady's England, 372; Lord Lyttelton; Leland's Ireland, i. 138, 195; Hollisshed, vi. 43.)

CURSON, ROBERT, became a reader of Lincoln's Inn in autumn 1529, and a second time in Lent 1537. On the accession of King Edward VI. in 1547 he was promoted to the bench as second baron of the Exchequer, and his successor in that office was appointed on May 6, 1549.

CUSERGGE, BALDWIN DE, had property in Berkshire, and was one of the justices itinerant employed in 9 Richard I., 1197-8, to fix the tallage in that county. (Mador, i. 705.)

D

DAIVILL, JOHN DE, or D'AYEVILL, was one of the justices itinerant appointed in 10 Henry III., 1226, for the county of Westmoreland. He was the son of Robert Daivill, a baron of Yorkshire and Nottingham, and had joined in the rebellion against King John, whereupon his lands were seized into the king's hands. Dugdale, in his 'Baronage' (i. 503), states that they were again forfeited for some offence in 38 Henry III., but being restored to favour, he was appointed justice of the forests beyond Trent in 41 Henry III., and was afterwards constituted governor of the castles of York and Scarborough. In the contest between the king and his barons he joined the latter, and was summoned to the parliament they held after the battle of Lewes. He even continued the contest after the royal victory at Evesham, and suffering another defeat at Chester, fled to the isle of Axholme in Lincolnshire. He, however, purchased his peace in 1265, Henry III., and was again restored to his possessions.

He married Maude, the widow of John de Aldithley. (Rot. Claus. i. 243, 244, 128, 151.)

DALISON, WILLIAM. William Dalison, who came over with the Conqueror, was the founder of this family. The first who wrote himself Dalison, a direct scendant in the eighth generation, was of Loughton in Lincolnshire, which, near two centuries afterwards, gave the title to the baronetcy granted in 1611 to Sir Roger Dalison, but which failed in 1645. Sir Roger was the grandson of George, the elder brother of Judge William, and they were the children of William Dalison, sheriff and escheator of his native county, by a daughter of George Wastneys, Esq., of Haddon in Nottinghamshire.

William was educated at Cambridge, and, entering at Gray's Inn, was called to the bar in 1637, and was reader in 1648 and 1652. In the October of the latter year the society presented him with 5*l.* and a pair of gloves on his leaving them to assume the degree of the coif (Dugdale's Orig. 137, 203); and on November 2, 1655, he was made serjeant to King Philip and Queen Mary. In April 1654 he was elected representative of the county of Lincoln, and was appointed a justice of the Common Pleas in the county palatine of Lancaster.

He was constituted a judge of the Queen's Bench about Hilary Term 1656, being mentioned, not only in Dyer's Reports in that and subsequent terms, but also in a commission of the same and the succeeding year, among the proceedings preserved in the 'Baga de Secretis' (4 Report Pub. Rec., App. ii. 255), and was then knighted.

On Queen Elizabeth's accession his patent was renewed, but he survived only till the 18th of January following. He was buried in Lincoln Cathedral under an altar tomb with his portrait thereon. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Dighton, Esq., of Sturton Parva in Lincolnshire, he left four sons and five daughters.

His learning as a lawyer was in high estimation. His reading on the statute 3 Henry VIII., entitled 'That wrongful disseisin is no descent in law,' is quoted by Dyer (219); and his Reports in conjunction with Serjeant Bendlowes are a valuable record of the cases of the time.

DALLAS, ROBERT, was the son of a gentleman of the same name living at Kensington in Middlesex, and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. James Smith, minister of Kilberney in Ayrshire. He became a member of Lincoln's Inn, and trained himself to public speaking at the debating society held at Coachmakers' Hall, according to the common practice of the time. This was of considerable advantage to him when he was called to the bar, and enabled him to produce his arguments with much more ease to himself and with greater effect to the court, in which he soon acquired considerable practice. In January 1788 he was engaged in the defence of Lord George Gordon. He next appears as one of the counsel for Mr. Hastings, the trial of whose impeachment lasted seven years, from 1788 to 1795, and highly distinguished himself by his exertions, and by his polished addresses to the lords. Naturally disgusted with the inveteracy of Burke against his client, he gave the relentless prosecutor no credit for patriotic feelings, but, attributing his attacks to the innate malignity of his nature, composed this bitter epigram:—

Oft have we wonder'd that on Irish ground
No poisonous reptile has e'er yet been found:
Reveal'd the secret stands of Nature's work—
She sav'd her venom to produce her Burke.

In 1795 Mr. Dallas received a silk gown; and through all the succeeding years till he was raised to the bench the latter volumes of the State Trials record his efforts either for the defence or the prosecution. Among these his speech on the motion for a new trial in the case of General Picton was separately published. In the meantime he had obtained a seat in the House of Commons, where he represented St. Michael's, Cornwall, in 1802, and afterwards the Scotch boroughs of Kirkaldy, &c. In 1804 he was promoted to the chief justiceship of Chester, and presided there till 1813, when on May 4 he was appointed to the office of solicitor-general and knighted. Six months afterwards he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, on November 5, 1813, and on the same day in 1818 he was promoted to the headship of that court. There he presided for five years with acknowledged ability and universal respect.

A curious question having been raised in 1823, whether the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had the same power to confer knighthood after the Union which he undoubtedly possessed before that measure had passed, a meeting of the judges was held in June at Chief Justice Dallas's to consider the point, when they were of opinion unanimously that the Act of Union did not deprive him of his former privilege. It was a matter of some speculation how the right should have remained undisputed for above twenty years, during which it had been frequently exercised, and only now be impugned; and it was suspected that the doubt was invented for the purpose of mortifying Lady Morgan, who had offended the ministers by the freedom of her writings, and whose husband had received an Irish knighthood. (Lady Morgan's Memoirs, ii. 172.)

At this time his health began to break, and he soon found he could no longer undergo the fatigues of his office. He therefore resigned his seat at the end of 1823, and lived little more than one year longer, dying on December 25, 1824. He left several children by his wife, Charlotte, daughter of Lieut.-Col. Alexander Jardine.

DAMMARTIN, MANASERIUS DE, was one of the justices itinerant named by Dugdale under the year 1170, but who were rather commissioners to enquire into the abuses of the sheriffs. Some of the family of Dammartins were settled in Surrey, and some in Norfolk.

DAMPIER, HENRY, descended from the Le Dampierres, anciently Counts of Flanders, was the son of the Rev. Thomas Dampier, a native of Somersetshire, who from being one of the masters at Eton College was raised to the deanery of Durham, and, having married twice, was most fortunate in his family. Thomas, the elder of his two sons by his first wife, Anne Hayes, became successively Bishop of Rochester (1802) and Ely (1808); and John, the younger, held a canonry in the latter cathedral. Henry, his only son by his second wife, Frances Walker, was born on December 21, 1758, at Eton, and, having received his early education there, was elected to King's College, Cambridge, in 1775. He took his degree of B.A. in 1781, and of M.A. in 1784; in the interim gaining the members' prizes both in 1782 and 1783. Preferring the legal to the clerical profession, for which he was at first intended, he entered the Middle Temple in 1781, and was called to the bar in the customary routine. During the next thirty years he pursued the rugged paths of the law, admired and esteemed for his intelligence as an acute counsel, and for his obliging disposition and his classical as well as legal learning, made more attractive by the brilliancy of his conversation and his wit. At last he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench on June 23, 1813, when he was knighted. His judicial career was doomed to be shorter than any who had lately preceded him. Ere he had graced the bench for two years and a half, he died on February 3, 1816. Few have left a name so universally respected.

He married in 1790 Martha, daughter of the venerable John Law, archdeacon of Rochester. She and five of their children survived him, one of whom, John Lucius Dampier, was recorder of Portsmouth, and became vice-warden of the Stannaries in Cornwall.

DANASTER, JOHN. In Dugdale's list of the governors of Lincoln's Inn the name of John Danaster occurs five times from 21 to 31 Henry VIII., 1529-30, and in the last year he is called 'Baro Scacc.' In the 'Chronica Series,' however, the name is not inserted among the barons; but in a list kindly supplied by Mr. Adlington, an officer of the Exchequer, John Banaster appears in Michaelmas Term 1538 as third baron, who is also omitted in Dugdale's list. There can be no doubt that the same individual is intended in both cases; and the preference must be given to Dugdale's account, not only because the name of Danaster is so often repeated, for it appears that he was also a reader at Lincoln's Inn in 1530 and in 1535, but also because he is specially mentioned with the title as one of the commissioners for receiving the indictment against Henry Pole, Lord Montacute, on November 29, 1539, preserved in the 'Baga de Secretis.' He died before Easter 1540. (Dugdale's Orig. 251, 259; 3 Report Pub. Rec., App. ii. 256, 258; Manning and Bray's Surrey, iii. 224.)

DANBY, ROBERT, of a Yorkshire family, in 1441 is mentioned as an advocate in a case before the privy council. The Year Books introduce his name as early as 1431, and he was called serjeant on February 14, 1443, 21 Henry VI., being appointed one of the king's serjeants soon afterwards. He was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas on June 28, 1452, 30 Henry VI., and held his place during the remainder of the reign.

If he be the Robert Danby mentioned in the 'Paston Letters' (i. 34), he was evidently an adherent to the Yorkist party. If so, we can well understand why on May 11, 1461, immediately after the accession of Edward IV., he was made chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas. Dugdale is in error when he introduces Sir Richard Choke as chief justice in 1 Edward IV., four months after the appointment of Danby. The Year Books plainly prove that throughout the next ten years both Danby and Choke were in the court together, the former described as chief justice, and the latter as justice only.

He was still chief justice on the restoration of Henry VI., who continued him at the head of the court during the six months of his renewed reign. On the return of Edward IV. in 1471 he was not re-appointed; but whether the change arose from his death or removal we are not informed.

In Holinshed's Chronicles (iii. 290) under this year is an account of the curious means adopted by Sir William Haukeford, knight (meaning Hankford), one of the chief justices, to rid himself of liberty by directing his keeper to shoot any person whom he found in the park at night, and who would not stand when called upon, and then placing himself in the way of the fatal shot. That this could not apply to Sir William Hankford is evident from the fact that he had been dead for nearly fifty years. Whether it be true at all, or a mistake is only in the name, cannot now be determined; but the only chief justice who disappears at this time is Sir Robert Danby, and to him not only is the character given by Holinshed in favour of the misguided man equally applicable, the perplexities of the time afford a more probable reason for the tragic catastrophe.

That Sir Robert was an excellent judge is evidenced by the great deference with which he was treated by the other judges and by the counsel in the Year Books, and by the frequent reference made to his opinions.

DANIEL, WILLIAM, was a younger son of the ancient family of Daniels of Over-Tabley in Cheshire. The name was originally D'Anyers, and is to be found in the list of those who entered England with the Conqueror. He was entered at Gray's Inn in 1556, and became reader there in 1579, and treasurer in 1580 and 1587.

In 1584 he was admitted deputy recorder of London to Serjeant Fleetwoode, and his name appears in Coke's Reports in Hilary 1591. When about to be advanced to the degree of serjeant-at-law in 1594 his name was struck out of the list upon an information to his prejudice relative to one Hacket, but was restored at the request of Lord Burleigh, who contradicted the report, and testified to his being 'a vearie honest, learned, and discreat man.' On February 3, 1604, he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas, as one of the two new judges King James had determined to add to the judicial staff. (Egerton Papers, 383.) There is no record of his argument in the great case of the post-nati, but he joined the majority in the affirmative view of the question. (State Trials, ii. 576.) He died in 1610.

DANVERS, ROBERT. The founder of this family in England was Roland D'Anvers, who accompanied the Conqueror on his invasion, and whose descendants, by grants and marriages, acquired considerable property in Berkshire and Oxfordshire. Robert was the eldest son of John Danvers, of Cothorp in the latter county, by his first wife Alice, daughter of William Verney, of Byfield. He became one of the governors at Lincoln's Inn in 1428, 6 Henry VI. In 1433 he was implicated in an erasure which had been made in an act of council (iv. 106), but was exonerated from all blame on that account by a special warrant under the privy seal. The record does not explain the particulars; but it seems probable that they were in some way connected with the city of London, of which he was about this time common serjeant. He was advanced to the recordership in 1442, and was called serjeant on February 14, 1443. In 1444 he was one of the king's serjeants, and in 1445 was member for the city of London.

In July 1450 Jack Cade, on taking up his head-quarters in London, forced Robert Danvers, the recorder, to be the head of a commission of oyer and terminer, at which several noblemen and gentlemen were tried for high treason, and some of them executed. That his conduct while acting in this capacity was not displeasing to the government appears by his being named on a commission into Kent, issued on August 1, to try the adherents of Cade, and by his being raised to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas on August 14. He continued to sit there till the deposition of King Henry VI.; and, being re-appointed by Edward IV., he passed the remainder of his life in the quiet performance of his judicial functions. He died in 1467, being described as a knight in the inquisition then taken. (Cal. iv. 341.) He and his wife Agnes were buried in the church of St. Bartholomew, in Smithfield. By her, who was daughter of Richard Quatremains, of Rycot in Oxfordshire (or, according to Stow, of Sir Richard Delaber), he left no male heirs.

The baronetcy of Danvers and the earldom of Danby were granted to descendants from Sir Robert's brother Richard, but are both now extinct.

DANVERS, WILLIAM, was half-brother to the above Robert, being one of the sons of John Danvers, of Cothorp in Oxfordshire, by his second wife, Joan, daughter of William Bruly, of Waterstock in the same county. There must have been a considerable difference between the ages of the two, because William's career as an advocate, in the Year Books, does not commence till 1475, seven or eight years after his brother's death. He attained the degree of serjeant-at-law soon after the accession of Henry VII., and on February 5, 1488, he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas. Fines appear to have been acknowledged before him as late as February 1504. (Dugdale's Orig. 47.)

He married Anne, daughter and heir of John Perry, Esq., of Chamberhouse in Berkshire; and his descendants were settled at Upton in Warwickshire.

DARNALL, JOHN, on February 26, 1544, was appointed ingrosser of the Great Roll of the Exchequer, otherwise called clerk of the Pipe; on May 5, 1548, he was constituted fourth baron of that court, and he retained his seat till his death, on November 28, 1549. Beyond this there is no account of him.

DAVENCESTER, PHILIP DE. In 11 Henry II., 1165, a charter between the abbots of St. Albans and Westminster was executed at the Exchequer, 'assidentibus justiciis regis,' the last of whom is 'Philippo de Davencestræ' (Daventry), without any designation of the office he held. (Madox, i. 44.) He was sheriff of Cambridge and Huntingdon for three years, from 13 Henry II.

DAVENPORT, HUMPHREY, the second son of William Davenport, of an ancient and genteel family settled at Bromhall in Cheshire, by Margaret, daughter of Sir Richard Ashton, of Middleton in Lancashire, was born at Chester about 1566, and after entering Balliol College went to Gray's Inn, where he was called to the bar on November 21, 1590, and in Lent 1613 became reader to this society. He was elected member for Brackley in 1588, and made an ineffectual effort to introduce a measure of Church reform. (D'Eves, 438.) In June 1623 he took the degree of the coif; and, having been knighted by King James, he was created king's serjeant, shortly after King Charles's accession, on May 9, 1625. He was raised to the bench on February 2, 1630, as a judge of the Common Pleas, and had not sat there a year before he was called upon to fill the office of lord chief baron, to which he was nominated on January 10, 1631. (Rymer, xix. 133, 254; W. Jones's Reports, 230.)

In the case of ship-money he gave his opinion assuming the king's power to impose it, but acquitting Hampden on a technical point, that the writ was not good in law. The majority of the judges having decided against Hampden, it became the duty of the lord chief baron to deliver the judgment, which afterwards, in the Long Parliament, was declared to be void. His equivocal opinion in favour of Hampden did not avail to prevent that parliament from condemning the support he had given to the king's illegal impositions. Articles of impeachment against him were accordingly carried up to the House of Lords on July 6, 1641, and he was ordered to give 10,000*l.* bail for his appearance. It is probable that he then withdrew himself altogether from the duties of his office, for on January 25, 1644, the king appointed Sir Richard Lane his successor. It is curious, however, that Sir Humphrey's patent of revocation is not dated till January 11 in the following year.

The date of his death is not given. Fuller (i. 188) says he 'had the reputation of a studied lawyer and upright person;' and A. Wood (iii. 182) states that 'he was accounted one of the oracles of the law.'

DE GREY, WILLIAM (LORD WALSHINGHAM). The root of this family can be traced to the twelfth century, and that branch of it to which the judge belonged possessed, with other large estates, the manor of Merton in Norfolk for about four hundred years before he came into the world. His father was Thomas De Grey, who represented that county in parliament; and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of William Wyndham, of Felbrigg. William was their third son, and was born at Merton on July 7, 1719. After receiving his education at Christ's College, Cambridge, he entered the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in 1742. He was made king's counsel to George II. in 1758, and in September 1761 solicitor-general to the queen of George III. In the latter year he was elected member of parliament for Newport in Cornwall, and in December 1763 was appointed solicitor to the king. In August 1766 he became attorney-general, and was knighted. He was also comptroller of the first-fruits and tenths.

He filled the office of attorney-general for nearly five years, and in the parliament following his appointment had the honour of being elected by three different constituencies—at first for Newport and Tamworth, selecting the former; and afterwards, in January 1770, for the university of Cambridge. In that parliament he contended against the legality of Mr. Wilkes's return for Middlesex; and on all other occasions strenuously supported the measures of Lord North's ministry. On a motion to abridge the power of the attorney-general in filing ex officio informations, he boldly defended himself, and proved that the power was not only constitutional, but when discreetly exercised, essentially necessary. He conducted the proceedings against Wilkes, when he surrendered in 1768 after his conviction, on the question of his outlawry; in the various discussions previous to his sentence; and in the writ of error before the House of Lords, by whom the conviction and sentence were confirmed. Though sharing of course the unpopularity with which all the opponents of that demagogue were visited, Sir William De Grey does not seem to have excited any special animosity, but to have been regarded as merely doing his duty as an officer of the crown.

On January 25, 1771, he was appointed lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. After presiding over his court for nearly ten years, the failure of his health obliged him to resign in June 1780. In acknowledgment of his services, the king in the following October called him up to the House of Peers by the title of Lord Walsingham. He enjoyed his new honours but little more than six months, dying on May 17, 1781, when he was buried at Merton.

He was a most accomplished lawyer, and of the most extraordinary power of memory. 'I have seen him,' says Lord Eldon, 'called into court with both hands wrapped up in flannel (from gout). He could not take note, and had no one to do so for him. I have known him try a cause which lasted nine or ten hours, and then, from memory sum up all the evidence with the greatest correctness.' (Twiss, i. 113.)

He married Mary, daughter of William Cowper, Esq., M.P. for Hertford, and first cousin of the poet; and the title is still enjoyed by his descendants.

DELVES, JOHN DE, was the son of Rich.

de Delves, of Delves Hall, near Uttoxeter, in Staffordshire, who was constable of Heleigh Hall, in that county. At the battle of Poitiers, in 1356, the Lord Audley, with his four esquires, of whom John de Delves was one, performed such acts of valour that Prince Edward granted to him, on the field, 'fyue hundred markes of yerely reuenewes,' which the generous lord immediately resigned to his four squires, saying that they had 'alwayes serued me truely, and specially this day: that honour that I haue is by their valyantesse.' And each of them was allowed to add a part of their lord's arms to his own.

John de Delves was soon afterwards knighted, and retained in the service of the Black Prince. In 36 Edward III. he is called his 'valettus,' in an order to the sheriffs of London to supply him with as many bows and arrows as the prince should require; and he was entrusted with the wardship of the Duchess of Brittany.

However natural it was that the royal goodwill should be extended to him, it seems strange that a place on the judicial bench should be selected as a reward for his military services, since there is no evidence that he had been ever previously connected with the law. Yet so it was, and on February 3, 1364, 38 Edward III., he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas. There is evidence, however, that he accompanied the Black Prince to Gascony two months afterwards, so that he did not devote himself much to his legal avocation. Fines, however, appear to have been levied before him till the middle of the following year. As his name was not afterwards inserted among the judges who received their salaries, he probably then retired from the bench. He was lucky enough, at this time, to announce to the king the birth of his grandson Edward, the son of the Prince of Wales, for which he had a grant of 40*l.* a year. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 180.)

He lived till 1369, and was buried at Audley in Staffordshire. By his wife Isabella, daughter of Philip de Malpas, he left a daughter, Joan, the widow of Henry de Kymes, and bequeathed to her most of his manors; but he was eventually succeeded in his estates by his brother Henry, one of whose descendants, Thomas Delves, of Dodington, obtained a baronetcy, which is now extinct. (Froissart, i. 197, 205; Dugdale's Orig. 45; Cal. Inq. p. m. ii. 296.)

DENE, HENRY (ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY), although holding three sees successively, wore the episcopal mitre for little more than five years. His public career is equally short, and little is preserved of his private history. His origin is not recorded, except that he was a Welshman, which might perhaps operate as a recommendation to Henry VII. He was born about 1450, and the place of his education is claimed by both Oxford and Cambridge. He became in 1461 prior of Llanthony Secundus, near Gloucester, a cell to that in Monmouthshire, but afterwards, in 1481, made the principal house. In 1494 he was constituted Chancellor of Ireland, when his services in turning away the impostor Perkin Warbeck from the Irish shores secured the royal favour, and he was not only rewarded by being made deputy and justiciary of that kingdom in 1496, but also Bishop of Bangor. In this see he restored the rights of the church, and regained several valuable properties, and in March 1500 he was translated to the more important diocese of Salisbury. Six months afterwards, on October 13, he was invested with the custody of the Great Seal with the title of lord keeper, and in the following January he was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury. The pope soon after appointed him his legate in England; and before the end of the year he solemnised the nuptials of Prince Arthur with Catherine of Arragon, and was engaged in negotiating the treaty of marriage between the King of Scots and the Princess Margaret. No reason being assigned for his early resignation of the custody of the Great Seal on July 27, 1502, it may probably be attributed to the failure of his health, as he survived his retirement only half a year. He died at Lambeth, on February 15, 1502-3; and his remains were deposited in Canterbury Cathedral. (Godwin, 132, 352, 625; Rymer, xii. 523, 642, 793; Arch. Journal, xviii. 256-267.)

DENE, RALPH DE, one of the twelve inquisitors against the sheriffs in 1170, who are called justices itinerant by Dugdale, was of a Sussex family, in which county he had considerable property. He settled some canons of the Præmonstratensian order at Ottham in Sussex. (Madox, i. 578, ii. 78; Monast. vi. 911.)

DENHAM, JOHN, in the memoir of his son Sir John Denham, the poet, is described as of Little Horsley in Essex. He was a member first of Furnival's Inn, and then of Lincoln's Inn, and, having been called to the bar in 1587, was chosen a reader of that society twenty years afterwards.

Eton College employed him as their counsel, and made him their steward. On June 5, 1600, having been first called serjeant, he was appointed lord chief baron of the Irish Exchequer, and knighted. From this office he was advanced within three years to that of lord chief justice of the King's Bench, in the same country. This he held for five years, and then exchanged it on May 2, 1617, for a seat in the English Court of Exchequer. How well he performed his duties in Ireland may be judged from the address of Lord Chancellor Bacon (Works, vii. 264) to his successor, Sir William Jones, who is recommended to imitate 'the care and affection to the commonwealth of Ireland, and the prudent and politic administration of Sir John Denham.' He was so good an 'administrator of the revenue' there, as Bacon calls him, that he set up the customs, which, bringing first only 500*l.*, were let before his death for 54,000*l.* per annum. (Ibid. 310, note.)

In the proceedings against his eminent eulogist, three years afterwards, he had the unpleasant duty of delivering the message of the lords to the fallen chancellor, requiring a special answer to the charges against him. (Parl. Hist. i. 1239.) In the case of ship-money he joined the other judges for the sake of conformity in the opinion they gave to the king in favour of its legality; but on the hearing of the case against Hampden he was absent during four days of the argument, and, being sick and weak, gave a short written judgment on May 28, 1638, in opposition to the king's claim. (State Trials, iii. 1201.) He lived only seven months after the unfortunate decision of the majority, and dying on January 6, 1639, was buried at Egham in Surrey, where there is a monument to him and his two wives. The first of these was Cicile, the widow of Richard Kellefet, Esq.; and the second Eleanor, the daughter of Sir Garrett Moore, first Viscount Drogheda.

The judge built the mansion called 'The Place' at Egham; but his estate was wasted in gambling by his only son, John Denham, equally celebrated as the author of 'Cooper's Hill' and other poems, and as a loyal adherent of King Charles through all his adversities. He was rewarded on the Restoration with the post of surveyor-general and the knighthood of the Bath, and died in 1668. (Aubrey, ii. 320; Brit. Biography, v. 453.)

DENISON, THOMAS, was the younger of two sons of Mr. Joseph Denison, an opulent merchant at Leeds, the elder of whom was the grandfather of the Right Honourable John Evelyn Denison, speaker of the House of Commons since 1857. He was born in 1690, and received his legal education at the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar. His merits as a lawyer soon procured him a considerable practice, and, without having filled any of the minor offices of the profession, he was made a judge of the King's Bench in December 1741. He was knighted in November 1745, when he joined in the loyal address to the king on the rebellion. After administering justice in that court for more than twenty-three years, his health and his sight failing him, he resigned on February 14, 1765.

He sat under three successive chief justices—Sir William Lee, Sir Dudley Ryder, and Lord Mansfield; the latter of whom had so high an opinion of his learning, and so great an affection for him, that when he died on the 8th of the following September, he wrote the beautiful and characteristic epitaph on his monument in the church of Harewood in Yorkshire, where he lies near Lord Chief Justice Gascoigne.

He married Anne, daughter of Robert Smithson, Esq., but left no issue.

DENMAN, THOMAS (LORD DENMAN), than whom no chief justice of England since the death of the Earl of Mansfield has been regarded with more personal esteem and affection, and none since the days of Lord Chief Justice Holt have left a character of bolder independence or more fearless and uncompromising patriotism, was born on February 23, 1779, at his father's house in Queen Street, Golden Square, which in honour of the infant then brought into the world has lately assumed the name of Denman Street. He was the only son of Dr. Thomas Denman, the most eminent physician of his time in his particular branch of science, and of his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Brodie, Esq., a descendant from the ancient family of Brodie, of Brodie in Morayshire. The family from which he sprang was originally settled in Nottinghamshire, some time at East Retford, and more lately at Bevercotes, but Dr. Denman's father removed to Bakewell in Derbyshire, where for many years he practised as a surgeon. The judge therefore is another instance, of which there are so many in this reign, of the legal bench being supplied by men of medical lineage.

At three years he commenced his school education under that amiable and excellent woman Mrs. Barbauld, then resident at Palgrave in Norfolk, and to her system of instruction during the two years he was under her tuition the judge was accustomed to attribute the retentive memory and whatever grace and facility of diction he afterwards attained.

After leaving Mrs. Barbauld's, he was placed for a short time under the Rev. Dr. Thompson at Kensington, whence he proceeded when seven years old to Eton. His industry and application during the years that he remained there are evidenced by the stores of classical literature which remained in his memory, and by the delight which he took in them, and his readiness in quoting them; and his social character among his schoolfellows may be estimated by the many lasting friendships which he formed there. To the last period of his life he retained that affection for the establishment with which those who have been educated within its walls invariably regard it. Before proceeding to the university he spent one or two years as pupil with his maternal uncle, the Rev. Peter Brodie (the father of Mr. Bathe eminent conveyancer, and Sir Benjamin Brodie the great surgeon, his fellow pupils), under whom he added largely to the classical and historical knowledge which he had laid in at Eton.

From 1796 to 1800 he spent at St. John's College, Cambridge, and took his degree of B.A. in the latter year, and that of M.A. in 1803, without aiming at a place on the list of university honours, as he had a great distaste to mathematical studies, and devoted himself entirely to his favourite classics.

He then entered Lincoln's Inn, and placed himself as a pupil under the great conveyancer Charles Butler, and the eminent pleader Mr. Tidd, the initiator into legal mysteries of so many remarkable men. After due preparation, he practised for a short time as a special pleader until 1806, when he was called to the bar, and joined the Midland Circuit and Lincoln Sessions. He had two years before married Theodosia Ann, the eldest daughter of the Rev. Richard Vevers, rector of Saxby in Leicestershire.

While making the slow progress which is so much the fate of junior barristers, he employed some part of his leisure in writing critiques on the classical literature of the day for the 'Monthly Review,' then the leading whig journal, until it was superseded by the advances of its Edinburgh competitor. But he gradually got the ear of the court, and so early as 1809 by his lucid, elaborate, and successful argument on the right application of the rule in Shelley's case, in opposition to so able an opponent as Mr. Copley (afterwards Lord Lyndhurst), proved that he had not sat at the feet of the great conveyancing Gamaliel in vain. (11 East, 548.) But the event to which he attributed his ultimate success, and which recommended him to the first honours he received, was his employment on the trials of the Luddites in 1817, when he was engaged for the defence of the prisoners arraigned at Derby.

In 1818 Mr. Denman obtained his first seat in parliament as representative of Wareham in Dorsetshire. He soon embarked on the stormy sea of politics, and distinguished himself by the boldness with which he attacked abuses and pronounced opinions to which he adhered through life, and in particular by advocating the necessity of an amelioration of the criminal law. In this his first year he had obtained a position of considerable importance in the House of Commons, and had established a reputation which was soon to be extended throughout the country.

The old king George III. died on January 29, 1820, and the Prince of Wales, who had held the regency of the kingdom for the nine previous years, 'heavily in clouds' commenced his actual reign of George IV. A conspiracy, widely spread among the lower orders of the people, had been organised to overturn the government of the country just before his accession, and within a month after it a plan was concerted for the commencement of the outbreak by the murder of all the ministers at a cabinet dinner at Lord Harrowby's. The plot was discovered only just in time. On the very day of its intended execution the body of traitors were arrested in the midst of their preparations, and their conviction and execution soon followed. The agitation arising from what was called the Cato Street conspiracy had scarcely subsided before the public were excited by the prospect of an investigation of a very different nature, but threatening equally perilous consequences. In the meantime Mr. Denman had at the general election of that year been returned for Nottingham.

Queen Caroline, who was living apart from her husband in foreign lands, had intimated her intention of coming to England to claim the rights and privileges due to her new rank, which it was known that the king intended to resist, as he had already excluded her name from the usual prayers in the Liturgy. One of the first acts of her progress towards England was to appoint Mr. Brougham her attorney-general and Mr. Denman her solicitor-general. Numerous negotiations took place between the government and her law officers, in order to avert the inconveniences which threatened to follow her arrival. But all endeavours of accommodation failing, her majesty entered London on June 7, amidst the triumphant acclamations of the people, and the whole town, partly from sympathy and partly from force and fear, was illuminated in the evening.

The cause of this popular feeling was not so much a conviction of the queen's innocence, for of that the majority knew little and cared less, as a disgust at the indignities offered to a female, and an admiration of the spirit she exhibited in hastening to face her accusers, together with the growing unpopularity of the king, much increased by the knowledge of the grounds of recrimination which the queen, even if the charges against her were true, could justly bring against him. Meetings of arbitrators, motions in parliament, were alike ineffectual to produce an arrangement, the interesting protocols and debates in which will be found in Hansard and the 'Annual Register' for the year. In all these proceedings Mr. Denman of course took a prominent part, and in the new House of Commons he spoke with so much indignation, boldness, and force that he drew from the mouth of a member a question to which the spirit of prophecy might be attributed. Mr. R.

Martin asked her majesty's solicitor-general 'if by any train of fortuitous events he should at some future period find himself elevated to the bench of this country (and, as all things were in the hands of Providence, such an event was by no means unlikely), how he would like to have hurled against his judicial dignity any former opinion which he might have professed in that house or elsewhere?' Mr. Denman was certainly prophetic in the dignified answer that he gave to this impertinence. He said that 'he did not fear that any opinion he had delivered or should deliver in that house would ever rise up in judgment against him, nor should he desert those opinions in any situation in which he might be placed.'

The 'Green Bag' containing the dirty details was brought in and referred to a secret committee, upon whose report the Bill of Pains and Penalties was introduced into the House of Lords on July 5, the object of which was to deprive the queen of her title and to dissolve the marriage between her and the king. The second reading was put off till August 17. Nearly the whole talent of the bar was engaged, and of the eleven counsel who appeared, six on one side and five on the other, no less than ten were afterwards elevated to high legal distinction. Only one of the advocates for the queen—namely, Sir Nicolas Tindal—received his judicial promotion while George IV. remained on the throne, and though the two principal advocates received legal rank during the reign, it was not granted till near the end of it, and then with the greatest reluctance and difficulty. With so much displeasure did the king regard Mr. Denman for the bitter terms in which he had alluded to the grounds of recrimination which the king had afforded, that he was omitted from the batch of king's counsel created on the accession of the liberal-minded Lord Lyndhurst to the chancellorship, and it was only by his bold remonstrance that the Duke of Wellington was enabled to remove the injustice.

During the progress of the trial the excitement of the people was unbounded. They wholly discredited the evidence adduced against her majesty, declaring that the witnesses were suborned, and when the ministers were obliged to abandon the bill the delight of the populace almost amounted to frenzy. In the queen's popularity the advocates of her innocence, who had shown such fearless gallantry in her defence, of course largely participated.

The popular effervescence had not subsided when Sir John Sylvester, the recorder of London, died and Mr. Knowles was appointed his successor in 1822, leaving a vacancy in his former place of common serjeant. This was in the gift of the Common Council, and would naturally have fallen to their senior pleader, Mr. Bolland, who was a deserved favourite in the city. But the queen's party in the council determined to testify their admiration of the exertions made in her defence by Mr. Denman, on whom in the previous year they had conferred the freedom of the city, and elected him to the office by a majority of 131 over 119 for Mr. Bolland, who some years after was appointed a baron of the Exchequer.

In this new character Mr. Denman disappointed his opponents, who gave him credit for more eloquence than law, by exhibiting those judicial powers which are most admirable while presiding over a criminal court—patience, firmness, and humanity; and by the sweetness of his disposition, joined with the natural dignity of his character, he gained the affection and respect even of those who differed most from him in politics. These feelings found utterance in the various addresses they presented to him upon every occasion of his advancement.

He retired from parliament from 1826 to 1830, when on the general election consequent on the accession of William IV. he was again elected for Nottingham, which he continued to represent till his elevation to the bench.

On the death of the queen in 1821 he of course lost the precedence which his office of her solicitor-general gave him in the courts, and was obliged to retire behind the bar; and it was not till seven years afterwards, in 1828, that he received a silk gown. From that time his promotion was rapid. William IV. in 1830 succeeded to the crown, and on the accession of the whig ministry, scorning to remember the personal attack which Mr. Denman in his zeal had uttered against him on the queen's trial, sanctioned his appointment as attorney-general on November 26, and knighted him. He had not filled the office of attorney-general quite two years when Lord Tenterden died, and Sir Thomas was without a moment's hesitation appointed. on November 4, 1832, his successor as lord chief justice of the King's Bench.

For nearly eighteen years he graced that seat with the highest commendation from his brother judges, the bar, and the public. Without pretending to the deep black-letter learning of some of his colleagues, he had laid up a sufficient store of legal knowledge to meet every requirement, and being deeply imbued with the principles on which the law is founded, knew well how to apply them in the justice he administered. He maintained on the bench the same independence, and exhibited the same courage, as distinguished him at the bar, and in the famous case of Stockdale

z. Hansard did not hesitate boldly to support the rights and liberties of the subject in opposition to the assumed privileges of parliament, and the threats of the House of Commons. No judge ever showed more unaffected dignity in his demeanour, more kindness and courtesy to all who were in communication with him, more patience and discrimination in investigating the rights of the parties before him, or more firmness and perspicuity in delivering his judgments.

In March 1834 he was created a peer by the title of Baron Denman of Dovedale in Derbyshire, and ventured to break through the custom of chief justices attending parliament in their judicial robes, by always sitting in his ordinary dress. Lord Denman was called upon, in consequence of the illness of Lord Cottenham the chancellor, to preside as lord high steward when the Earl of Cardigan was indicted for shooting Captain Tuckett in a duel, who was acquitted from the omission of the prosecution to prove the identity of the man wounded with the man named in the indictment.

At the age of seventy Lord Denman's health began to fail, and after several months' suffering he felt that he could no longer perform the duties of his office with satisfaction to himself or with benefit to the public. He therefore sent in his resignation at the end of Hilary Term 1850, and Lord Campbell, who was only two years his junior, was appointed in his place. In no instance of a judge's retirement was so much regret expressed. Not only from the citizens of London, who looked upon themselves as in some sort the founders of his fortune, and who had placed his portrait on the walls of their council chamber, but from the whole bar, and specially from the members of his own (the Midland) circuit, from the grand juries of Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Warwickshire, Kent (conveying the sentiments of admiration and regret of the leading gentry of those counties), was he gratified by receiving the most affectionate addresses. The solicitors gave a permanent testimony of their participation in these feelings by placing his bust in their hall in Chancery Lane; and the poet-laureate of the Home Circuit, Sir Joseph Arnould, since a judge at Bombay, embodied them in a beautiful copy of verses describing in elegant and pathetic lines the various excellences by which he was distinguished, and their loss in being deprived of his example.

The sympathy thus shown in this country extended even to America, and was communicated in an elegant letter from Mr. Everett, who had been ambassador here. But the highest gratification experienced by Lord Denman was in receiving the unexampled compliment from his colleagues in the court in which he presided of a valuable inkstand, in a beautiful classical design, accompanied by a letter the language of which must have been even more precious than the gift. His four brethren say, 'We do desire to bear sincere and considerate testimony to the leading good sense and ability, the industry and uprightness, the candour, patience, dignity, and good temper with which you have adorned the bench on which we have had the happiness to sit as your assistants. But we are bound to add to this our gratitude for the uniform kindness which individually we have experienced at your hands, the hearty acceptance which you have ever given to such assistance as it was our duty and in our power to afford you, and the delightful friendliness, without change or diminution at any time, which has shed a peculiar charm on our private intercourse. By these we have been made, we trust, more useful servants to the public, as we are sure we have been enabled to enjoy our few leisure hours more perfectly.' The letter bears the subscription of the respected names of Sir John Patteson, Sir John Coleridge, Sir William Wightman, and Sir William Erie.

Throughout his life he preserved his enjoyment of every branch of literature and science; and, though he did not publish any work with his name, he contributed many elegant translations to Bland's 'Greek Anthology,' besides often relaxing himself in playful dalliance with the Muses.

He lived nearly five years after his resignation, spending most of his time at Stony Middleton, near Bakewell, which he had inherited from his father, in those acts of charity and kindness which endeared him to his fellow-creatures, and in contemplations which prepared him for his end. His death occurred on September 22, 1854, at Stoke Albany, near Rockingham. He left a large family.

DENNY, EDMUND, or EDWARD, from being a clerk of the Exchequer, was raised in 1504 to the office of king's remembrancer, and on May 6, 1513, 5 Henry VIII., to that of fourth baron, in which he continued till his death in 1520. He was buried in the church of St. Benet, Paul's Wharf, London. He is described as of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire, and was the son of Thomas Denny and Agnes his wife. He had three wives: the first was Margaret, daughter of Ralph Leigh, Esq., of Stockwell, Surrey, M.P. for the county; the second was Mary, daughter and heir of Robert Troutbeck, Esq., of Bridge-Traford, Cheshire; and the third Jane, daughter of —. By his second wife only he had issue. Besides several daughters, one of whom, Joyce, was the mother of the celebrated Sir Francis Walsingham, and the maternal ancestor of the Viscounts Falkland, he had two sons, the younger of whom was Sir Anthony, the king's remembrancer, and gentleman of the king's privy chamber. His grandson was created Baron Denny and Earl of Norwich, both of which titles have become extinct. The family is now represented by a baronetcy, created in 1782.

DENTON, ALEXANDER, was the nephew of Sir Edmund Denton, a baronet, whose title is now extinct, and the son of another Alexander Denton, of Hillesden, near Buckingham.

In 1704 he was called to the bar by the Middle Temple, and in February of the next year he was committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms by the House of Commons for pleading for the plaintiffs in the Aylesbury case. (State Trials, xiv. 809.) In 1708 and 1714 he was elected member of parliament for Buckingham. Taking a high rank in his profession, he was on June 25, 1722, appointed a judge of the Common Pleas, and after filling it with respectability for eighteen years, he died on March 22, 1740, holding at his death the office also of chancellor to the Prince of Wales.

He married a lady with a fortune of 20,000*l.*, named Bond, but left no issue.

DENUM, WILLIAM DE, of a family established in Durham, was the son of Robert de Denum. Both he and his elder brother John were serjeants, and are probably the persons who are generally called J. and W. Devon in the Year Books of Edward II. and III. William, in the early part of the reign of the latter monarch, was frequently employed in conducting the negotiations with Scotland. In 1320 he was one of the itinerant judges into Nottinghamshire, and in 1331 was constituted king's serjeant. On September 24, 1332, he was made a baron of the Exchequer; and a little later in the same year Dugdale introduces him among the justices of the King's Bench, on the authority of a liberate. But it is most probable that this document was nothing more than the order for his salary as a baron, the titles not being always clearly distinguished. No entry occurs relative to him after this date, so that it is not unlikely that he retired from the bench when he succeeded to the manor of Herdwick-juxta-Hesilden, and other large family estates, on the death of his brother.

He died in 1350, leaving his wife, Isabella, and four daughters. (Surtees's Durham, i. 51, 192; N. Fœdera, ii. 704-849; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 91, 261.)

DERBY, WILLIAM, was a clergyman, and no doubt a clerk in the Exchequer. On February 8, 1435, 13 Henry VI., he was nominated third baron, and on June 16, 1436, was raised to the second seat in the court. He died in 1438. (Acts Privy Council, iv. 205.)

DESPENCER, HUGH LE, was, there is no doubt, the descendant of one who had been the steward of the king, and who was, in the language of the time, called Dispensator, or le Despencer, which title became a surname of the family. Dugdale calls Hugh a grandson of another Hugh, and the son of Thomas (Baronage, i. 389); while Collins makes him the son of Geoffrey, and grandson of Thurstan. (Peerage, iv. 496.) If the former, Dugdale leaves us in doubt as to his actual ancestors; but if the latter, his succession from the steward of Henry I. is clearly shown.

That Hugh le Despencer, however, was of the baronial family of that name is sufficiently proved by his accompanying Richard, King of the Romans, to Germany, in 1257 (Rymer, i. 355), and by his being selected as one of the twelve commissioners on the part of the barons at the parliament of Oxford in 1258, when Hugh Bigot was nominated chief justiciary by them. In 44 Henry III. he went as a justice itinerant into three counties, and on the retirement of Hugh Bigot at the latter end of that year he was appointed by the barons to succeed him. Although the king, in the following July, on resuming his authority, placed Philip Basset in the office of chief justiciary, Hugh le Despencer continued to act in the same capacity on the part of the barons till April 1262, when, an accommodation taking place, Philip Basset seems to have been established in the office, as he certainly performed its functions during the king's absence in Guienne in that year. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 385, &c.)

On a pretended reconciliation between the king and the barons in 1263 Hugh le Despencer was again appointed chief justiciary. Early in the next year the barons' war again broke out, and the Earl of Leicester having secured the citizens of London on his side, Hugh le Despencer, at the head of their associated bands, destroyed the houses of Philip Basset and the loyal nobility, imprisoned the judges, and left the Jews, after enriching himself with the ransom of some of the most wealthy, to the tender mercies of the mob. (Lingard, iii. 155.)

In the battle of Lewes, fought on May 14, 1264, the chief justiciary distinguished himself on the barons' side, and after the king's defeat no less than six castles were placed under Hugh's government, with a grant of 1000 marks for his support in his office. (Rymer, ii. 445.)

In Leland's 'Collectanea' (ii. 378) there is a statement that he afterwards quarrelled with the Earl of Leicester; and it is somewhat curious that in three records quoted by Brady (i. 650-1), dated in May and June 1265, the title 'Justiciarius' is added to the earl's name. This bears the appearance of the retirement of Hugh; but as the following August he was in arms with that nobleman, the difference could not have been of long continuance. The firmness of his friendship was shown at the battle of Evesham on August 4, 1265, when, refusing to quit the field before it began, though urged by the earl to do so, he and Leicester were slain together.

As a soldier he seems to have been valiant and bold; but the few facts that are recorded of him in his capacity of chief justice of the kingdom are marked with the violence and rapacity of the times.

He married Alyna, or Aliva, the daughter and heir of Philip Basset, of Wiccombe, who, after his death, became the wife of Roger Bigot, Earl of Norfolk. By her he left a son and a daughter, the latter of whom married Hugh de Courtney, father of Hugh, first Earl of Devon. The son, Hugh, was created Earl of Winchester in 1322; but being beheaded in 1326, his honours became forfeited. His grandson, however, was summoned to parliament by Edward III.; but his successor (who had been created Earl of Gloucester in 1397) was beheaded in 1400, and the honours were again forfeited. This attainder being reversed in 1461, the barony was restored to his granddaughter Elizabeth, the wife of Edward Nevill, and, after falling several times into abeyance, still survives in the present Baroness le Despencer.

DEVON, EARL OF. See H. DE COURTESYE.

D'EYNCOURT, EDMUND, the son and heir of John, who was lineally descended from Walter D'Eyncourt, who came over with the Conqueror, and was royally rewarded with many lordships in the counties of York, Northampton, Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln, at his father's death, in 1257, was a minor, and when he attained his majority served the king in his wars in Wales, in Gascony, and in Scotland. He was summoned to parliament in 27 Edward I. (Baronage, i. 388), and subscribed the letter to the pope by the title of 'Dominus de Thurgerton.' In 1306 he was appointed one of the justices of trailbaston for Lincoln and nine other counties, and throughout the following reign he still continued to act as a judge. (Parl. W., ii. 759.)

He died in 1327, 1 Edward III. His lands and title devolved by royal licence on his nephew William, the son of his brother John. On the death of the thirteenth baron, in 1422, the barony fell into abeyance, and ultimately became forfeited. (Nicolas's Synopsis.)

DIGGES, DUDLEY, whose pedigree, prepared by himself, commences in the reign of Henry III., was the grandson of Leonard Digges, 'insignem mathematicum,' and the son of Thomas, 'mathematicum insignissimum,' by Anne, the daughter of Sir Warham de Sentleger. Both of these progenitors, so eminent for their mathematical studies, were resident at Digges Court, Barham, in Kent, where Sir Dudley was born in 1583. He was entered a gentleman commoner of University College in Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1601, and, in the multitudinous distribution of honours by King James, he was knighted soon after the accession.

He was member for Tewkesbury from 1604 to 1611. Part of this time he spent abroad; and in 1611 he is mentioned as 'busy with the discovery of the north-west passage,' and in 1614 as 'moving every stone to obtain employment.' (Cal. St. Papers [1611], 96, 225.) He was subsequently employed on a mission to the Hague. Whether he then held any office at court is uncertain; but he probably did so in October 1615, when he deposed, on the trial of Weston for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, that the knight had imparted to him his readiness to be employed in an embassy to Russia, to which the king had appointed him. He was certainly a gentleman of the king's privy chamber in 1618, for he is so described in a commission of that date appointing him 'ambassador to the great duke and lord of all Russia, to treat concerning a loan from the king to the duke.' Of this voyage, in which John Tradescant accompanied him as a naturalist, there is a MS. account preserved in the Ashmolean Museum. (Notes and Queries, 1st S. iii. 392.)

In the parliament of 1621, so fatal to Lord Chancellor Bacon, Sir Dudley sat again for Tewkesbury, and was one of the committee that brought forward the charges against the noble delinquent. Though he seems to have taken altogether a moderate and conciliatory part, the king thought otherwise, for, though not included among the 'ill-tempered spirits' mentioned in his proclamation on the dissolution, whom he committed to the Tower, Sir Dudley and a few others were punished by being sent into Ireland on a frivolous commission. They were dismissed from their penal employment in February 1623, receiving each thirty shillings a day for 124 days from October 26, when they entered on their commission. (Pell Records, 266.)

Archbishop Abbot, in his narrative, says that Sir Dudley had been 'a great servant' of the Duke of Buckingham, who, he presumes, lost his friendship for some unworthy carriage offered to him; and also alludes to Sir Dudley being committed to the Fleet, and kept there for seven or eight weeks, without any known reason for his imprisonment. (Rushworth, i. 450.) It is apparent that these two persons bore great illwill towards each other, for Sir Dudley, in the second parliament of Charles I. (1626), was one of the most active managers of the impeachment against the duke. In the conference with the Lords, having made some allusion to the plaister administered to the late king, Buckingham endeavoured to fasten upon him expressions which were little less than treason to the present king, and thereupon obtained his committal to the Tower. There was evidently a wilful misrepresentation of the words used, and on the murmured resentment of the Commons, Sir Dudley was released, after three days' detention. (White-locke, 5.) In the next year he suffered another imprisonment in the Fleet, for some 'unfitting words' at the council table. (Cal. St. Papers [1627], 2, 64.)

In Charles's third parliament (1628) Sir Dudley was returned for the county of Kent, and took a prominent part in forwarding the Petition of Right, being appointed to open the conference with the Peers on the subject. The lord president in reporting to the house describes him as 'a man of volubility and elegance of speech.'

This parliament was angrily dissolved in March 1629, and the next was not called until eleven years afterwards. In the interim, Sir Julius Caesar being a very old man, the reversion of his office of master of the Rolls had been granted to Sir Humphrey May, an old officer and constant supporter of the court, but he dying in fourteen months, the reversion in the following November (1630) was given to Sir Dudley Digges, who, though a strenuous advocate for the liberty of the subject, had, since the death of his enemy the duke, shown no disposition to oppose government measures, and had probably resumed his connection with the court. On obtaining this grant he entered himself as a member of the society of Gray's Inn, and, honoris causa, was immediately made a bencher. He had to wait for nearly five years and a half before Sir Julius Caesar died; but in the meantime he was admitted one of the masters in Chancery on January 22, 1631. He thus had a slight opportunity of acquiring some professional knowledge; for neither he nor Sir Humphrey May, having never studied any branch of law, could from their legal experience find any claim to the judicial seat. On Sir Julius's death on April 18, 1636, Sir Dudley immediately acceded to the office; but of his proceedings in it, during the three years of his possession, there is no account.

He died on March 18, 1639, and was buried at Chilham, the manor and castle of which he acquired by his marriage with Mary, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Sir Thomas Kempe, of Ollantigh in the next parish. He was intelligent, eloquent, and ready as a public man, and pious, amiable, and generous in his private life. He published 'A Defence of Trade' during his life, and was the author of 'The Compleat Ambassador,' printed after his death. The family was famous for literature: his brother Leonard was an accomplished poet, and is connected with the memory of Shakespeare by his commendatory verses, which have been often reprinted; and his third son Dudley was also a good poet and linguist. His grandson, Sir Maurice Digges, received a baronetcy in 1666, which became extinct within the year. (Ath. Oxon. ù. 634; Fasti, i. 290; Hasted, vii. 265.)

DIGHTON, WILLIAM DE. In 48 Edward III., when he had letters of protection granted to him to accompany the Duke of Brittany abroad, he is called clericus, and is described as 'alias dictus Willielmus Marmoyne.' In the previous year his name, as canon of St. Paul's, London, is attached to the treaty with the King of Portugal. (New Fadera, iii. 985, 1010.)

He was made keeper of the privy seal in the early part of the reign of Richard II.: and when the king dismissed Richard le Scrope from his second chancellorship on July 11, 1382, Dighton was joined with Hugh de Segrave and John de Waltham in the custody of the Great Seal, until a new chancellor was appointed, and they held it for ten weeks. He is not mentioned later than the ninth year of the reign, when he is still called canon of St. Paul's. (Rymer, vii. 520.)

DIXON, NICHOLAS, was in holy orders, and held the church of Cheshunt in Hertfordshire for thirty years from 1418. He was then clerk of the Pipe, and soon after became sub-treasurer of the Exchequer. His next elevation was to the bench of that court on January 26, 1423, 1 Henry VI. (Acta Privy Council, iii. 22.) He is mentioned as late as 19 Henry VI. in a deed relating to property granted to Richard, Duke of York. (Ibid. v. 136.) His retirement from the court must have been previous to 22 Henry VI., as his name does not appear among those to whom the usual robes were then assigned (Orig. 99); but he lived till October 30, 1448, 27 Henry VI.

He was buried in the church at Cheshunt, which, together with a chancel dedicated to the Virgin, was erected by him: and his epitaph celebrates both his justice and his charity. (Fuller's Herts., i. 438; Cheshunt, 302.)

DODD, SAMUEL, was descended from the Cheshire family, and was the son of Robert Dod, who describes himself 'Civis et Pat. Londini.' He was born about 1652. The Inner Temple was his school of law, where he was called to the bar in 1679, and admitted to the bench in 1700. He was counsel for Dr. Sacheverell in the ill-judged impeachment against him in 1710, and pleaded so manfully and ably that he obtained a great amount of popularity among the high church party. (State Trials, xv. 213, &c.)

On the accession of George I. he was appointed the lord chief baron on November 22, 1714, and knighted. He occupied his seat barely seventeen months, dying on April 14, 1716, when he was buried in the Temple Church. He left a manuscript volume of Reports, which is preserved among the Hargrave Collection in the British Museum.

By his wife Elizabeth, sister and coheir of Sir Robert Croke, of Chequers, Bucks, he had two sons, who both died without issue.

DODERIDGE, JOHN, according to the more received opinion, was the son of Richard Doderidge, an eminent merchant at Barnstaple, and Joan Badcock, of South Moulton, and was born at Barnstaple in 1555. He entered Exeter College, Oxford, and, having taken the degree of B.A., became a member of the Middle Temple. At both his studies were so successful that Fuller says 'it was hard to say whether he was better artist, divine, civil or common lawyer.' Among his other pursuits, history was a favourite one, and he joined the learned men who formed the nucleus of the Society of Antiquaries, then meeting at the Heralds' College in Derby House. (Reliq. Spelman, 69.) In 1593 and 1602 he was selected by his inn to deliver lectures at New Inn. The subject of the last course was 'Advowsons and Church Livings,' published after his death under the title of 'A Compleat Parson.' In the following year he was appointed Lent reader to his own society; and on January 20, 1604, he was called to the degree of the coif, being at the same time nominated serjeant to Henry, Prince of Wales. Nine months after, on October 28, he was appointed solicitor-general, being at this time representative in parliament for Horsham in Sussex.

After filling the office of solicitor-general nearly three years, during which he argued the famous case of the post-nati (State Trials, ii. 506), he was induced on June 25, 1607, to resign it, and become principal serjeant to the king, in order that Bacon might be put into his place. For this accommodation he was knighted on July 5, with a promise of the first seat that should become vacant in the Court of King's Bench. This did not occur for the next five years, when, on November 25, 1612, he received his patent (Croke, Jac.); and in that court he continued during the remainder of his life.

When the practice of privately interrogating the judges was adopted, Bacon (Works, xii. 125) tells the king 'that he had found Judge Doderidge very ready to give opinion in secret,' a course in which it is lamentable to think that most of his colleagues concurred. When King James was negotiating for his son's marriage with the Spanish princess, and was desirous of showing some leniency to the Catholics, Walter Yonge (Diary, 69) reports that 'Judge Doderidge saith he thought they [the judges] should find out a way by law to dispense with the statute against recusancy.' This spirit of accommodating their opinions to the royal wishes was further shown when the judges refused to admit Hampden and others to bail for refusing to subscribe to the late loan. On their being called before the House of Lords in April 1628 to assign the reasons for their judgment, Judge Doderidge, though he attempted to justify the decision, seemed to acknowledge they had committed a mistake, by thus apologetically concluding: 'Omnia habere in memoria, et in nullo errare, divinum potius est quam humanum.' (Parl. Hist. ii. 291.) This speech exhibits somewhat of the drivelling of an old and failing man; but in it he says, 'God knoweth I have endeavoured always to keep a good conscience,' an assertion which is borne out by the general tenor of his life. He had the habit of shutting his eyes while sitting on the bench, for the purpose of concentrating his attention on the argument, without being distracted by surrounding objects, and was thence jocularly called the Sleeping Judge.

He survived his appearance in the House of Lords only five months, dying on September 13, 1628, at Forsters, near Egham, in Surrey, and was buried in the Lady chapel in Exeter Cathedral, where there is a stately monument erected to his and his wife's memory.

Croke, in recording his death, describes him as 'man of great knowledge, as well in common law as in other humane sciences, and divinity' (Croke, Car. 127), and Fuller (i. 282) says of him, 'His soul consisted of two essentials, ability and integrity, holding the scale of justice with so steady a hand that neither love nor lucre, fear or flattery, could bow him on either side.' But it must be acknowledged that in several instances he betrayed that subservience to the ruling powers for which the judicial bench was then remarkable. He composed a variety of works, legal and antiquarian, none of which were published in his lifetime, and some of which still remain in manuscript.

He married three wives, but outlived them all. His first wife was a daughter of — Germin; his second was a daughter of — Cullum, of Canon's Leigh in Devonshire; and the third was Dorothy, daughter of Sir Amias Bampfield, of North Molton, and widow of Edward Hancock, of Combe Martin, Esq. By the two former he had no issue, and by the latter only one son, who died before him. He was succeeded in his property by his brother, Pentecost Doderidge, of Barnstaple, whose son became recorder of that town, and edited one of his uncle's tracts concerning Parliament.' (Athen. Oxon. ii. 425.)

DOLBEN, WILLIAM, of an ancient and respectable Denbighshire family, was the son of John, Archbishop of York, and brother of Gilbert, the judge of the Common Pleas in Ireland from 1700 to 1719, who was created a baronet by Queen Anne.

He pursued his legal studies at the Inner Temple, was called to the bar in 1653, and was elected a bencher in 1672, and autumn reader in 1677. His legal merits probably procured him a royal recommendation for the recordership of the city of London, to which he was elected on February 8, 1676, and knighted. He held the place till he was advanced to the bench, when the corporation voted him a piece of plate 'as a loving remembrance.'

In 1677 he was the first-named serjeant, and was immediately made one of the king's serjeants. On October 23, 1678, he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench; and it was his misfortune to sit under Sir William Scroggs as chief, and to be present at all the trials arising out of the Popish Plot, in the existence of which, as far as it appears, he had a firm belief. But he saw and fairly pointed out the inconsistencies and improbabilities of the evidence against Sir Thomas Gascoigne, which resulted in an acquittal; and at the trial of Sir Thomas Stapleton at York for high treason he summed up favourably for the prisoner, who was thereupon acquitted. (State Trials, vi. 1321, vii. 964, viii. 326, 523.) Being found to be too independent, and suspected of not siding with the crown in its attempt against the charter of the city of London, he was, according to the vicious practice of the time, suddenly superseded on April 20, 1683, just before the judgment against the city was pronounced. Whether he returned to the bar is uncertain.

At the Revolution Sir William Dolben was replaced in his former seat on March 11, 1689. On the 29th of the following month, in delivering a charge to the grand jury in the King's Bench, Narcissus Luttrell says that 'he inveighed mightily against the corruption of juries the last seven years, and gave in charge the laws against Papists.' The same diarist records (i. 509, 527, ii. 253, 259, 262) that on a similar occasion in 1691 he directed the grand jury 'to enquire into malecontents to the government, such as disturbed the peace of the kingdom by dispersing seditious and false news.' He died on January 25, 1694, seized with an apoplectic fit while going into court, and was buried in the Temple Church.

DONCASTER, JOHN DE, in 28 Edward I. was a commissioner of array in Yorkshire. He was summoned to attend the ceremony of the coronation of Edward II, and also was included in the list of judges and others called to assist at the parliaments from the first year of that reign. In 1310 he was appointed a judge of assize for the northern counties, and he is named in various judicial commissions during the next seven years.

On June 5, 1319, he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas; but the fines levied before him in that court do not extend beyond the next year, and he was not summoned to parliament after the early part of the fourteenth year. He was probably at that time removed from the court, although he was named in a special commission for trying some forest offences in his own county two years afterwards.

He was alive in 5 Edward III., when the king confirmed certain grants which had been made to him and his wife Alicia, and their heirs, by the Earl of Surrey. (Parl. Writs, i. 345, ii. p. ii. 781; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 52, 55.)

DORMER, ROBERT, a descendant of the Buckinghamshire family of that name, a branch of which was ennobled by James I. with the title of Lord Dormer of Wenz, which has flourished ever since, was the grandson of Sir Fleetwood Dormer, and the second son of John Dormer, of Ley Grange and Purston, a barrister, by Katherine, daughter of Thomas Woodward, of Ripple in Worcestershire. To his elder brother John, Charles II. in 1661 presented a baronetcy, which became extinct in 1735. Robert was born in 1649, and, having entered Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar in 1675. He is mentioned as junior counsel for the crown in several trials in 1680, and was soon afterwards constituted chancellor of Durham.

In 1698 he represented Aylesbury, in 1701 the county of Bucks, and in 1702 Northallerton. In the great question of Ashby and White he opposed the assumed privilege of the House of Commons, which would have prevented an elector from proceeding at common law for the injury sustained by the returning officer refusing his vote. On January 8, 1706, he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, and sat there nearly one-and-twenty years, at his death on September 18, 1726.

His seat was at Arle Court, near Cheltenham. His marriage with Mary, daughter of Sir Richard Blake, of London, produced him four daughters only, one of whom married Lord Fortescue of Credan, and another John Parkhurst, of Catesby in Northamptonshire, the father of the author of the Greek Lexicon to the New Testament. (Alkyn's Gloucestersh. 174; St. Trin.

DORSET, EARL OF. See OSMUND.

DOUBRIDGE, or DOUNEBRIGGE, WILLIAM, was appointed a baron of the Exchequer on May 12, 1380, 12 Richard II., having previously held the office of auditor of the Exchequer, in which he was paid 6s. 8d. a day for going to Lostwithiel to audit the accounts of Cornwall and Devon. It seems probable that he died in 17 Richard II. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 115, 117; Devon's Issues Exch. 223, 235.)

DOVER, JOHN DE, and his companions, made the assize of the king's demesnes in Warwickshire and Leicestershire in 20 Henry II., 1174, as the justices errant for those counties. (Madox, i. 125.) He was the son of William de Dover, and nephew of Hugh de Dover, Lord of Chilham in Kent, to whom his son Fulbert de Dover eventually became heir. (Madox, i. 97, 125, 252, 630; Arch. Cantiana, iv. 214.) The family became extinct in the reign of Edward I.

DRAYTON, NICHOLAS DE, an ecclesiastic, was probably the son or nephew of the already mentioned Thomas de Brayton, who was sometimes called de Drayton, to whom the Great Seal of Edward III. was occasionally entrusted in the absence of the chancellor. On December 1, 1363, he was appointed custos of the scholars supported by the royal bounty at the Aula Regis in Cambridge (N. Fadera, iii. 717); and a few years afterwards he was a disciple of John Wickliffe, and had the greater excommunication fulminated against him by Sudbury, Bishop of London, for promulgating among the people errors against the articles of the Catholic faith; and whom the king, on March 20, 1370, authorised that prelate to incarcerate until he renounced his heresies. (Ibid. 889.) How he purged himself does not appear; but it is by no means surprising that he should have been raised to the bench of the Exchequer on November 14, 1376, 50 Edward III., and been continued there in the following June, on the accession of Richard II., since the authority of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who partook of the same opinions, was paramount at both these dates.

DRAYTON. See T. DE BRAYTON.

DROES, HUGH DE, was appointed one of the two coroners of Wiltshire in 7 Henry III., and it was no doubt in that character that two years afterwards his name was added to the list of justices itinerant for that county. In 10 Henry III., 1226, he was one of those appointed to take an assize at Devizes as to the last presentation of the church of Harrendon, and to collect the quinzime of the county. He was still alive in 20 Henry III., when he assessed the tallage there. (Rot. Claus. i. 560, ii. 76, 136, 140, 146.)

DROGO is the last witness in a charter of William II. granting the church of Andover to the monks of St. Florentius, and is there described with the words 'qui custodiebat sigillum.' Galdric was chancellor at the time, being the second witness to it; so that it is difficult to explain the nature of the office held by Drogo, unless, if the 'sigillum' mentioned was the royal seal, he was merely the officer attendant on the chancellor, whose duty it was to carry it. This is the less unlikely, from the fact that no previous evidence exists of any such appointment as keeper of the seal, either independent of or in connection with the chancellor, and from his position at the end of the list of witnesses. The charter has no date, but was probably granted in or soon after 1093. (Monast. vi. 992.)

DROKENESFORD, JOHN DE (BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS), was keeper of the king's wardrobe, and on the chancellor's resignation on August 12, 1302, 30 Edward I., the Great Seal was placed, as was the usual custom, under his care in the wardrobe, but with no power to use it, and eleven days after it was given to Adam de Osgodby, the master of the Rolls.

He possessed the manor of Eston Crok, in the forest of Chute, and had a licence to impark his wood of Horsley there and eighty acres in addition. He had also grants from the king amounting to 260 acres in Wolnemer and Windsor forests. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 55, 62.)

He evidently had previously filled some office in the Treasury or the Exchequer, as he is mentioned in 1296 as the locum tenens of the treasurer, an office to which he was again appointed in 1305, in which year he is also described as pleading for the king in a suit relative to the manor of Woodhull in Bedfordshire. He retained the office of keeper of the wardrobe till the end of that reign, when it would appear that in 1 Edward II. he exchanged it with John de Benstede for the office of chancellor of the Exchequer. (Madox, i. 72, 325, ii. 71, 324; Abb. Placit. 256, 293.)

His ecclesiastical preferment consisted at this time of a canonry in the cathedral of Wells, and he was also a chaplain to the pope; but in the next year he was elected Bishop of Bath and Wells, and was consecrated on November 9, 1309. King Edward II. entrusted him with the care of the kingdom when he went into France in 1312, but he afterwards joined the partisans of the queen against her husband.

The nineteen years of his rule were continually disturbed by contests with the canons of his church. He died at Dogmersfield in 1329, and was interred in the chapel of St. Catherine in his own cathedral. (Godwin, 375.)

DUKET, RICHARD, was probably the son of Nicholas Duket, chamberlain of London in the reign of Richard I. (Madox, i. 776.) He held an office in the court, his name frequently appearing on grants in 5 to 8 John. (Rot. Claus. i. 4-73.) In the latter year, being then called 'clericus noster,' he received a grant of an annual pension of five marks out of the abbey of Whithy. (Ibid. 83.) In 6 and 7 Henry III. he was sheriff of the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. In 1225 he was one of the justices itinerant commissioned to several counties, and while performing this duty in Norfolk and Suffolk he was summoned to the king to undertake an embassy to the court of Rome, whither he proceeded with Philip de Hadham. In the next year and till 17 Henry III. he was still employed as a justice itinerant, and from the numerous commissions in which his name thus occurs through so many years, and the position which he occupies in them, it is not improbable that he was at this time one of the regular justiciars at Westminster. His death occurred about 1245, when his son Hugh did homage for his lands in Lincolnshire. (Ibid. 77, ii. 68, 78, 103, 141, 161, 213; Orig. 104; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 446.)

DURENENT, WALTER, is only known as a resident in Buckinghamshire, and as acting as one of the justices itinerant for that county in 9 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 375, ii. 77.)

DUREM, JOHN, was appointed one of the barons of the Exchequer in 1449, 27 Henry VI., and remained in his seat till the restoration of that monarch in 1470, but does not appear to have been reappointed on the return of Edward in the following year. He died between that date and 1476, when his widow, Elizabeth, made her will, by which it appears that they left a son Thomas and two daughters, and that he possessed property at Wendover in Bucks, and also in the counties of Northampton, Bedford, and Huntingdon. He was buried in the church of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield. (Test. Vetus. 342.)

DYER, JAMES, was born at Roundhill in Somersetshire about the year 1512. His father, Richard Dyer, of Wincalton, was of an honourable family, which produced in a senior branch Sir Edward Dyer, the author of several poems, and an especial favourite of Queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the chancellorship of the Garter. His mother's name was Walton. He is said to have been educated at Broadgate's Hall, Oxford, on the site of which Pembroke College was afterwards founded, and went from thence, first, to New Inn, and then to the Middle Temple. He must have been called to the bar before the year 1537, as he is then first mentioned as an advocate in his own Reports.

On May 19, 1552, he received his writ to take upon himself the degree of the coif in the following Michaelmas Term; and in the interval, according to a common custom of the time, he was appointed autumn reader to his society. The 'Statute of Wills' was the subject of his reading. He was admitted to the degree of the coif on October 17, 1552, and the ceremony was remarkable as the first recorded instance of a motto being inscribed on the rings presented, that adopted on this occasion being 'Plebs sine lege ruit.' (Dyer, 71.) But it appears, though not recorded, that it was an ancient practice, and instances occur in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII. (See SIR JOHN FINEUX and SIR EDWARD MONTAGU.) Within a month he was nominated one of the king's serjeants, and in March 1553 he was returned member for Cambridgeshire, and elected speaker of the last parliament of Edward's reign. His next honour was the recordership of Cambridge, and he was soon after knighted. On May 8, 1557, he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas. Another patent, dated April 23, 1558, appointed him a judge of the King's Bench during pleasure—a temporary appointment, without removing him from the Common Pleas, made for the sole purpose of his keeping the essoign of Easter Term, instead of Justice Francis Morgan, who was too ill to perform the duty. A question was mooted whether Dyer's first patent was not rendered void by this new patent; and, as this was decided in the affirmative (Dyer, 143, 158), it is more than probable that Judge Dyer was at once restored by a new patent to the Common Pleas. This view is strengthened by the facts that a fine was levied before him in Trinity Term following (Orig. 48), and that on the accession of Queen Elizabeth in November his patent was for that court.

Queen Mary's death took place in the middle of Michaelmas Term, and the new patents to all the then existing judges were issued on the following day. But before the commencement of the next term the two chief justices, who were Catholics, were removed to a lower grade, and Judge Dyer was promoted to the head of the Common Pleas on January 22, 1559. He presided till his death, on March 24, 1582, a period of more than twenty-three years, during which the law was administered in his court and on the circuit with such efficiency, firmness, and patience as not only to secure the confidence and admiration of his contemporaries, but also to fix a glory round his name which the centuries have failed to dim. His judicial manner is thus described by George Whetstone, who sung his praises in a long lament which, written when flattery would be unprofitable, is more valuable than any epitaph:—

Settled to heare, but very slowe to speake,
Till either part, at large, his minde did breake.

And when he spake, he was in speeche repos'd;
His eyes did search the simple sutor's barte;
To put by bribes his hands were ever close,
His processe just, he took the poore man's parte:

He rul'd by law and listned not to arte;
These foes to truth,—love, hate, and private gaine,
With most corrupt, his conscience would not staine.

The friendless wight, which did offend through need,

He evermore with mercy did respect;
The prowder thiefe, that did his trespasse feede,
Through truste in friendes, with scourge of lawe he cheekt;
For by the fault, not friendes he did direct.

Thus he, with grace, the poore man's love did drawe,
And by sharpe meanes did keepe the prowde in awe.

This last point of his character was perhaps suggested by the energy he displayed at the Warwick assizes in 1574 in supporting a poor widow against the oppression of a rich knight of that county, whose illegal proceedings were assisted by the bench of magistrates there; the particulars of which are related in the life of the judge prefixed to his Reports, edited by John Vaillant, Esq.; together with his reply to the articles exhibited against him to the privy council by the angry magistrates, whose punishment or dismissal of the complaint does not appear, but is alluded to by Lord Chief Justice Sir Edward Montagu in Wraynham's case in 1618. (State Trials, ii. 1080.) The judge continued to be an ornament to the bench for nearly eight years afterwards. He was buried in the parish church of Great Stoughton in Huntingdonshire, under a handsome monument still existing.

His Reports, which extend from 4 Henry VIII. to the period of his death, are remarkable for their conciseness and accuracy. They were first published in French three years after he died, and several editions have since issued from the press. That of 1688 was illustrated by marginal notes and references by Chief Justice Treby; and that of 1794, the edition now used, is an English translation by John Vaillant, Esq., with valuable additions of modern cases, and preceded by a life of the author.

He married Margaret, the daughter of Sir

Maurice à Barrow, of Hampshire, and widow of Sir Thomas Elyot, the celebrated author of the 'Boke of the Governour,' but left no children; and on his death his mansion in Charterhouse churchyard and his estate at Great Stoughton descended to Sir Richard Dyer, his great-nephew, whose grandson Ludovick was created a baronet in 1627, but the title became extinct at his death. (Whetstone's Poem; Vaillant's Life; Athen. Oxon. i. 480.)

DYMOCK, ANDREW, descended from a branch of the family of Sir John Dymock, who acquired the manor of Scrivelsby in Lincolnshire in the reign of Edward III., and held it by the service of being the king's champion at the coronation, was constituted solicitor-general in 1485, 1 Henry VII.; but, as his name is never mentioned in the Year Books, his duties were probably confined to the advocacy of the king's interests in the Exchequer. To the second barony in that court he was preferred on May 2, 1496, 11 Henry VII., and filled the seat till the 16th year of that reign.

He married Elizabeth, daughter and one of the coheirs of Sir Peter Arden. (Cal. St. Papers [1509], 190.)

DYVE, WILLIAM DE, sometimes called Dyne, is mentioned by Dugdale as a justice of the King's Bench in 1321-2, on the authority of a passage from Leland's 'Collectanea' (i. p. ii. 275); but, referring to it, we find that Geoffrey de Say and William de Dyne, 'justiciarii regis,' are stated by Gervas of Canterbury to have been sent into Kent to enquire 'de fautoribus Badlesmer.' Now the term 'justiciarius regis' was at that time applied, not only to the judges of the two benches and the justices of assize, but also to any others who were appointed on a special judicial commission; and it is not improbable that such a commission, although no record of it has yet appeared, may have been issued to those two gentlemen to try the adherents of Bartholomew de Badlesmere, who was executed for treason in that year. Though there is nothing whatever to show that William de Dyve, or Dyne, was connected with the courts at Westminster, it has been deemed right, on Dugdale's authority, to introduce his name.

There were two families of that name, one settled in Northampton, and the other lords of the manors of Docklington and Dadington in Oxfordshire.

E

EBBOICIS, STEPHEN DE (Evreux), was appointed by a mandate of 4 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 437), with three others, one of the justices to deliver the gaols of Hereford of all the prisoners therein detained. It is evident, however, that he was only included in this commission on account of his being a knight residing in that county, where his principal seat was the castle of Lenhall. (Rot. Chart. 156.) For his lands at Badelingham he was accustomed to pay annually thirty-two gallons of honey to the castle of Hereford, a charge from which he was for ever released in 17 John. (Rot. Claus. ii. 188.) He died in 12 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 168.)

EDENSTOWE, HENRY DE, so called from a place of that name in the county of Nottingham, now Edwinstowe, where he had possessions (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 102), was a clerk in the Chancery in 18 Edward II., 1325, and in 4 and 6 Edward III. he acted as clerk of the parliament. (Rot. Parl. i. 420, ii. 52, 68.) In the latter year and on several occasions the Great Seal was placed in the custody of the master of the Rolls, in the absence of the chancellor, under the seals of two of the clerks, of whom Henry de Edenestowe was one (Hardy's Catal.); and in 20 Edward III., 1346, he is named for a loan to the king of 100*l.* (N. Fadera, iii. 69.)

EDENHAM, GEOFFREY DE, had property in Lincolnshire, where there is a parish of that name. He was made a judge of the King's Bench on January 18, 1331, 4 Edward III., and is last mentioned, with Thomas de Longevillers, as possessing the manor of Aykle in Lincolnshire in 15 Edward III. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 110, 138; Rot. Parl. ii. 446; Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 105.)

EDINGTON, WILLIAM DE (BISHOP OF WINCHESTER), was born at Edington, a parish in Wiltshire, where, when he became Bishop of Winchester, he built a church and founded a large chantry for a dean and twelve ministers. (Monast. vi. 535.)

He was educated at Oxford, and was presented in 1335 to the living of Cheriton in Hampshire, and also had a canonry in Salisbury Cathedral.

In 1341 he was receiver of the ninth granted by parliament (N. Fadera, ii. 1154), and in 1343 he was keeper of the king's wardrobe. On April 10, 1344, he was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, from which he was raised, at the end of two years, to the high and responsible office of treasurer. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 147, 154.) This he held for no less than ten years, and then only exchanged it for the higher post of chancellor.

On the death of Adam de Orilton he was placed in the vacant see of Winchester, by papal provision in his favour dated December 9, 1345; but he was wise enough to renounce the pope's nomination as prejudicial to the rights of the crown; and the king, 'of his special favour, and not by virtue of the said bulls,' accepted his fealty, and restored the temporalities to him on the 15th of the following February. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 153; N. Fadera, iii. 39, 64, 69; Devon's Issue Roll, 150.)

His treasurership was illustrated by the unfortunate introduction of two new coins, called a groat and a half-groat, the real worth of which was so much less than their nominal value as to produce a corresponding increase in the price of all articles of consumption throughout the kingdom.

On the institution of the order of the Garter in 1349 Edward constituted him the prelate of it, perpetuating the dignity in his successors of the see of Winchester. In 1355 he was left one of the custodes of the kingdom in the absence of the king on his renewed invasion of France.

The Great Seal was placed in his hands, with the title of chancellor, on November 27, 1356, 30 Edward III., and he retained it for more than six years, during which he preserved the royal favour without losing the confidence of the people. He was, as the record says, 'gratefully absolved' from its duties on February 19, 1363.

He survived little more than three years, still continuing high in the confidence of his sovereign. Shortly before his death the monks of Canterbury elected him archbishop, on the decease of Simon Islip; but he refused the proffered dignity, humorously saying that, though Canterbury was the higher rack, Winchester was the better manger.

He died on October 7, 1366, and was buried at Edington. (Godwin, 225.)

EGERTON, THOMAS (BARON ELLESMERE, VISCOUNT BRACKLEY), whose surname was assumed from a manor in Cheshire so called, possessed by his father's ancestors when Domesday Book was compiled, was the natural son of Sir Richard Egerton, of Ridley in the same county, by a young woman named Alice Sparke.

He was born in 1540, and about 1570 was admitted a commoner at Brasenose

College, Oxford, where he remained for three years. He then entered Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1572. He became governor in 1580, Lent reader in 1582, and treasurer in 1587. He practised principally in the Court of Chancery, and was raised to the office of solicitor-general on June 28, 1581. It is related that this appointment arose from the admiration of Queen Elizabeth on hearing him argue in a cause against the crown, when she is said to have exclaimed, 'In my troth, he shall never plead against me again.' (Life of Egerton, 8.)

During the intervals of his laborious avocations his chief relaxation was in the sports of the field, and several noble clients gave him licence to 'hunt and kill' in their parks and manors.

Egerton held the office of solicitor-general for the space of eleven years, till he became attorney-general on June 2, 1592, and so remained for nearly two years. During this long period of office he was of course engaged in all the prosecutions for high treason and offences against the state. His name appears in those against Campion and others in 1581, against Abingdon and others in 1586, against Secretary Davison in 1587, against Philip Earl of Arundel and against Sir Richard Knightly in 1589, and against Sir John Perrot in 1592. (State Trials, i. 1051-1322.) If these criminal proceedings were to be judged according to the present enlightened views with regard to the administration of the law, not one of the persons engaged in them would escape condemnation. But this would be palpably unjust. With whatever abhorrence the iniquitous principles on which these trials were conducted may be now regarded, the only fair enquiry which can be raised with respect to the advocates employed in them is whether they exceeded their duty according to the practice which then prevailed. Looking through the Reports from this point of view, Egerton must receive a full acquittal from all imputation of harshness towards the prisoners.

In 1593 the office of chamberlain of Chester was conferred upon him, and soon after he was knighted. By this title he was promoted to the mastership of the Rolls on April 10, 1594. So active and efficient did he prove himself in this office that the queen at once constituted him lord keeper on the death of Sir John Puckering, delivering the Great Seal to him on May 6, 1596.

His appointment arose entirely from the high reputation he had attained for his legal knowledge and integrity, and not only without the intervention of any courtly interest, but even, it is said, in opposition to the wishes and endeavours of Lord Burleigh, and his son Sir Robert Cecil. Fuller says (i. 186) that 'all Christendom afforded not a person which carried more gravity in his countenance and behaviour, . . . so much that many have gone to the Chancery on purpose truly to see his venerable garb (happy they who had no other business), and were highly pleased with so acceptable a spectacle;' adding that 'his outward case was nothing in comparison with his inward abilities, quick wit, solid judgment, ready utterance.' He still retained the place of master of the Rolls, and executed during the rest of the reign the whole business of the Court of Chancery in his double capacity. The intrigues of the lawyers who aspired to the second place were counteracted by his influence with the queen, and her conviction that he needed no assistance.

In the foolish émeute raised by the Earl of Essex in February 1600, so fatal to himself, the grave lord keeper was placed in a position of some danger. On the queen's being informed of the earl's seditious meeting in Essex House, she sent the lord keeper there, accompanied by the lord chief justice and other lords of the council, 'to understand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know that if they had any particular cause of grief against any persons whatever, it should be heard, and they should have justice.' On being admitted they found the courtyard crowded with armed men, who, after the lord keeper had delivered the queen's message, cried out, 'Kill them!' 'Cast the Great Seal out of the window!' &c. The earl, under pretence of conferring privately with them, took the lords into his back chamber, and, telling them that he was going to the lord mayor and sheriffs of London, and would be back in half an hour, left them under lock and key, 'guarded by Sir John Davis and others with musket-shot.' There they were detained from ten o'clock in the morning till four in the afternoon, when Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who had joined Essex in his progress through the city, and found that he received no encouragement, hastened back and released them. Considering how much the earl was indebted to Egerton, who had always acted as a sincere and considerate friend, it is to be hoped that his allegation that he locked up the counsellors for their security against his irritated partisans was founded in truth; but the Earl of Rutland in his examination acknowledged that it was purposed to take the lord keeper with them to the court, which they intended to surprise. (State Trials, 1340-7.)

During Queen Elizabeth's life Egerton enjoyed her utmost confidence and favour. She employed him in various treaties with the Dutch and the Danes, in the management of which he showed himself a good diplomatist; and she entrusted him with great powers under several special commissions, which he exercised with mildness and moderation. Within eight months of her death she paid him the honourable but burdensome compliment of a three days' visit to his mansion at Harefield in Middlesex, the enormous expense attending which may well account for her majesty's subjects dreading such visitations. (Egerton Papers, 340-7.)

No sooner did King James hear of his peaceful accession to the throne than he issued a mandate from Holyrood House, dated April 5, 1603, appointing Egerton keeper of the Seal during pleasure, who met the king on his arrival at Broxbourne in Hertfordshire, on May 3, when his appointment was confirmed. He was also continued in the office of master of the Rolls till the 19th of the same month, Edward Bruce, Lord Kinloss, being then named as his successor. On delivering him the new Great Seal on July 19 his majesty created him Baron of Ellesmere in Shropshire, and on the 24th he was constituted lord chancellor. He held this high position for nearly fourteen years under King James, which, in addition to the seven years under Elizabeth, makes his term of service as the head of the law extend to the long period of twenty-one years. Few have filled so prominent a station with so much honour and so few enemies. Looking at the character of the two monarchs whom he served, he must have been endowed with more than ordinary wisdom, prudence, and learning, to suffer no alienation from the caprices of either, and to preserve such continued ascendancy in their councils, without degrading himself by that abject and humiliating flattery to which they were both too much accustomed.

He was elected chancellor of Oxford in 1610, and his presidency lasted till within two months of his death, when he resigned it on January 24, 1617.

The best mode of judging of the character of an individual is to see the reputation which he held among his contemporaries of various grades. That of Egerton will stand the ordeal. Camden records an anagram on his name, 'GESTAT HONOREM,' which would not have been discovered if it had not been applicable; Ben Jonson wrote three epigrams in his praise, one of them the last time he sat as chancellor; and Bishop Hacket describes him as one 'qui nihil in vitâ nisi laudandum, aut fecit, aut dixit, aut sensit.' Among the writers of the next generation, Fuller gives the same testimony; and Anthony Wood says, 'His memory was much celebrated by epigrams while he was living, and after his death all of the long robe lamented his loss.'

Among the most eminent was Sir John Davies, the poet, statesman, and lawyer, who, after summing up the characteristics of a good chancellor, gracefully applies them to Lord Ellesmere. (Preface to his Reports.)

He is said to have been the first law chancellor since the Reformation who entertained a chaplain in his family. This was Dr. John Williams, who subsequently filled the same office as his patron, and became also Archbishop of York. Another eminent man, Dr. Donne, afterwards dean of St. Paul's, spent many years under Lord Ellesmere's roof, as his secretary, and there formed that secret connection with his wife Anne Moore, the niece of the chancellor's second marriage, which had so fatal an influence on his earlier fortunes.

Few of his judicial decisions are reported; but in the case of the post-nati, being the question whether persons born in Scotland after the accession of King James to the throne of England were aliens in the latter country, and therefore disabled from holding lands there, he delivered an elaborate judgment that they were entitled to all the rights of natural-born subjects, which by the king's command he published in 1609. Twelve out of the fourteen judges concurring in his opinion, his remarks on the doubts of the other two afford a curious specimen of the extraordinary manner in which Scripture allusions were introduced into the oratory of the period. He said, 'The apostle Thomas doubted of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ, when all the rest of the apostles did firmly believe it; but this his doubting confirmed, in the whole Church, the faith of the resurrection. The two worthy and learned judges that have doubted in this case, as they beare his name, so I doubt not but their doubting hath given occasion to clear the doubt in others, and so to confirme in both the kindomes, both for the present and the future, the truth of the judgement in this case.' He does not name the two dissentients, and it is uncertain which they were, as three of the judges who pronounced their opinion were named Thomas—viz., Sir Thomas Fleming, Sir Thomas Walmesley, and Sir Thomas Foster, all of the Common Pleas. (State Trials, ii. (228).)

Besides the publication of this judgment, he printed no other work during his life, but he left several valuable manuscripts.

He objected strongly to the Statute of Wills, passed in the reign of Henry VIII., and he was wont to tell the following merry story as an illustration of its evils:—A friar coming to visit a great man in his sickness, and finding him past memory, took opportunity, according to the custom of those times, to make provision for the monastery whereof he was, and, finding that the sick man could only speak some one syllable, which was for the most part "Yea" or "Nay," in an imperfect voice, forthwith took upon him to make his will; and demanding of him, "Will you give such a piece of land to our house to pray for your soul?" the dying man sounded "Yea." Then he asked him, "Will you give such land to the maintenance of lights to our Lady?" The sound was again "Yea." Whereupon he boldly asked him many such questions. The son and heir standing by, and hearing his land going away so fast by his father's word "Yea," thought fit to ask one question as well as the friar, which was, "Shall I take a cudgel, and beat this friar out of the chamber?" The sick man's answer was again "Yea," which the son quickly performed, and saved unto himself his father's lands.' (Archæologia, xxv. 384.)

In the latter part of his judicial career he was annoyed by Sir Edward Coke's attempt to restrain the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and by the proceedings which were taken, not only against certain suitors there, but against the counsel who were engaged in the causes, and even the masters in Chancery to whom they were referred, to subject them to the penalties of præmunire, to which, under an old statute, all persons were subject who impeached the judgments of any of the king's courts. The enquiry resulted in the complete triumph of Lord Ellesmere, by the confirmation of the powers of his court, and it had no little effect in disgracing Coke, its instigator.

On November 7, 1616, the king rewarded his long services by advancing him in the peerage to the title of Viscount Brackley, which the wits of Westminster Hall, who objected to his interference with the judgments of the common law courts, converted into Viscount Break-law. He had in 1613, and several times since, requested the king to allow him to retire from his arduous post, the duties of which he felt were too heavy for his increasing age and infirmities. Sickness at last compelled him to press his resignation, and the Close Roll records that on March 3, 1617, being ill at his residence, York House, he was visited by the king himself, who then freed him from the custody of the Great Seal, but limited his retirement to two years. Within two weeks from this time, however, his earthly career was closed. He died on March 15, and his body being removed to Doddleston in Cheshire, was there buried.

The king, who appears to have regarded him with great affection, is said to have parted from him with tears of gratitude and respect, and to have signified his intention to raise him to an earldom. Though death prevented the chancellor from receiving this last mark of his sovereign's favour, little more than two months elapsed before his majesty proved his sincerity by creating the heir Earl of Bridgewater in Somersetshire on May 27, 1617. This title was changed into a dukedom in 1720, but both have since become extinct. The earldom, however, was revived in 1840 in the grand-nephew of the last duke.

The chancellor was thrice married, but had issue by his first wife only. She was Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Ravenscroft, Esq., of Bretton in Flintshire. His second wife was Elizabeth, sister to Sir George More, knight, of Losely Farm, Surrey, lieutenant of the Tower, and widow, first of Richard Polstead, Esq., of Abury in the same county, and then of Sir John Wolley, knight, chancellor of the order of the Garter. His third wife was Alice, daughter of Sir John Spencer, of Althorpe, knight, and widow of Ferdinando, fifth Earl of Derby.

ELDON, EARL OF. See J. SCOTT.

ELERIUS was a monk in the priory of Cogges in Oxfordshire, of which he became prior in 1227. From that he was promoted to the abbacy of the monastery of Pershore in Worcestershire on March 19, 1251, 35 Henry III. In August of that year he was appointed the king's escheator on this side Trent, and continued in that office till 1255 (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 112-220), in which year he was employed by the king on a financial commission into Wales, where he was most honourably received by Llewellyn and his nobles. (Leland's Coll. i. 243.)

In 1257-8 he is inserted in Madox's list of barons of the Exchequer (ii. 319), on the authority of the memoranda of that year; but he is not mentioned afterwards in that court. He retired from the abbacy of Pershore on October 24, 1262, having previously granted to it his manor 'de Haukesburi.' (Monast. ii. 412, 418, vi. 1003.)

ELIOT, RICHARD, was allied to the ancient family of that name first seated in Devonshire and afterwards in Cornwall, a member of which was raised to the peerage in 1784 as Baron Eliot of St. Germain, whose son was created Earl of St. Germain in 1815. Richard was an advocate of the Middle Temple in 8 Henry VII. In 1503 he took the degree of the coif, and in 1506 he was appointed one of the king's serjeants. On April 26, 1513, he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, and exercised his judicial duties there till 1522. By his will he directed his body to be buried in the cathedral of Salisbury. (Orig. 47, 113, 215.)

ELIOT, WILLIAM, was named master of the Rolls, in conjunction with Robert Morton, on November 13, 1485, to hold for life and for the life of the survivor. There is no evidence of his exercising the duties of the office, nor of his retaining it, after his partner was consecrated Bishop of Worcester in February 1487. On the contrary, David William is mentioned in the office on the 22nd of that month, and William Eliot as acting as a simple master in Chancery, being named in that character as a receiver of petitions in parliament from the fourth to the eleventh year of the reign. (Rot. Parl. vi. 346, 409, 441, 458.)

ELLENBOROUGH, LORD. See E. LAW.

ELLESMERE, LORD. See T. EGERTON.

ELLESWORTH, SIMON DE, had a grant in 11 Edward I. from Simon de Torp of lands in Torveston, Bucks, with the advowson of the church there. (Abb. Placit. 206.) He was not a regular justice itinerant, but merely for pleas of the forest, in which he is mentioned as acting in 1292 for the county of Essex. In 23 Edward I. the custody of the religious houses belonging to France in the counties of Northampton, Rutland, Cambridge, and Huntingdon was committed to him, and in the next year he was joined with the chief justice of the forests in a commission to rent out the wastes of the forests beyond the Trent. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 91, 94.) In 21 Edward I. he was one of the sureties for the appearance of William de Luda, Bishop of Ely, on a complaint made against him by the Archbishop of Dublin (Rot. Parl. i. 112); and on Ellesworth's death, in 25 Edward I., the bishop returned the obligation by becoming security for the payment of his debts to the crown. (Madox, ii. 44.)

ELLIS, WILLIAM, son of Thomas, thrice mayor and once M. P. for Norwich, was a member of Lincoln's Inn, where he became a reader in Lent 1502. He was made a baron of the Exchequer in 1523, being so named in the list of the judges, &c., who were assessed to the subsidy in November of that year. He continued on the bench till 1536.

He was lord of the manor of Attlebridge in Norfolk, where his son William, whom he had by Elizabeth his wife, lies buried. (Blomefield's Norwich, ii. 199; Orig. 250.)

ELLIS, WILLIAM. Noble, in his 'House of Cromwell' (i. 437), states that the William Ellis who was solicitor-general to the protector became judge of the Common Pleas under Charles II.; and, notwithstanding the apparent improbability that one who had held so prominent a ministerial office under the Commonwealth should be selected to fill a judicial one under the monarchy, there seems little reason to doubt that the solicitor and the judge were one and the same individual. The appointment as solicitor is dated 1654, and the judge was chosen bencher of Gray's Inn in that year; he was a member of the parliaments of 1640 and 1654 for Boston, and in those of 1656 and 1659 for Grantham, the first being the place that the judge represented afterwards in 1679, and the last being the place of his father's residence: facts sufficient to support the identity.

The family of Ellis, or Ellys, is said to have been originally Welsh, but afterwards to have settled in Lincolnshire. Sir William Ellis, an ancestor of the judge, was an eminent lawyer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and from him descended Thomas Ellis of Grantham, who had two sons, Thomas and William. The former was made a baronet in 1660 for his loyalty during the rebellion, but the title became extinct in 1742; the latter sided with the opponents to the crown and was the future judge. (Wotton's Baronet. iii. 90.)

William Ellis was born about 1609, and was sent for his education to Caius College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees of B.A. and M.A. in 1632 and 1636. Admitted into Gray's Inn, he was called to the bar in 1634. The town of Boston returned him to the Long Parliament in 1640, where he subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant; but, in consequence of voting 'that the king's answers to the propositions of both houses were a ground for peace,' he was one of those excluded from the house by Pride's Purge, in December 1648. Whitelocke states (p. 405) that he was re-admitted in the following June, and accordingly he is found among the Rump who resumed their sittings on the dissolution of Protector Richard's government in 1659. (Parl. Hist. ii. 611, iii. 1248, 1547.)

In the meantime, however, he had accepted office under Cromwell, being appointed solicitor-general to his highness on May 24, 1654, the functions of which he continued to perform under Protector Richard. In the parliament of 1654 he was returned for Boston, and in those of 1656 and 1659 for Grantham, having in the interim received a baronetcy from the protector. In Richard's parliament he showed great activity, but all his speeches, as reported by Burton, were in a sober and accommodating spirit. Having from the beginning been an adherent to the supporters of the Commonwealth, he was opposed in his attempt to be re-elected at Grantham to the Healing Parliament of 1660. Probably his brother's loyalty, added to his own insignificance, preserved him from censure or even notice at the Restoration. (Parl. Hist. iii. 1430, 1480, 1533, iv. 4, 1081.)

Losing his title and his place on the king's arrival, he fell back into the legal ranks, and pursued his profession with so much success that, after having been chosen reader of his inn in 1663, he was called serjeant in 1669, and made one of the king's serjeants in 1671, when he was knighted

He was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas on December 18, 1672, but in October 1676 he was removed from his place for some political reason not stated, but probably for the mere purpose of giving his seat to Scroggs, whom the minister Lord Danby favoured. His dismissal was evidently not caused by any reflection on his character, for he was replaced in less than three years, when Danby's influence had ceased. In the interval he again entered parliament, being chosen in 1679 by his old constituents at Boston, while his nephew, Sir William, was selected for Grantham. These elections may have been the cause of his being recalled to the bench on the 1st of the next May, when he was also allowed to resume his former precedence. He died at his chambers in Serjeants' Inn, Fleet Street, on December 3, 1680, leaving no issue. (Sir T. Raymond, 217, 251, 407.)

ELY, NICHOLAS DE (BISHOP OF WINCHESTER), was appointed archdeacon of Ely about 1249, 33 Henry III., and on October 18, 1260, the barons placed the Great Seal in his hands. He kept it only till the 5th of the following July, when King Henry transferred it into the hands of Walter de Merton, but by a separate patent specially recommended Nicholas for his good service.

In the following year the king appointed him his treasurer; and on July 12, 1263, the Great Seal was again entrusted to him, with the title of chancellor. On the king's going abroad soon afterwards, the Seal remained in his possession, with a prohibition, however, from affixing it to any instrument which was not attested by Hugh le Despencer, the chief justiciary. In the course of the next year he resigned the office of chancellor, and resumed that of treasurer. (Madox, ii. 319.)

In September 1266 he was elected Bishop of Worcester, from which see he was on February 24, 1267, translated to Winchester, over which diocese he presided about twelve years, and died on February 12, 1280, at Waverley in Surrey, where his body was buried, his heart being sent for interment at Winchester. (Godwin, 222, 261; Le Nere, 73, &c.; Rapin, iii. 142.)

ELY, RALPH DE, was according to Madox (ii. 318) a baron of the Exchequer in 24 and 27 Henry III., but there is no other notice of his name.

ELY, WILLIAM OF, a canon of the church of Lincoln, was the king's treasurer during the whole of the reign of John and part of that of Henry III. He is mentioned in that character as one of the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged in 10 John, 1208, and Dugdale records his death in 8 Henry III., 1223, calling him then Anglia Thesaurarius. (Rot. Chart. 49.)

ENGAIN, WARNER, is first mentioned in 19 Henry III., 1235, when, being then custos of the honor of Richmond, he was directed to deliver it up to Alexander Bacon. (Madox, i. 335.) In 1240 he was one of the justices itinerant for the northern counties, before whom a fine was levied at York. At this time he had the custody of the king's manors, and failing to account for the proceeds in 29 Henry III., his person was attached, and he was called upon to appear before the barons of the Exchequer. (Madox, ii. 243.) On his death, in 1253, he was still indebted to the crown, as the king then granted his brother, James Engaine, permission to pay the balance due into the Exchequer, by half-yearly instalments of 100 shillings each. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 166.)

ENGLEFELD, ALAN DE, called so from the place of that name in Berkshire, of which he was the parson, was added to the commission of the justices itinerant for that county in 9 Henry III. He was at the same time coroner for Staffordshire, and possessed property, not only in both these counties, but also in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire, all of which were seized into King John's hands, but restored to him on returning to his allegiance in 1 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 300; ii. 76, 124.)

ENGLEFIELD, WILLIAM DE, probably the nephew of the above, was sheriff of Devonshire in 36 Henry III., 1251, and the two following years. (Madox, i. 597, ii. 193.) In 1255 and the two following years he was one of the justices itinerant who visited several counties, and again in 1260. About that time it seems probable that he was made a justicier at Westminster, for the Rotulus de Finibus (Excerpt. ii. 335) contains an entry of an amercement imposed by him. From 46 to 50 Henry III. he was employed in a judicial character. (Ibid. ii. 422-445.)

He derived his name from the town of Englefield in Berkshire, where it is said his family had property above two hundred years before the Conquest. He was the son of John Englefield, of that place, and was succeeded by his own son John, one of whose descendants is the subject of the next article.

ENGLEFIELD, THOMAS. In regular descent from the above William came Sir Thomas Englefield, justice of Chester, and twice speaker of the House of Commons, who died about 1514, leaving by his wife Margery, daughter of Sir Richard Danvers, of Prescott, a large family. His second son was Thomas the judge, who on the death of his elder brother without issue succeeded to the inheritance, having previously entered the Middle Temple, where he was reader in 1520.

In 1519 he was sheriff of Berkshire and Oxfordshire. In 1521 he was called to the degree of the coif, and on December 3, 1523, he was advanced to be king's serjeant, at the same time receiving a grant of 100*l.* a year for life.

From the Year Books it appears that he sat as judge of the Common Pleas in Michaelmas 1526, 18 Henry VIII., being knighted at the same time. He performed the functions of his office till his death, which took place on September 28, 1537. To his judicial duties were added those of master of the king's wards, which he held in conjunction with Sir William Paulet. He was buried at Englefield, where there is a brass memorial of him in his robes, and of his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Robert Throgmorton, of Coughton, Warwickshire.

His eldest son Francis lost the paternal estate by attainder for high treason in 35 Elizabeth. His second son John, seated at Wootton Bassett, was the father of another Francis, created a baronet in 1612—a title which expired in 1822. (Wotton's Baronet. i. 254; Dugdale's Orig. 47, 215; Kal. of Exch. i. cxxxix.)

ERDINGTON, GILES DE, was the son of Thomas de Erdington, of an opulent family seated at Erdington, near Aston, in Warwickshire, who was honourably and frequently employed by King John, and died in 2 Henry III. His mother was Roesia, the widow of Adam de Cokefield. Giles was evidently a minor when his father died, and so continued for the twelve following years, for it was not till April 12, 1230, 14 Henry III., that he obtained permission from the king to pay his father's debts by instalments of 100 shillings a year. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 195.) Though there are no reports of the period, it may be presumed that he practised in the courts of Westminster. He was made a judge before August 1251, 35 Henry III., the first date of a payment for an assize to be taken before him, and when he held pleas for the city of London. He retained his place on the bench till December 1267, soon after which he died. (Ibid. ii. 113-404; Abb. Placit. 137.)

Although Dugdale, in his 'Origines Juridicales' (21), calls him a canon of St. Paul's, he makes him in the 'Baronage' (ii. 112) father of Henry, who succeeded to his estates, and whose son, also Henry, was summoned to parliament in 9 Edward III., but not afterwards.

ERLE, WILLIAM, is the lineal descendant of a very ancient family of that name, settled in Somersetshire, from the time of our earliest kings, several members of which have rendered themselves eminent for their services to the country. He is the son of the Rev. Christopher Erle, of Gillingham in Dorsetshire, and was born at Fifehead-Magdalen in its neighbourhood in 1793. After going through Winchester School he entered New College, Oxford, where he took his degree in civil law in 1818. In November of the next year he was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple, and joined the Western Circuit. He also purchased the situation of one of the counsel of the palace court, in which he acquired those habits of business which are of slow attainment in the superior courts. His erudition as a lawyer and his attainments as a scholar soon insured him such full employment on the circuit and in Westminster Hall that he was made king's counsel in 1834.

The city of Oxford returned him as their representative in parliament in 1837, and, though his support was given to the liberal party in the house, the conservative prime-minister, Sir Robert Peel, regarding his merits only, did not hesitate to appoint him a judge of the Commons Pleas on November 6, 1844, whereupon he was knighted. He sat in that court nearly two years, and in October 1846 was transferred to the Queen's Bench. For little less than thirteen years he remained in this seat, when he was promoted on June 24, 1859, to take the vacant place of chief justice of the Common Pleas, in which high position the urbanity of his manner added force and effect to the unquestioned impartiality of his decisions.

These qualities were eloquently recognised by the attorney-general in his farewell address on the chief justice's retirement from the bench on November 26, 1866, after a judicial life of twenty-two years. He still gives his services at the privy council.

He married the daughter of the Rev. David Williams, warden of New College and prebendary of Winchester.

ERMYN, OR ARMYN, WILLIAM, possessed property at Osgodby in Lincolnshire. In 2 Richard II. he was treasurer of Calais, and in 3 Henry IV., 1402, he is mentioned as a baron of the Exchequer. Neither the date of his appointment nor his death is recorded; but he was the ancestor of a knightly family which flourished in the county. (Devon's Iss. Exch. 211; Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 199.)

ERNLE, JOHN, whose name was derived from a family which had flourished at Ernle, a manor near Chichester in Sussex before the reign of Edward I., was the second son of John Ernle, of Ernle, and Agnes, daughter and heir of Simon Bevo who brought him her mother's inheritance of the manor of Etchilhampton in Wiltshire. He was made solicitor-general in 1507; and in 1509, a few days after the accession of Henry VIII., he was promoted to the attorney-generalship, which he occupied till he was raised to the chiefship of the Court of Common Pleas, on Janu-

27, 1519, whereupon he received the honour of knighthood. He did not enjoy his presidency much above two years, his death occurring in 1521. He was buried at Ernle, where his remains lie under a monument still existing. He had two wives: the first was Anne, daughter of Constantine Darel, Esq., of Collinbourne, Wilts; and the second was Margaret, daughter of Edmund Dawtry, Esq.

From his second son, John, descended Sir John Ernle, knight, chancellor of the Exchequer to Charles II.; and also Walter Ernle, of Etchilhampton, who in 1660 was created a baronet—a title which became extinct in 1787.

ERSKINE, THOMAS (LORD ERSKINE).

That only one short year of judicial life should have distinguished an advocate who retained for the long space of twenty-eight years the most prominent place at the British bar would naturally excite surprise, were it not for the recollection that the party to which he was attached was during that period wholly deprived of the power of selecting the law officers of the crown, except for an equally short interval at the beginning of his career, when he was too young and inexperienced to expect promotion. Such was the position of the Hon. Thomas Erskine in 1806, when he was raised per saltum to the highest office of judicial dignity; although without a single interruption from his very first entrance into the forensic arena in 1778, his progress had been one continued march of triumph.

This eminent advocate was the youngest of three sons of Henry David, Earl of Buchan, by Agnes, daughter of Sir James Stuart, Bart., the eldest of whom succeeded to his father's title, and the two others, Henry and Thomas, became equally distinguished for their extraordinary talents, the former being twice lord advocate of Scotland, in 1783 and 1806, and the latter earning honours in England which are now to be recorded.

Thomas Erskine was born at Edinburgh on January 21, 1750, and received his education at the High School of Edinburgh and the university of St. Andrews, the very restricted income of the earl his father forbidding any other advantage. In 1764 he left his native country as a midshipman in the 'Tartar,' and during the four years he remained at sea he visited America and the West Indies. He retired from the service in 1768, and entering the army as an ensign in the Royals or First Regiment of Foot, attained his lieutenantancy in April 1773. While yet an ensign, in 1770, and when little more than twenty years of age, he married Frances, daughter of Daniel Moore, Esq., M.P. for Marlow, and spent the next two years with his regiment at Minorca, devoting his leisure hours to English literature with so much avidity that there was scarcely a passage in Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, or Pope which he could not recite from memory. He used to relate that while in Minorca he not only read prayers to the regiment, but also composed and preached two sermons.

Returning to England in 1772, his agreeable manners and pleasant vivacity soon procured him access to the society of the metropolis, among the distinguished members of which are the names of Mrs. Montagu, Jeremy Bentham, Dr. Johnson, Boswell, Cradock, and Sheridan. He also commenced authorship in a pamphlet 'On the Prevailing Abuses in the British Army,' which had a considerable circulation. After serving in the army for seven years, he saw too palpably that without interest that profession would not secure a provision for his increasing family, and he could not but feel that his talents were more likely to be productive in a wider field for their exercise. Resolving, therefore, to enter the legal profession, he sold his lieutenantancy, and was admitted a member of Lincoln's Inn in 1775. His next step was to be matriculated at one of the universities in order that by taking his degree his time of legal probation should be shortened from five to three years. With this object he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, on January 13, 1776, as a nobleman's son, which entitled him to a Master of Arts degree in two years without examination. This did not prevent him from striving for and obtaining the college prize for English declamation, the harbinger of his future fame. His degree was conferred in June 1778, and on July 3 he was called to the bar.

During the interval between his matriculation and his call he kept his terms both at Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn, dividing his time between literary and legal studies. For the latter purpose he placed himself under the instruction of Sir Francis Buller, and afterwards of Sir George Wood, both subsequently raised to the bench; and by steady application gained that knowledge of the principles of the law, and that mastery of the intricacies of special pleading, so necessary for his future success. He also attended a debating society in order to obtain fluency and confidence, and to accustom himself to the sound of his own voice. His circumstances were so straitened during this period that he himself acknowledged, and indeed vaunted, that his family were usually fed on cow-beef and tripe, and that when he was called to the bar he was almost reduced to his last shilling. But his sanguine disposition and his courageous self-reliance supported him through all his difficulties.

No sooner was he called to the bar than there was a propitious change in his circumstances. From being almost penniless he became suddenly affluent, and though a perfect novice in Westminster Hall, he was at once recognised as one of its brightest ornaments. One happy accident followed by another gave him the fortunate opportunity. Happening to dine in company with Captain Baillie, against whom a rule to show cause in the following Michaelmas Term why a criminal information should not be filed for a libel on the officers of Greenwich Hospital had been recently obtained, Erskine, in ignorance that the captain was present, expressed himself freely on the doomed pamphlet, which was then the general subject of conversation. He spoke with so much warmth and indignation against the tyranny and abuses imputed to Lord Sandwich, first lord of the Admiralty, and the officers of the hospital, that the captain, enquiring who he was, determined to employ him as his advocate. Erskine had not then taken his seat in court, and his first retainer and first brief was as counsel for the defence of Captain Baillie. But still, as he was the last of five barristers retained on that side, he could not expect to have any opportunity of distinguishing himself; but again fortune favoured him. His four seniors expended so much time in their arguments, and Mr. Hargrave was obliged by illness so often to interrupt his address, that at the close of it Lord Mansfield adjourned the court. Erskine therefore had to commence the proceedings on the next morning, and in a speech as powerful and effective as was ever heard in court he exposed and stigmatised the practices of Lord Sandwich and the officers of the hospital, with so much eloquent invective that the rule was dismissed, and Erskine was triumphant. The effect of this brilliant oration was so great that retainers flowed in upon him from all quarters, and from that time forward there was scarcely a cause or a trial of importance in which he was not engaged. This first appearance occurred on November 28, 1778, and as a consequence of his success he was employed in the following January to defend Lord Keppel, on the charges brought against him by Sir Hugh Palliser. The trial lasted thirteen days, and, though from the restricted privileges of a counsel at a court-martial he was not allowed to examine witnesses nor to make a speech in defence, he suggested the questions to be put, and composed the address which Lord Keppel was to deliver. To the excellence of that address his noble client attributed his triumphant and unanimous acquittal, testifying his gratitude by the noble present of 1000*l*.

Though acquiring in less than a year the lead over many an elderly aspirant, his success was productive of no jealousy or illwill. His manners were so pleasing and his bearing so unpretending that he soon became a universal favourite, and his competitors willingly submitted to the superiority of his genius. His business became so extensive that he found it necessary to refuse to hold junior briefs, and he accordingly received a patent of precedence in May 1783, before he had been five years at the bar.

The coalition ministry, of which his whig friends formed a part, had in the previous March come into power, and, being naturally desirous of the assistance of one so much famed for his eloquence, procured his election for Portsmouth in the following November. He made his first speech on the introduction of Mr. Fox's India bill, and continued to support it in its progress through the house. When the rejection of that bill by the Lords caused the dismissal of his friends from the government, he took a prominent part in the vexatious attempts in the remainder of the session to oust Mr. Pitt, the new minister. The natural consequence was that, with the dissolution of that parliament in March 1784, Erskine was made one of 'Fox's Martyrs,' and his senatorial life suffered an interruption of more than six years. In truth, he had somewhat disappointed public expectation. His eloquence was less suited to the senate than to the forum: and, though he made some effective addresses, he was considered to have been cowed by the superior powers of Mr. Pitt, against whom he was indiscreetly put in collision.

During this interval he devoted himself to his profession, in the pursuit of which he increased his fame and fortune. Besides his command of business in Westminster Hall and on the Home Circuit, he was called by special retainer to prosecute or defend very many important causes in other parts of the kingdom. Among those of a more public nature was his defence of Dr. Shipley, the dean of St. Asaph, for publishing a tract by Sir William Jones, when, in a contest with his former master, Mr. Justice Buller, he boldly insisted on the verdict of the jury being taken in the very words they used, and afterwards, in a speech which Charles Fox declared to be the finest piece of reasoning in the English language, contended for the power and right of the jury to determine whether the publication complained of was or was not a libel. Though the judgment was afterwards arrested, the judges decided against him on this question; but his argument was the death-blow to their doctrine, and led to the enactment of Mr. Fox's libel bill in 1792, which fully established the right of juries to give a general verdict on the whole matter in issue. At this time Mr. Erskine had regained his seat in parl-ment for his old borough, and had the satisfaction of seconding Mr. Fox's motion on bringing in the bill. At this time also he was attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, who on the formation of his establishment had nominated him to that office. Another triumph in libel cases was in his inimitable defence of Stockdale, prosecuted for publishing Logan's pamphlet against the managers on Hastings' trial, when his forcible argument for free discussion, and his impressive introduction of the celebrated illustration of the Indian chief, produced so enthusiastic an effect on the auditory, and induced the jury, even before the libel bill was passed, to acquit the defendant.

When the French Revolution electrified the world, a schism arose among the whigs, many of whom, led by Burke, supported government in its efforts to counteract the spread of revolutionary principles in this country. The Prince of Wales took the alarm with this section, but Erskine, though his royal highness's attorney-general, and designed for the same office to the crown had the regency been established, had the spirit and independence to join the other section, led by Fox, to whom throughout his life he zealously adhered. Happening then to be retained for the defendant in the prosecution of Paine's 'Rights of Man,' attempts were made to induce him to refuse the brief; and on his firm refusal to do so, upon the principle that he was bound by professional etiquette to defend any man for whom he was retained, he received a message from the prince, unwillingly requesting him to resign his office, which he accordingly did in February 1793.

This episode of unpopularity was of short duration. In the next year he rose to the highest pitch of public admiration by the noble stand he made against the doctrine of constructive treason in his defence of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall, severally indicted for high treason as members of societies professing parliamentary reform, but charged with conspiring to subvert the existing laws and constitution, and thus compassing the king's death. The trial of Hardy lasted eight days, that of Horne Tooke six days, and that of Thelwall four days, in all eighteen days, and each resulted in an acquittal, produced principally by the wondrous exertions, the powerful reasoning, the eloquence, and the tact of their advocate. This triumph was hailed by the general public as the preservation of the constitution from the perils that would have environed it if the subjects were liable to such proceedings. No further attempt has been since made to impute treason by construction or inference. The applause which Erskine received could scarcely be exceeded; honours flowed in to him from all quarters in the freedom of corporations, and the sale of his portrait and bust was excessive.

For the next twelve years he preserved his undisputed ascendancy in the courts, and was engaged for the plaintiffs or defendants in almost every cause. In state trials the defence was generally entrusted to him as the advocate of liberty of speech, and resulted most frequently in verdicts of acquittal. In parliament he was always found on the liberal side, supporting Mr. Fox, and joining him in his temporary secession from the house. He published a pamphlet entitled 'A View of the Causes and Consequences of the present War with France,' of which no less than thirty-seven editions were called for. In it he made a violent attack on Mr. Pitt, against whom he had a strong animosity, arising, perhaps, from his consciousness of failure in competition with the minister in the senate. On Pitt's resignation in 1801, Mr. Addington offered Erskine the attorney-generalship, which from a doubt of the prince's approval he declined. He however supported that administration till it was superseded in 1804 by the return of Mr. Pitt, but he seldom addressed the house. In the following year the prince revived the office of chancellor to the duchy of Cornwall, and gave it to Mr. Erskine; and on the renewal of the war he for a time resumed his old profession by becoming colonel of the Law Association, a corps of volunteers which was familiarly called 'The Devil's Own.' It is curious that it should have fallen to his lot soon after to contend for the right of volunteers to resign, when the government wished to deprive them of that power; but, as usual, he was triumphant, the judges unanimously deciding that the service was entirely voluntary.

On Mr. Pitt's death in 1806 the whigs, after an exile from court of more than twenty years, were allowed a temporary taste of the sweets of office, and Erskine was certain to be a partaker. He would have preferred to preside over a common law court, conversant as he was with its rules and practice; but the existing chiefs, Lord Ellenborough and Sir James Mansfield, wisely resisting the temptation of the Great Seal, its possession was given to him on February 7, 1806, as lord high chancellor of Great Britain, and he was at the same time raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Erskine of Restormel Castle in Cornwall, a designation with which the Prince of Wales complimented him, as it had been the ancient residence of the Dukes of Cornwall. With whatever feelings of pride he went in state from his house in Lincoln's Inn Fields to take the oaths, or may have welcomed these rewards for his long public services in the cause of liberty, far greater must have been his gratification at the recognition of his private worth and personal character in the unprecedented address of congratulation which was unanimously voted to him by the whole bar of England. That body might well regret his retirement from its ranks, for never had they, and never could they expect to have, a leader whose hilarity of spirits, whose lively wit, and whose uniform kindness, added to such extraordinary powers, could secure at once their affection and respect.

Though little acquainted with the rules of equity or the practice of his new court, he had the wisdom to avail himself of the advice of more experienced men; and by his natural quickness of perception, his discretion and caution, he passed through his fourteen months of trial in so satisfactory a manner that only one of his decrees was appealed against, and that one, arising out of Mr. Thellusson's extraordinary will, was affirmed. In the trial of Lord Melville, Lord Erskine presided as chancellor, and acted with that dignity, firmness, and impartiality that excited universal admiration. As a peer of parliament he of course supported the measures introduced by his party, and had the satisfaction to announce the royal assent to the bill for the abolition of slavery. In the summer the death of his friend Mr. Fox was a source of sincere lamentation to him, which was followed in the following spring by the dissolution of the ministry, occasioned by the refusal of George III. to sanction a bill allowing Roman Catholics to hold commissions in the army. Though himself adverse to the measure, he shared in the dismissal, and gave up the Great Seal on April 7, 1807.

In the fifteen years during which he survived his loss of office he very rarely took a prominent part in the politics of the day; but on some occasions he exhibited the same command of argument and oratorical power which had formerly distinguished him. When the king's permanent illness necessitated a regency in 1810, Lord Erskine opposed the restrictions on his patron the Prince of Wales, who, in 1815, though he had deserted his old whig connections, complimented his former chancellor with the green ribbon of the order of the Thistle.

Lord Erskine now amused himself as a man of the world, mixing in all gay societies, and being acceptable to all by his liveliness and wit. His bon-mots and his vers de société at this time and while at the bar would fill a good-sized volume, and Mr. Townsend in his agreeable memoir has made a happy selection of them. He again ventured his fame by becoming an author on a more extended scale, and published a romance called 'Armata,' being a clever allegory, in the manner of Sir Thomas More's 'Utopia' and Dean Swift's 'Voyage to Laputa,' on the politics of England and the customs and manners of London life. It had a temporary popularity and passed through several editions, but from the want of interest in the story it is now almost forgotten.

When the popular tumults and discontent in 1817 led to the introduction of restrictive measures, Lord Erskine appeared again in the political world, and contended against them with all his ancient vigour. He stood boldly and prominently forward also in 1820 in defence of Queen Caroline, although by so doing he opposed his old patron and friend. But, deeming the queen an innocent and injured woman, he cast every personal consideration aside, and throughout the investigation battled on her part, and when the Bill of Pains and Penalties was withdrawn, he sounded its knell in the last speech he made in parliament. By this independent conduct his favour with the people, by whom he was almost forgotten, was revived, and was exhibited in every shape. His likeness was a treasure universally sought, addresses and municipal freedoms were showered upon him, and public dinners were given to do him honour. One, on which he most prided himself, was that at Edinburgh, which he had not visited since his departure from it as a midshipman in 1764, a period of fifty-seven years. In 1822 he published a 'Letter to Lord Liverpool' in support of the cause of the Greeks, proving that his love of freedom was unabated; and another pamphlet on agricultural distress, his advocacy of increased protection in which is strongly opposed to the principle of free trade that now prevails. His career was now drawing to its close. In the autumn of 1823, as he was proceeding by sea to pay a visit to his brother the Earl of Buchan at Dryburgh Abbey, he was suddenly attacked with inflammation in the chest. On landing he went direct to Ammondell, near Edinburgh, where the widow of his deceased brother Henry resided, and where the Earl of Buchan joined him. There he breathed his last on November 17, 1823, and his remains lie in the family burying-place at Uphall in the county of Linlithgow.

In the eloquent words of Lord Brougham: 'if there be yet among us the power of freely discussing the acts of our rulers, if there be yet the privilege of meeting for the promotion of needful reforms: if he who desires wholesome changes in our constitution be still recognised as a patriot, and not doomed to die the death of a traitor, let us acknowledge with gratitude that to this great man, under heaven, we owe the felicity of the times.' The courtesy of his manners, the cheerfulness of his disposition, the geniality of his wit, his 'generous impulses and honourable feelings,' and the wonderful power of his eloquence, his almost as vividly among the few who now survive as they impressed those who at his death erected a statue to his memory in Lincoln's Inn Hall. Against merits such as these the only failing that is suggested is a charge of egotism and vanity, with too great a tendency to introduce himself and the incidents of his life upon all occasions. Let those who laugh at him on that account ask themselves whether, if they had founded their fortunes in the same surprising manner, they could have altogether abstained from self-glorification.

Of the incidents of his private life there are few records. If they were mixed with some frailties, we may ask, What mortal is exempt from them? Whatever they were, they may be designated by the words of that rigorous moralist, Lord Kenyon, 'blots in the sun.' The great fortune which he must have acquired by his forensic success he lost by unfortunate speculations in Transatlantic funds, and by the purchase of an estate in Sussex, which produced nothing but brooms; so that at last he was obliged to part with his beautiful seat at Hampstead, and live upon the retiring allowance of chancellor.

He lost his first wife, after a union of thirty-five years, in December 1805, just before his attaining the peerage. His second wife was Miss Mary Buck. By both he left issue. Thomas, one of his sons by the first wife, having acquired judicial honours, is next to be noticed. (Lives by Roscoe, Townsend, and Lord Campbell; Lord Brougham's Historical Sketches; &c. &c.)

ERSKINE, THOMAS, the fourth son of the above celebrated advocate by his first wife, Frances, the daughter of Daniel Moore, Esq., was born on March 12, 1788, at No. 10 Serjeants' Inn, Fleet Street, then the abode of his father. He was educated at Harrow under Dr. Drury and Dr. Butler his successor. His career at school was interrupted by his father's elevation to the office of lord chancellor, whose inauguration he was summoned to attend, and who gave him the secretaryship of presentations, the duties of which did not require any great experience. At the same time he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1811 as a peer's son graduated as M.A., without residence or examination. In 1807 he became a member of Lincoln's Inn, commencing his study of the law as a pupil of the eminent special pleader Joseph Chitty, Esq., and acquired such a mastery of the science that in 1810 he began practice in the same branch on his own account. After a successful pursuit of it for three years, Mr. Erskine was called to the bar in 1813. He at first joined the Home Circuit, and afterwards availed himself of the privilege of changing it once, by attaching himself to the Western Circuit.

Taking no active part in political controversy, and more intent on the steady performance of his duties than in the pursuit of public distinction, he progressed slowly but surely, till he acquired such a position as to entitle him to claim the honour of a silk gown. He was appointed a king's counsel in 1827, and speedily acquired a place, if not among the first leaders of the common law bar, yet one of considerable distinction on his own circuit. His speeches as a leading advocate were not so much characterised by fluency or copiousness of language, or by strong appeals to the feelings, as by great clearness of statement, and, according to the subject of the case, placing it on a high moral ground, or treating it with dry humour and epigrammatic force. He possessed a power which in those days, when verdicts were more often won or lost on technical grounds than now, was of infinite importance,—he saw perfectly the points of attack and defence; and no one was more acute in detecting a latent non-suit in his opponent's pleadings. When Serjeant Wilde found on consultation that there was a weak point in his case, he would commonly ask, 'Whom have we against us?' and if the answer was 'Mr. Erskine,' would shake his head and say, 'Then we may be pretty sure this blot will be hit.'

When the new Court of Bankruptcy, established by stat. 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 56, received the royal assent on October 20, 1831, Mr. Erskine was selected as the chief of the four judges who were thereby appointed as a Court of Review. Though the junior of his three colleagues, he soon by the unfeigned simplicity of his manner and attractive cordiality overcame any jealousy that might have existed among them; and by the clearness of his intellect, the soundness of his judgment, his great industry, impartiality, and care, amply justified the appointment. He presided over this court for eight years, assisting also in hearing appeals before the judicial committee of the privy council, and in the early period of its existence aiding greatly in shaping its proceedings into that course which has gradually raised it to so pre-eminent a rank among the judicial tribunals of the country. So effective were his services considered that he was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas on January 9, 1839; and for nearly four years he held both offices together, not resigning his chief justiceship of the Court of Review in Bankruptcy till November 1842.

He accompanied Mr. Justice Coleridge on the Northern Circuit in the spring of 1840, when the delinquents among the Chartists were to be tried; and it is to the credit of these two judges that the manner in which they disposed of these political trials contributed not a little to the settlement of disturbed minds, and to disabuse ill-informed persons of the prejudices they had entertained against the tribunals of the country. The effect was that the judges were not merely the objects of general admiration, but that their conduct was most highly applauded by those papers (especially the 'Northern Star,' of which Feargus O'Connor was the editor) which were supposed to guide and to express the feelings of the lower orders.

Mr. Justice Erskine's judicial career was short. Amid the performance of his duties he was seized with a sudden chill, which produced a severe attack of influenza and congestion of the lungs, which resulted in the rupture of a blood-vessel and tubercular disease in the lungs, producing such a state of bodily incapacity as to render him totally unfit to discharge the functions of his office, requiring as they did the active employment of the voice. Under this compulsion he reluctantly retired from the bench in November 1844, and many were the testimonials he received from his distinguished contemporaries of the value of those services they were about to lose.

The retired judge was long in a dangerous state, and it was nearly ten years before the bleeding from the lungs entirely ceased; and the continuance of his life for twenty years after his first seizure was little less than a miracle. He died at Bournemouth, on November 9, 1864. By his wife Henrietta Eliza, daughter of Henry Trail, of Dairisie in Fifeshire, he had a large family, of whom only four were living at his death.

ESCURIS, MATTHEW DE, was one of the five justices errant appointed by Richard de Luci to impose the assize in the county of Hants in 20 Henry II., 1174. (Madax, i. 125.) He is not otherwise noticed.

ESPEC, WALTER, was a powerful baron in the north, his principal estate being Helmsley, or Hamlake, in Yorkshire, and having also large possessions in Northumberland and several other counties. The loss of his only son Walter, by a fall from his horse, is said to have induced him to devote a great part of his estate to the service of God. He and his wife Adelina founded a priory of Augustin canons at Kirkham in Yorkshire, to the honour of the Holy Trinity, in 1121, endowing it with seven churches, and other lands to the amount of 1100 marks per annum. He also founded the abbey of Rievaulx in the same county, for Cistercian monks, in 1131, dedicating it to the Virgin Mary; and the abbey of Warden in Bedfordshire, in 1135, for the same order, with endowments of like munificence.

He was justice of the forest for Yorkshire in the reign of Henry I.: and he and Eustace Fitz-John, another northern baron, were justices itinerant in that county, and also in Northumberland, Cumberland, and the bishopric of Durham. The precise period of their appointment is uncertain, but they both fined to be relieved from being judges of Yorkshire in 31 Henry I. (Mag. Rot.) They had certainly acted as justices in the two preceding years, during which they were excused, as the judges then usually were, from the payment of Danegeld and other impositions.

In the early part of the reign of King Stephen, Walter Espec appears in the character of an experienced warrior, heading his countrymen against the ferocious invasions of the Scots. Animated by despair, under the barbarities which they witnessed, the northern barons summoned their neighbours and dependants, who put themselves under the command of Walter Espec and William of Albemarle, and marched to Northallerton. There they placed a silver pix containing the consecrated host on the top of a tall mast, with the banners of their patron saints, to serve as a rallying point: and from this sacred ensign the battle which followed, and which was fought on August 22, 1138, received the name of the Battle of the Standard. From the foot of this standard Walter Espec harangued his associates, and then, by giving his hand to William of Albemarle, and exclaiming with a loud voice, 'I pledge thee my troth either to conquer or to die,' he kindled such enthusiasm among his hearers that the oath was repeated by every chieftain around him. The result of the battle was the entire overthrow of the invaders, with the loss of 12,000 men.

He died in 1153, and was buried in his own monastery of Rievaulx. To his piety and bravery may be added that he was equally distinguished for wit, modesty, sincerity, and loyalty, and (not to omit what was a great recommendation in those days) was of high and commanding stature.

Leaving no issue by his wife Adelina, his property descended on his three sisters, from one of whom, Adeline, the wife of Peter de Roos, the Duke of Rutland and Lord de Roos are descended.

ESSEBY, JORDAN DE (Ashby), was the grandson of another Jordan, and had considerable possessions in the county of Lincoln. Others were subsequently conferred upon him by King John for his adherence to the royal cause. (Rot. Claus. i. 224, 290.) In 7 Henry III. he was appointed by the Archbishop of York to appear for him before the barons of the Exchequer relative to the debt due by his predecessor to the crown (Ibid. 335), from which may be inferred that he was an advocate of the court. He was selected as one of the justices itinerant for Lincolnshire in

Henry III., 1225, being at that time constable of Lincoln Castle. (Ibid. ii. 68, 77.)

ESSEBY, ROBERT DE, sometimes called Esseburne, appears in the acknowledgment of a fine in 27 Henry III., 1243. In 1221 a Robert de Esseby was appointed with William Basset to deliver the gaol at Roell in Leicestershire (Nichols, 579), and Robert and Thomas de Esseburn, in 10 Henry III., were attorned by William de Ferariis in a suit he had against Walter de Widevill. (Rot. Claus. ii. 153.) His property was situate in the counties of Leicester, Northampton, and Nottingham. (Ibid. i. 253, 258, ii. 25; Abb. Placit. 99.)

ESSEX, HENRY DE, whose grandfather, Swene, at the time of the general survey was lord of Rachley in Essex, and of no less than fifty-four other lordships in that county, besides others in Suffolk and Huntingdonshire, was the inheritor of this property after the death of Robert his father.

He was in great favour with Henry II., and held the high office of constable. His pleas as a justice itinerant in many counties are recorded on the rolls of that king from 1156 to 1158. (Pipe Rolls, 31, 78, &c.)

He was likewise sheriff or fermor of the counties of Bedford and Buckingham.

His prosperity, however, was not of long continuance. In the war which King Henry waged with the Welsh in 1157, his army, falling into an ambush at Coleshull in Flintshire, was thrown into confusion, and the king himself placed in great danger. Henry de Essex, who bore the king's standard, instead of hastening to his assistance, was seized with a sudden panic, and, exclaiming that the king was dead, threw away his banner and fled from the field. The king with much difficulty rallied the troops, and, though his army suffered severely, overlooked the dereliction of his officer, making allowance probably for the terror of the moment, and remembering his former services. The subsequent conduct and bravery of Henry de Essex in the war of Toulouse, in 1159, justified his sovereign's leniency, and tended to wipe out the stain from Essex's character. The disgrace would probably have been entirely forgotten but for a quarrel which he had six years afterwards with Robert de Montfort, who, publicly charging him with the fact, and offering to prove it in mortal combat, the king had no choice but to consent to the trial. The duel accordingly took place on April 18, 1163, at an island near Reading, and terminated in the defeat of Essex. The 'Chronicle of Bracelonda' (50, 136) says that, being believed to be dead, the king, on the petition of his relations, permitted his body to be taken to the neighbouring abbey for interment, and that there he recovered, and took the habit of the order. This account is stated to have been narrated by himself to the abbot of St. Edmunds, on his visit to the abbey of Reading about the year 1196; so that he had then been thirty-three years in the cloister, where, Fuller quaintly observes, 'between shame and sanctity he blushed out the remainder of his life.'

By his defeat the whole of his large possessions were confiscated, and several records show that they remained in the king's hands for many years afterwards.

Before his disgrace he gave the church of Walde to the nuns of Clerkenwell, and his lordship of Little Frincham to the Knights Templars. Dugdale states that he had two sons, Henry and Hugh, and that his widow, Alice, a sister of Alberic de Vere, afterwards married Roger Fitz-Richard, lord of Warkworth in Northumberland, and of Clavering in Essex. (Baronage, i. 463; Brady, 302; Lord Lyttelton, ii. 73, 76, 224; Leland, iii. 410.)

ESSEX, EARLS OF. See G. DE MANDEVIL; G. FITZ-PETER; H. BOURCHIER; T. CROMWELL.

EUSTACE (BISHOP OF ELY), of whose parentage and early life no memorial remains, was not improbably one of the clerks in Chancery. The appointment to accompany the king into Normandy, for the purpose of conducting such business of the Great Seal as might be required while he was abroad, would be the natural result of his official position; and the deanery of Salisbury, which he held in 1195, with the addition of the archdeaconry of Richmond, which was conferred upon him in the following year (Le Neve, 262, 324), would probably be the recompense to which he would be entitled from his standing in the court.

Hoveden calls him 'sigillifer' and 'vice-chancellor;' but in the charters which he authenticated, the first of which is dated April 7, 1195, 6 Richard I. (New Fœdera, i. 65), he simply uses the terms 'tunc gerentis,' or 'tunc agentis vices cancellarii.' He was raised to the bishopric of Ely on August 9, 1197, but was not consecrated till the 8th of March following. There is no positive evidence of the actual time when he received the Great Seal as chancellor, but he probably was appointed to office before his consecration as bishop.

Succeeding Longchamp thus both in his ecclesiastical and his civil honours, Eustace's name as chancellor appears in a charter dated August 22, 1193, 'apud Rupem Auree Vall.' (Rymer, i. 67), and he was officially present when a fine was levied at Westminster in the following year. (Hunter's Preface.) King Richard's death occurred on April 6, 1199, when Eustace's duties ceased, King John selecting his successor from among his own adherents.

That John, however, appreciated his abilities and judgment is proved by his being sent in 1202 with Hubert de Burgh to the court of France, to demand from King Philip a safe-conduct on his sovereign's appearance there to answer the charge made against him of having murdered his nephew, Prince Arthur. The ambassadors were told that their king might come in peace, but that his return would depend on the result of the trial, a decision which John was not so foolhardy as to risk.

In the subsequent troubles of that reign he was called upon to take a prominent and courageous part. Appointed in 1207, in conjunction with the Bishops of London and Worcester, to convey the papal remonstrance, they appeared before the king, and demanded of him the restoration of Stephen, the ejected Archbishop of Canterbury. The hardened monarch's angry and contemptuous refusal was followed by the bishops pronouncing the solemn interdict, which deprived the kingdom for so many years of the rites of religion. Warned by the king's threats, the bishops retired secretly from the kingdom, and in the following year, by the pope's directions, fulminated the sentence of excommunication against the royal person. They remained in voluntary exile till the year 1212, when, the king having found it necessary to obtain absolution from the pontiff, they ventured to return; and in the charter of submission afterwards executed a pecuniary compensation was made to them for their losses.

During the short remainder of his life Eustace was reconciled to his sovereign, and was one of his sureties to the barons for the redress of their grievances. He did not live to witness the grant of Magna Charta, but died at Reading on February 3, 1214, and was buried in his own cathedral.

He is described as well skilled in both sacred and profane learning, and as a pious and discreet prelate. To his church he was a considerable benefactor, and built the Galilee at the west end of it from its foundation. (Godwin, 254; Angl. Sac. i. 633; Mador, i. 29, 77; Rapin, ii. 429.)

EVERDON, SILVESTER DE (BISHOP OF CARLISLE), as one of the king's chaplains, appears as a witness to charters granted in 7 and 9 John. He had about that time presentations to the churches of Bulewell, Fremesfeld, and Tatham in succession. In all these he is called by his Christian name alone, and may possibly, therefore, not be the person who afterwards became bishop. In 8 Henry III., 1224, however, Silvester de Everdon is expressly mentioned as a demandant of a virgate of lands, which he claimed as belonging to his church of Everdon in Northamptonshire, and it was probably on acquiring this preferment that he assumed the name. In the following year he was evidently engaged in the king's service in the same way as the clerks of the Exchequer or Treasury frequently were, and is called 'clericus noster.' (Rot. Claus. i. 631, ii. 53, 63.)

It was no doubt in this character that he had the custody of the Great Seal when the king, on May 5, 1242, confided to the Archbishop of York the government of the kingdom during his absence in Gascony. Soon after the Bishop of Chichester's death (Sir T. Hardy says on November 14, 1244) he was appointed either chancellor or keeper, and is stated to have been one most cunning in the custom of the Chancery. In August 1246 he received the bishopric of Carlisle, and in November was succeeded in the Chancery by John Mansel. In 1251 and 1252 he acted as a justice itinerant in the counties of York, Nottingham, Derby, Warwick, and Leicester.

When the bishops and nobles in 1253 went to the king with the conditions upon which they granted the aid he demanded, and the former were sharply reminded that their elevation was effected by the very causes of which they complained, Matthew Paris relates that to Silvester de Everdon he addressed himself thus: 'And thou, Silvester of Carlisle, who, so long licking the Chancery, wast the little clerk of my clerks, it is well known to all how I advanced thee to be a bishop, before many reverend persons and able divines.'

He was killed by a fall from his horse on May 13, 1254.

EVERDON, JOHN DE, was an officer of the Exchequer, and, like his fellows, was of the clerical profession. He was appointed in 30 Edward I. to superintend the levying of the fifteenth in the counties of Oxford and Berks. In 1 Edward II. he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on November 28, 1307. While he held a seat on that bench he frequently acted as an assessor of the taxes charged on the city of London, and as a justice of over and terminer in various counties for the trial of offences connected with the revenue and its collection. He continued in his place till 1322 or 1323. In 4 Edward II. he was dean of the free chapel of St. Peter at Wolverhampton, and was certified as lord of that township in the ninth year. He held the chancellorship of Exeter from May 1308 till August 1309, and was afterwards a prebendary of Sarum, which he exchanged for the deanery of St. Paul's, London, which he was admitted on September 11, 1323. He died on January 15, 1330, and was buried in the church of St. Faith, under St. Paul's. (Le Neve, 89, 183.)

EVERDON, WILLIAM DE, probably the brother or nephew of the above John de Everdon, in 5 Edward II., October 11, 1311, was appointed treasurer's remembrancer in the Exchequer, and had a fee of forty marks per annum for himself and his clerks; and in 10 Edward II. he had an additional grant of 20*l.* a year, de dono, for his good service, until the king should provide him with an ecclesiastical benefice euitable to his degree. From that time there is no entry relative to him till July 18, 1324, 17 Edward II., when he was raised to the bench as a baron, in which office he continued till the end of the reign, and was retained in it on the accession of Edward III. The date of his death is not recorded, but he was employed in 11 Edward III. to assist in levying money from the clergy of York for carrying on the French war, and is named as receiving a pension, or bribe, from the Knights Hospitallers so late as 1338. (Madox, ii. 267; New Fodera, ii. 1005; Hospitallers in England, 203.)

EVESHAM, THOMAS DE, held some place in one of the departments of the court as early as 1313, 6 Edward II., when he accompanied the king abroad. In 1319 he was appointed one of the attorneys for Rigand de Asserio, the pope's nuncio (N. Fodera, ii. 212, 399), and appeared as proxy for the abbot of Evesham in the parliaments of 16 and 18 Edward II. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 828.)

He is first mentioned as a clerk in the Chancery in July 1328, 2 Edward III., and on the appointment of Sir Robert Bouchier as chancellor the Great Seal was placed in his hands under the seals of two of the other clerks, and so remained from December 16, 1340, to the 1st of January following. On the 10th of that month he was raised to the office of master of the Rolls, but it would seem that this was a mere temporary appointment, for he was superseded by John de Thoresby on February 21, after only six weeks' enjoyment of the place. He immediately resumed his duties as a clerk in the Chancery (N. Fodera, ii. 745, 1172), which he continued to perform during the remainder of his life. He died in 1343, possessed of land at Weston Underegge in Gloucestershire. His London residence was in 'Faytour Lane.' (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 108.)

EVESH, HENRY LE, had property in Cambridgeshire, which was all seized into the king's hands during the troubles of King John. On the accession of his successor they were restored to him, and in 9 Henry III. he was one of the justices itinerant in that county and Huntingdonshire. (Rot. Claus. i. 324, ii. 76, 148.)

EWENS, MATTHEW, was reader in the Middle Temple in autumn 1501, and took the degree of serjeant in Hilary 1504, when he was raised to the bench of the Exchequer, and his judgments in that and the following years are reported by Savile and Coke. His death or resignation soon after occurred, as his successor, John Savile, was appointed in July 1598. (Dugdale's Orig. 218.)

EXETER, DUKE OF. See T. BEAUFORT.
EYNEFELD, HENRY DE, was appointed, in 21 Edward I., 1293, one of two justices to take assizes, &c., in Cornwall and nine other counties, and was summoned among the judges to parliament till the twenty-fifth. One of his name was returned knight of the shire for Middlesex in 26 and 28 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 29, 52, 72-86.)

EYRE, GILES, was of an ancient and distinguished Wiltshire family, which supplied no less than three, and perhaps four, members to the judicial bench. Their common ancestor was Humphrey le Heyr, who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion to the Holy Land. One of his lineal descendants, Giles Eyre, settled at Brickworth in Whiteparish, and had several children, one of the younger of whom emigrated with Ludlow to Ireland, and was the ancestor of Lord Eyre, of Eyre Court in the county of Galway, a title which died with the grantee in 1792. The eldest son, named also Giles, succeeded to Brickworth, and represented Downton in the parliament of 1660 and 1661. By his marriage with Anne, daughter of Sir Richard Norton, of Rotherfield, Hants, Bart., he became the father of Sir Giles Eyre, the judge, who was admitted a member of Lincoln's Inn in October 1654, and called to the bar in November 1661.

Of his early life we have no further account except that he lost his first wife, Dorothy, daughter of John Ryves, of Ransston in Dorsetshire, in 1677. To her monument in Whiteparish Church he attached an inscription in anticipation of his own death, leaving the date in blank, with eight lines expressing the warmest affection for her, and implying the impossibility of his ever being united to another. Notwithstanding this monogamistic resolution, we find that he afterwards married a second wife, who occupied the same grave with her predecessor.

In 1675 the corporation of Salisbury presented him with a tankard of 10*l.* value for his services in procuring their charter, being then their deputy recorder. He was afterwards elected recorder, but lost his place on the subsequent seizure of the charters. On the renewal of them in 1688 he was restored, and was elected representative of that city to the Convention Parliament. He took part in the conference with the Lords as to the vote of abdication, and in all the debates showed himself a hearty supporter of the new government.

He was immediately made a serjeant, and on the settlement of the Court of King's Bench was constituted one of the judges of it on May 4, 1689, receiving soon after the honour of knighthood. After filling this seat with great credit for six years, he died on June 2, 1695, and was buried in White-parish Church.

The Christian name of his second wife was Christabella; that of her family has not been discovered. She survived the judge, and took for her second husband Lord Glasford, a Scotch Papist, from whom she withdrew in 1699, leaving him a prisoner for debt in the Fleet, where he died in November 1703. The judge left issue by both his wives. Some of the male representatives of his family have had seats in parliament, and one of his female descendants married Thomas Bolton, the nephew of Admiral Lord Nelson, who succeeded to that earldom in 1835. (Parl. Hist. v. 107, &c.; Luttrell, i. 529, iv. 549.)

EYRE, SAMUEL, was the second cousin of the above Sir Giles Eyre, both having the same great-grandfather. He was the son of Robert Eyre, of Salisbury and Chilhampton, and Anne, daughter of Samuel Aldersey, of Aldersey in Cheshire, and was born in 1633. As his father had done before him, he took the degree of barrister at Lincoln's Inn in June 1661. He pursued his profession with considerable success, to which the patronage of the Earl of Shaftesbury, to whom he was reputed to be the confidential adviser, in some measure probably contributed, though the same cause in all likelihood prevented his promotion in Charles's and in James's reigns. After the revolution he was created a serjeant on April 21, 1692; and from that rank was advanced, on February 22, 1694, to take his place, by the side of his cousin Sir Giles, as a judge of the King's Bench.

Shortly after his appointment, Charles Knollys, claiming to be Earl of Banbury, who had been indicted for the murder of Captain Lawson, his brother-in-law, and had pleaded his peerage, brought the question into the Court of King's Bench, where judgment was given in the defendant's favour in Trinity Term 1694. On the discussion of the claim of peerage nearly four years afterwards, Chief Justice Holt and Sir Samuel Eyre were called before the House of Lords and required to give their reasons for that judgment. They resolutely and properly declined to do so, unless it came before the house on a writ of error, and their lordships, after threatening the two judges with the Tower for their refusal to answer, found it expedient to let the matter drop. Seven months after this incident Sir Samuel was seized with the colic, just upon finishing the circuit at Lancaster, where he died on September 12, 1698.

His body was removed to the family vault in St. Thomas's Church, Salisbury, a costly monument to his memory being erected at Lancaster.

His wife, Martha, daughter of Francis, fifth son of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote in Warwickshire, brought him a large family, the eldest of whom was Chief Justice Sir Robert Eyre. (Luttrell, ii. 427, iii. 273, iv. 343, 428, 436; 1 Lord Raymond, 10; State Trials, xii. 1179.)

EYRE, ROBERT, the son and heir of the above Sir Samuel Eyre, was born in 1666, and, having entered upon his legal studies at Lincoln's Inn in April 1683, was admitted to the bar in February 1689.

Before his father's death in 1698 he had succeeded his cousin Sir Giles in the recordership of Salisbury, and he represented that city in the last three parliaments of William III. and the first four of Queen Anne, from 1698 to 1710. He was sworn queen's counsel in May 1707, and in October of the following year he was made solicitor-general. In March 1710 he was one of the active managers of the unwise impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell, and was afterwards engaged in the trials of the parties connected with the Sacheverell riots. (Luttrell, vi. 166, 202, 203; State Trials, xv. 396, 522, &c.)

The whig ministry by which he was appointed fell a sacrifice to this prosecution, but fortunately for him, before their dismissal, the death of Mr. Justice Gould occasioned a vacancy in the Court of Queen's Bench, which he was appointed to supply. He was sworn in on March 13 and knighted, and sat in that court during the remainder of Queen Anne's reign. On the arrival of George I. he was appointed chancellor to the Prince of Wales. As in duty bound, on the great question agitated before the judges in 1718 as to the king's prerogative in regard to the education and marriage of the royal family, Sir Robert gave an opinion differing from the majority of his brethren in favour of the prince his client. Satisfactory was his performance of his judicial functions, and so high his legal reputation, that, notwithstanding this opposition to the royal claim, the king on November 16, 1723, promoted him to the head of the Court of Exchequer as lord chief baron, and eighteen months after, on May 27, 1725, raised him to the still higher dignity of lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. (Lord Raymond, 1309, 1331; State Trials, xv. 1217.) He maintained the reputation he had earned for the ten years that he continued to preside in that court his whole career on the three benches extending over one-and-twenty years.

Sir Robert, however, did not escape calumny. Some infamous and profane persons brought a charge against him in visiting Bambridge, the brutal and corrupt keeper of the Fleet, when in prison, and of otherwise aiding and abetting him in his atrocities. On a strict investigation, however, the committee came to a resolution that it was a wicked conspiracy to vilify and asperse the chief justice, and that the informations against him were 'false, malicious, scandalous, and utterly groundless.' (Parl. Hist. viii. 707, &c.; State Trials, xvii. 619.)

That Sir Robert was somewhat haughty in his demeanour may be inferred from the Duke of Wharton's satire. He vows constancy to his mistress until the time

When Tracy's generous soul shall swell with pride,
And Eyre his haughtiness shall lay aside.

As a set-off against this, there is evidence of the general estimation of his character in the intimacy which existed between him and Godolphin, Marlborough, and Walpole; and of his kind and generous disposition a testimony is afforded by a legacy of 400*l.* bequeathed to his daughter by an old domestic, in grateful acknowledgment that he owed all his good fortune in life to his deceased master. The chief justice died on December 28, 1735, and was buried in St. Thomas's Church, Salisbury. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Rudge, Esq., of Warley Place, Essex, he left a large family. (Sir R. C. Hoare's South Wiltshire; Frustfield: Salisbury.)

EYRE, JAMES, was a descendant of the old Wiltshire family to which the three judges already noticed belonged, but it is uncertain of what branch of it. His great-grandfather was of the medical profession, and died mayor of Salisbury in 1685. His brother, Dr. Thomas Eyre, was a canon in the cathedral of that city. The judge was born in 1733, and his father is described in the Lincoln's Inn books as Mr. Chancellor Eyre. Having received his classical education first at Winchester and then at Oxford, he commenced his legal studies at Lincoln's Inn in November 1753, but two years after removed to Gray's Inn, by which society he was called to the bar in 1755. He purchased the place of one of the four city pleaders of London, and was for some time little known beyond the Lord Mayor's and Sheriffs' Courts. In them, however, his attendance was so regular, his manners so good, and his appearance so grave, that in February 1761 he was appointed deputy recorder, and in April 1763 recorder of the corporation, being then scarcely thirty years of age.

In the December of that year he was engaged as second counsel for John Wilkes in the action against Mr. Wood for entering into the plaintiff's house, and seizing his papers under a general warrant from the secretary of state. Though he acted in this case with great energy and spirit, as thinking that it affected the liberty of the subject, yet, when a few years after, in 1770, the corporation, joining in the political distractions excited by the cry of 'Wilkes and Liberty,' and the call for a new parliament, voted a remonstrance to the king, the recorder would not attend on its presentation; but on another address in harsher terms being voted, he boldly protested against it as a most abominable libel, and again refused to accompany the corporation to the palace. This was the occasion when Lord Mayor Beckford is supposed to have replied to his majesty in the speech that appears at the foot of his statue in Guildhall, but the language of which is said to have been subsequently composed by Horne Tooke. The common council of course resented their recorder's resistance, and voted that he should no more be advised with or employed in the city affairs, he 'being deemed unworthy of their future trust and confidence.' But the court of St. James's looked upon his conduct in a different light, and took an early opportunity of rewarding his loyalty, by raising him to the bench of the Exchequer in October 1772, when he was knighted. On resigning the recordership he received the thanks of the Court of Aldermen for the many eminent services he rendered the public, and was presented with a piece of plate with the city arms engraved thereon, as a grateful remembrance from the court for his faithful discharge of his duties.

After sitting in the Exchequer as a puisne baron for nearly fifteen years, he was raised to the head of it on January 20, 1787; and when Lord Chancellor Thurlow was removed in 1793, he was appointed chief commissioner of the Great Seal, an office which he held for seven months from June 15 to January 28, in the following year. On retiring from the Seal he was promoted to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas, and at the end of the next year he was entrusted with the arduous duty of presiding at the memorable trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall for constructive high treason. These trials lasted eighteen days, and throughout them he acted with the greatest patience and impartiality, but in the opinion of many with too great forbearance to the irregularities of Horne Tooke. In his summing up of the evidence in the different cases he carefully described the principles of the law, and in the most fair and unexceptionable manner explained the bearings of the evidence upon the charges. The result was the acquittal of all the prisoners; and the same verdict was given in 1796 in another trial before him of Crossfield and others for high treason in conspiring to make an instrument from which to shoot a poisoned arrow at the king. (State Trials, iv., v., vi.)

With an extensive knowledge of law he united the greatest judicial qualities; and to the unbiased integrity of the judge was joined a quickness of apprehension and a natural sagacity and candour that secured to him the respect and esteem as well of his brethren on the bench as of the members of the bar, whom he never interrupted in their arguments, and towards whom he preserved an invariable and unaffected courtesy. He presided over the Common Pleas six years and a half, and died on July 6, 1799, at his residence, Ruscombe in Berkshire.

F

FAIRFAX, GUY, the third son of Richard Fairfax, of an ancient family seated at Walton in Yorkshire, by Anastasia, daughter and co-heir of John Carthorpe, received from his father the manor of Steeton in that county, where he afterwards built a castle, which continued the chief residence of his posterity till the beginning of the last century, when the family removed to Newton Kyme, about six miles distant from the castle, which is now the principal farmhouse on the estate.

In 1435 he was a commissioner of array for the West Riding, and in 1460 he was joined with Sir William Plumpton and others to enquire concerning the lands of Richard, Duke of York, attainted in the preceding parliament. (Plumpton Corr. lii., lxvi.) It may be presumed that he participated in the mercy shown by the duke's son, King Edward, to his friend Sir William Plumpton, for in Michaelmas 1463 he was called serjeant under Gray's Inn (Y. B. 3 Edw. IV. fo. 10); and in April 1468 the king appointed him one of his own serjeants. In the following year he is noticed as being employed by Sir William Plumpton, and as receiving ten shillings for his fee, a sorry honorarium to be offered to a king's serjeant. A few years afterwards, in an appeal carried on, as the judges suspected, by the maintenance of Sir William, in which they expressed their opinion that the men charged were not guilty, Fairfax 'said openly att the barre that he knew so, verily they were not guilty; that he would labor their deliverance for almes, not taking a penny;' whereupon Sir William's agent retained two other counsel. (Corresp. 23, 25.)

He was appointed recorder of York in 1476 (Drake's York, 363), which he held about a year. The date of his elevation to the bench is not preserved, but he is first mentioned in the character of a judge of the King's Bench in Trinity Term 1477. (Y. B. 17 Edw. IV. fo. 4, b.) On the death of Edward IV., and again on the usurpation of Richard III., he had a renewal of his patent, and a few days before Richard's assumption of the crown he was made chief justice of Lancaster (Grants of Edw. V. G.); nor did the termination of the tyrant's career make any change in his judicial position. For the first ten years of the reign of Henry VII. he kept his seat, and died in possession in 1495, leaving behind him the character of an able lawyer and a conscientious judge.

By his marriage with Margaret, daughter of Sir William Ryther, he had six children, one of whom, Sir William, is the next-mentioned judge. The viscounty of Fairfax of Elnley in Ireland, granted in 1628 to a descendant of William, the elder brother of Sir Guy, became extinct in 1772. (Biog. Peerage, iii. 249.)

FAIRFAX, WILLIAM, the eldest son of the above Sir Guy Fairfax, pursued his father's profession, and probably in the same school, Gray's Inn. He was elected recorder of York in 1489 (Drake, 368), and was engaged as counsel for Sir Robert Plumpton in 1490 (Corresp. 101, 210), and in November 1504 he was called to the degree of the cof. Soon after the accession of Henry VIII. he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, the first fine levied before him being in Easter Term, 1 Henry VIII., April 1509. He died about the same season in 1514.

By his wife, Elizabeth, one of the three daughters of Sir Robert Manners, ancestor of the Duke of Rutland, he had an only son, William, whose grandson Thomas was created Baron Fairfax of Cameron in Scotland by Charles I. in 1627. The parliamentary general who defeated that unfortunate monarch at Naseby in 1645 was the third lord. Bryan, the eighth baron, resident in America, proved his title in the House of Lords, May 6, 1800; but his descendants have not claimed it. (Biog. Peerage, iii. 249; Notes and Queries, 1st Ser. 156.)

FALEISE, WILLIAM DE. held a high and responsible office in the Treasury of England. The only year in which he is mentioned as acting as a justicier is 1 John. 1199, when a fine was levied before him. (Liberat. 37, 71, 76, 99, 107; Hunter's Preface.)

He was the custos of the honor of Gloucester for the first nine years of John's reign, and he and Maurice de Tureville at a later period had the custody of the castle of Winchester. (Madox's Baron. Angl. 59, 66, 76.)

He married Alice, the daughter of Philip de Liguire, and died in 1232, leaving a son, Elias. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 220.)

FALLAN, WILLIAM, was appointed a baron of the Exchequer in 14 Henry VI., 1435-6. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 278.) There is a curious account of his removal from the court. Richard Forde, one of the remembrancers, in a petition to the parliament of 33 Henry VI., 1455 (Rot. Parl. v. 342), stated that Thomas Thorpe having superseded Forde in the office of remembrancer, would not restore it to him unless he was made third baron of the Exchequer, and that Forde thereupon arranged with Sir William Fallan, clerk, then third baron, to resign on receiving from Forde a bond to pay him 40 marks yearly for life, unless otherwise provided for to the same amount, with a remarkable condition, however, by Sir William Fallan, that such provision should not be 'any benefice havynge cure of soule.' The prayer of this petition, that this bond should be made void, was granted; so that the baron lost both his place and pension.

FASTOLF, NICHOLAS, was of Great Yarmouth in Norfolk, for which town he was returned to parliament in 2 and 7 Edward II. In 18 Edward II., 1324, he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland, and was still mentioned in that character in 1327, 1 Edward III. The patent of his successor in the office being dated in 1333, 7 Edward III., it may be presumed that Fastolf enjoyed it till that time. If so, he must have been on a visit to England when he was added to the commission of justices itinerant into Derbyshire in 4 Edward III., 1330. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 838; N. Fadera, ii. 709; Smyth's Law Officers of Ireland, 97.)

FAUCONBRIDGE, EUSTACE DE (BISHOP OF LONDON), was born in Yorkshire, but his relationship to the noble family of that name is not distinctly traced. He appears in 1 John, 1199, among the justiciars before whom fines were levied at Westminster. In this capacity he regularly acted during the whole of that and for the first three years of the succeeding reign. (Orig. Jurid. 42; Abb. Placit. 39, 116.) In 2 Henry III. he was appointed treasurer of England, a station which he held for the remainder of his life, during the whole of which he was in the constant confidence of the sovereigns whom he served. Each of them employed him in embassies to the court of France, King John in 1204, and King Henry in 1223 and 1225, and from each of them he received various marks of favour. (Rot.

Claus. i. 16, 32, 368, 447, 556, ii. 41, 47.)

To his judicial duties he added those of an ecclesiastic, and held a canonry in the cathedral of St. Paul's; and in 1221, 5 Henry III., he was elected Bishop of London. His high character may be estimated by the following distich, which was written on his being elevated in opposition to several other claimants:—

Omnis hic digni, tu dignior omnibus; omnes
Hic plene sapiunt, plenius ipse sapit.

He still continued actively to perform his duties at court, and was a frequent witness to charters and other royal documents until a fortnight before his decease. This occurred on October 31, 1228. He was buried in his cathedral, to which he had been a considerable benefactor. (Godwin, 179.)

FAUNT, WILLIAM, of whom neither in the Year Books nor in any other records is the name to be found, is inserted by Dugdale as a justice of the King's Bench on April 4, 1338, 12 Edward III., and H. Philipps mentions two persons as his descendants in 1684, one residing at Foston in Lincolnshire, and the other at Kings-thorpe in the county of Northampton. (Grandeur of the Law [1684], 220, 252.)

FENCOTES, THOMAS DE, of a Yorkshire family, was an adherent of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, in the reign of Edward II., and obtained his release from prison by a payment of 20*l.* (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 208.) When John de Britannia, Earl of Richmond, was taken by the Scots in 16 Edward II., Thomas de Fencotes was appointed one of his attorneys in England; and on the death of the earl in 8 Edward III. he still represented him, and acted as custos of the estate till the death of the earl's successor, John, Duke of Brittany, in the fifteenth year. (N. Fadera, ii. 88, 524, 1159.) From the Year Books it appears that he acted as an advocate in Yorkshire as early as 2 Edward III., and as a justice of assize in the seventeenth year. He was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas on January 14, 1348, and seems to have resigned about 1354. (Orig. Jurid. 45.) He received the order of knighthood when or soon after he was raised to the bench. In 24 Edward III. he gave certain tenements to the priory of the order of Mary of Mount Carmel to enlarge their house in Fleet Street; and in 31 Edward III. he and his wife Beatrice endowed the convent of Egleston with the advowson of the church of Bentham in Yorkshire. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 168, 203.)

John de Fencotes, a serjeant-at-law in 40 Edward III., was probably his son.

FENNER, EDWARD, was the son of John Fenner, of Crawley in Surrey, by Ellen, the daughter of Sir William Goring, of Burton. Dallaway (i. 16) traces the family for five generations higher, the earliest of which he calls John atte Fenne. He took his legal degrees in the Middle Temple, where he became reader in autumn 1576. In Michaelmas 1577 he was made a serjeant-at-law, and on May 26, 1590, he was constituted one of the judges of the Court of King's Bench, in which he sat for one-and-twenty years, under Elizabeth and her successor. (Orig. Jurid. 218.) In the January before his appointment he, being a justice of the peace for Surrey, sat on the bench at the assizes when John Udall was brought up to receive sentence, and in kind and considerate language assisted the judges in urging the prisoner to submit himself to her majesty. (State Trials, i. 1297.) In 1595 an account was published of 'The arraignment, judgement, and execution of three wytyches of Huntingdonshire, being recommended for matter of truthe by Mr. Judge Fenner;' and the Register of the Stationers' Company adds to the entry that the judge's note 'is layd up in the warden's cupbord.' (Notes and Queries, 3rd S. i. 402.)

He died on January 23, 1611-12, and was buried at Hayes in Middlesex. By a curious error, his name on his monument appears as 'Jenner' instead of 'Fenner.'

FERMBAUD, or FERNYBAUD, NICHOLAS, was constable of Bristol from 22 to 33 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 82.) In 28 Edward I. he was appointed to perambulate the forests of Gloucestershire and the neighbouring counties (Parl. Writs, i. 398), and two years afterwards the custody of the bishopric of Bath and Wells was entrusted to him during its vacancy. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 121.)

He is mentioned with William Inge as a justice taking assizes in 1305, and was also appointed a justice of trailbaston for Essex and ten other counties. (N. Federa, i. 97.) He possessed considerable property at Wingrave and Rollesham in Buckinghamshire. (Abb. Placit. 222, 276.)

FERRIBY, THOMAS DE, was a clerk of Thomas Plantagenet, Earl of Buckingham (afterwards Duke of Gloucester), in 6 Richard II. (Kal. Exch. ii. 12.) It was not unnatural, therefore, that Henry IV., on ascending the throne, should advance him to be a baron of the Exchequer on October 14, 1399. But of the term of his continuance in the court there is no account.

FERTE, RALPH DE LA, so called from a town in Normandy, was a resident in Cumberland. In 17 John he was constable of Carlisle (Rot. Pat. 163); and in 3 Henry III., 1218, and several years afterwards, he was appointed a justice itinerant in that county and in Westmoreland. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77, 147, 151.)

FIENNES, NATHANIEL, was the second son of William, Lord Say and Sele, by Elizabeth, daughter of John Temple, Esq., of Stowe in Buckinghamshire. He was born about 1608 at Broughton in Oxfordshire, and was educated at Winchester and at Oxford, where he was admitted in 1624 fellow of New College, as founder's kin. (Wood's Athen. iii. 877.) He remained there about five years, and then spent some time abroad, 'in Geneva and amongst the cantons of Switzerland, where,' says Clarendon, 'he improved his disinclination to the Church, with which milk he had been nursed.' From his travels he returned through Scotland in 1639, at the time of the tumults there, which he assisted in fomenting. (Clarendon, i. 325, 510.)

In 1640 he was elected a member of the Long Parliament for Banbury, and soon became a leader of the party called 'root and branch.' He strongly supported the bill against the bishops, and so little had the consequences been considered that, in a conversation with Clarendon, in answer to the question what government they meant to introduce instead, he said 'there would be time enough to think of that.' He was appointed of the committee to attend the king on his journey to Scotland in 1641. (Ibid. 410, 494; Life, i. 90.) When the parliament took up arms in the following year, Fiennes not only undertook to find one horse and bring 100*l.* in money as his subscription towards the cause (Notes and Queries, 1st S. xii. 338), but accepted a commission of colonel of their forces. His first exploit, the defeated attempt to surprise Worcester (Clarendon, iii. 234, 625), did not speak much to the credit either of his courage or military skill, and his conduct at Bristol in 1643 confirmed the bad impression he had made. Professing great zeal for the parliament, he had removed the former governor on suspicion of disaffection, and had condemned and executed two principal citizens on the charge of plotting to give up the place to the king; and yet, after laying in stores of ammunition and provisions sufficient to sustain a siege of three months, no sooner had Prince Rupert invested the city than he surrendered it to the royalists, to the great advantage of their cause in the west, and the infinite discouragement of the parliamentarians.

On the colonel's return to parliament 'every one looked strangely on him with a discontented aspect,' so palpably showing their suspicion of either treachery or cowardice that he felt it necessary to make his apology openly in the house, concluding with a desire that his conduct might be examined by a council of war. This relation, being published by himself, was answered and exposed by Mr. Walker and

Mr. Prynne, in a book called 'Rome's Masterpiece,' for the publication of which the writers were summoned before the council to make good their accusation. The consequence was that Colonel Fiennes was called upon to defend himself, and after a solemn trial, conducted most ably by Mr. Prynne, which lasted no less than nine days, he was convicted by the council of war, and condemned to lose his head. The sentence, however, was not put in execution; by his family interest and connections, and perhaps by the consideration of his great civil ability and the eminent services and zeal he had previously shown in the cause, the general was induced to grant him a pardon. His military career, for which he was totally unfitted, thus ended in infamy, and he quitted the kingdom to cover his disgrace. (Ibid. iv. 141, 343, 611; State Trials, iv. 185-298.)

Returning after some years' retirement, he resumed his attendance in parliament and almost his former ascendancy. He was one of the committee formed for the safety of the kingdom in January 1648; and on December 1 he made a speech in favour of receiving the king's answers from the Isle of Wight as satisfactory. In consequence he was one of the first victims of Pride's Purge, and, after being imprisoned for a short time, was secluded from the house. (Whitelocke, 286.)

In the parliament which Cromwell called after he was declared protector in September 1654, and which was dissolved in January 1655, he was elected one of the members for Oxfordshire. In the following May Fiennes was a commissioner of the protector's privy seal, and on June 15 he was appointed lord commissioner of the Great Seal, on the secession of Whitelocke and Widdrington, when they refused to carry into effect the ordinance concerning the Chancery.

Fiennes is said to have been the author of the declaration issued by Cromwell in the following October, vindicating the severity with which he had treated all the royalists, making them suffer in money or in person for the plots against him, whether they were implicated in them or not. (Harris's Lives, iii. 433-435.) In January 1656 he was united with Whitelocke and others in the negotiation of the treaty with the Swedish ambassador. In the next parliament he was returned for the university of Oxford, and confirmed as commissioner of the Great Seal. (Whitelocke, 632-640, 653.) In the endeavour to remove the scruples which Cromwell professed to assuming the title of king he was one of the principal speakers. This attempt being set aside, he bore the Seal at the solemn ceremony of the re-inauguration in June 1657. (Parl. Hist. iii.

1498, 1515.) Under the new constitution he was appointed one of Cromwell's lords, and on the protector's death in 1658 assisted in proclaiming Richard as his successor, and was reinstated in the custody of the Great Seal, with his former colleague and Bulstrode Whitelocke. (Whitelocke, 666, 675-6.) In the list of the members of the parliament called by Richard in January 1659 the name of Nathaniel Fiennes appears as member for Banbury (Parl. Hist. iii. 1533), which, as he was a member of the 'other house,' either must be a mistake, or some other person of the same name must be intended. He is not only mentioned as lord keeper in Richard's speech on the first day, as about to address the parliament on certain matters untouched by him (Ibid. 1540), but is named in April as going up to the bar of the 'other house' to receive a declaration from the Commons. (Whitelocke, 677.) Soon after the dissolution of the parliament on April 22 Richard's authority ceased, and with it Fiennes' office, the Long Parliament, which met again on May 7, appointing other commissioners. (Ibid. 678.)

On the king's return Fiennes retired to his country seat at Newton Tony in Wiltshire, where he died on December 16, 1669, and was buried in the church there, with a monument to his memory. However that memory might be cherished by his friends and family, the only claim to admiration by the public would be his undoubted talent and eloquence, of which his published speeches afford ample evidence; but in regard to his conduct either as a soldier or civilian, tainted in the former as it must ever remain with the suspicion of treachery and the imputation of cowardice, and exhibiting in the latter so many proofs of changeableness and timeserving, he cannot but be held in the lowest estimation.

He married twice. His first wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Eliot, of Port Eliot in Cornwall, by whom he had a son; and his second was Frances, daughter of Richard Whitehead, Esq., of Siderley, Hants, by whom he had three daughters. His son William, by the death of his first cousin without male issue, became third Viscount Saye and Sele, and the title remained in the family till 1781, when the viscounty became extinct, but the ancient barony survived in Thomas Twistleton, descended from the daughter of the eldest son of the first viscount.

FINCH, JOHN (LORD FINCH OF FORDWICH). This family originally bore the name of Herbert, and is said to have descended from Henry Fitz-Herbert, chamberlain to Henry I., and to have adopted the name of Finch in the reign of Edward I., being that of a manor in Kent, which came into their possession by a marriage with the daughter and heir of its lord. After a long train of succession, Sir Thomas Finch, in the reign of Queen Mary, married one of the coheirs of Sir Thomas Moyle, of Eastwell in Kent, and on his death by shipwreck, in 6 Elizabeth, he left three sons. Through two of them his connection with the law is worthy of remark, for he had one son, two grandsons, one great-grandson, and one great-great-grandson, all eminent in Westminster Hall, besides two female descendants connected by marriage with lawyers equally illustrious. Sir Thomas's second son, Sir Henry Finch, was an eminent advocate, and one of King James's serjeants, and by his wife Ursula, daughter and heir of John Thwaites, was the father of this John Finch, who was born on September 17, 1584, and was admitted of the society of Gray's Inn in February 1600. Nearly twelve years elapsed before he was called to the bar, on November 8, 1611; but in six years more, assisted by the patronage of Lord Bacon, he became a bencher, and was chosen autumn reader in 1618. In the meantime he had been elected member for Canterbury in 1614, and was chosen recorder of that city in 1617. The corporation rejected him in 1620, but being reinstated by the direction of the council (Cal. St. Papers [1619], 108-148), he held that office till 1621. Again representing that city in the first three of Charles's parliaments, he was chosen speaker of the last in 1628. Clarendon says (i. 130) that he had 'led a free life in a restrained fortune, and having set up upon the stock of a good wit and natural parts, without the superstructure of much knowledge in the profession by which he had to grow, he was willing to use those weapons in which he had most skill.' The first effect of his endeavours was his knighthood, the next his appointment as king's counsel, and then attorney-general to the queen in 1626. (Rymer, xviii. 633, 866.)

In his address to the king on his being elected speaker he showed some of the wit for which Clarendon gave him credit, and too much of the customary adulation. On the difficult subjects which agitated this parliament it was a difficult and delicate task to a man of Finch's disposition to avoid doing anything which might deprive him of the confidence of the Commons, or hazard the destruction of his hopes from the king. Through the first session he managed in his speeches to the throne to steer with tolerable safety; and though, towards the end of it, he ran some risk by interrupting, 'with tears in his eyes,' a speaker who was about, as he supposed, to fall upon the Duke of Buckingham, and requesting to withdraw, he redeemed himself by bringing back a conciliatory message from the king. At the termination, however, of the second session he lost all credit with the house, and incurred their censure by his conduct. After delivering a message from the king, ordering an adjournment, he refused to read a remonstrance against tonnage and poundage, proposed by Sir John Elliott, and left the chair. Upon being forced to resume it, he had again recourse to tears, saying, 'I am the servant of the house, but let not the reward of my service be my ruin . . . I will not say I will not, but I dare not.' Sir Peter Hayman, a kinsman and a neighbour, called him 'the disgrace of his country, and a blot to a noble family.' The door of the house was locked, the usher of the black rod denied admittance, and the speaker was compelled to keep his seat while the resolutions were passed. Eight days after the king angrily prorogued the parliament. (Parl. Hist. ii. 222-492.)

But soon Sir John was to act a more prominent part. Noy, the attorney-general, who had invented or revived the tax called ship-money, died in the following August, before the writ for the imposition was issued; the removal of Sir Robert Heath from the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas, without any alleged cause, took place in September; and on the 14th of October (1634) Finch, to the surprise of all, received the latter appointment. (Croke, Car. 375.) The writ for ship-money being issued six days after naturally induced the public to associate the removal, the substitution, and the writ as in some way connected together. Lord Clarendon (i. 127, 130) says that Finch 'took up ship-money where Noy left it, and, being a judge, carried it up to that pinnacle from whence he almost broke his own neck, having in his journey thither had too much influence on his brethren to induce them to concur in a judgment they had all cause to repent.' Though he denied having known of the writ at the time of his appointment, he acknowledged having collected his brethren's opinions on the subject, and when the case of Hampden came under discussion he gave so absolute an opinion in its favour, and contended so strenuously against the argument of his brother judges, Hutton and Croke, that it confirmed the general feeling that he was elevated to the bench for the purpose of carrying through the obnoxious impost, and, as Lord Clarendon says, by the judgment he delivered he made it 'much more abhorred and formidable' than before. (State Trials. iii. 1216.)

On his appointment in the place of Heath and Sir John Banks succeeding Noy as attorney-general, the following specimen of bar wit was circulated (Wood's Athl. ii. 584):—

*Noy's flood is gone,
The Banks appear;
Heath is shorn down,

The prejudice against him was in no degree diminished by his heartless remark, when Mr. Prynne was brought up for sentence upon his second libel: 'I had thought Mr. Prynne had no ears, but methinks he hath ears.' Thus noticed, the hair was turned back, and the clipped members exposed, 'upon the sight whereof the lords were displeased they had been formerly no more cut off.' And the consequence was that the unfortunate gentleman was condemned to lose the remainder, which was done so cruelly and closely that a piece of his cheek was cut off with it. (State Trials, iii. 717, 749.)

Finch's unpopularity in the kingdom tended to advance his favour with the king, and on Lord Coventry's death he was appointed lord keeper on January 23, 1640. (Rymer, xx. 364.) Having been previously ennobled with the title of Baron Finch, of Fordwich in Kent, he opened the parliament that met in April (eleven years having elapsed since it had last assembled) with a fulsome speech, in which, alluding to the royal condescension in calling them together, he says that the king 'is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty, as Phœbus did to Phaëton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not barr you of that filial freedom of access to his person and counsels.' His majesty, however, felt it necessary to resume his beams in less than three weeks, and hastily dismissed the assembly on May 5. In the meantime the Commons had visited the lord keeper with a vote declaring that his conduct as speaker at the close of the last parliament was a breach of privilege (Parl. Hist. iii. 528, 552, 571), and the offence was not forgotten when the king was compelled to summon a new parliament in the following November. Lord Finch, finding by the resolution then passed by the Commons against ship-money and those who advised it, that preparations were making for proceeding against him personally, applied to the house, desiring to be heard in his own defence before it came to a vote; and, his request being granted, he delivered, on December 21, an artful and ingenious speech in his own vindication. But, notwithstanding his grace of elocution, the Commons were not to be diverted from their purpose, a vote being immediately passed for his accusation before the Lords, and a demand for his committal. On the following morning the message was delivered; but his lordship had taken advantage of the interval to escape, and, first sending the Great Seal to the king, to sail for Holland. The articles against him charged him with endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of England, and to introduce an arbitrary tyrannical government against law; and comprehended, besides others, his refusal to put the question as speaker, his soliciting the judges' opinions on ship-money when chief justice, and his framing and advising the king's declaration after the dissolution of the last parliament. (Ibid. 626-698.)

From a passage in Lord Clarendon's work (i. 525), originally suppressed, it appears that many of the ascendant party were not desirous of urging the charges against Lord Finch to extremity; and their refraining from pressing for any further proceedings on the impeachment seems to warrant the assertion. His lordship remained quietly at the Hague, and the governing powers were content with receiving from him a composition of 7000*l.* (State Trials, iv. 18.) It does not appear when he returned to England, but he received two affectionate letters from Queen Henrietta Maria in 1640, and Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, in 1655, showing their continued interest in him. (Archæologia, xxi. 474.) On Charles II.'s return to his throne, Finch was named in the commission for the trial of the regicides in October 1660, and when Thomas Harrison in his defence asserted that the authority under which he acted was not usurped, but that it 'was done rather in the fear of the Lord,' Lord Finch interrupted him, and said, 'Though my lords here have been pleased to give you a great latitude, this must not be suffered, that you should run into these damnable excursions, to make God the author of this damnable treason committed.' In two or three of the other trials he also made some remarks. (State Trials, v. 986-1007.) He was then in his seventy-seventh year, which he did not live to complete, dying on November 20, 1660. He was buried in the ancient church of St. Martin, near Canterbury, in which parish his paternal seat, called The Moat, was situate; and a splendid monument to his memory was erected there by his widow.

However highly Lord Finch's talents and eloquence may have been spoken of, few have ventured to bear testimony to his independence as a judge or his wisdom as a statesman; and the general character that has with apparent truth been assigned to him is that of an unprincipled lawyer and a timeserving minister.

He was twice married, first to Eleanore, daughter of Sir George Wyatt, of Boxley in Kent; and secondly to Mabella, daughter of Charles Fotherby, dean of Canterbury. As he left only a daughter (married to Sir George Radcliffe, of the privy council of Ireland), the title became extinct. (Hasted, xi. 162.)

FINCH, HENEAGE (LORD FINCH OF DARENTY, EARL OF NOTTINGHAM). What- ever discredit the family of Finch sustained from the equivocal character of the above John, Lord Finch of Fordwich, was amply redeemed in the person of his relative, the Earl of Nottingham, by the admiration and respect he commanded among his contemporaries, and the reverence with which his name is ever mentioned in the present day. He was great-grandson of Sir Thomas Finch, the ancestor of Lord Finch, and son of Sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London, by his first wife, Frances, daughter of Sir Edmund Bell, of Beaufrés Hall, Norfolk (a descendant of the lord chief baron in the reign of Elizabeth). He was born on December 23, 1621, and, after passing through his curriculum at Westminster School, was admitted as a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1635, four years after his father's death. Anthony Wood records no degree that he took, although he remained at the university till he became a member of the Inner Temple in 1638. He was called to the bar in 1645, and must have soon obtained good practice in the courts, as his name frequently occurs in Siderfin's Reports during the Commonwealth as a leader in abstruse cases in the upper Bench. That he was no friend to the republican party may be inferred from his being selected for a prominent office immediately on the Restoration; and it was no doubt from the reputation of his loyalty that he was employed before the Protector Richard's parliament in February 1659 for Mr. Street, who had been returned for Worcester, and was petitioned against as having borne arms as a cavalier. On this occasion we have the first reference to the eloquence for which he has been so famed, the opposing counsel acknowledging that he had done the part 'not only of an advocate, but of an exquisite orator.' (Burton, iii. 423-434.) From his persuasive powers, he acquired the titles of 'the silver-tongued lawyer' and 'the English Cicero,' and from his graceful action that of 'the English Roscius.' Evelyn speaks (ii. 226) of his pleading 'most eloquently for the merchants trading to the Canaries;' and the gossiping Pepys (ii. 123, iv. 157) is in ecstasies when attending the court, exclaiming, 'So pleasant a thing is it to hear him plead.' Even the prejudiced Burnet (ii. 37) is obliged to concur, though he qualifies his praise by the depreciating remark that his eloquence was 'laboured and affected,' and that 'he saw it as much despised before he died.'

He was returned to the Convention Parliament of April 1660, by two constituencies, those of St. Michael's in Cornwall, and of the city of Canterbury, and, taking his seat for the latter, he was actively employed in all the steps adopted by the house to facilitate the king's return. A week after that event he was appointed solicitor-general and rewarded with a baronetcy. The trials of the regicides were conducted wholly by him, the attorney-general taking no part in them, and the whole proceedings were carried on with exemplary fairness and judgment. When the parliament met after the recess, he brought in the bill for keeping the fast of King Charles's martyrdom, which, after an observance of two centuries, has been lately discontinued; and in a debate with reference to the attempted exaction of 150*l.* by the serjeant-at-arms for fees against Milton, he is reported to have said 'Milton was Latin secretary to Cromwell, and deserved hanging;' a sentiment which shocks our modern ears, and which has been accordingly stigmatised by over-nice critics, without making due allowance for the frantic loyalty of the time, and without remembering that little was then known of the great bard beyond his republican writings; his 'Comus,' 'L'Allegro,' and 'Il Penseroso,' and other minor poems, having had a very limited circulation.

A new parliament met in May 1661, in which Sir Heneage represented the university of Cambridge. Later in the year he became treasurer of his inn of court, and, being selected as autumn reader, he had the expensive satisfaction of reviving the splendid festivities which had been so long discontinued, and on the last day of the feast had the honour of entertaining the king. Sir Heneage resided, at this time and till his death, at Kensington, in the mansion which afterwards became the palace, his son having sold it to King William.

At the trial of Lord Morley for murder, Sir Heneage summed up the evidence in an eloquent and impressive speech, which is fully reported in the 'State Trials.' (vi. 778.) Lord Clarendon then acted as high steward, and in the following year was himself the subject of prosecution. During its progress Sir Heneage, as far as can be judged from the published reports, showed his disapproval of the proceedings, and did what he legally could in behalf of the fallen statesman. (Parl. Hist. iv. 375, &c.) In 1670 he succeeded to the office of attorney-general, which he held for three years and a half; and on the removal of Lord Shaftesbury from the chancellorship, the Great Seal was on November 9, 1673, placed in his hands, where it remained till his death, a period of nine years. Two months after his advancement he was raised to the peerage as Baron Finch of Darenty. For two years he was distinguished by the title of lord keeper only, but at the end of that time, on December 19, 1675, he was constituted lord high chancellor, and in 1681 he was further honoured with the earldom of Nottingham. While he held the Seal he presided as lord steward on three occasions—in 1678, on the trials of the Earl of Pembroke and of Lord Cornwallis, both for murder; and in 1680, on that of Viscount Stafford, impeached for complicity in the Popish Plot. In pronouncing sentence on that unfortunate nobleman he shows his belief in the existence of the plot 'beyond all possibility of doubting,' and even carries it back so far as the Fire of London, exclaiming, 'Does any man now doubt how London came to be burnt?' He, however, according to Roger North, discredited the witnesses brought forward to support it, and pointed out the inconsistencies of their evidence. (State Trials, vi. 1310, vii. 143, 1294; North's Examen, 208.)

Towards the close of the chancellor's life he suffered greatly from the gout, and was in other respects so much afflicted that he often sat to hear causes when in great pain and more fit to keep his room. Frequently unable to perform his duties in the House of Lords, his place as speaker was supplied by Chief Justice North, with whom he preserved a cordial friendship. He died at the age of sixty-one at his house in Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, on December 18, 1682, and was buried in the church of Ravenstone in Bucks, where he had a seat, his son placing a splendid monument to his memory over his remains.

In the various steps of his career, while party animosities were most violent and the whole kingdom was divided into factions, he carried himself with so much wisdom and steadiness, modesty and forbearance, that he appeared to be of no faction himself, and not only retained the good opinion of his sovereign, but escaped even the assaults, if not the censures, from which few were exempt, of his political opponents.

As chancellor, Lord Nottingham is described by Blackstone (iii. 55) as 'a person of the greatest abilities and most uncorrupted integrity. . . . The reason and necessities of mankind arising from the great change in property by the extension of trade and the abolition of military tenures enabled him in the course of nine years to build a system of jurisprudence and jurisdiction upon wide and rational foundations.' Burnet (ii. 67) calls him 'a man of probity, and well versed in the laws . . . an incorrupt judge, and in his court he could resist the strongest applications even from the king himself, though he did it no where else;' forgetting his refusal to affix the Great Seal to Lord Danby's pardon, and the remark of the king on returning it after he had himself used it for the purpose, 'Take it back, my lord, I know not where to bestow it better.' In the disposal of his ecclesiastical patronage he was so particular that, not thinking himself a judge of the merits of the suitors for it, he charged it upon the conscience of his chaplain (Dr. Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York) to make the closest enquiry and give the best advice, so that he might never bestow any preferment upon an undeserving man.

Tate, in the second part that he added to Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel,' describes him in encomiastic terms under the character of Amri; and the Duke of Wharton, in the 'North Briton' (No. 69), speaks of him in terms equally eulogistic. His character may be estimated by the reputation which has ever since been attached to his name, by the frequent references to his decisions as authority, and by the veneration with which he is still regarded by those who practise in Westminster Hall, where his common appellation is 'The Father of Equity.' As a law reformer too he must hold the highest place, since to him we owe the most important and most useful act of the reign—the Statute of Frauds.

He has been unfortunate in the contemporary reporters of his decisions, of whom there were three—namely, William Nelson, an anonymous author, and Sir Anthony Keck, the lord commissioner of the Great Seal under William III., none of whose publications are satisfactory or of much reputation. A few cases may be met with occasionally in other writers, and Lord Nottingham left a folio volume in manuscript of all the judgments he pronounced, some of the most important of which have been given to the world by Mr. Swanston, the learned editor of our own time. While attorney-general he superintended the edition of Sir Henry Hobart's Reports (1671). The other publications in his name are principally his speeches and legal arguments.

In his private life there is not one story told to his discredit, ready as that profligate age was to feed malice and deal in scandal. He kept up the dignity of his office with liberality and splendour, and was so far from being tainted with avarice that he gave up 4000*l.* a year out of his official allowances. He patronised largely learning and learned men. In the language of Bishop Warburton, 'he took into his notice and continued long in his protection every great name in letters and religion, from Cutworth to Prideaux.'

He married early in life Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. William Harvey, who died seven years before him, having produced him fourteen children. His eldest son, Daniel, succeeded to a second earldom, that of Winchelsea, a title given to his great-grandmother, the widow of Sir Moyle Finch; and in his descendants the double earldom of Winchelsea and Nottingham still survives.

The chancellor's second son, Heneage, also an eminent lawyer and solicitor-general before his father's death till he was removed by James II., greatly distinguished himself by his strenuous advocacy in the cause of the seven bishops. He received no office or other reward from King William, but when Queen Anne came to the throne he was raised to the peerage as Lord Guernsey, to which the earldom of Aylesford was added by George I., and has been enjoyed ever since by his descendants in regular succession. (Collins's Peerage, iii. 420; Athen. Oxon. iv. 66; Welsby, 51.)

FINEUX, JOHN, whose family was established at Swingfield in Kent, which Hasted says was bestowed on John Fineux by Nicholas Criol, in 3 Richard II., in gratitude for saving his life at the battle of Poitiers, was one of three sons of William Fineux of that place, by a daughter of — Monyngs; and, taking Fuller's authority that he was eighty-four years of age when he died, he must have been born about 1441. Fuller states also that he was twenty-eight before he took to the study of the law, that he followed that profession twenty-eight years before he was made a judge, and that he continued a judge for twenty-eight years. His legal studies, therefore, must have commenced about the year 1469, 9 Edward IV. The inn of court to which he belonged is not ascertained, nor does his name appear in the Year Books till 1485, 1 Henry VII., when he was called serjeant-at-law; but David Lloyd states that he was steward of 120 manors at once, counsel to sixteen noblemen, and that he left behind him twenty-three folio volumes of notes, and 3502 cases he had managed himself. (State Worthies, 81-86.) The motto he selected for his serjeant's ring (the first recorded instance of its use) was, 'Sux quisque fortunæ faber,' and one is in possession of a noble descendant of the judge.

He owed his elevation to the bench to his bold opposition to the imposition of the tenth penny. 'Let us see,' said he, 'before we pay anything, whether we have anything we can call our own to pay.' The king, when Archbishop Morton resisted his advancement as being an encouragement of the factious, more wisely suggested that 'so noble a patriot would be an useful courtier, and that one who could do so well at the bar might do more at the bench.' He was accordingly made a judge of the Common Pleas on February 11, 1494, and gave so much satisfaction in that court that in less than two years he was promoted to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, on November 24, 1495. During the remainder of the reign, and for the first sixteen years of that of Henry VIII., he retained his high position with an unblemished reputation both as a lawyer and a man.

He died in 1525, residing then in the manor of Hawe in the parish of Herne, which he had purchased; and his remains were deposited in Canterbury Cathedral. He is represented as a person of great piety, though of a very cheerful temper and conversation. He was a considerable benefactor to the Augustin friars and the priory of Christchurch in Canterbury, and also to the abbey of Faversham: and it tells well of his character that Archbishop Morton, who had opposed him, made him his executor, and that he was nominated to the same duty under the will of Henry VII.

The inn of Chancery now called New Inn is said to have belonged to him, and to have been let by him to the students there when they first removed from St. George's Inn, at the rent of 6*l.* per annum. (Ory. Jurid. 230.)

He was twice married. His first wife was Elizabeth, daughter and heir of William Appulderfeld, Esq., and by her he had two daughters, the eldest of whom, Jane, married Attorney-General John Roper, whose grandson was created in 1616 Baron Teynham. His second wife was Elizabeth, widow of William Cleere, and daughter of Sir John Paston, grandson of William Paston, the judge in the reign of Henry VI. From his only son by her descended an only daughter, who married Sir John Smythe, of Ostenhanger in Kent, whose son Sir Thomas in 1628 was created Viscount Strangford in Ireland, to which was added the English title of Baron Penshurst in 1825, so that the chief justice was lately doubly represented in the House of Lords. (Fuller, i. 500; Hasted, vi. 141, vii. 122, ix. 87, 454.)

FISHERBURN, THOMAS DE, was probably the son of Ralph de Fisseburn, who in 42 Henry III. paid a fine of one hundred shillings in Northumberland for marrying Beatrice, the widow of William the Corner. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 278.) He was appointed justice itinerant in 21 Edward I., and assizes taken before him in Cumberland in the same reign are referred to in 2 Edward II. (Abb. Pract. 307, 309.) He continued to act as a justice of assize until 10 Edward II.

FISHER, JOHN, is said to be descended from Osbernus Piscator, who held lands in Bedfordshire in the time of Edward the Confessor. The first time his name occurs is when he was made king's serjeant-at-law in 1486. From that period the Year Books frequently mention him as an advocate, till he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas on November 3, 1501. In the summer preceding he acted as a judge on the circuit at Nottingham and Derby (Plunpton Corr. 159, 161), as serjeants then commonly did, and still frequently do. Fines continued to be levied before him till the end of the reign, and he received a new patent on the accession of Henry VII., but died in the next year.

FITZ-AILWYN, HENRY. Considerable difficulty frequently arises in tracing the families to which individuals who are solely designated in the records as 'filius Aluredi,' 'filius Bernardi,' 'filius Radulphi,' &c., belong; because, surnames not being at that period in general use, sons were often described by the Christian names of their fathers, their own Christian names being in turn assumed by their children. Thus the designation varied in the different generations, until one of the family, by acquiring possessions, or honours, or office, fixed his own name, or some other he had assumed, permanently for his descendants. The difficulty is materially increased where both the Christian names thus united were of common occurrence. In these cases two persons of different families not unfrequently bore the same appellation, so that much confusion often occurs in investigating the facts and records of the time, by the impossibility to distinguish the precise individual intended.

The frequent occurrence of names of this class (the prefix 'Fitz' being substituted for that of 'Filius') renders these observations necessary, in order to account for the doubt that is sometimes expressed as to their actual lineage. They will apply more forcibly to others than to the individual now to be noticed; but their introduction appeared more appropriate when the first example was to be considered.

Henry Fitz-Ailwyn, called of London Stone, was probably a lineal descendant of Ailwin Child, who founded the priory of Bermondsey in 1082, part of his family being buried there. In 1 Richard I., 1189, he was appointed mayor of London by the king, being the first who bore that title, and as such he is particularly mentioned to have officiated at the coronation as chief butler of the kingdom. It was not till 10 John, 1208, that the citizens obtained the power of annually electing a mayor for themselves. Their choice then fell upon Fitz-Ailwyn, who had presided over them from his first appointment, and whom they annually re-elected till his death in 14 John, 1212, so that he held the office for a period of twenty-four years.

His name is inserted in this list of justices because he was one of those present at Westminster in 8 John before whom a fine was acknowledged.

Sir Francis Palgrave, in p. cv. of the Introduction to the 'Rotuli Curiarum Regis,' gives a curious deed by which he grants a piece of land in Lim-Strete, in the city of London, to William Lafaute. The consideration is half a mark of silver 'ingersumiam,' and the annual rent reserved is twelve pence.

He died in 1212, 14 John (Rot. Claus. i. 124, 127), and was buried in the priory of the Holy Trinity, near Aldgate. By his wife Margaret, who survived him, he had four sons—Peter, Alan, Thomas, and Richard.

FITZ-ALAN, BRIAN, was the son of Alan Fitz-Brian, a grandson of Alan, Earl of Brittany and Richmond. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 23.) At the end of John's reign he took part with the insurgent barons; but his estates, which were thereupon seized, were restored soon after the accession of Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 165, 338.) From 9 to 15 Henry III. he performed the duty of justice itinerant in the northern counties. (Ibid. ii. 77, 151, 213.) From 13 to 19 Henry III. he was sheriff of Northumberland and from 21 to 23 Henry III. he held the same office in Yorkshire. (Fuller's Worthies.) The time of his death is not mentioned, but his son Brian succeeded him, and dying without male issue, the barony is in abeyance among the descendants of his two daughters—Agnes, the wife of Sir Gilbert Stapelton; and Katherine, the wife of John Lord Grey de Rotherfield. (Nicolas's Synopsis.)

FITZ-ALAN, THOMAS. See T. DE ARUNDEL.

FITZ-ALAN, WILLIAM, of Clun in Shropshire, was the grandson of Alan, the son of Flathald, who received from William the Conqueror the castle of Oswaldstre, and son of William of the same name.

In 1 Richard I., 1189, he was one of the justices itinerant into Shropshire, Hereford, Gloucester, and Stafford. (Pipe Roll. 95-248.) In the next year he became sheriff of Shropshire, and continued to hold that office through the remainder of the reign, and for the first three years of that of King John. (Fuller.) The manor of Chipping-Norton in Oxfordshire belonged to him, for a fair at which, and also at Clun, he obtained charters from King John. (Rot. Chart. 136.)

He died about 15 John, 1213-14, and left two sons, the younger of whom, John, by his marriage with Isabel, one of the sisters and coheirs of Hugh de Albini, Earl of Arundel, acquired, in the partition of the estates, the castle of Arundel, which, with its appendant earldom, has remained in the family ever since, and is now held by his lineal descendant, the Duke of Norfolk.

FITZ-ALDELM, WILLIAM, or ALDELIN, sometimes also called de Burgh, was descended from Robert, Earl of Moreton in Normandy, and Earl of Cornwall in England, the uterine brother of William the Conqueror. Earl Robert's son William succeeded him, and fighting against Henry I. was taken prisoner and confined for the rest of his life, and cruelly deprived of his eyes. He is said to have left two sons, the elder of whom was Aldelm, the father of the subject of the present notice. The younger was either the grandfather or father of the celebrated Hubert de Burgh.

In 11 Henry II. William Fitz-Aldelm is called one of the king's marshals, and in 1177, and probably before, he was one of the dapifers. (Madox, 44-50.)

It was no doubt in the latter character that he accompanied King Henry in his expedition to Ireland in October 1171. He was then sent with Hugh de Lacy to receive the allegiance of Roderick, King of Connaught, and on the king's return to England in the next year the city of Wexford was committed to his charge, with two lieutenants under him. In 1173 Pope Adrian's bull granting the kingdom of Ireland to Henry was entrusted to the prior of Wallingford and him to exhibit before the synod of bishops at Waterford, and on the death of Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, in 1176, the king appointed him deputy over the whole of that kingdom, and granted him the wardship of Isabella, the earl's daughter and heir.

His government, which is represented as having been weak and negligent, did not last above a year, Prince John receiving a grant of the kingdom at the parliament held at Oxford in May 1177, Fitz-Aldelm himself being present there. The city of Wexford, however, was restored to his charge, together with the province of Leinster.

Luxurious, proud, and covetous, harsh, unkind, and tyrannical to his officers, his unpopularity was heightened by the disgust naturally felt by a brave people against one to whom was imputed a too careful avoidance of personal danger in the wars which he undertook. The complaints of the Irish deprived him for some time of Henry's favour, though they did not occasion his removal.

During his residence in Ireland he founded the priory of St. Thomas the Martyr at Dublin. Brady (i. 365) states that he was seneschal of Normandy, Poitou, and some other of the king's dominions in France.

After Henry's death he held the office of sheriff of Cumberland during the first nine years of Richard's reign, and in the first year he was one of the justices itinerant in that county and in Yorkshire, and in the former again in 8 Richard I. (Madox, i. 704, ii. 236.)

He afterwards returned to Ireland, obtained a great part of the province of Connaught, and while engaged in some cruel ravages was seized with an illness, of which he died in 1204.

He married Juliana, the daughter of Robert Doisnell, and by her he had Richard de Burgo, surnamed the Great, lord of Connaught and Trim, who left two sons, Walter and William. Walter, by marrying Maude, the heir of Hugh de Lacy, became Earl of Ulster in Ireland, and from him, by the marriage of the third earl's sole daughter and heir, Elizabeth, with Lionel, Duke of Clarence, third son of King Edward III., descended Richard, Duke of York, the father of King Edward IV. William was the ancestor of the present Marquis and Earl of Clanricarde in Ireland, who was created Baron Somerhill in England in 1826. The same title, with that of Viscount Tunbridge, was given to Richard, fourth Earl of Clanricarde, in 1624, to which was added the earldom of St. Albans in 1628; but these became extinct in 1659. The Irish earldom then devolved on a cousin, from whom the present marquis lineally proceeds. The Earl of Mayo also derives his lineage from the same root. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 693; Leland's Ireland, i. 113, &c.; Lord Lyttelton's Henry II. iii. 85, &c.; Lingard, ii. 261.)

FITZ-ALEXANDER, NIGEL, was one of the justiciers present in the Curia Regis in 31 Henry II., 1185, when a fine was levied there. (Hunter's Preface.) In the same year, and until 1 Richard I., he was sheriff of Lincolnshire (Fuller), in which county he had considerable property. He gave a carucate of land in Bolebi to the priory of Sempringham in that county in pure and perpetual alms; and it is a curious fact that in 29 Henry III. the prior was exempted from the scutage upon it, because the heirs of Nigel had then sufficient property in the county to discharge it. (Madox, i. 672.) In 1 Richard I., also, he was one of the justices itinerant in the counties of Buckingham, Bedford, and Lincoln; and by the roll of that year he appears to have been a justicier of the forest acting in Yorkshire. He died before 9 John, when his son Osbert was engaged in a suit relative to lands in Fulebec in Lincolnshire.

FITZ-ALURED, RICHARD, is only known by an entry on the Great Roll of 31 Henry I. In that record it is stated that he owed—i. e., that he fined—fifteen silver marks that he might sit with Ralph Basset to hold the king's pleas in Buckinghamshire. He is called pincerna, or butler, an office which he probably held under William de Albini, the king's chief butler. (Madox, i. 62, 457.)

FITZ-BERNARD, ROBERT, was among the eighteen justices itinerant appointed at the council of Northampton, held at January 23, 1176, 22 Henry II., to distribute justice throughout the kingdom. Robert Fitz-Bernard was placed at the head of the three to whom the counties of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hants, Berks, and Oxford were entrusted, he being at that time, and until 29 Henry II., sheriff of the first-named county.

He had been sheriff of Devonshire also for six years from 1165. He died about 9 Richard II. (Madox, i. 120-138, 199; Fuller; Lord Lyttelton, iii. 93, 186.)

FITZ-BERNARD, THOMAS, was an officer of King Henry's household, and was twice subjected, in 1168 and 1169, to the sentence of excommunication pronounced against him by Becket, for the purpose of annoying the king. His pretence was that Fitz-Bernard had usurped the goods of the church of Canterbury; but the pope, on the king's representation that Fitz-Bernard and others were in attendance on his person, took off the ban.

In 1178, 24 Henry II., and the two following years, he acted as a justice itinerant in several counties; and in 1182 he is named as one of the justiciars and barons before whom fines were levied in the Curia Regis at Westminster. He was also justice of the forest, and from 1178 to 1184 he held the sheriffalty of Northamptonshire. (Lord Lyttelton, ii. 434, 506, iii. 404; Madox, i. 133-137; Hunter's Preface, xxi.; Fuller.)

FITZ-ERNISE, PHILIP, was one of the justices itinerant appointed by the writ of Richard de Luci to make the assize for the county of Gloucester in 20 Henry II., 1174. (Madox, i. 123.)

FITZ-GEROLD, HENRY, as one of the king's chamberlains, had a seat in the Curia Regis, and is one of the three 'justiciæ regis' directing an exchange of lands at Canterbury between the king and one Atheliza. In 16 and 17 Henry II., 1170-1, he was a justice itinerant into Kent.

There can be little doubt that he was either the son or brother (probably the former) of Warine Fitz-Gerold, the third lord mentioned by Dugdale, whom he succeeded in the office of chamberlain. (Madox, i. 145, 204.)

FITZ-GILBERT, RICHARD DE, had a variety of names. He was first called Richard Fitz-Gilbert from his father, and afterwards de Benefacta, from his estate of Benefield in Northamptonshire; de Tunbridge, from that castle in Kent; and de Clare, from the honor or earldom of that name in Suffolk, all of which were included in his possessions.

He was the son of Gilbert Crispin, Earl of Brion and Ou, whose father Geoffrey was a natural son of Richard I., Duke of Normandy, so that he was second cousin to the Conqueror on his father's side; and if his mother was, as one pedigree asserts (Manning and Bray's Surrey, i. xix.), Arlotta, who was also mother of the Conqueror, he was, on her side, that monarch's half-brother.

He was a participator in the dangers of the field of Hastings. His share in the lands distributed among the Norman adventurers was not a niggardly one. At the general survey he was found to be possessed (among others) of thirty-eight lordships in Surrey, thirty-five in Essex, three in Cambridgeshire, and ninety-five in Suffolk, of which Clare was the chief, the name of which his descendants adopted. He exchanged the strong castle of Brion in Normandy, which he inherited, for the town and castle of Tunbridge, with a circuit round them, the extent of which was fixed by the same rope by which his own domains at Brion had been measured, comprehending three miles from every part of the walls.

When King William went to Normandy in 1073 he was left as joint chief justiciary of the kingdom with William de Warenne, and during their rule they defeated Roger Fitz-Osborne, Earl of Hereford, and Ralph de Guader, Earl of Norfolk, who had headed a rebellion against the royal authority.

After the Conqueror's death he at first took the part of his son Robert, but afterwards adhered to William Rufus, and his successor Henry I. In the reign of the latter he was slain in an ambush, while marching to his property in Cardiganshire.

He married Rohais, the daughter of Walter Giffard, Earl of Buckingham, and by her he left five sons, the eldest of whom was Gilbert, who is generally spoken of as de Tunbridge, whose eldest son, Richard, was created Earl of Hertford, a title which was successively enjoyed (together with that of Clare) by his two sons Gilbert and Roger de Clare. Gilbert's second son, Gilbert, was created Earl of Pembroke by King Stephen, and this title devolved on the famous William Mareschall by his marriage with this earl's grand-daughter. (Madox, i. 32; Dugdale's Baron. i. 206; Brady's England, &c.)

FITZ-HELTON, WILLIAM, or FITZ-HELT, is named by Dugdale as one of the justices itinerant in 16 Henry II., 1170, but who have been shown to be commissioners of enquiry into the conduct of the sheriffs, &c. A family of that name is mentioned by Madox as paying seventy shillings for scutage in Kent; and by an entry on the Great Roll of 1 Richard I. (232) it appears that William Fitz-Helte and William de Enema attested the account of the sheriff of that county for money laid out in the works of Dover Castle. (Madox, i. 630.)

FITZ-HENRY, RANULPH, whose family

eventually adopted the name of Fitz-Hugh, and may be traced back to Bardolph, lord of Ravensworth in the time of William the Conqueror, was the son of Henry Fitz-Hervey, who died in 1201, 3 John. In 17 John, having shown symptoms of joining the discontented barons, he obtained a safe-conduct to go to the king to make his peace, which he effected on the payment of a fine of fifty marks. (Rot. Pat. 163.) He married Alicia, the daughter and heir of Adam de Staveley, and in 2 Henry III. fined forty marks for having livery of the lands held by his father-in-law in capite in Yorkshire. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 14.)

In 18 Henry III., 1234, he was appointed one of the justices itinerant then sent into Cumberland.

He died, not as Dugdale states, in 1262, but before January 13, 1243; for on that day a writ was granted to Alicia, who 'was the wife of Ranulph Fitz-Henry.' (Ibid. 393.) He was succeeded by his son, Henry Fitz-Ranulph, from whose son, Hugh Fitz-Henry, the name of Fitz-Hugh was permanently adopted. The barony continued in male heirs till 1512, since which time it has been in abeyance. (Nicolas.)

FITZ-HERBERT, MATHEW, a younger son of Herbert Fitz-Herbert, who was chamberlain to Henry I., was attached to King John's court, and is a frequent witness to his charters from the sixth year of his reign. (Rot. Chart. 140, &c.) From 12 to 17 John he was sheriff of Sussex, during part of which time he held the office of custos of the port of London (Rot. Claus. i. 145); and in 18 John the castle of Pontoise was delivered to his charge. His services and faithful adherence to his sovereign were not without reward: besides the lands of William Pont Arch in Gloucestershire, he received a grant of the manors of Wufrinton and Kinemesdon in Somersetshire; and he possessed the manor of Chedelinton in the same county, for which he obtained a market. (Rot. Pat. 184, 194; Rot. Claus. i. 17, 48, 363.) He married Joanna, daughter and heiress of William de Mandeville and Mabilia Patric, his wife, and by her right had the land of Ollonde in Normandy.

For the first thirteen years of the next reign he continued sheriff of Sussex, and acted twice as a justice itinerant, in 3 and 11 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. ii. 213.)

He died in 1231. His son Herbert (called Herbert Fitz-Mathew) died in 1245, when his possessions devolved on his next brother, Peter, who also dying in 1255 was succeeded by John, the son of the third brother, Mathew, after whom the descent is doubtful. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 211, 430, 432, ii. 205.)

FITZ-HERBERT, ANTHONY, of Norbury,

a manor in Derbyshire, granted in 1125 by William, prior of Tutbury, to William Fitz-Herbert, was the sixth and youngest son of Ralph Fitz-Herbert, the twelfth lord, by Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of John Marshall, of Upton in Leicestershire; and by the death of all his brothers without male issue he eventually succeeded to the paternal estate, as fourteenth lord.

Anthony Wood claims him as a member of the university of Oxford, but is not able to say of what college; and the place of his legal education is equally uncertain, though, from the insertion of his arms in the window of Gray's Inn Hall, that society evidently adopts him. It is more surprising that there should be any difficulty in tracing the academical home of so eminent and learned a lawyer, than that any school should desire to be considered as having guided his studies. Although his name does not appear in the courts till some time after he was called to the degree of serjeant in 1510, it is evident that he had been long industriously employed in the composition of his laborious work, 'The Grand Abridgment,' containing an abstract of the Year Books till his time, the first edition of which was published in 1514. In 1518 he was made one of the king's serjeants, and about the same time he received the honour of knighthood. In less than six years his elevation to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas took place, in Easter 1522. He sat in this court for the remainder of his life, a period of sixteen years.

Besides his judicial duties, he had frequent occupation on the king's affairs. He was one of the commissioners sent to Ireland, and a visitor of the monasteries; and during the latter period of his career his name appears more prominently in connection with the political events of the time. His signature is the last but one of the seventeen subscribers to the articles of impeachment against Cardinal Wolsey, and he was one of the commissioners appointed on the trials both of Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher. Notwithstanding the disgust which the conviction of these two excellent men universally excited, Fitz-Herbert's reputation sustained no blemish, the world knowing that his being joined in the commission was an act that he could not prevent, and that his interference with the will of the arbitrary despot would have been both useless and dangerous. His judicial character had been raised by his having allowed bills for extortion against Wolsey while in the height of his power to be found before him at York, for which he suffered the cardinal's rebuke (New Trials, i. 377-398; Hall's Chron. 681), and his legal reputation had continued to increase, not only from the sound judgments he pronounced, but from the seven useful and learned works with which he followed his early undertaking, showing that his labours were not confined to professional enquiries, but extended to subjects of general interest, and aimed at instructing all mankind.

Sir Anthony died, as appears by his epitaph in the church at Norbury, on May 27, 1538. In his last moments it is said that he enjoined his children, by a solemn promise, never to accept a grant or to make a purchase of any of the abbey lands. He was twice married. By his first wife, who was Dorothy, daughter of Sir Henry Willoughby, of Wollaton, Notts, he had no issue. By his second wife, Matilda, daughter and heir of Richard Cotton, of Hampstall-Ridware in Staffordshire, he left several children. Norbury, after a regular descent of more than seven hundred years, is still in possession of a lineal representative of the family.

The Fitz-Herberts of Tissington in Derbyshire are of a different but equally ancient family, which, however, became connected with the Fitz-Herberts of Norbury by marriage with one of the descendants of the judge.

FITZ-HERVEY, HENRY, was probably the father of Osbert, noticed in the next article; but the early history of the family is involved in some obscurity. If so, he attended King Richard in his expedition to the Holy Land, and was much esteemed by King John.

In 9 Richard I., 1197, he was one of the justices itinerant who fixed the tallage in Cumberland (Madox, i. 704); and in 10 John, 1208, he was present as a justicier when fines were acknowledged at Carlisle.

King John confirmed to him his lands at Hinton in Richmond, in Scorton, and other places; and the forest in Teisedale, as his ancestors held it, and authorised him to fortify his house at Cudereston.

He married Alice, the daughter of Henry Fitz-Yvo. When he died is uncertain, but he survived Osbert, his eldest son.

FITZ-HERVEY, OSBERT. Osbert Fitz-Hervey's name appears as one of the justices of the King's Court at Westminster for a period of twenty-five years—viz., from 28 Henry II., 1182, till 7 John, 1205-6—in almost every year of which he was present when fines were levied there (Hunter's Preface), and frequently he performed the duties of a justice itinerant. Joceline de Brakelonda (25) records that he was sub-sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk.

He was a descendant of a younger son of Hervey, Duke of Orleans, named Robert, who accompanied William the Conqueror in his enterprise against England, and received part of the territorial spoil in reward for his services. The name of Osbert's father was Henry, probably the justicier last noticed, and his mother was Alice, daughter of Henry Fitz-Yvo. He married Dionysia, daughter of Geoffrey de Grey, and died in April 1206, leaving an only son Adam, who married Juliana, the daughter of the justicier John Fitz-Hugh, and their descendants through a long succession of years were conspicuous in the senate and the field. One of them, Sir William Hervey, was created by James I. baron of Ross in the county of Wexford, and by Charles I. Lord Hervey of Kidbroke in Kent, but on his death without male issue in 1642 his titles became extinct. Another representative of this distinguished family was raised by Queen Anne to the peerage, by the title of Lord Hervey of Ickworth in Suffolk, and by George I. he was advanced to the earldom of Bristol. The fifth earl was created Earl Jermyn and Marquis of Bristol by George IV. on June 30, 1826. (Brydges' Collins's Peerage, iv. 140, &c.)

FITZ-HUGH, JOHN, was among the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged in 10 John, 1208. (Hunter's Preface.) He was of a Yorkshire family, and was high in the king's employment, being constable of Windsor Castle, in the custody of which he is noticed throughout the whole of the reign, and in that of Henry III.

In 10 and 12 John he held the sheriffalty of Sussex, and during the three following years that of Surrey, and in some of these years was concerned in the receipt of the tallage from the Jews, and in the collection of the customs of woad and wine. (Madox, i. 123, 774.) Among the mandates addressed to him, he is commanded on August 1212 to send the great crown, with all the regalia which he had in his custody, to the king at Nottingham. (Rot. Claus. i. 122.)

He was a firm adherent to King John, and was present with him on the expedition to Ireland (Ibid. 125), and during his subsequent contests with the barons. (Wendover, iii. 301.)

He died on March 7, 1222, 6 Henry III., leaving by his wife a son, who died young, and a daughter Juliana, who married Adam Fitz-Hervey, son of the last-noticed Osbert Fitz-Hervey.

FITZ-JAMES, JOHN, so far from Lord Campbell's assertion that he was 'of obscure birth' (Chief Just. i. 160), was of very good parentage and ancestry. The name, in connection with the county of Somerset, is as old as the reign of Edward III. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 163.) His grandfather is stated to have been James Fitz-James, who acquired the estate of Redlynch in that county, and considerable other property, by his marriage with Eleanor, the daughter and heir of Simon Draycott; and his father is described as John Fitz-James, whose wife was Alice, daughter of John Newburgh, of East Lullworth in Dorsetshire (Godwin, 190); and the Draycotts and Newburghs were second to none of the gentry of England in possessions and high blood. (Athen. Oxon. ii. 720; Hutchins's Dorset, ii. 337, &c.)

The last-named John was the father of three sons—1. John; 2. Richard, who was Bishop of Rochester, Chichester, and London in succession; and 3. Aloed, the ancestor of the Lewesden branch of the family.

The eldest son, John, has by all writers been hitherto considered to have been the chief justice; but, on a full investigation of the family records, he is proved to be the father of the chief justice, who therefore, instead of being the elder brother, was the nephew of the bishop.

No evidence whatever exists of the place of Fitz-James's early education, and Lord Campbell is silent as to the authority on which he says that 'he made his fortune by his great good humour, and by being at college with Cardinal Wolsey.' If this were so, the cardinal was rather backward in his patronage; for Fitz-James's first promotion in the law was not till many years after Wolsey had attained supreme power. Lord Campbell adds, 'It is said that Fitz-James, who was a Somersetshire man, kept up an intimacy with Wolsey when the latter had become a village parson in that county, and that he was actually in the brawl at the fair when his reverence, having got drunk, was set in the stocks by Sir Amyas Paulet.'

It would have been more satisfactory to his readers if his lordship had informed them where the facts he has thus announced are to be found. Though Anthony Wood did not know it, Fitz-James may possibly have been at Oxford; though Redlynch, Fitz-James's home, is at least sixteen miles from Lyminster, Wolsey's parish, the intimacy between them may have existed; and though Fitz-James was very near the time of his solemn reading at the Temple, it is not impossible that he might have joined in the drunken brawl; yet all these circumstances, new and extraordinary as they appear, are of such interest in the lives both of the judge and the cardinal that a reference seems necessary, in order to decide whether their original relater is worthy of credit. The same enquiry will be made as to the authority on which his lordship states that Fitz-James at his inn of court 'chiefly distinguished himself on gaudy days by dancing before the judges, playing the part of the Abbot of Misrule, and swearing strange oaths; that 'his agreeable manners made him popular . . . although very deficient in moots;' and that 'he was in deep despair' for want of clients till Wolsey, 'his former chum, . . . was able to throw some business in his way in the Court of Wards and Liveries.' Whatever may be the source from whence these curious particulars are extracted, the little dependence that should be placed on it may be estimated by the fact that the Court of Wards and Liveries was instituted, not only after the death of Wolsey, but even after that of Fitz-James, ten years later. (Ellis's Letters, 1st S. i. 176.)

He studied the law at the Middle Temple, where he sufficiently distinguished himself to be called to the bench of that society, to be made reader in 1505, and treasurer in 1509. He was recorder of Bristol in 1510 (Cal. St. Papers [1509], 157), and succeeded to the office of attorney-general on January 26, 1519, more than three years after Wolsey had become chancellor, and seven or eight years after he had acquired a complete ascendancy over the king. In Trinity Term 1521 he was called to the degree of the coif, and on the 6th of the following February was constituted a puisne judge of the King's Bench, and two days afterwards chief baron of the Exchequer (Dugdale's Orig. 215, 221), a fact of which Lord Campbell does not seem to be aware. Judging from all appearances, he performed the duties of both offices at the same time, for which there were numerous precedents from the reign of Henry IV., with the slight variation that in former instances the judgeship was in the Common Pleas. He is named as chief baron in the will of Lord Zouche, dated October 1525. (Test. Vetust. 620.) When he had occupied this honourable position for four years he was promoted to the presidency of the Court of King's Bench on January 23, 1526, having been in the meantime serviceably employed to negotiate a marriage for Lord Percy, whose previous contract with Anne Boleyn stood in the way of the king's desire. (Lingard, vi. 112.)

He sat as chief justice for thirteen years, during a very trying period of the reign for one in his prominent position. There can be no doubt that he participated in the craven subserviency to the royal tyranny with which every one of his brethren was chargeable; but, in expressing disgust at the general failing, care must be taken not to visit on any one more than history justifies. Lord Campbell gives no authority for his assertion that Cardinal Wolsey incurred considerable obloquy by Fitz-James's appointment, or that the new chief justice was thought to be 'not only wanting in gravity of moral character, but that he had not sufficient professional knowledge for such a situation.' The prejudice also which his lordship displays against the chief justice renders it necessary to look with caution on his description of Fitz-James's conduct in the three great events in which he introduces his name—the disgrace of Wolsey, and the trials of Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher.

In reference to Wolsey, his lordship's endeavour to prove Fitz-James guilty of base ingratitude loses all its potency from the total want of evidence that the cardinal had been his benefactor. With this view, however, he makes the chief justice the active organ of the proceedings against the cardinal, charging him with having 'joined in the cry against him and assisted his enemies to the utmost,' and with having 'declared his readiness to concur in any proceedings by which the proud ecclesiastic . . . might be brought to condign punishment;' and he further represents Fitz-James as the suggester of Judge Shelley's argument to the cardinal with reference to the alienation to the king of the archiepiscopal palace of York House (now Whitehall). These are serious charges, and surely require more authentication than his lordship has afforded before they are admitted on the page of history. In addition to these, Lord Campbell describes the chief justice as the adviser and dictator of the articles adopted in the House of Lords against Wolsey, for no other apparent reason than that the name of 'John Fitz-James' appears as the last of the seventeen persons who subscribed them. The signature, even if his, is merely a formal one, and the articles no more 'indicate a pre-existing envy and jealousy' in Fitz-James than they do in Sir Thomas More, who signed at the head of all. There was, however, another John Fitz-James, of the Middle Temple, who might have held some office in the House of Lords.

Lord Campbell next introduces this 'recreant chief justice,' as he calls him, as one of the commissioners on the trial of Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, of which the lord chancellor was the head, and, though the chief justice is not personally mentioned in any one account of the proceedings, his lordship names him the spokesman on every occasion. Professing to quote verbatim from the 'State Trials' the answers of the court, which consisted of thirteen persons, nine of whom were lawyers, he includes within the marks of quotation with which he cites them the name of Chief Justice Fitz-James, instead of the words which are actually used—viz., 'some of the judges,' and 'the judges and lawyers;' the word 'judges' evidently applying to all members of the commission. Surely this mode of writing history cannot be defended. His lordship would have shown more charity, as there was clearly as much likelihood, if, in recording from the same report that 'some of the judges lamented so grievously' as to shed tears, he had suggested the possibility that Fitz-James was one of them.

At the trial of Sir Thomas More, Lord Campbell says that Fitz-James's conduct was 'not less atrocious,' adding that 'no one can deny that he was an accessory to this atrocious murder.' These are hard words, but the guilt must be divided among all those who sat in judgment. Fitz-James is mentioned once only in the report, and then an expression is put into his mouth which may well raise something more than a doubt whether he was satisfied of the justice of the proceedings. When Audley, the lord chancellor, who conducted the trial, 'loath to have the burden of the judgment to depend upon himself,' openly asked the advice of the Lord Fitz-James whether the indictment was sufficient or not, the chief justice answered, 'My lords all, by St. Gillian (that was ever his oath) I must needs confess that if the act of parliament be not unlawful, then is the indictment in my conscience not insufficient,' thus evading the very point raised by Sir Thomas More, which was that the act of parliament, being repugnant to the laws of God, was insufficient to charge any Christian man. (Roper's More [Singer], 88.) If he had not been previously overruled on that point, as the 'if' seems to infer, he was no doubt intimidated, as all his brethren were, by the fear of the consequences, of which they saw too many examples.

On the conviction of Queen Anne Boleyn Lord Campbell pursues the same course. He represents that 'the opinion of the judges was asked' whether the sentence upon her could be in the alternative, to be burnt or beheaded at the king's pleasure, and he puts a cruel speech into Fitz-James's mouth arguing against its being in the disjunctive, and consequently enforcing the former as the legal punishment of a woman attainted of treason. The sole words in the authority quoted, upon which this supposed speech is founded, are, 'The judges complained of this way of proceeding, and said such a disjunctive in a judgment of treason had never been seen' (State Trials, i. 418; Burnet's Reformation, i. 407); and Lord Campbell not only translates 'the judges' into 'Fitz-James, C. J.,' but adds within inverted commas an argument as spoken by him on the occasion. It does not appear, however, that there was any opinion asked, or any public discussion on the subject, but, on the contrary, the above passage is merely a remark in Judge Spelman's Common-Place Book, and evidently shows nothing more than the judges' private doubts on the introduction of the precedent. Deeply as all Englishmen must feel the dreadful degradation of the law at this period, and disgusted as they must be at the despicable weakness of its professors, they would deem themselves guilty of injustice similar to that which was then administered if they convicted any individual on evidence concocted as this is. But the most curious part of the story remains to be told. The whole of the proceedings against the unfortunate queen are preserved in the 'Baga de Secretis,' and from them it is manifest that Fitz-James was not present at all. His name does not occur in any one of the writs, and Baldwin, the chief justice of the Common Pleas, was the principal judge in all of them. (3 Report, Pub. Rec., App. ii. 243.)

Is it not improbable that Fitz-James partook of those faults which pervaded the whole bench at the period in which he flourished; but they were faults arising more from that awful dread of majesty which the Tudors inculcated than from any personal cruelty or delinquency. Of Fitz-James nothing is told to distinguish him in this respect from the rest of the group, and certainly nothing to justify his being brought forward as a special object of vituperation. Indeed, if any credit is to be placed on David Lloyd (State Worthies, 114-118), who wrote little more than a century after the chief justice's death, he left a character behind him very different from that with which, two centuries later, Lord Campbell has depicted him. This author states that Sir John 'was so fearful of the very shadow and appearance of corruption that it cost his chief clerk his place but for taking a tankard after a signal cause of 1500*l.* a year, wherein he had been serviceable, though not as a bribe, but as a civility.' The following remarks in one of the additional MSS. (1523, f. 54) in the British Museum, which are either the foundation of or extracts from David Lloyd's sketch, convey also a pleasing picture:—

'Two maine principles y^e guide humane nature are conscience and law; by y^e former we are obliged in reference to another world, by the latter in relation to this. What was law alwaye, was then a resolution, Neither to deny, nor defer, nor sell justice. When his cozen urged for a kindnesse, "Come to my house, (saith the judge,) I will deny you nothing; come to the king's court and I must do you justice."'

'He would attend each circumstance of an evidence, hearing what was impertinent, observing what was proper, saying, "We must have two soules as two sieves, one for the bran, and the other for the flour; one for the grosee of a discourse, and the other for the quintessence."'

Fitz-James, however, did not escape those attacks from which even the best judges are not exempt. Sir R. Terres, the writer of a 'slanderous complaint against him, exhibited to the king in a written book,' was condemned to pay a fine, to stand in the pillory, and to lose his ears.

His retirement from his high office on January 21, 1539, arose probably from bodily infirmity; for in his will, which is dated in the previous October, he describes himself as 'weke and feble in bodye.' That he lived above two years afterwards may be presumed from the fact that the will was not proved till May 12, 1542. He was buried at Bruton, near to his manor of Redlynch, and a fine monument to his memory is in the parish church there. His will contains a direction that his 'great book of Statutes in vellum or parchment . . . shall remayn to the howse [Redlynch] as an implemēt to the saide howse;' and his bequests in behalf of his poor neighbours and dependants are unmistakable proofs of his considerate benevolence.

FITZ-JOEL, WARIN, was one of the four justices itinerant sent in 8 Henry III., 1224, to Dunstable (Rot. Claus. i, 631), whose judgments against Faukes de Breautre led to such fatal consequences to that turbulent baron. In 1225 he went as justice itinerant into Cornwall; a fine was levied before him in Easter. In October he was sent with Thomas de Muleton on a special commission into Norfolk, to enquire into certain robberies committed on the merchants of Norway; and in the following January he acted as a justice itinerant in Hampshire and other counties.

FITZ-JOHN, THOMAS, was a justice itinerant in Cumberland in 18 Henry III., 1234. He had a grant in 17 John of the lands of Philip Fitz-John, in Yorkshire, during pleasure, and in 10 Henry III. was one of those appointed to assess the quinzime in Westmoreland. (Rot. Claus. i. 245, ii. 147.) He may possibly have been a second son of John Fitz-Geoffrey (the son of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex, by Aveline, his second wife), who in the same year was sheriff of Yorkshire. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 706.)

FITZ-JOHN, EUSTACE, appears on the Ancient Roll of 31 Henry I. as holding pleas on the northern circuits established by that king, in all of which he was united with Walter Espec. They seem to have taken some offence in Yorkshire, inasmuch as on the same roll it is recorded that they fined that they should not be any longer judges or jurors there. By the roll it is evident that he had held the office for at least two years.

He and Pain Fitz-John (next mentioned) were the sons of John de Burgo, called Monoculus, from having lost an eye, and the nephews of Serlo de Burgh, baron of Tonsburgh in Normandy, and founder of Knaresborough Castle, both of whom accompanied the Conqueror on his invasion of England. The latter dying without issue, Eustace succeeded as his heir, and thus became a powerful baron in the north, receiving very large additions to his inheritance from the bounty of King Henry, and being appointed governor of Bamburgh Castle in Northumberland. He held a high place in the confidence and favour of that king, and had the reputation of a wise and judicious counsellor.

On the death of Henry, the usurper Stephen took from him the custody of Bamburgh Castle, and on suspicion of a treasonable correspondence with David, King of Scotland, seized his person and kept him for a considerable time in confinement. On obtaining his release, he joined with Robert, Earl of Gloucester, in aiding the Empress Matilda; making good for her the castle of Malton, and raising a powerful force from his own vassals in support of the Scottish king's invasion. He held a command at the memorable battle of the Standard, fought at Northallerton on August 22, 1138, when the Scottish forces were entirely defeated. He must afterwards have made his peace with King Stephen, for in 1147 he founded the abbey of Alnwick in Northumberland, and in 1150 the priory of Walton in Yorkshire. In 3 Henry II., 1157, he was slain in battle with the Welsh, whom the king had attacked in a narrow and difficult pass in Flintshire.

He was twice married. His first wife was Beatrix, the daughter and sole heir of Yvo de Vesci, which name was afterwards assumed by Eustace's son William, who succeeded to the barony, which became extinct in 1297 by the death of William de Vescey, a justice itinerant in the reign of Edward I., without heirs.

His second wife was Agnes, daughter and heir of William Fitz-Nigel, baron of Halton, and constable of Chester, to both of which he succeeded. By her he had a son named Richard Fitz-Eustace, one of whose grandsons, Robert Fitz-Roger, was a justicier in the reigns of Richard I. and John, and another, Roger de Laci, was also a justicier in the latter reign. (Madox, i. 146, 457; Monasticon, vi. 867, 970; Lord Lyttelton: Rapin; Nicolas's Synopsis, 684.)

FITZ-JOHN, PAIN, brother of the above-mentioned Eustace Fitz-John, was also a favourite baron and one of the chief counsellors of King Henry, in whose household he held the office of groom of the chamber (cubicularius). It was his duty to provide a measure of wine every night for the king, which, as it was seldom required by his majesty, Fitz-John and the pages generally drank. On one occasion the king, being thirsty, called for his wine, and it was gone; but, instead of being angry, he acknowledged that one measure was too little for both, and good-humouredly directed that the butler should supply two measures for the future, one for himself and one for Fitz-John. (Mapes, De Nugis Curialium, 210.)

In the roll of 31 Henry I. he is mentioned as a justice itinerant in the counties of Gloucester, Stafford, and Northampton. Besides his lands in Oxfordshire, Gloucestershire, and Norfolk, he likewise possessed the whole territory of Ewyas in Herefordshire. His castle of Caus, in 34 Henry I., was attacked in his absence by the Welsh, who burned it to the ground, and massacred all its inhabitants; and two years afterwards, in 1136, he himself was slain with 3000 of King Stephen's troops in a battle fought with the same enemy near Cardigan.

By his wife Sibyll he had a son and two daughters. Cecilia, the elder daughter, married Roger, the son of Milo of Gloucester (afterwards Earl of Hereford), his coadjutor as a justice itinerant; and Agnes, the younger daughter, married — de Montchensy. His son Robert took the name of Fitz-Payne, and his male descendants were summoned to Parliament until the reign of Edward III., when the title became in abeyance in the female line, and at last devolved on the Earls of Northumberland, but became extinct in 1670. (Madox, i. 146; N. Fœdera, i. 10; Lord Lyttelton: Hasted; Baronage, i. 90, 572; Nicolas.)

FITZ-JOHN, WILLIAM, in 9 Henry II., 1163, held pleas in the county of Hereford, and in 1168 he amerced Samuel, the priest of Pilton in Somersetshire. (Madox, i. 527, ii. 213.) He held some office about the court, and when Richard de Humet, the chief justiciary of Normandy, was sent to England by King Henry in 1170 to arrest Becket, with a view to save him from the mischief which he anticipated from the sudden absence of four of his knights, William Fitz-John and Hugh de Gundeville were despatched by Humet to Canterbury for the purpose; but before their arrival the archbishop's fate was accomplished. (Lord Lyttelton, iii. 2.)

FITZ-MARTIN, WILLIAM, who had land in Hampshire, was a justicier or baron acting in the Exchequer both in 4 and 16 Henry II., 1170. He is also one of the twelve commissioners, whom Dugdale calls justices itinerant, who in the same year were sent to enquire into the conduct of the sheriffs in the several counties of the kingdom. (Madox, ii. 253; Pipe Roll, 172.)

FITZ-NIGEL, or FITZ-NEALE, WILLIAM, is named among the commissioners appointed in 1170 to examine into abuses of the sheriffs, &c., whom Dugdale erroneously calls justices itinerant. He was sheriff of Kent in 1184, 30 Henry II., and in the certificate returned by the Bishop of Chichester for the aid on marrying the king's daughter in 12 Henry II., 1166, he mentions William Fitz-Neale as holding one knight's fee under that church.

It is not improbable that he was a son of Nigel, Bishop of Ely, and brother of the next-mentioned Richard Fitz-Nigel, Bishop of London. (Madox, i. 215, 576; Fuller.)

FITZ-NIGEL, or FITZ-NEALE, RICHARD (BISHOP OF LONDON), must have been born before the canon requiring the celibacy of the clergy was strictly enforced, because he seems to have been openly brought forward by his father Nigel, Bishop of Ely (who will be subsequently mentioned), and acknowledged as his son. He was educated in the monastery of Ely, and was then placed in the Exchequer, at the head of which his father held the office of treasurer.

Brought up to the Church, as most of the other clerks in those times were (whence indeed the derivation), his successive ecclesiastical preferments in Henry's reign were canon of St. Paul's; archdeacon of Ely, 1169; and dean of Lincoln, by which latter title he is described in 30 Henry II., 1184. (Madox, i. 215; Le Neve.)

In his early youth he was the author of a work called 'Tricolumnus,' from its being arranged throughout in three columns. It was a tripartite History of England under Henry II.—the first column treating of the transactions of the Church of England and the rescripts of the apostolical see; the second of the remarkable exploits of the king, which he says exceed all human credibility; and the third, of many affairs both public and domestic, and also of the court and its judgments. (Madox, ii. 345.)

His diligence and erudition, and the capacity he displayed for the conduct of the public revenue, soon justified his father in recommending him as his successor in the office of treasurer. He was accordingly appointed in 1165, but, as no royal favour was in those days conferred without an equivalent, Nigel was obliged to pay to the king four hundred marks for his son's nomination. (Ibid. i. 44, 113.) He continued in the office for the remainder of that reign, and managed the revenue with so much care and adroitness that, notwithstanding the continual wars in which the country was involved, King Richard found on his father's death no less a sum than one hundred thousand marks in the Exchequer.

That monarch's appreciation of his merits was evidenced, not only by retaining his valuable services, but by raising him, soon after his coronation, to the bishopric of London on December 31, 1189.

During Henry's reign he frequently shared in the duties of a justice itinerant, and from the time when fines were introduced into the court—namely, about 28 Henry II.—his regularity of attendance is particularly observable, for there is scarcely one until the end of that reign in which his name does not appear. So also after King Richard's return from the Holy Land till the year before his own death. (Ibid. 79-215.)

Under the regency of William de Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, he possessed considerable influence, and it was by his interference that Geoffrey Plantagenet, Archbishop of York, when seized and imprisoned by the orders of the chief justiciary, was liberated.

He left a most valuable legacy to his successors in the 'Dialogus de Scaccario,' copies of which are preserved both in the Black and the Red Books in the Exchequer. It is printed by Madox (ii. 331-452) at the end of his learned history of that court; and in a preliminary dissertation he has satisfactorily established the claim of the bishop to the authorship, in opposition to that of Gervas of Tilbury, to whom it was for many years attributed. It was composed in the 23rd or 24th Henry II., and describes the Exchequer, with all its officers and their duties, and the forms of proceeding and their origin; a treatise of inestimable value as well to historians and antiquaries as to lawyers.

He died on September 10, 1198. One of the monks of Winchester (Angl. Sac. i. 304), in describing this event, having designated his office of treasurer by the word 'apotecarius,' an author has been led to commit the somewhat absurd blunder of making him the king's medical adviser. (Godwin, 179; Wendover, iii. 39.)

FITZ-OSBER, OSGER, the son of Oger the Dapifer (afterwards noticed), was sheriff of the united counties of Buckingham and Bedford from 33 Henry II. to 1 Richard I. inclusive. In the next year he was made sheriff of Hampshire, and filled that office also in 5 Richard I. (Fuller.) From 7 Richard I., 1195-6, to the end of the reign, his name often appears as one of the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged at Westminster, and in the first of those years he acted as a justice itinerant into Devonshire. (Hunter's Preface; Madox, i. 113, 502.)

He married Amy, one of the daughters and coheirs of William de Schettega.

FITZ-OSBERNE, WILLIAM (EARL OF HEREFORD), was the son of Osberne de Crepon, and grandson of Herfastus, who was the brother of Gunnora, first concubine, and then wife, to Richard I., the third Duke of Normandy, and great-grandfather of William the Conqueror. He was consequently connected by distant relationship with the young prince, and was brought up with him from infancy. On his father's death he succeeded to the office of steward or dapifer in the ducal household, and was Count of Bretteville in Normandy. He aided Duke William in quelling every civil commotion of his Norman subjects; and in the invasion of England he equipped forty of the ships at his own expense, and commanded one of the three divisions at the battle of Hastings.

Having contributed to the conquest of England, he assisted greatly in the maintenance of the acquisition by his valour and good counsels. To his vigilance was entrusted the erection of a castle at Winchester for the purpose of overawing the inhabitants, and when, in the year after the Conquest, the king returned to Normandy, to him and to Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, the government of the realm was committed as chief justiciaries. The southern division was appropriated to Odo, and the northern to Fitz-Osborne, on whom the earldom of Hereford and the office of constable or marshal (magister militum) were also conferred.

Besides presiding over the Curia Regis during the king's absence, they also managed the king's revenue; but their conduct was so arrogant and rapacious that the indignation of the English was roused. The efforts of the people, however, to relieve themselves were so ill-concerted that they were easily subdued, and the regents were rewarded, instead of being punished for their oppression.

In 1069 Fitz-Osborne assisted his sovereign in the suppression of various insurrections in England, and was employed by the king in aiding Queen Matilda in the defence of Normandy. In 1072 he proceeded to Flanders to assist Arnulph, the heir of Baldwin, its earl, in resisting the invasion of the disinherited Robert de Frison, by whom he was surprised, and perished through his careless security.

To his zeal, courage, and wisdom King William was greatly indebted for his success, and he was rewarded accordingly. Besides the grant of the county of Hereford, he received the Isle of Wight and various other possessions and advantages. But, notwithstanding the rich gifts which were lavished on him, his prodigality always left him in poverty, which King William, with whom he was a great favourite, at once chided and supplied. Quarrels, however, would now and then occur between his sovereign and him. On one occasion, being steward of the household, he had set upon the royal table the flesh of a crane scarcely half-roasted, when the king in his rage aimed a severe blow at him, which, though it was warded off by Eudo, another favourite, so offended Fitz-Osborne that he resigned his office.

Though brave and generous as a soldier, he was severe and oppressive in his government, and was looked upon as the pride of the Normans and the scourge of the English.

He was twice married. His first wife was Adeline, daughter of Roger de Toney, a great Norman baron, standard-bearer of King William; and the second was Richild, daughter and heir of Reginald, Earl of Hainault. By the former only he had children, three sons and two daughters; but the family and titles soon became extinct. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 67; Will. Malmesbury, 396, 431; Madox, i. 31-78; Chauncy's Herts, 121; Turner, &c.)

FITZ-PETER, SIMON, was one of the 'assidentes justiciæ regis,' before whom a charter or contract was executed at the Exchequer in 11 Henry II., 1165, and is the first of four after whom are the words 'marescallis regis.' Whether, as Madox (i. 44) seems to infer, these words apply to all the four may perhaps admit of question. If, however, he were not one of the marshals, it is clear he held some office in the court, since his property was exempted on that account from the Danegeld and other assessments so early as 2 Henry II. (Pipe Roll, 7.) From that year to the sixteenth he was sheriff of the latter county; and as Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the great justiciary in the next reign (whose father is not mentioned in Dugdale's 'Baronage'), was entrusted with the same sheriffalty for many succeeding years, it does not seem an improbable conjecture that this Simon was his father.

Simon Fitz-Peter acted also for four years, commencing 2 Henry II., as deputy to Henry de Essex, the sheriff of the counties of Buckingham and Bedford. It was probably at a later period that he was a justice itinerant in the latter county, when his name is mentioned in connection with the case of a certain canon of Bedford, named Philip de Brois, who having been convicted of manslaughter before his bishop, was merely condemned to make pecuniary compensation to the relatives of the deceased. In the open court at Dunstable, the judge, alluding to the case, called him a murderer, whereupon a violent altercation ensued, and the priest's irritation drawing from him expressions of insult and contempt, the king ordered him to be indicted for this new offence. (Lingard, ii. 213; Leland's Collect. iii. 424.) This was one of the grounds for Henry's attack on clerical privileges.

FITZ-PETER, GEOFFREY (EARL OF ESSEX), was not improbably the son of the above Simon Fitz-Peter, for the reason suggested in his life. Dugdale commences his history without any mention of who his father was, and, independently of the sheriffalty of Northamptonshire, and also of the name, it is apparent that he had been brought up in the court where Simon had also filled some office.

In 31 Henry II. he was one of the justices of the forest, the duties of which he continued to perform till the death of King Henry (Madox, i. 547, ii. 132); and in Richard I. he acted as a justice itinerant in various counties. (Pipe Roll, 35, &c.)

King Richard compelled him to pay a fine for not joining the crusade (Ric. Divis. 8), but at the same time showed the estimation in which he held him by appointing him one of the council to assist Hugh Pussar, Bishop of Durham, and William de Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, in the government of the kingdom, and in the subsequent disputes directing him, in conjunction with Walter de Constantii, the Archbishop of Rouen, and others, to act independently of the chancellor. About this time he became sheriff of the united counties of Essex and Hertford, being probably so named on account of the property to which he had succeeded in right of his wife, Beatrice, one of the daughters and co-heirs of William de Say, by Beatrice, the sister of Geoffrey, father of the deceased Earl of Essex.

His continued employment as a justicier during Richard's reign is shown by his being present when fines were acknowledged at Westminster (Hunter's Preface); and in July 1198, 9 Richard I., he was placed in the high office of chief justiciary of the kingdom. His military talents were immediately called into exercise against the Welsh, whose king, Gwynwyn, he completely defeated.

On Richard's death in the following year, being continued in his office, he induced the nobles to take the oath of fealty to King John at Northampton. On the day of the coronation he was created Earl of Essex. His performance of the duties of his office was marked with exemplary activity, and he exerted himself with considerable energy in exacting the taxes which King John imposed. At the same time he appears to have joined in the king's amusements, as a payment of five shillings was made to him 'ad ludum suum,' and to have been not averse from the pleasures of the table, as he paid for eating flesh with the king on a fast-day. (Cole's Documents, 248, 272, 275.)

During the contest with Rome he supported his royal master, but was compelled to be a witness to the disgraceful document, dated May 15, 1213, 14 John, by which the crown was surrendered to the pope. In a few months after this event this great man terminated his career, dying on the second day of the following October. He was buried at the priory of Shouldham in Norfolk, which he had founded.

For twenty-eight years he had filled a judicial position, fifteen of them as head of the law, and principal minister of the kingdom. Invested with extraordinary power, the absence of complaint in such difficult times is a proof that he used it without harshness; skilful in the laws, he seems to have administered them with firmness, and the lengths to which the king soon after resorted appear to show that the royal impetuosity had been previously checked by his prudence. Matthew Paris says that the king hated, but feared, him, and that upon his death he exclaimed, 'Per Pedes Domini, nunc primo sum rex et dominus Anglie.' How the infatuated monarch used his freedom the history of the remainder of his reign affords a lamentable display.

So large were the various grants made to him that when his son did homage on succeeding him, the sheriffs of no less than seventeen counties were commanded to give possession of the lands he held in each of them. (Rot. de Finibus, 502.)

By Beatrice, his first wife, he left three sons, two of whom succeeded to his title, which continued in the family, through female channels, till the year 1643, when it became extinct.

Geoffrey Fitz-Peter's second wife was Aveline, by whom he had a son named John, lord of the manor of Berkhamstead in Hertfordshire, who was made justice of Ireland. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 703; Wendover, iii. 49, &c.; Royal Tribes of Wales, 71; Turner's Engl.)

FITZ-RALPH, GEROLD, whose lineage has not been traced, was one among the twelve inquisitores in 1170, 16 Henry II., whom Dugdale has mistakingly called justices itinerant.

FITZ-RALPH, WILLIAM, sometimes written Ranulph, and sometimes Randolph, for they are all three one and the same name, succeeded to the lordships of Alfreton, Norton, and Marnham, in Derbyshire, on the death of his father, Robert Fitz-Ranulph, who is supposed by some to have assisted in the assassination of Archbishop Becket in the year 1170, and to have founded the priory of Beauchief, in that county, in expiation of his crime. The fact that he retired about that time from the sheriffalty of the counties of Nottingham and Derby, which he had held for the four preceding years, in some degree gives weight to this opinion. His son, this William, was then placed in that office, and held it for the eight following years. (Fuller.)

Whether the father was guilty or not, the son was certainly not excluded from the court, but continued to be employed in places of trust up to the reign of King John. In 20 Henry II., 1174, he was, as sheriff of Nottingham and Derby, joined with Godfrey de Luci, one of the king's justices, in setting the assize of those counties; and in the six next years he sat in the King's Court, in which he seems to have held a high place, as his name often appears thus: 'Per Willelmum filium Radulphi et socios suos,' without noting who those companions were. During those years, also, he went as one of the justices itinerant into fourteen several counties. (Madox, i. 94, 123-138.)

In 1180 he was appointed dapifer or seneschal of Normandy, in right of which he had the custody of the castle of Caen, for which a livery of 300*l.* per annum was allowed him. (Ibid. 166.) This office, which comprehended that of justiciary, he continued to hold from that time till his death in 1200. When Richard I. went to the Holy Land he committed Alice, the King of France's sister, to the custody of William Fitz-Ralph, who resolutely refused to deliver her up to her brother, notwithstanding his repeated demands. In 2 John he is mentioned on the Norman Roll as being present in the King's Court at Caen with the other justices and barons there. (Ibid. 53-169.)

According to Dugdale's 'Baronage' (i. 678), he had, by his wife Agnes, one son, Thomas, who succeeded him and died without issue, and three daughters, who thus became his heirs.

FITZ-RANULPH, RALPH, was the son of the under-named Ranulph Fitz-Robert, and a descendant, therefore, from Ranulph de Glanville. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fm. ii. 147.) Dugdale introduces his name among the justices itinerant into the northern counties in 46 Henry III., 1262; but it is apparent that this iter was only for pleas of the forest. He died about April 1270. His wife's name was Anastasia, and he had by her three daughters.

FITZ-REGINALD, RALPH, was three times a justice itinerant—viz., in 14, 16, and 18 Henry III., 1229-1234. From these appointments, which are evidently not referable to any local property, it seems probable that he was connected with the courts of law. He had been a partisan of the barons against King John, but on the accession of Henry III. his forfeiture was reversed on returning to his allegiance.

FITZ-REINFRED, ROGER, is mentioned in 1176, 22 Henry II., as a justice itinerant, in which capacity he acted occasionally to the end of that reign. During this period he visited no less than thirteen counties, an extent of circuit sufficient of itself to show that he was a regular justicier in the King's Court, from whence these itinera emanated. But examples of pleas before him in the Exchequer at Westminster are mentioned from 25 Henry II., 1179 (Madox, 83-736), and fines were levied before him as late as 10 Richard I.

It was then a common custom for some of the judges to be in personal attendance on the king, and accordingly his name is attached to the charter, dated at Oxford in May 1177, by which the grant of the kingdom of Cork to Robert Fitz-Stephen and Milo de Cogan was confirmed, and he was also one of the witnesses to the will of King Henry, dated at Waltham, in 1182. (Lord Lyttelton, iv. [9], [14].) He was sheriff of Sussex for eleven years from 23 Henry II., and of Berkshire in 1 Richard I. (Fuller.)

The estimation in which he was held is evidenced by his being appointed one of the council to assist the two chief justiciaries who were left in the government of the kingdom during King Richard's absence in the Holy Land. (Madox, i. 34.)

He married Rohaise, niece of Ranulph, Earl of Chester, and widow of Gilbert de Gant, Earl of Lincoln, by whom he had a son Gilbert, who was a favourite of King John.

FITZ-RICHARD, WILLIAM, was sheriff of the counties of Buckingham and Bedford from 18 to 25 Henry II. He was preceded in this office by a Richard Fitz-Osbert, who probably was his father. According to the practice then adopted, he was appointed, as sheriff, one of the justices itinerant to fix the assize for those counties in 20 and 23 Henry II. (Madox, i. 124, 132.)

Nothing further occurs as to this William Fitz-Richard during Henry's reign, and it is difficult to ascertain whether facts subsequently related in connection with the same name refer to the same individual. The Christian names Richard and William were common in those times, and scarcely a roll occurs which does not mention several bearing the same designation in different and distant counties who are evidently not the same person.

FITZ-ROBERT, JOHN, was the son and heir of the after-noticed Robert Fitz-Roger, lord of Clavering in Essex, and Warkworth in Northumberland. Soon after his father's death, in 14 John, he was appointed to the sheriffalty of Norfolk and Suffolk, which he held for the next two years. He then joined the insurgent barons, and was one of the twenty-five to whom was entrusted the enforcement of Magna Charta. He obtained restitution of the possessions he then forfeited soon after the accession of Henry III., and in subsequent years received several marks of royal favour. He held the sheriffalty of Northumberland for four years, commencing in 9 Henry III., and in 10 Henry III. was nominated one of the justices itinerant for Yorkshire. There is a writ in the Exchequer in 1238 which bears the appearance of his then acting as a baron of the Exchequer.

His first wife was Joane, and his second Ada de Baillol, who, on his death in 25 Henry III., 1241, fined two thousand marks for the custody of his lands and heirs, Hugh and Roger. The former of these, dying during minority, was succeeded by Roger, whose grandson assumed the name of Clavering. (Dugdale's Baron, i. 106; Rot. Pat.

130-180; Rot. Claus. i. 316-618, ii. 33-185; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 337, 342; Madox, ii. 317.)

FITZ-ROBERT, PHILIP, was among the justices itinerant who fixed the tallage in the county of Lincoln in 10 Richard I., 1198-9 (Madox, i. 705), being the only time he is noticed in that character. The roll of the following year, 1 John, contains a curious entry of his paying a fine of 200l., and one hundred bacons and one hundred cheeses, for the grant of the wardship and land of the heir of Ivo de Munby till he was of age. (Rot. de Oblatis, 24.)

FITZ-ROBERT, RANULPH, was the grandson of that Robert Fitz-Ralph who married the daughter of Ranulph de Glanville. He himself married Berta, the niece of Ranulph de Glanville, and succeeded to a third of his property with the representatives of that great man's two other daughters. (Rot. de Finibus, 337, 369.) In 12 John he accompanied the king to Ireland, but before the end of the reign took part against him in the contest with the barons. Returning, however, to his allegiance before the king's death, his manor of Saxtorp in Norfolk, of which he had been deprived, was restored to his possession. Little further is recounted of him, except that he twice filled the office of a justice itinerant—once in 10 Henry III., 1226, for Lancashire, and another time in 15 Henry III., 1230, for Yorkshire. His death occurred before December 25, 1252, 37 Henry III., when his son and heir, Ralph (who has been mentioned in a former page as Ralph Fitz-Ranulph), did homage for his lands in Norfolk, paying fifty shillings for his relief.

FITZ-ROBERT, or DE WELLS, SIMON (BISHOP OF CHICHESTER). Many of the charters of the early part of the reign of King John are concluded with the words 'Dat. per manus Simonis Archidiaconi Wellensis et J. de Gray,' both of whom some writers have therefore designated keepers of the Seal under the Chancellor Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury. As in no instance have their names, or those of others who appear in the same manner, any addition designating that office, such as 'vice-cancellarius,' or 'tunc agens vices cancellarii,' as in the reign of King Richard, it admits of considerable doubt whether this character is properly assigned to them, especially as in every case the persons so introduced are known to have held some other office in the court. They were officers of the treasury of the Exchequer, where the Great Seal was usually kept.

The first date on which these two names appear is September 16, 1199, 1 John; and they continue to sign together till June in the following year, after which Simon the archdeacon's name alone is appended to numerous charters for a long period, ending in June 1204, 6 John. (Rot. Chart. 28, 74-135.) In March 1203 he was provost of Beverley, and in June 1204 he was consecrated Bishop of Chichester.

Le Neve, in his list of archdeacons of Wells, calls him Simon Fitz-Robert, and in that of the Bishops of Chichester introduces Simon de Wells (Le Neve, 43, 58), evidently not being aware that the two names belonged to one and the same person. Godwin also calls the bishop Simon de Wells. That his actual surname was Fitz-Robert is proved by two curious charters (Rot. Chart. 86, 88), by one of which King John, on February 7, 1201, confirms to him, by the name of 'Symoni filio Roberti,' archdeacon of Wells, a grant of certain lands in Stawell in Somersetshire, with the advowson of the church there, which had been estreated in consequence of the felony of Alice, the wife of Robert de Wattelai, in killing her husband, for which she was condemned and burnt; and by the other, dated the 22nd of the same month, the king grants to him the land of Burgelay in the manor of Meleburn, which the said Robert de Wattelai and Alice his wife had held as of her inheritance, but which had been forfeited by the same felony of which she had been convicted. No doubt, therefore, that the Robert of whom Simon was the son was the murdered man Robert de Wattelai, and that the grants were in fact a restoration of the property which he would have inherited but for the crime committed by Robert's wife. It was not uncommon in this age for an ecclesiastic to discard his family name, and adopt that of the place of his birth, education, or preferment. It is certain that this bishop is generally known as Simon de Wells; but, inasmuch as he had not discontinued the name of Fitz-Robert at the time when these grants were made, the assumption of the new name may possibly, in this instance, have been influenced by the tragical events recorded in them.

That Bishop Simon after his elevation continued to enjoy the royal favour is shown by the king in January 1207 giving him letters 'ad dominum S. de Malo Leon.' desiring all honour should be shown to him, with letters of protection during his absence. (Rot. Pat. 68.) In the course of that year he died. (Godwin, 504.)

FITZ-ROBERT, WALTER, was the grandson of the before-noticed Richard Fitz-Robert, called also Benefacta, and son of wife Maud, the daughter of Simon de St Liz, Earl of Huntingdon.

He was probably very young at his father's death, as no mention is made of him, beyond the usual assessments on his property, until 22 Henry II., 1170, when he is recorded as one of the three justices itinerant appointed by the council of Northampton to go into the eastern counties of England. In this employment he was engaged for several following years, during which time, and perhaps before it, he took his share in the judicial duties of the Curia Regis. Madox gives several instances from that time till 5 Richard I, 1193, in which he was present as one of the barons and justiciars there. (Madox, i. 94-137, ii. 20.)

His knightly pursuits were not forgotten in the performance of his civil duties. He supported William de Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, the governor of the realm, during King Richard's absence in the Holy Land, in his contest with John, the king's brother; and in 6 Richard I, 1194, he joined the expedition into Normandy.

He died in 1198, and was buried in the choir of the priory of Dunmow, which his father had founded, and to which he himself had given divers churches and lands.

His two wives were, first, Maud, daughter of Richard de Luci, the chief justiciary; and, secondly, Margaret de Bohun.

He left several sons, of whom Robert, the eldest, succeeded him, and was called Robert Fitz-Walter. His prowess as a warrior procured for him the addition of 'the Valiant;' and, as leader of the barons confederated against King John, they styled him 'Marshal of the Army of God and the Holy Church.' His grandson was regularly summoned to parliament in 23 Edward I. To the title of baron Fitz-Walter an earldom of Sussex was added in 1529, and other titles; but these becoming extinct in 1756, the barony fell into abeyance among the five daughters of Thomas Mildmay, Esq., whose wife Mary was sister to Benjamin, the fourteenth baron. (Dugdale's Baron, i. 209; Nicolas.)

FITZ-ROBERT, WALTER, was forester of the county of Huntingdon, and for some offence in the exercise of his office was imprisoned in 14 John, and did not obtain his liberty without a fine of two palfreys. He afterwards joined the barons against the king, but returned to his duty at the commencement of the next reign. His appointment as one of the justices itinerant in Huntingdonshire in 9 Henry III. no doubt arose from his continuing to hold the above office. (Rot. Claus. i. 120, &c., ii. 75, &c.)

FITZ-ROGER, ROBERT, was the son of Roger Fitz-Richard, a grandson of the before-noticed Eustace Fitz-John. He married Margaret, the daughter of William de Chesney, and widow of Hugh de Cressi, and obtaining with her considerable property in Norfolk, he became sheriff of that county and of Suffolk in 3 Richard I, and held the office at intervals till 14 John. (Fuller.)

In 3 Richard I, 1191, he was present in the Curia Regis as a witness to a final concord then made there; and in 1197 he was a justice itinerant in Norfolk, and was present in the following year on the acknowledgment of fines at Norwich. Other fines were levied before him in 3 John, 1201. (Madox, 704; Hunter's Preface.)

King John granted him a charter of confirmation of his inheritance of the castle and manor of Warkworth in Northumberland, of which county he held the sheriffalty from 3 to 14 John. He founded the priory of Langley in Norfolk about the end of Richard's reign (Monast. vi. 929), and dying in 14 John, left by his widow, Margaret, a son, the before-mentioned John Fitz-Robert. After three generations the family assumed the name of Clavering, from a manor so called in Essex, which belonged to this Robert. John de Clavering, who was summoned to parliament by the first three Edwards, died in 1332, leaving only female issue. (Dugdale's Baron, i. 106; Nicolas.)

FITZ-ROGER, WILLIAM, was one of the justices itinerant appointed for York and Northumberland in 3 Henry III., 1218. (Rot. Claus. i. 403.) If, as it seems probable, he were of Lincoln, he married Agnes de Scotney. (Madox, i. 488.)

FITZ-ROSCELIN, WILLIAM, is introduced by Dugdale as one of the justices itinerant for Norfolk and Suffolk in 9 Henry III., yet, being ill at the time, he did not act; but on several occasions he had been named with others to take assizes of novel disseisin in Norfolk; and in 11 Henry III. he was the first named in a commission into that county to try two prisoners of the Bishop of Ely, who were charged with murder, and for whom the bishop had not a gaol sufficiently secure. (Rot. Claus. i. 552, 633, 665, ii. 72, 77, &c.) In 15 John he was so far in the confidence of the court as to be employed as one of the commissioners appointed to enquire into the losses sustained by the clergy in the diocese of Norwich; and he obtained a licence not to be placed on any assize or jury in the county, except in cases in which the king was concerned. (Rot. Claus. i. 154-165.) Before the end of that reign he either fell off from his allegiance, or was suspected of intending to do so, as his son Andrew, and his granddaughter Alice, were placed as hostages for him in the custody of the constable of Orford Castle, and he fined two hundred marks. On the accession, however, of Henry III. he procured full restitution. (Ibid. i. 257, 332; Rot. Fin. 589.) His wife's name was Lecia or Alicia.

FITZ-SIMON, OSBERT, is inserted by Dugdale in his List of Fines as a justicier before whom one was levied in 7 Richard I, October 1195 (Orig. Jurid. 41), but Mr. Hunter omits his name.

FITZ-SIMON, RICHARD, in 1 Henry III. paid 100 shillings for having seisin of the lands which his father, Simon Fitz-Richard, forfeited in 17 John, situate in the counties of Leicestershire, York, Huntingdon, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex. He was one of the justices itinerant in 9 Henry III. for Essex and Hertfordshire, and in the two following years was a commissioner to collect the quinzime and to assess the tallage there, and in Cambridge and Huntingdon. He died in 17 Henry III. (Rot. Claus. i. 245-324, ii. 76-208; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 212, 234.)

FITZ-SIMON, TURSTIN, held some office in the Exchequer so early as 4 Henry II. (Pipe Rolls, 144, 150), and after the murder of Becket he was one of the custodes of the archbishopric of Canterbury. (Madox, i. 309, 631.)

In 1178 he was a justice itinerant for setting the assize or tallage in Gloucestershire, and having been selected in 1176 as one of the eighteen justices appointed to administer justice throughout the kingdom, his pleas are recorded, in that and the two following years, on the rolls, not only of the four counties at first appropriated to him, but also of six others. In 1177 he is mentioned as holding pleas in the Exchequer. (Ibid. 127, &c.) In 1 Richard I. he had the custody of the castle of Ludlow. (Pipe Roll.)

FITZ-STEPHEN, RALPH, was an officer in the Chamber of the Exchequer from 3 to 19 Henry II., 1157-1173. He possessed lands in the counties of Warwick, Leicestershire, Northampton, and Gloucester, and the sheriffalty of the latter county was entrusted to him in conjunction with his brother William Fitz-Stephen in 18 Henry II., and from that time till 1 Richard I. either one or the other occupied the office. For that county also he acted as a justice itinerant in 1174, and having been appointed in 1176 at the head of one of the six divisions into which the circuits were then arranged, his pleas are recorded in the rolls of that and of the four following years in twenty-four different counties. (Madox, i. 123-137.)

In 1182 he was one of the king's chamberlains, and his name appears as a witness to the king's will executed at Waltham in that year. (Lord Lyttelton, iv. [14].) In 1184 he was among the justiciars and barons before whom a fine was levied in the King's Court, and in 1187 he was appointed custos of the abbey of Glastonbury, and so remained till 3 John. (Madox, i. 635; Rot. Cancell. 195; Abb. Plac. 12.)

He died in or before 6 John, as Godfrey de Albini then paid a thousand marks, his fine for having his land. (Rot. Claus. 9.)

FITZ-STEPHEN, WILLIAM, the brother of the last-mentioned Ralph Fitz-Stephen, filled with him the office of sheriff of Gloucester from 18 Henry II., 1171, to 1 Richard I., 1190. He was (like Ralph Fitz-Stephen) placed at the head of one of the six circuits arranged by the council of Northampton in 1176, and his pleas are recorded in that and the four following years, not only in fourteen counties, but 'ad Scaccarium' also. (Madox, i. 127-130, 211.) His name likewise appears as a justice itinerant in Shropshire in 1 Richard I., 1190. (Pipe Roll, 95.)

There are many grounds for identifying the sheriff and justicier with a remarkable man of the same name who flourished at the same period; I mean William Fitz-Stephen, the author of 'The Life and Passion of Archbishop Becket,' in which is introduced the description of the city of London printed in Stow's 'Survey.'

Several circumstances in the career of the latter render it far from improbable that he should have been selected for judicial employment. He himself says that he was a fellow-citizen with Becket, one of his clerks, and an inmate of his family; that, being by express invitation called to his service when chancellor, he became 'in Cancellaria ejus dictator' [qu. remembrancer?], or, as another reads, 'scribe in Cancellaria Angliæ;' that when Becket sat to determine causes he was a reader of the instruments, and upon his request sometimes an advocate. (Dr. Pegge's Dissertation, 8.) All this must have occurred before 1162, when Becket resigned the chancellorship, and, from the expressions used, no doubt can exist that he was at that time established in some office in the Chancery, or in the Exchequer, where the business of the Chancery was usually transacted. There is nothing to show that he did not remain in his office after his patron's resignation of the Great Seal, and it is certain, from his own relation, that though he was present with the archbishop on his trial at Northampton in 1164, he escaped being involved in the subsequent banishment of Becket's friends, in consequence of his having been the author of a rhyming Latin prayer, which he had once presented to the king in the chapel of Bruhull in Buckinghamshire. (Biog. Brit. Lit. 363.) The first two lines will be a sufficient specimen of its style:—

Rex cunctorum seculorum. rex arcis ætheris:
Rector poli, rector soli, regum rex altissime.

That he was present at Canterbury, and was an eyewitness of Becket's murder, forms no objection to the presumption that he was a servant of the court, because it is to be recollected that the archbishop was then, at least nominally, reconciled to the king, and it could be considered no other than an act of decent respect for Fitz-Stephen to visit his former patron on his return from a long exile. After the murder had been accomplished King Henry would naturally be anxious to disconnect himself from its perpetration, by carefully avoiding any act which might be construed into a punishment of those who had adhered to the troublesome prelate, independently of his being too wise a prince to deprive himself of the services of a learned and useful man, who had never made himself personally obnoxious.

It would therefore be far from unlikely that a person so situated should not be interfered with in his office; indeed, the reasons adduced would rather operate to promote his further advancement, as tending to remove the suspicions which then certainly attached to the king. Accordingly, his nomination as sheriff of Gloucestershire in the following year can excite no surprise, especially as it was most usual in those times for officers of the Exchequer, or of other branches of the court, to be entrusted with such appointments, and the same reasons would account for the selection of such a man, palpably well experienced in the law, as one of the justiciars in 1176. That the termination of the sheriffalty and the last acts of the justiciar both occur about 1190 or 1191, the period assigned for the death of the biographer, are curious circumstantial corroborations of the conjecture thus ventured. Fitz-Stephen's Life of Becket offers nothing to contradict the supposed identity; but, on the contrary, it is remarkable for being written in a calmer style than that of other partisans, and for not attempting to implicate the king in authorising the murder.

Fitz-Stephen had travelled to France to complete his education, and on his return, his erudition, which was conspicuous both as a scholar and a divine, recommended him to the notice of Becket, with whom he eventually became on terms of familiar intercourse. He is said to have been a monk of Canterbury, and is frequently called Stephanides.

FITZ-TOROLD, NICHOLAS, was one of those selected by the council held at Windsor in 25 Henry II., 1179, as a justice itinerant in one of the four divisions then established for the purpose of administering justice throughout the kingdom. (Madox, i. 79, 139.) His name occurs as a justice itinerant in the following year, and he probably acted subsequently, because, among the pleas of Godfrey de Luci and his companions in Berkshire, entered on the Roll of 1 Richard I. (181), there is an entry which seems to have reference to his misconduct in office—viz., 'Nicholas filius Turoldi redd. Comp. de 45l. 13s. 4d. pro falsa p'sent. plac. Corone et pro falso clam. de averiis detentis.'

FITZ-WARINE, Fulco, is introduced by Dugdale as a justicier of the bench, and in the chronicle of William de Rishanger (33)

it is asserted that William de Wilton and Fulco Fitz-Warine, 'justiciarii regis,' were slain at the battle of Lewes, May 14, 1264. There is no doubt that both these persons met their death at that battle, nor that the former was a justiciary; but Fulco Fitz-Warine, who was a Shropshire baron, is never mentioned even as a justice itinerant. One of his descendants, John Burchier, was created Earl of Bath, a title which became extinct in 1654. The barony then fell into abeyance among the daughters of the fourth earl. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 443; Nicolas.)

FITZ-WARINE, WILLIAM, a younger brother of the above-mentioned Fulco Fitz-Warine, was in the early part of John's reign greatly in the king's favour, receiving a grant of the manor of Dilun in Herefordshire in 6 John, and in 9 John obtaining royal 'litteras deprecatorias' to Gila de Kilpec, urging her to marry him without delay. For this intercession on his behalf he presented the king with an entire horse and a palfrey. (Rot. Claus. i. 25, 28, 43; Rot. de Finibus, 375.) On this lady's death he was again indebted to royalty for a wife, paying a fine of fifty marks, in 2 Henry III., for permission to marry Agnes, one of the sisters and coheirs of John de Wahull, and widow of Robert de Basingeham. He was at this time sheriff of Lincolnshire. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 3, 7; Rot. Claus. i. 380.) In 9 Henry and several following years he was appointed one of the justices itinerant in many other counties, in most of which he had property; and in Easter, 12 Henry III., his name appears upon a fine levied before him, in consequence of which Dugdale has introduced him among the regular justiciars of this reign, but he is not subsequently noticed in a judicial capacity. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77-213.)

The castle of Rockingham was entrusted to him as constable in 10 Henry III., in which year he sent five hundred Welsh to Prince Richard, the king's brother, in Gascony. (Ibid. 110, 130.) In 13 Henry III. he was sheriff of Worcestershire, and executed the same office in Herefordshire in 16 Henry III. and the two following years. During the rest of his life he sustained the part of a loyal knight, assisting his sovereign as one of the lords of the Marches, and attending the king in 37 Henry III. in his expedition to Gascony.

He left an only daughter, Asselina, who married Thomas Lyttelton, ancestor of the eminent judge in the reign of Edward IV.

FITZ-WILLIAM, ADAM, forfeited his property in the county of Hertford in 17 John for his adherence to the barons; but on that king's decease he returned to his allegiance, and was restored to his lands. (Rot. Claus. i. 229, 245, 318.) He appears in a judicial character from 9 to 21 Henry III. as a justice itinerant and one of the regular justiciars at Westminster. (Ibid. ii. 76, 147; Wendover, iv. 469; Orig. Jurid. 42.) There are numerous mandates addressed to him from 18 to 20 Henry III. as one of the king's escheators. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 260-303.)

FITZ-WILLIAM, HUGH. There are so many persons of the name of Hugh Fitz-William who lived about the same period that, without a better clue than has been obtained, it is impossible to decide which was the justice itinerant so called, who, in 30 Henry III., 1246, was appointed with five others to visit the northern counties. From 15 John to 43 Henry III. there are four persons so named on the rolls, all in different counties, and with different wives. (Rot. de Oblatis, 471; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 132, ii. 36, 293.)

FITZ-WILLIAM, ROBERT, was a knight of Nottinghamshire, who, having got into trouble in 17 John, when he was taken in arms against the king in the castle of Beauveur (Belvoir), was compelled to pay a fine of sixty marks for the restoration of the royal favour. (Rot. Pat. 162, 168; Rot. de Finibus, 591.) In 9 Henry III. his name appears among the justices itinerant in Nottingham and Derby. In the following year the sheriff of Cumberland is commanded to cause a successor to be elected in the place of Robert Fitz-William, one of the coroners of that county; and there is every probability that this was the same person, as in 11 Henry III. Ralph Fitzlands and heirs, the sheriff of Nottingham and Derby being commanded to give him seisin of those which were in his bailiwick. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77, 119; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 157.)

FITZ-WILLIAM, OSBERT, in the last year of the reign of Richard I., 1198-9, was one of the justiciars before whom a fine was levied (Hunter's Preface), but his name does not appear in any fine of a subsequent date. He was, perhaps, therefore, merely an officer of the court, which is rendered more probable from his being sheriff or fermor of the county of Devon in 2 John, and of Hereford in 8 and 9 John.

FITZ-WILLIAM, ORHO, from 28 Henry II., 1183, to 2 Richard I., 1190, was sheriff of the united counties of Essex and Hertford. In 1194 he acted as justice itinerant in the same counties, and in that or the previous year he was one of the justiciars before whom a fine was levied at Westminster. (Madox, ii. 20; Hunter's Preface.)

FITZ-WILLIAM, RALPH. The first two justices of trailbaston whose names appear were Ralph Fitz-William and John de Barton. Their commission was dated 1304, and was for Yorkshire, where they both resided, and of which the former was the king's lieutenant. (Hemingford, ed. Hearne, 208.) In the next year new commissions, in which neither of them were named, were issued for all the counties of England, except those in the home district (N. Fœdera, i. 970), showing therefore that the offences which these commissions were intended to suppress were found to be of a more serious nature, and more universally extended, requiring larger powers and more experienced judges.

Ralph Fitz-William was a son of William Fitz-Ralph, of Grimsthorp in Yorkshire, by Joane, daughter of Thomas de Greystock. In 25 Edward I. he was one of the barons summoned to join the king's armies in Scotland. He served with so much zeal and valour in those wars that he was constituted capitaneus of the garrisons and fortresses in Northumberland, lieutenant of Yorkshire, and lord of the Marches, in which character, no doubt, the commission of trailbaston was directed to him. In 23 Edward I. he was present at the siege of Carlaverock, and was engaged in the Scottish wars to the end of the reign.

Under Edward II. he was employed in the same manner, and was made governor of Berwick-upon-Tweed and of Carlisle, was one of the ordainers to regulate the king's household and government, and was frequently appointed, in 8 Edward II., to take inquiries as to wrecks and otherwise. He died about November 1316, and was buried in Nesham Abbey, Durham.

The barony of Greystock was settled upon him by his mother's nephew, John, the last lord of that name, upon whose death, in 1305, he succeeded to it. By his wife Margery, the daughter and one of the coheirs of Hugh de Bolebec, and widow of Nicholas Corbet, he had two sons—William, who died in his father's lifetime, and Robert, who succeeded him, and died in 1317. His descendants assumed the name of Greystock, and held the barony till 1487, when, the then lord dying without issue male, it was, by the marriage of his granddaughter, united to that of Dacre of Gillesland till 1543, when it fell into abeyance among the sisters of George, the fifth Baron Dacre. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 740; Nicolas.)

FLAMBARD, RANULPH (BISHOP OF DURHAM). This extraordinary man was a Norman, whose father was an obscure priest, and whose mother had the reputation of being a witch. He followed the court of the Conqueror into England, and having entered into holy orders, obtained from that prince the church of Godalming in Surrey, in which his name appears as Flambard. According to Domesday Book (fo. 30, 51), he had, besides one hide of the king's land in Bile in Hampshire, three tenements which William held in Guildford, belonging to the church of Godalming. After receiving many pluralities, he became chaplain to Maurice, Bishop of London, but left his service because that prelate refused him the deanery of the church of St. Paul.

He probably held an office in the Chancery under Maurice; and Malmesbury's description of him, as 'invictus caudicus,' shows he was connected with the courts. He is next found in 1088 and 1098 as one of the king's chaplains (Monast. i. 164, 174, 241); and it was not long before he contrived to ingratiate himself with Rufus, and soon discovered his sovereign's profuseness and extravagance. Unprincipled himself, he did not hesitate to suggest measures which, however oppressive to the people, or disreputable to the crown, would produce the desired object of filling the royal coffers. By his instigation, new offences were created for the sake of the fines which followed them; a price was set on crimes by substituting a pecuniary payment for the punishment; the forest laws were loaded with severe penalties; and the impost on the land, so lately established according to the entries in Domesday Book, was disturbed, and rendered more oppressive by a new survey of the kingdom. Not content with this, he drew down upon himself the deepest indignation of the clergy, by suggesting to the king that on the death of any dignitary of the Church, whether bishop or abbot, the temporalities devolved to the crown till the vacancy was supplied. The king was not slow in acting upon this advice; and the injurious effect on the ecclesiastical revenues may be easily conceived; since the parties to whom the Church lands were entrusted in the interim, having paid largely for their use, and knowing how precarious was their tenure, could not be expected to neglect any means, however detrimental to the property, of making the most of their bargain.

Flambard, as may be supposed, obtained the custody of several of these vacant benefices. In 1088 the abbey of Winchester, in 1089 the archbishopric of Canterbury, and in 1092 the bishopric of Lincoln and the abbey of Chertsey were severally entrusted to him; and by the spoil of their churches and the pressure of their tenants, both rich and poor, he did not fail to enrich himself. To these modes of imposition he added another device to supply the royal wants. When any of these vacancies were at last filled, he made a simoniacal contract for the king with the candidate for the clerical honour, compelling him to pay a large sum before he was instituted.

William looked more favourably upon his minister on account of the unpopularity which resulted from these proceedings, saying that he was the only man in his dominions who regarded not the hatred of others so that he pleased his master. His approval was manifested during the remainder of his reign by raising him to high office in the state.

What the precise nature or title of his office was it is difficult to determine. Dugdale introduces him into his list of chief justiciaries. The only historian who gives him that title is Ordericus Vitalis, whose words are 'Summus regiarum procurator opum et justitiarius factus est.' Henry of Huntingdon and Roger de Hoveden style him 'placitator et exactor totius Anglie;' by the former of which titles, Madox says, may be meant chief justicier, and by the latter, intendant of the revenue, or treasurer. Roger de Wendover calls him by the names of 'placitator' and 'procurator regis.'

The only authority of any importance who describes him as chancellor is Spelman; but there is evidently no foundation for supposing that he held that office. He refers to Malmesbury, who says nothing like it; and to Godwin, whose language has been palpably misunderstood. That author, after saying, from Malmesbury, that Ranulph became 'totius regni procurator,' merely adds this explanation: 'Unde illam omnem auctoritatem videtur consequutus, qua hodie potiuntur cancellarius, thesaurarius, et nescio quot alii.'

The office of chief justiciary seems scarcely yet to have been completely established; but, by whatever title Ranulph was distinguished, he was clearly the king's chief minister. The oppressive nature of his exactions naturally caused frequent complaints against him, which being unredressed, the instigator of them became the object of popular indignation, and narrowly escaped the fate that was prepared for him.

Being inveigled, by a pretended message from the Bishop of London, into a boat on the river, he was forced into a ship, and carried out to sea. A storm arising, and his intended murderers quarrelling among themselves, Ranulph took advantage of both, by working upon the fear and gratitude of Gerold, the principal of them, who had formerly been a mariner in his service, and they were prevailed upon to release him, and put him on shore. The terror and amazement of his enemies when, three days afterwards, he appeared in his usual place at court may well be imagined. His appointment to the bishopric of Durham immediately followed, in June 1099, three years and four months having elapsed since the death of William de Carlefo, its last incumbent. The king, however, benefiting by the lessons his minister had taught, made him feel the effect in his own person, by compelling him to pay one thousand pounds for his advancement.

On the death of William Rufus, one of the first acts of Henry was to satisfy the clamours of the people by imprisoning the hated Flambard in the Tower of London, to which he was committed on August 15, 1100. But even in this extremity his good fortune did not desert him. Out of the allowance of two shillings a day which he received for his subsistence (equal to thirty shillings now), with the additional help of his friends, he kept a sumptuous table, and by his affability and his wit captivated his keepers. Encouraging them in their habits of intemperance, he lulled their watchfulness; and on the 4th of the following February, taking advantage of their excess at a feast he had provided, he contrived to escape by means of a rope which his friends had concealed in the bottom of a pitcher of wine, not, however, without cutting his ungloved hands to the bone in the adventure.

He succeeded in obtaining shipping to Normandy, where he instigated the Duke Robert to pursue his claim to the English crown, and accompanied him on his invasion. By the settlement which the policy of Henry then effected, Ranulph, on the retirement of the duke, was permitted to return to his bishopric, and obtained a charter restoring all its immunities.

From this time it does not appear that he interfered further in politics, though Dugdale, on the authority of Matthew Paris, places him in the list of treasurers to Henry I.

The completion of his cathedral, the erection of Norham Castle, the fortification of the walls of Durham, and numerous other works, among which were the endowment of the college of Christchurch, where he had been dean, and the foundation of the priory of Mottisford, near Lincoln, not only are ample proofs of his munificence, but seem sufficient occupation for the remainder of his life. He filled the see rather more than twenty-nine years, and died on September 5, 1128.

The character of Flambard may be collected from the incidents of his life. There can be no doubt that he was an able, artful, and uncompromising minister; that he had considerable eloquence and ready wit; and that he was convivial in his habits and generous in his expenditure. It is evident also that he was ambitious, crafty, prodigal, and rapacious; but some abatement should be made from the unfavourable colouring with which he is painted by the historians, who, writing near his time, and being mostly ecclesiastics, would look with a jaundiced eye on one whom they considered to be the adviser of measures oppressive to the Church. (Godwin, 732; Madox, i. 32, 78; Wendover; Malmesbury; Angl. Sac.; Turner; Lingard.)

FLANDRENSIS, or LE FLEMING, RICHARD, was one of the justiciars before whom fines were levied at Westminster in the last year of Richard's reign, 1198-9, and the first three years of that of King John, 1199-1202. In 3 John and the two following years he held the sheriffalty of Cornwall, and was connected with the receipt of the king's revenue in Devonshire. His property was in the latter county; and he and William Fitz-Stephen in 7 John gave two palfreys for the grant of a market at Dartmouth. In the same year the king, in consideration of six hundred marks and six palfreys, granted to him, and his four sons after him, the custody of the lands in that county and eight others, and the wardship and marriage of the heir of Richard de Greynville. (Rot. de Finibus, 221, 295, 362.)

Either he or his son Richard, it would appear, was with the king in Ireland in 12 John, and the land of a Richard Flandrensis, in Gloucestershire, was given away by the king in 18 John, evidently having been forfeited in the rebellion. (Rot. Claus. i. 261, 283.) But the name being by no means uncommon at the time, it is impossible to say that either of these is of the same family.

FLEMING, THOMAS, was of a family long settled in Hampshire, and many of its members, from the early part of the thirteenth century, held high office in the town of Southampton. He was the son of John Fleming, established at Newport in the Isle of Wight, by his wife Dorothy Harris, and was born there in April 1544. In May 1567 he became a member of Lincoln's Inn, and having been called to the bar in June 1574, he arrived at the bench of that society in 1587, and was elected reader in Lent 1590, and double reader in Lent 1594, on his receiving the degree of the coif. Before the end of the following year he was designated as the successor of Sir Edward Coke in the office of solicitor-general, and even Bacon, who was intriguing for it, acknowledged that he was an able man for the place. In order to hold it, however, it was then deemed necessary that he should vacate the degree of serjeant, when he was replaced as a governor of Lincoln's Inn. (Dugdale's Orig. 254-262; Bacon, xvi. App. LL.)

He attained sufficient eminence in his profession to be brought forward as a candidate for the recordership of London, a post to which, though he then missed it, he was elected in 1594, but resigned it in 1596 on being made solicitor-general. (Maitland's London, 1206.) In 1601 and in 1604 he was returned member for Southampton; and, having been knighted, was on October 27, 1604, raised to the office of chief baron of the Exchequer. Such was the reputation for integrity he had acquired in the House of Commons, that on the meeting after their adjournment it was resolved that, notwithstanding his elevation to the bench, he should still continue a member. (Dutby's Hants, 383.) When advanced on June 25, 1607, to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench, he vacated his seat, and his son was elected for Southampton in his place.

One of the first duties as chief baron was to sit on the trial of the gunpowder conspirators, but he appears to have been quite a silent commissioner. Not so, however, on the great case of impositions by royal authority, which, so important in its ultimate consequence, was tried in Michaelmas 1606. There, after expressing something like indignation that a subject should presume to plead that an act of the king was 'indebite, injuste, et contra leges Angliæ imposita,' he concluded a long argument which, though certainly most learned and ingenious, was anything but conclusive in favour of the crown. The only other important case in which he is recorded to have been engaged is that in which the refusal of the Countess of Shrewsbury to answer interrogatories relative to the marriage of Sir William Seymour with Lady Arabella Stuart, and her connivance in their subsequent escape, was considered before the privy council. It was a preliminary enquiry as to this being an offence in law, and whether it was cognisable in the Star Chamber, and the chief justice's speech, in favour of the affirmative, is curious as containing a recital of the privileges attached to the nobility, and the consequent duties which they are therefore peculiarly called upon to perform. (State Trials, ii. 159-770.)

After presiding over the Court of King's Bench for six years, he died suddenly at Stoneham Park, on August 7, 1613, and was buried in the church of that parish, under a stately monument, on which he is represented in his official costume, with an inscription that he had fifteen children, of whom eight were then living, by his wife, Dorothy, otherwise Mary, daughter of Sir Henry Cromwell, of Hitchinbroke, who was the aunt of the protector. (Dutby's Hants, 385.)

A prejudiced account of him is given by Lord Campbell (Ch. Justices, i. 237), who calls him a 'poor creature;' but Sir Edward Coke (10 Reports, 34), who knew him somewhat better, describes him as discharging all his places 'with great judgement, integrity, and discretion,' adding that 'he well deserved the good will of all that knew him, because he was of a sociable and placable nature and disposition.'

The male branch of the family failed in the early part of the last century, when the Hampshire property, including the Stoneham estate, devolved on the descendants of the great antiquary Browne Willis, who had married a daughter of the house. These assumed the name of Fleming, and the present possessor long represented the county in parliament.

FLOWERDEW, EDWARD, son of John Flowerdew, Esq., of Hetherset, Norfolk, after being educated at Cambridge was admitted a member of the Inner Temple in 1552, appointed reader in 1569 and 1577, and treasurer in 1579. (Dugdale's Orig. 165, 170.) He held a high character as a lawyer, and was the confidential adviser of the dean and chapter of Norwich, having also several annuities granted to him for his good and faithful counsel and advice, all charged on the estates of his clients. In 1580 he was called to the degree of the coif, and was appointed steward or recorder of Great Yarmouth. In 1564 he had purchased Stanfield Hall, at Windham in Norfolk, and taken up his residence there, so that probably his principal practice was in the country, which would account for the omission of his arguments from the Reports. On October 23, 1584, he was raised to the bench of the Exchequer as third baron, and in the following February he was one of the judges appointed to try Dr. Parry for high treason, being the first baron of the Exchequer whose name appears on a similar commission. (Bagu de Secretis: App. 4 Report Pub. Rec. 273.) At the assizes held at Exeter on March 14, 1586, when a contagious and mortal disease broke out, which spread from the prisoners to many of the leading gentlemen of the county, Baron Flowerdew was one of those who were seized with the distemper, of which he died about April 11, and was buried in Hetherset Church. His wife was Elizabeth, daughter of William Foster, of Windham; and their daughter married Thomas, the son of Sir Robert Shelton, knight. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 721-732; Ath. Cantab. ii. 5; Weever, 864; Holinshed, iv. 868.)

FOLIOT, HUGH. Dugdale inserts among the justiciars before whom fines were acknowledged at Westminster in 3 Henry III., 1219, the name of H. Abbot of Ramsey, whom he also notices as a justice itinerant in the same year. This was Hugh Foliot, who, from being prior, was elected abbot of Ramsey in June 1216. (Mitred Abbeyes, 154.) It seems probable that he is the same man who is called archdeacon of Salop in a record dated January 16, 1215, being a pressing application by the king to the Bishop of Hereford relative to the church of St. David's in his behalf, in which he is designated as a man 'magnæ honestatis et scientia et moribus bene ornatum.' (Rot. Claus. i. 203.) The archdeacon was raised to the bishopric of Hereford in November 1219, which would account for his no longer acting as a justiciar; but the doubt whether the abbot and the bishop were identical arises from the discrepancy between the dates given of their deaths, the abbot being stated by Browne Willis to have died in 1231, and the bishop by Godwin (484) on July 26, 1234.

FOLIOT, WALTER, was settled in Berkshire at the beginning of the reign of King John, whom he accompanied to Ireland in the twelfth and fourteenth years of his reign. (Rot. Misc., 178, &c.) In 16 John he was summoned to attend with horses and arms at the castle of Wallingford, in which, by the king's order, the chamber appropriated for the royal wardrobe was assigned for the accommodation of him and his wife and family. Several other entries show that he was either the governor of that castle, or held some other high office in connection with it, and with the county of Berka. In 3 Henry III. he was a justice itinerant into Wiltshire, Hampshire, Berkshire, and Oxfordshire, and sheriff of the latter county in 9 and 10 Henry III.

He died about June 1228, 12 Henry III., and was succeeded by his son Richard. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 172, 426-443.)

FORD, WILLIAM (not Fulford, as Prince erroneously calls him, nor in any manner connected with the Devonshire family of that name), was, according to the only authentic information that exists about him, constituted a baron of the Exchequer in 8 Richard II., 1384, reappointed on the accession of Henry IV., and ceased to act, whether from death or removal, between 1403 and 1407, the entries of the intervening years not having been found.

FORTESCUE, JOHN, is one of the worthies of the county of Devon, of whom it may be justly proud. In Westminster Hall his name is still regarded with reverence, and his principal work, 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ,' after more than three centuries, is referred to as the first treatise that entered minutely into the history of our legal institutions and described the professional education and habits of the period. The works of his three predecessors, Glanville, Bracton, and Hengham, were no doubt more useful to the legal student and forensic practitioner; but that of Fortescue offered greater attractions to general readers by its popular form and its historical details; and the consequence is that, while the former have become almost obsolete, the latter is still read with interest by the curious and philosophical enquirer.

The family traces its origin, without the loss of a single link, to the knight who bore the shield before William the Norman on his invasion of England, the assumed name commemorating the fact. His son Sir Adam, who was with him in the battle, received as the reward of their joint services, among other lands, the manor of Wimondeston or Winstone in the parish of Modberry, Devon. King John confirmed the grant, and it remained in possession of the family till the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Two accounts are given of the judge's actual parentage; but, discarding that which makes him the son of Sir Henry Fortescue, the chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland from June 1426 to February 1429, who was really his brother, the most probable seems to be that his father was Sir John Fortescue, knighted by Henry V. for his prowess in the French wars, and made governor of Meaux, which he had helped to reduce. This knight was a second son of William Fortescue of Winstone, and was himself seated at Shepham. He married Joan, the daughter and heir of Henry Norreis, of Norreis in the parish of North-Huish in Devonshire, by whom he had several children, the two elder being the above-mentioned Sir Henry, the Irish chief justice, and Sir John, who obtained the same rank in England.

John Fortescue is supposed to have been born at Norreis, the estate of his mother. The date of his birth must have been about the close of the fourteenth century. He received his education at Exeter College, Oxford, and pursued his legal studies at Lincoln's Inn, where he was a governor of the house from 1424 to 1429. (Dugdale's Orig. 257.) In Michaelmas Term of the latter year he took the degree of a serjeant-at-law, and from that time his arguments frequently occur in the Year Books. In 18 and 19 Henry VI. he acted as a judge of assize on the Norfolk Circuit (Kal. Erc. iii. 381), and at Easter in the latter year, 1441, he was named one of the king's serjeants.

So conspicuous were his merits that he was, without taking any intermediate step, raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench on January 25, 1442. In that court we have proof from the Year Books that he presided till Easter Term 1460, and no new chief justice is recorded until Edward IV. a few months afterwards seized the throne.

His salary on his appointment was 120 marks (120*l.*) a year, besides 5*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* for a robe at Christmas, and 3*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* for another at Midsummer. In addition to this he received in the following February a grant for life of one dolium of wine annually, to which a second was added in the next year. These two dolia (tunnies) of wine are expressly reserved to him by the act of resumption in 34 Henry VI. In March 1447, 40*l.* a year was granted him beyond his former allowances. (Rymer, xi. 28; Rot. Parl. v. 317.)

It has been a question how far Sir John Fortescue was justified in calling himself as he does in the title to his work 'De Laudibus,' Cancellarius Angliæ, a title which he reiterates in his retraction of what he had written against the house of York, by making the interlocutor in the dialogue say to him, 'Considering that ye were the chief chancellor to the said late king.' (Selden's Preface.)

Let us then follow him in his career, and see at what time he could have received the office after Easter 1460, up to which time he acted in the King's Bench.

The fatal battle of Northampton was fought on July 10, 1460, and three days before it the Chancellor Waynflete resigned the Seals in the king's tent on the field. Fortescue was clearly not appointed then, for the Seals were in the custody of Archbishop Bourchier on the 25th of that month, when the king delivered them to George Neville, Bishop of Exeter, the new chancellor. A parliament was held in the following October, which was opened by that prelate as Chancellor of England. Fortescue does not appear in that parliament in his usual place as a trier of petitions; but neither does Prisot, the chief justice of the other bench. Of the four judges who were among the triers of petitions, only one, John Markham, was of the Court of King's Bench (Rot. Parl. v. 401), of whom there is no evidence whatever to show that he became chief justice till the next reign. Neither is he named among the judges who were called upon, and refused, to give their opinion on the claim of the Duke of York. Henry continued under the control of his enemies till February 17, 1461, the second battle of St. Albans, and his reign practically expired on March 4, when Edward assumed the throne. At the battle of Towton on Palm Sunday, March 29, Fortescue was present, and when the field was lost fled with King Henry. That unfortunate monarch went first into Scotland, then into Wales, and afterwards lay concealed in the north of England until he was betrayed and taken to the Tower of London in June 1465. There he remained in durance till his temporary restoration in October 1470. During this period the Great Seal remained in the hands of Bishop Neville till June 1467, and then was transferred to those of Bishop Stillington; so that, without its possession, any appointment of Sir John Fortescue would have been merely illusory, and in fact could only have been legitimately recognised if made between February 17 and March 4, 1461. During the six months of Henry's renewed reign, from October 1470 to April 1471, it is certain that Fortescue did not hold the post, as Neville, then Archbishop of York, is expressly mentioned as chancellor. (Rymer, xi. 672.) It must therefore be concluded that his title was a nominal one, given during the exile of Henry, and that the dictum of Chief Justice Finch, rather oddly introduced into his argument upon ship-money in the reign of Charles I., is correct, that Fortescue was never actual Chancellor of England. (State Trials, iii. 1225.)

In the first parliament of Edward IV. Fortescue was attainted of high treason as one of those engaged in the battle of Towton, and all his possessions were forfeited to the king, who granted part of them to Lord Wenlock. (Rot. Parl. v. 477, 581.) He clearly was at some time in Scotland, going there probably with King Henry, for in his petition to King Edward some years afterwards he refers to the works he had written against his title to the crown 'in Scotland and elleswhere.' (Ibid. vi. 69.) About 1463 he was with the queen and prince, but without the king, 'at Seynte Mighel in Barroys' (in Lorraine), from which place he addressed a letter in December to the Earl of Ormond, then in Portugal, in which he describes himself, not as chancellor, but simply as one of the knights who were there with the queen. They must all have been much straitened for the means of living, for he says, 'We buth all in grete poverté, but yet the queene susteyneth us in mete and drinke, so as we buth not in extreme necessite.' He remained in Lorraine for some time, and it was probably while there that he composed his learned work 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ' for the instruction of the young prince.

During the whole of this time Sir John was energetically negotiating for the restoration of King Henry, and did not return with the queen to England till April 1471, after the battle of Barnet. His age did not prevent him, as we learn from Warkworth, from being present at the battle of Tewkesbury on May 4, 1471, where he was taken prisoner; but it no doubt exempted him from suffering under the subsequent execution of the Lancastrians. His royal master and his princely pupil being now both dead, no hope could remain for the party to which he had been devoted. Further opposition, therefore, to the ruling powers would have been fruitless, and the desire of peace for the short remainder of his life, and of obtaining a restoration of his property for his family was probably all that could now influence him. These feelings no doubt operated to produce the retraction, spoken of by Selden, of all he had previously written against Edward's title, and this it is apparent on the record was one of the causes of that monarch's reconciliation with him, and of the reversal of his attainder in October 1473, 13 Edward IV., when he was reappointed a privy councillor.

How long he lived afterwards is very uncertain. The only afterwards recorded notice of him is in February 1476, when he delivered into the Exchequer an assize that had been taken before him while chief justice. (Kal. Exch. iii. 8.) Over his remains, at Ebrington in Gloucestershire, is a tomb on which he is represented at full length in his robes as chief justice. His seat there still belongs to the family.

He married Isabella, daughter of John Jamys, Esq., of Philips Norton in Somersetshire, not, as several biographers erroneously state, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Miles Stapleton. From his grandson John descended Sir Hugh Fortescue, created in 1721 Lord Clinton, and in 1746 Lord Fortescue of Castle Hill, Devon, and Earl Clinton. In the latter barony he was succeeded, under a special limitation, by his half-brother Matthew, whose son Hugh was in 1789 advanced to the titles of Viscount Ebrington and Earl Fortescue, which still flourish. Besides Sir John Fortescue-Aland, already recorded as Lord Fortescue of Credan in Ireland, a third descendant was created in 1777 Earl Clermont in Ireland, who is represented by the present Lord Clermont, under a new creation, whose handsome edition of all Sir John's works has recently been printed—we are sorry to add, for private circulation only.

FORTESCUE, LEWIS, was the third son of John Fortescue, of Spurlston in Devonshire (descended from William of Winston, the elder brother of Sir John, the father of the eminent chief justice), and Alice, daughter of John Cookworthy, his wife. His legal studies were completed at the Middle Temple, where he became reader in autumn 1636. On August 6, 1642, he was constituted fourth baron of the Exchequer, but only sat there for about three years.

By his marriage with Elizabeth, the daughter and sole heir of John Fortescue, Esq., of Fallapit (lineally descended from Sir Henry Fortescue, the chief justice of Ireland), he acquired that property, which came in regular succession to Sir Edmund Fortescue, who received a baronetcy in 1664, which became extinct in 1682. (Dugdale's Orig. 216.)

FORTESCUE, LORD. See J. FORTESCUE-ALAND.

FORTESCUE, WILLIAM, lineally descended from the celebrated judge Sir John Fortescue, was the son of Hugh Fortescue, of Buckland Filleigh, and Agnes, daughter of Nicholas Dennis, of Barnstaple. He was admitted to the Middle Temple in September 1710, but removing to the Inner Temple in November 1714, he was called to the bar by the latter society in July 1715.

Sir Robert Walpole, when chancellor of the Exchequer, made him his secretary, and he was returned to parliament as member for Newport in Hampshire at the beginning of the reign of George II., and sat for that borough till 1736. He became attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, and king's counsel in 1730, and a baron of the Court of Exchequer on February 9, 1736. On July 7, 1738, he was removed to the Common Pleas, and after nearly six years' experience on both these benches he received the appointment of master of the Rolls on November 5, 1741, and sat there till his death on December 15, 1749, when he was buried in the Rolls Chapel.

Though considered a good lawyer, he is better known for his intimacy with the wits and literary men of the time. The friendship that existed between him and Pope appears in their correspondence, and he is reputed to have furnished the poet with the famous case of Stradling versus Stiles in Scriblerus's Reports. His mother after his father's death married Dr. Gilbert Budgell, who by his first wife was the father of the unfortunate poet Eustace Budgell. Mr. Fortescue married Mary, the daughter and co-heir of Edmund Fortescue, Esq., of Fallapit, and left an only daughter. (Collins's Peerage, v. 342; Parl. Hist. viii. 610; Noble's Granger, iii. 296.)

FOSTER, MICHAEL, was of legal descent, both his father and grandfather being attorneys in the town of Marlborough, with the reputation, eminently deserved, of being honest lawyers. He was born on December 16, 1689, and after attending the free school at Marlborough entered Exeter College, Oxford, in May 1705, and was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May 1713. In 1720 he published 'A Letter of Advice to Protestant Dissenters,' to which class his family belonged. Little known in Westminster Hall, he pursued his profession principally as a provincial counsel, first in his native town, and then at Bristol, to which city he removed after his marriage in 1725 with Martha, daughter of James Lyde, of Stantonwick in its neighbourhood. In 1735 he issued a learned tract entitled 'An Examination of the Scheme of Church Power, laid down in the Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani,' which went through several editions, and of course led to a controversy on ecclesiastical law. In August of the same year he was appointed recorder of Bristol, and took the degree of serjeant in the following Easter Term.

In his character of recorder several very important questions came before him. Among others was the right of the city of Bristol to try capital offences committed within its jurisdiction, and the legality of pressing mariners for the public service. The former arose in 1741 in the case of the atrocious murder of Sir Dineley Goodere by his brother Captain Goodere, who was convicted, and the city authority fully established. The latter was the case of Alexander Broadfoot, indicted in 1743 for the murder of Cornelius Calahan, who was killed in an attempt to press the prisoner. On this occasion the recorder delivered a long opinion in support of the legality of imprisonment, but directed the jury to find Broadfoot guilty of manslaughter only, because Calahan had acted without any legal warrant. (State Trials, xvii. 1003, xviii. 1323.)

On April 22, 1745, he was sworn in as a judge of the King's Bench, and knighted, and for the long period of eighteen years he maintained the high judicial character he had established as recorder of Bristol. He was equally distinguished for his learning, his integrity, his firmness, and his independence. Three of his contemporaries who practised under him, and afterwards gained eminence as judges, have given testimony of his excellence. Lord Chief Justice De Grey says of him, 'He may truly be called the Magna Charta of liberty of persons as well as of fortune.' (3 Wilson, 203.) Sir William Blackstone (Commentaries, iv. 2) alludes to him as 'a very great master of the crown law;' and Lord Thurlow, in a letter written in 1758, describes his spirited conduct in the trial of an indictment for a nuisance in obstructing a common footway through Richmond Park. (Life of Foster, 85.) The general impression of his disposition may be collected from the passage in Churchill's 'Rosciad':—

Each judge was true and steady to his trust,
As Mansfield wise, and as old Foster just.

He died on November 7, 1763, and was buried in the church of Stanton Drew.

Besides the works mentioned above he published his 'Report of the Proceedings on the Commission for the Trials of the Rebels in 1746, and other Crown Cases,' in which the doctrines of the criminal law are very learnedly discussed. It is a work of very high authority, and two subsequent and enlarged editions have been issued under the superintending care of his nephew Michael Dodson, Esq., who was also author of a memoir of the judge's life, from which much has been extracted in the present sketch.

FOSTER, THOMAS, was born about 1549. He belonged to the family of Foster in Northumberland, one of whom was gentleman usher to Queen Mary, and another, Sir John Foster, his second cousin, was made a knight banneret at Musselburgh for his valour in defeating the Scots. (Gent. Mag. lxxxiv. pt. i. 341.)

He entered the Inner Temple in 1571, described as of Hunsdon, Herts, and became reader in autumn 1596. He being one of the persons designated by Queen Elizabeth to be serjeants two months before her death, the writ was renewed by King James, and he assumed the coif in Easter Term 1603, and was afterwards counsel to Queen Anne and Prince Henry.

On November 24, 1607, he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, and sat in that court for four years and a half, performing his duties in such a manner as to acquire the character of 'a grave and reverend judge, and of great judgment, constancy, and integrity.' (10 Coke's Reports, 235.) He was nominated by Thomas Sutton to be one of the first governors of his hospital—the Charterhouse.

He died on May 18, 1612, and was buried at Hunsdon in Hertfordshire, under a massive arched monument of variegated marble, with an effigy of the judge in his robes. His town residence was in St. John Street. The under-mentioned Robert was one of his sons.

FOSTER, ROBERT, the youngest son of the above Sir Thomas Foster, was born about 1589. Destined for his father's profession, he was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in January 1610, and in autumn 1631 attained the post of reader. In May 1636 he was created a serjeant, and on January 27, 1640, was promoted to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas, and knighted. He joined the king on his retiring to Oxford, and that university conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws on January 31, 1643. Upon the execution of Captain Turpin in 1644, the House of Commons ordered the judges who had condemned him to be impeached of high treason, and proceedings were taken against Serjeant Glanville, who was in their power; but against the two chief justices and Justice Foster, who were also concerned in the trial, no further measures were adopted. The steady adherence of the latter to the royal cause, however, was not likely to go unpunished. An ordinance was accordingly passed on November 24, 1645, disabling him and four of his colleagues from being judges, 'as though they were dead,' and he was obliged to purchase his peace by compounding for his estate. (Wood's Fasti, ii. 44; Rymer, xx. 20, 380; Whitelocke, 93, 181.)

On the restoration of Charles II. he was immediately restored to his seat in the Common Pleas on May 31, 1660, and within five months, on October 21, was advanced to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench. During the three years that he presided in the court he was much engaged in the trials of the Fifth Monarchy men and other conspirators against the state, and also of the Quakers Crook, Grey, and Bolton, for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. It would have been well if he had confined himself to these judicial duties, but his memory is tarnished by his conduct in Sir Harry Vane's case. When the prisoner was convicted, and both houses of parliament had petitioned for his life, which the king had promised, the chief justice is reported to have urged his execution, saying 'God intended his mercy only for the penitent.'

Sir Robert's death occurred on October 4, 1663, while on circuit, and his remains were deposited under a handsome monument in the church of Egham, in which parish his family residence was situate, still called Great Foster House. (1 Siderfin, 2, 153; State Trials, vi. 188.)

FOUNTAINÉ, JOHN. Alternately a royalist and parliamentarian, this lawyer was commonly called Turncoat Fountaine. A monumental inscription in the church of Salle in Norfolk proves him to have been the eldest son of Arthur Fountaine, of Dalling in that county, one of the sons of another Arthur Fountaine, of Salle. His mother was Anne, the daughter and heir of John Stanhow. (Pedigree in Herald's Coll., Norfolk, ii. 82.) The Lincoln's Inn books confirm this description, and record his admission to that house on October 30, 1622, and his call to the bar on June 21, 1629. A. Wood (Fasti, i. 473, 497) has evidently mistaken for him a member of another family of the same name settled in Bucks.

When the civil war broke out in 1642 John Fountaine showed his devotion to the crown by refusing to contribute to the subscription required by the parliament, whereupon the House of Commons committed him 'to the Gatehouse' on October 12, and Whitelocke in stating the facts adds, 'But, afterwards, he and many others refused, and again assisted on both sides, as they saw the wind to blow.' (Com. Journ. ii. 804; Whitelocke, 63.)

He was still in confinement on December 20, when his petition to be bailed was refused. (Com. Journ. ii. 896.) His discharge from custody was probably granted on condition of his leaving London, for Clarendon (86) mentions him in 1645 as assisting and counselling Sir John Stawel in forming the Association of the Four Western Counties, and calls him a 'lawyer of eminency, who had been imprisoned and banished London for his declared affection to the crown.' He is said to have joined Sir Anthony Astley Cooper in a project to raise a third army to force both parties to put an end to the civil war. (Locke's Works [1768], iv. 234.)

As long as the royal cause prospered Fountaine remained its staunch adherent, but as soon as he considered it was hopeless he deserted Oxford, and went over to the enemy under Colonel Rainsborough at Woodstock. The colonel announced his 'coming in,' and his being then at Aylesbury, to the Commons, who, evidently distrusting him, ordered that he 'should be sent prisoner to Bristol, and that Major-General Skippon should take care to keep him in safe custody.' (Com. Journ. April 25, 1646; Whitelocke, 202.) During the fortnight he was at Aylesbury he published a 'Letter to Dr. Samuel Turner concerning the Church and its Revenues,' urging him to advise the king, for the sake of peace, and to 'save what is left,' to concede all the parliament required, bishops and Church lands, and all. Dr. Richard Steuart wrote an answer (Wood's Athen. iii. 297), in which he calls the writer 'an Oxford Londoner,' and reminds him, in reference to his profession of 'reason and honesty,' of a sentence he was wont to utter, that 'when vessels do once make such noises as these, 'tis a shrewd sign they are empty.'

On his release he appears to have remained quiet for the next six years, and so far to have satisfied the parliament as to be appointed in January 1652 one of the committee of persons, not members, to take into consideration what inconveniences existed in the law, and to suggest remedies. He was fully cleared from his former delinquency in March 1653, compounding for his estate at 480*l.* (Whitelocke, 520; Com. Journ. vii. 69-268.) He must have acquired some reputation as a lawyer, as he was made a serjeant-at-law on November 27, 1658, in the short reign of the Protector Richard.

The Long Parliament, on its restoration, selected him on June 3, 1659, for one of the three commissioners of the Great Seal for five months, but before that term expired the Committee of Safety superseded the commission. He, however, was replaced on January 17, 1660, on the Long Parliament again resuming the government, and with his colleagues continued in possession of the Seal till its commonwealth emblems were defaced, and the Broad Seal of the monarchy restored. On the return of Charles II. he resumed his old political creed, and was immediately confirmed in his degree of the cof. (Noble, i. 438; Whitelocke, 650, 693; 1 Siderfin, 3.)

Pursuing his profession, he resided in Boswell Court, and survived the Restoration eleven years. He died on June 4, 1671, and was buried at Salle, the seat of his ancestors. His first wife died in 1642; his second was Theodosia, daughter of Sir Edward Harrington, Bart. By both he left a family, among the descendants of whom were several eminent churchmen.

Richard Baxter (Reliquie, pt. 3, 187) speaks highly of his piety, integrity, and liberality, and states that he received during the serjeant's life an annuity of 10*l.* from the time of his being silenced.

FOXLE, JOHN DE, had the custody of the temporalities of the vacant abbey of Westminster in 1 Edward II., 1307. On February 28, 1309, he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer. Besides performing the duties of that court, he was frequently named in commissions, and appointed to take inquests by the parliament, and called upon to act as a justice of assize and of oyer and terminer in the provinces as late as 17 Edward II.

He died in 18 Edward II., possessed of considerable property in the counties of Hants, Berks, and Buckingham, part of which was granted to him by the king. His wife's name was Constanca. (Madox, i. 314, ii. 60; Parl. Writs, ii. 891; Rot. Parl. i. 298-345; Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 318; Abb. Orig. i. 199-283.)

FRAMPTON, ROBERT, is introduced by Dugdale as a baron of the Exchequer in 1444, with no other authority than a MS. volume belonging to the keeper of the wardrobe. He was the son of John Frampton, of Morton in the county of Dorset, by Edith, daughter of Sir Matthew Stawell, of Catherston, Somersetshire. By his wife Alicia he left a son Robert, but this branch is said to have failed for want of male issue. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iv. 100, 271, 326.)

FRANCHEVILL, WILLIAM DE, was lord of the manor of Garboldesham in Norfolk, of which his father, also named William, had a grant from Hugh de Montfort. From 8 to 11 Henry III. several mandates are addressed to him and other gentlemen of the county to take assizes as to lands claimed by the Church, and as to the right of presentation. In 9 Henry III. he was one of the justices itinerant for Norfolk and Suffolk. (Rot. Claus. i. 592, ii. 77, 83, 157.) He left a son William.

FRANK, JOHN, was of a Norfolk family, and was probably the son of John Frank, of Norwich, and Alice his wife. (Acts Privy Council, ii. 149.) He was a clerk or master in Chancery in 2 Henry V., 1414, in which reign he was also clerk of the parliament, receiving 40*l.* a year as his salary for that duty. (Ibid. v. 106.) He was collated archdeacon of Suffolk on November 10, 1421 (Le Neve, 221); and on October 28, 1423, was constituted keeper of the Rolls in Chancery. During the absence at Calais of the chancellor John Stafford, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Great Seal was placed in his hands for a month, from April 22 to May 23, 1433. He held the office of master of the Rolls till May 13, 1438. By his will he bequeathed 100*l.* to purchase lands for the maintenance of four fellows of Oriel College, Oxford, from Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, and Devon. (Chalmers' Oxford, 79.)

FRAUNCEYS, JOHN LE, or FRANCIGENA, as he is sometimes called, was the son of Hugh le Fraunceys. He was a servant of the crown, and acted as an escheator in the north of England. In 25 Henry III., 1241, he was assigned with the sheriff of Cumberland to extend the lands of John de Veteri Ponte, deceased. Some other similar entries occur in 29 and 31 Henry III. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 349, 427, ii. 7.) In 27 Henry III. Robert de Veteri Ponte gave him the manor of Meburn in Cumberland, and he held the church of Caldebec in that county. (Abb. Placit. 120, 169.)

He is introduced by Madox (i. 615, ii. 318) among the barons of the Exchequer from 27 to 42 Henry III., 1243-57. It is probable that for some short time he was one of the regular justices, as assizes were ordered to be taken before him in Cumberland and Norfolk, in July 1254, and July 1255. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 192, 211.)

He died in 52 Henry III., when his property lay in the six counties of Lincoln, Bedford, York, Kent, Westmoreland, and Cumberland.

FRAUNCEYS, JOHN, was probably the nephew of the above John le Fraunceys, but the various and discordant circumstances mentioned in the entries connected with the name in the reign of Edward I. will give some idea of the difficulty in tracing any individual to whom it belonged.

In the parliament of 18 Edward I., when Thomas de Weyland, the chief justice, was disgraced, there is a petition from one John Fraunceys, who had been imprisoned for a year and a half in the Fleet by that judge for a debt which Agnes de Valence claimed from him; and he was ordered to be bailed. In the same parliament there is a petition which charges John Frauncies with a murder, for which he had been acquitted, and a new trial is prayed for by reason of his kindred and his confederates having tried the appeal. In 35 Edward I. a John Fraunceys represents that he was taken in the battle of Roeslyn, had lost his horses, arms, and everything he had, and was detained in a Scotch prison for fifty-seven weeks, and only released on payment of a fine of forty marks; and he therefore prays for the grant of certain land in Staffordshire, the particulars of which are ordered to be reported to the king. And in the same parliament held at Carlisle, Master John Fraunceys, rector of Queldryk, is one of the proctors sent by the clergy of the diocese of York. (Rot. Parl. i. 47, 49, 191-193.)

The last of these was probably the subject of the present notice, as the duty to which he was appointed was commonly performed by some officer in the court. Master John Fraunceys was a clerk in the Chancery, and on May 12, 1310, 3 Edward II., on the Great Seal being surrendered by the chancellor John de Langton, Bishop of Chichester, was one of the three persons under whose seals it was placed in the wardrobe, a proceeding which scarcely warrants his being included in the list of keepers. He was among the 'dilecti clerici' to whom, with others, the correction of the ordinances was submitted by the king in 5 Edward II. (Ibid. 447.)

FRAY, JOHN, so early as in the reign of Richard II. held the manor of Coldridge, or Codered, in Hertfordshire, for which county he was returned to parliament in 8 Henry V. (Chauncy, 67.) In 2 Henry VI., being then recorder of London, he was one of the commissioners appointed to enquire into the treasons of John Mortimer. He was raised to the bench as a baron of the Exchequer in 4 Henry VI., 1425 (Cal. Rot. Pat. 273), and is mentioned in that character on July 15, 1428. (Rot. Parl. iv. 202, 334.) Dugdale does not introduce him into that court till February 8, 1435, but that is the date of his advancement to be the second baron. (Acts Privy Council, iv. 295.) In every year after the seventh year he was sent as a justice of assize into Norfolk (Ibid. iii. 283; Kal. Exch. iii. 381), from which it may be inferred that he was a serjeant-at-law. He sat as second baron for twelve months only, being raised to the office of chief baron on February 9, 1436, and presided in the court for twelve years, till May 2, 1448. Two years afterwards we find him delivering a silver seal out of the treasury to the new chancellor, Cardinal Kempe, being described as 'deputatum Jacobi Fenys, militis,' the treasurer of England. In the same year an act was passed (Rot. Parl. v. 196) for the resumption of all the king's grants, from which was excepted 40*l.* yearly out of 100 marks given to him for life out of the ferm of London and Middlesex, with a yearly robe, vesture, and furrure.

Among his possessions in Hertfordshire was the manor of Munden, in right of which he had the patronage of Rowheiny or Rowney nunnery; which, by a licence in 37 Henry VI., he transferred to a chantry he had founded in the church of the nunnery, to be called the chantry of St. John the Baptist of Rowney, for a perpetual chaplain to pray for the souls of the founders and for the good estate of the king, &c., and of John Fray. (Monast. iv. 342.)

There is no other evidence of the part he took in the contest between the Roses, except that he made a loan (perhaps a compulsory one) of 200*l.* to King Edward IV. in his first year. (Rot. Parl. v. 471.) At the close of that year, 1461, he died, and was buried in the church of St. Bartholomew the Little in London. He left large estates in the counties of Bedford, Essex, and Hertford, which, as he had no sons, were divided among his five daughters. His wife Agnes, or Annes, one of the daughters of John Danvers, of Cothorp, Northamptonshire, and sister of the judges

Sir Robert and Sir William Danvers, survived him till 1478, having since his death had two other husbands—viz., John, Lord Wenlock, who was killed in the field of Tewkesbury in 1471; and Sir John Say, knight, who also died before her. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iv. 309, 390; Morant, ii. 592; Test. Vetust. 297, 347.)

FRENINGHAM, RALPH DE, held a canonry of St. Paul's, to which he was appointed in 1270. Fines were levied before him as a justice of the Common Pleas from 3 to 6 Edward I., 1275–8. (Dugdale's Orig. 21, 44.) He died in 15 Edward I., and one of his descendants, residing at East Farleigh, was sheriff of Kent in 17 Edward II. (Parl. Writs, i. 623; 3 Report Pub. Rec. App. ii. 209; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 279.)

FREVILLE, GEORGE, was a descendant of a noble family of the fourteenth century. He was the second son of Robert Freville, of Little Shelford in Cambridgeshire, and Rose [Peyton], his wife.

Commencing his legal studies at Barnard's Inn, he completed them at the Middle Temple, where he was twice reader, in 1558 and 1559. On the first occasion his duties were performed by the celebrated Edmund Plowden, and the second occasion is remarkable from the fact that on the 31st of the previous January Queen Elizabeth had constituted him third baron of the Exchequer, thus affording an evidence that the degree of the coif was not yet a necessary qualification for those who sat on that bench. He became second baron on April 23, 1564, and remained in that place till June 1, 1579.

He was elected recorder of Cambridge in 1553, but was successfully opposed in 1559, when he was appointed a baron. (Athen. Cantab. i. 407, ii. 92.)

FRISKENEY, WALTER DE, whose name was derived from a parish so called in the county of Lincoln, is mentioned as a counsel in the Year Book of Edward II., and in the fourth year of that reign was summoned, with six others, as an assistant to the parliament then held. He was added to several judicial commissions in his own county in 7, 8, and 11 Edward II.

He was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on August 6, 1320, 14 Edward II., and, besides being frequently employed as a justice in the country, he was one of those who were empowered to pronounce the judgment upon the Mortimers in 16 Edward II. On July 9, 1323, he was removed from the Exchequer and appointed a judge of the Common Pleas. Remaining, as it seems evident, in that court till the end of the reign, he was reappointed to the same court six days after the accession of Edward III., viz., on January 31, 1327. On March 6 following, however, he was placed in the King's Bench, where he sat till Trinity Term in the second year, when the last notice of him occurs in the Year Book. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 897.)

FROWYK, THOMAS. From the time of Henry III. the records of the city of London afford evidence of the respectability and opulence of the family of Frowyk. In that reign the conduit in Newgate Street was built at the charge of Henry Frowyk and Sir Henry Basynges; under Edward I. and II. Thomas and Roger were successively goldsmiths to the king, and Simon was an alderman. Under Edward III. one of the assessors of the subsidy in Middlesex was Henry de Frowyk, and another of the same name gave lands for the support of four chaplains for the chantry in the chapel of 'St. Marie Gyhalle, London.' In that reign also John de Frowyk was prior of St. John of Jerusalem in Ireland, and chancellor of that kingdom, and Thomas de Frowyk was a justice of labourers and coroner and clerk of the King's House of Merchants. In the reign of Henry VI. Henry de Frowyk was an alderman and twice lord mayor of London, and justiciary of the German merchants in that city: and in the seventh year of Edward IV. Thomas Frowyk was a member of the parliament then assembled. (Newcome's St. Albans, 334; Rot. Parl. i. 474, ii. 426, 455, iv. 308, v. 634; Palgrave's Merchant and Friar, 140; Cal. Rot. Pat. 163, 174, 285; Devon's Issue Roll, 122, 128; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 198, ii. 34, 229; Maitland's London, 1195.)

The latter was probably the father of the chief justice, who was born at the manor of Gunnersbury in the parish of Ealing, Middlesex. His mother was daughter and heir of Sir John Sturgeon, knight.

Fuller states that the judge died before he was full forty years old, so that he must have been born about the year 1466, and in Keilwey's Reports his death is recorded to have occurred 'in florida juventute sua.'

He was educated at Cambridge, and studied the law in the Inner Temple. From this society he was called to the degree of serjeant at the end of Trinity Term 1494 (Y. B. 9 Henry VII. fo. 23 b), and he attained such eminence in his practice as to be preferred, on September 30, 1502, to the high office of chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, when he received the honour of knighthood. By a manifest error, an entry in the Year Books (15 Henry VII. fo. 13) would seem to fix his elevation three years earlier, as he is subsequently mentioned as counsel.

This 'oracle of the law,' as Fuller calls him, presided in his court only four years, and dying on October 17, 1506, was buried in the church of Finchley. His wife's name was Elizabeth; by her he left two daughters, between whom his estate was divided.

Elizabeth, the eldest, was married to the after-mentioned Sir John Spelman.

FRYSTON, RICHARD, had the custody from March 7 to May 12, 1470, of the Great Seal during the absence of the chancellor, Bishop Stillington. He was at that time a clerk or master in the Chancery, which office he had held since 1450, and continued to hold as late as 1472, 12 Edward IV. (Rot. Parl. v. 227-571, vi. 3.) During the above two months bills in Chancery were addressed to him as keeper, and not to the chancellor, although the latter still retained his office and received the Seal back from Fryston's hands on May 12. (Introduct. Proceedings in Chancery, temp. Eliz. vol. i.)

FULBURN, WILLIAM DE, was no doubt a native of the place of that name in Cambridgeshire. He held an office in the court in the reign of Edward II., and was sent into that county and Huntingdonshire to instruct and assist the sheriffs in arresting the Knights Templars. Besides being employed in special commissions for the trial of offenders, he was on June 1, 1323, 16 Edward II., constituted a baron of the Exchequer, and having filled that office during the remainder of the reign, was reappointed on the accession of Edward III. The latest occurrence of his name is in a commission dated May 11, 1328, 2 Edward III. (Parl. Writs, ii. 900; Rot. Parl. ii. 25, 208.)

FULCON, ROBERT, before whom frequent assizes were holden from September 1267, is not introduced into Dugdale's list until May 15, 1271, 55 Henry III., when he was appointed a justice of the Common Pleas. As he was clearly raised to the bench at the former date, it is not improbable that he sat in the King's Bench for the intervening period.

That he was continued in his office on the accession of Edward I. appears from fines being levied before him till about Michaelmas in the second year of this reign (Dugdale's Orig. 42), and he is mentioned as a justice itinerant till 15 Edward I., probably retaining his position on the bench. (Rot. Parl. i. 4, 186; Abb. Placit. 202.)

FULTHORPE, ROGER DE, was the second son of Alan de Fulthorpe, of Fulthorpe, county Durham, where the family had been settled for several generations. He began his career as an advocate about 34 Edward III., 1366, and was made a king's serjeant in the thirty-ninth year. In 47 Edward III. he was one of the three commissioners assigned to hear and determine the dispute between Henry Lord Percy and William Douglas respecting the custody of the marches of the kingdom of England near Scotland. (Issues Eccl. 195.) His elevation to the bench of the Common Pleas took place in the following year, on November 28, 1374, and, having been reappointed on the commencement of the new reign, he was knighted in 1385, and fines were continued to be levied before him till Midsummer 1387. (Leland's Collect. 185; Dugdale's Orig. 45.)

In the following August he was summoned to the council at Nottingham with the other judges, where, according to his own plea, he was compelled by the menaces of the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Tresilian, to put his seal to the questions and answers already prepared by the latter, declaring the ordinance of the last parliament appointing eleven commissioners for the regulation of the kingdom to be illegal, and denouncing the promoters of it to be guilty of high treason. He and his colleagues were impeached for this act in the next parliament, and, notwithstanding the above excuse, were sentenced to death, which, however, was eventually commuted to banishment to Ireland for life, with forfeiture of all their property. Sir Robert was confined to the city of Dublin, and three miles round it, and he had an allowance of 40*l.* a year. (Rot. Parl. iii. 223-244.)

It is somewhat surprising that the same measure of severity should be meted to him as to his colleagues, since it appears by his plea that he immediately communicated the act he had done under fear of his life to the Earl of Kent, so that it was through his means that the lords, who were likely to be endangered by this extra-judicial opinion, had the earliest opportunity of securing themselves against the consequences. It was perhaps, however, on this account that in the same year an allowance of 40*l.* per annum was made to his son William out of the forfeited estates during his father's life, and that two years afterwards many of his father's manors and lands were granted to him on a fine of 1000 marks. (Rot. Pat. iii. 245; Cal. Rot. Pat. 219.)

It would seem that Fulthorpe died in his exile, probably in 16 Richard II., 1392 (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 151), for his name was not included among those who in the twentieth year were recalled from Ireland; although he was mentioned in the proceedings of the next parliament, which reversed the judgment against the judges, and decreed the restoration of their lands to such as were living and to the heirs of those who were dead. Though the benefit of this reversal was lost by its repeal in the first year of Henry IV., the judge's forfeited lands were ultimately restored to his family, on the petition of his son William alleging all these facts in excuse for his father. (Rot. Parl. iii. 346, 358, 393.)

By his first wife, Sibella, Sir Roger had the above-mentioned William, who was the father of the next-noticed Thomas de Fulthorpe. His second wife, also named Sibella, was the daughter and heir of Sir

Robert Salebury, and widow of Richard Radcliffe, of Ordsall, county Lancaster. (Surtree's Durham, iii. 126.)

FULTHORPE, THOMAS, was the grandson of the last-mentioned Sir Roger Fulthorpe, and the son of Sir William, who was the knight of the retinue of King Henry IV. who, on the refusal of Sir William Gascoigne, was assigned for the nonce to sit in judgment on Archbishop Scrope, the earl marshal, Ralph Hastings, and others in 1405. (Rot. Parl. iii. 633.) No evidence exists of Sir William having acted as a judge on any other occasion, and this was more a military execution than a judicial trial. His mother was Isabella, daughter of Ralph, Lord Lumley.

He was made a serjeant-at-law in 3 Henry VI., and often acted as a justice of assize, until he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, shortly before February 3, 1439, 17 Henry VI., when the first fine was acknowledged before him. The last fine was in November 1456, 35 Henry VI. (Dugdale's Orig. 46.) He died between that date and May 3 in the following year, when his will was proved. (Surtree's Durham, iii. 126.)

Among the patents of 27 Henry VI. 1448-9, is one declaring that 'pro salute sua' he shall not be compelled 'residere' in his office of judge, and that he may take cognitions wherever they may be brought to him (Cal. Rot. Pat. 293); but it does not appear whether this privilege was accorded on account of a failure in his health or of some personal danger which he apprehended.

FURNELLIS, or FURNAUS, ALAN DE, does not appear to have acted as a judge previous to 1179, 25 Henry II., when the kingdom was divided by the council held at Windsor into four parts, and certain wise men were selected to administer justice in each. He was one of the six who were specially appointed to hear the complaints of the people in the Curia Regis itself, and different counties were also appropriated to them for their circuit.

The roll of 1 Richard I., 1189, contains the entry of his death. He had been sheriff of Oxfordshire from 31 to 33 Henry II., and Cornwall also from 27 to 30 Henry II. The family, however, appears to have been more specially connected with Devonshire, as a Geoffrey de Furnellis was sheriff of that county at the end of the reign of Henry I. and the beginning of that of Henry II. Alan himself was joined in that sheriffalty in 21 Henry II., and Henry de Furnellis held it during the last nine years of the reign of Richard I. (Magna Evch. i. 94, 139, 276, 328, ii. 220; Fulthorpe's Worthies; Pipe Roll, 58, 105, 106, 107, 118, 131.)

FURNELLIS, or FURNAUS, HENRY DE,

a relative and probably the son of the last-named Alan, was according to Fuller sheriff of Devonshire during the last nine years of the reign of Richard I., though seemingly only under-sheriff. (Madox, i. 276.) In 3 John he accounts for Shropshire as the substitute of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, then the sheriff of that county. (Rot. Cancell. 121.) There is little doubt, therefore, that he held an office in the Exchequer, and it was probably in that capacity that he was present in 1 John, when his name appears among the justiciers before whom a fine was acknowledged.

FURNELLIS, or FURNAUS, WILLIAM DE, as well as the two last members of this family, was connected with the court, and in 5 John was one of the fermers of the quinzime arising from merchandise in England. (Madox, i. 771.) According to the custom of the time, he was likewise of the clerical profession, and in the same year a royal mandate was directed to Geoffrey Fitz-Peter to give him ecclesiastical preferment to the extent of 40*l.* a year as soon as the other royal promises had been satisfied. (Rot. de Liberat. 69.) He was accordingly in possession of the living of Bromesgrove at the time of his death, in 1236, when the bishops gave it to the use of the monks of Worcester. (Angl. Sacra, i. 489.)

He was present at Cambridge in 10 and 11 John, 1208-1210, when fines were taken there before him, in which he is called a justice itinerant.

FURNELLIS, SIMON DE, was one of the justices itinerant for Essex and Hertford in 1234, 18 Henry III.; but his name does not again occur in the same character. He probably was a connection of the three above-named persons, and, like them, held some office connected with the courts.

FYNCHEDEN, WILLIAM DE, is mentioned as an advocate in the Year Books from 24 Edward III., and was made a king's serjeant in the thirty-sixth year, being also employed as a justice of assize two years after. On October 29, 1365, 39 Edward III., he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas, and was advanced to its head on April 14, 1371. His successor was appointed on October 10, 1374, but whether the vacancy was occasioned by the death or retirement of Fyncheden does not appear. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 180, 186.)

G

GAERST, HUGH DE, was a justicier appointed by the great council held at Windsor in 1179, 25 Henry II., when England was arranged into four judicial divisions. He must have been held in some considerable estimation, as he was one of the six to whom not only the northern counties were appropriated, but who were also assigned to hear the complaints of the people in the Curia Regis. (Madox, i. 93, 138.)

GALDRIC. Dugdale erroneously calls this chancellor Baldricus, and places him in the reign of William I., on the authority of a charter granting the church of St. Mary of Andover to the abbey of St. Florence, at Salmur, in Anjou. This charter, however, was evidently granted by William II., though the gift of the church had been previously made by the Conqueror. That gift is recited in these words: 'Noscant qui sunt et futuri sunt, quod Willielmus rex, qui armis Anglicam terram sibi subjugavit, dedit Sancto Florentio ecclesiam de Andeura,' &c. (Monast. vi. 992)—language which the Conqueror himself never could have used, but which would be very natural in his son. But the date is placed beyond the possibility of doubt by the fact that the first witness to the charter is Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, who was Robert Bloet, not raised to the bishopric till some years after the accession of William II.

'Galdricus Cancellarius' is the second witness to this charter, and he probably was the immediate successor of Robert Bloet as chancellor, on his resigning the Seal when he was appointed bishop in 1093: because there is sufficient testimony that William Giffard was restored to the office soon afterwards, and retained it without interruption to the end of the reign.

In the reign of Henry I. there was a chancellor described by the name of Waldric, and, considering that the letters G and W were often indiscriminately used in spelling Christian names, as Gualterus, Walterus; Gulielmus, Willielmus; and also that there is only an interval of ten years between them, it does not appear improbable that Waldric was the same man. There is not, however, sufficient evidence to warrant a united notice.

Galdric was one of the royal chaplains, and accompanied King Henry in 1106 to Normandy, where he distinguished himself in the battle of Tenchebrai, fought on September 28, by taking Duke Robert prisoner. He was rewarded for his services with the bishopric of Laon, Laudunensis (Notes and Queries, 2nd S. v. 45), not, as elsewhere said, Llandaff, Landa-vensis (Lingard, ii. 115), being elected, notwithstanding the protest of Anselm, dean of the cathedral. Incurring the hatred of the citizens, he was murdered in a field with seven of his prebendaries. A curious account of his episcopate is in book iii. of Guibert of Nogent, 'De Vitâ Suâ.'

GANT, ROBERT DE. Philipot, following Thynne, names a Robert as chancellor to Stephen, without any surname. Spellman adds the surname, but neither Dugdale nor the author of the 'Lives of the Chancellors' (1708) mentions him. Madox (ii. 138), however, gives the copy of a charter of King Stephen, the first witness to which is Robert de Gant, chancellor. Another witness to this charter is William, Earl of Lincoln, who acquired that title in 1142, and died about 1152. 'Robert the Chancellor' is also the first witness to a grant of the church of Langford made by that king to the Templars (Monast. vi. 320), which must have been dated between the years 1139 and 1151.

There were two Roberts de Gant who were alive about this time, uncle and nephew. The former was the second son of Gilbert, the first baron of that name (son of Baldwin, Earl of Flanders or Gant), by Alice de Montfort; the latter was the second son of Walter de Gant, the second baron, by Matilda, the daughter of Stephen, Earl of Brittany and Richmond. In the absence of any decisive authority, the presumption to be drawn from facts and dates seems to be that the uncle was the chancellor. He preceded Becket as provost of Beverley (Ibid. 1307), and was dean of York in 1148. He was succeeded in the deanery in 1153, which was doubtless the date of his death. The nephew lived till 1192, and was the ancestor of Maurice de Gant, the next-noticed justice itinerant. (Arch. Inst. York; Holy Trinity, 59, &c.; Dugdale's Baron. i. 402.)

GANT, MAURICE DE, was the son of Robert de Berkeley (son of Robert Fitz-Harding), by Alice, daughter of Robert de Gant (above named) and Alice Paganell, his wife. He attained his majority about 9 John, and soon afterwards assumed his mother's name, inheriting the large possessions she derived from her mother. In 15 John he married Matilda, the only child of Henry D'Oilly, baron of Hooknorton in Oxfordshire.

He was one of the principal instigators of the contest between the king and the discontented barons, and thereupon suffered excommunication and lost all his lands. (Rot. Pat. 162-198; Rot. Claus. i. 232, &c.) On the accession of Henry III. he continued to adhere to Prince Lewis of France, and was taken prisoner at the battle called the Fair of Lincoln, on May 20, 1217, by Ranulph, Earl of Chester, in whose custody he remained for a year, and ransomed himself by the cession of two of his capital manors, those of Leeds and Bingley in Yorkshire. After the treaty with Prince Lewis, he was allowed to make his peace, and in the latter part of the second year of Henry's reign his lands were restored to him. (Rot. Claus. i. 368, 376.)

His loyalty was thenceforward steadfast and active. In 9 Henry III. he assisted William, the earl marshal, in fortifying a castle in Wales; and although he had fortified his castle of Beverston in Gloucestershire without the necessary royal licence, he obtained the royal confirmation of his act. And in August of the same year, 1227, he was nominated one of the justices itinerant for five counties. (Ibid. ii. 180, 213.)

In April 1230 he embarked with King Henry on his expedition into France, during which, in the following August, he died. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 201.)

After the death of his first wife, Matilda, he married Margaret, the widow of Ralph de Sumeri, who survived him; but he left no issue by either. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 402.)

GARDINER, STEPHEN (BISHOP OF WINCHESTER), is stated to have been an illegitimate son of a bishop, who concealed his incontinence by making one Gardiner, an under-servant in his household, marry his concubine, and thus become the apparent father of the child of which she was pregnant. The actual father is represented to have been Lionel Woodvill, brother of the queen of Edward IV., who was made Bishop of Salisbury in 1482, and died in 1483. He was born at St. Edmund's Bury in 1483. A will has been lately published (Genl. Mag. May, 1855, p. 495), made by one John Gardener, a cloth-maker of Bury St. Edmunds, dated January 18, 1506-7, which bequeaths some valuable legacies 'to Stevyn my sone,' one of which is to be paid to him 'when he comyth to the full age of xxj years,' and another 'when he shall take commensment in the scole at the universite:' and it is inferred with great probability that this John was the father of the lord chancellor.

He was sent to Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where his perseverance and attainments secured to him a reputation which he maintained through life. Proceeding doctor in both laws in 1520 and 1521, he entered into holy orders, and in 1525 he was elected master of his college, eventually, in 1540, becoming chancellor of the university. At an early period, however, he had been received first into the family of the Duke of Norfolk, and then into that of Cardinal Wolsey, who had made him his secretary. About the year 1525 the king, being on a visit to his minister, found Gardiner employed in drawing up the plan of an alliance projected by Wolsey with the king of France, which he did in a manner so satisfactory, supporting his views with so much ability, and suggesting expedients with so much ease, that he at once acquired the royal confidence, and was soon admitted into the council. In 1528, when he and Fox were sent to the pope, to negotiate the question as to the king's divorce from Catherine of Arragon, he gratified Henry by obtaining a new commission to Wolsey and to Cardinal Campeggio, and Wolsey also by reconciling the pope to the endowment of his two colleges at Oxford and Ipswich out of the revenues of some lesser monasteries which had been dissolved, as well as by his arduous exertions to secure the pontificate for the cardinal in the event of the pope's expected death.

On Gardiner's return he received his first preferment in the Church, that of the archdeaconry of Norfolk, on March 1, 1529. In the following October his name 'Stephen Gardiner' appears as 'counsellor to the king' in the record of the delivery up of the Great Seal by Cardinal Wolsey. (Rymer, xiv. 349.) Placed by the changes which took place on that event in the office of secretary of state, it has been a question how far he exerted the great influence which he certainly had with the king in behalf of his fallen master, and it is generally admitted that Cromwell's conduct was more generous, bold, and decided. A letter, however, from Wolsey to Gardiner, without entirely attributing to his interference the pardon which the king had consented to grant, seems to exhibit a firm reliance on his 'love and affection' in the preparation of the instrument. (Archæologia, xviii. 57.)

Gardiner was next employed in inducing the university of Cambridge to make a declaration affirming the prohibition by the divine and natural law for a brother to marry the relict of his deceased brother. This he and his coadjutor Fox, after some trouble, contrived by management to obtain (Lingard, vi. 386); and the king was not long in rewarding both. Gardiner received the archdeaconry of Leicester on March 31, 1531, and on the 27th of November in the same year he was consecrated Bishop of Winchester, the patent for the restitution of the temporalities, dated December 5, describing him as 'our principal secretary.' (Rymer, xiv. 429.)

Throughout the remainder of Henry's reign Gardiner devoted himself to the king's service, and until towards its close succeeded in preserving his ascendancy in the royal councils. This he effected by accommodating himself to Henry's humours, whatever they might be. When the king's marriage was pronounced null and void, he went as ambassador to the French king. Bonner, who was joined in the embassy, complained loudly of his being obstinate and self-willed, and of his extreme jealousy of any interference in the management of the business, or of any supposed assumption of an equality of rank. This spirit he soon after exhibited toward his ecclesiastical superior, Archbishop Crammer, by raising every obstacle against the visitation which that prelate proposed to make in his diocese. Like all his brethren of the episcopal bench, he was compelled by the new statute to swear to the king's supremacy, which he not only appeared to do with the greatest readiness, but wrote strongly and ably in its support, although at the same time he was devotedly attached to the superstitious doctrines of the Romish Church. The king, though professing the same sentiments, was still desirous of introducing some reforms, and of permitting the Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue, but Gardiner vigorously opposed every step taken to promote the Reformation. He stirred up the king's zeal against those who denied the Real Presence, and seems to be justly chargeable with bringing Lambert and others to the stake for refusing to adopt the doctrine; he procured, or at least promoted, the enactment of the bloody statute of the Six Articles, under the cruel provisions of which so many suffered; and he plotted to get rid of Archbishop Cranmer, whom he hated as the great supporter of the Protestant party, by charges of an heretical nature. But in the latter he failed; the king saw through his malevolent design, and from that moment ceased to have confidence in him. He did not improve the impression on the royal mind by the servile submission and acknowledgment which he made in anticipation of a charge against himself of doubting the king's supremacy, although he obtained his pardon by an abject promise to reform his opinion. But he put a finishing stroke to the king's alienation from him by combining with Lord Wriothesley in the endeavour to implicate Queen Catherine Parr in reference to these religious questions. From that time Henry not only withdrew all show of favour to him, but his name was struck out of the king's will, of which he had before been appointed one of the executors. He was thus excluded from the council of regency.

Strongly opposing all the means then taken to advance the Reformation, he was committed to the Fleet in September 1547, resisting all the attempts of Archbishop Cranmer to bring him round to the new opinions. From this imprisonment he was released, in consequence of the general pardon granted at the close of the session, on December 24. In the following June, however, being commanded to preach before the king, his sermon was so little satisfactory that he was sent to the Tower on the next day. The removal of the lord protector, whom he looked on as his great enemy, made no change in his state, and at the end of two years he was subjected to a sort of examination, and offered his freedom if he would subscribe to certain articles submitted to him. This he declined to do until he was discharged from his imprisonment. A special commission was then appointed to try him, when, persisting in his refusal, his bishopric was sequestered, but three months were given him for consideration, at the end of which he was brought before a court of delegates, over which Archbishop Cranmer presided, and on February 14, 1551, he was deprived for disobedience and contempt of the king's authority. His contemptuous behaviour towards the court led to an increased rigour in his confinement, which continued till the end of the reign.

The accession of Queen Mary opened a brighter prospect to the determined prelate. On her public entry into the Tower on August 3, 1553, he made a congratulatory speech in the name of himself and his fellow-prisoners, among whom were the Duke of Norfolk, the Duchess of Somerset, the Lord Courtney, and Bishop Tunstall. The queen, in releasing them all, is said to have kissed them, and to have called them 'her prisoners.' Thus, after a confinement of more than five years, was he restored to liberty. He was immediately admitted to a seat in council, and within five days he exercised his episcopal functions, performing in the queen's presence the obsequies of the late king. On the 23rd of that month the Great Seal was delivered to him as chancellor, but it was not till September 21 that his patent was dated. He performed the ceremony of coronation on October 1, opened the first parliament of the reign four days afterwards, and from that time during the remainder of his life acted as Mary's chief adviser in all civil matters, and, until the arrival of Cardinal Pole in November 1554, in the affairs of the Church also.

The first difficulty which he had to encounter was the necessary confirmation of the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon, in order to remove the illegitimation of Queen Mary. Here, though he had been one of the principal promoters of the divorce, by his contrivance the whole blame was thrown on Archbishop Cranmer. The repeal of the laws passed in the last reign with regard to religion, and the restoration of all the ancient Romish practices, were not delayed, but the measures adopted for this purpose, and the cruel consequences with which all opponents were visited, belong rather to the history of the period than to the biography of an individual. Suffice it to say that several Protestant bishops were deprived, others compelled to fly the country, the prisons were filled to overflowing, and after a short time innumerable victims suffered at the stake. With every desire to give an impartial consideration to the arguments of those writers who attempt to palliate his conduct, it is impossible to acquit Gardiner of originating the laws which authorised these cruel measures, and of carrying them into effect with their extremest severity, and conscientious as some may think him in his zeal for the ancient Church, none but the most bigoted can justify the means he adopted for its restoration. That his old enemy, Archbishop Cranmer, who had already been tried, did not suffer at the same time with Bishops Ridley and Latimer, has been ascribed to his desire to succeed to the archbishopric, with which he knew that Cardinal Pole would be immediately invested if his intrigues in the court of Rome against that powerful ecclesiastic were not successful. Whatever were his motives for delaying the execution, it is difficult to ascribe them to merciful considerations, since these did not operate to save the two other Oxford martyrs. During the interval, however, between the archbishop's trial and the execution of his sentence, Gardiner, after opening the parliament on October 21, 1555, was seized with a mortal disease, the nature of which has been variously represented, of which he died at Whitehall, on November 12, terminating a short ministry of two years and less than three months more disreputable than any other of similar extent recorded in the annals of the kingdom. He was buried in Winchester Cathedral.

Of Gardiner's learning there can be no doubt; but even in his contest with Sir John Cheke on the pronunciation of the Greek language he exhibited the obstinacy and tyranny of his disposition, visiting with punishment those who adopted the reformation proposed by his antagonist. With very quick parts and great acuteness of mind, his early initiation into business highly qualified him for a statesman, and the measures which he took on the marriage of Queen Mary to prevent foreign interference with the government of the kingdom are sufficient proofs of his abilities as a politician.

His work 'De Verâ Obedentiâ,' written against the Papal supremacy, he was afterwards obliged to retract by another called 'Palinodia Dicti Libri.' Besides these he published several other controversial pieces; and many of his sermons have been preserved. (Godwin, 236; State Trials, i. 551; Brit. Biog. ii. 202; Robertson's History; Lingard; Burnet; &c.)

GARLAND, JOHN DE, was one of the custodes of the bishopric of Winchester during its vacancy in 1189. (Pipe Roll, 5.) There is no doubt, therefore, that he held some office in the court. In 8 Richard I., 1196, he acted as a justice itinerant, setting the tallage for the united counties of Essex and Hertford. (Madar, i. 704.)

GARROW, WILLIAM, one of the most successful advocates of his day, was born on April 13, 1760, at Monken-Hadley in Middlesex, where his father, the Rev. David Garrow, kept a school, in which his son received the whole of his education. At fifteen he was articled to Mr. Southouse, a respectable attorney residing in Milk Street, Cheapside, where he showed so much ability and quickness that he was strongly recommended by his master to aim at the higher branch of the law. His friends consenting, he was entered at Lincoln's Inn in 1778, and was called to the bar on November 26, 1783.

He attended the debating societies then established in the metropolis, and at Coach-makers' Hall and other similar schools he soon became a powerful debater, and his speeches were so admired for their eloquence and ingenuity that his presence at them was always welcomed. He assumed the gown, therefore, with a certain prestige, which immediately secured him some business at the Old Bailey, where, so early as the January after he was called, he was fortunate enough so to distinguish himself as to establish a sure foundation for his future success. A clever swindler, Henry Aickles, was indicted for stealing a bill of exchange, which he had obtained under the promise of getting it discounted; instead of doing which he had converted it to his own use. His counsel contended confidently that this was no felony, and it was considered a very doubtful point; but the acuteness of Mr. Garrow's reply, and the readiness and cogency of his arguments, so far satisfied the judge that he left the question of fact to the jury, who convicted the delinquent; and on a reference to the twelve judges, they coincided with Garrow's view of the law.

His reputation thus established, his business rapidly increased, not only in criminal but in civil cases. In the general election of the same year he was fully employed. First, he was chosen assessor to the sheriff of Hertford, in the county election; next, he was retained in the London scrutiny for Mr. Sawbridge; and then he acted as counsel for Mr. Fox in the famous Westminster scrutiny. In reference to the latter, when he was suddenly called upon to address the House of Commons, his unpremeditated speech was so forcible and luminous that it excited the applause, and he received the congratulations, of even the opposing party. All this occurred in the first year after his call to the bar. He not only acquired the undisputed lead in the crown courts, but was also so much employed, both on the Home Circuit and in Westminster Hall, that in April 1793 he was appointed a king's counsel.

His services were perpetually engaged in honourable contest with the phalanx of eminent men who, during the twenty-four years that he remained at the bar with a silk gown, graced the courts in London and the country, the principal of whom were Erskine, Gibbs, and Best. He was employed by the government in most of the state trials occurring during that period; and in many of them the sole management was entrusted to him. (State Trials, xxii.-xxxi.) In June 1812 he was appointed solicitor-general, and knighted, having six years previously held the office of attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, before he was regent. In the next year he was raised to the same office as the king's attorney, and further promoted to the chief justiceship of Chester in March 1814.

He entered parliament in 1805, and represented successively Gatton, Collington, and Eye; but his senatorial harangues were not distinguished with more success than is usually attributed to members of the legal profession.

After performing the duties of attorney-general for four years with exemplary forbearance and general commendation, he relieved himself from its responsibility by accepting on May 6, 1817, a seat on the bench of the Exchequer. For nearly fifteen years he exercised the functions of a judge, when, prompted by the advance of age and infirmity, he retired in February 1832, receiving an honourable reward for his services by being made a privy counsellor. He lived nearly eight years afterwards, and died on September 24, 1840, at his house at Pegwell Bay, near Ramsgate, at the age of eighty.

The influx of business with which he had to cope from the very commencement of his career, although it made him an adept in the practice of the courts and in the superficial questions of law, deprived him of the opportunity of studying the abstruser points. So conscious was he of his deficiency in the knowledge of the law of real property that he always in cases which touched that branch relied on the intelligence of his junior.

As a judge his former experience gave him considerable advantages in the ordinary cases of Nisi Prius, by enabling him at once to pierce into the real merits of the question, and to detect any evasion or ambiguity, and in Banco he had the discretion not to go beyond the limits of his own learning. He maintained an intimate friendship with those who were his forensic antago-nists and rivals, and he closed his long life without a single stain on his moral character, and with the respect and deep affection of all who were closely connected with him.

By his wife, whom he lost in 1808, he had two children—a son, Dr. David Garrow, who died rector of East Barnet; and a daughter, Eliza, who married the eldest son of the well-known Dr. Lettson.

GARTON, THOMAS DE, was a member of the clerical profession, and appointed in 18 Edward II. to assist the bishops in removing foreign priests. Under Edward III. he held the offices of comptroller of the king's household and keeper of the wardrobe, and on October 10, 1331, 5 Edward III., he was placed on the bench of the Exchequer, as second baron. (N. Fœdera, ii. 574, 769, 785.)

GASCOIGNE, WILLIAM, is the first chief justice of whom we have any personal anecdotes, and the incidents related of him are not only creditable to himself as an individual, but afford also the first example of that honesty, independence, and courage which should characterise the judicial bench, and of which in our own days we have so much reason to be proud; but of him we know, and we can expect to know, but little, until he became chief justice of the King's Bench.

The family of Gascoigne, the derivation of which is sufficiently shown in the name, is very ancient, no less than seven successive Williams being recorded in the pedigree before the chief justice. The third of these is described as of Harewood, near Leeds, in Yorkshire, whose son acquired Gawthorp in the same parish by marrying the heiress of that manor. There the judge's father was settled, and there the judge was born, his mother being Agnes, daughter and coheir of Mr. Nicholas Franke.

In which of the legal seminaries he received his instruction it is impossible to determine, because the records of none of them extend to so ancient a date. Fuller says he was of the Inner Temple, but adduces no authority; and in the MS. account of Gray's Inn, written in the seventeenth century, his name stands among the undated and supposed readers of that society.

He was old enough in 48 Edward III., 1374, to be mentioned as an advocate in the Year Books, and in 21 Richard II., 1397, he was appointed one of the king's serjeants. In 1398 he was among the twenty attorneys assigned for different courts or jurisdictions by Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford (Rymer, viii. 49), on his banishment from the kingdom in consequence of the quarrel with the Duke of Norfolk; but on the death of Henry's father, John of Gaunt, four months afterwards, the infatuated monarch seized the duke's lands, notwithstanding his declaration that Henry's succession to his inheritance should not be interrupted.

Henry IV. had not been fourteen months upon the throne before he rewarded Gascoigne for his services, by constituting him chief justice of the King's Bench on November 15, 1400. All writers acknowledge his legal merit in the ordinary execution of his office, and it was not long before he had occasion to exhibit the higher characteristics of his nature. In 1405 the army raised by Richard Scrope, Archbishop of York, and Thomas Mowbray, earl marshal, having been dispersed by the capture of the two leaders, they were taken to the royal presence at Bishop's Thorpe, the primate's palace, when the king commanded the chief justice to pronounce on them the sentence of death. Gascoigne resolutely refused to obey, saying, 'Neither you, my lord, nor any of your subjects, can, according to the law of the realm, sentence any prelate to death; and the earl has a right to be tried by his peers.' The king, however, was not to be stopped, and he found a willing instrument in a knight of Yorkshire, named Sir William Fulthorpe, in no way himself connected with the law. (Scrope and Grosvenor Roll, ii. 124.)

Henry on reflection could not help approving his judge's boldness, and, so far from withdrawing his confidence from him, seems to have been in the familiar habit of putting supposed cases for his opinion. The history of Gascoigne's committing Prince Henry to prison is told in various ways. The most authentic seems to be that the prince, on the arraignment of one of his servants for felony before the chief justice, imperiously demanded his release, and having been refused, with a rebuke for his interference, had angrily drawn his sword on the judge. His passion was instantly checked by the dignified demeanour of Gascoigne, who calmly called on him to remember himself, reminded him of the position in which he would one day stand, and committed him to prison for his contempt and disobedience. The prince submitted at once and went away in custody: and when the incident was related to the king, he exclaimed, 'How much am I bound to your infinite goodness, O merciful God, for having given me a judge who feareth not to administer justice, and a man who can thus nobly submit to it!'

Almost all of Gascoigne's biographers have fixed his death to have taken place on December 17, 1412, 14 Henry IV., and consequently have determined that Shakespeare's introduction of him, as chief justice to Henry V., is a poetic fiction invented for dramatic effect. Whatever enthusiasm we may indulge for the works of our immortal bard, it cannot extend to our accepting them as authority for historical facts, and unquestionably in a trial between him and the biographers we should feel bound in the absence of other evidence to give a verdict for the latter. But in this case there are materials which render it unnecessary to rely wholly on either, and which enable us to arrive with a clearer judgment at the truth. The result of the investigation proves that both are wrong—the biographers wholly, the poet partially.

The error of the biographers in fixing the death of Gascoigne in December 1412 is manifest in many ways.

In the first place, he is the judge in a case reported in February 1413. (Y. B. 14 Henry IV. fo. 19.) Secondly, he was summoned to the first parliament of Henry V. in Easter 1413. Thirdly, on the Issue Rolls of the same year the sum of 79*l.* 3*s.* 0*d.* is stated to have been paid to him on July 7 for his salary and additional annuity. (Devon's Issue Roll, 322.) And lastly, his will has been found in the ecclesiastical court at York, the date being on December 15, 1419, and the probate being granted on the 23rd of the same month.

Thus therefore the poet correctly introduces Gascoigne as alive on the accession of Henry V.; but we fear we must convict him of falsifying history in his desire to enhance the character of his hero, when he makes Henry with a noble generosity reinstate the inflexible magistrate with 'the balance and the sword;' nor can we acquit Lord Campbell of a similar charge, when he asserts that he can 'prove to demonstration that Sir William Gascoigne * * * actually filled the office of chief justice of the King's Bench under Henry V.'

The only evidence that has the slightest tendency to support this view is the summons to parliament, which was dated March 22, 1413, the day after the accession, in which he is called 'chief justice of our lord the king.' This single fact, however, gives little assistance to the argument; because the title of chief justice would be properly applied to him until he was actually superseded, and because the king, having obviously had no more time than to order a parliament to be summoned, the writs of summons would be naturally addressed to those peers, judges, and others who were summoned to the preceding parliament, and consequently to the judicial officers existing at the demise of the late king. But the slight presumption founded upon the fact is invalidated by numerous contrary proofs.

Thus in the parliament held by virtue of that summons, which commenced on May 15, Gascoigne not only was not present, but his usual place among the triers of petitions was filled by Sir William Hankford, who, though previously only a puisne judge of the Common Pleas, is named in precedence of Sir William Thring, the chief justice of that court. (Rot. Parl. iv. 4.)

Again, although Dugdale defers Hankford's elevation to the chief justiceship for more than ten months from the accession, and although he was not included in the new patents to the judges of the Common Pleas which were issued on May 2, a day or two before the opening of Easter Term 1413, yet in several cases reported in the Year Books, not only of that term but of Trinity also, we find him, not indeed acting in the Common Pleas, but presiding in the King's Bench.

Even if these two facts were not sufficient to remove any doubt upon the question, the two records to which reference has been already made contain such conclusive proof that Sir William Gascoigne was not reappointed to his place as chief justice that it seems impossible that any one can maintain the contrary.

In one of them, the payment on the Issue Roll of July 1413, Gascoigne is called 'late chief justice of the Bench of Lord Henry, father of the present king.'

In the other, the inscription on his monument in Harewood Church in Yorkshire in 1419, he is described as 'nuper capit. justic. de Banco Hen. nuper regis Angliæ quarti.'

Can it be for a moment supposed that in either of these records he would have been docked of his title had he ever been chief justice of the reigning king?

Still, however, the difficulty remained arising from Dugdale's date of Hankford's appointment as chief justice; but this has been removed by reference to the roll itself. It turns out, on inspection, that the date, instead of being January 29, 1414, as stated by Dugdale, is March 29, 1413, just eight days after King Henry's accession, and ten days previous to his coronation.

The peculiar period chosen for this act, and its precipitancy in contrast with the delay in issuing the new patents to the other judges, seem strongly to show that it resulted from the king's peremptory mandate rather than Gascoigne's personal choice, and consequently to raise a suspicion that the indignity he had laid upon the prince was not 'washed in Lethe, and forgotten' by the king.

A royal warrant dated November 28, 1414, twenty months after his dismissal, granting him four bucks and four does yearly during his life, out of the forest of Pontefract (Tyler's Henry V. i. 379.) was a favour too long retarded to warrant a more lenient construction of the conduct of the king.

This great judge was buried in the parish church of Harewood, where the monument bears his effigy in judicial robes.

He married first Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Alexander Mowbray, of Kirthington, Esq.; and secondly, Joan, daughter of Sir William Pickering, and relict of Sir Henry Greystock, baron of the Exchequer. By both he had issue. The eldest son by his first was named William, and as there were seven successive Williams before the judge, so also were there seven after him.

The baronetcy of Gascoigne of Barnbow was granted by Charles I. to a descendant of Nicholas, a younger brother of the judge, and became extinct in 1810. (Wotton's Baronet. v. 334; Testam. Ebor. p. i. 410.)

GASELEE, STEPHEN, was the son of an eminent surgeon at Portsmouth, where he was born in 1762. He chose the legal profession and entered the society of Gray's Inn, became a pupil of Sir Vicary Gibbs, and was called to the bar in 1793. He joined the Western Circuit, and was so well respected as a careful and well-informed junior that when, after six-and-twenty years' practice, he was made a king's counsel in 1819, his professional income was probably diminished. But though not gifted with those oratorical powers which were likely to gain him employment as a leader, his deserved reputation for legal knowledge soon recommended him to a judge's place. Accordingly he was selected on July 1, 1824, to supply a vacancy in the Common Pleas, and was knighted. In that court he sat for nearly fourteen years, with the character of a painstaking and upright judge, and in his private capacity as a worthy and benevolent man. He resigned his place at the end of Hilary Term 1837, and died on March 26, 1839.

His widow survived him, and one of his sons is now a serjeant-at-law.

GATES, THOMAS, is described as of Churchill in the county of Oxford in his admission to the Inner Temple, on January 1, 1606-7. Having been called to the bar on January 29, 1614-15, he was elected reader to that society in autumn 1635. As his name is never mentioned in the Reports, there seems nothing but his politics to induce the Long Parliament (of which he was not a member) to recommend him to be called serjeant, and to be made a baron of the Exchequer. This however they did on October 12, 1648, and he accepted a renewal of his commission on the death of the king. His death on August 19, 1650, at the age of sixty-three, was occasioned by an infection taken at Croydon while engaged in his judicial duties, and he was buried in the Temple Church. (Peck's Desid. Cur. b. xiv. 23.)

GATESDEN, JOHN DE, is called by Dugdale (Orig. 21) a canon of St. Paul's; but if so, civilians must have held those appointments, inasmuch as he had a wife and children. He was possessed of property in Norton and Bradford in Somersetshire, and held the office of sheriff of Surrey and Sussex in 20 Henry III. and the three following years. (Madox, ii. 177.) In 25 Henry III. he had a liberate for 50*l.*, to discharge the expenses of the queen. (Pell Records, iii. 17.)

He is inserted in Dugdale's list of justices of the Common Pleas in 34 Henry III., 1250, on account of a fine having been acknowledged before him in Hilary Term of that year, and also as a justice itinerant into Lincolnshire. He is again mentioned as a justicier in an entry of 38 Henry III. relative to certain 'heccagiis' in Sussex held by himself and some other persons. (Abb. Placit. 137.)

He and the Bishop of Ely were sent as ambassadors to Spain on the king's affairs in 40 Henry III. (Rymer, i. 343.) He died in April 1262, 46 Henry III., leaving large property both in Sussex and Somersetshire. By his wife Hawise he had a son named John, who died in his lifetime, leaving a widow; and at the date of his own death, Margaret, his daughter, or granddaughter, was a minor. She married John de Camoys. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 316-384; Abb. Placit. 187, 334.)

GAUNSTEDE, SIMON, was in holy orders, and connected with the court as early as 11 Richard II., 1386, when his name appears attached to the confederation with the King of Castile. Throughout the reign of Henry IV. he is mentioned as one of the clerks of the Chancery. (Rymer, vii. 515, 809.) On June 3, 1415, 3 Henry V., he was appointed master of the Rolls, and on the chancellor's going to France the Great Seal was left with him from September 5 to October 12, 1416. He held it again under Henry VI., from September 28, 1422, till November 16, when he was recognised as an independent keeper with all the usual powers, and received the accustomed salary. (Rymer, x. 262.) He probably died soon after, since John Frank was appointed his successor on October 28, 1423.

GAWDY, THOMAS, was the son of another Thomas Gawdy, of Harleston in Norfolk. Both were of the Inner Temple, and both serjeants-at-law. The father was reader there in Lent 1548 and 1553, and for refusing to read in the latter year he was amerced, although he had been promoted to be a serjeant in the previous October. (Dugdale's Orig. 164; Machyn's Diary. 26.) He represented Norwich in Queen Mary's first parliament. He died in August 1561, and his virtues, together with those of Serjeant Richard Catlin, are recorded in a joint Latin epitaph introduced into Plowden's Reports. (180.) By one of his wives, Anne, the daughter of John Bassingbourne, Esq., of Woodhall in Hertfordshire, he had two sons, Thomas and Bassingbourne, the latter of whom was the great-grandfather of two baronets—Gawdy of Crow's Hall in Suffolk, and Gawdy of West Herling in Norfolk; but both titles became extinct at the beginning of the last century.

Thomas Gawdy, the eldest son, who was born at Harleston, became in 1558 member for Norwich, as his father had been before him, and was among those who were summoned by Queen Mary in October of the same year to take the degree of the coif in the following Easter; but her death intervening, it became necessary to have a new writ, from which, probably at his own request, his name was excluded. In the following year he was reader at the Inner Temple, and treasurer in 1562. In 1563 he became recorder of Norwich, and on another summons he took the degree of the coif in 1567; and on November 16, 1574, he was constituted a judge of the Queen's Bench. Here he sat for fourteen years, and was one of the few puisne judges on whom Queen Elizabeth bestowed a knighthood. He was both in the commission for the trial of Dr. Parry in February 1585, preserved in the 'Baga de Secretis,' and in that of October 1586 for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots at Fotheringay. (State Trials, i. 1167.) His legal arguments are reported by Dyer, Plowden, and Coke; and the latter, in stating Rawlyn's case in Michaelmas 1587 (4 Report, 54), gives this character of him: 'This was the last case that Sir Thomas Gawdy argued, who was a most reverend judge and sage of the law, of ready and profound judgment, and venerable gravity, prudence, and integrity.' He died on November 4, 1588, and his place was supplied by the appointment of his half-brother, Francis Gawdy.

He was married twice: his first wife was named Helwise, and his second Frances, by both of whom he left issue.

GAWDY, FRANCIS, was the half-brother of his predecessor, Sir Thomas Gawdy, being the third son of Serjeant Thomas Gawdy, of Harleston in Norfolk, by his third wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas or Oliver Shyres. He presents an instance as well of the same name being given to two sons as of a Christian name being altered at confirmation. At his baptism he was called Thomas, which at his confirmation was changed to Francis, and the latter name, 'by the advice of all the judges in anno 36 Henry VIII. (1544), he did beare, and after used in all his purchases and grants.' (Coke Litt. 3a.)

He was admitted a member of the Inner Temple in 1549, and became Lent reader in 1566. In Lent 1571 he was appointed duplex reader, and also treasurer to the society. Being called to the degree of the coif in 1577, he was made one of the queen's serjeants on May 17, 1582, and was present at Fotheringay on the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, but no duty appears to have devolved upon him. On the arraignment of Secretary Davison in 1587, for forwarding the warrant for that unfortunate lady's execution, he joined in the solemn farce with as serious a face as any of the rest of the actors. (State Trials, i. 1173, 1233.)

On the death of his brother, Sir Thomas Gawdy, he was nominated his successor as a judge of the Queen's Bench on November 25, 1588. In none of the criminal trials on which he was a commissioner, either in the reign of Queen Elizabeth or of King James (by whom he was continued in his place and knighted), is he represented as taking any part except in that of Sir Walter Raleigh, when he is made to say, 'The statute you speak of concerning two witnesses in case of treason is found to be inconvenient; therefore by another law it was taken away.' (Ibid. ii. 18.) He was named as one of the commissioners to hear causes in Chancery on the death of Sir Christopher Hatton in 1591.

It seems not improbable that he owed his elevation to the bench to Elizabeth's favoured chancellor, whose nephew, Sir William Newport, alias Hatton, about six months after it took place, married the judge's only daughter Elizabeth. The judge perhaps was also indebted for his next promotion to the marriage of his granddaughter Frances, the only issue of the above union, to Robert Rich, second Earl of Warwick. These nuptials took place in February 1605 (Nicolas's Hatton, 478, 502), and on the 26th of the following August Sir Francis was raised to the post of chief justice of the Common Pleas. He enjoyed this high position, for which he is said to have paid at a dear rate, less than a year. He was stricken with apoplexy at his chambers in Serjeants' Inn about Whitsuntide 1606, and was taken to his mansion at Eston Hall, Wallington, in Norfolk; but, having converted the parish church into a hay-house or dog-kennel, his body was obliged to be buried in the neighbouring church of Rungton.

His wife was Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of Christopher Coningsby, the son of William Coningsby the judge.

GEDDING, RANULPH DE, is named among the justiciars and barons before whom fines were acknowledged in the Curia Regis in 28 Henry II., 1182, and the two following years (Hunter's Preface, xxi.; Madox, i. 82, 113, 213); but his attendance on these occasions probably arose from his holding an office connected with the Exchequer. In the last of those years he was paid out of the issues of the honor of the constabulary divers sums expended for cordage, instruments, and other necessaries for the ship of Henry de Schornis, when it sailed to Spain for the Infanta of Portugal. (Madox's Baron. Angl. 75.)

The Great Roll of 31 Henry II., 1185, contains a curious instance of the pretences made in those times for bringing money into the king's exchequer. William de Beaumont, it seems, had contracted to marry the daughter of Ranulph de Gedding, but, altering his mind, had taken to wife the daughter of Maurice de Barsham; whereupon the faithless William was fined fifty marks, while his manœuvring father-in-law was fined in double that amount for permitting the breach of the contract.

GENT, THOMAS, was the son of William Gent, Esq., of the manor of Moynes in the parish of Bumpstead-Steeple, Essex, who could trace his pedigree backwards more than two centuries, by his second wife Agnes, daughter and coheir of Thomas Carr, Esq., of Great Thurlow in Suffolk. Educated at Cambridge, he entered the Middle Temple, where he arrived at the post of reader in Lent 1571, and again filled it three years afterwards, having been elected member for Malden in 1572. He was called serjeant in June 1584, and in the meantime he enjoyed the lucrative appointment of steward of all the courts of Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford. According to Dugdale he was not raised to the bench of the Exchequer till June 28, 1588, 30 Elizabeth; but this is clearly an error, for he is so designated in a special commission of oyer and terminer in Sussex on February 1, 28 Elizabeth, 1586, preserved in the 'Baga de Secretis.'

Coke reports his judgments, and he had the special privilege granted him of acting in his own county as a judge of assize, notwithstanding the prohibition in the statute 33 Henry VIII. c. 24. He died in 1593, and was buried at Bumpstead. His character may be estimated by the lines which Thomas Newton in his 'Encomia' addressed to him, commencing thus:

Religio, virtus, pietas, pudor, ac athletia
Exulat e terris, mobile vulgus ait.
Fallitur: Eximias nam qui considerat in te Dotes, &c.

He married first Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of Sir John Swallow, of Bocking; and secondly Elizabeth, the widow of Robert Hogeson, of London, and sister of Morgan Robyns, Esq. By the first he had a large family, and the estate has continued from that time to this in his descendants.

GEOFFREY was archdeacon of Berks from 1175 to 1200 (Le Neve, 278), and in 9 Richard I., 1197-8, was the first of four justices itinerant who set the tallages in that county. (Madox, i. 705.)

GEOFFREY THE TEMPLAR, to whom, with John de Lexinton, King Henry gave the custody of the Great Seal in August 1238, does not seem to have held it long, as it was soon after in the possession of Simon the Norman. There is very little information as to Geoffrey, and indeed of the persons so named at different dates the identification is doubtful. (Mat. Paris, 474.)

GEOFFREY (BISHOP OF COUTANCE) was a member of the noble Norman house of Mowbray, and was elected Bishop of Coutance (Constantia) in Lower Normandy in 1048. He was more of a soldier than a divine, and, accompanying William on his invasion of England, held a distinguished command in the battle of Hastings. He assisted at the coronation of the Conqueror, and harangued the Normans on the occasion. He afterwards exerted himself in suppressing the rebellions of the English and in resisting the incursions of the Danes. At the head of the men of Monmouth, London, and Salisbury, he checked the assault of the West Saxons of Dorset and Somerset on Montacute, and he joined in reducing to subjection the rebels under the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. He was rewarded with no less than 280 manors.

He is said to have held the office of chief justiciary in conjunction with Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Robert, Earl of Moreton, during part of William's reign, several precepts having been directed to them by the king which bear that interpretation. There is no doubt that he presided in loco regis at the contest between Archbishop Lanfranc and Bishop Odo, relative to certain lands and rights of which the former alleged his church of Canterbury had been disseised by the latter. The trial took place on Penenden Heath, about 1076, lasting three days, and was decided in favour of Lanfranc.

After William's death he assisted Robert, the king's eldest son, in his attempt on the English crown, and with his nephew, Robert Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, fortified themselves in Bristol. On the failure of Robert's enterprise the bishop was allowed to return to Normandy, where he died on February 4, 1093. (Dugdale's Monast. i. 546; Will. Malmesb. 487; Madox, i. 32; Dugdale's Orig. 20; Baronage, i. 56; Hutchins's Dorsetsh. i. 11; Rapin: Turner; Lingard.)

GERARD, GILBERT, a descendant from the family of Gerard of Bryn, which now enjoys a baronetcy granted in 1611, was the son of James Gerard and Margaret, daughter of John Holcroft of Holcroft. After receiving his education at Cambridge he entered Gray's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1539, became an ancient in 1547, reader in 1554, and in the next year he was joined with Sir Nicholas Bacon in the office of treasurer. (Dugdale's Orig. 293, 298.) He represented Wigan in the parliament of 1553, Steyning in 1554, and Lancashire in 1585. Dugdale says (Baron. ii. 417), 'In the time of Queen Mary (as by credible tradition I have heard), upon the Lady Elizabeth's being questioned at the council table, he was permitted to plead there on her behalf, and performed his part so well as that he suffered imprisonment for the same in the Tower of London during the remaining terme of Queen Marie's reign.' However true the former part of this story may be, the latter part is certainly incorrect, for Plowden records his appearance in court in Michaelmas 1557; and on October 27, 1558, he was summoned to take the degree of the coif in the ensuing Easter Term. Before that time arrived the death of Mary had taken place, and Queen Elizabeth had, on January 22, 1559, raised him to the office of attorney-general. He retained his important post for twenty-two years, during which time there are only two English state trials reported—those of the Duke of Norfolk and of his servant Hickford for high treason in 1571. At both of these Gerard assisted, and in the first took a prominent part. In the last Hickford pleaded guilty. (State Trials, i. 957-1030.)

He was knighted in 1570, and was promoted to the office of master of the Rolls on May 30, 1581. While occupying this post he seems to have been more engaged in criminal trials than when he was attorney-general, as the 'Baga de Secretis' contains the proceedings of five in which he is named as a commissioner. He was also one of the commissioners on the arraignment of Davison, and joined with his colleagues in the shameful sentence pronounced against the secretary, of whom he says that 'his great zeal made him forget his duty.' (State Trials, i. 1094, 1230, 1250, 1315.)

During the vacancy in the office of chancellor between November 20, 1591, and May 28, 1592, he was placed at the head of the commission for hearing causes in Chancery. This of itself would be a sufficient contradiction to the account of Dugdale, who says that he died shortly after January 8, 1592, 34 Elizabeth, the date of his will, which was proved in 'April next ensuing.' It turns out, however, that the probate is dated on April 6, 1593, and the entry in the parish register of Ashley in Staffordshire rather unusually records his death on February 4, 1592-3, and his burial on the 6th of March following. A noble monument was erected to his memory. (Notes and Queries, 1st S. vii. 609.)

By his wife Anne, daughter and heir of William Ratcliffe, he had, besides four daughters, two sons, Thomas and Ratcliffe, from both of whom peerages sprang, all of which have since become extinct. (Dugdale's Baron. ii. 417; Wotton's Baronet. i. 51, iv. 271, 270.)

GERNEMUE, ADAM DE (Yarmouth), was one of the justices itinerant who, in 19 and 20 Henry II., 1173-4, fixed the tallage for Essex and Hertford, and for Norfolk and Suffolk. (Madox, i. 124, 701.) He probably held some office in the king's court or household, for he was one of the four commissioners whom the king in 1174 sent over to Ireland to settle the affairs of that country, and to bring Raymond over to England. (Brady's England, 363.)

Camden (Remains, 247) relates a story of Adam de Gernemue, who, being clerk of the signet, was summoned before Henry I. by Thurstan le Despencer, or steward, for refusing to sign a bill he had without a fee, as was the custom among the officers of the court. Upon Adam's answering that he merely desired him to bestow two spice cakes made for the king's own mouth, the king compelled Thurstan to put off his cloak and to go and bring the two cakes on a white napkin, and with a low curtesy to present them to Adam. He then made them friends, observing that 'officers of the court must gratifie and shew cast of their office, not only one to another, but also to strangers, whenever need shall require.'

GERNUM, RALPH, was one of those before whom a fine was levied at Westminster in 3 Henry III., and described as justices itinerant.

He was descended from Robert de Gernon, a Norman who, for the assistance he gave to William the Conqueror, received various lordships in Hertfordshire. His father Ralph was great-grandson of this Robert, and his mother was a sister of William de Breuse. During John's reign he was one of his marshals (Rot. Claus. i. 77), and was a firm adherent to him in his troubles. Several valuable grants of land rewarded his loyalty, besides other marks of favour and confidence.

In 4 Henry III. he was twice sent over to Poitou, and the last time to accompany the king's sister Joanna to England. In 5 Henry III. he was appointed constable of the castle of Corfe, which he held for many years. In 7 and 8 Henry III. he was sheriff of the county of Dorset, and in the following year he was appointed one of the justices itinerant for that county. (Ibid. i. 418-586, ii. 76.) He lived to a good old age, and died in 1247. His son William had two sons, from one of whom, Geoffrey, descended Chief Justice Sir John Cavendish, a name assumed from a lordship so called in Suffolk.

GESTLING, JOHN DE, had property at Winchelsea, and is first named as a justicier in 9 Richard I., 1198, and acted regularly in that capacity during the first ten years of John's reign, and up to 4 Henry III. He died about 1223. (Dugdale's Orig. 41, &c.)

GIBBEWIN, GEOFFREY, is recorded by Madox (ii. 43), from the archives of Westminster Abbey, as taking a fine in the King's Court at Westminster in 3 Henry III., but he is not mentioned in any other record as occupying a place on the bench. He had land at Bixie in Oxfordshire, the corn of which he gave to the monks of Thame (Rot. Claus. ii. 62); and there is a hamlet near Henley in that county still called Bix Gibwen.

GIBBS, VICARY, was the son of George Abraham Gibbs, Esq., a member of the medical profession practising at Exeter till 1781, when he retired to a small estate he had inherited at Clyst St. George. He was born in October 1751, and was sent to Eton, and thence was elected scholar of King's College, Cambridge. At the former he contributed some elegant Latin compositions to the 'Musæ Etonenses,' and at the latter he was notorious for his scholarship in Greek. Taking his degree of B.A. in 1772, he was elected fellow of his college, and became a member of Lincoln's Inn in August 1769. When he commenced business for himself as a special pleader he soon acquired a high reputation for ability in the science. The most complicated cases were submitted to him, and they flowed in with such abundance that he was wont to complain of the absence of easy ones. Yet he enjoyed the usual pleasures of society, of which the theatre was one of his favourite relaxations, evidenced by an extensive familiarity with almost every line of Shakspeare, and with passages and scenes from the best comedies.

He was called to the bar in February 1783, and in the next year he married. Joining the Western Circuit, he soon obtained sufficient employment, leading naturally to equal success in Westminster Hall, and only ten years after his call Horne Tooke, disregarding Mr. Gibbs's known predilections on the side 'of public peace and public order,' and no doubt being aware of his energetic defence at Exeter of the Rev. Mr. Winterbotham, indicted for alleged sedition in two sermons (State Trials, xxii. 838, 884), strongly recommended him to be employed in aid of Erskine in the trials for high treason that were then about to take place. Discarding all political prepossessions, Mr. Gibbs threw himself into the cases with such zeal, and displayed so much constitutional learning, that by his exposition of the law and application of the facts, almost as much as by the wonderful eloquence of his leader, verdicts of acquittal were not only gained for all the defendants in those extraordinary trials, but also a release from apprehension for the numerous misguided men who might have been implicated in the transactions which formed the groundwork of the charge. Sir John Scott (Lord Eldon), the prosecutor on these trials, sent him across the table this written testimony at the termination of them: 'I say from my heart that you did yourself great credit as a good man, and great credit as an excellent citizen, not sacrificing any valuable public principle; I say from my judgment that no lawyer ever did himself more credit or his client more service; so help me, God!'

This masterly performance at once raised Mr. Gibbs to the front rank of his profession, and led to a rapid succession of forensic honours. The recordership of Bristol he had received in February 1794, before the treason trials, as a recognition of his legal merits. In the following years he was made king's counsel, and received the appointment of solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales, which was followed by that of his royal highness's attorney-general. In 1804 he was promoted to the chief justiceship of Chester, and in February 1805 he became solicitor-general in Mr. Pitt's last administration, and was then knighted. He held this place for a year only, resigning on that statesman's death; but the whig administration that succeeded holding the reins of government little more than twelve months, Sir Vicary, on their exclusion, was restored to office, but in the higher grade of attorney-general.

In the parliament that followed the change of ministry he had the honour of being returned for his own university, defeating the late chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Henry Petty, and also the late prime minister, Lord Palmerston, then first entering into political life. As a senator he undoubtedly did not shine, his style of eloquence not being adapted to the audience he was addressing. As a legislator, the only statute he introduced was one enacting that a person against whom an information had been filed might be arrested and held to bail (48 Geo. III. c. 58), the provisions of which were so obnoxious that neither he nor any subsequent attorney-general ever put them in force. In the exercise of his official functions he is considered to have been extremely severe, and there is no doubt that he filed many more ex-officio informations than any of his predecessors. The fact is that while Sir Vicary held office seditious libels were the order of the day, and there was so much licentiousness in certain publications of the daily and weekly press that it was deemed necessary to put some restraint on them. But it might well be a question whether the attorney-general's power was not too freely exercised, when by a return made to the House of Commons it appears that from 1808 to 1810 no less than forty-two informations had been filed, while only fourteen had been filed during the preceding seven years. The wisdom of these proceedings becomes still more doubtful, when out of these forty-two informations no less than twenty-five were not prosecuted, but the subjects of them were left in a state of suspense and anxiety. The sentences passed on those who were convicted show, by their severity, how strongly the judges felt the necessity of stopping the seditious incitements, and how clearly they saw the danger that induced the attorney-general to prosecute them.

Among the acquitted were James Perry and John Lambert for an apparently innocent passage in the 'Morning Chronicle,' and John and Leigh Hunt for a much more questionable article in the 'Examiner.' These defeats seem to have put an end to any further proceedings on Sir Vicary's ex-officio informations, but not before a general outcry had been excited against the frequency of them; and the active mover no doubt incurred great unpopularity, which was aggravated by the personal character of severity and harshness which generally but undeservedly attached to him. Few men were really more sensitive, more kind-hearted, more anxious to atone for an unpremeditated wrong, and more desirous of the good opinion of good and moral men. But his manner was so caustic and bitter, and sometimes so rude and uncivil, that the prevalent feeling would be amply justified; and his assumption of superiority over his brother barristers, which on one occasion received a severe rebuke, did not tend to remove it.

At the same time his superior merits as a lawyer were universally acknowledged. After he had filled his office for five years he found its duties, together with his vast accumulation of business both in court and in chambers, so much more onerous than his strength or his health could bear that on May 28, 1812, he accepted a seat in the Common Pleas as puisne judge. He sat there only eighteen months, when he was promoted to be chief baron of the Exchequer in November 1813. In less than three months Sir James Mansfield's retirement enabled him to take the place which he most desired and was best fitted for. He was sworn lord chief justice of the Common Pleas in Hilary vacation 1814, and presided in that court for nearly five years. The attacks of ill-health from which he had long suffered, and to which it is charitable to attribute much of his ill temper, becoming more frequent, he felt himself compelled to resign his seat on November 5, 1818.

As a judge all competent authorities give him the highest praise. The prejudice which undoubtedly existed against him personally is altogether silenced when his judgments are the subject of observation. One of the most severe of his critics admits that 'there was but one opinion as to his fitness for the situation which he had been selected to fill, and that in point of learning and experience no one could be better qualified for it. . . . His decisions on the bench or at Nisi Prius furnished equal proofs of the extent of his learning and of the accuracy of his mind.'

On quitting the bench he retired altogether from public life. In his domestic society he had always shone, and they who partook of it are loud in their declaration of the charms he imparted to it. His familiar friends, and they were many from both sides of politics, bear witness to his virtues, his high religious feelings, his honourable principles, his goodness of heart, and the kindness of his disposition, notwithstanding occasional irritabilities of temper. After suffering for fifteen months, he died on February 8, 1820, and was buried in the family vault at Hayes, with a monumental inscription of great elegance and truth penned by his friend Sir William Scott, Lord Stowell.

He married, in June 1784, Frances Cerjoit Kenneth, sister of Francis Humberston Mackenzie, Lord Seaforth; and their only child, Maria Elizabeth, was married to Lieutenant-General Sir Andrew Pilkington, K.C.B.

GIFFARD, WILLIAM (BISHOP OF WINCHESTER), was a Norman of high birth, and probably a relative of Walter Giffard, who came over with King William at the time of the Conquest, and was rewarded with the earldom of Buckingham. In consequence of that connection he was in all likelihood received into the Conqueror's household as one of his chaplains; but the first certain notice of his name is as chancellor.

He is placed by all the authorities as the last chancellor to William I., succeeding William Welson, afterwards Bishop of Thetford; and is generally mentioned as the first chancellor under William II., and to have been succeeded by Robert Bloet in 1090. His restoration to the chancellorship between 1093 and 1098 is rendered certain by his witnessing in that character a charter granting the manor of Stone to Rochester Cathedral; for, though it is undated, one of its witnesses is Robert Bloet, Bishop of Lincoln, who was not raised to that see till 1093; while Walkeline, Bishop of Winchester, another witness, died in January 1098. (Dugdale's Monast. i. 164, 241, vi. 1271.) By a similar process of investigation his continuance in the office may be traced to the end of the reign, and that he so continued at the commencement of that of Henry I. appears by several charters granted by that king. (Ibid. i. 241, ii. 18, v. 14.) He was superseded in his office by Roger, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, who is designated chancellor in two charters, dated September 3, 1101. (Ibid. iv. 16, 17.) After Roger's elevation to the episcopal bench, however, Giffard was reinstated, as appears from his being present as chancellor at the signing of the convention between King Henry and the Earl of Flanders, on March 10, 1103 (Rymer, i. 7, 12), shortly after which there is every probability that he was discharged from the office in consequence of the displeasure of the king.

At the coronation, or soon after the accession of Henry, Giffard had been nominated to the vacant bishopric of Winchester; but his consecration had been prevented at first by the absence of Archbishop Anselm, and then by that prelate's refusal to perform the ceremony upon him, and several others then appointed, unless the king would give up the right of investiture, which had been gradually assumed by the crown. This dispute lasted for the four following years, and was then terminated by mutual concessions, the king giving up the claim to invest with the crozier and ring, and being allowed to retain the more important right of receiving the fealty and homage of the bishops for their temporal possessions. This accommodation was arranged in 1107, and on August 11 Anselm solemnly consecrated seven bishops, William Giffard being among the number.

He presided over his see for nearly twenty-one years, during which period he performed many acts to make his rule remembered. He introduced monks of the Cistercian order into England, and in 1128 founded an abbey for them at Waverley in Surrey. He erected a priory for Augustin canons at Taunton in Somersetshire. He was either the founder of, or the principal contributor to, the priory of St. Mary Overy in Southwark, and he built the magnificent mansion there which was so long the residence of his successors when in London. His death occurred on January 25, 1120.

There is no act recorded of him that throws doubt on the praises awarded by Henry of Huntingdon, and Thomas Rudborne in his 'History of Winchester;' and, holding the office of chancellor five times under three kings, the last of whom was celebrated for his discrimination, he must have been endowed with no ordinary qualifications. (Godwin, 213; Angl. Sac. i. 270, 700; Roger de Wendover, ii. 164, &c.; Rapin; Turner; Lingard.)

GIFFARD, RICHARD, the great-grandson of Osbert, one of the Norman barons who accompanied the Conqueror, and a younger son of Elias Giffard, the third lord of Brinsfield in Gloucestershire, was one of the eighteen justices itinerant who were appointed to administer justice throughout the kingdom by the council of Northampton, 22 Henry II., 1176. (Madox, i. 126-135.) In 1180 he was bailiff of the Oximin in Normandy, receiving 200*l.* per annum as custos of the castle of Falaise. To the hospital of the latter town he was a benefactor. (Rot. Scacc. Norm. i. 41.) One of his descendants was summoned to parliament, but the title became extinct in 1322. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 499.)

GIFFARD, HUGH, if not, as not unlikely, the son of Osbert Giffard, who was a natural son of King John (Dugdale's Baron. i. 501), was undoubtedly of noble connection, as William, Earl of Salisbury, Hugh de Mortuo Mari, and Walter de Clifford became his pledges in 1 Henry III. that he would satisfy the king for a transgression which he had presumed to commit. From the rest of the record it may be collected that this offence was his marriage, without the royal licence, with Sibilla, the daughter of Walter de Cormaill, an heiress. (Rot. Claus. i. 301.) In 20 Henry III. Hugh Giffard was made constable of the Tower of London: and two years after a fine was levied before him as a justicier (Dugdale's Baron. i. 502), probably only sitting as constable, as his name does not afterwards occur in a judicial character. He was connected with the household of Edward the king's son, and several payments were made to him for the prince's expenses, and other payments up to 26 Henry III. (Issue Roll, iii. 15, 18, 29, 30.)

It appears that in 1256 King Henry gave his widow and her son, the next-mentioned Walter Giffard, permission to live in the castle of Oxford during pleasure (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 243), and by a pedigree in Dugdale's 'Baronage' (i. 424), under the title 'Cormeilles,' it seems that she had another son, named Geoffrey, which is probably a misreading for Godfrey, Bishop of Worcester, also hereafter noticed, who, according to Richardson's notes on Godwin (461), was Walter's brother.

GIFFARD, WALTER (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), was, as before stated, the son of the above Hugh Giffard, and of Sibilla de Cormaill. The first notice of his name occurs in the permission from King Henry III., on November 3, 1256, to 'Sibille Giffard, and her son, Master Walter Giffard,' to lodge in the castle of Oxford, and to use the mills below it. He afterwards became a canon of Wells and a chaplain to the pope, and on May 22, 1264, was elected Bishop of Bath and Wells.

After the battle of Evesham, which was fought on August 4, 1265, he was appointed chancellor, in the room of Thomas de Cantilupe, who had been nominated by the barons. He was translated to the archbishopric of York on October 18, 1266; soon after which he is believed to have resigned the Great Seal, but the actual date of his retirement nowhere appears. He still continued a member of the king's council, and in 54 Henry III. was sheriff of the counties of Nottingham and Derby, an office which he filled from that time till 1 Edward I.

On the accession of Edward I. he was selected as one of the regents of the kingdom during the king's absence, and was made constable of the Tower of London, and according to Philipot was also treasurer. Various dates are assigned for his death, but the most probable seems to be April 25, 1278. He was buried in York Cathedral. (Godwin, 373, 682; Le Neve, 32, 308.)

GIFFARD, GODFREY (BISHOP OF WORCESTER), is said by Bishop Godwin (461) to have been near to the king in blood, and Richardson, his editor, adds that he was the brother of the above Walter Giffard, Archbishop of York.

On November 6, 1265, he was collated archdeacon of Barum (Barnstaple), (Le Neve, 98), and in the following May he occupied the post of chancellor of the Exchequer, and had permission to appoint a substitute to act during his absence. (Madox, i. 476, ii. 52.)

In 1268 he was appointed chancellor of England, in the room of his brother, Walter Giffard, probably soon after that prelate's promotion to the see of York. In June 1268 he was elected Bishop of Worcester, and continued chancellor till the 29th of October following. In 6 Edward I., 1278, he was at the head of the justices itinerant for the counties of Hereford, Hertford, and Kent.

He died on January 26, 1301. He was a man of high spirit, overbearing, and litigious, and made his visitations burthen-some by the extent of his retinue, which amounted to near a hundred horse. (Chambers's Illust. Worcestershire.)

GIFFARD, GEORGE MARKHAM, one of the present lord justices of appeal in Chancery, is the son of Admiral Giffard, by Susannah, daughter of Sir John Carter. He was born at the Dockyard, Portsmouth, in the year 1813, and was educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, of which he eventually became a fellow. Entering the society of the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar on November 20, 1840, and practised in the Court of Chancery. He was raised to the rank of queen's counsel in 1858, and took a prominent lead without holding any official situation till 1868, when, on March 5, he was made a vice-chancellor and knighted, and in less than ten months was promoted, on January

1, 1869, to his present judicial seat, in each case succeeding Sir William Page Wood (Lord Hatherley). He was thereupon added to the privy council.

He is married to Maria, daughter of Charles Pilgrim, Esq., of Kingsfield, Southampton.

GIFFORD, ROBERT (LORD GIFFORD), was the son of Robert Gifford, carrying on the business of grocer and linendraper in the city of Exeter, where he was born on February 24, 1779. From his earliest youth he showed remarkable quickness and an ardent desire of improvement. His greatest delight was to attend the assizes and watch the proceedings of the courts, and he longed for an opportunity to emulate the talents he witnessed. Though his father could not afford to educate him for the bar, he so far encouraged his taste as to article him to Mr. Jones, a respectable attorney of his native city, with whom he served the whole of his time. Here he made himself so practically useful in the business of the office that during the illness of his master he was entrusted with its sole management. Before the end of his clerkship his father died, and at its termination he entered himself at the Middle Temple in 1800. After a year or two's study under Mr. Robert Bayley and Mr. Godfrey Sykes, eminent special pleaders, he commenced practice for himself in the same line. For five years he pursued this useful branch with considerable success, and was called to the bar on February 12, 1808.

He joined the Western Circuit, and the Exeter and Devon Sessions, where he soon acquired an extensive business. In London too his abilities were soon recognised, and many opportunities occurred in which he distinguished himself by his intimate acquaintance with the law of real property, by the ready cogency of his arguments, and by his easy elocution.

He had been only nine years at the bar when he was appointed solicitor-general on May 9, 1817. So entirely did he owe it to his professional merit that many of those advocates who were opposed to the government acknowledged its propriety. He was then knighted and elected bencher of his inn, and took his place in the House of Commons as member for Eye in Suffolk. On that stage, though not acting a prominent part in politics, he assisted the government by the dexterity he displayed, and by the clearness with which he explained their legal measures. He was almost immediately called upon to take part in those state prosecutions rendered necessary by the treasonable practices of the time. The talent he displayed on these occasions at once dissipated all doubts upon the propriety of his promotion. In July 1819 he succeeded to the office of attorney-general, and, holding it at the commencement of the reign of George IV., it fell to his lot in April 1820 to conduct the prosecution of the conspirators who were implicated in the Cato Street plot for overturning the government, intended to be commenced by the assassination of all the ministers at a cabinet dinner. (State Trials, xxxii. 538, &c., xxxiii. 716, &c.) In the same year he had the more arduous duty imposed upon him of opening the charges against Queen Caroline in support of the preamble of the Bill of Pains and Penalties; his comparative failure in which was amply redeemed by his powerful reply, which in the most perspicuous manner collected all the facts and corroborative evidence into one focus, and to the satisfaction of most unprejudiced minds made clear and evident the guilt of that unfortunate lady. But few, though they could not shut their eyes to her misconduct, approved of the proceedings, and the outcry was so great at the harshness and impolicy of the measure that the ministers were obliged to withdraw the bill. The temporary popularity of the queen soon subsided, and her death, which was hastened by chagrin, occurred soon after the coronation in the next year.

Exercising his office with great moderation, he instituted very few prosecutions, and principally confined himself to his forensic duties in Chancery, to which court he had removed on being appointed solicitor-general. Here he obtained very considerable practice, which was greatly increased after the lamentable death of Sir Samuel Romilly. In the House of Lords also he had the principal lead, especially in the appeals from Scotland, having carefully made himself master of the laws of that country. As recorder of Bristol, to which he had been elected on the resignation of Sir Vicary Gibbs, he was such a favourite with the corporation that they placed his portrait, a whole-length by Sir Thomas Lawrence, in their town-hall.

After filling the office of attorney-general for four years and a half, he was raised to the bench on January 9, 1824, as lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, and was ennobled on the 31st of the same month by the title of Lord Gifford of St. Leonards in the county of Devon. This elevation to the peerage he owed to the alteration then adopted in the House of Lords in the hearing of appeals, and he was constituted at the same time deputy speaker for the special purpose of hearing those from Scotland. So satisfied were the Scottish lawyers with his decisions that on a visit to Edinburgh a short time after he was received and invested with extraordinary honours. In less than three months he changed his judicial post for the more appropriate one of master of the Rolls, to which he was removed on April 5. The increase of labour consequent on these appointments at length weighed upon his spirits, and so greatly affected his health and strength that he succumbed to a bilious attack on September 4, 1826, at Dover, where he was spending his vacation. His remains repose in the Rolls Chapel.

At the time of his premature death he was only in the forty-eighth year of his age. He was then the universally designated heir to the chancellorship upon the expected resignation of Lord Eldon. But he was not permitted thus to complete the parallel with Lord Chancellor King. Lord Tenterden wrote of him: 'The present attorney-general (Gifford) will probably be his (Lord Eldon's) successor; he is a sound lawyer and a sound-hearted man . . . the fittest man living to succeed one for whom a successor must soon be found—though perhaps an equal will never be.' High as was his professional character, in private life he was equally to be admired. Unaffected, amiable, kind, and indulgent, he secured the affection of numerous friends, and totally disarmed whatever jealousy might at first have been entertained at his sudden advancement.

He married in 1816 the daughter of the Rev. Edward Drew, rector of Willand in Devonshire, and by her had seven children, the eldest of whom is the present peer.

GILBERT, JEFFREY, who, from his arms being somewhat similar to those of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the noted seaman and discoverer in Queen Elizabeth's reign, is supposed to have belonged to a branch of that family, is said to have been born at Burr's Farm, a manor in the parish of Goudhurst in Kent, which he afterwards purchased, in 1674. He was the son of William Gilbert, Esq., and Elizabeth his wife. Admitted into the Inner Temple in 1692, he was called to the bar in 1698, and, judging from the numerous treatises of which he was the author, he must have been indefatigable in his early studies. He commenced taking notes of cases in 1706, when his Equity Reports begin. It is evident that he had established a good legal reputation before 1714, as on November 8 of that year he was appointed one of the judges of the King's Bench in Ireland, from which he was promoted on the 16th of the following June to be chief baron of the Exchequer there. In 1719 he and the other barons were committed by the Irish House of Lords to the custody of the usher of the black rod, for granting an injunction in pursuance of an order of the English House of Lords (State Trials, xv. 1301-16) in an appeal from the Irish courts (Annesley v. Sherlock). In the next year an act of parliament was passed putting an end to the dispute by excluding the Irish House of Lords from any jurisdiction, and, though this act was afterwards repealed, the whole question is since settled by the Act of Union. How long the barons remained in custody is not mentioned, but the conduct of the chief was evidently approved by the English government. His epitaph says that he was offered the Great Seal of Ireland, and that he refused the honour, and resigned his place upon being made a baron of the English Exchequer in May 1722. He received the honour of knighthood in January 1724. On the resignation of Lord Macclesfield he was nominated second commissioner of the Great Seal, and filled that position from January 7 to June 1, 1725, on which day he was promoted to the place of chief baron, which seat he only occupied for fifteen months, being snatched away by an early death on October 14, 1726. This event occurred at Bath, in the abbey church of which he was buried. A tablet to his memory is placed in the Temple Church, with an elegant eulogium in Latin of his legal and scientific attainments.

Of all the works that appear under his name, and which exhibit so much learning in almost every variety of legal investigation that they are still constantly referred to as authority, it is extraordinary that none were published in his lifetime. They comprehend Reports in Equity, histories of the Courts of Exchequer, Common Pleas, and Chancery, and treatises on Uses and Trusts, Tenures, Devises, Ejectments, Distresses, Executions, Rents, Remainders, and Evidence. This latter Blackstone describes as excellent, and calls it 'a work which it is impossible to abstract or abridge without losing some beauty and destroying the chain of the whole.' He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and was equally famous for his mathematical as for his legal studies, and for his refined taste in polite literature. The modesty he showed in not himself publishing any of his works distinguished him throughout his career; and he was held in as much esteem by his contemporaries as he is regarded with respect and admiration at the present day. (Lord Raymond, 1380-1420; Hasted's Kent, vii. 77, 195.)

GISELHAM, WILLIAM DE, probably took his name from the place so called in Suffolk. On several occasions from 7 to 14 Edward I. he is described as the king's attorney, and in the tenth year both he and Gilbert de Thornton are designated 'narratores pro rege.' In 9 Edward I. he was called to the degree of king's serjeant-at-law; but it should be observed that all who are noticed at this time as of the degree of the coif seem to have been so designated, and that it is doubtful whether the modern distinction then existed.

When Edward I. purified the bench in 1229 of those members who had disgraced it, William de Giselham was constituted one of the new judges of the Common Pleas. In January 1293 he came to an untimely end, but no other particulars of his death have been found than are contained in a letter from William de Weresminster to John de Langton, the chancellor, in which he simply communicates that William de Giselham had been killed. (7 Report Pub. Rec. App. ii. 249.)

GLANVILLE, RANULPH DE, was born at Stratford in Suffolk. He was a grandson of a baron of the same name, whose possessions were in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and younger son of William de Glanville, and on the death of Bartholomew, his eldest brother, he succeeded to the barony.

Long previous to this event he had raised himself to a considerable position. It does not precisely appear in what capacity he began his career, but it seems most likely that he filled some office in the Exchequer. It was probably in this character that he held the office of sheriff of Warwick and Leicester in 10 Henry II., 1164, and that in the same year he was advanced to the sheriffalty of the more important county of York. The former he retained for only one year, but in the latter he continued during the whole remainder of the reign. These appointments took place twelve years before his name is recorded as a justicier; but after he was raised to the bench several other counties were placed under his care as sheriff.

According to Benedict Abbas, Queen Eleanor was consigned to his care during the sixteen years of her confinement in the castle at Winchester, of which, and also of the royal treasury there, he had the custody. That he treated her with the respect due to her station is shown by the confidence she reposed in him when placed in authority on her release.

During his northern sheriffalty his military talents were called into action by the incursion of the Scots, and his efficiency as an energetic and brave commander was soon proved. Having, with the assistance of King Henry's illegitimate son Geoffrey, then Bishop of Lincoln, forced the Scottish king to retire, that monarch a short time afterwards renewed his attack, and while his army was ravaging the neighbouring country he himself besieged Alnwick. There Ranulph de Glanville, at the head of the Yorkshire barons, surprised him on July 11, 1174, and, defeating his troops, took him prisoner. (Lord Lyttelton, iii. 135, 148.) This victory was of the highest importance to King Henry in the critical state of the kingdom, then distracted by the rebellious conduct of his sons. From this time, therefore, the valorous sheriff, brought more immediately under the king's notice, was employed in services for which he was not long in proving that he was equally fitted.

In the very next year he appears as a justice itinerant, his pleas being recorded not only in his own county of York, but in thirteen other counties, and in 1176 one of the six circuits into which the council of Northampton then divided the kingdom was appropriated to him and two others. When the council of Windsor in 1179 rearranged the kingdom for judicial purposes into four divisions, although most of his brethren were removed, his capacity was so conspicuous and his integrity so unblemished that he was not only reappointed to act in one of them, but was among those specially selected to hear the complaints of the people in the Curia Regis at Westminster (Mador, i. 77, 125-137), and in 1180 he was appointed chief justiciary, and continued in the office during the whole remainder of the reign, as high in the royal favour and confidence at the close as at the commencement, being named one of the executors to the king's will. A dereliction from the path of judicial integrity is reported of him in having, in 1184, condemned Sir Gilbert de Plumpton to death on a charge of rape, for the purpose of giving the widow of the unfortunate knight, a rich inheritor, to his friend Rainer, who performed his duties as sheriff of Yorkshire. The execution of the sentence was delayed by the interference of the Bishop of Worcester, and, the case being remitted to the king, Sir Gilbert's life was saved, but his person imprisoned for the rest of the reign. Presuming this story to be true, the chief justiciary's merit must have been great indeed to induce the king to pardon so monstrous a perversion of justice. Much doubt, however, cannot but be attached to the relation. It appears that in his account of the year as sheriff of York he charges 13s. for conveying Sir Gilbert from York to Worcester, and in the next year accounts for half a year's rent of his lands. Gilbert's brother afterwards pays a fine of 100 marks for his discharge, and Rainer pays a fine of 1000 marks for having the king's benevolence. These show no evidence that Ranulph de Glanville was cognisant of Gilbert's innocence, or a party to Rainer's intentions towards the lady. (Plumpton Corresp. x.) Indeed, it is scarcely possible to suppose that a king so just as Henry II. would have overlooked the guilt of the judge or have visited the innocence of the accused with imprisonment.

In the year after his appointment he headed a large army against the Welsh, and, though at first he made little progress, he succeeded at last, not only in bringing them back to their fealty, but in procuring from them a large body of infantry to serve in the subsequent wars against Philip of France. In those wars we find him successfully engaged in procuring a truce between the two kings. (Lord Lyttelton, iii. 360, 441.) So high an opinion had Henry of his wisdom and sagacity that he sent him with his son John to assist and direct in the government of Ireland. (Leiland's Ireland, i. 143.)

In 1188, when the crusade was preached at Gedington, though his age and position would have been a sufficient excuse, he partook of the enthusiasm and engaged in the enterprise. The king's death, which happened the next year, only delayed, but did not prevent, the performance of his vow. His piety was further evidenced by the foundation and endowment of the priory of Butley and the abbey of Leystone, both in Suffolk, for canons of the order of St. Augustin. (Dugdale's Monast. vi. 379, 879.)

In his character of chief justiciary he assisted at the coronation of Richard I., on September 3, 1189, and was sent by the king to restrain the people from the massacre of the Jews which disgraced that solemnity. Two or three authors testify that he was deprived of his office at the beginning of this reign, and was obliged to purchase his release from imprisonment by an enormous fine, fixed by some at 5000*l.* and by others at 15,000*l.* The silence of other historians throws a discredit on the story, which is supported by his subsequent proceedings. His retirement from the office of chief justiciary would be a necessary result of his determination to proceed to Jerusalem, and his payment of a sum of money to assist the king in his holy war would be only what that monarch required from all who could afford it. The roll of that year, so far from giving any evidence of his disgrace, proves plainly that he continued to act in his judicial character after the death of King Henry. (Pipe Roll, 8, 15, &c.) There is also subsequent evidence of his being with the king in Normandy on his way to the Holy Land, as he is the first of the witnesses attesting a royal charter given under the hand of John de Alençon, the vice-chancellor, 'apud Moret,' on April 11, 1190, 1 Richard I. (Mador, i. 77), and he afterwards travelled towards Jerusalem in company with Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Hubert Walter, his nephew, Bishop of Salisbury, and landed at Tyre about Michaelmas 1190, all of them having been despatched by King Richard to assist at the siege of Acre, and having previously, according to some accounts, accompanied the king himself through France as far as Marseilles.

He and his companions reached Acre, before which Archbishop Baldwin first fell a victim, and then, before the end of the year, Ranulph de Glanville; not, as sometimes stated, in the heat of battle, but 'ex aëris nimia corrptione.' (R. de Wendover, iii. 30, 36.)

He married Berta, one of the daughters of Theobald de Valoins, lord of Parham. Leaving no male issue, he distributed his lands before he sailed on his last expedition among his three daughters—Matilda, the wife of William de Auberville, a before-named justicier; Amabilia, the wife of Ralph de Arden, a justicier also before-named; and Helewise, the wife of Robert Fitz-Robert.

Although some question has been raised whether the work generally attributed to this great man, entitled 'Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ,' was really composed by him, there are still stronger grounds for considering him as its author. If decisive evidence of the fact cannot be advanced, there is at all events no candidate who has superior claims to the honour of having produced it, nor is there any hypothesis of sufficient weight to counterbalance the presumptions in favour of the tradition. (Dugdale's Baron, i. 423; Lord Lyttelton; Lingard.)

GLANVILLE, WILLIAM DE, no otherwise appears in connection with his eminent namesake than that he was a witness, with the title of 'clericus,' to the charter of Hervey Walter, Ranulph de Glanville's brother-in-law, to the priory of Butley, which was founded by the chief justiciary. (Monast. v. 380.) He was one of the justiciers in 7, 8, and 9 Richard I., and was still alive in 3 John. (Madox, i. 705; Hunter's Preface; Rot. Cancell.)

Mr. Hunter, in his valuable preface to the 'Fines of Richard I. and John,' suggests the possibility of his having been the author of the treatise generally attributed to Ranulph de Glanville; but he offers no other grounds for the suggestion than the identity of the name.

GLANVILLE, OSBERT DE, was present as a justicier when fines were levied in the Curia Regis in 28 and 35 Henry II., 1182, 1189. (Hunter's Preface.) As the former of these years was soon after the appointment of Ranulph de Glanville to the office of chief justiciary, and the latter just before his retirement from it, it is probable that Osbert was in some way related to him, and had been brought into the court under his auspices. This is rendered still more likely by the fact that he was one of the witnesses to the justiciary's charter to the priory of Butley. (Monast. vi. 180.)

GLANVILLE, GILBERT DE (BISHOP OF ROCHESTER), was archdeacon of Lisieux when, on July 16, 1185, 31 Henry II., he was elected Bishop of Rochester, and was obliged to be ordained priest before he received consecration. He appears among the justiciers in 1 Richard I., 1189, and acted as a justice itinerant in several counties. He was present also in 5 and 7 Richard I., when fines were levied before him. (Pipe Roll, 27, &c.; Hunter's Preface.)

The whole of his episcopal life was engaged in a contest with the monks of his church relative to certain lands which he claimed as belonging to the see; and they are said by some to have carried their animosity so far as to refuse the ordinary funeral rites to the bishop's body when he died. This, however, according to others, was occasioned by the interdict then hanging over the kingdom. The bishop's death happened on June 24, 1214, and his tomb is within the rails of the altar of his cathedral. He founded, and amply endowed, the hospital at Stroud in Kent, an act which is a sufficient answer to the harsh character given to him by the monks in their doggerel rhymes written on his death.

GLANVILLE, BARTHOLOMEW DE, is inserted by Dugdale as one of the justices itinerant for Norfolk and Suffolk in 9 Henry III. It is found that the record in which his name was at first introduced is altered by substituting that of William de Ambly. (Rot. Claus. ii. 77.)

GLANVILLE, JOHN, is stated by Anthony Wood (Fasti, ii. 64) to have been bred an attorney. If so, he is the first judge who is recorded as having commenced his career in that branch of the profession. He was a younger son of another John Glanville, of Tavistock, and entered himself at Lincoln's Inn in 1507, and, having retired from his first occupation, he was called to the bar in 1574. He filled the office of reader both in Lent and autumn 1589, the latter occasion being in consequence of his having been called to the degree of the cof. Prince states that it was said of him, and of Thomas Harris and Edward Drew, who were called serjeants at the same time, that

One $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{gained} \\ \text{spent} \\ \text{gave} \end{array} \right\}$ as much as the other two.

He does not specially appropriate these characters, but intimates that Drew was on the getting side.

He was promoted to the bench as a justice of the Common Pleas on June 30, 1598, a position which he occupied for little more than two years, his death occurring on July 27, 1600. His monument in Tavistock Church represents him as a corpulent man, in full judicial costume, in a recumbent posture, and is considered a superior work of art. It was erected by his wife, Alice, the daughter of — Skirret, who after his death married Sir Francis Godolphin. He left several children; his second son, Sir John Glanville, who became a serjeant, and was speaker of the House of Commons in April 1640, gained a far higher eminence for his legal attainments than his father did, and his Reports on controverted elections are still in considerable estimation. (Risdon, 403.)

GLOUCESTER, MILO DE (EARL OF HEREFORD), sometimes called Milo Fitz-Walter, was son of Walter, 'constabularius principis militiæ domus regiæ,' who built the castle of Gloucester on his own domain. His mother was Emma, sister of Hameline de Balun, also a powerful noble, and a companion of William the Conqueror on his invasion. By his marriage with Sibyl, the eldest daughter of Bernard de Newmarche, he acquired the honor of Brecknock.

In 31 Henry I. he was sheriff of Staffordshire and Gloucestershire; and one of the entries is an allowance to him as sheriff of thirty shillings for mead and beer provided for the king. By the same roll it appears that he was justice of the forest for the former county, and that he and Pain Fitz-John were justices itinerant in both counties.

On the death of Henry he concurred with the other barons in placing Stephen on the throne, he being then high constable as successor to his father, and received, as the first fruits of his acquiescence, a charter of confirmation of all his lands. The king, in this grant, covenants with him 'sicut baroni et justiciario meo,' evidently using the expression as if the two titles were synonymous.

The royal favour, however, made no permanent impression; for soon after Milo forsook the king's party, and joined that of the Empress Matilda. To that unfortunate lady he proved himself a firm friend during the remainder of his life, receiving her as his guest in her difficulties, supporting her and her establishment at his own expense during a period of two years, guiding her by his counsels, and aiding her by his arms. The oldest patent on record shows the extent of her gratitude. It is dated on July 25, 1141. It confers upon him the title of Earl of Hereford, and gives him and his heirs the castle and moat of Hereford, and extensive privileges. In the following September he was one of those devoted warriors who covered Matilda's retreat from Winchester when closely pressed by the bishop.

He was renowned for his bravery and good conduct, and they were both strongly exemplified in his almost romantic rescue of the sister of the Earl of Chester, when she, after the murder of her husband, Richard de Clare, was besieged by the Welsh, and being without provisions, despaired of succour. He gained the castle on the side where it was considered inaccessible, and relieved her from her dreadful condition.

Unharméd amidst all the perils he had encountered, he was at last accidentally slain by an arrow in a hunting match, on December 24, 1146.

He translated the canons of the abbey of Lanthony in Monmouthshire, who were oppressed by the Welsh, to a place called the Hide, near Gloucester, where he established them in a new abbey called Lanthony Secunda.

He had five sons, all of whom died without issue, and three daughters, the descendants of the eldest of whom acquired, besides the earldom of Hereford, those of Essex and Northampton. These titles all became extinct in 1372. (Dugdale's Monast. vi. 131-136; Mador, i. 40, &c.; Lord Lyttelton; Lingard; Magn. Rot. 31 Henry I.)

GLOUCESTER, WALTER DE, one of the canons of Beverley, is called the son of Simon Lymereeth. (Abb. Placit. 214.) He was an officer of the Exchequer, and in 22 Edward I. was entrusted with the sheriffalty of Dorset and Somerset, which he held for five years. He then was appointed to visit the seaports to enquire into the concealment of the king's customs on wool, &c. (Mador, i. 784, ii. 169.) In 28 Edward I. he was a perambulator of the forests in Hants and Wilts, and about the same time was selected as one of the king's escheators, acting in the north till the end of that reign, and in the south for the first four years of the following. In 35 Edward I. he was a commissioner of array in Glamorgan, and paymaster of the levies there. (Ibid. i. 740.)

During the early years of the reign of Edward II. he was summoned to parliament among the judges, and was regularly constituted one of the three justices of assize for Gloucestershire and four other counties in 1310. Dugdale does not notice him as a baron of the Exchequer, although there is no doubt that he was so, being designated by that title in two writs, directing him to confer with Nicholas de Segrave, and in the letters patent constituting Walter de Norwich a baron in his place. The patent of his own appointment has not been discovered, but it must have been between June 16 and July 5, 1311, the former being the date of his last summons to parliament, where he is evidently placed among the justices of assize, and the latter being that of the writ to Nicholas de Segrave.

He held his rank for little more than six weeks; for his death is recorded in Walter de Norwich's patent, which is dated on August 29. (Parl. Writs, ii. 929.) He died in possession of considerable property in Surrey, and the counties of Lincoln, Worcester, and Gloucester. By his wife Hawise he had a son Walter, who died in 16 Edward II. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 247, 305.)

GLYNNE, JOHN, whose genealogy commences in the year 843 with Cilimir Dredtu, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, was the eldest son of Sir William Glynne, knight, of Glyn-Llivon in Carnarvonshire, by Jane, daughter of John Griffith, Esq., of Carnarvon (Wotton's Baronet. iii. 289), and was born in 1602 at the ancient seat of his ancestors. He was educated at Westminster School, and at Hart Hall, Oxford (now part of New College). At the same time he kept his terms at Lincoln's Inn, and having been called to the bar in 1628, he got quickly into practice, for he appears in Croke's Reports in Hilary Term 1633.

In August 1638 he received a grant of the office of keeper of the writs and rolls in the Common Pleas in reversion (Rymer, xx. 300), a place of considerable profit. Having been previously appointed high steward of Westminster, he was elected representative for that city in both the parliaments that met in 1640. In the last of these, the Long Parliament, he showed himself to be an active partisan of the discontented party. He took a prominent part in the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford; and one of the arguments he used to prove that the multitude of the earl's minor offences amounted to high treason, was 'Raine in dropps is not terrible, but a masse of it did overflow the whole world.' In all the proceedings his reasoning was inconsequential and his conduct harsh and inhuman. He was one of the committee to prepare the votes condemnatory of the canons, and to draw up a charge against Archbishop Laud, and was the messenger from the Commons with a charge of high treason against the bishops who had signed a protestation against the Lords proceeding in their absence. (White-locke, 53.) He supported the remonstrance on the state of the kingdom, the carrying of which had so great an effect in widening the breach with the king (Verney's Notes, 44-125); and he published a speech, delivered by him in January 1642, strenuously vindicating the privileges of the Commons on the occasion of the king's unadvised attendance at the house, and demanding the delivery of the five members whom he had caused to be accused of high treason. (Parl. Hist. ii. 1023.) He further showed his zeal in the cause by subscribing 100*l.* in money or plate, together with the maintenance of a horse, for the defence of the parliament. (Notes and Queries, 1st S. xii. 358.)

His active zeal will account for his being elected on May 30, 1643, recorder of London. In the next year he assisted at the Assembly of Divines, and had the thanks of the house for his speech on the Jus Divinum. In all the questions discussed he was a popular debater, but stoutly opposed the self-denying ordinance. (Clarendon, v. 89.) No unwilling sharer in the forfeited spoils of the loyalists, the small were as welcome as the great, and he did not disdain a grant of the books of Mr. Vaughan of Lincoln's Inn (White-locke, 177), at the time he was being gratified with the clerkship of the petty bag, worth 1000*l.* a year.

The Presbyterian party, with which he was connected, becoming jealous of the army, took measures in June 1647 for its being disbanded. Sir Thomas Fairfax counteracted this attempt by bringing a charge in the name of the army against eleven of the opposing leaders, including Glynne, and insisting on their being sequestered from their attendance on the house. Though the Commons at first resisted the interference, the accused members, upon the army's advance towards London, thought proper to withdraw. This was quickly followed by their impeachment, their expulsion from the house, and the attempt to place Mr. Steele as recorder instead of Glynne. After a year's byplay, resulting in the discharge of the accused, and their being restored to their seats, the farce concluded, having answered its purpose of getting rid for the time of the popular opponents of the army and their plans. (Ibid. 253-310.) Glynne was re-admitted on June 7, 1648, and was so entirely restored to confidence as to be appointed in the following September one of the commissioners to treat with the king in the Isle of Wight, and while engaged in that service to be named, on October 12, a serjeant-at-law. (Ibid. 334, 342.) In December, however, he was one of the victims of Pride's Purge, by the vote of the Rump repealing the previous revocation of the proceedings against the eleven impeached members, which, so far from being detrimental to him, turned out to his future advantage, by relieving him from all implication in the murder of the king.

Glynne's party having now lost all power, he soon after showed an inclination to side with that of Cromwell, who, willing enough to encourage his advances, made him, on becoming protector, his serjeant. In this character he appeared in the High Court of Justice, and went the Oxford Circuit as a judge in 1654. In the same year he received the appointment of chamberlain of Chester, and was returned member for Carnarvonshire in Cromwell's parliament of September, in which he seems to have been extraordinarily silent. In April 1655 he presided at the trial of Colonel Penruddock for the rising in the west, when the judges were seized at Salisbury (State Trials, v. 518, 604, 787; Athen. Oxon. i. xxiii. iii. 604); and on July 15, when Chief Justice Rolle, who had refused to be concerned in that trial, had retired, was put into his place as chief justice of the Upper Bench. (Style's Reports, 452.) This position, there being then no House of Lords, did not disqualify him from sitting for Flintshire in Cromwell's next parliament of September 1656. He supported Alderman's Pack's motion to offer Cromwell the title of king, and, being one of the committee to forward the application, in a roundabout inconclusive speech he endeavoured to remove the protector's scruples, by arguing that the kingly office is essential to our constitution. (Harris's Lives, iii. 472.) He cunningly published his speech as a pamphlet on the king's return, under the title of 'Monarchy asserted to be the best, most ancient, and legal form of Government.' In the new constitution which followed he accepted a seat in Cromwell's House of Peers. (White Locke, 606.)

The protector died on September 3, 1658, and Glynne was continued chief justice by Richard, on whose removal and the return of the Long Parliament, with a prophetic glance at the political horizon, he resigned his chief justiceship. In the new parliament, called the Convention Parliament, that met on April 25, 1660, he was returned for the county, and his son for the town, of Carnarvon, and played his cards so adroitly that, on the arrival of Charles II. in England, he was included in the first batch of serjeants, being those who had been appointed irregularly by the parliament. On November 8, in the same year, all bygones forgotten, he was made, according to Anthony Wood, 'by the corrupt dealing of the then lord chancellor' (Clarendon), the king's serjeant (Siderfin, 3), and was knighted. He and Maynard, who also attained the same rank, were both employed in the crown prosecutions that followed, and divided the shame of appearing against Sir Harry Vane, their old coadjutor and friend. (Burton's Diary, iii. 175, 182.)

Charles's coronation took place on April 23, 1661; and the account given by Pepys of an accident on the occasion shows the feeling that existed in regard to the two legal renegadoes: 'I have not heard of any mischance to anybody through it all, but only to Serjeant Glynne, whose horse fell upon him yesterday and is like to kill him, which people do please themselves to see how just God is to punish the rogue at such a time as this, he being now one of the king's serjeants, and rode in the cavalcade with Maynard, to whom people wish the same fortune.' That the hostile impression was not confined to the courtier is proved by Butler's immortalising their names in the following couplet:—

Did not the learned Glynne and Maynard
To make good subjects traitors strain hard?

He continued in the practice of his profession till his death, which occurred at his house in Portugal Row, Lincoln's Inn Fields, on November 15, 1666. He was buried in his own vault under the altar in St. Margaret's, Westminster.

The reputation of his wealth was no doubt founded in truth; for, besides his professional gains, the places which he enjoyed must have brought him considerable profit. He was undoubtedly an able lawyer, and in his judicial character, as between man and man, was just and impartial. Siderfin (159) states that his plainness and method in arguing the most intricate cases were such that it was made clear to the comprehension of every student. But here his praise must end. As a politician, though the cunning with which he joined all the ruling powers in turn may be admired, who but must despise his various tergiversations?

Sir John was twice married. His first wife was Frances, daughter of Arthur Squib, Esq.; his second was Anne, daughter and coheir of John Manning, Esq., of Cralle in Sussex. By both he left children. His eldest son, William (by his first wife), was, during his father's life, created a baronet on May 20, 1661, and his descendants still enjoy the title.

GODBOLT, JOHN, was of Toddington in Suffolk, and after studying at Barnard's Inn was admitted into Gray's Inn, where he was called to the bar, and was elected reader in autumn 1627, and soon appears in Croke's Reports with considerable practice. He received the dignity of the coif at the great call in 1636; and it must have been from his professional reputation, for there is no account of his interfering in the political troubles of the time, that, when the parliament took upon them to appoint the judges, he was selected to fill a vacant seat in the Common Pleas. This occurred on April 30, 1647, and he was immediately added to the commission to hear causes in Chancery. (White Locke, 245; Journals.) He did not long retain his place, but died at his house in High Holborn on August 3, 1684. (Register.) His collection of Reports was published soon after his death. The family appears to be now extinct.

GODFREDE, WILLIAM, was a resident at Middleton in Norfolk. His name does not occur in the Year Books till he was called to the degree of a serjeant-at-law in 3 Henry VI. In 1431 he received the appointment of king's serjeant, and on July 3, 1433, he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench, his attendance in which court is noticed till Easter, 21 Henry VI., 1443.

His wife Catherine was a great promoter of the rebuilding of the church of Walpole St. Peter in Marshland, in the window of which her effigy is placed. (Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 715.)

GODFREY (BISHOP OF BATH) is placed erroneously by Thynne and Philipot and their followers in the list of the chancellors of Henry I. The sole authority they give is that of Matthew Parker, who in his life of Archbishop William Corbel says that he consecrated 'Godfridum, regni cancellarium, Bathoniensem Episcopum.' The word 'regni,' however, in this passage, was no doubt, by a mistake of the transcriber or the printer, substituted for 'regine,' as Godfrey certainly was chancellor to Queen Adeliza; and the term 'cancellarius regni,' or 'Angliæ,' was not introduced till long afterwards, that officer being invariably called at this period 'cancellarius regis.' This consecration occurred also in 1123, when Ranulph was chancellor.

Godfrey was a Belgian priest who came over to England with the queen on her marriage in 1121, as one of her chaplains. He was soon raised to the post of her chancellor; and, by her interest, shortly afterwards obtained the bishopric of Bath, to which he was consecrated on August 26, 1123. He presided over his see nearly twelve years, and, dying on August 16, 1135, was buried at Bath. (Madox, i. 60; Godwin, 368; Angl. Sac. i. 560.)

GOLDINGTON, WILLIAM DE, whose family was established in Essex, where he held the manors of Raurethe, Badewe Parva, and Ringgers in Terling, is mentioned in the Year Book as an advocate in the early part of the reign of Edward II., in the fourth year of which he was appointed one of the three justices of assize for Kent, Sussex, and Surrey. He continued to serve for several years in those and other counties, and was regularly summoned to parliament in virtue of his office till the eleventh year. He died in 12 Edward II., and left a son named John, who was an adherent of the Earl of Lancaster and the other barons in rebellion. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 934; Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 292.)

GOLDBOROUGH, EDWARD, of Goldborough in Yorkshire, was of a very ancient and respectable family. He was probably an officer of the Exchequer, to the bench of which court he was raised, as third baron, on June 26, 1483, 1 Richard III. He was continued in his place by Henry VII., who made him second baron on December 5, 1488. After sitting there for about six years more, he was succeeded by Thomas Barnewell on October 1, 1494. His daughter Elizabeth married Sir John Gower, the ancestor of the Duke of Sutherland. (Collins's Peerage, ii. 444.)

GOODRICH, THOMAS (BISHOP OF ELY). This learned prelate was the second son of Edward Goodrich, of East Kirby in the county of Lincoln, by his third wife, Jane, sole daughter of Mr. Williamson, of Boston. The name was pronounced and often spelled Goodrick, notwithstanding that the epigram given by Granger (i. 136) suggests a different reading:—

Et bonus, et dives, bene junctus et optimus ordo; Præcedit bonitas, pone sequuntur opes.

He was educated at Benett College, Cambridge, from which he was elected a fellow of Jesus College in 1510, and was proctor of the university in 1515. His proficiency in the canon and civil laws led to his appointment as one of the syndics in 1529, to prepare the university's answer on the question of the king's marriage with Queen Catherine. Thus introduced to the royal notice, he received the rectory of St. Peter's Cheap in London, and was nominated one of the king's chaplains, with a canonry in St. Stephen's, Westminster. On March 17, 1534, he was elected Bishop of Ely. (Rymer, xiv. 486.)

His zeal for the Reformation was soon manifested in his diocese by stringent orders to his clergy to erase the pope's name from all their books, and to demolish all images and relics in their churches. In 1537 he was one of the compilers of the work which was called the 'Bishops' Book;' and soon afterwards the Gospel of St. John was allotted to his share in the revision of the New Testament. In 1540 he seems to have been suspected of being concerned in the translation of Melancthon's Epistle, as his study was directed to be searched. (Acts Privy Council, vii. 98.) Under Edward VI. he assisted in the compilation of the Liturgy; and in 1549 and 1550 he was one of the commissioners assigned to enquire 'super hæretica privatate.' (Rymer, xv. 181, 250.) On December 22, 1551, the Great Seal on the sudden retirement of Lord Chancellor Rich was given into the bishop's hands as keeper. This deposit, which seems in the first instance to have been only temporary till Rich's recovery from his pretended illness, was by the almost immediate discovery of the real cause of that minister's retirement converted into a permanent one, with the full title of lord chancellor, on January 19, 1552.

In the parliament which met on the next day the new Liturgy was made the law of the land. (Robertson's Heylyn, 221, 252, 291.) Previously to the king's death he had settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey, by an instrument which the Duke of Northumberland had induced the bishop to authenticate with the Great Seal. He does not appear to have been consulted on the subject; but with the rest of the council he subscribed the undertaking to support the royal testament, and he acted on the council during the nine days of that unfortunate lady's reign, signing as chancellor several letters issued by them on her behalf, the last of which is dated on July 19. He was accordingly one of the prisoners named for trial on the accession of Queen Mary; and it was perhaps on account of his having joined in the order sent by the council on July 20, commanding the Duke of Northumberland to disarm, that her majesty struck his name out of the list. (Chron. Qn. Jane, 91, 109; Lingard, vii. 122.)

The Great Seal was of course taken from him, and his death within a year from his dismissal probably released him from those investigations which were so fatal to some of his brethren.

He died at his palace at Somersham on May 10, 1554, and on his brass in Ely Cathedral he is represented in his episcopal robes as he wore them after the Reformation, with a Bible in one hand, and the Great Seal in the other. Of his munificent expenditure on the buildings of his see the long gallery at Ely Palace is an existing memorial. (Angl. Sac. i. 676; Godwin, 272.)

GOULD, HENRY, was the son of Andrew Gould, of Winsham in Somersetshire. He was born about 1644, and was called to the bar of the Middle Temple in 1667, and elected a bencher in 1689. Included in the great call of serjeants in 1692, he was made one of the king's serjeants in the following year. In this character he conducted the case for the bill of attainder against Sir John Fenwick in 1696.

On January 26, 1699, he was promoted to be a judge of the King's Bench, and on his first circuit had the unpleasant necessity of inflicting a fine of 100*l.* on Sir John Bolls at Lincoln, for giving him the lie, kicking the sheriff, and other disorderly conduct. (State Trials, xiii. 546; Luttrell, iv. 545.)

On the death of King William his patent was renewed by Queen Anne, under whom he acted for the eight remaining years of his life, dying at his chambers in Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, on March 26, 1710. His residence was at Sharpham Park, between Street and Walton, in Somersetshire, the future birthplace of the celebrated novelist and magistrate Henry Fielding, who was the son of Sarah, the judge's daughter, by her marriage with Lieutenant-General Fielding, nephew of the Earl of Denbigh.

He married Miss Davidge, of Worcester, and by her left a son, Davidge, the father of the next-named judge. (Lord Raymond, 414, 1309; Collinson, ii. 268.)

GOULD, HENRY, the grandson of the last-named, and the son of Davidge Gould, Esq., of Sharpham Park, a barrister of the Middle Temple, by his wife, Honora, daughter of — Hockmore, of Buckland Baron in Devonshire, was born about the year 1710.

The Middle Temple called him to the bar in June 1734; and at the end of twenty years he arrived at the dignity of a bencher on being made king's counsel. His business was considerable, but he was distinguished more by the soundness of his law than by the power of his oratory. In Michaelmas 1761 he was raised to the bench as a baron of the Exchequer, where he sat till the end of the next year, when he was removed into the Common Pleas on January 24, 1763.

With acknowledged ability he exercised his judicial duties till his death at the age of eighty-four on March 5, 1794, a period of thirty-three years from his first appointment.

In the riots of 1780, when the king, after Lord Mansfield's house had been burnt, offered to all the judges the protection of the military, Judge Gould is said to have declined the proffered aid, and to have declared that he would rather die than live under any other than the laws of England.

He was buried at Stapleford Abbots in Essex, of which parish his brother, Dr. William Gould, was rector. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Walker, archdeacon of Wells. Their only son dying in the judge's life, his large fortune was divided between his two daughters, one the wife of the Hon. Temple Luttrell, and the other of the Earl of Cavan. (Collinson, ii. 268.)

GRAHAM, ROBERT, was the son and heir of James Graham, Esq., of Dalston in Middlesex, and was born at Hackney on October 14, 1744. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and entering the Inner Temple in 1766, he was called to the bar in due course. After many years' practice, he was in February 1793 made attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, and king's counsel in the April following. In June 1800 he was raised to the bench of the Exchequer, on which he sat for nearly twenty-seven years.

He was not considered a very efficient judge, and that his previous reputation as a lawyer was not very high appears from Sir Edward Law's remark when he was appointed, 'that he put Mr. Justice Roake upon a pinnacle.' His principal distinction was his equanimity of temper. So great was his politeness and urbanity to every one that Jekyll said of him, 'No one but his sempstress could ruffle him.' His dignity must have been somewhat disturbed by an unlucky accident which befell him at Newcastle, while judge of assize there, and which was made the subject of a humorous song from the pen of Mr. John Shield, to be found by the curious in Dr. Bruce's interesting 'Handbook to Newcastle-upon-Tyne.' He resigned in February 1827, in his eighty-third year, but lived several years afterwards, and died at his sister's, at Long Ditton in Surrey, when he was beyond ninety.

GRANCOURT, WILLIAM DE, is noticed both by Dugdale and Madox (i. 256, ii. 320) as a baron of the Exchequer in 32 Henry III., 1268, but no trace of his continuance in office or of his personal history has been ascertained, except that a Walter de Grancourt, perhaps his son, was sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk in 5 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 28.)

four justiciars appointed in 4 Henry III., 1220, to deliver the gaols of Hereford (Rot. Claus. i. 437), but his name does not afterwards occur.

GRANT, WILLIAM. Among the judges that distinguished the reign of George III., Sir William Grant occupies one of the most prominent places, and of his seven countrymen who graced the judicial bench he stands next in reputation to Lord Mansfield. He was born at Elchies in Morayshire in 1755. His father, James Grant, was a humble member of that branch of the ancient clan of the Grants settled at Baidornie, having been at first a small farmer and afterwards collector of the customs in the Isle of Man. In consequence of the death of both his parents while he was in early youth, he was left to the care of his uncle, a wealthy merchant in London. After passing through the grammar school at Elgin, he was sent to the college of Aberdeen, and then spent two years at Leyden in studying the civil law. He is said to have resorted for a short time to an attorney's office as a useful introduction to practical knowledge. Entering Lincoln's Inn on January 30, 1769, he was called to the bar on February 3, 1774, and determined to try his fortune in Canada, where he went in the next year. Soon after his arrival he rendered military service by commanding a body of volunteers during the siege of Quebec by the Americans. The governor appointed him attorney-general of the colony, where for several subsequent years he had the principal lead as an advocate. Not satisfied with shining in so limited a sphere, he then resigned his office and returned to England. Here, however, his colonial fame had not extended, and his efforts in the common law courts and on the Home Circuit were attended with so little success that he contemplated returning to his former exile. But his good fortune introduced him to two patrons, who were capable both of appreciating and rewarding his superior talents. Mr. Pitt, requiring some information relative to Canada, was accidentally referred to him, and, having found his intelligence useful and abundant, and his views correct and statesmanlike, he at once saw his value and commenced that friendship which secured his future promotion. As one of its first fruits he was returned to parliament at the general election in November 1790 for the borough of Shaftesbury. He soon distinguished himself in the debates, giving an effective support to the minister in the political difficulties of that troublous time. In 1796 he was returned for the county of Banff, which he continued to represent while he remained in parliament.

His second patron was Lord Thurlow, who, after listening to his argument on a Scotch appeal in the House of Lords, expressed the highest opinion of his reasoning powers, and encouraged him to devote himself to the equity courts. There he consequently took his stand, and in April 1793 receiving a patent of precedence, he in a very short time acquired a leading business. In the same year he was appointed one of the judges of the Carmarthen Circuit, and in 1795 solicitor-general to the queen. In 1798 he became chief justice of Chester, and in July 1799 he was appointed solicitor-general, and knighted. He held this office nearly two years, and on May 27, 1801, was made master of the Rolls, and at once justified the great expectations formed of him. During the seventeen years in which he sat in the Rolls Court he was looked upon as a perfect model of judicial excellence. No judge ever gave more satisfaction. His judgments were not only convincing by their practical wisdom, but were remarkable for the clearness with which they explained the principles of equity on which they were founded. No one who has practised under him can forget the patient attention with which he listened to all the statements and arguments of counsel, or the discrimination he evinced in extracting from confused details all that was relevant, or the clearness and simplicity of his reasons when he pronounced his decisions.

To the regret of all, he retired from his court on December 23, 1817. The equity bar testified their respect and veneration for him by requesting him to sit for his picture, which, painted by Sir Thomas Lawrence, now graces the hall in which he sat. For a few subsequent years he assisted in hearing appeals at the cockpit, but afterwards altogether retired from public life, and lived to attain his eighty-third year. He died at Dawlish in Devonshire on May 25, 1832.

When England was threatened with invasion, Sir William, while master of the Rolls, for a second time assumed the military habit, and, joining the volunteers who embodied themselves for the safety of the country, he was called upon, no doubt from the tradition of his prowess and experience at Quebec, to take the command of the Lincoln's Inn corps, which he put into as good a state of efficiency as any in London. In 1809 he was elected lord rector of the university of Aberdeen.

The impression which he made in parliament was wonderful. Few men have gained a greater ascendancy. Lord Brougham relates that even Mr. Fox felt it difficult to answer him, and that once, being annoyed by some members talking behind him while he was listening to one of Sir William's speeches, he turned round and asked them sharply, 'Do you think it so very pleasant a thing to have to answer a speech like that?' The effect of his addresses was thus described at a later period:—'There was one extraordinary oration that night—Sir William Grant's; quite a masterpiece of his peculiar and miraculous manner. Conceive an hour and a half of syllogisms strung together in the closest tissues, so artfully clear that you think every successive inference unavoidable; so rapid that you have no leisure to reflect where you have been brought from, or to see where you are to be carried; and so dry of ornament, or illustration, or reflection, that your attention is stretched—stretched—racked. All this is done without a single note.' (Memoir of Francis Horner, i. 285.) Though he opposed most of the beneficial alterations in the law suggested by Sir Samuel Romilly's intellectual and comprehensive mind, to Sir Samuel's amelioration of the criminal code he gave a hearty support.

GRAS, NICHOLAS LE, is the last named in a writ by which justices itinerant into Northamptonshire were appointed, dated August 3, 1285, 13 Edward I. (Chron. Petroburg. 102, 118.) He was appointed sheriff of Surrey and Sussex in 8 Edward I., and held the office for five years. The castle of Odyham in Hampshire was also committed to his charge in 10 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 35, 41.)

He was possessed of the manors of Renger in Terling and of Little Badewe in Essex. (Abb. Placit. 190-305.)

GREEK, THOMAS, who was born and educated at Cambridge, held the office of baron of the Exchequer for one year and ten months, between January 20, 1576, and November 18, 1577, when he died; but all that is known of him is that he lived sixty-three years, and was buried in the church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate. He left a son and daughter. (Stow's London, 332-3.)

GREEN, HENRY. Queen Isabella having granted to Henry Green, probably for some services as an advocate, the manor of Briggestoke in Northamptonshire, her son Edward III. confirmed it to him for life. He was appointed one of the king's serjeants-at-law in 19 Edward III., and was called to the bench of the Common Pleas on February 6, 1354, 28 Edward III., when he was knighted.

In 1358, having been cited before the pope for pronouncing a judgment against the Bishop of Ely for harbouring one of his men who had burnt a manor of Lady Wake's, and slain one of her servants, he was excommunicated for his non-appearance. It is not related how he cleared himself from this sentence; but it did not prevent his being raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench on May 24, 1361. He retained his place four years and a half, and was removed on October 29, 1365.

Joshua Barnes says (624, 667) that he and Sir William Skipwith were then 'arrested and imprisoned for many enormities against law and justice, and were not redeemed without refunding large sums which by injustice they had got from others, and were for ever after excluded from their places and the king's favour.' It is somewhat curious, if this charge were made (of which no evidence, however, appears on the records), that in the warrant to Sir Henry Green, directing him to give over the rolls, &c., to his successor, the king should call him 'dilectus et fidelis.' He is referred to as the 'wise justice' in one of the cases in Richard Bellewe's Reports. (142.)

That he was not much damaged by any fine imposed upon him is apparent from the numerous manors and other lands in the counties of Northampton, Leicester, York, Hertford, Bedford, Buckingham, and Nottingham, together with a mansion in Silver Street, Cripplegate, London, which he possessed at the time of his death, which occurred in 1369. He married a daughter of Sir John de Drayton, and his son Thomas enjoyed the same property till his death in 1391-2. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 195; Bridge's Northampton ii. 247; Cal. Inquis. p.m. ii. 200, iii. 136.)

GREENFIELD, WILLIAM DE (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), was born in Cornwall, and, from the practice that had been previously adopted by King Edward of raising the superior officers of the court to the chancellorship, it is not unlikely that he had passed his probation as a clerk of the Chancery or Exchequer. Like those officers, he was of the clerical profession, and had been rewarded with the dignities of the Church, the deanery of Chichester having, in 1289, been superadded to his canonry of York, and, like them, he had been summoned to the parliament from 1293, on one of which occasions he is called clerk of the council. (Le Neve, 60; Parl. Writs, i. 28-113.)

He was appointed chancellor on September 30, 1302, and on December 4, 1304. He was elected Archbishop of York soon after, on the 29th, he declared to the council that it behoved him to take a journey to Rome on the business of this election, and requested the king to declare his will as to the custody of the Great Seal. William de Hamilton was immediately invested with the office of chancellor, and the archbishop elect proceeded to the Roman court, where, notwithstanding the king's letters, the pontiff granted him consecration, on the payment of 9500 marks. To relieve him from so extortionate an imposition, the clergy of his province raised the money among them.

The ten years of his rule were principally illustrated by his support of the Knights Templars in their fallen fortunes, and by his assisting at the general council held at Vienne in 1311, where one of the highest places was assigned to him.

He died at his palace at Cawood on December 6, 1315, and was buried in the chapel of St. Nicholas in his own cathedral. He had the character of an eloquent man and an able statesman, and his library was extensive enough to be worthy of a separate bequest to St. Alban's Abbey. (Godwin, 685.)

GREGORY, WILLIAM, son of the Rev. Robert Gregory, vicar of Fawthorpe and rector of Sutton St. Nicholas in Herefordshire, and Anne, daughter of John Harvey, of Bradestone in Gloucestershire, was born on March 1, 1624, and educated at All Souls' College, Oxford, of which he was afterwards a fellow. Entering the society of Gray's Inn, he was called to the bar in 1650, made bencher in 1673, and elected autumn reader in 1675. He travelled the Oxford Circuit, and held several lucrative stewardships. He attained sufficient eminence in the law to be elected recorder of Gloucester in 1672, to be created a serjeant in 1677, and to be returned as member for Weobly in 1678, the last year of Charles's second parliament, and to the new one summoned for March 1679. When the latter met, the king rejected Mr. Seymour, who had been chosen speaker in opposition to the nominee of the court, to the great indignation of the house, which would not give up the privilege of choice. On a compromise, however, both candidates were excluded, and Mr. Serjeant Gregory, having been called to the chair, was immediately approved by the king. (Pearce's Inns of Court, 344; Parl. Hist. iv. 1112.)

In that parliament, which only lasted two months, but had the credit of passing the Habeas Corpus Act, parties ran so high that, though a supply was granted, and the bill read a third time, the opposition took every means to delay sending it up to the Lords, till their grievances were enquired into. Roger North (Examen, 460; State Trials, vii. 524) relates that the Speaker Gregory one day, by a concerted plan, immediately upon a member moving for the carrying up of the bill, rose from his chair without putting the question, and, followed by the court party, before the opposition could have time to say a word, carried up the bill to the Lords, where the king, being on his throne, at once gave it his fiat. At this time, the king having newly arranged the ministry, reducing the council to thirty members, and making the Earl of Shaftesbury the nominal president of it, four of the judges—Wilde, Thurland, Bertie, and Bramston—were summarily dismissed on April 29. In the place of the last Serjeant Gregory was appointed a baron of the Exchequer, and was knighted.

Though his patent is dated May 1, it is evident that he was not sworn in, nor his nomination announced, till some time after, for he still continued to sit as speaker till the prorogation of the parliament on the 26th of that month, which was followed by a dissolution in August. He retained his place till February 10, 1686, when he was discharged in consequence of giving his opinion against the king's dispensing power. (Parl. Hist. v. 312; Bramston's Autobiog. 221.) In the following year he was removed by royal mandate from the recordership of Gloucester.

To the Convention Parliament which met on January 22, 1689, Sir William was returned for the city of Hereford, but soon vacated his seat on being selected by King William as one of the judges of the King's Bench. In one of his circuits the mayor of Bristol thought proper to send him a message that he must not expect to have his charges borne by the city, to which he replied that they need not be frightened, for that he could bear his own expenses; but, receiving great insolences from the people on his entrance, he found that a purposed affront was intended. He therefore, on the sitting of the court, promptly fined the city 100*l.* and each sheriff 20*l.*, and would not remit the fine till they had submitted and apologised. He maintained throughout his judicial life the character for integrity he had gained, and dying on May 28, 1696, at his manor of How Capel, Herefordshire, he was buried in the parish church there, which he had entirely rebuilt. By his wife, Catherine, daughter and heiress of James Smith, Esq., of Tillington, he had an only son, whose descendants in the male line failed in 1789. (Manning's Speakers, 374; Kennett, iii. 528; Luttrell, ii. 277.)

GREINVILL, ADAM DE, paid in 35 Henry III. a fine of forty marks for a grant of the bailiwick of the forest of Sellwood in Wiltshire. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 21; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 106.) After this he was appointed justice of the Jews, and is mentioned in that character in 42 and 44 Henry III. (Madox, ii. 319.) In the three following years, 1261-3, he appears as a justice itinerant in several commissions. In 50 Henry III., 1266, Dugdale inserts him among the justices of the Common Pleas, on the authority of a liberate of that date, and till October 1272, a month before the king's death, there are continual entries of payments made for assizes to be taken before him.

GREVILL, WILLIAM, son of Richard Grevill, Esq., of Lemington in Gloucestershire, attained the serjeant's coif in November 1504. He was made a judge of the Common Pleas on May 21, 1509, 1 Henry VIII., and so remained till 1513, when he died, and was buried in Cheltenham Church, where there is a monument to his memory. (Dugdale's Orig. 47; Atkyns's Gloucesters. 173.)

GREY, JOHN DE, or GRAY (BISHOP OF NORWICH), was one of the descendants of Anchtel de Gray, a Norman who came over with the Conqueror, and received from that prince various large possessions. His grandfather was Richard de Gray, a great benefactor to the abbey of Ensham in Oxfordshire, and his father was Anchtel. John was a native of Norfolk, and filled some office in the Curia Regis. (Rot. de Oblatis, 12-73.) Being also brought up to the Church, he was, about 1200, preferred to the archdeaconry of Cleveland, which he exchanged for that of Gloucester. (Le Neve, 303, 308.) He was attached to prince John before he came to the crown, and his frequent attendance at the court after John's accession is shown by several royal charters given under his hand from September 1199 to June 1200. (Dugdale's Monast. ii. 168, 418, v. 112, vi. 956, 1000.)

On this account Sir T. Hardy has inserted his name among the keepers of the Great Seal; but it may be doubted whether he is entitled to any other designation than that of a mere officer, who affixed the Seal for Archbishop Hubert, the chancellor at the time.

His erudition and his wit, for both of which he was remarkable, soon made him a favourite with King John, who procured his election to the bishopric of Norwich on September 24, 1200. Under that title his name frequently appears from this time till the eighth year of the reign as one of the justiciars in the Curia Regis at Westminster, and on the different itineraria. (Hunter's Preface: Rot. de Oblatis, 211, 351.)

In 1205 he was, on the earnest recommendation of the king, elected Archbishop of Canterbury. Although he was actually enthroned, the pope set aside the election, pretending that he was too much employed by the king in secular affairs to have sufficient leisure to attend to the spiritual government of the Church. The appointment of Stephen de Langton followed; but the king, indignant at the pope's assumption, and at his favourite's election being annulled, refused to acknowledge him. This led to the kingdom being placed under interdict, and soon after to the excommunication of the monarch. The bishop was soon removed from the actual scene of contention, by being sent as lord deputy to Ireland, where, shortly after, in 1210, he aided King John, on his visit there, in the introduction of English laws.

On the invasion of England by Prince Louis of France in 1213, the bishop brought over from Ireland a powerful force to the king's assistance, but was soon after compelled to witness his royal patron's resignation of the crown to Pope Innocent, and to proceed to Rome to arrange the terms on which the clergy were to receive compensation for the losses they had sustained through the king's proceedings.

During his return from this embassy he fell sick at Poitiers, and died there on November 1, 1214. His remains were brought to England and honourably interred in his own cathedral. In February of that year he had been elected Bishop of Durham, but the pope's confirmation did not arrive till after his death. (Surtree's Durham, i. xxvii.)

He was a man of agreeable manners and sprightly conversation, well-informed and intelligent, ready in counsel and energetic in action. He was fond of antiquarian studies, and the author of some historical and other works. (Godwin, 429; Weever, 789; Blomefield's Norfolk, i. 274, 577; R. de Wendover, iii. 185, &c.; Lingard, ii. 17-25.)

GREY, WALTER DE (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), was the nephew of the above-named John de Grey, being the second son of the bishop's elder brother John, by his wife Hawise.

The first fact recorded of him is his purchase of the Chancery for the sum of five thousand marks, to be paid by instalments of five hundred pounds at the feast of St. Andrew and at Pentecost in each year. The charter by which this grant is confirmed is dated October 2, 1205, 7 John, and his uncle makes himself responsible on the roll for the payment of the fine. (Rot. de Fin. 378; Rot. Chart. 168; Rot. Claus. i. 53.)

Various ecclesiastical preferments were now presented to him, and in May 1207 he was made archdeacon of Totnes, with the prebend in the church of Exeter. In 1210 or 1213 he was elected Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, but it appears that it was only by the canons of Lichfield, the monks of Coventry choosing another person, and that both elections were made void. He was in October 1213 sent on a mission to Flanders, and previous to his departure he, of course, sent the Seal to the king, but still remained chancellor, and is so styled four days after. (Rot. Claus. i. 153; Rot. Pat. 105.) During his absence, however, which probably lasted longer than was expected, there is no doubt that the king appointed Peter de Rupibus his chancellor, who is so designated in two records dated November 21 and 24, 1213 (Rot. de Fin. 507-9), and the Seal was delivered to Ralph de Neville on December 22 to be held under him. The bishop did not, however, long continue in office, for Walter de Grey on his return resumed the title, and from January 12, 1214, till July 7, 1214 (although in the interval he had been again abroad), he is never mentioned without that designation. (Rot. Pat. 108-111; Rot. Claus. i. 160-8.)

During this second absence he was elected Bishop of Worcester, and was consecrated on October 5, 1214, when he probably resigned the office of chancellor, the 29th of that month being the date of the first record in which his successor, Richard de Marisco, is so denominated.

During the war with the barons, Walter de Grey adhered closely to the king; but, though he was chancellor at the time, he is not mentioned as having placed the Seal to the charter of May 15, 1213, 14 John, by which the king resigned the crown to the pope.

In the contest for the archbishopric of York, his faithful adherence to the king procured his election in opposition to Simon de Langton, brother to the primate. The immaculate chastity of his life was urged to the pope to procure his confirmation; and the plea was allowed on a promise to supply the papal treasury with a donative of no less than 10,000*l.*, and he accordingly received the pall on May 24, 1216. The straitened means to which he was reduced in order to meet the payment of a sum so enormous in those times obtained for him a character for sordid avarice, an imputation which no doubt induced his contemporaries to believe the absurd story that is related of his having, during a famine, hoarded a quantity of corn, which became the resort of innumerable snakes, serpents, and other reptiles, and from which a fearful voice proceeded, commanding the ricks to be avoided, as they and all the possessions of the bishop belonged to the devil.

That he was not truly charged with avarice, however, is proved by his generosity when he had cleared himself from his heavy debt. Not only did he restore part of his cathedral, and make many munificent additions to the see, and to his church, but he presented the manor of Thorpe as a residence for his successors, and purchased also for them the palace at Westminster, which had been built by Hubert de Burgh. The former is still, under the name of Bishopsthorpe, in the occupation of the archbishops; and the latter, with the name of York Place, continued to be so till Cardinal Wolsey alienated it to King Henry VIII., when it received the new designation of Whitehall. His character for wisdom, prudence, and integrity was so high that in 26 Henry III., 1242, though at a very advanced age, he was left by Queen Eleanor, then regent, in the government of the kingdom when she went to join her husband in France.

He presided over his see nearly forty years, and died at Fulham on May 1, 1255.

His remains were removed to his cathedral, where a splendid monument was erected to his memory. (Godwin, 315, 459, 877; Hasted, i. 156; Le Neve; Blomefield's Norwich, i. 478.)

GREY, JOHN DE, was the nephew of the above Walter de Grey, being second son of his eldest brother, Henry, and of Isolda, the eldest of the five nieces and coheirs of Robert Bardolf. He was sheriff of Buckinghamshire and Bedfordshire in 23 Henry III., and had his seat at Eaton, near Fenny Stratford. In 30 Henry III. he was made constable of the castle of Gannoc in North Wales, and was also justice of Chester. He offended the king in 35 Henry III. by marrying without his licence Johanna, the widow of Pauline Peyvre, who had been devoted to another person, and he was fined five hundred marks for his transgression, but shortly afterwards he is stated to have greatly ingratiated himself with Henry by assuming the Cross. The Fine Roll of 1253 contains an evidence of the favour he thus obtained, in the grant of a pardon of 300*l.* of the above fine and other debts which he owed to the crown. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 453, ii. 119, 167.)

He was made steward of Gascony, custos of the castles of Northampton, Shrewsbury, Dover, and Hereford, and sheriff of the latter county. In 1260 he was among the justices itinerant sent into the counties of Somerset, Dorset, and Devon. When Henry submitted the determination of the differences between him and his barons to the decision of Louis, King of France, he was one of the barons who undertook that he should abide by it; and during the war which followed he firmly adhered to his sovereign. After the battle of Evesham in 1265 he was made sheriff of the counties of Nottingham and Derby, and died in the following year.

Before his union with Johanna Peyvre, he had married Emma, daughter and heir of Geoffrey de Glanville, by whom he had a daughter and an only son, two of the descendants of whom now sit in the House of Peers as Earl Wilton and Earl De Grey and Ripon. (Dugdale's Baron. i. 712, 716; Nicolas's Synopsis; &c.)

GREY, HENRY (EARL OF KENT), a lineal descendant of the last-mentioned John de Grey, succeeded to the title of Earl of Kent on the death of his father Anthony in 1643, and had not long taken his seat among the peers before he was substituted for the Earl of Rutland in the commission from the parliament for the custody of their Great Seal. Clarendon (iv. 340, 403) calls him a man of far meaner parts than the Earl of Rutland, and says that the number of lords who attended the parliament was so small that their choice of the two who were to represent them was very limited.

The commissioners held the Seal from November 10, 1643, till October 30, 1646, when it was given to the speakers of the two houses. (Journals.)

In December 1647 the earl was one of the lords commissioners to take the four bills to the king at the Isle of Wight, and had to bring them back with the king's refusal to assent to the destruction of the royal authority which they involved. He was renominated on March 15, 1648, chief commissioner of the Seal, in conjunction with another lord and two commoners, who continued in office till the death of the king, not one of them approving or taking any part in the tragic event. With that the power of the lords who were commissioners virtually terminated, but they remained in office till the Commons, on February 6, 1649, voted the abolishment of the House of Peers, and two days after put the Seal into other hands. (White-locks, 283-378.)

So ended the earl's political career. He died in 1651; and the title is now merged in that of Earl De Grey and Ripon.

GREY, WILLIAM (LORD GREY DE WERKE), was advanced to this peerage in 1624. From the commencement of the civil war he was an active partisan of the parliament, and one of the few peers that remained in the House of Lords while the rest joined the king. When Lord Fairfax suffered a defeat in the north, and the parliament were desirous to send to the Scots to assist them, Lord Grey on being named one of the deputation refused to go, and was committed to the Tower; but, making his peace, he was soon after selected by the Lords as their speaker, in the absence of the lord keeper. In 1648 he was added to the commissioners of the Great Seal, and performed the duties of the office for nearly eleven months, the last few days being after the king's death, in the planning or execution of which fearful event he is not charged with concurring. With the abolition of the House of Lords of course his office ceased, but he consented to be nominated on the Council of State. (White-locks, 295-488; Clarendon, iv. 153, 368, 415.)

He survived the restoration of Charles II. more than fourteen years, and died in July 1674. His title became extinct in 1706.

GREYSTOKE, HENRY DE, does not appear to have been a member of the baronial family of Greystoke in Cumberland. He may therefore have been so called from his being born in that place. He was connected with the king's household or Exchequer in 27 Edward I., as well as several times afterwards under Edward II. He acted as paymaster of the forces in Nottingham and Derby, and was appointed by the latter king to assist the sheriff of Cumberland in arresting the Knights Templars. From 16 Edward III. he held the office of custos of the lands and tenements which were reserved for the use of the king's chamber, and in this character various manors, &c., were placed under his charge; and in the parliaments of 25 and 28 Edward III. he was ordered to be present on the hearing of petitions touching these lands, to give information 'pur le roi et au le roi.' Dugdale introduces him in the twenty-seventh year as attorney-general; but it is probably in reference to these matters only, as he does not appear to have been otherwise connected with the law. Though he is described as a 'clericus,' he could not have taken that grade in holy orders which prevented him from marrying; for his widow Jane, the daughter of Sir William Pickering, is said to have married Chief Justice Gascoigne.

He had a grant of the French portion of the church of Mapeldurham, and of a messuage and lands in Resceby in Yorkshire for his good services, and he was made a baron of the Exchequer on October 6, 1356. 30 Edward III., beyond which no trace of him remains. (Parl. Writs, i. 956, ii. p. ii. 648, n.; N. Feodera, ii. 1214; Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 159-208; Rot. Parl. ii. 236, 254.)

GRIMBALD, ROBERT, is inserted by Dugdale as a justicier in the reign of Henry II. (Orig. 100; Monast. vi. 425); but in the multiplicity of names of justiciars in the rolls of this reign, quoted by Madox and others, that of Robert Grimbald never occurs, although it does forty years afterwards in that of Henry III. The document to which his seal is attached is a charter granting certain lands in Dunnington to the priory of Osulveston in Leicestershire, and there are four others of the same description, in none of which is there any addition to his name at all designating a judicial character. It appears, however, that he was united with Paganus from 2 to 8 Henry II., 1156-1162, in the sheriffalty of Cambridge and Huntingdon; and this, recollecting the judicial duties which appertained to that office, may have been the ground of naming him as a justicier. He married Matilda, daughter and heir of Paganus de Hoston, who was probably the sheriff with whom he was associated.

GRIMBALD, PETER, is introduced in Madox's List of the Barons of the Exchequer (ii. 318), with a reference to a writ tested in 25 Henry III., 1241. There is a mandate on the Close Roll (ii. 207) of 11 Henry III., 1226, addressed to Magister Philip de Arden and P. Grimbald, relative to certain business entrusted to them to transact in the bishopric of Durham, a duty which was likely to devolve on one connected with the Exchequer.

GRIMBALD, ROBERT, was not probably a descendant of his before-mentioned namesake. He, as well as the other, was certainly resident in Northamptonshire, and in 9 Henry III. was appointed to conduct the quinzime of that county to Oxford. (Rot. Claus. ii. 74.) In the commission for justices itinerant in 1234, 18 Henry III., he stood third of those nominated for Rutland.

GRIMSTON, HARBOTTLE, a descendant from Sylvester, the standard-bearer of the Conqueror, for whose services the parish of Grimston in Yorkshire, and various other manors in the East Riding, were the reward, was the son of Sir Harbottle Grimston, created a baronet in 1612, by Elizabeth, daughter of Ralph Coppinger, Esq., of Stoke in Kent.

He was born at Bradfield Hall in Essex, and was at first intended for the law and entered at Lincoln's Inn. But upon his brother's death he abandoned the study, till forming an attachment to the daughter of Sir George Croke, the judge refused to bestow her hand upon him unless he resumed his profession. He re-opened his law-books with all the ardour of a lover, and soon attained sufficient legal knowledge not only to satisfy Sir George, but also to obtain the post of recorder of Colchester, to which he was elected in 1638, being also returned member for that town to the two parliaments of 1640.

Between the two parliaments his father died, and he succeeded to the title. In both of them he was one of the most violent opposers to the encroachments of the court, and a powerful advocate for the liberties of the people, being no doubt instigated by the imprisonment suffered by his father for refusing to pay the loan-money. He was not very choice in his language, saying in his speech against the advisers of ship-money, that 'he was persuaded that they who gave their opinions for the legality of it did it against the dictamen of their own conscience,' and calling Secretary Windbank 'the very pander and broker to the whore of Babylon.' Contributing two horses and twenty pounds in 1642 for the defence of the privileges of parliament, he was looked upon as one of the most active among the popular party; yet in 1643 he refused to subscribe the Solemn League and Covenant, and discontinued sitting in the house till it was laid aside. He then joined with Holles and the Presbyterian party against the Independents, and Cromwell in particular. He was one of the commissioners selected to treat with the king in the Isle of Wight (Notes and Queries, 1st S. xii. 358; White Locke, 334), when, though the negotiation was unsuccessful, his majesty was well pleased with his conduct, and on his return he urged upon the house the acceptance of the king's concessions. He then began to see the real object of the dominant faction, and, not consenting to their determination to get rid of the monarchy, was with other members excluded the house. His influence with the army and the people was considered so great that he was put into confinement before the king's trial; but was discharged by an order from Lord Fairfax on the very day of the execution, first entering into an engagement not to act nor to do anything to the disservice of the parliament or the army.

Cromwell's subsequent forcible dissolution of the parliament made it a matter of prudence that Grimston should retire to the Continent. At the same time he resigned the recordership of Colchester.

Returning to England in a few years, he was elected in Cromwell's new modelled parliament in 1656 as one of the sixteen members for Essex; but, declining to sign the engagement recognising Cromwell's government, he was refused admittance to the house. He afterwards joined in the remonstrance of the secluded members, which protested against the assembly as not being the representative body of England; but no notice being taken of it, he quietly retired to the practice of his profession until more promising times. In December 1659 the Long Parliament was restored to its functions, and having dissolved itself in the following March, Sir Harbottle was appointed one of the council of state. Of the Convention Parliament, summoned on April 25, he was elected speaker, and distinguished himself by the peculiar style of his oratory. In the addresses which he made to the king after his return the fulsome style of his predecessors in the chair was revived, and even exceeded, with the addition of absurd reiterations. He called the actors in the rebellion 'the 'monsters who had been guilty of blood, precious blood, precious royal blood;' and in his speech, previous to the dissolution, he exclaimed, 'We must needs be a happy parliament, a healing parliament, a reconciling and peaceful parliament, a parliament propter excellentiam, that may truly be called parlamentissimum parlamentum.' (White Locke, 653; Parl. Hist. iv. 27, 113, 168.)

He had the honour of entertaining the king on June 25, 1660, at his house in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and soon received a more substantial proof of the royal gratitude in the appointment of master of the Rolls, which was given him on November 3, though it was said that he gave Lord Clarendon 8000*l.* for the place. (Ch. Just. Lee's Memor. in Law Mag. xxxviii. 217.) He was then sixty-six years of age, and he held the office till his death, a period of twenty-three years. One of his decrees nearly cost him his life. Nathaniel Bacon, of Gray's Inn, against whom it was pronounced, offered a man 100*l.* to kill him; and upon being convicted of the crime in 1664, was condemned to pay a fine of 1000 marks, to be imprisoned three months, and be of good behaviour for life, and to acknowledge his offence at the bar of the Chancery. Bacon was discharged as insolvent in 1667. (1 Siderfin, 230.)

Sir Harbottle was also made chief steward of St. Albans, where he had purchased the manor of Gorbambury and other property, and recorder of Harwich. His judicial position did not prevent his sitting in parliament, in which he continued to be one of the representatives of the borough of Colchester till his death. He at last grew out of favour with the court, from his known dislike to the Roman Catholic religion, which he made no attempt to conceal. When a bill was introduced in 1667 for changing the punishment of Romish priests and Jesuits from death to imprisonment for life, he indignantly asked, 'Is this the way to prevent Popery? We may as soon make a good fan out of a pig's tail as a good bill out of this.' He asserted the right of the House of Commons to choose their own speaker when the king rejected Mr. Seymour in 1679; and at the close of his life he was compelled to dismiss Burnet, the preacher at the Rolls, for a sermon on the 6th of November, which was interpreted as levelled against the king's conduct. (Parl. Hist. iv. 1096; Burnet, i. 596.)

He died on January 2, 1685 (Luttrell, i. 384; 1 Vernon, 284), of natural decay, being then above eighty years of age, and was buried in St. Michael's Church, St. Albans. Sir Henry Chauncy, his contemporary, thus describes him: 'He had a nimble fancy, a quick apprehension, a rare memory, an eloquent tongue, and a sound judgment. He was a person of free access, sociable in company, sincere to his friends, hospitable in his house, charitable to the poor, and an excellent master to his servants.' He published the Reports of his father-in-law Sir George Croke, having first translated them into English, and is said to have greatly assisted Burnet in his 'History of the Reformation.'

By his first wife, Mary, Sir G. Croke's daughter, he had six sons and two daughters; by his second, Annie, daughter of Sir Nathaniel Bacon, niece to Lord Bacon, and widow of Sir Thomas Meautys, he left no children. On the decease of his son Samuel in 1700 the title became extinct. The estate of Gorbambury, with large landed property, he left to his great-nephew William Lukyn, who assumed the name of Grimston, and in 1719 was created a peer of Ireland by the title of Baron of Dunboyne and Viscount Grimston. His grandson was created Baron Verulam in England in 1790, a title which was converted into an earldom in 1815. (Croke Family, 606-

13; Chauncy's Herts, 465; Collins's Peerage, viii. 214.)

GROSE, NASH, was the son of Edward Grose, a resident of London, where he was born about the year 1740. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in November 1766, and took the degree of serjeant in 1774, soon commanding the leading business in the Common Pleas, which he retained till he was raised to the bench. He was appointed a judge of the King's Bench on February 9, 1787, and received the honour of knighthood. After occupying the same seat for twenty-six years, his infirmities obliged him to resign it in Easter vacation 1813. His death took place in the following year, on May 31, when his remains were interred in the Isle of Wight, where he had a beautiful seat called The Priory. (Term Rep. 551; Gent. Mag. 1814, 388, 629.)

Both in his private and judicial character he was highly respected; but contemporary critics, of course, differ as to his powers and efficiency. By some he was considered to have lost in credit what he gained in rank, and this couplet was perpetrated against him:

Qualis sit Grotius Judex uno accipe versu;
Exclamat, dubitat, balbutit, stridet et errat.

Lord Campbell (Ch. Just. iii. 155) says that his aspect was very foolish, and that he had the 'least reputation' among his colleagues; but he adds that 'this supposed weak brother, though much ridiculed, when he differed from his brethren, was voted by the profession to be right.'

Sir Nash married Miss Dennett, of the Isle of Wight.

GRYMESBY, EDMUND DE, was of the town of that name in Lincolnshire, where he had considerable property. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 155, 176.) He was probably the son of Simon de Grymesby, eacheator to the king, and is mentioned as one of the procurators to appear for the abbot of Thornton in the parliaments of 17 and 18 Edward II. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 838.) In the next year he was parson of the church of Preston. (Rot. Parl. i. 437.) In 7 Edward III., 1333, he received the appointment of keeper of the rolls in the Irish Chancery (Cal. Rot. Pat. 117), but two years afterwards he was sent to various parties in England to obtain loans for the king to carry on the war with Scotland. (N. Fadera, ii. 912.) He was no doubt then a master or clerk in the English Chancery, in which office he continued to act till the 25th, and perhaps the 27th, year of the reign, being a receiver of petitions in all the parliaments assembled in that interval. (Rot. Parl. ii. 126-236.) During this period the Great Seal was twice placed under his seal, from December 16, 1340, to the end of the year, and from September 2 to October 8, 1351.

GUILFORD, LORD. See F. NORTH.

GULDEFORD, HENRY DE, settled at Hempsted in Kent, in 26 Edward I. was appointed to perambulate the forests of the northern counties, and two years afterwards to perform the same duties in the counties of Salop, Stafford, and Derby. In 32 Edward I. he appears at the head of the justices itinerant sent to visit the Isle of Jersey, and during the whole of this time he was summoned among the justices to parliament. (Rot. Parl. i. 130, 180, 421.) In November 1305 he was constituted one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas; but he was not re-appointed under Edward II.; Hervey de Staunton was placed there in his stead.

He still continued to be employed to take assizes, and as a justice itinerant. He died in the early part of 6 Edward II., his last summons to parliament being dated on July 8, 1312, the first day of that regnal year. Several of his descendants were sheriffs of Kent, one of whom entertained Queen Elizabeth at his manor-house. Robert, the last of the name, was made a baronet in 1685 by King James II., but, leaving no issue, the title became extinct at his death.

GUNDEVILLE, HUGH DE, at the beginning of the reign of Henry II., filled some responsible office in the Exchequer or in the king's household. In 1170, 16 Henry II., he was despatched with William Fitz-John to arrest Becket, whose fate, however, was sealed before their arrival at Canterbury; and in 1172 he and Robert Fitz-Bernard were appointed lieutenants under Humphrey de Bohun in the government of the city of Waterford. He held the sheriffalty of Hampshire from 16 Henry II. for ten years, that of Northamptonshire from 21 Henry II. for three years, and that of Devonshire in the 24th and 25th years of that reign.

In 20 Henry II., 1174, he was appointed, by writ of Richard de Luci, the chief justiciary, one of the five justices itinerant to fix the tallage of Hampshire; and he was selected in 1176 by the council of Northampton as one of the eighteen justices itinerant who were sent round England. His pleas while so engaged extended over the four following years. (Madox, i. 125-138.) He died about the end of this reign, the Pipe Roll of 1 Richard I. (213) referring to property which had been his.

GUNDRY, NATHANIEL, of a Dorsetshire family, was born at Lyme Regis, and entered the Middle Temple as a member in 1720, but, after being called to the bar in 1725, removed to Lincoln's Inn, and was made a king's counsel in July 1742. He represented Dorchester in his native county from 1741 till his elevation to the bench. That he was considered stiff and pretentious by his brethren may be presumed from the following character given of him in the 'Causidicade,' as a supposed candidate for the office of solicitor-general vacant in 1742:—

In the front of the crowd then appear'd Mr.

G—nd—y,
'To this office,' quo' he, 'my pretensions are sundry;

Imprimis my merit, e'en great as t' attract
His m—j—y's notice, so nice and exact,
As lately to call me inside of the bar,
From among the rear-guard—poor souls, how they stare!

Which is plain that he meant me some further preferment,

More worthy my learning, parts, and discernment.
More claims I might urge, but this I insist on
Is sufficient to merit the office in question.'

Then the president thus, 'You're too full of surmises;

The man who is stiff, like an oak, seldom rises.'

He waited eight years for his advancement, when in May 1760 he was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas. He enjoyed the post less than four years, dying on the circuit at Launceston on March 23, 1764. He was buried at Musbury in Devonshire. (Hutchins's Dorset, i. 249, 379; Gent. Mag. xxiv. 191, lxi. 1159.)

GUNTORTH, WILLIAM, described as 'clericus,' probably held some office in the Treasury or Exchequer before he received the responsible appointment of treasurer of Calais, on March 20, 1368, 42 Edward III. This place he held till October 26, 1373 (N. Fœdera, iii. 844, 992), and then was made a baron of the Exchequer.

The latest mention of him in that character it is 9 Richard II. (Rot. Parl. iii. 204), but up to 18 Richard II. he is recorded as granting lands to the chantry of the church of St. Wolstan, in Grantham, Lincolnshire, and to the chapter of St. Mary, Southwell, in Nottinghamshire. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iii. 162, 187.)

GURDON, ADAM, son of Adam Gurdon, one of the bailiffs of Alton in Hampshire (Madox, ii. 304), married Custancia, the daughter and heir of John de Venuz, with whom he received extensive lands at Selborne in that county, together with the bailiwick of the king's forests of Wulvermar and Axiholt. He seems to have been of a litigious disposition, no less than six entries occurring in the 'Abbreviatio Placitorum' of causes decided against him. He joined the party of De Montford, and even after the battle of Evesham raised an array against his sovereign in Hampshire. Prince Edward advanced against the rebels, and coming up with them between Farnham and Alton, he inconsiderately leaped over the trench that surrounded their camp before his forces could follow him. Adam met him, and, after a severe fight hand to hand, was at last mastered and obliged to yield himself prisoner to the prince. Edward generously gave him his life, and eventually his liberty, and thus secured the services of a brave and grateful enemy. (Rapin, iii. 170.)

In 8 Edward I., 1280, Dugdale places him among the justices itinerant in Wiltshire; but the pleas of that iter were confined to the forest, and he was no doubt appointed in virtue of his bailiwick, as he is not mentioned upon any other circuit.

He was frequently summoned to perform military service, and in 23 Edward I. was nominated custos of the seashores of Hampshire, and a commissioner of array in that county and in Dorset and Wilts.

In 33 Edward I., 1305, he was elected a representative by the 'communitas' of Scotland, and constituted a justice there, and died in the same year. (Rot. Parl. i. 267; Parl. Writs, i. 161, &c.; Cal. Inquis. p. m. 12, 193, 212.)

Besides his first wife Custancia, he married two others—viz., Almeria, whom he divorced after having two sons; and Agnes, by whom he had a daughter, Johanna, to whom he left his property in Selborne, and who married Richard Achard. That estate, still called Gurdon Manor, now belongs to Magdalen College, Oxford.

GURNEY, JOHN. The family of Baron Gurney may boast of a legal pedigree extending over more than a century and a half, inasmuch as his grandfather, Thomas Gurney, flourishing from 1705 to 1770, and his father, Joseph Gurney, were the recognised shorthand writers, not only employed confidentially by the government and in parliamentary committees, but engaged by authority in reporting the proceedings on all the important trials occurring during the period. His mother was a daughter of William Brodie, Esq., of Mansfield, and he was born in London on February 14, 1768. His education was commenced at St. Paul's School, and completed under the Rev. Mr. Smith at Bottesdale in Suffolk. Accompanying his father on his professional occupations in the courts of law, he naturally imbibed a predilection for that profession, and for practice in the art of forensic eloquence he frequented those debating societies in which some of the greatest orators had made their first essays, adopting those political principles of freedom and reform which then made opposition popular. Having entered the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar by that society in May 1793. He had not long to wait for employment. In the very first term, and the sittings after, he was retained as junior counsel to defend Daniel Isaac Eaton for two libels; and in the following February, in consequence of the absence of his senior, he led the defence of the same individual for another libel. On that occasion he delivered an animated, humorous, and effective speech, which at once established him in his profession, and placed him on a height from which he never descended.

The first consequence was that he was engaged as assistant counsel to Messrs. Erskine and Gibbs in the memorable state trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall for high treason, in all of which he proved himself a most efficient auxiliary. These occurred before he had been two years at the bar, and in all of them verdicts of acquittal were pronounced for his clients. The same success attended his efforts as counsel for Crossfield and others, arraigned in 1793 on what was nicknamed the Popgun Plot, and for John Binns when indicted with O'Coigley, Arthur O'Connor, and others for high treason in 1798, in both of which he most ably summed up the prisoners' defence. (State Trials, xxii.—xxvii.)

At the London and Middlesex Sessions, where he then practised, he soon got a decided lead, and gradually acquired such a footing in Westminster Hall and on the Home Circuit as warranted him in applying for a silk gown. But his supposed politics were against him, and it was not till he had been three-and-twenty years at the bar that he obtained it, and then only in consequence of the extraordinary ability he displayed in prosecuting Lord Cochrane, Cochrane Johnstone, and the other parties implicated in propagating a false story of Bonaparte's defeat and death, for the purpose of speculating in the funds. Here, in opposition to a whole phalanx of the most able counsel at the bar, he, almost unaided, gained a complete triumph in the conviction of all the defendants. His promotion could no longer be delayed, and in 1816 he took rank as king's counsel.

For sixteen years more he continued to labour as an advocate, during the whole of which period he shared the lead of the King's Bench with Sir James Scarlett, Sir John Copley, and one or two eminent members of the bar, and of the Home Circuit he soon became the acknowledged head. It fell to his lot to lead the prosecution of two of the Cato Street conspirators in 1820, who, with the remainder of those tried, were convicted on the clearest evidence. (Ibid. xxx. 711, 1341.)

He at length met his reward. After forty years of continued success, throughout the whole of which he was conspicuous for his respectful yet independent demeanour to the court, and his kindly and courteous manner to all, and particularly for the acknowledged virtues of his private life, he was promoted to the bench on February 13, 1832, as one of the barons of the Exchequer, when he was knighted.

For thirteen years Sir John Gurney held this judicial position; and then, from his advanced age and the failure of his health,

He resigned his seat in January 1845, only to die on the 1st of the following March at his house in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Without taking a high rank as a deep-read and black-letter lawyer, he supported as a judge the reputation he had gained as an advocate for discrimination, acuteness, and discretion, and his former experience gave him a recognised superiority on criminal trials. He was brought up among Dissenters, but in his latter years he conformed to the Church of England. Whatever were his doctrinal opinions at different periods of his life, as a man he was universally respected, and his charities and practice during the whole of his lengthened existence were the best proofs of his having imbibed the spirit of the Master whom he ever professed to serve.

By his wife, Maria, daughter of Dr. Hawes, he left several children, one of whom, Russell Gurney, Esq., exhibits, as recorder of London, such high judicial powers and such deep legal knowledge that he has been frequently called upon by the government to preside at the assizes in the place of judges temporarily incapacitated by illness. He is member for Southampton, and has been called to the privy council of his sovereign.

H

HADFIELD, WALTER DE, was one of the justices itinerant who set the assize on the king's demesnes in Essex and Hertfordshire in 20 Henry II., 1174. (Madox, i. 124.) The manor of Writell in Essex was granted to him and John Fitz-William in 4 Richard I., 1192 (Ibid. ii. 167), between which date and 1201 he died. (Chancellor's Roll, 3 John.)

HADLOW, or HANDLO, NICHOLAS DE, of the manor of Court-at-Street in Kent, was raised to the bench about November 1254, and continued to act up to September 1266. In 42 Henry III. he was one of the three who were assigned 'ad tenendum Bancum Regis apud Westm.' until the king arranged more fully for that court. (Dugdale's Orig. 43; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 211-446.) He died in 1270.

HAGET, GEOFFREY, in 10 Richard I., 1198, was associated with two others as a justice itinerant over Yorkshire and the other northern counties, to hear pleas of the crown.

He was the eldest son of Bertram Haget, who possessed considerable property in Yorkshire, and who granted a hermitage and land in the park of Helagh in that county, upon which Geoffrey afterwards built a church. (Monast. vi. 437.)

HAGHMAN, or HAWMAN, NICHOLAS, was probably the son of Alan de Haghman, and Amicia his wife, as in 6 Edward II., 1313, he was parson of the parish of Eversley in Hampshire, of the manor and advowson of which Alan and Amicia became possessed in 5 Edward I.

He was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on October 3, 1336, 10 Edward III.; but his name was not included in the new patent on January 20, 1341. (App. Rot. Orig. i. 195; Abb. Pacit. 191.)

HALE, SIMON DE, whose principal estate was situate in Yorkshire, was sheriff of that county till 8 Henry III. In the next year he was at the head of the justices itinerant appointed to no less than ten counties, and in 11 Henry III. to three counties more. (Rot. Claus. i. 450, 630, ii. 45-213.) It is manifest, from his being placed at the head of the lists, that he was something more than an ordinary justice itinerant.

In 10 Henry III. he was appointed sheriff of Wiltshire, and his people in Yorkshire were exempted from the rates of the county and hundred during his absence. He is last mentioned in 1240, when he again appears as one of the justices itinerant before whom a fine was levied at York.

HALE, MATTHEW. This eminent judge, whom all look up to as one of the brightest luminaries of the law, as well for the soundness of his learning as for the excellence of his life, descended from an old and respectable family in Gloucestershire. His grandfather, Robert Hale, a wealthy clothier at Wootton-under-Edge, had five sons, the second of whom, also Robert, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, had by his wife, Joan, daughter of Matthew Poyntz, Esq., of Alderley, an only son, the future judge, who was left an orphan five years after his birth. He was born at Alderley on November 1, 1609, and on his father's death he was placed under the guardianship of his kinsman, Anthony Kingscot, Esq., who first sent him to a puritanical grammar school at Wootton-under-Edge, and then to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, intending him for the clerical profession. He did not stay long enough to take a degree; but, like most young men, he was attracted by the pleasures incident to his age. He was expert in athletic exercises, and it is related of him that one of his masters, who was his tenant, having told him that he was better at his own trade than himself, Hale, proud of the praise, promised him the house he lived in if he could hit him a blow on the head. The master of course succeeded in doing so, and gained possession of the house, while Hale received an early lesson how to estimate a flattering tongue. He soon discarded the idea of becoming a divine, and determined on a soldier's life, an inclination which he would probably have followed had not a family lawsuit taken him up to London to consult Serjeant Glanville. That learned man soon observed his superior judgment and peculiar fitness for the study of the law, and advising him to adopt it as his profession, Hale entered himself at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar on May 17, 1636.

During this interval he forsook all his former vanities, which had never been tainted with any vice or immorality, and devoted himself wholly to the improvement of his life and the study of his profession. He himself states that for the first two years his application extended to sixteen hours a day, which, nearly bringing him to his grave, he was obliged to reduce to eight hours, and acknowledged that he thought six hours, well used, were sufficient. (Seward's Anecdotes, iv. 416.) At the same time he paid strict attention to his religious duties, never once missing attendance at church on Sunday for six-and-thirty years. As a diversion from his abstruser studies he made himself a proficient in mathematics and various branches of philosophy, and acquired considerable skill in medical and anatomical knowledge, not neglecting history, both ancient and modern, nor, particularly, the varied forms of the theological doctrines.

Besides introducing him into many desirable friendships, his deep learning and known industry soon insured him good practice at the bar. He was entirely a loyalist, though he religiously and upon principle avoided taking any part in the dissensions of the times. In 1643 he was engaged for Archbishop Laud, and is said to have composed the speech in defence which was spoken by Mr. Herne. In 1647 he was one of the counsel appointed to defend the eleven members, and he also appeared for Lord Macguire at his trial in the King's Bench for high treason. (State Trials, iv. 577, 702; Whitelocke, 258.) According to the statement of Burnet, he offered to plead for the king on his trial; and Serjeant Runnington (Edit. of Hale's Common Law) suggests that he furnished his royal client with the line of defence which he actually adopted, in denying the jurisdiction of the court, which of course precluded the appearance of any counsel. In the subsequent trials of the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Holland, Lord Capel, and others for high treason against the parliament, he was employed in their defence, and his arguments were urged with so much boldness and energy that the attorney-general threatened him for appearing against the government. Hale indignantly retorted that he was 'pleading in defence of the laws, which they professed they would maintain and preserve; and that he was doing his duty to his client, and was not to be daunted with threatenings.'

Notwithstanding his monarchical principles, he deemed it his duty to acquiesce in the existing government, and not to engage in any faction. He therefore subscribed the engagement to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, and was accordingly permitted to appear before the High Court of Justice in 1651 to take exceptions to the charge against the Presbyterian Christopher Love—a privilege refused to Mr. Archer and Mr. Waller, because they had not complied with that formality. (State Trials, v. 211.) Though thus acting against them, the parliament showed their estimation of his legal knowledge by placing Hale in the next year at the head of the committee for the prevention of the delays and expenses of law proceedings. (Whitelocke, 520.)

When Cromwell assumed absolute power Hale was one of the many who were disgusted at his usurpation. The protector, however, who was no doubt sincere in his wish to strengthen his government by having men of known ability and honesty on the bench, and seeing what influence Hale exercised by his learning and his courage, resolved to employ him as one of the judges. Hale naturally hesitated to accept the proffered office, but on the representation that he would not be required to acknowledge the usurper's authority, and at the urgent solicitation of Sir Orlando Bridgeman and other loyalists, backed by the opinion of his clerical friends, he determined to accept the appointment, upon the conviction that it was absolutely necessary that under all governments property should be secured, and justice impartially administered.

Accordingly, on January 25, 1654, he was made a judge of the Common Pleas. He altogether refused to try offenders against the state, not recognising the present authorities, and boldly and conscientiously administered justice between man and man, regardless of the party to which either was attached. He convicted and hung one of Cromwell's soldiers for a foul murder of a king's man, and he dismissed a jury because he discovered that it had been returned by Cromwell's order and not by the sheriff. The protector on his return from the circuit told him 'he was not fit to be a judge,' to which he simply answered 'that it was very true.' However angry and dissatisfied Cromwell might be, he could not afford to dismiss so popular a man, and was obliged, perhaps was glad, to pass over his refusal in 1655 to assist at the trial of Colonel Penruddock at Exeter. Hale therefore was continued on the bench, but upon the death of Cromwell in September 1658, not even the importunities of his friends and brother judges could induce him to accept a new commission from the Protector Richard.

In the July (1654) after he became a judge, which did not then disqualify him for a seat in parliament, Hale was returned for his native county. The first business of this parliament was the consideration of the system of government to be adopted. Violent discussions followed, till Mr. Justice Hale proposed an expedient that seemed reasonable to the majority. It was to the effect 'that the single person in possession should exercise the supreme magistracy, with such powers, limitations, and qualifications as the parliament should afterwards declare.' But the protector, fearing lest his power should thus be gradually taken from him, shut up the house, and would not re-admit the members till each had subscribed an unconditional recognition of his authority. Many refused to sign, and among them most probably was Hale, as his name does not subsequently appear either as a speaker or as a member of any of the committees. He was not elected to the only other parliament called by Cromwell, in 1656; but in that summoned by Protector Richard in January and dissolved in April 1659 he was chosen for the university of Oxford, but he seems to have been silent amid the dissensions of that short session. Upon the election of the Convention Parliament, in April 1660, Hale was again returned for Gloucestershire. In that he was most active, being selected as a manager of the conference with the Lords which led to the return of the king, and as one of the committee to examine the acts of government lately passed, and to report how the legal proceedings that had taken place might, notwithstanding all irregularities, be confirmed. (Burton, i. xxxii. iii. 142; Parl. Hist. iv. 24.) Burnet says (i. 88) that he attempted to bind Charles to certain conditions, by moving for a committee to look into the concessions that had been offered by the late king during the war, and to suggest such propositions as should be sent over to the king. This motion, leading to a settlement which might have prevented much future mischief, was dexterously counteracted by Monk.

On the arrival of Charles, though Hale was not immediately replaced in his judicial position, he was at once confirmed in his degree of serjeant, and in that character was included in the commission for the trial of the regicides. At the termination of those doleful proceedings he was, in spite of his declared reluctance, constituted chief baron of the Exchequer on November 7 (1 Siderfin, 3, 4), and so great was his desire to escape the honour of knighthood that he avoided the king's presence, until Lord Clarendon contrived an unexpected meeting with his majesty, who immediately conferred upon him the accustomed distinction.

In every stage of his career Hale was accustomed to put into writing his reflections on the incidents of the time, and to lay down regulations for his conduct. Among many excellent rules for his guidance as a judge was one 'to abhor all private solicitations.' Acting on this, he rebuked a noble duke who applied to him about a cause in which his grace was concerned, who, complaining of his rough reception, was told by the king to be 'content that he was no worse used, for he believed he himself should have been used no better if he had solicited him in any of his own causes.' Another of his rules was 'not to be biassed with compassion to the poor or favour to the rich;' and so strict was he in its application that he insisted on paying for a buck that was presented to him on the circuit before he tried a cause in which the donor was a party.

After presiding in the Exchequer for nearly eleven years, he was promoted to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench on May 18, 1671. He remained in that dignified post for almost five years, when his bad health and increasing infirmities induced him to resign it on February 21, 1676, in opposition to the wishes of the king and the solicitations of his friends and colleagues. But he felt that he could not conscientiously retain a position the duties of which he was not able fully to perform, and the near approach of death made him desirous of leisure for its contemplation. Sir Heneage Finch speaks of him as 'a chief justice of so indefatigable an industry, so invincible a patience, so exemplary an integrity, and so magnanimous a contempt of worldly things, without which no man can be truly great; and to all this a man that was so absolutely a master of the science of the law, and even of the most abstruse and hidden parts of it, that one may truly say of his knowledge in the law what St. Austin said of St. Hierome's knowledge in divinity—"Quod Hieronymus nescivit, nullus mortalium unquam scivit.'" These and other contemporaneous eulogies have been echoed by almost every writer during the two centuries that have elapsed since he flourished, and the more fully have been laid open to the world the principles that guided him in his judicial career, and the daily practices and habits of his private life, the more confirmed has been the admiration of his character, so that he is scarcely ever named except in terms of respect and veneration.

Surviving his resignation scarcely ten months, Sir Matthew died on Christmas Day 1676. By his special direction his remains were interred in the churchyard of Alderley.

A list of his numerous writings, few of which were published during his life, is given in most of the memoirs from which this sketch is compiled. Those which most will be remembered are his 'History of the Pleas of the Crown;' his 'Preface to Rolle's Abridgement,' containing excellent advice for the guidance of young students, in whom he ever took a special interest; and his 'Analysis of the Law,' which formed the basis of Blackstone's 'Commentaries.' His philosophical and religious works eminently show his varied learning and his contemplative piety, and the MSS. which he bequeathed to Lincoln's Inn library afford abundant testimony of his unwearied industry in collecting and transcribing the valuable records of the kingdom.

Of his two wives he had issue by the first only. She was Anne, daughter of Sir Henry Moore, of Fawley in Berkshire, and grandchild of Sir Francis Moore, the famous serjeant-at-law in the reign of James I. Two only of their ten children survived the judge. Late in life he married, secondly, Anne, daughter of Joseph Bishop, of Fawley, described by Baxter as 'a woman of no estate, but suitable to his disposition, to be to him as a nurse.' She survived him for many years, and is spoken of in his will in the most affectionate terms. The male line of his family has been long extinct.

HALE, BERNARD, was born in 1677 at King's Walden in Hertfordshire, an estate which had been in the possession of the family since the time of Queen Elizabeth. He was the eighth son of William Hale, who represented the county in 1661 and 1678, and of Mary, daughter of Jeremiah Elwes, Esq., of Roxby in Lincolnshire. Having entered the society of Gray's Inn, he took his degree of barrister in February 1704. He gained so considerable a reputation as an able lawyer that on June 28, 1722, he was constituted chief baron of the Irish Exchequer, where he remained for nearly three years. From this position he was removed on June 1, 1725, to the English Court of Exchequer as one of the puisne barons, when he was knighted. He sat there little more than four years, and died on November 7, 1729, at Abbots Langley, in the church of which his remains are interred.

He married Anne, daughter of J. Thoresby, Esq., of Northamptonshire, and left a large family.

HALES, CHRISTOPHER, derived his name from a place so called in Norfolk, where Roger de Hales possessed property in the reign of Henry II. Before the close of Edward III.'s reign the family had removed into Kent and was settled at Halden, near Tenterden. The unfortunate Robert de Hales, prior of St. John of Jerusalem and treasurer of England under Richard II., who was barbarously murdered by the rebels in 1381, was of this family, and from his brother Sir Nicholas descended no less than three eminent lawyers who graced the judicial bench—Christopher and John in the reign of Henry VIII., and James in that of Edward VI.

Christopher Hales was the son of Thomas, the younger brother of the father of John, so that the two judges were first cousins. His mother was Alicia, daughter of Humphrey Eveas. Receiving his legal education at Gray's Inn, he rose to be an ancient in 1516, and reader in 1524. On August 14, 1525, he became solicitor-general, and attorney-general on June 3, 1529. During the seven years that he filled this office he had to conduct the proceedings against several illustrious persons who had incurred the king's displeasure. He prosecuted Wolsey by an indictment to which the cardinal made no defence; he appeared for the king against Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher on their last arraignment: and the trials of Queen Anne Boleyn and those charged with being implicated with her occurred during the last few months of his official tenure (State Trials, i. 370, 389); but history charges him with no harshness in performing the delicate duties thus devolving upon him.

He succeeded Thomas Cromwell as master of the Rolls on July 10, 1538, and retained the place for the five remaining years of his life.

He died in June 1541, and was buried at Hackington, or St. Stephen's, near Canterbury. His large possessions, many of which were granted to him by the king on the dissolution of the monasteries, were divided among the three daughters he had by his wife Elizabeth, the daughter of John Cauntton, an alderman of London. (Weever, 260; Hasted.)

HALES, JOHN, is described by Wotton (i. 219) to have been the first cousin of Christopher, but Hasted makes him the uncle of Christopher, representing him as the elder brother of Christopher's father, instead of the son of that elder brother. If Hasted is right, John's father was Henry Hales, and his mother Julian, daughter of Richard Capel, of Lenden, near Tenterden; if Wotton is right, Henry was his grandfather, and another John was his father.

There is a curious entry with regard to them in the books of Gray's Inn, of which they both were members, by which it appears that in July 1520 John Hales communicated to the society that Sir Thomas Nevill would accept Christopher Hales, then attorney-general, to be his bedfellow in his chamber there.

John Hales became a reader in that house in 1514, and again in 1520. Residing at the manor of the Dungeon, or Dane John, near Canterbury, he was the acting steward of the abbey of St. Augustine. As he does not appear as an advocate in the Reports, he probably held an office in the Exchequer, the barons of that court being at that time usually selected from among those who were conversant with that department. He attained the place of third baron on October 1, 1522, and was promoted to be second baron on May 14, 1528. He still held this position on August 1, 1530, as John Smith then received a grant of the office in reversion on his death or retirement. (Orig. 273, 292; Rymer, iii. 788.) He probably died shortly afterwards, John Smith taking his place in the next Michaelmas Term.

By his wife Isabel, daughter of Stephen Harris (Harvey, according to Hasted), he had four sons. His eldest, James, is the next-mentioned judge, and the descendants of two of the others respectively were raised to baronetcies in 1611 and 1660; but both have become extinct. (Wotton, i. 219, iii. 93, 162.)

HALES, JAMES. James Hales was the eldest son of the above John Hales, by his wife Isabel Harris, or Harvey. Like his father, he studied the law at Gray's Inn, where he was three times reader—in 1532, in 1537, and in 1540, when he assumed the decree of the coif. In 1544 he was made one of the king's serjeants, and soon after had a grant from Henry VIII. of the manor of Clavertigh, with lands called Monken Lands in Eleham, Kent. (Hasted, viii. 106.)

At the coronation of Edward VI. he was one of the forty who were made knights of the Bath. He was selected in 1549 as one of the commissioners 'super hæreticâ pravitatē' (Rymer, xv. 181, 250); and having on the 10th of May following been advanced to the bench by Edward VI. as a justice of the Common Pleas, he sat there during the rest of the reign. He was one of the judges who pronounced the sentence of deprivation against Bishop Gardiner (State Trials, i. 630) in February 1551, and had reason to find that that prelate when he attained power did not forget those before whom he was arraigned.

Although firmly attached to the doctrines of the Reformation, and conscious as he must have been of the danger of a revulsion, should a princess who had even through persecution refused to renounce the ancient ritual succeed to the throne,

Sir James Hales, when called upon by the Duke of Northumberland to join the other judges in authenticating the instrument by which the succession was to be changed and the crown was to be placed on a Protestant head, boldly refused to affix his signature, declaring the attempt to be both unlawful and unjust.

The same firmness he had thus shown in supporting the succession according to law, he exhibited immediately afterwards at the assizes in Kent in reference to the statutes relative to religion. Some indictments having been brought before him against certain persons for nonconformity, he in his charge to the grand jury, regardless of the changes which might be expected under the present government, courageously pointed out what the law then actually was, and what it devolved upon them in the exercise of their duty to do. Although this was certainly not the way to 'stand well in her grace's favour,' yet the queen appointed him one of the commission to try Sir Andrew Dudley and others for high treason in August, and on October 4 granted him his new patent in the Common Pleas, thus apparently overlooking his neglect of her known wishes, and doing justice to the honesty of his principles. But this would not satisfy the bigoted chancellor Bishop Gardiner, before whom two days afterwards he came with his fellows to take his oath of office. On that occasion the harsh prelate required him 'to make his purgation,' and a 'colloquy' took place, in which the judge justified his conduct, speaking plainly of his intentions to support the queen and the law, but at the same time to adhere to his religion, while the bishop taunted him with his 'lacking no conscience,' and, after threatening but not moving him, dismissed him without his oath.

Within a few days the bishop, in a true persecuting spirit, had him committed to prison, where his incarceration lasted several months, during which many attempts were made to induce him to embrace the Popish doctrine, not only by working on his fears of the torments prepared for those who persisted in their heresy, but by the earnest persuasions of Foster, a Hampshire gentleman sent for the purpose, of Bishop Day, and of his brother judge Sir William Portman. He was at last overcome, but his recantation had such an effect upon his mind that he attempted in the absence of his servant to kill himself with his penknife. The servant's return saved his life, and being discharged from confinement, he was 'brought to the queen's presence, who gave him words of great comfort.' His release took place about April 1554, but his mind was not at ease, and in the course of the next year, while staying at his nephew's house at Thanington, near Canterbury, he in a fit of despondency drowned himself in a river in the parish of St. Mildred.

There is another account, that Sir James's death was occasioned by his crossing the river over a narrow bridge, from which he accidentally fell and was drowned, at the age of eighty-five. (Holinshed, iv. 8; State Trials, i. 714; Hasted; Burnet.) Whichever of these stories is the true one, it is certain that a verdict of felo de se was pronounced by the coroner's inquest; for there are two cases reported—The Bishop of Chichester v. Webb (2 Dyer, 107), and Lady Margaret Hales v. Petit (Plowden, 253)—the arguments and judgments in which proceeded on that finding by the jury. The hair-splitting subtleties urged in these cases are supposed to have suggested the argument which Shakespeare puts into the gravedigger's mouth in Hamlet.

The name of Sir James's wife was Margaret; but whether she was the daughter and heir of Thomas Hales of Henley-upon-Thames, or one of the daughters and coheirs of Oliver Wood, called by Hasted a judge of the Common Pleas under Henry VIII. (there being no such judge), Hasted and Wotton differ; but both authors agree that the judge left an only son Humphrey, and that the line became extinct in 1665.

HALS, JOHN, had a seat at Kenedon, in the parish of Sherford, in Devonshire. His name appears in the Year Books from 11 Henry IV., 1409, and he was appointed one of the king's serjeants in 1413. On May 5, 1423, 1 Henry VI., he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, and on January 21, 1424, was removed to the King's Bench. But, notwithstanding the latter appointment, he seems to have continued to act in the Common Pleas also till Hilary 1425, a fine having been levied before him in that term. (Orig. 46; Acts Privy Council, iv. 71, 172.) His name occurs in the Year Books till Hilary 1434, in which year he probably died, as a new judge of the King's Bench was appointed in the following July.

He married the daughter of — Mewy, of Whitechurch, and his second son John afterwards became Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry.

HALTOFT, GILBERT, is stated by Dugdale to be dead on November 30, 1458, 37 Henry VI. but he gives no information when he entered on the office of baron of the Exchequer. The Exchequer list, however, dates his admission in Michaelmas 1447; and in the act of resumption of the crown grants, which passed in the parliament of November 1449, he is described as secondary baron, and 20 marks out of 40*l.* yearly, which had been granted to him by letters patent for life out of the fermes of London and Middlesex, were specially excepted. In 31

Henry VI. he received a further grant of 20*l.* yearly for life, which also was excepted from another act of resumption passed three years after. The last mention which is found of his name is in the latter year, when the Commons prayed that he might be appointed one of the administrators of the property of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester. (Rot. Parl. v. 196, 317, 339.) In the four last years of his life Bishop Grey appointed him one of the judges of the Isle of Ely. (Cole's MSS. xxv. 47.)

HAMBURY, HENRY DE, was one of the sons of Geoffrey de Hambury, who resided at Hambury, or Hanbury, a parish in Worcestershire. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 304.) He was made one of the judges of the King's Bench in Ireland in 17 Edward II., and was raised to the office of chief justice of the Common Pleas there in the following year. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 94, 96.) He was soon afterwards removed from that country, being appointed a judge of the King's Bench in England in 2 Edward III., 1328. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 24.) The cause of his elevation to the bench may have been his connection with Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, for his adherence to whom he had received a pardon in 12 Edward II. He is mentioned as being alive in 26 Edward III., in the herald's visitation of Worcestershire, but he must have long retired from the bench, as the Liberate Roll does not name him among the judges in 12 Edward III.

His lineal descendants are divided into several opulent branches, two of which have been recently ennobled—one having been created Baron Bateman, of Shobden in the county of Hereford; and the other, Baron Sudely, of Toddington in the county of Gloucester.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM DE, had property in Cambridge, and his name is first recorded as a justice itinerant, but for pleas of the forest only, in Hampshire and Wiltshire in 8 Edward I., 1280. In 10 Edward I. he was custos of the bishopric of Winchester, and of the abbey of Hyde. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 401.) He seems afterwards to have become a clerk in the Chancery, as it was probably in that capacity that the Great Seal was occasionally placed under his care. There is one letter addressed to him as the king's vice-chancellor, dated November 12, 1286 (7 Report Prob. Rec., App. xii. 242, 251); and another from the regent Edmund, Earl of Cornwall, with directions relating to the Chancery. On Bishop Burnel's death, October 25, 1292, the Great Seal was delivered into the wardrobe under William de Hamilton's seal; and the record expressly states that he sealed the writs therewith for the few days that intervened before his accompanying the chancellor's remains to Wells as one of his executors. (Rot. Parl. i. 117.)

During the absences also of the next chancellor, John de Langton, from March 4 to 30, 1297, and from February 20 to June 16, 1299, he held the Seal and performed the necessary duties in the meantime.

He received the usual ecclesiastical preferments which were conferred on this class of officers, being in 1292 made archdeacon of the West Riding of York, and in December 1298 appointed dean of York. He was also dean of the church of St. Burian in Cornwall. (Le Neve, 313, 322; Cole's Documents, 421.) On December 29, 1304, the king named him chancellor; but, being then absent, the Seal was ordered to be deposited in the wardrobe till his arrival, and it was delivered to him on January 16, 1305. He held it till his death, on April 20, 1307. (Madox, i. 74.)

HANKFORD, WILLIAM, was born at a place of that name at Bulkworthy, in the parish of Buckland Brewer, in Devonshire, and was the second son of Richard Hankford, of an ancient and wealthy family, to whose large estates he eventually succeeded. The first mention of him is as one of the king's serjeants-at-law in 14 Richard II., 1390. In January 1398 he gave his opinion, by desire of the parliament, on the answers made by the judges to the questions propounded to them by Chief Justice Tresilian, which he declared to be good and loyal, and such as he himself would have given under the circumstances. (Rot. Parl. iii. 358.) It is to be hoped that this opinion was prompted rather by his fears of the danger that hung over him had he pronounced any other, than by the temptation of being raised to the seat on the bench of the Common Pleas then vacant. He was, however, appointed to fill it on the 6th of May following. Henry IV. renewed his patent on the very day he assumed the throne, feeling it a point of policy not to interfere so early in the judicial appointments; and Hankford was made a knight of the Bath at the coronation.

He continued in the Court of Common Pleas throughout that reign, and on the accession of Henry V. he was removed from the Common Pleas to the head of the Court of King's Bench, his patent being dated March 29, 1413, eight days after the death of Henry IV. He presided in the court during the whole of the reign, and was re-appointed at the commencement of that of Henry VI., being the fourth king under whom he had held a judicial seat. In a very few months, however, his career was closed, his death occurring on December 20, 1422, not four months after the accession. He was buried in the church of Monkleigh. He had a high reputation both in his moral and legal character.

A very improbable account of his death is given by his biographers. He is stated to have become weary of his life, and, with an intention of getting rid of it, to have given strict orders to his keeper to shoot any person found at night in his park who would not stand when challenged, and then to have thrown himself in his keeper's way, and to have been shot dead in pursuance of his own commands. The cause of this suicidal conduct is represented to have been his 'direful apprehensions of dangerous approaching evils,' which could only have arisen from a diseased imagination, as there was nothing at that time in the political horizon to portend the disasters of thirty years' distance. Holinshed introduces this event as happening in 1470, 10 Edward IV., very nearly fifty years after the death of the chief justice. The story, however, was long believed in the neighbourhood of his seat at Annery, in Monkleigh, and an old oak bearing his name was shown in the park, where it was said he had fallen. As Chief Justice Danby did actually disappear about that time, it is not improbable that the story applies to him, Holinshed having mistaken the name.

He left two sons, Richard and John, the first of whom had a daughter Anne, who married the Earl of Ormond; and their daughter Margaret, marrying Sir William Boleyn, was the grandmother of Anne Boleyn, the mother of Queen Elizabeth.

HANNEMERE, DAVID, was the grandson of Sir John Mackfel, constable of Carnarvon Castle in the reign of Edward I., who assumed the name of Hannemere from the town so called in Flintshire, which belonged to him. Philip, the youngest of his three sons, was ultimately his sole heir, and by his wife Agnes, daughter and heir of David ap Rice ap Evans ap Jones, had several children, of whom this David was the elder. His name appears as an advocate in the Year Books from 45 Edward III., and on the accession of Richard II. he was appointed one of the king's serjeants, and 'narrator' in all the courts. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 197.) On February 26, 1383, he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench, and from that time till the parliament of October 1386 he was among the triers of petitions. As his successor in the King's Bench was named in the following year, he probably died in the interval.

By his wife Angharad, daughter of Lhyvelin Dhu ap Griffith ap Jorworth Voell, he had, besides a daughter Margaret, who married the renowned Owen Glendower, two sons, Griffith and Jenkin, from the latter of whom sprang a long succession of knightly descendants. Two of these were created baronets, one of them in 1620, now extinct by the death in 1746 of Sir Thomas Hanmer, who was speaker of the House of Commons in the reign of Queen Anne, and distinguished by his elegant and correct edition of the works of Shakspeare; and the other granted in 1774, by whose descendant the title is now enjoyed. (Wotton, i. 411.)

HANNEN, JAMES, one of the present judges of the Queen's Bench, is the son of James Hannen, Esq., of London, and was born in 1821. After receiving the earlier part of his education at St. Paul's School, he finished it at the university of Heidelberg. Adopting the legal profession, he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on January 14, 1848, and joined the Home Circuit. During the twenty years that he practised in the courts he distinguished himself by the solidity of his advice, and the readiness and ability of his advocacy. Though he never accepted the silk gown, which has become a common aspiration, nor was ever in parliament, yet, notwithstanding he was well known as a liberal in politics, he was selected solely for his legal acquirements by a conservative government to fill the vacancy in the Court of Queen's Bench occasioned by the death of Mr. Justice Shee. He was appointed on February 25, 1868, and was soon after knighted.

He married Mary Elizabeth, daughter of N. Winsland, Esq.

HANNIBAL, THOMAS, in 1504 entered the university of Cambridge, where he took the degree of Doctor of Laws in 1514. At the former date he received a prebend in the church of York, and at the latter became chancellor of the diocese of Worcester. In 1522 both he and Dr. John Clerke were engaged at the Roman court in the double capacity of King Henry's orators and private agents for Cardinal Wolsey. Both of them were rewarded in succession with the mastership of the Rolls, Hannibal following Clerke in that office on October 9, 1523, and retaining it till June 26, 1527, when he voluntarily surrendered it. In 1524 he presented to the king a rose of gold sent by the pope. (Rymer, xiv. 10; Athen. Oxon. ii. 735, 771; Fæst. i. 39.)

HARCOURT, SIMON (LORD HARCOURT), was directly descended from Bernard, of the royal blood of Saxony, who with other lordships received that of Harcourt, near Falaise, from Rollo on his settlement in Normandy. His descendant, Robert de Harcourt, accompanied William on his invasion of England, and his family had flourished during the succeeding period in knightly distinction, and had been resident during the twelfth century at Stanton, near Oxford, from that time called Stanton-Harcourt. The chancellor was the son of Sir Philip Harcourt, by his first wife, Anne, daughter of Sir William Waller, the parliamentary general. The family estate, by one side or the other in the previous troubles, had been seriously diminished at the time of the Restoration.

Simon Harcourt was born in 1660, and while receiving his education at Pembroke College, Oxford, was admitted in 1676 as a member of the Inner Temple. He was called to the bar in 1683, and in 1688 he was elected recorder of Abingdon. (Athen. Oxon. iv. 214.) That borough returned him to parliament in 1690, and in all the future parliaments of King William's reign. That he was strongly imbued with tory principles he evinced on his first entrance into the house, by the objections he then raised in the discussions on the bills for the settlement of the government, and afterwards in 1696 by powerful speeches in opposition to the bill of attainder against Sir John Fenwick, as a proceeding both unconstitutional and unjust. He carried his party feeling so far that he declined in the first instance to subscribe the Association of the Commons on the discovery of the assassination plot.

The tide of party turned, however, towards the latter end of King William's reign. The consequence of this was first the removal, and then the impeachment, of Lord Somers, the duty of carrying up the charge against whom to the House of Lords was entrusted to Harcourt, to whose management or mismanagement (as it may be variously considered) may probably be attributed the non-appearance of the prosecutors at the trial. (State Trials, v. 582-1314.) At this time he had acquired a complete ascendancy, not only in the house, but in general estimation. His wit and eloquence, in addition to his legal ability, were so universally acknowledged that in after-years they were specially brought forward in the preamble to his patent of peerage as a principal reason for his advancement.

With the accession of Queen Anne the tories were established in power, and Harcourt was at once admitted to partake it, being made solicitor-general on June 1, 1702, and knighted. In the first parliament of that reign he was again returned for Abingdon, but in the second and third he sat for Bossiney in Cornwall. He supported the extraordinary claims of the Commons to decide on the rights of electors in the famous Aylesbury case, and has the credit of drawing the bill for the Union with Scotland in such a manner as to prevent a discussion of the articles upon which the commissioners had agreed. While solicitor-general he acted as chairman of the Buckinghamshire quarter sessions, and of his charges to the grand jury there are manuscript notes in the British Museum. In April 1707 he succeeded to the post of attorney-general, but before a year elapsed he resigned it, in February 1708, on the change of ministry and the admission of the whigs into the cabinet. In the new parliament called in November of that year he was returned again for Abingdon, but on a petition against him by his whig opponent, the house, notwithstanding the majority of legal votes at the close of the election were palpably in his favour, decided against him. He thus became the victim of an iniquitous system he had himself encouraged when in power in former parliaments, by which the faction in the ascendant decided on all petitions in favour of their own partisan. The Duke of Marlborough soon after removed him from the stewardship of the manor of Woodstock, which he had held for some time. (Burnet, v. 10, 48, 287, 345; Parl. Hist. vi. 264, 778; Luttrell, vi. 442.)

Before the close of that parliament he was elected member for Cardigan, but during his recess from the house the absurd impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell was resolved on, and Sir Simon was thus enabled to appear as his leading counsel at the bar of the House of Lords, and by a powerful argument to expose the folly of prosecuting his vain and silly client. This prosecution was the deathblow of the whigs. The tories were restored to power, and Sir Simon on September 19, 1710, resumed his office of attorney-general. He was returned to the new parliament for Abingdon, but before it met the Great Seal was delivered into his hands on October 19, with the title of lord keeper. He then took up his residence in Powis House, Lincoln's Inn Fields. (State Trials, xv. 196; Luttrell, vi. 620, 630, 644.)

Before he was solicitor-general his name only once occurs in the 'State Trials,' and after he obtained office there are only three cases in which he acted besides that of Dr. Sacheverell. (State Trials, xiii. 1084, xiv. 561, 989, 1100, xv. 196.)

The new lord keeper presided in the House of Lords for nearly a year without a title, but on September 3, 1711, he was raised to the peerage as Baron Harcourt of Stanton-Harcourt. On April 7, 1713, the queen changed his title of lord keeper to lord chancellor, which he retained till her death on August 1, 1714, steering cautiously amidst the dissensions in the cabinet and through the agitating scenes by which the last months of her reign were troubled. Although as chancellor he was forced to take the formal proceedings necessary for proclaiming the Hanoverian king, there was too much reason for believing that he had previously joined in the intrigue with Bolingbroke and Atterbury to restore the exiled family.

The lords justices however replaced him in his position as lord chancellor; and, notwithstanding the suspicion attaching to him, he escaped the consequences with which his colleagues were visited, and received no other punishment than an immediately discharge from his office on the arrival of George I. The king made his first entry into London on September 20, and on the next day he sent to Lord Harcourt for the Seal, which was delivered to Lord Cowper. Towards his old coadjutors he acted a friendly part, managing to defeat the impeachment of Oxford, and procuring a qualified pardon for Bolingbroke. (Lord Raymond, 1318; Parl. Hist. vii. 485.)

After some years, when the Hanoverian succession was recognised by the great majority of the people, he joined the whig party under Sir Robert Walpole, which procured him from his old allies the nickname of the Trimmer. His change of politics was accompanied, on July 24, 1721, by an advance in the peerage to the dignity of viscount, and an increase of his retiring pension from two to four thousand a year. To that administration he continued his support through the remainder of the reign, though he never held any other official position than that of one of the lords justices during the king's occasional visits to his German dominions. He survived George I. not quite two months, when, being seized with paralysis, he died at his house in Cavendish Square on July 28, 1727, and was buried at Stanton-Harcourt.

With undoubted abilities and a power of eloquence universally acknowledged, Lord Harcourt's reputation as a judge is not very great, nor are his decisions held in high estimation at the present day. That he was kind and amiable in his disposition, polished in his manners, and of social habits may be inferred from the number of friends that circled around him, from his being a frequenter of several literary and political clubs, and from his intimate association with Pope, Swift, Philips, Gay, and the other wits by which that age was distinguished.

Lord Harcourt was married three times—first, to Rebecca, daughter of Mr. Thomas Clark; secondly to Elizabeth, daughter of Richard Spencer, Esq., and widow of Richard Anderson, Esq.; and lastly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Vernon, of Twickenham Park, and widow of Sir John Walter, of Saresden in Oxfordshire, Bart. He had issue by his first wife only, and, his son Simon having died before him, he was succeeded by his grandson, to whose other titles an earldom was added in 1749. These honours became extinct in 1830.

HARDRES, ROBERT DE, was in 1185 one of the custodes of the see of Coventry, then vacant, and possessed of property at Hadleigh in Suffolk. (Madox, i. 116, 309.) He was one of the justices itinerant in the county of Lincoln in 1 and 8 Richard I., 1189-90. (Ibid. 704; Pipe Roll, 69.)

He held the prebend of Lochton in the church of Lincoln, and died about 9 John.

He derived his name from Hardres, a parish near Canterbury, and was no doubt a branch of the family who held the manor there under the Earls of Clare. They assumed the name about 1180, and several of them held a high position during the following reigns. One of their descendants was sheriff of the county in the reign of Elizabeth, and another was created a baronet by Charles I. in 1642. The title, however, became extinct in the early part of the reign of George III. (Hasted, iii. 732.)

HARDWICKE, EARL OF. See P. YORKE.

HARE, NICHOLAS, traces his descent in England to Jervis, Earl of Hare-court, or Harcourt, who accompanied William the Conqueror in his invasion of this island. He was the eldest son of John Hare, of Homersfield in Suffolk, and Elizabeth Fortescue his wife. Educated at Cambridge, he entered the Inner Temple, where he became reader in 1532. He received the honour of knighthood about the year 1539, and on April 28, 1540, he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, to which he was returned as member for Norfolk. He presided also in the following session, his speech at the close of which affords a curious specimen of the inflated oratory of the period. (Parl. Hist. i. 546.)

In September 1540 he was one in a commission into Wales to examine what jewels, plate, and ornaments were embezzled from the shrine of St. David's. (Acts Privy Council, vii. 46, 85.) At this time he was chief justice of Chester, and he was soon after made master of Requests, which he held during the remainder of Henry's and the whole of Edward's reign. Fortunately for himself, he was not called upon to witness the will of the latter, and was not implicated in the measures taken to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. On September 18, 1553, he was appointed master of the Rolls; but it would appear that his judicial position did not prevent him from opposing the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain, since Sir Nicholas Throckmorton justifies his 'misliking' of that connection by the reasons for it which he had learned from 'Master Hare' and others in parliament. If he had offended by this, he amply redeemed himself in the eyes of the court by his harsh endeavours to procure Throckmorton's conviction. (State Trials, i. 875-806.) His severity however at the trial overstepped its object, since it is not improbable that his refusal to examine a witness called by Throckmorton and to refer to a statute cited by him tended materially to the acquittal of the prisoner.

Sir Nicholas died as master of the Rolls on October 31, 1557, and was buried in the Temple Church. By his wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir John Bassingbourn, of Woodhall in Hertfordshire, he had three sons, all of whom dying without issue, the estate went eventually to his younger brother John, one of whose sons was ancestor of Sir Ralph Hare, of Stow Bardolph, who was created a baronet in 1641, but the title became extinct in 1764. It was however revived in 1818, and the title is now enjoyed. Another son was the father of Hugh, who was created Lord Coleraine in Ireland in 1625, but this title is also now extinct. (Oldfield and Dyson's Tottenham, 30, 81; Wotton's Baronet. ii. 208.)

HARENG, RALPH, was a justicier as early as 10 John, and fines were levied before him as late as 8 Henry III. He is mentioned as seneschal or steward of Thomas de St. Valerico in 8 John, and that he was then advancing in the king's favour appears by the committal to his custody of the two churches of Cestekton and Mixebir, of which his son, Jordan, had been deprived on account of the interdict (Rot. Claus. i. 82, 114); and in less than two years he was employed in a judicial capacity. In 17 John he was appointed sheriff of the united counties of Buckingham and Bedford, and in the following year he was specially employed by the king, and the constables of the castles of Wallingford, Oxford, and Windsor were commanded to give him safe conduct on his mission. (Rot. Pat. 146, 192.)

From the first year of the next reign there are frequent entries of his judicial employment, and of marks of royal bounty accorded to him. (Rot. Claus. i. 294-483.) He died about 1230.

HARPUR, RICHARD, was the son, or grandson, it is uncertain which, of Henry, the third son of Sir John Harpur, of Rushall in the county of Stafford, descended from a very ancient Warwickshire family, which had flourished from the time of Henry I. He was a student at Barnard's Inn, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, where he was elected reader in 1554. In 1558 he was nominated serjeant, and in May 1567 he succeeded as a judge of the Common Pleas. He died on January 29, 1577, and was buried in the church at Swarkestone in Derbyshire, under a monument finely representing him in full legal costume, to which the sculptor has added unaccountably a collar of SS. By his wife, Jane, daughter of George Findern, of Findern in the same county, he left several children, the eldest of whom, Sir John, was father of Henry Harpur, of Calke in Derbyshire, who was created a baronet in 1626. The seventh possessor of the title assumed the name of Crewe in addition to his own, and the present baronet bears both names. (Wotton's Baronet. ii. 3; Fairholt's Costumes, 278.)

HART, ANTHONY, a native of St. Kitt's in the West Indies, was born about 1754. He was educated at Tunbridge School, and studying for the legal profession, was called to the bar in 1781, and practised throughout his life in the courts of equity. Sound as a lawyer, clear in his statements, fluent if not forcible in his language, and industrious and painstaking for his clients, he obtained, both before and after he received a silk gown, a very considerable share of business. He laboured before the equity judges with indomitable perseverance for forty-six years, before his extensive legal knowledge gained him promotion; but in May 1827 he was appointed vice-chancellor of England. His merits were then so much better appreciated than on the retirement of Lord Manners, in the following October, he was raised to the lord chancellorship of Ireland. One of Lord Norbury's innumerable jokes was made on this appointment: 'That the government had treated the Irish with their wonted injustice; deprived them of what they needed, and given them what they already possessed—taken away Manners, and given them Heart.'

His judgments were much admired, and his character was plain, unostentatious, and kind. He gave such universal satisfaction that his removal in December 1830 was a subject of sincere regret to the members of his court, which was shown in a most affecting scene at his departure. He survived his retirement only one year, and died in December 1831.

HARVEY, FRANCIS, commencing his legal studies at Barnard's Inn, completed them at the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar, and became reader in 1611. In December 1612 (at which time he resided at Northampton) he was chosen recorder of Leicester; and in 1614 he attained the degree of the coif. On October 18, 1624, he was constituted a judge of the Common Pleas. On one of his circuits he fined a whole jury 10*l.* apiece for giving perverse and wrongful acquittals in four different criminal cases; and in another he showed some indignation on hearing an assize sermon at Norwich, in which the preacher alluded to the corruption of judges, saying in his charge to the grand jury, 'It seems by the sermon we are all corrupt; but know that we can use conscience in our places as well as the best clergyman of all.' (Borough MSS. Leicester.) He remained in that court till his death, which took place at Northampton in August 1632. (Croke, Car. 268.)

HARWEDON, ROBERT DE, who held land in the forest of Bernewood, was one of the four justices of trailbaston for Gloucestershire and ten other counties, dated on April 6, 1305, 33 Edward I. (N. Fadera, i. 970; Rot. Parl. ii. 215.) He acted as deputy to Hugh le Despenser, the justice of the forests south of Trent in the next reign, in the fifth year of which the custody of the manor of Rokele in Wiltshire, belonging to the Templars, was committed to him at an annual rent of eleven pounds, ten shillings, and fourpence. (Ibid. i. 321; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 184; Cal. Rot. Pat. 78.)

HATHERLEY, LORD. See W. P. Wood.

HATSEL, HENRY, the son of Captain Henry Hatsel, of Saltram, near Plymouth (who took a strong part in the Great Rebellion), was born in March 1641, and, being admitted a member of the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1667, and in 1689 was summoned to take the degree of the coif. In another eight years he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on November 23, 1697, and knighted. He filled the seat during the remainder of William's reign, and was re-appointed on the accession of Queen Anne, on March 2, 1702. But on the 4th of the following June he suddenly received a message from Lord Keeper Wright, informing him that he might forbear sitting the next morning, the first day of term, her majesty designing his quietus. His conduct at the Surrey Assizes on the extraordinary trial of Spencer Cowper, charged with the murder of Sarah Stout, and acquitted, does not tell much in favour of his judicial capacity. He lived twelve years after his discharge, and died in April 1714.

He married Judith, daughter of Josiah Bateman, merchant of London, and widow of Sir Richard Shirley, Bart. (Lord Raymond, 250, 768; Luttrell, iv. 309, v. 181; State Trials, xiii. 1105.)

HATTON, CHRISTOPHER. Something less than justice has been done to the character of Sir Christopher Hatton. He has been looked upon less as a grave counsellor than as an accomplished courtier, and the popular impression with regard to him is more connected with his youthful graces than with his mature services. The prevalence of this feeling is in a considerable degree to be attributed to the jocose stanzas of our poet Gray in his fanciful account of the mansion at Stoke-Pogeis, which he erroneously supposes to have been occupied by Sir Christopher:—

Full oft within the spacious walls,

When he had fifty winters o'er him,

My grave lord-keeper led the brawls,

The Seal and maces danc'd before him.

His bushy beard and shoe-strings green.

His high-crown'd hat and satin doublet,

Mov'd the stout heart of England's queen,

The Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.

It is difficult to reverse the sentence of a poetical judge, especially when the decree is pronounced in quotable phraseology; but truth in the end will triumph, and, whatever may have been the recommendations which introduced him at court, it will be acknowledged that he preserved his position there, and obtained his elevation, by qualities more solid and accomplishments more serviceable than an elegant address or a flattering tongue.

Although the son of a private country gentleman, his lineage, as is usual with the lineage of all men who become great, was satisfactorily traced to a Norman nobleman, whose descendants were long settled in Cheshire until a younger son of one of them married the heiress of Holdenby in Northamptonshire. William Hatton, the grandson of this gentleman, was, by his wife Alice, daughter of Robert Saunders, of Haringworth, father of three sons, the youngest of whom was Sir Christopher, who by the early death of his brothers succeeded to the paternal estate.

Born in 1540, at Holdenby, he became a gentleman commoner at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, but took no degree (Athen. Oxon. i. 582); and on May 29, 1560, he was admitted a member of the Inner Temple. It is uncertain whether Hatton took the degree of a barrister, because the Inner Temple registry of calls to the bar does not commence till 1567, three or four years after he had entered into the service of the queen; but, as he was clearly a member of the Temple in the following year, the probability is that he would not have remained in the house for eight years merely in the character of a student. All that is known of his early residence in the inn is, that in the Christmas of his second year, 1561, the prominent office of 'master of the game' was assigned to him in that celebrated masque at which Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester, was the chief personage. (Dugdale's Orig. 150.)

The date of his introduction to court is established by Sir Harris Nicolas's discovery of a warrant, dated June 30, 1564, for 'one armour fit for the body of our well-beloved servant Christopher Hatton, one of our gentlemen-pensioners,' which, however, is only to be 'delivered to him on his paying the just value thereof.' (Cal. State Papers [1547-80], 242.) It may be presumed, therefore, that he had previously attracted the queen's notice.

In 1568 he and four other gentlemen of the Inner Temple composed a tragedy called 'Tancred and Gismund,' which was acted before the queen, each of them taking a part in the performance. Hatton contributed the fourth act. It is plain that by this time he had ingratiated himself with Elizabeth, as in that year he was appointed keeper of Eltham Park and the Park of Horne, and had effected an exchange of his manor of Holdenby for the site of the abbey and demesne lands of Sulby with her majesty, who at the same granted him a lease of his paternal manor for forty years. During the next three years he received continued marks of royal favour, among which were his nomination as one of the gentlemen of the privy chamber, and the reversion of the office of queen's remembrancer in the Exchequer.

Hitherto he had taken no apparent part in politics; but he was elected member for Higham Ferrers in the parliament of 1571, and for the county of Northampton in that of 1572. In the latter he was one of the committee appointed to confer with the Lords 'on the great matter touching the Queen of Scots;' but he does not appear to have spoken in the house till March 12, 1575, when he presented a message from the queen recommending the enlargement of Mr. Wentworth, who had been committed to the Tower for an offensive speech. At this time he is described as captain of the queen's guard, having succeeded Sir Francis Knollys in 1572. In 1573 he narrowly escaped assassination from the hands of Peter Byrchet, a fanatic who was hanged for the murder of another person, whom he believed to be Hatton. Her majesty gave him the affectionate nickname of 'Liddes,' and he addressed her in the warmest terms of love. Scandal indeed was busy as to the nature of his intercourse with the queen, and the reports were not limited to the common herd of calumniators, but were boldly repeated to Elizabeth herself by Queen Mary, and were believed by Catherine de Medicis and others. The letter written by Dyer to Hatton, advising him what conduct to pursue in consequence of a temporary loss of favour at the end of 1572, and his own letters to the queen in the following year, when he was sent to Spa for his health (preserved in Sir Harris Nicolas's valuable 'Life and Times of Sir Christopher Hatton'), all contain expressions which are very difficult to interpret under any other supposition than that an intimacy existed between him and the queen which would have been fatal to the character of any less elevated female. (Ibid. 453, 461-6.) To what extent that intimacy was carried it would be as unseemly as useless to attempt to penetrate; but seeing that the royal favour began when he was about five-and-twenty, and ended but with his life, extending over a period of twenty-six years, and that it was unbroken but by a few of those ammuntium ire which rather proved its potency than caused any real interruption, it is impossible not to give him credit for a discretion most uncommon in that age, and for so extraordinary a degree of prudence and modest demeanour as to subdue the efforts of rival claimants, and to secure the esteem and confidence of the wisest counsellors of the crown.

During this period he frequently resided at the house in Eltham Park, apparently keeping up great hospitality. The churchwarden's accounts for 1578 contain an entry, 'Payd for brede and drynke when y^e Quenes Grasse dynd at Eltham, for ringing, xx^d;' her majesty's host being no doubt Sir Christopher. (Archæologia, xxxiv. 60.)

Between 1574 and 1577 Hatton obtained possession of the Bishop of Ely's house in Holborn, after an effort by the latter to fly from a contract made between them, which was speedily silenced by the interference of the queen in the following well-known letter:—

Proud Prelate! I understand you are backward in complying with your agreement; but I would have you know that I who made you what you are can unmake you; and if you do not forthwith fulfil your engagement, by God I will immediately unfröck you. ELIZABETH.

In 1576 he obtained an act for the assurance of his lands, and was gratified with a pension of 400*l.* a year for life, with monopolies, and with special advances for the payment of his debts. After having been connected with the court for thirteen years with no higher position than that of gentleman of the queen's privy chamber and captain of her guard, he was raised on November 11, 1577, to the office of vice-chamberlain, and was sworn of the privy council, and as appears from the Diary of Dr. Dee the astrologer (p. 4), with whom he, like most of his contemporaries, conferred, he was knighted on December 1.

From this time his devotion to state affairs is apparent from the letters between him and the principal ministers, who advised with him on all important matters, both foreign and domestic, and evidently regarded his opinion with a deference which a mere favourite could not command. Still representing the county of Northampton, he appears to have been the queen's organ of communication with the parliament. In 1581 he conveyed her reprimand to the house for presuming to appoint a public fast without her authority; in 1585 he presented the queen's answer to the address of thanks, and communicated her desire that they should adjourn for the Christmas holidays. On this occasion he made the unusual motion that the house should join in prayer for her majesty's preservation, and accordingly every one knelt down while Mr. Vice-Chamberlain read a prayer 'devised and set down by an honest, godly, and learned man.' (Parl. Hist. i. 812, 827.)

In the trials of Babington and the other conspirators relative to Mary, Queen of Scots, which took place in September 1586, Sir Christopher took a prominent part, and, if a judgment is formed from modern prosecutions, not an impartial one. But, prejudiced as he could not but be by the confessions he had heard, there was more of indiscretion than unfairness in the remarks he interposed; and the kindness of his nature was manifested by his promise to pay the debts of one of the accused, of whose guilt there is no doubt. (State Trials, i. 1127-53.)

The trial of Queen Mary immediately followed, Hatton being one of the commissioners, and her consent to plead, which she at first refused, was at length yielded, 'persuaded,' as she declared, 'by Hatton's reasons,' which he had delivered with force and eloquence the day before. In the parliament which was called in the next month he took the lead in urging her execution, expressing, as plainly appears from the whole proceeding, the universal wish of all parties in both houses. The queen's answer to their joint petition was delivered on November 12; and the warrant, after an affected hesitation, was signed on February 1, 1587. Secretary Davison, to whom it was given, having resolved not to act on his own responsibility, the privy council was summoned, and, in consequence of their decision, the warrant was forwarded to Fotheringay. Notwithstanding this, all the counsellors escaped public censure, except the unfortunate secretary, who was no more guilty than the rest, if guilt there was. But the queen wanted a pretence to excuse herself, and Davison was sacrificed to her hypocrisy by a severe sentence of fine and imprisonment. Had there been any sincerity in the queen's complaint, the whole council would have felt the weight of her indignation, but there is nothing to show that any other member of it suffered from her frowns. On the contrary, Sir Christopher Hatton, whom she must have known to have been anxious to release her from all fears about the Scottish queen, and to have been present when the warrant was forwarded, was, within a month after the unjust proceedings against Davison, rewarded with the highest civil rank in the state, by being promoted to the office of lord chancellor on April 29.

That Hatton's elevation to this high and important office occasioned some surprise cannot be doubted, for the public would naturally consider him a mere courtier, and would have forgotten that he had received a legal education. But he had now been known to the ruling powers more than twenty years, during the last ten of which he had been one of the queen's most secret counsellors, advised with not only by her, but by her leading ministers on all occasions. They thus had a full opportunity of judging of his talents and abilities, and their high appreciation of them is sufficiently evidenced by the correspondence which Sir Harris Nicolas has published. Although his early call to a court life prevented him from pursuing the practice of the law, it is to be remembered that in his youth he spent some years in the study of it, and also that he had been long accustomed as a privy councillor to sit in the Star Chamber. That these advantages were not wholly unproductive of fruit is proved by the judicial character he acquired for care and industry in acquainting himself with the rules of his court, and for wisdom and impartiality in the judgments he pronounced. He had the caution to require the attendance of four masters in Chancery when he sat in court, and two when he heard causes in his own house. (Egerton Papers, 125.) One of these was Sir Richard Smale, whose advice he is reputed to have followed in all matters of moment. Fuller says 'that some sullen serjeants at the first refused to plead before him,' forgetting that his court was not their usual arena, but adding that, 'partly by his power, but more by his prudence, he convinced them of their errors and his abilities.' His supposed incompetency to his judicial duties does not seem to have weighed so heavily upon him as to prevent his enlivening the bench with a joke. In a cause relative to the boundaries of some land, the counsel for the plaintiff having said, 'We lie on this side, my lord,' and the counsel for the defendant, 'We lie on that side, my lord,' the chancellor stood up and said, 'If you lie on both sides, whom will you have me to believe?' (Bacon's Apophthegms, 97.)

During the remaining four years and a half of his life he continued to perform the duties of the chancellorship, in such a manner as to escape condemnation from his legal contemporaries and to retain the favour of his sovereign. In April 1588 he was honoured with the order of the Garter, and on the death of the Earl of Leicester he sought for, and attained on September 20, no doubt by the queen's encouragement and influence, the honourable position of chancellor of the university of Oxford, having been elected two days before high steward of the sister university. It is thus apparent that she did not even resent the courage he had recently displayed in remonstrating with her against affixing the Great Seal to letters patent granting to the earl the unconstitutional post of Lieutenant of England and Ireland. He only presided over one parliament, which met on February 4, 1589, and was dissolved on March 29. (Parl. Hist. i. 853-8.)

No further event of any importance in the chancellor's history is recorded before his death on November 20, 1591. Fuller (Worthies, i. 165) states that 'it broke his heart that the queen (which seldom gave boons, and never forgave due debts) rigorously demanded present payment of some arrears which he did not hope to have remitted, but did only desire to be forborn; failing herein in his expectation, it went to his heart, and cast him into a mortal disease. The queen afterwards did endeavour what she could to recover him, bringing, as some say, cordial broths unto him with her own hands.' On several occasions there are accounts of his suffering from sickness, and his last illness was probably a violent attack of his old disease, its termination being embellished with the story of the broken heart. But, whatever may have been the real cause of his illness, one fact is incontrovertibly proved, that to the last moment of his life the queen's regard for him was undiminished.

He was buried with great pomp in St. Paul's Cathedral, where a splendid monument was erected to his memory by his nephew, Sir William Hatton.

Surrounded as he was by statesmen of unrivalled talent, an acknowledged favourite among many rivals, honoured and rewarded above his compeers, and holding prominent positions in the council and the court during a long series of years, the absence of any weighty and the failure of every malicious charge against him, the respect and friendship of the great and good men of his day, and the amicable relations in which he lived with his competitors for the queen's personal favour, all prove that he was a man of no ordinary capacity, and that he was as amiable in his disposition as he was discreet in his conduct, neither exciting opposition by arrogance, nor using his known influence to the injury of others. His principal rival in the queen's affections, the Earl of Leicester, called him in his will his 'own dear friend,' and bequeathed to him, besides other valuable gifts, his George and Garter, 'not doubting that he shall shortly enjoy the wearing of it.' His love of literature has not been denied, and of his encouragement of the learned many evidences remain. In the religious contests of the time he always took the part of a moderator; and though suspected of being favourable to the Catholics, he endeavoured to intercept the rigour of the law against the Puritans, being of opinion that 'in the cause of religion neither searing nor cutting was to be used.'

Sir Christopher dying unmarried, his estates devolved on his nephew, Sir William Newport, the son of his sister. This gentleman, who took his uncle's name, married twice, and his second wife afterwards became the wife of Sir Edward Coke. The chancellor's estates descended on Sir Christopher Hatton, the grandson of a younger brother of the chancellor's father. His son was created Baron Hatton of Kerby in Northamptonshire in 1643, and the second baron was advanced to the viscounty of Hatton of Gretton in the same county in 1682; but both titles became extinct in 1702.

The name of Hatton still survives in the peerage, having been assumed by the present Earl of Winchilsea and Nottingham's grandfather, whose mother was only daughter, and eventually heiress, of the first Viscount Hatton. (Nicolas's Life of Sir Christopher.)

HAUGH, JOHN, whose portrait in a window of the church of Long Melford in Suffolk is the only remaining indication of the place in which he was born or resided, was a member of Lincoln's Inn, of which society he was reader in 1460, and again in 1473. He was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas in Hilary 1487, 2 Henry VII., and he ceased to act, whether by death or otherwise, after Trinity 1489. (Dugdale's Orig. 47-258.) He married Joan, daughter and coheir of Thomas, son of Chief Justice Sir Thomas Billing.

HAUNSARD, WILLIAM DE, was one of the justices itinerant appointed for Surrey in 9 Henry III., 1225; and in the two following years he assessed the quinzime and the tallage in that county. (Rot. Claus. ii. 76, 146, 208.)

HAUTEYFN, HAMON, no doubt named from a manor called Hauteyn's in the parish of Bernham-Broom in Norfolk, held some office in the Exchequer, and was entrusted with the sheriffalty of Lincolnshire in 44 and 45 Henry III., during which he was either so negligent or corrupt as to incur an amercement of ten marks for delaying the execution of a writ till it was too late to act upon it. (Abb. Placit. 152.)

In 1 Edward I. he was one of the justices of the Jews, and acted as assessor in London and Middlesex of the fifteenth granted in 3 Edward I. (Parl. Writs, i. 4.) He also sat with Ralph de Hengham and others as a justice itinerant for the county of Suffolk in 1285, 13 Edward I. (Abb. Placit. 277.) In the next year, however, being called to account by the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, and convicted of various misdemeanours, he was suspended from his office of justice of the Jews in Trinity Term 1286. (Madox, i. 254, ii. 321.)

HAYA, ROBERT DE, was of the same name and flourished at the same time as the noble Scotch family now represented by the Marquis of Tweeddale. In 7 John he commanded the king's galleys 'in insulis' (Rot. Pat. 63); and in 24 Henry III., 1240, he was one of the justices itinerant for York; and being then sheriff of Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire, he had permission as long as he was on that iter to pass his accounts at the Exchequer by means of a substitute. (Madox, ii. 177.)

HAYES, GEORGE, was the last-appointed and the last-deceased judge of the Queen's Bench, receiving his patent on August 25, 1868, as one of the three added to the several courts in futherance of the recent act remitting the trial of election petitions to the judges, and within fifteen months dying almost in the exercise of his judicial duties.

He was born on June 19, 1805, and was the son of Sheedy Hayes, Esq., of Judd Place, a West India proprietor. Educated first at Highgate, and then at St. Edmund's Roman Catholic College at Ware, he entered the Middle Temple, where on January 29, 1830, he was called to the bar. He joined the Midland Circuit, of which he eventually became the leader. In 1856 he took the degree of serjeant-at-law, to which was added in 1860 a patent of precedence, and about the same time he was appointed recorder of Leicester. Whether as junior, or senior, or as recorder, he distinguished himself as a sound lawyer; and it was only his legal reputation, for he never entered into party politics nor ever sat in parliament, that pointed him out as an eligible recipient of the honour of the ermine.

This selection was most acceptable to his brethren of the bar, for he was highly popular among them, being of the most amiable disposition, joined to a jovial power of enlivening his companions. He was, in fact, a man of 'infinite jests,' and if there had been an album kept in Westminster Hall, to record the witticisms of the bar, many would have been the pages devoted to his witty pleasantries and whimsical pieces.

His judicial career was lamentably short. While unrobing at Westminster, after hearing a cause at Nisi Prius, he was seized with a severe attack of paralysis, which terminated in his death on November 25, 1869.

He married Sophia Anne, daughter of Dr. John Hill, of Leicester, and has left a large family.

HEATH, NICHOLAS (ARCHBISHOP OF YORK), was of a family seated at Apsley in the parish of Tamworth in Warwickshire, but was born in London. After attending St. Anthony's School, in which Sir Thomas More had been a pupil, he was entered of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; from whence he was transplanted to Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1621, being soon after elected a fellow of Clare Hall there. He is said to have been maintained while at college by Queen Anne Boleyn and her father and brother, and to have been in the first instance a favourer of the new Protestant doctrines. (Strype's Mem. i. 279.) Though his assistance to Cranmer in his translation of the Bible seems to warrant this report, his opinions must have undergone great change. Taking holy orders, he was instituted into the church of Hever in Kent in 1631, and, having proceeded doctor in divinity in the meantime, into those of Bishopsbourne and Southmalling in 1637, and of Shoreham in 1638, to which was added the rectory of Cliff. In the following year he became archdeacon of Stafford, and was made almoner to the king (Rymer, xiv. 648), who promoted him to the bishopric of Rochester on March 26, 1640.

After remaining in this diocese for nearly four years, he was translated to Worcester, to which he was elected on December 22, 1643; and he sat there, quietly performing his episcopal functions, for the rest of Henry's reign, and the first four years of that of Edward VI. The act for the adoption of the new Book of Common Prayer having been passed about that time, he, although he had voted against it, was appointed one of the commissioners for carrying it into effect. Refusing to sign the form prescribed for the ordination of bishops, &c., he was committed to the Fleet in December 1550 (Chron. Grey Friars, 68), and, being proceeded against for contempt, was deprived of his bishopric in the ensuing October. His imprisonment in Bishop Ridley's house, to which he was removed in July 1552, was alleviated by the kindness and liberal hospitality of that prelate, of whom Heath used always to speak as the most learned of the Protestant party.

On the accession of Queen Mary the sentence against him was reversed, and he recovered possession of his see. One of the first uses which Mary made of him was to attempt the conversion of the Duke of Northumberland, in which he showed so much dexterity as to induce the duke, either out of weakness or hope of life, to make a public profession of Romanism on the scaffold. (Robertson's Heylin, ii. 85.) The royal favour was further exhibited towards Heath by making him President of Wales, and, on the deprivation of Archbishop Holgate, by translating him to York. The congé d'élire is dated February 19, 1555; and the death of Bishop Gardiner in the same year leaving the office of chancellor vacant, the Great Seal was delivered to him with that title on January 1, 1556. Although the fires of Smithfield, begun by Gardiner, continued to rage during the chancellorship of Archbishop Heath, there is no evidence, and indeed no charge, that he assisted in feeding them.

On the day of Queen Mary's death, November 17, 1558, the parliament being then sitting, he communicated the event to the Lords and Commons, and declaring that the right and title of the Lady Elizabeth was free from all question and doubt, he directed her immediate proclamation. This prudent activity, which anticipated all pretenders and procured her a peaceful accession to the throne, could not but be gratefully felt by the new queen, who, though she did not again entrust him with the Great Seal, continued him in her privy council.

He joined with the other English prelates in refusing to assist at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth; but one of the number, Oglethorpe, Bishop of Carlisle, was at last prevailed upon to perform the ceremony on January 15, 1559, on her agreeing to take the accustomed oath. The parliament met on the 25th, and one of its earliest debates was with reference to an act for restoring the supremacy of the crown. To this bill Heath and eight other bishops were vigorous opponents, and the speech which he addressed to the house on the occasion has been published. It is firm and temperate and learned, but its arguments did not prevail. The bill passed into a law on March 22, and the archbishop and the opposing bishops refusing to take the oath, they were deprived of their sees, and the queen's licence to elect a new archbishop was issued on July 25, 1560. (Rymer, xv. 599.) In the preceding month Heath had been committed to the Tower, and in the following February sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him. (Machyn's Diary, 238, 249.)

The deprived archbishop was more fortunate than some of his colleagues, for his imprisonment was of short duration, he being allowed after two or three months' confinement to retire to his own property at Chobham in Surrey. For this comparative clemency he no doubt was indebted as much to the queen's gratitude for his early exertions in her behalf, as to her admiration of his learning and amiable character, and she showed her continued kindness by an occasional visit to him in his retirement. There he lived for many years, pursuing uninterruptedly and with patient devotion the studies which had first interested him, and there he died in the year 1579, and was buried in the chancel of the parish church.

Such is the history of his last years which all his biographers have written; but a story is ventilated by Miss Strickland (Elizabeth, 155) as to a Nicholas Hethe's imprisonment in 1565, which she applies to the archbishop. The tale, however, is of itself highly improbable, the identification of the two wholly fails, while a letter from the archbishop to Lord Burleigh, dated at Chobham, September 22, 1573, wherein he expresses his gratitude 'for having lived many years in great quietness of mind,' confirms the original account. (Cal. State Papers [1547-80], 467.)

During his presidency over the province of York, Queen Mary gave to him and his successors as a residence in the metropolis, instead of York House, which had been appropriated by Henry VIII., Suffolk House, near St. George's Church in Southwark. This he was permitted to sell, and to purchase in its stead Norwich House, near Charing Cross, which, changing its name to York House, long continued in the possession of the archbishops, but was commonly let by them to the keepers of the Great Seal. After Lord Chancellor Bacon's disgrace, the Duke of Buckingham obtained it, giving other lands in exchange, and the site is now occupied by the streets which bear his name and title.

Writers of all parties describe Archbishop Heath as a man distinguished by his private virtues, of great abilities and integrity, of gentle temper and prudent conduct, firm in his principles and moderate amidst the bigots of both parties. (Godwin, 470, 537, 710; Athen. Oxon. ii. 817; Langard; Hayward; Burnet.)

HEATH, ROBERT, son of Robert Heath, of Brasted in Kent, and Jane, his wife, daughter of Nicholas Poner, was born 'upon the 20th day of May in the year 1575,' says the chief justice in a short memoir of his life written a few months before his death. He was educated at the free grammar school of Tunbridge, and at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he remained for three years. He was then admitted of Clifford's Inn, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar in 1603. In 1607 he was selected to be reader of Clifford's Inn, and became a bencher in 1617, filling the post of reader there in 1619, and that of treasurer in 1625. (Dugdale's Orig. 167, 171.) He had the fortune to be a favourite of the favourite Buckingham, for whose use he received by patent the profits of the King's Bench and Common Pleas offices, and thus ingratiated himself with the frequenters of the court. On November 10, 1618, he was elected recorder of London in opposition to James Whitelocke. On his nomination as solicitor-general on January 22, 1621, he resigned the recordership, but was elected by the citizens to represent them in the parliament of that year. In it he was a frequent debater, trying to accommodate matters for the king, who knighted him, and retained him in his office during the rest of his reign.

Soon after Charles's accession, Heath on October 31, 1625, was promoted to the attorney-generalship. In the following May he had to bring articles of impeachment against the Earl of Bristol (Parl. Hist. ii. 80), in the nature of a cross-bill to the charges which the earl had made against the Duke of Buckingham, who at the same time was also impeached by the House of Commons. All these proceedings were stopped by the sudden and intemperate dissolution of the parliament. In the next year he had the invidious task of opposing the release of the knights who, having refused to contribute to the loan, had been committed to prison, and in this difficult duty he displayed much learning, ingenuity, and eloquence. In 1628, when the judges' refusal to bail or discharge them was taken up by parliament, Sir Robert Heath had again almost single-handed to maintain the argument against antagonists so powerful as Sir Edward Coke, Littelton, Selden, and Noy, and he did it with such ability and courage that, though defeated, he lost no credit by his exertions. (State Trials, iii. 30, 133.) The violent termination of this parliament in March 1629, and the imprisonment of the members who forcibly detained the speaker in the chair at its close, led to other proceedings in which Sir Robert Heath took a very prominent part. By the king's command, he obtained private opinions of the judges upon certain abstract questions, and upon the answers he obtained filed informations against the offending members, and, on their refusing to plead, judgment of fine and imprisonment was pronounced against them. When the conduct of the judges in this matter came to be canvassed by the Long Parliament, Sir Robert Heath seems almost to have escaped censure, as merely performing the duty which devolved upon him as the servant and advocate of the crown. In the exercise of his functions as attorney-general he was so zealous and active a partisan of the court that the king constituted him chief justice of the Common Pleas on October 26, 1631. (Rymer, xix. 346.)

On September 14, 1634, he was discharged from his place without any cause being assigned. His removal may perhaps owe its origin to his opposition to Laud, and his disinclination to the extreme views which that prelate adopted in ecclesiastical matters. It was generally believed, however, that the question of ship-money, the writs to collect which were issued four days after the appointment of Sir John Finch as Heath's successor, had some connection with the change. (Rushworth, ii. 253.) Anthony Wood, in his account of Noy, casually says that Sir Robert Heath was 'removed from the chief justiceship of the King's Bench for bribery;' but in his account of Heath himself he alludes in no way to his dismissal, and makes such mistakes in the courts to which he was appointed as to deprive his record of any value. (Athen. Oxon. ii. 584; Fasti, ii. 45.) Whitelocke, who was not his friend, would not have omitted all notice of his removal could he have alleged such an imputation as the cause. Upon the foundation of Wood's loose statement merely, for no other can be cited, Lord Campbell (Ch. Just. i. 415) makes this assertion: 'The truth seems to be that he [Heath] continued to enjoy the favour and confidence of the government, but that a charge had been brought against him of taking bribes, which was so strongly supported by evidence that it could not be overlooked, although no parliament was sitting, or ever likely to sit; and that the most discreet proceeding, even for himself, was to remove him quietly from his office.' Historians will be anxious for information of his lordship's authority for this statement; for they will be unwilling to suppose it to be gratuitous scandal, although it seems to be contradicted by the very act of the government that displaced him. In the next term after he was ousted from the bench he resumed his practice at the bar as junior serjeant (Croke, Car. 375), a privilege that the king would scarcely have granted, or that the fallen judge would have had the effrontery to ask, if his disgrace had been so notorious 'that it could not be overlooked.' That he was actually replaced on the bench, when the 'parliament was sitting'—a parliament, too, that was ready enough to find any blot in the king's appointments,—sufficiently shows the inconsistency of the charge. The chief justice himself says, in his memoir before cited, written when he was in sorrow, and just before his own death: 'At the end of three years I was on a sudden discharged of that place of chief justice, noe cause being then nor at any time since shewed for my removal.' In the next year (1635) the king required his presence at the council board to hear a certain cause (Cal. State Papers [1634-5], 87); and in the following year he was again taken into the actual service of the crown, his patent as king's serjeant being dated October 12, 1636. He continued at the bar for four years more, when he was replaced on the judicial seat on January 23, 1641, as a judge of the King's Bench; and was further favoured, on May 13, with the office of master of the Court of Wards and Liveries. (Rymer, xx. 448, 517.) When the king retired to York, Sir Robert joined him there, and on June 10, 1642, addressed a letter to the House of Lords, informing them that he had 'left the parliament to go to the king at York as by oath and duty bound;' whereupon they resolved to the contrary, and that his staying at the parliament, being sent for from them, was not against his oath. (Parry's Parliaments.) On February 7, 1643, he was created Doctor of Civil Law by the university of Oxford, and a few months later the king, being then in that city, appointed him chief justice of the King's Bench, and in a letter dated July 4, 1643, authorised him in the summer assizes 'to forbear those places whither you conceive you may not goe with convenient safety.' (Notes and Queries, 1st S. xii. 259.)

Several complaints were made to the parliament against Chief Justice Heath and other judges who acted with him on the circuit. On these charges, and for adhering to the king, then in arms against the parliament, the Commons impeached them on July 24, 1644; but as the chief justice never put himself in their power, he escaped trial. This, however, did not prevent them from venting their enmity. On November 26, 1646, they passed an ordinance disabling him and four others from being judges, 'as though they were dead;' and by another vote of October 24, 1648, they ordered that he should be excepted from pardon. (Whitelocke; Parl. Hist. iii. 285.) His estate was sequestered, but was recovered by his son Edward at the Restoration. According to his own relation, the parliament gave him liberty 'either to exile himself into a foreign country, or to run the hazard of further danger.' Of course he never took his seat as chief justice in Westminster Hall; and the prothonotaries of the King's Bench, Henley and Whitwick, took advantage of the distractions of the times to appropriate to themselves the fees received for his use. They were brought to account by the chief justice's son in 1663, when, notwithstanding they pleaded the Statute of Limitations, they were forced by a decree in Chancery to refund the whole amount. (W. Nelson's Reports, 75.)

Sir Robert fled into France in 1646, and survived his royal master just seven months, dying at Calais on August 30, 1649. His body was brought to England and entombed with that of his wife, under a stately monument, in Brasted Church.

Among his papers, now in the possession of his noble descendant, has been found a jeu d'esprit on the twenty-four links of the collar of SS., each link representing some judicial attribute commencing with the letter S. It is wholly in his handwriting, and was probably composed as an amusement of his exile. It not only shows great ingenuity, but exhibits in the strongest light with what solemn responsibility the writer regarded the qualifications, the virtues, and the duties of a judge. (Notes and Queries, 1st S. x. 357.) His short memoir also, written undoubtedly during his exile, gives pleasing evidence of an amiable and pious mind. He married, while yet a student, Margaret, daughter of John Miller, and by her he left several children.

HEATH, RICHARD, was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in November 1659, and was elected a bencher in October 1677. He was summoned to take the coif in 1683, and promoted to the bench of the Exchequer on April 21, 1686. Of his subservency to the court there is manifest proof in his concurring with his colleagues in favour of the king's dispensing power, and in his conduct with regard to the seven bishops. Archbishop Sancroft thus relates it to King James, when called before him on November 6, 1688, after the invasion of the Prince of Orange: 'I will particularly acquaint your majesty with what one of your judges, Baron H. by name, said coming from the bench, where he had declared our petition to be a factious libel. A gentleman of quality asking him how he could have the conscience to say so, when the bishops had been legally discharged of it, he answered, "You need not trouble yourself with what I said on the bench: I have instructions for what I said, and I had lost my place if I had not said it." He did lose his place shortly after, being superseded by James himself in the beginning of December. No wonder therefore that he was included among those who were excepted from the bill of indemnity at the revolution. He died in July 1702. His wife was Katherine, daughter of Henry Weston, of Ockham and Sende, Esq., sheriff of Surrey and Sussex. (2 Shower, 459; State Trials, xii. 503; Parl. Hist. v. 334; Luttrell, i. 482, v. 198.)

HEATH, JOHN, was the son of Thomas Heath, an alderman of Exeter, and the nephew of Benjamin Heath, town-clerk and a lawyer of eminence in that city, who was the father of Dr. Benjamin Heath, the head-master of Eton. He himself for a time filled the office of town-clerk of his native city.

A member of the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar in June 1762, and in 1775 he was graced with the dignity of the coif. On July 19, 1780, he was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas, and in that court he continued to sit for nearly thirty-six years. He died at the age of eighty on January 16, 1816, and was buried at Hayes in Middlesex.

That he was somewhat eccentric may be surmised from his refusal to accept the honour of knighthood, at that time and now almost invariably conferred on the occupiers of the judicial bench, declaring that he would die 'plain John Heath'—a resolution to which he firmly adhered. But his excellence in performing the functions of a judge is allowed by all who were witnesses of his career. Lord Eldon, who was part of the time chief justice of that court, took occasion to remark with admiration and surprise on the extent of his professional knowledge. Many also are the testimonies to his private worth, and to the universality and accuracy of his general knowledge. He was considered a severe judge, and, though capital punishments were then carried to an outrageous extent, the failure of the ticket-of-leave system which too frequently follows the penalties since substituted forcibly confirms the judge's opinion that 'the criminal is soon thrown upon you again, hardened in guilt.' Yet in his private intercourse he was kind, charitable, and good-natured. He died unmarried. (Notes and Queries, 3rd S. ii. 11, &c.)

HEGHAM, ROGER DE, was of a Kentish family, and probably the son of Robert de Heggam, whose widow, Matilda, paid for an assize in that county in 56 Henry III., 1272. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 571.) In 21 Edward I. he acted on the part of the king on a quo warranto at York. (Arch. Inst. York, 154.) In 25 and 26 Edward I. he assessed the tallage of London, and in the latter year he was appointed to perambulate the forests of five counties. At the end of the same year he is mentioned on the records as a baron of the Exchequer (Madox, i. 467, ii. 235; Parl. Writs, i. 397), although Dugdale does not introduce him into his list till two years afterwards. In 34 Edward I., having been grossly insulted by one William de Briwes, against whom he had pronounced a judgment, the delinquent was ordered to make an apology in full court, and to be committed to the Tower, there to remain at the will of the king. (Abb. Placit. 256.) In the last year of that reign he acted as a justice of assize in Durham, and was one of the justices of trailbaston for the home counties. (Rot. Parl. i. 198, 218, 267.)

On the accession of Edward II. he was re-appointed to his seat in the Exchequer, and died about the middle of the second year, in January or February 1309.

HEIGHAM, CLEMENT, whose family was so called from a village of that name in Suffolk, was the son of Clement Heigham, of Lavenham, and Matilda, daughter of Lawrence Cooke. Admitted into Lincoln's Inn in 1517, he became reader in 1538, and again in 1547. At an early period of his career the monastery of St. Edmunds Bury appointed him chief bailiff of the liberty of St. Edmund, but there is no appearance of his practising in the courts at Westminster, his name being nowhere mentioned in the Reports. This may have arisen in some measure from his being a Roman Catholic, a sufficient impediment to any professional advancement in the reign of Edward VI. He was soon engaged in Mary's service as a privy councillor, and sat in parliament successively for Rye, Ipswich, West Looe, and Lancaster. After the queen's marriage with King Philip he was selected as the speaker of the parliament that met on November 11, 1554, in which the attainder of Cardinal Pole was reversed, and the supremacy of the pope restored. The revival of the acts against heresy induced nearly forty members, whose names are preserved by Sir Edward Coke, to leave the house in disgust at the obsequiousness of the majority to the ruling powers. (Parl. Hist. i. 617-625.) The parliament was dissolved on January 16, and eleven days afterwards Heigham received the honour of knighthood from the hands of King Philip. (Machyn's Diary, 342.)

On March 2, 1558, he was promoted to the office of lord chief baron of the Exchequer; but, though on the accession of Queen Elizabeth he received a new patent, he was removed on January 22, 1559.

Sir Clement then retired to his seat, Barrow Hall in Suffolk, where he spent the remainder of his life, beloved for his piety and benevolence, and for the readiness he always evinced in accommodating the differences of his neighbours, showing himself in all respect a loyal subject, and making himself so little obnoxious by his religious opinions that the lord keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was a visitor in his house. He died there on March 9, 1570, and was buried in Thurning Church in Norfolk.

He married twice. His first wife was Anne, daughter of John de Moonines, of Seamer Hall in Suffolk; and his second was Anne, daughter of Sir George Waldegrave of Smalbridge, and widow of Henry Bures of Acton in the same county. By each he had children, and his representatives have preserved the honour of the family from that time to this. (Burton's Gresham, ii. 108; Fuller's Worthies, ii. 350.)

HELYNN, WALTER DE, is described in the Patent Roll of 52 Henry III. as 'justiciarius noster,' and there are continual entries of payments for assizes to be held before him to the end of the reign. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 460-574.) He is called 'one of the king's justices appointed to hold the pleas of the lord the king' in 1 Edward I.; and in the fourth year he was paid twenty pounds for his expenses in visiting 'eleven places to expedite the king's business.' (Devon's Issue Roll, 81, 96.) It would appear that he was removed to the Common Pleas in 6 Edward I., as from that year till Trinity, 9 Edward I., 1281, fines were levied before him. (Dugdale's Orig. 44.) There is no later mention of him after 1284, when a special commission was directed to him and Giles de Berkeley. (Swinfield's Roll, 182.) He was seated at Much-Marcle, near Ledbury, in Herefordshire.

HEMINGTON, RICHARD DE, was professionally engaged in the courts, and in 35 Henry III., 1251, appeared before the king at Windsor on the part of John de Bailiol, who afterwards, in 52 Henry III., proceeded against him for delivering up his castle of Fotheringay to Baldwin Wake, the king's enemy and his, without his assent. (Abb. Placit. 165.)

He performed the duties of a justice itinerant in 46 and 47 Henry III., 1202-3, and the Fine Roll proves that he was a regular justicier till near the end of the reign, the last entry of payments for writs of assize to be held before him being in October 1270. (Ibid. 178; Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 410-524.)

HENDEN, EDWARD, was descended from a branch of the old Kentish family of the Hends, originally residing on an estate bearing its name in the parish of Woodchurch in Kent, but afterwards removed to Benenden in its neighbourhood, where they were clothiers in great repute.

Entering at Gray's Inn in 1586, he became reader there in 1614, and in the same year sat in parliament for Rye. Having been in 1616 called to the degree of the coil, for the next two-and-twenty years he had an extensive practice, and on January 23, 1639, he was constituted a baron of the Exchequer (Rymer, xx. 306) and knighted.

When the parliament entered the field against the king they passed an ordinance assessing all who had not voluntarily contributed to the army, in such sum as the committee meeting at Haberdashers' Hall should deem reasonable, not exceeding a twentieth part of their estate. In December 1643 the Commons applied to the Lords to rate Baron Henden, as an assistant to their lordships, who accordingly assessed him at 2000*l.* for the twentieth part of his estate, to be employed for the defence of Poole and Lyme. The baron not obeying this order, the house, on the 23rd of the same month, directed proceedings against him; but, as he was ill at the time, it seems that they were not then taken, and that he died in the following February. (Lords' Journals, vi. 324, 436.) He was buried in the chancel of Biddenham Church.

HENGHAM, WILLIAM DE, was a resident in Norfolk, and was probably a brother of Andrew, the father of Ralph de Hengham. He was one of four who, in 9 Henry III. 1124, were appointed to take an assize of novel disseisin in Norfolk; and in 1128 he was sent with three others to try certain prisoners in the custody of the Bishop of Ely, who were charged with murder. (Rot. Claus. ii. 78, 169.)

HENGHAM, RALPH DE, was the son of Sir Andrew de Hengham, of a knightly family seated at St. Andrew's Manor at Hengham in Norfolk. He was brought up to the then commonly united professions of the Church and the law, in the former of which he held a canonry in St. Paul's and the chancellorship of Exeter, to which he was collated in 1275, but resigned it within three years and a half. (Le Neve, 83.)

As a lawyer, the payment for assizes to be held before him commences in January 1270, 54 Henry III., which was probably the date of his appointment as a justice of the King's Bench. These entries of assizes before him are very numerous, and the rapidity with which he established his reputation in the court is evinced by his standing at the head of the circuits during the next two years till the end of the reign. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 504-584.)

That, on the accession of Edward I. he was immediately removed to the Common Pleas appears from a fine having been levied before him in November 1272; and that his elevation as chief justice of the King's Bench must have been between November 1273 and September 1274 (though Dugdale does not name him in that character till 1278) is proved by an entry of pleas 'coram domino rege et R. de Hengham et sociis suis, justiciis de Banco domini regis, in Octabis S. Michaelis, anno regno &c. secundo, incipiente tercio, apud Westm.' (Abb. Placit. 263.)

In 18 Edward I. he was removed from his office and fined, but what was the precise charge against him is nowhere recorded, and the amount of the fine is variously stated. It has been generally fixed at 7000 marks; but the complaints against him in the next parliament were palpably too slight to warrant such a punishment, and probably were merely made by those mean spirits who are too ready to press a falling man. One was, that the chief justice had confirmed a false judgment pronounced by Solomon de Rochester, the justice itinerant; and another, that a man had been arbitrarily imprisoned by him. (Rot. Parl. i. 48, 52.) There is much more probability that the fine did not exceed 800 marks, according to the tradition in the reign of Richard III., which attributed its imposition to Hengham's pity for a poor man having induced him to erase from the roll a fine of 13*s.* 4*d.*, and substitute 6*s.* 8*d.* for it. The story went on to assert that with this fine the clockhouse at Westminster was erected, and a clock placed in it which could be heard in the hall. (4 Inst. 255.) This tradition has been frequently referred to by judges who have been urged to alter a record. That Hengham's offence could not have been a very grievous one is sufficiently proved by his restoration to the bench at a later date.

His retirement, however, was of ten years' continuance, and his return seems to have been gradual. His name is introduced nearly at the bottom of the list of judges and other officers who were summoned to the parliament of March 1300, 28 Edward I., as if among the justices itinerant. In the following April he was the first named of those appointed to perambulate the forests of Essex, Buckingham, and Oxford (Parl. Writs, i. 664); and it was not till eighteen months afterwards—viz., on September 14, 1301—that he was restored to the bench, and constituted chief justice of the Common Pleas. In this office he continued till the end of the reign, and was re-appointed by Edward II. He served that king for a very short time, his death occurring in 1309. (Ibid. ii. 995.) He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, and Weever (p. 367) gives his epitaph, in which he is called 'flos Anglorum' and 'vir benedictus.'

Besides the 'Registrum Brevium,' which Coke calls 'the most ancient book of the law,' he left two works of note called 'Hengham Magna' and 'Hengham Parva,' which have been published with notes by Mr. Selden, and are printed at the end of his edition of 'Fortescue de Laudibus Angliæ' (1741).

HENLEY, ROBERT (EARL OF NORTHINGTON). The family from which he descended was originally established at Henley in Somersetshire, of which county some members of it were sheriffs. Its elder branch was honoured with a baronetcy in 1660, which expired in 1740. His great-grandfather, Sir Robert Henley, master of the Court of King's Bench in the reign of Charles I., having acquired the estate of the Grange in Hampshire, employed Inigo Jones to erect a considerable mansion on it. His third son, Sir Robert, and his grandson, Anthony, were both successively members of parliament for Andover, and the latter was afterwards representative for Weymouth till his death in 1711. This Anthony, who was one of the most accomplished wits of his day, by his marriage with Mary, the daughter and coheir of the Hon. Peregrine Bertie, second son of the Earl of Lindsey, became the father of three sons, of whom this Robert was the second. He was born about 1708, and was educated at Westminster, and St. John's College, Oxford, and was elected a fellow of All Souls' in 1727. Being then admitted to the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar in 1732.

As a young man he was jovial and hilarious, and indulged so much in the prevailing vice of drinking that he laid the foundation of that gouty habit from which he subsequently suffered. But he evidently acquired an early practice in the Court of Chancery, which increased so much that he was compelled in 1745 to take chambers in Lincoln's Inn, where equity lawyers 'most do congregate.' For this purpose he was also then admitted a member of that society. It was at that time the custom for Chancery barristers to attach themselves to a circuit, and thus to obtain some insight into the course of the common law and criminal courts (a practice which had not been altogether discontinued at the beginning of the present century), and Mr. Henley chose the Western Circuit, his connections being resident within it. Here his rough-and-ready advocacy soon procured him a lead; and a curious story is told of his being obliged to apologise to a Quaker of Bristol named Reeve for some indecent liberties he had taken with him in cross-examination. It speaks well for both that the Quaker was afterwards employed by the chancellor to pay the freight of some wine consigned to him, and that the chancellor invited his old antagonist to dine at his table, and good-humouredly related to the company the particulars of their early fracas.

He was elected recorder of Bath, where he resided during his vacations, and where he formed a romantic attachment to Jane, the beautiful daughter and one of the co-heiresses of Sir Hugh Huband, of Ipeley, baronet. She had at that time entirely lost the use of her limbs, but on her recovery they were united in 1743. Bath elected him its representative in the parliament of 1747, and he continued its member till his elevation to the equity bench. Attaching himself to the Leicester House party, he was an active debater in support of its line of politics. After the death of the Prince of Wales he continued his adherence to the princess, and on the establishment of the household of the young prince (afterwards George III.), in 1751, he was appointed his solicitor-general, and in 1754 his attorney-general, being on the former occasion admitted within the bar as one of the king's counsel, and elected a bencher of the Inner Temple. On November 6, 1756, he was appointed king's attorney-general, and knighted; and on the coalition ministry being formed in the following year, Sir Robert, after ineffectual offers of the Great Seal had been made to Lords Hardwicke and Mansfield, Sir Thomas Clarke, and Chief Justice Willes, was nominated lord keeper on June 30, 1757.

So unacceptable was he to George II., from his connection with Leicester House, that he was allowed to preside in the House of Lords for nearly three years without a title; but the necessity of appointing him lord high steward for the trial of the Earl of Ferrers for the murder of his steward, and the impropriety of a commoner holding that high office, obliged the king on March 27, 1760, to create him a peer as Baron Henley of the Grange. At that trial, judging from the printed account, his conduct was simple and unaffected, and the ill-natured and prejudiced assertion of Horace Walpole that it wanted dignity is fully refuted by the grave, appropriate, and affecting addresses delivered by his lordship to the noble prisoner, both on his arraignment and his condemnation.

George II. died six months afterwards, and soon after the accession of George III. Lord Henley's title of lord keeper was converted into that of lord chancellor. He was the last person who was designated by the former title, the single holder of the Great Seal being ever since that time, now more than a century, distinguished by the latter. It is difficult to account for the unmeaning imposition of the two titles since the time of Queen Elizabeth, when an act of parliament took away every essential difference that might have existed previously, and declared them to be equal in power, jurisdiction, and dignity.

On May 19, 1764, he was created Earl of Northington (the hamlet in which the Grange estate was situate), and in the following August he was made lord lieutenant of his county. Though Lord Northington owed his appointment of lord keeper to Mr. Pitt, he still retained the Great Seal when that minister was succeeded by Lord Bute, and also during the two subsequent administrations headed by the Duke of Bedford and the Marquis of Rockingham. From several points in the policy of the last he differed so materially that he induced his majesty to submit the guidance of the state to his old patron, Mr. Pitt, upon the formation of whose administration he retired from the post of lord chancellor on July 30, 1766, and took the less onerous position of lord president of the council. His principal inducement for making this sacrifice was the impossibility he found of performing the duties of the office of chancellor, enfeebled as he was by repeated attacks of the gout. The same cause obliged him eighteen months after to resign his new office; and from December 1767 he retired wholly from public life. He died on January 14, 1772, and was buried at Northington, where a handsome mural monument has been erected.

In the judgment of Lord Eldon, 'he was a great lawyer, and very firm in delivering his opinion,' an authority which few will dispute. Its justice will receive confirmation from a collection of his decisions, printed from his own manuscripts by his grandson, Robert Eden, second Lord Henley of that name, who afterwards published a memoir of his life. He retained to the end of his life his love of classical literature, and in his domestic circle he kept up the conviviality which distinguished him in his early years, tintured rather too much with warmth and irritability, and with the common use of profane expressions, a vulgar and unmeaning habit which then unhappily prevailed, adopted more with the view of giving strength to expressions than with any thought or intention of being blasphemous. Though he was undoubtedly coarse and careless in his language, he has not been charged with being incorrect or immoral in his conduct, and the two beautiful prayers which Lord Henley informs us he composed for the use of his wife leave the impression that he was imbued with deeper religious feelings than he had the credit of entertaining.

His wife bore him several children. The only son who survived him, Robert, was the second and last earl, dying in 1786 unmarried. One of his daughters, Elizabeth, married Sir Morton Eden, K.B., who was created in 1799 Lord Henley of Charlestown, in the peerage of Ireland, a title which still exists.

HENRY, DUKE OF NORMANDY, afterwards KING HENRY II., was the eldest son of Geoffrey, Earl of Anjou, by the Empress Matilda, daughter of King Henry I.

Being born in March 1133, he was but an infant during the contest between his mother and King Stephen. On the death of his father in 1150 he succeeded to the earldom of Anjou, and by consent of his mother assumed the title of Duke of Normandy. Having then attained the age of sixteen, he resolved to recover the English throne which his mother had lost. He accordingly received the honour of knighthood from his uncle David, King of Scotland, and strengthened himself by a politic marriage with Eleanor of Poitou, the divorced wife of Louis, King of France, acquiring with her the extensive duchy of Aquitaine. On his landing in England shortly after, his standard was joined by such of his mother's former adherents as survived, and by all those who were desirous of terminating the state of anarchy which prevailed throughout the kingdom. The contending armies met at Wallingford, but by the intervention of wise counsellors they parted without bloodshed, and an arrangement was effected between Stephen and Henry, by which it was agreed that the former should not be disturbed in his rule during his life, and that Henry should succeed him at his death. This treaty was concluded on November 7, 1153, when Stephen is said to have constituted Henry Chief Justiciary of England under him. He did not, however, long perform the duties of this office, as he returned to Normandy at the following Easter, and remained there till after Stephen's decease, which occurred on the 25th of the ensuing October. After a reign of more than thirty-four years, he died at Chinon on July 5, 1189.

HEPPECOTES, THOMAS DE, was one of those who were appointed to supply the place of the judges removed on the king's return from Tournay. His patent is dated January 8, 1341, 14 Edward III., but his death occurred before the end of the year. He was probably a native of Northumberland, where there is a hamlet called Hepcote in the parish of Morpeth. (Dugdale's Orig. 45; Rot. Parl. ii. 126.)

HERBERT, EDWARD, was the first cousin of the famous Lord Herbert of Cheshire, being the son of Charles Herbert of Aston in the county of Montgomery, third brother to the father of his lordship. Admitted to the society of the Inner Temple, he was called to the bar in 1618, and became reader in 1637. He had before this time acquired a seat in parliament, and in 1626 was one of the managers of the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham. (Whitelocke, 6; Parl. Hist. iii. 719.) He was not in the next parliament of 1628, but after its dissolution he was one of the counsel employed by Selden in the prosecution against him. (Cal. State Papers [1628-9], 556.) His opposition to the court did not last long, for in 1633 he was selected by the Inner Temple as a manager of the famous masque designed by the four inns of court as a compliment to the king and queen in confutation of Prynne's tirade against players in his 'Histrio-Mastix.' (Whitelocke, 19.) In January 1635 his devotion to the court was confirmed by his appointment as attorney-general to the queen, and in 1637 he was employed on the part of the crown in the prosecution of Burton, Bastwick, and Prynne. (State Trials, iii. 719.) Having been soon after knighted, his next step was to the solicitor-generalship, which he obtained on January 25, 1640, and in that character he sat in the parliaments of the following April and November for New Sarum. He continued a member till January 29, 1641, when, on his being created attorney-general, and thereby becoming an assistant to the House of Lords, he was, according to the practice of the time, incapacitated from sitting in the Commons. (Rymer, xix. 606, xx. 380, 448; Parl. Hist. ii. 662, 623.) This removal from a scene of daily contention was peculiarly acceptable to him, for, according to Clarendon, he was 'awed and terrified' with the temper of the Commons, and glad to be 'out of the fire.'

On January 3, 1642, he, by the king's command, brought an accusation in the House of Lords against Lord Kimbolton and five members of the Commons for high treason, and the king on the next day committed the imprudence of going to the latter house and demanding their arrest. The Commons, highly resenting this proceeding, voted it a breach of privilege, and impeached Herbert for exhibiting the articles. Sir Edward put in his answer justifying himself as acting under his majesty's express personal commands, and without any advice from himself, and thereupon the trial commenced on March 8. Two of the counsel assigned for his defence were committed for contempt in refusing to plead, and the excuses of two others were allowed, all four being intimidated by the threats of the Commons. Mr. Hearne and Mr. Chute, however, boldly and ably exonerated the attorney-general. Yet the Lords, influenced in some measure by the same fear, found him guilty of the facts, but at the same time showed their estimate of the imputed crime by successively negating motions that he should be punished by the loss of his office, by fine, by imprisonment in the Tower, or by mulcting him in damages to the accused members. More than a month after, their lordships, being compelled by the Commons to inflict some punishment, contented themselves with merely committing him to the Fleet during pleasure, and declaring him incapable of any other place than that of attorney-general, which he held. His incarceration lasted only eighteen days, from April 23 to May 11, when Sir Edward was permitted 'for his health' to go to any of his houses within a day's journey of London, but not to come to London without the order of the house. On July 4 the warden of the Fleet was ordered to bring him up, but, as was no doubt intended, he had taken the opportunity to escape and join the king at York. (Parl. Hist. ii. 1089, 1121-79; Lords' Journals, v. 177.) Venturing some time after to London, he seems narrowly to have escaped the clutches of the parliament, by whom an order was made on March 6, 1646, that he should be apprehended and brought to the bar. (Whitelocke, 196.)

Clarendon (Life, i. 212), who did not like him, states that his 'greatest faculty was, and in which he was a master, to make difficult things more intricate and perplexed, and very easy things to seem more hard than they were;' and gives an amusing account of certain conferences at Oxford in 1643, on the subject of the proposed proclamation for dissolving the parliament, which seems fully to justify his opinion.

The ground that he lost with the king on that occasion he did not regain. In a letter to Mr. Secretary Nicholas dated from Newark, October 16, 1645, his majesty says: 'For Mr. Attorney, tell him if the rebelles never did but justice, or what they had lawful power to do, then his answer good, otherwais it is not worth a button; wherefor if he confesse my power lett him accept my offer, otherwais I shall know what I have to do.' (Evelyn's Memoirs, v. 154.) The offer alluded to was probably that of the lord keepership, then vacant by the death of Lord Lyttelton. The result of this letter was that the Great Seal was entrusted to Sir Richard Lane on October 25, and that Sir Edward Herbert was discharged from his office on November 1. (Docquets at Oxford.)

Sir Edward seems to have been reinstated in his office by King Charles; for in 1648 Clarendon speaks of him in that character, as accompanying the Prince of Wales, and as a great favourite with Prince Rupert, describing him as always interfering with his advice, and as being 'of all men living most disposed to make discord and disagreement among men, all his faculties being resolved into a spirit of contradicting, disputing, and wrangling upon anything that was proposed.' If reliance is to be placed on the noble author's account of Sir Edward's subsequent conduct at the Hague, his intrigues and indiscretion well merit the censure; but the jealousy of a rival for court favour may account for some exaggeration of the facts. (Clarendon, vi. 83, 82, 127-30, 140.)

After the death of Charles I. Sir Edward is still mentioned with his official title. He attended the new king's court at the Hague, and afterwards was with the Duke of York at Paris, being one of this prince's private and confidential advisers, recommending and accompanying him on that inauspicious visit to Flanders and Holland in the following year. The regular councillors of the duke represented him 'as a man of that intolerable pride that it was not possible for any man to converse with him; . . . yet, by the knack of his talk, which was the most like reason without being it, he retained still too much credit with the duke, who, being amused and confounded with his positive discourse, thought him wiser than those who were more easily understood.' (Ibid. 321, 474, 483.)

Unless Sir Richard Lane was continued after the decapitation of the late king as nominal lord keeper till his death in 1650, of which there is no evidence except that on his widow's tomb, that office had not hitherto been filled by Charles II.; indeed, since the battle of Worcester there had been no Great Seal to keep. But in 1653 the king, having provided himself with a new Seal at Paris, entrusted it, against his own inclination, but at the urgent solicitation of the queen-mother (Evelyn, v. 284, 288), to Sir Edward Herbert in April of that year. The duties of the office, judicial or political, could not have been very onerous; and his time is described as being principally employed in endeavouring to effect the ruin of Sir Edward Hyde, of whose ascendancy over the king he was inordinately jealous. He showed his enmity on every occasion, and was met with corresponding hatred on the part of Hyde, whose prejudice is so apparent in every sentence that the character he gives of Herbert would be altogether unworthy of credit, were it not that both Charles I. and his son appear to have concurred in his opinion. That the dislike of the latter was real is proved by his resolving that Herbert should not accompany him when he left France in June in the following year. Sir Edward was so indignant at this mark of disgrace that he immediately surrendered the Great Seal. He died at Paris in 1657; or according to another authority, he survived till the Restoration, and died at Rouen.

He married Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Smith, master of the Requests, and widow of Thomas Carey, the second son of the Earl of Monmouth. His three sons all became distinguished in the succeeding reigns. The eldest, Charles, commanded a regiment of foot under King William, and was slain in the battle of Aghrim, in 1691. The second, Arthur, was the admiral who brought over that king in 1688, and was created Earl of Torrington, but, dying without issue, his title became extinct in 1716. The youngest, Edward, took the contrary side, and is the chief justice next noticed.

HERBERT, EDWARD, the third son of the above Sir Edward, was educated at Winchester, and at New College, Oxford, where he graduated as B.A. in 1689. He then went to the Middle Temple, and, becoming a barrister, migrated to Ireland, on his becoming attorney-general there. He was knighted in 1689, and was made chief justice of Chester. Subsequently appointed attorney to the Duke of York, he was soon after his royal highness's accession to the throne made attorney-general to the queen, and on October 23, 1685, was promoted to the vacant office of chief justice of the King's Bench. (Athen. Oxon. iv. 552; Fasti, ii. 304; Bramston, 207.) On his previous investiture with the necessary degree of serjeant he gave rings with the extraordinary motto 'Jacobus vincit, triumphat lex.'

Of his merits as a lawyer previous to his elevation we have no means of judging from the English Reports; but Burnet describes him (iii. 92) as 'a well-bred and virtuous man, generous, and good-natured,' but 'an indifferent lawyer. . . . He unhappily got into a set of very high notions with relation to the king's prerogative. His gravity and virtues gave him great advantages, chiefly his succeeding such a monster (Jeffreys) as had gone before him. So he, being found to be a fit tool, was, without any application of his own, raised up all at once to this high post.'

In the king's attempts for the establishment of Popery, one of his earliest steps was to appoint Roman Catholics to offices, and grant them a patent of dispensation from the oaths required by the Test Act. Sir Edward Hales held the colonely of a regiment under these circumstances, and, for the purpose of trying the question whether the king had power to grant such dispensation, a sham action to recover the penalty was brought against Sir Edward by Godden, his coachman. On the case being argued on demurrer Chief Justice Herbert gave a decided opinion that there was no law whatsoever but what may be dispensed with by the king as supreme lawgiver; but, as it was a case of great importance, he promised to submit it to the twelve judges. On a subsequent day he gave judgment for Sir Edward Hales, stating that all his colleagues agreed with his opinion except Mr. Baron Street. There can be no doubt, however, that, unconstitutional as this doctrine is now allowed to be, the chief justice really and conscientiously held it; and afterwards, when his judgment was assailed by Sir Robert Atkyns and other writers, he published a vindication of it, with the authorities upon which it was founded. Almost immediately followed his appointment as one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, who had powers almost as extensive and quite as obnoxious as those of the old High Commission Court; but the chief justice formed one of the minority which subsequently voted against the tyrannical suspension of the fellows of Magdalen College. (State Trials, xi. 1196, 1251; Evelyn, iii. 212, 214; 2 Shower, 497.) In Easter Term 1687 he refused a rule for the execution at Plymouth of a soldier who had been tried for desertion at Reading, and so determined was the king to effect his purpose of introducing martial law that Sir Edward was at once removed, and within a day or two Sir Robert Wright, who was substituted for him, complied with the king's will as a matter of course.

Though discharged from the King's Bench, he was on the next day, April 22, made chief justice of the Common Pleas, in which court he continued till the flight of the king. Remaining true to his master, Sir Edward joined the self-exiled monarch, and was of course excepted from the bill of indemnity, notwithstanding the high character for honour and integrity universally accorded to him in the debates. In France King James created him Earl of Portland, and gave him the nominal office of lord chancellor, in which his principal duty was to draw up declarations, asserting his master's right to his deserted dominions. Some of the most violent ones were unjustly attributed to him; for he in truth had little or no influence over James, the Roman Catholic ministers monopolising all the sway. Though taking rank as chancellor, and possessing all the external marks of his office, he was not allowed, as a Protestant, to hold a seat in the council. A large majority of the Jacobites in England remonstrated; but to their prayer that he should be admitted James answered evasively, that he would be 'on all occasions ready to express the just value and esteem he has for the lord chancellor.' When James's Protestant servants were dismissed in October 1692 Sir Edward retired into Flanders, but afterwards returning to France, he died at St. Germain's in November 1698. (Burnet, iii. 92, 149; Evelyn, iii. 235; Luttrell; Lord Macaulay, iv. 227, 386.)

HERBERT. See HERBERT LOSINGA.

HEREFORD, EARL OF. See W. FITZ-OSBERNE; M. DE GLOUCESTER; H. DE BOHUN.

HERIET, RICHARD DE, was sheriff of Essex and Hertfordshire in 4 Richard I., and was no doubt in some employment connected with the Exchequer. From 6 Richard I. to 6 John, 1194-1205, he acted as a justicier in the Curia Regis at Westminster, his name frequently appearing on the fines that were levied there. In 1 John, Robert Fitz-Torold granted him half the town of Bedefont; and in 3 John he paid

50l. for having the custody of his land in Surrey, and fifty-five marks for that in Wilts. He died in 1208. (Madox, i. 216; Rot. Cancell. 30, 225; Rot. Claus. i. 109.)

HERLASTON, WILLIAM DE, no doubt came from the place of that name in Staffordshire. In 6 Edward II. he accompanied the king abroad in the train of Ingelard de Warlee, keeper of the wardrobe. (N. Federa, ii. 213.) He soon afterwards became a clerk in the Chancery, and was parson of the church of 'Estwode near Reylegh;' and in July 1319 he had a grant of the prebend of Carnwyth in the church of Glasgow. (N. Federa, ii. 401.)

According to the practice of the time, the Great Seal was placed in the custody of some of the clerks of the Chancery during the occasional absence of the chancellor, and they transacted the business appertaining to it. William de Herlaston was frequently one of those entrusted with this duty from 1321 to 1324. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 1001.) He was also in the latter part of this reign keeper of the king's privy seal. (Rot. Parl. ii. 383.)

In 2 Edward III. he and Henry de Cliff, the master of the Rolls, were appointed keepers of the Great Seal during a vacancy in the office of chancellor, and he acted in the same character several times during that and the following year. He was a trier of petitions in the parliament as late as the twenty-first, and one of the justices itinerant in the twenty-second year.

HERLE, WILLIAM DE, was, according to Fuller (i. 281), born in Devonshire, because he was owner of Ilfracombe; but it is more likely that he was born in Leicestershire, both Robert de Herle, apparently his father, and he having been summoned by the sheriff of that county, the former in 1301, 29 Edward I., to perform military service, and the latter in 1324, 17 Edward II., to attend the great council at Westminster. (Parl. Writs, i. 355, ii. 639.) The principal part of his property was certainly in that county.

In 4 and 6 Edward II. he was summoned as an assistant to parliament, apparently in the character of a serjeant-at-law; and in the ninth year he was one of three 'qui sequuntur pro rege' in a suit against the men of Bristol. (Rot. Parl. i. 359.) The wardrobe account of 14 Edward II., 1320, contains the entry of a payment to him of the large sum of 133l. 6s. 8d. in these words: 'To William Herle, king's serjeant, who, by the king's order, will shortly receive the honour of knighthood, of the king's gift, in aid of his rank, 6th of August' (Archæologia, xxvi. 345); and he was raised to the bench of the Common Pleas on the 16th of the following October.

On the accession of Edward III. he was immediately made chief justice of that court, his patent being dated February 4, 1327. Though he was displaced on September 3, 1329, by John de Stonore, it is evident he still continued to act as a judge, as he was at the head of the justices itinerant in Nottinghamshire in the following December, and also, in the succeeding year, in Derbyshire. Restored to his place as chief justice on March 2, 1331, he was again removed on November 18, 1333; but Henry le Scrope, who was then appointed, resumed his seat at the head of the Exchequer on the next day. The cause of these changes can only be inferred; but William de Herle, from that day, presided till July 3, 1337, when, at his own request, he was allowed to retire from his office, on account of his age and infirmities. The patent spoke in eulogistic terms of his approved fidelity, the solidity of his judgment, the gravity of his manners, and his laudable and unwearied services to the state; and required him to remain on the secret council, and to attend at his pleasure during the rest of his life. (N. Federa, ii. 913.) He lived nearly twelve years after his retirement, dying in 1347.

Through his wife Margaret, the daughter and heir of William Polglas, by Elizabeth, the heir of Sir William Champernon, the manor of Ilfracombe, and other large property in Devonshire, came into his possession. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. ii. 135, 265; Nicholl's Leicestersh. 622; Prince.)

HERMAN (BISHOP OF SHERBORNE AND SALISBURY) was of Flemish origin, and had been one of the chaplains of Edward the Confessor, by whom he was advanced in 1045 to the small bishopric of Wilton, which in the preceding century had been cut off from the diocese of Sherborne, and the seat of which was sometimes at Wilton, sometimes at Ramsbury, and sometimes at Sunning. In 1050 he visited Rome in company with Aldred, Bishop of Worcester, and on his return he used his utmost endeavours to remove his see to Malmesbury; but, though the king consented, he was defeated by the opposition of the monks there. Indignant and disgusted, he retired to Bertin, in France, in 1055, and remained in that monastery for three years. On the death, however, of Efwold, Bishop of Sherborne, in 1055, he returned and succeeded in procuring the reunion of the two sees of Sherborne and Wilton; and in 1075, taking advantage of the order of the Council of London, that the bishops' sees should be removed from obscure places to towns of greater note, he effected the transfer of his to Old Sarum, no doubt, however, under the influence of favour, as that place was then little better than a castle. He there commenced the erection of the cathedral, but did not live to witness its completion. His death is fixed by different writers in the years 1076, 1077, and 1078.

Thynne, in his Catalogue of Chancellors, introduces him with these words: 'He is that Hermanus which, I suppose, was chancellor to William the Conqueror.' With no other authority than this, the followers of Thynne have unhesitatingly admitted his name.

He wrote the 'Life and Miracles of St. Edmund,' King of the East Angles. (Holinshed, iv. 348; Godwin, 336; Hutchins's Dorset, ii. 373.)

HERON, EDWARD, was the grandson of John Heron, a physician at Barming in Kent, and the son of Richard Heron, settled at Harsted or Hastings Hall, in Birdbroke, Essex. Admitted at Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar in 1574, and elected reader in 1587. In 1594 he took the degree of serjeant-at-law, which he held for fourteen years before he was advanced to the bench of the Exchequer on November 25, 1607, having been previously knighted. He did not long enjoy his position, for he either resigned or died in 1610. (Croke, Jac. 197.)

He was twice married. His first wife was Anne, daughter of David Vincent, Esq., of Bernake in Northamptonshire, the ancestor of the present baronet of that name. His second wife was Dorothy, daughter of Anthony Maxey, Esq., of Bradwell, near Coggleshall. (Moran's Essex, ii. 345.)

HERTELPOLE, GEOFFREY DE, of the manor of Brereton in Northumberland, acted as a judge of assize at Newcastle in the reign of Edward I. In 34 Edward I. the king granted to him the manor of Kenweston in Durham for his services.

He was summoned to the coronation of Edward II., and held the office of recorder of London for about a year in 1320, and continued during that reign to act as a justice of assize, attending the parliament among his brethren as late as 1326. (Abb. Placit. 306-9; Parl. Writs, i. 379, ii. p. ii. 1003; Rot. Parl. i. 194, &c.; Cal. Rot. Pat. 65.)

HERTFORD, ROBERT DE, was one of the judges of the Common Pleas placed on the bench in the room of those who were superseded for corruption in 18 Edward I., 1290, and appears to have continued to act up to 1295, as he was summoned to the parliament of that year. (Dugdale's Orig. 44; Parl. Writs, i. 29.)

HESILL, or HESILT, WILLIAM, was auditor of the Exchequer (Acts Privy Council, ii. 290) at the time he was made a baron of that court on July 13, 1421, 9 Henry V. He was re-appointed on the accession of Henry VI., but on May 18, 1424, was exonerated from his office. (Ibid. iii. 147.) He died on April 9 in the following year, and was buried in the church of Northfleet in Kent. He married Agnes, the daughter of John Appleton. (Hasted, ii. 321, iii. 315.)

HEWITT, JAMES (LORD LIFFORD), the eldest son of William Hewitt, a mercer and draper at Coventry, who served the office of mayor in 1744, was born in 1709, commenced his life in an attorney's office, under articles to Mr. James Birch, but was subsequently induced to seek his fortune at the bar. Entering the Middle Temple, he became a barrister in 1742. His merits as a lawyer procured him in 1755 the dignity of the coif, and four years afterwards the position of king's serjeant. In 1761 being elected member for his native town, the style of his oratory in parliament may be surmised from the story that is told of Charles Townshend, who being met going out of the house, when Serjeant Hewitt was thundering away on some dull legal question, was asked whether the house was up. 'No,' said Townshend very gravely, 'but the serjeant is.' At this time he was in opposition, but in the next year, when the Earl of Chatham came in, and his friend Lord Camden was made lord chancellor, the latter offered him the vacant judgeship of the King's Bench, which he accepted on November 6, 1766, on a promise that if he held the Seal when the chancellorship of Ireland became vacant he should be promoted to that office. Within a year the Irish chancellor died, and, Lord Camden having succeeded in overcoming all obstacles, Mr. Justice Hewitt received his patent as Lord Chancellor of Ireland on January 9, 1768. In June following he was created Baron Lifford in the Irish peerage, to which a viscounty was added in 1781. He filled this high office till his death on April 28, 1789, a period of more than twenty-two years. With few advantages of education, and with no extraordinary powers of intellect, he was successful in the exercise of his functions as a judge by the accuracy of his technical knowledge and his general professional skill. Formal in his manner and old-fashioned in his ideas, he yet, by his patience and urbanity to all, acquired universal esteem and respect.

He married, first, a daughter of the Rev. Rhys Williams, D.D., rector of Stapleford-Abbotts in Essex, and secondly, Ambrosia, daughter of the Rev. Charles Bayley, of Knavestock in the same county. The viscounty is still held by the descendants of his eldest son. His third son Joseph became a judge of the King's Bench in Ireland; and his fourth son, John, was dean of Cloyne.

HEYDON, THOMAS DE, is described as 'clericus noster' in letters patent of 4 John, 1203, relative to lands in Heydon and in London, belonging to Robert Furree, the custody of whose daughter, Constance, had been previously granted to him. (Rot. Pat. 27.)

From 8 to 11 Henry III. he was one of the regular justiciars at Westminster, receiving the acknowledgment of fines during the whole of that period, and acting as a justice itinerant on several occasions. (Dugdale's Orig. 42; Rot. Claus. i. 473, 681, ii. 82, 209; Madox, ii. 335.)

HEYM, PETER, was appointed, in 20 Edward I., 1292, a justice to take assizes in divers counties, and his pleas are recorded in 23 Edward I. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 92.) He was perhaps the son of the under-named Stephen Heym.

HEYM, STEPHEN, was one of the justices of the Common Pleas at Easter, 55 Henry III., 1271, and writs of assizes were taken in his name till the end of that reign. He was continued in the office under the succeeding king, as fines were levied before him from the former date till 3 Edward I., 1274, when he died. (Excerpt, e Rot. Fin. ii. 537-589; Dugdale's Orig. 44; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 23.)

HEYBUN, JORDAN, was of a Northumberland family, and joined the barons in their contest with King John. He made his peace in the next reign, and in 9 Henry III., 1225, he was one of the justices itinerant for Northumberland and Westmoreland, and in 1228 he acted in the same character for the liberties of the bishopric of Durham. (Rot. Claus. i. 341, 631, ii. 77.)

HILDESLEY, JOHN DE, was parson of the church of Thynden, and canon of Chichester in the reign of Edward II., from the tenth year of which, till the seventh year of the next reign, he was continually employed in diplomatic missions to various courts. He was raised to the bench of the Exchequer on December 18, 1332, 6 Edward III., having evidently been previously an officer connected with that department. He was superseded on September 9, 1334, on his becoming chancellor of the Exchequer. He is so called in 12 Edward III., and is named two years afterwards as a trier of petitions in parliament. (N. Fodera, ii. 329-875; Rot. Parl. ii. 99, 114; Cal. Rot. Pat. 120.)

HILL, HUGH, was born in 1802 at Craig in the county of Cork, the residence of his father, James Hill, Esq., a private gentleman, whose family originally settled in Ireland in Cromwell's time. Educated in Dublin University, he graduated there as A.B. in 1821, and, intending to pursue the profession of the law in Ireland, he then kept legal terms for two years in the inns of court there, and afterwards at the Middle Temple in London. He started as a special pleader under the bar in 1827, and for more than thirteen years devoted himself with unremitting energy to this department. Though his progress was at first not very rapid, at last his success exceeded his most sanguine expectations. So extensive and oppressive was his business that he felt it necessary to be called to the bar in January 1841, when he joined the Northern Circuit. Both there and in Westminster Hall his reputation as a deeply-read jurist and an ingenious and safe pleader secured to him an immense quantity of the heavy business, which required greater labour, but gave less profit, than the ordinary causes that occupy the courts.

From 1851, when he obtained the silk gown, till 1858, he was rewarded for his past labours by gaining a considerable lead, and on May 29 of the latter year he was constituted a judge of the Queen's Bench. But his labours had overtaken his strength; his constitution was completely undermined, and, becoming incapable of further exertion, he retired, after less than four years' service, in December 1861, to the regret of his colleagues and the loss of the legal world. He still survives, an example of patience in his sufferings, and of humble gratitude to a merciful God for the blessings he has received.

He married in 1831 a daughter of Richard Holden Webb, Esq., controller of the customs.

HILL, or HULL, JOHN (the name being as often spelled one way as the other), was born at Hill's Court, the seat of the family, near Exeter. The earliest mention of him as a lawyer is a writ of summons, dated November 28, 1382, to take upon himself the degree of a serjeant-at-law, being the first of that description which has hitherto been found, the previous entries only noticing those who were king's serjeants.

He was constituted a judge of the King's Bench on May 30, 1389, 11 Richard II., and on the accession of Henry IV. his patent was renewed, and his attendance in parliament as a trier of petitions is noted in every year from his first appointment till that of October 1407. (Rot. Parl. iii. 258-609.)

HILL, or HULL, ROBERT, was apparently of a Cornish family, and married two heiresses of that county, the first being Isabella, the sister of Thomas, the son of Sir Thomas Fychet, and the second being the daughter of Otto de Bodrugan, who or whose father had been sheriff of that county in 3 Richard II.

Robert Hill is mentioned among other lawyers in 16 Richard II. (Rot. Parl. iii. 302), and in the first year of Henry IV. 1399, he was appointed one of the king's serjeants, in which character he was required to contribute, or as it was called to lend, 100*l.* to enable the king to resist the Welsh and the Scotch. (Acts Privy Council, i. 202.) He was elevated to the bench of the Common Pleas on May 14, 1408, 9 Henry IV., and fines were levied before him as early as Midsummer in that year. (Dugdale's Orig. 46; Cal. Rot. Pat. 234.) He sat in the same court the whole remainder of his life.

In 3 Henry V. he was one of the judges by whom Richard Earl of Cambridge, Henry Lord Scrope, and Sir Thomas Grey were tried for treason at Southampton, and condemned to death, and in the first year of the next reign he is spoken of as having been chief justice of Ely. (Y. B. p. 8 b.)

He seems to have been rather a free-spoken judge on the bench. An action was brought against a dyer, who had bound himself not to use his craft for half a year, upon which Hill said that the bond was void because the condition was against the common law, adding, 'And, by God, if the plaintiff was here, he should go to prison till he paid a fine to the king.' (Y. B. 2 Hen. V. p. 5 b.) This is perhaps the only instance of an oath on the bench being reported.

The last fine acknowledged before him as a judge of the Common Pleas was in Hilary Term, 3 Henry VI., 1425, soon after which he died.

He settled himself at Shilston in Devonshire, and left a son named Robert, who was sheriff of that county in 7 Henry VI., and whose descendants flourished there for many generations. One of them was Abigail Hill, Lady Masham, the favourite of Queen Anne. (Notes and Queries, 2nd S. viii. 10.)

HILL, ROGER, belonged to a very ancient Somersetshire family, which had flourished at Hounston from the time of Edward III. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was seated at Poundsford, near Taunton, where William Hill, the father of the baron, lived and died in 1642. His mother was Margaret or Jane, daughter of John Young, of Devonshire, and he was born at Colliton in the latter county. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1632, and became a bencher in 1649.

In March 1644 he was the junior of the five counsel employed against Archbishop Laud, who, in allusion to the senior four being the only spokesmen, calls him 'Consul Bibulus.' (Athen. Oxon. iii. 130.) In the next year he was returned to the Long Parliament as member for Bridport, and one of the first fruits of his siding with the popular faction was the grant to him in 1646 of the chambers of Mr. Mostyn and Mr. Stampe in the Temple. (Whitelocks, 201.) Though named in the commission for the king's trial, he never sat on it.

Cromwell made him a serjeant-at-law on June 29, 1655, and in Easter Term 1657 he is mentioned in Hardres's Reports as a baron of the Exchequer. In that character he assisted at the ceremony of investiture of the protector in June 1657, and as one of the judges attendant on Cromwell's House of Peers he delivered a message from them to the Commons in the following January. (Burton, ii. 340, 512.) In the summer of 1658 he went the Oxford Circuit with Chief Justice Glynne, an account of the proceedings in which, 'writ in drolling verse,' was published soon after. (Athen. Oxon. iii. 754.) When the commonwealth was restored by the removal of Richard Cromwell and the return of the Long Parliament, Baron Hill resumed his place as a member, and on January 17, 1660, he was transferred from the Exchequer to the Upper Bench (Whitelocks, 693), where his name appears as a judge in Hilary Term in Siderfin's Reports.

The author of 'The Good Old Cause' says that the parliament granted him the Bishop of Winchester's manor of Taunton Dean, worth 12,000*l.* a year, on the determination of the estate for lives (Parl. Hist. iii. 1599), which he, of course, was not allowed to retain when the bishops were replaced at the Restoration. At that period he escaped the censure of the king, but, being one of the Rump Parliament, he had not the same favour shown to him as most of the other serjeants of the commonwealth experienced, in being confirmed in their degree. He survived Charles's return for seven years, during which he married his third wife, who brought him an estate at Alboro' Hatch in Essex, where he died on April 21, 1667, and was buried in the Temple Church.

He married three times—first, in 1635, Katherine, daughter of Giles Green, of Allington in the Isle of Purbeck; secondly, in 1641, Abigail, daughter of Brampton Gurdon, of Assington Hall in Suffolk; and thirdly, in 1662, Abigail, daughter and co-heir of Thomas Barnes, of Alboro' Hatch, Essex, and twice a widow, first of John Lockey of Holms Hill, Herts, and secondly of Josias Berners of Clerkenwell Close, Middlesex. (Family Memorials.)

HILLARY, ROGER, of a very ancient family, which possessed large property in the counties of Lincoln, Warwick, and Stafford, was the son of William and Agnes Hillary, and is frequently mentioned as an advocate in the Year Books of Edward II. and Edward III. He was raised to the Irish bench as chief justice of the Common Pleas in 3 Edward III., where he remained for eight years. He was then constituted a judge of the same court in England on March 18, 1337, to the head of which he was advanced on January 8, 1341. Dugdale, in his 'Chronica Series,' makes William Scot supersede him in that office on April 27; but this is evidently an error, as the latter was then and for some years afterwards chief justice of the King's Bench. On May 9, 1342, however, Roger Hillary made way for John de Stonore, on his restoration to the chief justiceship, receiving himself, on June 4, a new patent as a judge on that bench. On the death of Stonore, Roger Hillary was, on February 20, 1354, again constituted in his place, and continued to preside in the court for the short remainder of his life.

His death occurred in June 1357, and he was buried in the church of All Saints in Staffordshire. By his wife Katherine he had, besides other children, a son Roger, who was probably the serjeant-at-law mentioned in the Year Books of 40 Edward III. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. i. 333; Cal. Rot. Pat. 106; Rot. Parl. ii. 119-254.)

HILTON, ADAM DE, was the last named of four justices itinerant who in 35 and 38 Henry III., 1251-2, were appointed to visit Yorkshire and several other counties. There is one instance, in December 1253, of a writ of assize being paid for to be taken before Alan de Watsand and him in Yorkshire (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 177), which bears the appearance of his having been one of the regular justiciars.

HOBART, HENRY, belonged to a family of ancient descent in Suffolk and Norfolk, and was great-grandson of Henry VII.'s attorney-general, Sir James Hobart, and son of Thomas Hobart, of Plumsted in the latter county, by Audrey, daughter of William Hare, of Beeston in Norfolk, Esq.

Admitted a member of Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar in 1584. In 1595 he was steward of Norwich, and in 1597 was returned to parliament as the representative of Yarmouth, for which place and for Norwich he had a seat on several succeeding occasions. In 1601 he became reader of his inn, an honour which was repeated two years afterwards, on the occasion of his being called serjeant by Queen Elizabeth; but, in consequence of her death, he was included in a new writ by King James. (Dugdale's Orig. 254, 262.)

Having been knighted on the occasion, he was made attorney of the Court of Wards in 1605, and on July 4, 1606, he was created attorney-general. This office he held for above seven years, to the annoyance of Bacon, who served under him for six of them, and longed by his removal to take another step in promotion. Henry, Prince of Wales, made him his chancellor. In the case of the post-nati he of course took the part of the plaintiff (State Trials, ii. 609), and in the complaint raised by the Commons against Dr. Cowel's book, claiming the superiority of the civil to the common law, it is stated that Sir Henry 'did very modestly and discreetly lay open the offence of the party and the dangerous consequence of the book.' (Parl. Hist. ii. 1124.)

Modesty seems to have been his characteristic, and, though a very learned, he was not by any means a sparkling lawyer. On the death of Sir Thomas Fleming, the chief justice of the King's Bench, and Sir Edward Coke's succession to it, Hobart received the appointment of chief justice of the Common Pleas, from which Coke was removed, on November 26, 1613.

He presided in that court with great credit as a sound lawyer and upright judge for twelve years, and with so little imputation on his honesty and independence as to form one of the exceptions to the general subserviency of the bench. He was selected as chancellor to Prince Charles in 1617, and was obliged for the purpose of accepting the office to have his patent of chief justice revoked, and a new one granted, in order to enable him 'to take fee and livery' from any one besides the king. (Croke, Car. 1.) He was created a baronet in May 1611.

King Charles on his accession renewed his patent of chief justice, but he survived King James only nine months, dying at his house at Blickling in Norfolk on December 26, 1625. He was buried under a fair monument in Christ Church, Norwich.

Spelman says of him that he was 'a great loss to the public weal;' Croke (Car. 28) reports him as 'a most learned, prudent, grave, and religious judge;' and there is an excellent character of him in the preface to 5 Modern Reports. His own Reports were published after his death, and are so well reputed as to have passed through several editions.

By his wife Dorothy, a daughter of Sir Robert Bell, of Beaupré Hall, Norfolk, lord chief baron under Elizabeth, he had no less than sixteen children, of whom twelve were sons. From Sir Miles, his third son, who succeeded to the estates on the death of his brothers, descended Sir John, who in 1728 was created a peer by the title of Baron Hobart of Blickling, to which was added in 1746 the earldom of Buckinghamshire. (Collins's Peerage, iv. 362.)

HODY, JOHN, descended from a family of considerable antiquity, though of no great note, in the county of Devon, was the son of Thomas Hody, who was lord of the manor of Kington Magna near Shaftesbury, in the adjoining county of Dorset, in 7 Henry V., and in the same year was king's escheator there. His mother was Margaret, daughter of John Cole, of Nitheway, near Torbay, in Devonshire. (Rot. Parl. iv. 285, v. 477.)

He is frequently mentioned in the Year Books from 3 Henry VI., and appears to have taken the degree of the coat about the fourteenth year. He was returned to parliament for Shaftesbury in 7 Henry V., and again in several parliaments of Henry VI., and subsequently for the county of Somerset. On April 13, 1440, 18 Henry VI., he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, but held it not quite two years, dying in December 1441. He tried and condemned, a few days before, 'a gret and konnyng man in astronomye,'

HODY

Roger Boltingbroke, for labouring 'to consume the kinges persone by way of nygromancie,' stirred up, as he asserted, by Alienor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester. He was executed declaring his innocence, and the chronicler concludes the narrative thus: 'And the justice that yaf of him ingement lived not long after.' (English Chron., Camden Soc., 60.) The judge was buried at Wolavington in Somersetshire.

Notwithstanding the short period during which he presided in the court, he is stated by Prince to have won golden opinions by his integrity and firmness in the administration of justice. That author relates a tradition, that when his son Thomas was tried before him at the assizes, and found guilty of a capital crime, he with his own mouth pronounced sentence of death upon him. How this tradition originated it would be useless to enquire, but that it is untrue there can be no question, for his eldest son, John, could not have been more than six or seven years old at his father's death. Sir Edward Coke (Prof. to First Inst.) mentions him amongst the 'famous and expert sages of the law,' from whom Lyttelton had 'great furtherance in composing his Institutes of the Laws of England.'

The judge had an estate at Stowell in Somersetshire as early as 6 Henry VI.; but he was for some time seated at Pillesden in Dorsetshire, which came to him by his marriage with Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of John Jewe, son and heir of John Jewe, by Alice, daughter of John de Pillesden. By her he had a large family. His second son, William, is the subject of the next article.

HODY, WILLIAM, the second son of the above Sir John Hody, was quite an infant when his father died in 1441. Naturally pursuing his father's profession, his name is first mentioned in the Year Books in 1476. He must have attained some celebrity, as within a month after the accession of Henry VII., in 1485, he was appointed attorney-general. Before the close of that year he was made a serjeant-at-law, probably in preparation for his assumption of the office of chief baron of the Exchequer, to which he was promoted on October 29, 1486.

He presided in this court for the remaining twenty-three years of the reign, and for the first eight years of that of Henry VIII., being mentioned as receiving his salary in 1516. (Cal. State Papers [1515-18], 876.) On January 18, 1513, a grant of the place in reversion was obtained by John Scott (Ibid. [1500-14], 470); but there is no evidence of his ever having filled it. Sir William probably lived till 1522, when John Fitz-James was appointed lord chief baron.

By his wife Eleanor, daughter of Baldwyn Mallett, of Corypool in Somersetshire, he had issue two sons and two daughters. (Prince's Worthies; Hutchins's Dorset, i. 317.)

HOLDERNESSE, ALEXANDER DE. At the head of the list of justices itinerant for the county of Lincoln in May 1226, 10 Henry III., appears the name of 'Abbas de Burgo.' He was Alexander de Holderness, who had been elected to that dignity in 1222. In consequence of this appointment, several causes between the abbot and other parties at those assizes were ordered to be heard in the ensuing Easter before the justices at Westminster. Before that period arrived, however, Alexander died, in November 1226. He was buried in the abbey, and in 1830 a grave that was opened in Peterborough Cathedral was identified to be his, by a piece of lead inscribed 'Abbas Alexan.' (Browne Willis, 147; Rot. Claus. ii. 151-160.)

HOLES, HUGH. See H. HOLS.

HOLGRAVE, JOHN, was appointed fourth baron of the Exchequer on September 24, 1484, 2 Richard III., and his patent was renewed on the accession of Henry VII. He either resigned or died before Michaelmas 1487, as Nicholas Lathell was then fourth baron. He was buried in the abbey church of Bermondsey. (Stow's London [Thoms], 156.)

HOLLOWAY, RICHARD, the son of John Holloway, who is described by Anthony Wood as 'a covetous civilian and public notary' at Oxford, became a fellow of New College, and, though admitted a member of the Inner Temple on February 7, 1634, was not called to the bar till November 24, 1658, the interval being probably caused by the Great Rebellion, or perhaps by his pursuing his father's avocations at Oxford. His practice as a barrister seems to have been confined to that city, and the only record of his doings is that he was one of the first passengers in the 'flying coach' . . . having a boot on each side, that started from Oxford to London on May 3, 1669, and performed the journey in thirteen hours. He became reader of his inn in Lent 1675, and about this time the following descriptive hexameter was written on five of the family then resident in Oxford:—

Sarjeant, Barrester, Necessitie, Notarie, Mercer, Gravely dull, ill-spoken, lawless, cum pergere, broken;

the first being Serjeant Charles Holloway, the uncle; the second being the future judge, 'living against the Blew-bore in St. Aldate's parish'; the third, Charles, the son of Serjeant Charles, so called from the old saw Necessitas non habet legem, as being a barrister but no lawyer; the fourth, the judge's father; and the fifth, another uncle, a broken tradesman. (Athen. Oxon.: Life, xlv., lxiii., lxxix.; Fasti, ii. 12.)

In July 1667 he was created a serjeant, and Luttrell (i. 260) calls him king's serjeant in June 1683, when he was knighted, and on September 25 of the same year he was constituted a judge of the King's Bench. In the following November he was engaged in the trial of Algernon Sidney, in that court, but took no active part in it, and in the other public trials of Charles's reign his conduct was irreproachable. (State Trials, viii. 591, ix. 867, x. 45, 151, 515.)

After the accession of James II. he concurred in the deserved but illegal sentence pronounced against the infamous Titus Oates, and in the excessive fine of 30,000*l.* imposed upon the Earl of Devonshire for an assault upon Colonel Culpepper in the king's palace, overruling his lordship's plea of privilege; and for both these judgments he and the other members of the court were called before parliament after the revolution, when the latter was declared a breach of privilege, and so much of the former as remained to be inflicted was remitted by the king. The judges were, however, permitted to depart unscathed. But having in the great case as to the king's power to dispense with the penal laws acquiesced in the judgment in favour of the crown, he and all who survived were excepted out of the bill of indemnity passed in 2 William III. (Ibid. x. 1315, xi. 1200, 1368.)

This was a severe measure towards Sir Richard, because he had already been made a victim to James's vengeance, and had amply atoned for his previous error by boldly resisting the king's attempt to impose martial law in time of peace without the consent of parliament, and by publicly declaring that the petition of the seven bishops was not a seditious libel. They were acquitted on June 30, 1688, and on July 4 the honest judge was dismissed.

He was still living at Oxford in November 1695, as at that time he drew up the will of Anthony Wood, the historian of the university. (Bramston's Autob. 272, 310; Luttrell, i. 449; State Trials, xii. 426; Athen. Oxon. i. Life, cxxiii.)

HOLME, JOHN, was constituted a baron of the Exchequer on February 3, 1446, 24 Henry VI.; and on May 28, 1449, he had a grant for life of his summer and winter robes, probably on his retirement, for his name does not again occur.

HOLROYD, GEORGE SOWLEY, owes his origin to the same stirps from which Lord Sheffield descended; the direct ancestors of both, George and Isaac, being the sons of Isaac Holroyd, of Cawcrofte in Rishworth, in the parish of Elland in the county of York. The judge was the great-grandson of George, and the eldest son of another George, by Eleanor, the daughter of Henry Sowley, of Appleby, Esq. He was born at York on October 31, 1753, and was sent to Harrow School, from which it was intended that he should proceed to the university; but, in consequence of his father suffering some severe losses from unfortunate speculations, he was removed from Harrow, and in April 1774 was articled to Mr. Borthwick, an attorney in London. At the end of three years he entered Gray's Inn, and commenced business as a special pleader in April 1779.

During the eight years that he pursued this branch of the profession he adopted, with Romilly, Christian, and Baynes, one of the most effective preparations for the contests into which they were about to enter. Meeting at each other's chambers, they discussed legal points previously arranged, one of them taking the affirmative side, another supporting the contrary part, and a third summing up the arguments and deciding the question as judge. On June 26, 1787, he was called to the bar, and about three months after married Sarah, the daughter of Amos Chaplin, Esq., who brought him fourteen children.

He joined the Northern Circuit, and the character he had acquired while under the bar for solidity of judgment and professional ability secured to him a fair proportion of business, both in the north and in Westminster Hall. Ere he had been called a year his name appears in two cases in the 'Term Reports.' (ii. 445, 480.) During the twenty-nine years that he remained at the bar his fee-book shows the rapid increase of his practice, proving also the advance of his reputation by the number and importance of the cases submitted to his direction. Of a retiring disposition, he persisted in declining the offer of a silk gown, and therefore his merits were comparatively unrecognised by the general public; but among the legal community his superiority was fully acknowledged, and it was said of him that 'he was absolutely born with a genius for law.' So highly were his instructions esteemed that, while at the bar, no less than forty-seven pupils availed themselves of them, among whom were Mr. Baron Hullock, Mr. Baron Bolland, and Mr. Justice Cresswell. In 1811 he greatly distinguished himself in the celebrated case of privilege, Burdett v. The Speaker of the House of Commons, by his luminous arguments on behalf of the plaintiff. (14 Ess. Reports, 11.) In the last year of his practice at the bar he was sent by the government to Guernsey, at the head of a commission to enquire into and determine certain 'doleances' complained of by persons resident in that island.

At length he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench. In that court he sat for more than twelve years, from February 14, 1816, to November 17, 1828, the date of his resignation, fully sustaining the reputation he had acquired, and largely contributing to the high character of the bench to which he belonged, when at sociated with such erudite and discriminating judges as Lord Tenterden, Sir John Bayley, and Sir Joseph Littledale. His patience never seemed to be wearied; his amiable temper was never ruffled; his decisions were always clear and well-founded, for his memory was the storehouse of all the arguments that had ever been advanced for or against the case he was to judge; and his taste, with no effort at display, was so exquisite that he made the driest subjects interesting. The infirmities which obliged him to retire, in three years terminated his life, on November 21, 1831, at his residence at Hare Hatch in Berkshire. A monument is erected to his memory in the parish church of Wargrave, with an inscription, written by Lord Brougham, faithfully and eloquently describing his merits and his virtues.

Of the judge's fourteen children six survived him, one of whom exercised as a commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy till the recent alteration of that court the functions of his laborious office with the same legal learning, the same patience, and the same suavity of temper that distinguished his father.

HOLT, JOHN, was born in Northamptonshire, where he had considerable property. (Abb. Rot. Orig. ii. 240.) His name appears in the Year Books from 40 Edward III., in the last year of whose reign he was made a king's serjeant. His elevation to the bench as a judge of the Common Pleas took place in 7 Richard II., 1383. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 208.)

He obeyed the summons of the king to attend him at Nottingham, where, on August 25, 1387, he united with his colleagues in answering the questions placed before them by the king's confederated courtiers, pronouncing the proceedings of the last parliament, by which a permanent council was appointed, to be illegal, and its promoters punishable with death. For this act he was arrested, while sitting on the bench, on February 3 following, and on his trial, on March 2, alleged that he was compelled by the threats of the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Ireland, and the Earl of Suffolk to do so, and that he complied through fear of his life. The parliament, notwithstanding, found him guilty; and he only escaped the sentence of death that was pronounced by the intercession of the prelates, who succeeded in getting it commuted to banishment for life. To him was assigned the town of Drogheda and a circuit of two miles around it, with an allowance from the state of forty marks for his support. (Rot. Parl. iii. 233-44.)

Three years afterwards the king granted several of his manors to his son John; and in the parliament of January 1397, 20 Richard II., so much of the sentence as regarded his banishment was renitted, and he was allowed to return to England. In the following year the whole of the judgment was reversed, and his lands ordered to be restored. Richard's deposition unfortunately deprived the judge of the benefit of this reversal; but Henry IV., on his petition in the second year of the reign, directed that he should have again all his lands and tenements which were in the king's possession. This, however, turning out to be nearly a nullity, inasmuch as many of them had been alienated by King Richard, another ordinance was made in 4 Henry IV., by which he was allowed to resume possession on making such allowances to the purchasers as the council should deem reasonable. (Ibid. 346-461; Cal. Rot. Pat. 221.)

That he was successful in recovering them would appear from the extent of property in Northamptonshire and other counties contained in the inquisition taken on his death in 6 Henry V., 1418. (Cal. iv. 37, 52.) By his wife Alice he left another son named Hugh, who succeeded him.

HOLT, JOHN. After the succession of chief justices that disgraced the bench in the reigns of Charles and James since the death of Sir Matthew Hale, it is refreshing to record a name which excites universal admiration, as possessed by one who was erudite in law, independent in character, and just and firm in his decisions. In him may be fixed the commencement of a new era of judicial purity and freedom, marked with that perfect exemption from extraneous influences which has, with few exceptions, ever since distinguished the bench, and which is now the undisputed glory of our judicature.

The family of Holt had flourished for some centuries at Grislehurst in Lancashire, and in Queen Elizabeth's time had divided into several branches. The judge's father was Thomas Holt, a bencher of Gray's Inn and recorder of Abingdon, and afterwards a serjeant and knighted. His mother was Susan, daughter of John Peacock, of Chawley, near Abingdon; and this their eldest son was born at Thame in Oxfordshire, on December 30, 1642. (Monumental Inscription; T. Jones, 51.) If there is no error in this date, he had not completed his tenth year when he was admitted into the society of Gray's Inn on November 19, 1652; nor attained his majority when he was called to the bar on February 27, 1663, unless the latter entry means 1663-4. The early admission may perhaps be explained by his father being reader of the inn at the time. His previous education was at the free school in Abingdon, whence he was removed in 1658 to Oriel College, Oxford. There he is reputed to have been notorious for his idleness and for his association with dissolute companions, who led him into every kind of licence and extravagance. Some tales that were subsequently related of him give probability to the report of his juvenile delinquency; but he soon saw the error of his ways, deserted his old haunts and associates, left the university without taking a degree, and applied himself diligently, under the tuition of his father, to that profession of which he was destined to be one of the brightest ornaments.

So early did he exhibit his superiority that we find his name in Sir Thomas Raymond's Reports, with the addition of 'junior,' in the year 1668; and not long after it appears with great frequency, not only in those but in other Reports of the time. From 1679 till the beginning of James's reign he was engaged in almost all of the numerous state trials which occupied the courts of justice during that unhappy period. At first he was retained on the part of the prosecution, but, his distaste to the arbitrary proceedings of the government becoming apparent, he was soon employed by the unfortunate prisoners who were the victims. Whether on one side or the other, his advocacy was remarkable for so much lucidity of arrangement, and such fairness of statement, and his arguments displayed such profound knowledge of the principles of law, that his colleagues could not but augur his future promotion. But his nomination as counsel for three of the Popish lords impeached in 1679, and his appearance in the defence of Pilkington and others for a riot at a city election, of Sir Patience Ward for perjury, of Lord Russell for high treason, and of Sacheverell and others for a riot in the election of mayor of Nottingham—all political questions,—seemed to forbid any early fulfilment of the expectation of advancement. On the other hand, his arguments in favour of the monopoly of the East India Company, and in defence of Mr. Starkey against the Earl of Macclesfield, and his opinion in favour of the legality of the judgment upon the quo warranto against the city of London, in addition to the respect with which he was invariably treated by Chief Justices Scroggs, Pemberton, and Jeffreys, pointed him out as a fit object for royal favour. (State Trials, vii., ix., x.)

On February 18, 1686, he was induced rather unwillingly to take the recordership of London. He was thereupon knighted, and in the Easter Term following he received the degree of the coif, and was immediately made king's serjeant. But his independence and his sense of right would not allow him to act according to the king's unconstitutional desires. A soldier being found guilty of felony in running away from his colours, the recorder refused to pronounce sentence of death upon him, doubting, as the kingdom was at peace, whether the conviction was good in law. As the royal project of creating a standing army would have been frustrated if such a doubt was recognised, he was of course removed from his office. On James's desertion of the kingdom he was one of the lawyers called by the Lords to advise them on the course to be taken; and in the Convention Parliament that met in January 1689 he was returned for the borough of Beeralston.

In the early sittings of that parliament he took a leading part; but his senatorial duties were soon terminated by his removal to a judicial sphere. In order to insure a learned bench, King William required every privy councillor to furnish a list of twelve lawyers, and out of these lists he selected the twelve of most conspicuous merit. One of the most satisfactory appointments was that of Sir John Holt, whose patent as chief justice of the King's Bench was dated April 17, 1689. For twenty-one years did he grace that seat, his presidency extending over the whole of King William's reign and two-thirds of that of Queen Anne, during which period the administration of justice was distinguished by learning, sagacity, and integrity, and freed from the suspicion of private bias or courtly dictation, most effectually securing the confidence and commanding the applause of all parties, whether whigs or tories, from the contrast it presented to the experience of the preceding thirteen years. In all of the criminal trials at which he presided he acted with such honesty and impartiality that many of the accused, even when convicted, acknowledged the fairness with which they had been treated.

In February 1693 he and Justice Eyre had the courage to resist the House of Lords, when they were required to give their reasons for the judgment they had pronounced in 1694 in favour of Charles Knollys, claiming to be Earl of Banbury, who had pleaded his peerage to an indictment charging him as a commoner with the murder of Philip Lawson, his brother-in-law. The refusal of the two judges to do so, unless the case was brought before the lords by writ of error, gave such offence that there was some inclination to commit them both to the Tower; but, though the question was adjourned, it was never resumed, and the enquiry, as Lord Raymond (i. 18) says, 'vanished in smock.' (Lectures, ii. 231, 243.)

That this resistance did not arise from caprice, but from principle, is proved by his conduct in the Aylesbury case. The three puisne judges of the King's Bench having, in opposition to his opinion, reversed a verdict in which the constables of Aylesbury were cast in damages for refusing to permit a voter to exercise his franchise, the case was removed into the House of Lords on a writ of error. There, on the opinion of the judges being regularly required, he explained in a very learned argument the grounds of his judgment, and had the pleasure of being supported by Lord Somers and a great majority of peers, who set aside the order of his colleagues and confirmed the verdict given for the injured voter. (Burnet, v. 112, 191; Vernani's Letters, iii. 250; State Trials, xiv. 779.) In the iniquitous case of the bankers, also, where the Court of Exchequer had pronounced a judgment in their favour, which the Court of Exchequer Chamber had by a quibble reversed—such reversal having been strenuously opposed by Holt, and as strenuously supported by Lord Chancellor Somers and Chief Justice Treby,—the House of Lords confirmed Holt's opinion, and reversed the reversal. (Ibid. 29.) The correctness also of his judgment that a writ of error would not lie upon his denial of a prohibition prayed for by Dr. Watson, Bishop of St. David's, was acknowledged by the House of Lords in opposition to the dictum of Lord Chancellor Somers.

So highly were his services valued by King William that on the removal of Lord Somers he was urgently pressed to accept the Great Seal; but, wisely declining the responsible and unstable honour, he excused himself to his majesty by saying 'that he never had but one Chancery cause in his life, which he lost, and consequently could not think himself fitly qualified for so great a trust.' He however consented to act as chief commissioner till the vacancy was filled up, and, in conjunction with the two other chiefs, held the Seal from May 5 to 21, when Sir Nathan Wright was appointed lord keeper. On the death of King William he took out a new commission, notwithstanding that his office was held 'quamdiu se bene gesserit;' thus establishing the principle that the judges were removable at the demise of the crown, which continued to prevail till the accession of George III., who by one of his first acts secured them in their seats on the accession of a new king.

For eight years of the reign of Queen Anne he maintained the credit of the bench. He sat in court for the last time on February 9, 1709–10, and on March 5, during the progress of the unadvised trial of Dr. Sacheverell, he died at his house in Bedford Row. He was buried in the church of Redgrave in Suffolk, the manor of which, formerly possessed by Sir Nicholas Bacon, he had purchased; and a costly monument, representing him sitting in a chair in his robes and collar, was erected to his memory.

During the extended period of his judicial reign he retained the respect and the confidence of all. His appointment as executor of Chief Justice Treby is some proof of the estimation in which he was regarded by his contemporaries, which is still further displayed in the 'Tatler,' No. 14, written about a year before his death, and the character there eloquently given has been acknowledged to be a faithful description from that time to this. Thoroughly versed in the principles of the law, and perfect master of its practice, he was strict in its application, but humane, patient, and forbearing in its administration. Keeping himself entirely aloof from the political intrigues of the time, his decisions were free and unfettered, neither influenced by personal prejudice nor over-awed by the threats of power. His spirited resistance of the latter has been already exemplified, and his personal courage is evidenced by the following tradition. A mob having assembled with the intention of pulling down a house in Holborn where persons were supposed to be kidnapped and then sent to the colonies, the Guards were called out. The chief justice, being applied to, asked the officer what he would do if the populace did not disperse. 'Fire on them,' said the officer, 'as we have orders.' 'Have you so?' replied the judge. 'Then take notice that if one man is killed, and you are tried before me, I will take care that every soldier of your party is hanged.' He then himself, accompanied by his tipstaves, went to the mob, and, boldly facing them, by explaining to them the impropriety of their conduct, with a promise that justice should be done against the crimps, induced them quietly to disperse.

Among the anecdotes that have reference to his early follies is the following, which shows that he did not hesitate to acknowledge them when the confession would serve the ends of justice. In a trial of an old woman for witchcraft, the witness against her declared that she used a 'spell.' 'Let me see it,' said the judge. A scrap of parchment being handed up to him, he asked the old woman how she came by it, and on her answering, 'A young gentleman, my lord, gave it me to cure my daughter's ague,' enquired whether it cured her. 'Oh! yes, my lord, and many others,' replied the old woman. He then turned to the jury and said, 'Gentlemen, when I was young and thoughtless, and out of money, I and some companions, as unthinking as myself, went to this woman's house, then a public one, and having no money to pay our reckoning, I hit upon a stratagem to get off scot-free. Seeing her daughter ill of an ague, I pretended I had a spell to cure her. I wrote the classic line you see, and gave it her, so that if any is punishable, it is I, and not the poor woman.' She was of course acquitted, and did not fail to receive from the judge a compensation for the trouble he had caused her. In none of the trials before him for this supposed crime was a conviction obtained, and prosecutions for it from his time fell into discredit, which was increased by his putting into the pillory one Hathaway, convicted of pretending to be bewitched by a poor woman whom he had recently indicted for the crime. Of the idle companions of his youthful frolics there is a melancholy tradition that it was his fate to have one of them tried before him and convicted of felony. The prisoner was afterwards visited by him in gaol, and to his enquiry after their college intimates, answered, 'Ah! my lord, they are all hanged but myself and your lordship.' (Noble's Granger, i. 165.) His only legal publication was an edition of Sir John Keyling's Reports, to which he subjoined three important cases which he had decided.

He married Anne, daughter of Sir John Croyley, Bart., who brought him no issue. (Athen. Oxon. iv. 505; Life [1764]; Welsby's Lives, 90.)

HOPTON, WALTER DE. To the ancestor of this family, whose property was situate in Herefordshire and Shropshire, King William is stated to have granted the celebrated rhyming charter, preserved in Blount's 'Tenures' (102). Whatever may be the authenticity of the record, there is little doubt that Walter de Hopton was a descendant of the alleged grantee. In 35 Henry III., 1251, Johanna, the widow of Walter de Hopton, paid for an assize in Herefordshire. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. ii. 119.) These probably were the father and mother of the judge. His own wife was Johanna, the daughter of William de Scularis.

In 1272 he acted as a justice itinerant in Worcestershire, and on April 24, 1274, 2 Edward I., he was one of the barons of the Exchequer. At the end of that, or the beginning of the following year, he was removed into the King's Bench, and is mentioned as a justice itinerant in 6 Edward I. The name does not occur again till 13 Edward I., 1284, in which and in the two following years he was joined in various commissions as a justice itinerant (Mador, ii. 320), and was one of those who were fined for corruption by King Edward on his return to England in 1289. By his petition to the king in 1290, he represents that he was not guilty of a charge brought against Solomon de Rochester and his companion justices itinerant in Norfolk, inasmuch as he was not associated with them till after the time when the offence was committed, nor did he know of the presentment until he was taken before the council and committed to the Tower. If, as Weever says, he was fined in the sum of 2000 marks, there were probably further charges against him. It would seem, however, that his appeal to the royal favour was successful, for in the same year the king assigned to him the lands of which his wife had died seised. From the twenty-fifth to the thirtieth year of the reign also he was not only summoned to perform military service in respect of his lands, but was twice elected as assessor of the fifteenth and other charges on the county of Hereford. In 33 Edward I. he was returned as knight of that shire, and in the same year he died in possession of property in Shropshire of very considerable extent.

It seems to be more than probable that the above facts refer to two persons named Walter de Hopton; that they were father and son; and that the division should be made between the sixth and thirteenth years of the reign.

HOETON, ROGER, possessed the manors of Catton and Brysingcotes in Derbyshire, in which county he probably was born. His arguments as an advocate commence in 1 Henry IV., and continue till he was called to the judicial seat in the King's Bench on June 16, 1415, 3 Henry V. He was re-appointed on the accession of Henry VI., but died before the termination of the first year—viz., on April 30, 1423. He was buried in St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet Street. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 264, 269.)

HOSE, GEOFFREY, or HOESE, was the son of Henry, and held a barony in the county of Wilts. He was sheriff of Oxfordshire in 26 Henry II. and two following years. In 1179 he was one of the persons selected by the council of Windsor to act as justices itinerant in certain counties forming one of the four divisions into which England was then arranged; and his pleas appear on the roll of the following year, but not subsequently. (Mador, i. 138.)

He gave the church of Little Fageham to the canons of St. Dionysius in Southampton, and some lands to the monks of Stanley in Wiltshire. (Dugdale's Baronsage, i. 622.) He died in 1 John, 1199, when his wife, Gundred de Warenne, gave two hundred marks for the custody of Geoffrey, his heir, and all his lands until he was of age. (Mador, i. 202.)

HOSPITALI, RALPH DE, was another of the 'inquisitores' against the sheriff in 1170, 16 Henry II. In the Great Roll of 31 Henry II. he and Hugh Cophin render an account of the proceeds of the abbey of Tavistock, then in the king's hands. (Mador, i. 311.) He held a prebend in Exeter Cathedral, and the chapel of Walingford, both of which he resigned in 9 John, 1207. (Rot. Pat. i. 75, 81.)

HOTHAM, JOHN DE (BISHOP OF ELY), was a descendant of John de Trehouse, who, for his assistance to the Conqueror at the battle of Hastings, obtained the grant of the manor of Hotham in Yorkshire, with others. In 27 Edward I. he was assessor of the tenth then granted, and in 2 Edward II. he was sent to Ireland as chancellor of the Exchequer (Cal. Rot. Pat. 69); but in the next two years he is found acting as the king's escheator on both sides of the Trent. (Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 168-174.) In 1311 he was 'custos domorum' of Peter de Gaveston in the city of London, the termination of whose career in June 1312 did not interrupt Hotham's advance. On December 13 he was made chancellor of the Exchequer in England, and in May 1313, being then called canon of York, was sent on a mission to the court of France. In August 1314, and again in September 1315 (N. Federa. ii. 147-276), he went with extraordinary powers to Ireland, then invaded by Edward Bruce, the King of Scotland's brother, to effect a reconciliation with the barons, and to treat with the natives. In this he was only partially successful; for though he induced the tenants of the crown to associate in binding themselves, under the penalties of forfeiture, to aid each other to the utmost in their efforts against the common enemy, he made little impression on the chiefs of the natives. (Lingard, iii. 306.) It does not appear that while thus employed he was removed from his office of chancellor of the Exchequer, which he certainly held in Easter 1316 (Madox, ii. 327), and probably did not retire from it till his election to the bishopric of Ely, which took place on July 20.

In 1317 he was raised to the treasurer-ship of the Exchequer, and held that office till June 10, 1318. (Madox, ii. 39.) On the following day the Great Seal was delivered to him as chancellor; but for the next six or seven weeks he was obliged to leave the duties of his office to be performed by deputies, as he was engaged in frequent journeys on the king's affairs. He held the Great Seal for about nineteen months, during the latter part of which period he was engaged in negotiating a truce with the Scots. (N. Federa. iii. 409.) After his resignation on January 23, 1320, he still continued to be employed by the king on several confidential missions.

Three days after the accession of Edward III., viz. on January 28, 1327, he was again entrusted with the office of chancellor, and continued to perform its duties till March 1 in the following year. He then retired from its labours, and during the remainder of his life devoted himself to the administration of his diocese.

His expenditure for his cathedral was enormous for those times, and his confirmation to the see of the manor of Oldbourne in London was among the liberal acts which illustrated his presidency. During the last two years of his life he was entirely disabled by paralysis, which terminated in his death, at his palace of Somersham, on January 25, 1336, leaving behind him a high character for piety, prudence, and liberality. (Godwin, 260.)

His nephew was summoned to parliament as a baron in 8 Edward II., but not afterwards. It was the descendant of that nobleman who was created a baronet in 1621, and whose conduct as governor of Hull, in the civil wars, led to his own and his son's untimely execution. From his grandson descended Sir Beaumont Hotham, the subject of the next article.

HOTHAM, BEAUMONT (afterwards LORD HOTHAM), was of the same family as that of the above prelate. The seventh possessor of the baronetcy conferred in 1621 was Sir Beaumont Hotham, who by his wife Frances, daughter of the Rev. William Thomson, had five sons, on four of whom the title successively devolved. The third son, Admiral William Hotham, for his gallant achievements at the commencement of the French Revolution, was in 1797 created Baron Hotham in the Irish peerage, with a special remainder to the heirs of his father. On his death without issue in May 1813, his two elder brothers having left no representative, the heir to both titles was his next brother, the judge, now to be noticed.

Beaumont Hotham was the fourth son of Sir Beaumont, and was born in 1737. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May 1758. He practised in the Chancery courts, but with little success and less distinction, and was member for Wigan in the two parliaments of 1768 and 1774. He was appointed on May 10, 1775, a baron of the Exchequer, and knighted. He sat in that court for the long space of thirty years, and the only variation in his judicial career was in 1783, when he was placed as third commissioner of the Great Seal in the interval between the two chancellorships of Lord Thurlow. This lasted for nearly nine months, from April 9 to December 23. Though he never had any business at the bar, by the effect of great natural sense and an excellent understanding he made a good judge, and was deservedly esteemed for his polished manners, marked by courtesy, kindness, and attention. So circumscribed was his knowledge of law that when any difficulty arose he was in the habit of recommending the case to be referred, thus acquiring among the wags of Westminster Hall the nickname of 'The Common Friend.' In criminal cases he was distinguished for his humanity, and for his impressive and pathetic addresses to prisoners.

Feeling the infirmities of age approaching, he resigned in Hilary Term 1805, but lived for nine years afterwards. On his brother's death on May 2, 1813, he succeeded to the title of Lord Hotham, but enjoyed it only ten months, his own death occurring on March 4, 1814. By his marriage with Susannah, daughter of Sir Thomas Hankey, an alderman of London, and widow of James Norman, Esq., he had three sons and three daughters. The title is now enjoyed by his grandson.

HOUBRUG, WILLIAM DE, is recorded on the Fine Roll of 8 Henry III., 1224 (i. 122), as taking some amerancements of assizes of novel disseisin in Shropshire with lialph, Bishop of Chichester; but this is the only entry which notices him in a judicial capacity.

William de Hobregge is mentioned by Roger de Wendover (iii. 297-356) as one of the confederates against King John in 1215, and as having incurred the sentence of excommunication in the following year. His lands in Kent and Essex were then seized and granted to Richard Fitz-Hugh. (Rot. Claus. i. 165, 239, 247.) Under the new reign he returned to his allegiance, and, with his wife, Agnes, and her sister Alicia, the wife of Richard le Buteiller, was admitted in 3 Henry III. to the lands of Richard Picot, whose heirs the ladies were. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 23.)

HOUGHTON, JOHN DE, or HOUTON, was connected in early life with the Exchequer. In 19 Edward II. he accompanied the king to France in that character, and was then the parson of the church of Postwick, a parish in Norfolk. In that county he had the manor of Wormegay and considerable property. In 1 Edward III. he was clerk of the keeper of the wardrobe, and was advanced to be one of the chamberlains of the Exchequer in the twelfth year, in which office he continued till he was called to the bench of that court as a baron on March 8, 1347. We are not told the time of his death. (N. Fadera, ii. 606, iii. 25, 53; Devon's Issue Roll, 139; Cal. Exch. iii. 166.) He was probably the father of the undermentioned Adam.

HOUGHTON, ADAM DE (BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S), was probably the son of the above John de Houton. He was educated at Oxford, and adopted the clerical profession. His connection with the court is evidenced by his being appointed in 1360 one of the commissioners to receive possession of the counties and cities which the King of France had agreed to give up by treaty. (N. Fadera, iii. 511, 679.)

In 1361 he was, by papal provision, placed in the see of St. David's, and was made chancellor on January 11, 1377, 50 Edward III. In the following April he was at the head of the commissioners to negotiate a peace with France, and for this purpose he proceeded to Calais, and was still there at the time of King Edward's death on June 21, 1377. On his immediate return to England he was re-sworn into his office. He then resided in Fleet Street.

His chancellorship, which lasted only till October 29, 1378, was remarkable for nothing but the resumption of Biblical texts into his addresses to the parliament, a practice which had been discontinued by William of Wykeham and his successors in the office. Among other somewhat ludicrous applications, he commenced one of his orations with the passage of St. Paul, 'Ye suffer fools gladly, seeing that ye yourselves are wise,' adding to the assembly, 'And as ye are wise and I am foolish, I presume you desire to hear me.' (Rot. Parl. ii. 361.) He died in April 1389. (Godwin, 581.)

HOUGHTON, ROBERT, born at Gunthorpe in Norfolk, in 1548, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1577, and appointed reader in 1591, and again in 1600. He was one of several who were nominated by Queen Elizabeth to be serjeants; but in consequence of her death were re-summoned by James, and took the degree in Easter Term 1603. He represented the city of Norwich in the parliament of 1693, and was chosen its recorder in 1603, an office which he held till April 21, 1613, when he was made a judge of the King's Bench and knighted. In Peacham's case, who was tried in 1615 for divers treasonable passages contained in a sermon which was never preached nor intended to be preached, but only set down in writing and found in his study, King James, by the advice of Bacon, commenced the unconstitutional practice of obtaining the opinion of the judges before trial; and he joined with Sir Edward Coke in resisting 'this taking of auricular opinions single and apart,' as new and dangerous. The trial took place, and though the poor man was found guilty, yet, notwithstanding all Bacon's endeavours, he was not executed. Many of the judges being of opinion, as every reasonable man must be, that the offence was not treason. (State Trials, ii. 821.)

Sir Robert Houghton died at his chambers in Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, on February 6, 1623-4, and was buried at the church of St. Dunstan-in-the-West. Croke calls him 'a most reverend, prudent, learned, and temperate judge, and inferior to none in his time.'

His wife was Mary, the daughter of Robert Rychers, Esq., of Wrotham in Kent, by whom he had three sons and three daughters. (Blomefield's Norwich, i. 359; Norfolk, i. 625.)

HOUTON, JOHN DE, frequently spelled Hocton, was archdeacon of Bedford when he was one of the justices itinerant appointed in 9 Henry III., 1225, for the counties of Bedford and Buckingham (Rot. Claus. ii. 77), and seems to have been much in the royal confidence. In January 1224 he was sent on a mission to the court of Rome; and on his return, the distribution of the stones of the castle of Bedford, then razed to the ground in consequence of Faukes de Breaute's rebellion, was entrusted to him, with Henry de Braybroc and the sheriff of the county. In the next year, besides his appointment as a justice itinerant, he was again employed in foreign parts, first in July, and then in October (Rot. Claus. i. 582-654, ii. 47-83); and in 1228 he took the principal part in the mission to Rome to oppose the election of Walter de Heynsham as Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1231 he changed his archdeaconry for that of Northampton, and died in 1246. (Le Neve, 161.)

HOWARD, WILLIAM, was the ancestor of the Dukes of Norfolk. Henry Howard, of Corby Castle, in his Memorials (App. xl.), makes him the grandson of Robert Howard, of Terrington and Wiggenshall, near Lynn in Norfolk, living in 12 Henry III., and son of John Howard, living in 45 Henry III., and Lucy Germund, his wife, adding that they were 'what we should call private gentlemen of small estate, probably of Saxon origin, living at home, intermarrying with their neighbours, and witnessing each other's deeds of conveyance and contracts.'

William Howard was selected as one of the eight special justices who were assigned in 21 Edward I., 1293, to take assizes throughout the realm, in aid of the judges of both benches, and of the justices itinerant. The district to which he was assigned comprehended the northern counties.

On October 11, 1297, he was constituted one of the judges of the Common Pleas. (Madox, ii. 91.) Both in 33 and 35 Edward I. he was one of the judges named in commissions of trailbaston. (Rot. Parl. i. 178, 218.)

On the accession of Edward II. he was re-appointed, and sat in the court during the whole of the first and part of the second year of that reign; the patent of his successor, Henry le Scrope, being dated November 20, 1308. Howard is described as chief justice of England on a window in the church of Long Melford in Suffolk, where he is portrayed in his judge's robes; but as this was not erected till about the reign of Edward IV. or of Henry VII. (Dugdale's Orig. 44, 99), and therefore nearly two hundred years after his death, it cannot be accepted as authority for a fact of which no other evidence appears.

He had two wives, both of whom were named Alice. The first was a daughter of Sir Robert Ufford, the ancestor of the family which acquired the earldom of Suffolk. The second was the daughter of Sir Edmund de Fitton, of Fitton in Wiggenshall, St. Germain's, which she afterwards inherited. She and her husband resided at East Winch, near Lynn, where he built a chapel, adjoining the church, in which he was probably buried.

The first marriage produced no issue; but by the second he left two sons, Sir John and Sir William. Sir Robert, the lineal descendant of this Sir John in the fifth generation, married Margaret, the daughter of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, who ultimately became coheir of John Mowbray, the fourth duke. Their son John Howard was summoned to Parliament as Baron Howard by Edward IV. in 1470, and was created earl marshal and Duke of Norfolk by Richard III. in 1485, and is Shakspeare's 'Jockey of Norfolk.'

Not only does this, the premier dukedom, remain in the family; but in the present House of Peers the earldoms of Suffolk and Berkshire, of Carlisle and of Effingham, and the barony of Howard of Walden are represented by descendants from the same parentage. Besides these, several other peerages which have now become extinct flourished during various periods: the viscounty of Bindon from 1559 to 1619; the earldom of Nottingham from 1597 to 1681; the earldom of Northampton from 1604 to 1614; the barony of Howard of Escrick from 1628 to 1714; the earldom of Norwich from 1672 to 1777; the earldom of Stafford from 1688 to 1762; the earldom of Bindon from 1706 to 1722.

HULL. See J. and R. HILL.

HULLOCK, JOHN, was a native of Durham, where his father, Timothy Hullock, was a master weaver, and proprietor of a timber yard at Barnard Castle. Born in 1764, he was articled to an attorney at Stokesley in Yorkshire, where he grounded himself so well in the principles of the legal science that the noted barrister Mr. Lee, whom he often met on his visits to an uncle, was so struck by his intelligence and application that he recommended him strongly to go to the bar. Acting on this advice, he was entered as a student at Gray's Inn, and, having become a barrister in May 1794, he joined the Northern Circuit. In 1792 he published a valuable work called 'The Law of Costs,' which became quite an authority, and went through several editions. This made his name known, and necessarily introduced him to extended employment; so that in 1816 he felt himself warranted in accepting the degree of the coif.

On the Northern Circuit his honourable feeling and his courageous conduct were on one occasion tried and exhibited. In a cause which he led he was particularly instructed not to produce a certain deed unless it should be absolutely required. Notwithstanding this injunction, he produced it before it was necessary, with the view of deciding the business at once. It proved to have been forged by his client's attorney; and Mr. Justice Bayley, who was trying the cause, ordered the deed to be impounded, that it might be made the subject of a prosecution. Before this could be done, Mr. Hullock requested leave to inspect it, and on its being handed to him, immediately returned it to his bag. The judge remonstrated, but in vain. 'No power on earth,' Mr. H. replied, 'should induce him to surrender it. He had incautiously put the life of a fellow-creature in peril; and, though he had acted to the best of his discretion, he should never be happy again were a fatal result to ensue.' The judge continued to insist on the redelivery of the deed, but declined taking decisive measures till he had consulted the associate judge. While retiring for that purpose the deed was of course destroyed, and the attorney escaped.

He signalised himself by the manner in which he conducted the prosecutions at Manchester against Hunt and his seditious associates. Just before he was raised to the bench, he was sent with Mr. (afterwards Sir Joseph) Littledale to Scotland, to arrange some criminal proceedings of the same nature on the part of the crown. He met his reward by being appointed on March 1, 1823, to fill a vacant seat in the Exchequer.

For little more than six years he discharged the duties of his office in a most exemplary manner. A perfect master of the law, he expounded it with a liberal spirit, clearing it from all useless technicalities, and acting upon its plain intention. Firmness and mildness were equally his characteristics, and to these were united integrity, sagacity, and knowledge. While on the circuit he was suddenly seized with a severe bowel complaint at Abingdon, which terminated his life on July 31, 1829. His estimation among his colleagues may be judged from the following energetic commendation with which a brother baron spoke of him to a grand jury: 'He circumscribed the ocean of law with firm and undeviating steps.'

HULS, or HOLES, HUGH, is stated by Ashmole to be the grandson of Sir William of the Hulse, in Cheshire, by that knight's second son, David. He is mentioned in Richard Bellewe's Reports, and on May 20, 1389, 12 Richard II., he was appointed a judge of the King's Bench. During the remainder of that reign, the whole of the reign of Henry IV., and the first two years of that of Henry V., he retained that position, and under King Richard he acted for several years as locum tenens for the justice of North Wales. (First Rep. Pub. Rec., App. 91.)

He died in 1415, and was buried in the church of Watford in Hertfordshire. (Weever, 591.) On his tomb he is called Hugo de Holes, as he is also in the above-mentioned roll. His wife was Margaret, daughter of John Domville, of Moberley in Cheshire, and his descendants were settled at Sutton Court in Berkshire.

HUNT, ROGER, of Chalverston in Bedfordshire, was probably the son of Roger Hunt, who was attornatus regis in August 1406, 9 Henry IV. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 254.) Of this Roger the first mention occurs as speaker of the parliament of 8 Henry V., he being then member for Huntingdonshire. He next appears as counsel for John Mowbray, earl marshal, in his claim for precedence above the Earl of Warwick before the parliament in April 1425, 3 Henry VI. In July 1433 he was again presented as speaker of that parliament. (Rot. Parl. ii. 268, 296, 420.) On November 3, 1438, 17 Henry VI., he was appointed a baron of the Exchequer, and the last entry in which he is named is a grant to him, 'for divers considerations,' of 200*l.* out of the customs of London in 1443. (Acts Privy Council, iv. 327, v. 227.)

HUNTINGFIELD, ROGER DE, was the grandson of a baron of the same name, who in the reign of King Stephen gave the Isle of Mendham in Suffolk to the monks of Castle Acre in Norfolk, and the youngest son of Roger de Huntingfield. In 8 John he was one of the justiciars before whom fines were levied, and in the following year his lands were seized on occasion of the interdict, and were placed by the king in the hands of his brother, the under-mentioned William. (Rot. Claus. i. 110: Dugdale's Baronage, ii. 7.)

HUNTINGFIELD, WILLIAM DE, the elder brother of the above-mentioned Roger, also acted as a justiciar before whom fines were levied in 10 and 11 John, 1208-1210. In the fines themselves, which were taken at Cambridge and Lincoln, the justiciars are specially called justices itinerant.

During the greater part of John's reign he seems to have been a favourite with the king, being appointed constable of Dover Castle in 5 John, giving, however, his son and daughter as hostages for his safe holding thereof. (Rot. Pat. 34.) From 11 to 15 John he held the sheriffalty of the united counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. But on the barons forming their confederacy against the king he joined them, and was one of the twenty-five who were appointed to enforce the observance of Magna Charta. He made himself so prominent in the subsequent wars that he was excommunicated.

by the pope, and his lands, being seized into the king's hands, were not restored to him till 1217, 1 Henry III., when he returned to his allegiance. In June 1219 he obtained licence to go to the Holy Land, constituting his brother Thomas his attorney to transact all business in his absence. (Rot. Claus. i. 215-393.)

His death occurred in or before 9 Henry III., as in that year his son Roger (by his wife Alice de St. Liz) instituted a suit against his bailiff for an account of rents. (Ibid. ii. 83.) Roger's grandson was summoned to parliament by Edward I., but in 1351 the barony became extinct. (Dugdale's Baronage, ii. 7.)

HUSCARL, ROGER, is frequently named in the fines levied at Westminster from 11 to 16 John. He continued to act as a justicier till 7 Henry III., when he was sent to Ireland, where it is evident he held the next place on the bench to the chief justice. (Rot. Claus. i. 526.)

The mode of remunerating the judges, both in England and Ireland, in that age seems to have been by appropriating to them certain lands during the king's pleasure. Thus, in 16 John, the land which was of Roger de Tanton, in Kent, was given to him 'ad se sustentandum in servicio domini regis quamdiu eidem domino regi placuit;' and in 10 Henry III. the town of Baliscadam in Ireland was devoted in the same manner to him and others. (Ibid. i. 204, ii. 125.) He seems to have been lord paramount of a manor in the vill of Stepney, which in 1290 was called 'Stebynhyth Huscarl.' (Gent. Mag. April 1855, p. 388.)

HUSE, JAMES, was not improbably a younger scion of the baronial family of that name. He was made a baron of the Exchequer on April 16, 1350, 24 Edward III. In 34 Edward III. he was employed as a commissioner to treat with the people of the counties of Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, Devon, and Cornwall, as to raising forces for the defence of the kingdom. (N. Fœdera, iii. 440.)

HUSE, WILLIAM, there is little doubt, belonged also to the noble family of Hoesse or Huse, and in all probability was the son of Sir Henry Huse, knight, who had a grant of free warren in 8 Henry VI. within his manor of Herting in Sussex, a property which was held by the Baron Henry in the reign of Henry III. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 39, 276.) He was a member of Gray's Inn, and on June 16, 1471, 11 Edward IV., he received the appointment of attorney-general, with full power of deputing clerks and officers under him in any court of record. (Ibid. 316.)—a power which is still introduced into the modern patents. It was not till Trinity Term 1478 that he took the degree of the coif, probably resigning the attorney-generalship, as the degree of serjeant-at-law was at that time superior to the office of attorney-general, and no one had lately held the two together. Three years subsequently, on May 7, 1481, he was made chief justice of the King's Bench. (Cal. Rot. Pat. 326.)

On the accessions of Edward V., Richard III., and Henry VII., his patent of chief justice was renewed, showing how little the violent changes of the time interfered with the regular administration of the law, and how little connected with political movements the judges were deemed to be. He was named by Henry VII. as one of the commissioners to decide on the claims made to do service at his coronation. (Rutland Papers, 8.)

In the first year of this reign he supported the purity of his office by successfully remonstrating with the king against the judges being consulted beforehand in crown cases which were afterwards to come before them judicially. (Coke's 3 Inst. 29.)

In June 1492 he was one of those commissioned to treat with the ambassadors of the King of France (Rymer, xii. 481.) and on November 24, 1495, Sir John Fineux was appointed his successor in the chief justiceship. Whether the vacancy was occasioned by the death or retirement of Sir William Huse there is no distinct information; but probably by the former.

The name was evidently then pronounced Husey or Husee, and was often so spelled, and also House and Howay. It gradually was changed to Hussey, by which the representatives of the family have since called themselves.

Sir William married Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Berkeley, of Wymondham, Esq., by whom he had several children. The eldest, John, was summoned to parliament by Henry VIII. in 1534; but being attainted and beheaded two years afterwards, the barony was lost. From Sir William's son Robert descended Sir Edward Hussey, of Honnington in Lincolnshire, who was created a baronet in 1611, and whose third son, Charles Hussey, of Caythorpe in the same county, received the same honour in 1661. Both titles were united in 1706, and both became extinct in 1734. (Dugdale's Baron. ii. 309; Burke's Ext. Baronet. 276.)

HUSSEBURN, THOMAS DE, is almost always mentioned with the addition 'Magister,' which in the reign of Henry II. began to be adopted by the clergy. He appears to have been only a canon of St. Paul's (Dugdale's Orig. 22.) but several of the bishoprics and abbeys which were vacant during the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. were placed in his custody. (Madox, i. 310, 311; Angl. Sacr. i. 169.)

His judicial employment in those reigns, and in that of John, appears by his presence in the Curia Regis as one of the justiciars before whom fines were levied in 33 Henry II., 1187, from the fifth year of Richard I. to the end of the reign, and in the first year of King John; and also by his acting as a justice itinerant, holding pleas and assessing tallages, in 33 Henry II. and 3 Richard I. (Madox, i. 544, 634.)

HUTCHINS, GEORGE. Narcissus Luttrell relates in his Diary that on a motion in Chancery relative to the guardianship of a child, Parson Hickeringill the claimant said of Sir George Hutchins, who was counsel against him, that they were something akin to each other, not by consanguinity, but by affinity, for he was a clerk, and Sir George's father was a parish clerk. Whether this story had any foundation, or was only invented for the purpose which it effected, 'of setting the court a laughing,' has not been discovered. Sir George is described in the Gray's Inn books as son and heir of Edmund Hutchins, of Georgham in Devonshire, gentleman, and is stated to have been called to the bar in August 1667.

He was summoned by James II. in Easter 1686 to take the degree of the coif, and in May 1689 was appointed king's serjeant to William III., who knighted him. In May of the next year he was nominated third commissioner of the Great Seal, an office which he filled for nearly three years, till March 22, 1693. On his discharge Sir George claimed a right to retain his former position of king's serjeant, and on the question being referred to the judges they determined that, though his appointment of lord commissioner did not deprive him of his degree of the coif, it extinguished his post of king's serjeant, which was merely an office conferred by the crown. The king, however, re-appointed him his serjeant on May 6. He continued to practise at the bar till his death on July 6, 1705, and his success may be estimated by the fact that on the marriage in 1697 of his two daughters (afterwards his coheirs) he gave each of them a portion of 20,000*l.* The husband of Anne, the second daughter, was William Peere Williams, the eminent Chancery reporter of that time; and their eldest son, Sir Hutchins Williams, was in 1747 honoured with a baronetcy, which became extinct in 1784. (Luttrell's Diary, i. 529, 598, iii. 93, iv. 289, 651, v. 570; 3 Levinz, 351.)

HUTTON, RICHARD, is called by King Charles, although he declared the imposition of ship-money to be illegal, 'the honest judge.' He was the second son of Anthony Hutton, of a good Yorkshire family residing at Penrith in Cumberland, and was born there about 1500. He was sent to Jesus College, Cambridge, where he devoted himself to the study of divinity, but was induced to pursue the law as a profession. He became a member, first, of Staple Inn, in the hall of which his arms are emblazoned on the south window, and next of Gray's Inn, where he was called to the bar on June 16, 1586. When James came to the crown, he was added to the list of those whom Queen Elizabeth, just before her death, had summoned to take the degree of the coif at Easter 1603, and was then knighted. (Fuller's Worthies, i. 237; Athen. Ozon. iii. 27.) In this character he was the leading counsel for the defendant in the case of the post-nati. (State Trials, ii. 609.)

In 1608 he was made recorder of York, and on May 3, 1617, was appointed a judge of the Common Pleas. Lord Chancellor Bacon's address to him on his being sworn in is memorable for the character it gives of him, and the advice it offers. 'The king,' it begins, 'being duly informed of your learning, integrity, discretion, experience, means, and reputation in your country, hath thought fit not to leave you these talents to be employed upon yourself only, but to call you to serve himself and his people.' Among the counsels he gave were 'that you should draw your learning from your books, not out of your brain; 'that you should be a light to jurors to open their eyes, but not a guide to lead them by the noses; 'that your speech be with gravity as one of the sages of the law, and not talkative, nor with impertinent flying out to show learning; 'and particularly 'that your hands, and the hands of your hands, I mean those about you, be clean and uncorrupt from gifts, from meddling with titles and from serving of turns, be they of great ones or small ones.' (Works, vii. 278.) Pity that his own precept was not followed by the lecturer as well as it was by his auditor.

On the accession of Charles I., Sir Richard Hutton was the eldest puisne judge of the court, and on the death of Chief Justice Hobart, so much confidence was placed in his learning and integrity that the vacancy was not supplied for nearly a year, during which he presided as prime judge. (Croke, Car. 56.) When Sir John Finch applied to each of the judges separately for their opinions with regard to ship-money, Justice Hutton refused to subscribe, and although he afterwards signed the united opinion which they gave in favour of its legality, he declared, when Hampden's case came judicially before him in 1637, that he had so subscribed only for conformity with the majority, but that his private opinion was ever against it; and he gave his reasons, as he said, 'with as much perspicuity as those imperfections which attend my age will give me leave,' why judgment ought not to be given for the king. (State Trials, iii. 844, 1191.) He repeated his interpretation of the law in his charge to the grand jury at Northampton when Thomas Harrison, a clergyman of that county, foolishly taking umbrage at this, came to the bar of the Common Pleas, and cried out in a loud voice, 'I do accuse Mr. Justice Hutton of high treason.' He soon suffered for his temerity. Being indicted for the offence, he was fined 5000*l.* and imprisoned, and required to make his submission in all the courts at Westminster. The only point of the story that does not tell to the judge's credit is that he also brought an action for damages against Harrison, and recovered 10,000*l.* (Croke, Car. 503.)

He died on February 25, 1638-9, leaving a large family and a fair estate at Goldsborough in Yorkshire, and was buried at St. Dunstan's-in-the-West. He compiled 'Reports of sundry Cases,' which were published after his death. (Surtcees' Durham, i. clxvi.)

HYDE, NICHOLAS, to whose family Norbury, in the county of Chester, had belonged in regular descent from the time of the Conquest, was the youngest son of Lawrence Hyde, of West Hatch in Wiltshire, by Anne, daughter of Nicholas Sybill, Esq., of Chimbhams in Kent, and widow of Matthew Somerton, Esq., of Claverton in Somersetshire.

At his father's death he was left dependent on his mother, except an annuity of 30*l.* for life bequeathed to him by his father. Admitted to the Middle Temple, he was called to the bar by that society, who elected him their reader in Lent 1617, and their treasurer in 1626. He had previously entered parliament in 1603 as member for Christchurch, Hants, and he is first noticed in the Reports as an advocate in 1613. He had sufficiently distinguished himself to be employed by the Duke of Buckingham in preparing his defence to the articles of impeachment prepared against him by the House of Commons in 1626. (Parl. Hist. ii. 167; Whitelocke, 8.) The care and ingenuity evinced in that defence were so satisfactory to the duke that he was by the favourite's influence nominated chief justice of the King's Bench on February 5, 1627 (Rymer, xviii. 835), and knighted.

He presided in the court for four years and a half only, and had no easy time of it. He and the other judges had to justify themselves before the House of Lords for refusing to discharge the five gentlemen who were imprisoned for refusing to contribute to the loan. (Parl. Hist. ii. 291.) He had also, in 1629, to adjudge the case of Stroud, Sir John Eliot, and the other members, for their violence to the speaker on the last day of the session. They were at first refused bail, unless they gave sureties for their good behaviour, which they refusing, some of them were tried and sentence pronounced upon them. For these proceedings the judges in the commencement of the Long Parliament in 1640 were called to account, and their judgment reversed. (State Trials, iii. 235-335; Whitelocke, 38.) Long before this investigation took place Sir Nicholas was removed from the violence of the times. He was seized with a fever, which Lord Clarendon says he got from the infection of some gaol in the summer circuit, and died on August 25, 1631.

In the opinions given by him and his colleagues, in answer to the king's questions, they seem to have acted an independent part, and also on several other occasions, in refusing to stop the course of justice at the king's command. Sir Nicholas is said to have been mean in his person and bearing, and was so unostentatious that he rode his circuits on horseback, according to Sir Symonds D'Ewes, in a whitish-blue cloak, 'more like a clothier or a woolman than a lord chief justice.' But Croke and Whitelocke, his contemporaries and colleagues, and Lord Clarendon, his nephew, give evidence of the sterling points of his character. Croke (Car. 225) calls him 'a grave, religious, discreet man, and of great learning and piety.' Judge Whitelocke says that 'he lived in the place with great integrity and uprightness, and with great wisdom and temper, considering the ticklishness of the times. He would never undertake to the king, nor adventure to give him a resolute answer in any weighty business, when the question was of the law, but he would pray that he might confer with his brethren.' (Rushworth, ii. 111.) Lord Clarendon says of him (Life, i. 3-13), 'His justice and sincerity were so conspicuous throughout the kingdom that the death of no judge had in any time been more lamented.'

He married Margaret, daughter of Arthur Swayne, Esq., of Sarson, and left several children.

HYDE, EDWARD (EARL OF CLARENDON), will ever be regarded with admiration and reverence for his devoted adherence to Charles I. during his misfortunes, and to Charles II. for nearly twenty years after. His services to both monarchs, and the influence he exercised in the councils of that eventful period, must necessarily occupy a large and interesting portion of the annals of the kingdom; and though the principles by which he was guided, and the motives which prompted him, will no doubt be variously represented according to the political bias of the writers who record his actions—one party impugning what the other extols, and his conduct being painted now in deep shadow, and now in the brightest light,—the almost universal verdict, after two centuries of investigation, is an unreserved acknowledgment of his loyalty, his wisdom, and his integrity.

Henry Hyde, the father of the earl, was the third son of Lawrence Hyde of West Hatch, and the brother both of the above Sir Nicholas Hyde, and of Sir Lawrence, the father of the next mentioned Sir Robert Hyde. By his marriage with Mary, daughter and one of the coheirs of Edward Langford, Esq., of Trowbridge, he had a large family. Edward was the third of his four sons, and was born at Dinton in Wiltshire, the family residence, on February 18, 1608-9. He was sent to Oxford with a royal recommendation to be elected a demy at Magdalen College; on the refusal of which (Cal. State Papers [1623], 8, 120) he was admitted a student at Magdalen Hall in Lent Term 1623. On taking his degree of B.A. he began his legal curriculum at the Middle Temple on February 1, 1626, his uncle Sir Nicholas being then treasurer. Early in 1633 he and White-locke were chosen the representatives of that society to manage the famous masque given by all the four inns of court to the king and queen, for the purpose of showing their disapproval of the doctrines promulgated by Prynne against interludes in his 'Histrio-Mastix.' (White Locke, 19.) He acknowledges that at first he gave himself up to gay society and did not pursue his legal studies very industriously, but still enough to enable him to pass respectably through his uncle's nightly examinations.

Before his call to the bar he had been married twice—once in 1629 to Anne, daughter of Sir George Ayliffe, who died six months afterwards; and again in 1632 to Frances, daughter of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Bart. He was called to the bar on November 22, 1633, and received in December 1634 a grant of the office of keeper of the writs and rolls of the Common Pleas. (Rymer, xix. 605.) His name does not appear as a barrister in the Reports of this period, but he was engaged in causes before the council, and, according to his own account, he got into good practice in the Court of Requests, and realised a good professional income. Dividing his time between forensic studies and polite literature, he formed intimacies with the most eminent men in both classes, and was happy in the enjoyment of their society, till the troubles that afterwards arose divided him from some of his early friends.

In the first parliament of 1640 he was returned by two constituencies, Wootton Bassett and Shaftesbury, and sat for the former. During its short session he spoke against the grievous encroachments of the Earl Marshal's Court, of which, in the second (or 'Long') parliament of that year, representing then the borough of Saltash, he procured the suppression. Though exerting himself at first for the removal of this and other enormous grievances, as soon as he saw the intention to encroach upon the royal prerogatives he stood forward in their support. The dominant party in the house, he says, were inimical to him from the first, knowing his devotion to the Church and his loyalty to the king, and particularly for his endeavours to save Lord Strafford's life. Yet they appear to have used him for their purposes, by making him chairman of several of their committees, and sending obnoxious messages by him to the Lords. Cromwell, whom he had occasion to rebuke for intemperate conduct in a private committee where he presided, entertained against him a great enmity, to which may probably be traced the harsh votes against him that were afterwards adopted. In 1641 he had his first interview with the king, who was desirous to thank him for his exertions in parliament, and to induce him to delay the bill against episcopacy till his majesty returned from Scotland, which Hyde, who was chairman of the committee, managed to effect. He secretly penned the answer adopted by the king to the remonstrance of the Commons, and in reward for his services was offered the place of solicitor-general, which he declined to accept, advising the king that it would be dangerous to turn out St. John at that time. He continued privately to give information to the court, as well before as after its removal to York, of all that was transacting in the house, supplying answers to the various declarations of the parliament, which the king, to screen him from discovery, invariably copied with his own hand.

The republican leaders, though they suspected Hyde to be the author, had not sufficient evidence of the fact to visit him with the vengeance they contemplated. As soon however as he eluded their intentions by joining the king at York, they disabled him from sitting in the house and excepted him from the pardon they offered to all who would withdraw from the king. On March 3, 1643, the office of chancellor and sub-treasurer of the Exchequer was granted to him for life (4 Report Pub. Acc., App. ii. 187); and he was at the same time knighted and sworn a privy councillor. He was consulted by the king in his most secret affairs, composing most of the important state papers issued, and was one of the conductors of the issueless negotiation at Uxbridge. When it was determined to send Prince Charles to the west, Sir Edward Hyde was one of those appointed to accompany him, and his interview with the king at his departure on March 4, 1645, was the last that he had with the unfortunate monarch. He attended the prince till July 1646, when, his highness leaving Jersey, to which he had retired, for France, Hyde remained at the former place for the two succeeding years, employing his leisure in preparing his great work on the History of the Rebellion, some of the materials for which were supplied by the king himself. He then joined the prince again, and was with him at the time of his father's murder, when he was immediately sworn of the new king's privy council. Soon after he and Lord Cottington were sent as ambassadors to Spain, where their mission was not successful, and then returning to his family at Antwerp, he stayed there till after the battle of Worcester, when, being summoned to the king at Paris, he continued in close attendance on his majesty in all the various places at which he resided during his exile. The king relying on him as his chief adviser, he not only performed such duties as attached to his office (which it may well be supposed, considering the straitness of the Exchequer, were difficult enough), but also acted for some time as the principal secretary of state, and carried on the most important part of the correspondence. The weight of these duties was greatly increased by the extremity of penury and want which he suffered, of which he gives a pitiable account in his letter to Sir Edward Nicholas. Yet even then his position excited envy, and, with a view to his removal from it, a ridiculous charge was invented against him that he was in intimate correspondence with Cromwell, into whose chamber it was alleged he had been seen to enter on a secret visit to England. Charles treated it as it deserved, by giving his personal testimony of its falsehood.

The Great Seal, ever since Sir Edward Herbert's resignation in June 1654, had remained in the hands of the king without any occasion for its use. But now, being pestered with perpetual applications by the companions of his exile for offices, titles, and reversions, and by the adherents of Cromwell for secret confirmations of grants and estates, the king put an end to the personal annoyance by entrusting it on January 29, 1658, to Sir Edward Hyde, with the title of lord chancellor, and in that character he accompanied the king to England on the Restoration in 1660, for which by his cautious counsels he materially cleared the way. As chancellor he resided at first at Dorset House in Fleet Street, and afterwards at Worcester House in the Strand, till he removed in 1667 to the palace which he built at the top of St. James's Street, the magnificence of which so greatly increased the popular prejudice against him.

To the heavy and multifarious duties of this office were added those of the chancellor of the Exchequer, which he executed for several months after Charles's return, besides the management of all the important business of the state, and the necessary changes consequent on the renewal of legitimate government. He was, in fact, prime minister, without the title, but with all the envy and discontent usually attendant upon one who is supposed to guide the councils of his sovereign. Notwithstanding the confidence placed in him both by the late and the present king, the queen-dowager had from the first shown a distaste and almost an aversion to him, and her jealousy of the ascendancy of his counsels instead of her own was in no degree abated by the successful results which she could not but attribute principally to him. Charles's confidence however was not to be shaken, and he disappointed Hyde's enemies by calling the chancellor up to the House of Peers, as Baron Hyde of Hindon (November 3, 1660), and by presenting him with a royal gift of 20,000*l*. Soon afterwards his daughter Anne's marriage with the Duke of York was acknowledged, and her claims fully recognised. On April 20, 1661, three days before the coronation, the chancellor was advanced from a barony to a viscounty and an earldom, by the titles of Viscount Cornbury in Wiltshire (an estate presented to him by the king), and Earl of Clarendon.

This elevation for a time silenced his enemies, and for the next year or two his influence in the royal councils suffered no diminution. The king treated him with kindness and familiarity, applied to him for advice in all emergencies, and even patiently submitted to the remonstrances he sometimes ventured to offer against the immorality so openly practised and encouraged at court. But at length the panders to those practices obtained the mastery. By ridiculing and mimicking the chancellor's overstrict formality, they led the king gradually, first to suffer, then to laugh at their indecent reflections, till by degrees the fickle pupil was ashamed of appearing to be schooled. Clarendon's credit at court thus sensibly declining, his policy became the next subject of attack. To him were attributed every political oversight, every royal disappointment, and every national calamity, corruption was insinuated and bribery was hinted, till at last his enemies acquired such an ascendancy over the king and the parliament that his downfall and his ruin became inevitable.

The king became more and more tired of his reproachful lectures, administered, as the chancellor acknowledges, with unadvised earnestness; his enemies at court were more and more jealous of the influence he still retained; he had been all along obnoxious both to Presbyterians and Roman Catholics; and the people, taught to attribute to his mismanagement the miscarriages of the state, were strongly prejudiced against him. The way was thus fully paved to the success of the intrigue for his removal, in which the chief actors were the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Arlington, and Sir William Coventry, urged on and aided by the arts of the Duchess of Cleveland, the king's shameless mistress. Clarendon, conscious of innocence, refused to resign, and the Great Seal was taken from him on August 30, 1667. At the meeting of parliament in October, the malice of his opponents not being satisfied with the triumph they had obtained, an impeachment for high treason was voted against him by the Commons; but the Lords refused to commit him upon so general an accusation until some particular charge was exhibited. No one can read the articles without seeing the weakness and frivolity of the allegations, none of them, even if true, amounting to treason. To each and every of them Clarendon has left a satisfactory answer; but during the discussion on the subject of his committal, which continued for near a month, and nearly led to an open breach between the two houses, he withdrew to France. This he was induced to do, much against his own judgment and inclination, in consequence of an intimation from the king, who, though at first acknowledging his innocence, was worked upon ungratefully to desert him; and from the urgency of his friends, who, considering the temper of the parliament and the people, were fearful if he stayed that he would meet with Strafford's fate.

He left a justificatory letter to the House of Lords, which, from the reflections it contained against his persecutors, so excited the bile of the Commons that it was ordered to be burned by the common hangman; and they pursued their inveteracy so far as to pass an act banishing him from the kingdom, and prohibiting all correspondence with him, except by his own children and servants. Their malice followed him abroad, France by their influence at first refusing him an asylum; but soon altering her policy and withdrawing her prohibition, the banished earl retired first to Montpellier, then to Moulins, and eventually to Rouen, patiently employing the seven years of his exile in the completion of those works which have raised his character and extended his fame. He died at the latter city on December 9, 1674, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. It seems extraordinary, and looks as if the party prejudice against him had subsided, that his remains should have been allowed a resting-place in Westminster Abbey, his body having been buried in Henry the Seventh's Chapel.

The imputation of bribery to which he is sometimes subject is sufficiently refuted, as well by the absence of any specific charges being brought forward at a time when they would have been welcomed and encouraged, as by his leaving, after such opportunities of accumulation, his family so poorly provided for. The building of his great house in St. James's, which nourished the popular prejudice against him, greatly exceeded the cost he intended, and compelled him for want of funds to mortgage his estate; and the nicknames of Holland House, and Dunkirk House, and Tangier Hall, by which it was satirically called, have been long dismissed as unfounded misnomers by the prejudiced multitude.

His judicial career was that of a cautious and prudent man, conscious of his deficiencies and anxious to supply them with the experience of others. He selected the best men to fill the vacancies on the bench, and he is said never to have pronounced an important decree without the assistance of two of the judges. In the administration of justice he is acknowledged to have been strictly impartial; and his 'orders' for the regulation of the officers of his court, rendered necessary by the change in the government, are still considered admirably adapted for their purpose. His principal fame now rests upon his valuable 'History of the Rebellion,' and the interesting memoirs of his own life; works which, though evidently betraying a desire to justify his royal masters in the course they respectively pursued, and even to find excuses for their most equivocal acts, will always be valued as displaying a deep knowledge of mankind, and as ably picturing the scenes he describes. Admired as these works deservedly are, and beautiful as are some of the characters he draws, it must be acknowledged that the length of his sentences and turn of his periods give a certain turgidity and stiffness to his style. His other writings were chiefly theological, devotional, and political, and few of them are now regarded.

It may be doubted whether he was benefited by the union of his daughter with the Duke of York; in fact, he prophesied that it would sooner or later prove his ruin; and it certainly did not retard it. Two queens were the issue of that connection, both holding prominent and honourable place in our history, the reign of one of whom acquired, from the eminent man who flourished in it, the designation of the Augustan Age. The earl's eldest son Henry (the author of the Diary of his Times) succeeded to the title, which, with that of the Earl of Rochester, became extinct in 1753. The earldom of Clarendon was revived in 1776 in the person of Thomas Villiers, a scion of the house of Jersey, who had married the granddaughter and heir of the last earl. (Clarendon: Wood; Whitlocke; Burnet; Macdiarmid's Lives; &c.)

HYDE, ROBERT, was the first cousin of the Earl of Clarendon, both being nephews of the above Sir Nicholas Hyde. His father, Sir Lawrence Hyde, held the office of attorney-general to Queen Anne, the consort of James I. By his marriage with Barbara, daughter of — Castilion, of Benham, Berks, Esq., he had no less than eleven sons, most of whom distinguished themselves in their several vocations. Of the four in holy orders, one, Alexander, became Bishop of Salisbury; another, Edward, dean of Windsor; and a third, Thomas, fellow of New College and judge of the Admiralty. Another son, Sir Henry, bred to diplomacy, was beheaded by the parliament in 1651, for his adherence to the king; and the youngest son, James, a doctor in medicine, was elected principal of Magdalen Hall. Two only followed their father's profession: Sir Frederick, queen's serjeant, was promoted to a judgeship in South Wales; and Sir Robert, whose career is now to be traced, rose to the dignity which his uncle had previously attained.

Robert, who was the second son, was born at his father's house at Heale, near Salisbury, in 1595. He was called to the bar of the Middle Temple on February 7, 1617, and elected reader in Lent 1638. By this time he had got into considerable practice, and two years after, in May 1640, he was summoned to take the degree of the coif. Having been chosen recorder of Salisbury, he was returned as the representative of that city to the Long Parliament. A staunch loyalist, he joined the court party, and made himself obnoxious by voting against the bill for the attainder of Lord Strafford, for which his name was placarded in the list of the minority who opposed that unjust measure, under the title of 'betrayers of their country.' When the king retired to Oxford the serjeant joined him, and attended the meeting of parliament there, and also executed the commission of array; the consequence of which was that he was voted a malignant, and expelled from his seat at Westminster. After the fatal termination of that reign, his noble relative (vi. 340) relates that Charles II., in escaping from the disastrous battle of Worcester in 1657, was sheltered for many days in the mansion at Heale, which then belonged to the serjeant, and was occupied by the widow of his elder brother. (Parl. Hist. ii. 622, 756, iii. 219.)

During the Protectorate he resumed his practice at the bar, and his arguments are reported by Hardres and Siderfin. At the Restoration he was immediately knighted, and appointed a judge of the Common Pleas, his patent being dated May 31, 1660. He was one of the commissioners for the trial of the regicides, but, except on points of law, took no part in the proceedings. In the following spring the three Ferrys, a mother and two sons, were tried before him, and condemned to be hanged for the murder of William Harrison at Campden in Gloucestershire, though the body had not been found, and though the judge at the preceding assize, Sir Christopher Turnor, had on that account refused to entertain the charge. Several years after their execution Harrison appeared again, and related that he had been kidnapped and sold to slavery, from which he had escaped. The judge was dead before this discovery was made. (Siderfin, 2; State Trials, v. 1030, xiv. 1312-24.)

He was indebted to his noble relative for his promotion on October 19, 1663, to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench, where he presided for about a year and a half, without any great reputation as a lawyer; but Sir Thomas Raymond (Rep. 130) says that he was expert in the pleas of the crown, and especially in those which concerned a justice of peace. The extreme horror that he felt at anything that tended to rebellion was strongly manifested in the next year on the trial of certain printers of seditious books. To one of them named Twyn, capitally convicted of printing a treasonable work, called 'A Treatise of the Execution of Justice,' &c., inciting the people against the king and the government, who prayed his lordship to intercede for him, he gave the extraordinary and unmerciful answer, that he 'would not intercede for his own father in this case, if he were alive.' He was as severe against any one who promulgated doctrines contrary to the Liturgy of the Church, and his conduct on the trial of Benjamin Keach at Aylesbury on an indictment for publishing an heretical book, called 'The Child's Instructor; or, A New and Easy Primer,' does not redound to his credit or liberality. (Ibid. vi. 515, 702.)

He died on May 1, 1665 (Siderfin, 253), and was buried in Salisbury Cathedral. His wife, Mary, the sister of Francis Baber, M.D., of Chew Magna in Somersetshire, brought him no children.

HYDE, THOMAS DE LA, possessed considerable property in Cornwall, and was sheriff of that county as well as seneschal of the castles of Tintagel, Restormel, and Tremeton, and of the stannary and the coinage there. (Madox, i. 107, 132, 144, 201.) He was placed on the commission of trailbaston for the ten western and south-western counties in 1305, 33 Edward I. (N. Fœdera, i. 970.) He died in 8 Edward II. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 256.)

HYNDE, JOHN, was of a family seated at Madingley in Cambridgeshire. He was educated at Cambridge, and called to the bar at Gray's Inn, where he was reader in 1517, 1527, and a third time in 1531, on his being called to the degree of the coif. On January 2, 1535, he was nominated a king's serjeant; and in December 1540 a letter was addressed to him by the council, directing him and three others to take a chaplain and a servant of Goodrich, Bishop of Ely, and to search their houses, and also the bishop's study, as to a 'seditious epistle of Melancton's,' and if they found that he had assisted in the translation, to charge him to appear before the council. (Acts Privy Council, vii. 98.)

An act passed in 1542-3 in Hynde's favour (st. 34 and 35 Henry VIII. c. 24) affords a curious insight into the practice of those days as to the payments made to members of parliament. It recites that the manor of Burlewes, otherwise called the Shyre manor of the county of Cambridge, and certain lands in Madingley, were let to farm at 10*l.* a year, to the intent that the yearly profits should be applied to the payment of the fees and wages of the knights of that county sent to parliament; and that it might be perfectly known what person should be charged to pay the said rent of 10*l.*, all the gentlemen of the said county desired that it might be, and it was enacted that John Hynde, one of the king's serjeants-at-law, and his heirs, should hold the same to him, his heirs and assigns for ever, upon condition to pay 10*l.* to the sheriff and members of the county, who were to divide the same between the two knights every year. Hynde's participation in the plunder of the monasteries is evidenced by various grants entered in the Augmentation Office.

On November 4, 1545, he was promoted to the bench of the Common Pleas, and knighted. He sat there during the remainder of Henry's reign, and for nearly four years in that of Edward, during part of which time he was one of the Council of the North. (Burnet's Reform. ii. pt. ii. 312.)

He died in October 1550, and was buried in St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street. Old Machyn's entry (p. 4) proves him to have been of good repute and character, for after saying, 'And my Lade Hinde dyd make anodur standard, and a cote armor, and a penon, and a elmet, and target, and sword, to be had at the moynthe's mynde in the contrey for him, and a grett dolle of moner, and of mett and drynk, and gownes to the pore,' he adds, 'for ther was myche a doo ther for hym.' This is better than an epitaph.

I

IFELD, JOHN DE, was born at Ifeld in Kent, and was the third son of Thomas de Ifeld. During the reign of Edward II. he was actively employed in assessing the aids imposed by parliament, and arraying the men-at-arms. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 1037.) In 1 Edward III. he was one of the perambulators of the forests south of the Trent, and in 1320 was a justice itinerant into Nottinghamshire. He next represented his native county in parliament, and as late as 13 Edward III. was a commissioner of array for Surrey. (Rot. Parl. ii. 425; Hasted, i. 238; N. Federa, ii. 1071.)

ILLINGWORTH, RICHARD, was of a Nottinghamshire family, seated at Kirkby Wodhouse. He practised at the bar from 33 Henry VI.; and on September 10, 1462, 2 Edward IV. (Rot. Parl. v. 528), he was appointed chief baron of the Exchequer, and knighted. He continued in this place till the restoration of Henry VI., 1470, by whom he was not removed; but as soon as Edward IV. resumed the crown he was superseded. He had large grants of land in that county from Edward IV., all of which were excepted from the various acts of resumption passed in that reign.

His death occurred in 1476, and he and two of his sons, Ralph and Richard, were buried or had monuments in the church of St. Alban, Lad, or Ladle

Lane, Cripplegate, in which ward, in the neighbouring parish of St. Giles, he possessed a house, where he died. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. iv. 305, 375; Rot. Parl. v. 472, 584; Stow's London [Thomas], 111.)

INGE, WILLIAM, was an advocate of great eminence in his profession, and the king's attorney as early as 15 Edward I., 1287, being then retained to prosecute and defend for the king at a salary of 20*l.* a year (Issue Roll, iii. 101), and in the twentieth year he is noticed as the king's serjeant-at-law. (Rot. Parl. i. 24-85.) In 1293 he was one of the eight who were assigned as justices to take assizes, &c., throughout the kingdom in aid of the regular judges, in which office he continued till the end of the reign. (Rot. Parl. i. 150-206.) On April 6, 1305, he was one of the five justices of trailbaston named for Norfolk and Suffolk, and again in February 1307. (Rot. Parl. i. 218; N. Federa, i. 970.)

The accession of Edward II. made no alteration in his position, and until his elevation to the bench his name appears among the advocates recorded in the Year Book, showing that, notwithstanding his employment as a justice of assize, he did not desert his practice at Westminster. The patent of his appointment as a judge of the Court of Common Pleas was dated September 28, 1314, 8 Edward II.; and in January 1315, while merely a justice of the Common Pleas, he opened, by the king's directions, the parliament then held at Lincoln. (Rot. Parl. i. 350.)

He succeeded as chief justice of the King's Bench in February 1316; but presided over this court for little more than a year, for on June 15, 1317, he was displaced by Henry le Scrope.

He died in 1321, leaving large possessions in ten counties. (Cal. Inquis. p. m. i. 209.) Part of his Kentish property, the manor of Stanstead, subordinate to Wrotham, he obtained by his marriage with Margery, one of the daughters of Henry Grapinell. (Hasted, v. 355.)

INGE, JOHN, though probably of the same family as the above William Inge, was of a different branch of it. He was settled in Somersetshire, and was employed from 10 Edward II. in various judicial commissions within that county, and also acted there as assessor of the aids granted by Parliament. In 15 Edward II. he was sheriff of Devonshire, and three years afterwards had the castles, towns, and honors of Roger de Mortimer in Wygeton and Ludlow committed to his custody.

On January 18, 1331, 4 Edward III., he was made a judge of the Common Pleas, and died about the twentieth year, leaving, by his wife Alicia, a son named John. (Parl. Writs, ii. p. ii. 1039; Abb. Rot. Orig. i. 25, 282, ii. 291.)

INGLEBY, THOMAS DE, settled at Ripley in Yorkshire, is mentioned in the Year Book of 21 Edward III., 1347, and as a judge of assize in the twenty-fifth year. His appointment as a judge of the King's Bench took place on September 30, 1361, 35 Edward III., and he retained his seat in that court for the sixteen remaining years of the reign, being, during most of them, the only judge there in addition to the chief justice. He received an extra grant of 40*l.* a year beyond his stated judicial salary of forty marks; and, besides this, he had a fee of 20*l.* annually for holding assizes in different counties. (Issue Roll, 353.)

On the accession of Richard II. he seems to have continued in the King's Bench, as no new judge was appointed there till towards the end of the first year. About that time he died, and was buried in Ripley Church, where his tomb still remains. By his wife, Catherine Ripley, he left several children, from whom descended the under-mentioned Sir Charles Ingleby. Another of his descendants, Sir William Ingleby of Ripley, was created a baronet in 1642, and the title, becoming extinct in 1772, was renewed, and is now held by a kinsman of the family. (Wotton's Baronet. ii. 293; Burke's Ert. Baronet. 276.)

INGLEBY, CHARLES, whose father, John Ingleby, was a direct descendant from the above Sir Thomas Ingleby, was called to the bar at Gray's Inn in 1671. Being a Roman Catholic, he was involved, in February 1680, in a charge of being concerned with Sir Thomas Gascoigne in a plot against the king, and committed to the King's Bench prison; but on his trial at York in the following July he was acquitted, as Sir Thomas had been before. After the accession of James II. he was constituted on April 23, 1686, a baron of the Irish Exchequer; but, declining to go to that country, he was in May of the next year made a serjeant-at-law, and on July 6, 1688, was appointed a baron of the Exchequer in England, when he was knighted. One of the effects of James's apprehensions on the landing of the Prince of Orange was to supersede Sir Charles in the following November, before he had been four months in office. Returning to his practice at the bar, he was present at the York assizes in April 1693, and was fined forty shillings for refusing to take the oaths to King William. (Luttrell, i. 34-482, iii. 83; Bramston, 275; Smyth's Law Off. Ireland, 157; State Trials, xii. 263.)

INGLESHAM, ROBERT DE, in 31 Henry II. was one of the custodes of the bishopric of Worcester, and in the next year was appointed archdeacon of Gloucester. In 1187 he was one of the justiciars before whom a fine was levied, and his pleas as a justice itinerant in Hampshire and Devonshire occur in the roll of 1 Richard I., 1189. (Pipe Roll, 134, 203.)

He died about 1197. (Le Neve, 303.)

INGOLDESBY, JOHN, whose family was seated in the parish of that name in the county of Lincoln, probably held some inferior office in the Exchequer before he was raised to the bench of that court. His first patent as a baron is dated November 4, 1462, 2 Edward IV., but in September 1467 he was removed from his seat. In the following year, however, he received a new grant of the office for life in reversion on the next death or resignation, and this occurred on June 14, 1470. Henry VI. was restored in the following October, and Ingoldeby's name was omitted in the new patent; nor is there any appearance in the published records of his having resumed his seat on the return of Edward IV.

One of his descendants, though connected by marriage with the Protector Cromwell, deserted that side, and aided in the restoration of Charles II., who on August 30, 1660, created him a baronet; but the title became extinct in 1726.

INSULA, GODFREY DE, whose name appears among the justiciars before whom fines were levied from 10 Richard I. to 10 John, is also mentioned as a judge in the rolls of the Curia Regis in 13 John. (Abb. Placit. 82.)

INSULA, BRIAN DE, whether so called from the Isle of Wight or the Isle of Ely is uncertain, held a high place in royal favour from 2 John, 1200. In 6 John the king gave him to wife Maud, the daughter and heir of Thomas, the son of William de Selebi, with her lands. In the next year the castle of Knaresborough was committed to his keeping, to which was afterwards added that of Bolsover. He was also appointed chief forester for the counties of Nottingham and Derby; one of the custodes of the archbishopric of York during its vacancy; and a warden of the seaports of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire. (Rot. Claus. i. 17-43; Rot. Pat. 72, 80, 88; Madox, i. 773.) The king frequently describes him as his beloved knight, and he was admitted to the intimacy of playing at tables with his sovereign. (Rot. Misc. 14 John.) During the turbulent years of John's reign he was a devoted adherent to the king, and greatly benefited by grants of the forfeited estates. In 17 John he held the office of seneschal, or steward, and was appointed one of the governors of Yorkshire. (Rot. Claus. i. 219, 272; Rot. Pat. 164; Wendover, iii. 353.)

On the accession of Henry III. he had a renewal of the custody of the castle of Knaresborough and the forests of Nottingham, and aided the royal troops both at Montsorel and Lincoln. In 5 Henry III. he was constituted chief justice of the forests, but about three years afterwards was removed from his office, having got into disgrace by being one of the barons who refused to comply with the injunction to surrender the castles in their custody to the king. (Rapin, iii. 14, 21.) He was then disseised of various manors he held under the crown, and several of the americiaments he had inflicted in his office were remitted. Soon, however, making his peace, he obtained the restoration of his lands, and received several marks of royal regard, as some deer for his park at Saleby in Lincolnshire, and the grant of a fair for that place. (Rot. Claus. i. 308-506, ii. 49-145.)

In 10 Henry III. he was nominated one of the justices itinerant for Yorkshire (Ibid. ii. 151), and continued to be entrusted with the guardianship of the castles of Knaresborough, Bolsover, and Peke. In the last year of his life, 1233, he was constituted sheriff of Yorkshire, and died before August 18, 1234. (Excerpt. e Rot. Fin. i. 263, 265; Dugdale's Baron. i. 737.)

INSULA, SIMON DE, or DE L'ISLE, was probably of the Isle of Ely, as he was one of the stewards of that bishopric in 9 and 15 John, and had property in Cambridge-shire. (Rot. Pat. 99, 140; Rot. Claus. i. 108.) In 12 John he accompanied the king to Ireland, but fell off from his allegiance in the troubles at the end of it. He soon, however, submitted to

Henry III., in whose first year his lands were restored to him. (Rot. de Præst. 117, 218; Rot. Claus. i. 318, &c.)

He was a justicier with fines levied before him at Westminster from 2 to 4 Henry III., and went as a justice itinerant into Essex and Hertford, Norfolk and Suffolk. (Rot. Claus. i. 350, 365, 383.)

INSULA, WILLIAM DE, was the son of a knight of that name who married Matilda, the daughter of William de Luddenham, of the manor of Luddenham in Kent. (Hasted, vi. 391.) He began his career in the service of Reginald de Cornhill, sheriff of Kent and comptroller of the Mint; and several instances occur from 6 John of his conveying money to the king. (Rot. Claus. i. 39-104.) In 16 John, in an order for some repairs at Brikestok in Northamptonshire, he is named as the king's bailiff, and as having the custody of the forests there, and in the next year as one of the justices appointed to take a recognition of the last presentation to the church of Oxeden in that county. (Ibid. 190, 193, 270.) About this time he was raised to the office of marshal of the Exchequer, and was sent in 17 John to the constable of Marlborough Castle to bring six hundred marks to the king at Windsor. He is so called in 2 Henry III. in a mandate to the barons of the Exchequer, who are directed to receive his clerk in his place till he returns from an embassy to Ireland. (Ibid. 214, 251.)

In 1222 he was appointed with others to hold pleas of the forest at Northampton, and became constable of Rockingham Castle. (Ibid. 497, 516, 573.) His first nomination as a justice itinerant was in 9 Henry III. for the counties of Northampton and Rutland; afterwards for Lincolnshire, and for several other counties. (Ibid. ii. 77, 151, 213.) The knowledge and experience he had acquired in his previous connections with the courts had become apparent; and as fines were levied before him from Easter 1228 till Easter 1231, it is manifest that he was then called to the higher position of a justicier in Banco at Westminster. During the whole of this period, and as late as 18 Henry III., 1233, his name appears as acting in numerous counties. (Dugdale's Orig. 42.)

INSULA, JOHN DE. Two of this name were summoned to the parliament at Carlisle in 35 Edward I., 1307 (Rot. Parl. i. 188)—one as a baron, and the other apparently as one of the judges or learned persons in the law.

It is certain that the latter was an advocate in the courts, and as early as 1290 was heard before the parliament on the part of the king in two suits there discussed. Two years afterwards he was amerced in 100 shillings for some contempt before the justices of assize (Ibid. 18-83), but in 21

Edward I. was himself appointed to act in that character in nine counties. On October 21, 1295 (Ibid.), he was admitted as one of the barons of the Exchequer. (Y. B. pt. i. 36; Madox, i. 320, ii. 44-324.) In 33 and 35 Edward I. he was one of the justices of trailbaston (Rot. Parl. i. 178, 218); but whether he preserved his seat in the Exchequer at the same time does not appear. He was not, however, numbered among those barons who received patents on the accession of Edward II., though he was still regularly summoned with the judges to parliament, and in 4 Edward II. was placed at the head of the justices of assize in the northern counties. He resumed his seat in the Exchequer, by a patent dated January 30, 1313, and is frequently noticed in that character till the twelfth year. He died in May or June 1320. (Ibid. 301-350; Parl. Writs, ii. 1104; Abb. Rot. Orig. 223.)

J

JAMES, WILLIAM MILBURNE, the recently appointed lord justice of appeal in Chancery, was born in 1807, his father being Christopher James, Esq., of Swansea, and his mother, Anne, daughter of — Williams, Esq., of Merthyr Tydvil. He was educated at the university of Glasgow, and was called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn on June 10, 1831. He remained a junior in the equity courts for two-and-twenty years, when in 1853 he was made a queen's counsel, and obtained a distinguished practice for sixteen years as a leader, during which he held the office of vice-chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster. After thirty-eight years' experience as a barrister, he was raised to the bench on January 1, 1869, as vice-chancellor, in the duties of which he was found so efficient that in July 1870 he was promoted to his present position, and to the Privy Council. He received the customary knighthood when made vice-chancellor.

He married Maria, daughter of Dr. William Otter, the late Bishop of Chichester.

JEFFREY, or JEFFERAY, JOHN, was of an old Sussex family. His father was Richard, the second son of John Jeffrey, of Chiddingly Manor, inherited from a long line of ancestors. His mother was Elizabeth, the daughter of Robert Whitfield, Esq., of Wadhurst, Sussex. He was called to the bar at Gray's Inn in 1546, and made reader in 1561. On his being summoned to the degree of serjeant in 1507 he was presented with a purse containing 10*l.* by the society. In 1571 he was returned member for East Grinstead, and in 1572 for Arundel. In the latter year he was nominated one of the queen's serjeants, and on May 15, 1576, he was promoted to a judicial seat in the Queen's Bench. Within a year and a half, on October 12, 1577, he was promoted to the chief barony of the Exchequer, but his seat was vacated by his death on May 23, 1578. He died in Coleman Street Ward, London, but was buried in Chiddingly Church, where, in a small chapel, a magnificent monument was erected to his memory, on which he is represented in his robes.

David Lloyd, in his 'State Worthies' (p. 221), gives a curious and eulogistic summary of his character in four pages of his sententious phrases. His first wife was Elizabeth, daughter and heir of John Ansley, Esq., of London, by whom he had an only daughter, who married the first Lord Montagu of Boughton. Sir John's second wife was Mary, daughter of George Goring, Esq. (Horsfield's Lives, ii. 66; Collins's Peerage, ii. 14.)

JEFFREYS, GEORGE (LORD JEFFREYS OF WEM). The task of writing the life of 'this very worst judge that ever disgraced Westminster Hall,' as Mr. Justice Foster designated him, is most ungrateful, especially when the writer can find no ground for reversing the verdict that has been already pronounced.

George Jeffreys was the younger son of John Jeffreys, of Acton, near Wrexham, in Denbighshire, a gentleman of ancient stock, but of comparatively slender means, by Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Ireland, of Bewsey in Lancashire. Born in 1648, his education began at the free school of Shrewsbury, and was continued, first at St. Paul's School in London, and then at Westminster under Dr. Busby, to whose tuition he often referred in his after-life. He himself states in the Cambridge case that he was once a member of that university (State Trials, xi. 1329), but it is not known to what college he belonged, and he took no degree. His untractable disposition was early exhibited by his refusing to settle in some quiet course of trade, for which he was intended; and he was of so litigious a temper, and so fond of opposition and argument, that his father used to say to him, 'Ah! George, George, I fear thou wilt die with thy shoes and stockings on.' (North's Lives, 209.) Choosing the law as his profession, he commenced his legal studies, with the pecuniary aid of his grandmother, at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar on November 22, 1669.

During his novitiate he had lightened the rigour of his studies by too great a devotion to the exciting pleasures of the times, which, as a natural reaction from the austerities of the Puritan rule, had become eminently hilarious and disgracefully profligate. Daring and impudence in that age were almost certain to insure success; and an apocryphal story of the proficiency of the young aspirant in these qualifications is related, of his appearing in a forensic gown at the Kingston assizes during the year of the plague, and pleading there as a barrister three years before he was called. A voluble tongue and a stentorian voice, joined with the interest of the disaffected party in the state, to which he at first attached himself, soon introduced him into considerable practice, principally confined to criminal business and the city courts. This led him into the society of the members of the corporation, to whom his jovial disposition was not a little recommendation. He found a firm friend in an alderman of the same name, through whose influence he was elected to the place of common serjeant on March 17, 1671, at the early age of twenty-three.

Seeing little prospect of advancement from his connection with the popular party, he gradually deserted it; and getting himself introduced to Chiffinch, the king's page, pimp, and factotum, he made himself so agreeable to that worthy, both by joining in his potations and by betraying the plans of the disaffected, that he soon was recommended to his majesty as a man likely to do good service. Through the same means, having also procured another powerful advocate in the Duchess of Portsmouth, he easily secured to himself the post of recorder of London on October 22, 1678, receiving, a year before, the first reward of his apostacy by being knighted and appointed solicitor to the Duke of York. He brazened out the disgrace of his desertion, and from this time forward he attached himself wholly to the court party, treating his former friends not only with contempt, but with the utmost violence of reprobation.

His first wife was Sarah, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Neesham, and the circumstances under which he married her (May 22, 1667) tell greatly to his credit. She was the kinswoman and humble friend of a merchant's daughter, a prize of 30,000*l.*, to whose hand or fortune Jeffreys aspired, and had used the companion as his secret advocate. But the plot being discovered, the poor girl was dismissed, and, coming up to town to tell of her failure and disgrace, the discarded lover took pity on her and married her. She bore him several children during the eleven years of their union; and three months after her death, in May 1678, he contracted a second marriage with Mary, daughter of Sir Thomas Bludworth, lord mayor of London and M.P. for the city, and the widow of Sir John Jones, of Fonnon Castle, Glamorganshire. This lady, being supposed to be not remarkable for continence, formed the subject with her new husband of a lampoon called 'A Westminster Wedding.'

He held the recordership for two years, during which, though he did not betray all the violence and cruelty that afterwards distinguished him, he exhibited a sufficient inkling of his overbearing disposition. In his anxiety to follow the popular cry against Papists, he forgot the religious profession of his patron, the Duke of York, going out of his way to insult the prisoners of that persuasion, against whom he had to pronounce sentence as recorder, by ridiculing and inveighing against the doctrines they professed. But when the tide seemed to be turning, and the court party had managed to meet the petitions for a parliament by addresses of abhorrence, Sir George took so active a part in getting up the latter that he was visited with the censure of the House of Commons. On November 13, 1680, a vote was passed, declaring that by traducing and obstructing petitioning for the sitting of parliament he had betrayed the rights of the subject, and ordering that an address be made to his majesty to remove him out of all public offices, and that the members for London should communicate the said vote to the Court of Aldermen. On receiving this communication the aldermen resolved that Sir George be advised and desired to surrender the office, which he accordingly did on December 2, having in the interim obtained the reluctant permission of the king, who laughed and said that Sir George was not parliament-proof. With this concession and a reprimand on his knees at the bar, the house was satisfied, and Sir George kept his other places. (Parl. Hist. iv. 1210; North's Examen, 550.)

Since his election as recorder he had received the degree of the coif in February 1679, and had been made king's serjeant on May 12, 1680. In the preceding month he had also been constituted chief justice of Chester, an office which he retained till he became chief justice of the King's Bench. In almost all the numerous state trials during this period, connected with the Popish, the Meal-tub, and the Rye House Plots, he was engaged on the part of the crown, and after he became king's serjeant he took a prominent part in them. In few of these, as reported, is there much to complain of, except in that against Stephen Colledge, whom he seemed to take a pleasure in ridiculing, and in which he came into collision with Titus Oates, who, being a witness for the prisoner, threatened the serjeant that he should 'hear of it in another place' (State Trials, viii. 601, 641, 664)—a threat that was not forgotten by Sir George when the brazen-faced plotter was sentenced four years afterwards for perjury. The serjeant's general character at the bar for insolence and browbeating his antagonists was so notorious that his brethren must have enjoyed the severe rebuke he received at Kingston assizes from Baron Weston.

In trials at Nisi Prius he sometimes was paid in his own coin, and, as chief justice of Chester, he soon behaved in such a manner as to draw down upon him general animadversion, being described by Mr. Booth (afterwards Lord Delamere and Earl of Warrington) in his place in parliament as acting 'more like a jack-pudding than with that gravity that becomes a judge.' (Harris's Lives, v. 331.) On November 17, 1681, he was created a baronet, of Bulstrode in Buckinghamshire, where he had bought an estate, and built a mansion, which was afterwards sold to William Earl of Portland.

During the last illness of Sir Edmund Saunders, the Earl of Sunderland recommended Jeffreys to the king for the chief seat in the King's Bench, but his majesty raised doubts of his capacity, and had too much knowledge of his character to expect that the appointment would be agreeable to the other judges. This hesitation was the cause of the place remaining vacant for three months after Saunders's death; but his majesty being at last overtalked, Jeffreys was installed chief justice on September 29, 1683. Evelyn (iii. 93, 140, 190), referring to his advancement, characterises him as being 'reputed to be most ignorant, but most daring,' and relates that between the sentence and execution of Algernon Sidney he attended a city wedding and was exceeding merry, dancing with the bride, drinking and smoking, and talking much beneath the gravity of a judge. On another occasion he calls him 'of nature cruel and a slave of the court.' And Burnet (ii. 389) says, 'All people were apprehensive of very black designs when they saw Jeffreys made lord chief justice, who was scandalously vicious and was drunk every day, besides a drunkenness of fury in his temper that looked like enthusiasm. He did not consider the decencies of his post, nor did he so much as affect to seem impartial, as became a judge; but run out upon all occasions into declamations that did not become the bar, much less the bench. He was not learned in his profession, and his eloquence, though viciously copious, was neither correct nor agreeable.'

Almost his earliest act as chief justice was to preside at Sidney's trial, when by his harsh and unfair treatment of the prisoner he gave the first sample of his brutal nature and his courtly subserviency. The same course he pursued in the subsequent trials, insulting and vilifying the accused, and acting rather as the advocate employed to procure a conviction, than as an impartial judge sworn to see fair play between the parties. Not only was he unfeeling and indecorous towards the prisoners, but he bullied and threatened the counsel practising in his court, instances of which are related in the lives of Sir Edward Ward, Mr. Wallop, and Mr. Bradbury.

Though King Charles had at first resisted the appointment of Jeffreys, he soon altered his opinion; and immediately after the condemnation of Sir Thomas Armstrong, who, having been brought to the bar on an outlawry had claimed to be tried, saying he demanded no more than the law, was brutally answered by Jeffreys that he should have it to the full, and thereupon ordered him for execution on the next Friday (State Trials, x. 114), his majesty took a valuable diamond ring from his finger, and gave it to the chief justice in acknowledgment of his services. This ring, Burnet (ii. 411) says, was thereupon called his blood-stone.

He justified the king's approbation of him by his zeal and active aid to the court in obtaining the surrender of the charters of corporate boroughs. The lord mayor of London complained to Sir John Resaby (Memoirs quoted in State Trials, viii. 217) that the chief justice usurped all the power of his office, that the city had no intercourse with the king but through him, and that the court looked upon the aldermen as no better than his tools. In both London and York he treated the aldermen with contempt, and turned out many of them, without so much as allowing them to be heard as to the crimes they were accused of.

Soon after King James had succeeded his brother, Jeffreys had an opportunity of revenging himself on Titus Oates, who, being convicted on two indictments for perjury, received at his hands so pitiless a sentence that even those who most condemned the man pronounced it cruel and excessive. Though the House of Lords refused to reverse the judgment, King William at their request pardoned such part of the punishment as remained to be inflicted. (State Trials, x. 1315-29.) Within a week after these trials Jeffreys was created Baron Jeffreys of Wem in the county of Salop, on May 15, 1685; and that very day was signalled by another exhibition of his brutality against Richard Baxter, then applying for a delay of his trial. Alluding to Oates, then standing in the pillory, he called them 'two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom.' On this trial, his counsel, and particularly Mr. Wallop, were indecently silenced, and Baxter himself treated with the coarsest reproaches. The indictment against him was for reflecting against the bishops in his 'Paraphrase upon the New Testament;' and, notwithstanding the absurdity of the charge, the chief justice easily procured a conviction; but so repugnant to common sense and to truth was his punishment, that his fine of 500*l.* was remitted before the end of the year. (Ibid. xi. 497.) But his excesses soon reached their climax. After the defeat of Monmouth at Sedgmoor in July, a commission of five judges was sent into the western counties to try those who were concerned in the rebellion. This commission consisted of Chief Justice Jeffreys, Chief Baron Montagu, Sir Francis Wythens, Sir Creswell Levinz, and Sir Robert Wright; and in order to give greater importance to it, Jeffreys was invested with the temporary rank of lieutenant-general, and the command of a strong military escort that accompanied its progress. Commencing at Winchester and terminating at Wells, the unfortunate prisoners at each place that was visited met with the full rigour of the law, and, taking even the most favourable account, that of the historian Lingard, the willing apologist of all the acts of this reign, there were 330 executed as felons and traitors, above 800 given to different persons to be transported for ten years to the West Indies, besides many who were whipped and imprisoned. With indecent haste all those who were convicted after trial suffered in the course of twenty-four hours, while those who pleaded guilty were gratified with a short reprieve. Bad as this report is, it is not nearly so atrocious as the accounts of other writers, equally deserving of credit. And in all ally 'western campaign,' as King James called it, no charge is brought against any of the judges but the chief: on him alone the harshness, the levity, the cruelty that attended the trials are fixed. His brutality in the examination of the witnesses in Lady Lisle's case, the blasphemy of his imprecations, his unjust insinuations against the unfortunate prisoner in his summing up, the ferocious anxiety he evinced for her conviction, and the threats to the jury by which he enforced it, are truly disgusting, and were equalled if not surpassed in what we hear of all the subsequent trials. Such dread was attached to his name that the memory of his fearful and sanguinary expedition is preserved to the present day in the district over which he exercised his terrific sway, by changing the name of the well-known children's game called 'Tom Tiddler's Ground' into 'Judge Jeffreys' Ground.' (Lingard, xiii. 53; Notes and Queries, 2nd S. vi. 432.) Even Lingard is compelled by irresistible evidence to acknowledge that Jeffreys converted his commission to his own advantage, by 'amassing a considerable sum of money, probably by the sale of his friendship and protection.' The journals of parliament prove, among other items, that he extorted above 14,000*l.* from Mr. Prideaux to save him from prosecution. (State Trials, xi. 297; Parl. Hist. v. 245.) When the atrocities of these proceedings came to be publicly discussed, the partisans of the king and the judge endeavoured each to acquit one by attributing the whole blame to the other, Jeffreys asserting 'that what he did he did by express commands, and that he was not half bloody enough for the prince who sent him thither;' and the advocates of the king asserting 'that he never forgave Jeffreys executing such multitudes, contrary to his express orders.' It seems scarcely necessary to enquire on which side the truth preponderates, for as it is allowed that 'the receiver is as bad as the thief,' so it will be acknowledged that 'the instigator is as bad as the actor;' and the world, in judging of the comparative innocence of either, will rather look at that which proves the complicity of both. It is certain that the king received daily accounts of the proceedings, and did nothing to check them; that he delivered up the convicted prisoners to his courtiers (including the judge himself) to make what profit they could extort from them for their pardon; and that he welcomed the commissioners on their return from the Bloody Assize, expressing his thanks, and rewarding Jeffreys immediately by raising him to the head of the law. The Great Seal was given to him with the title of lord chancellor on September 28, 1685, less than a week after his return. (Burnet, iii. 55; Bramston, 207.)

His elevation made no change in his manners. At a dinner he gave, at which Reresby was present, he not only drank deep, but made one of his gentlemen, named Mountfort, an excellent mimic, who had been an actor, plead before him in a fictitious cause, during which heaped all the great lawyers of the age, in their tones, their actions, and their gestures, to the great diversion of the company. His intemperate habits were in no degree diminished, and the same author relates that, dining with one of the aldermen, he and Lord Treasurer Rochester got so furiously drunk that they stripped themselves to their shirts, and were with difficulty prevented from getting in that state on the signpost to drink the king's health.

In opposition to Burnet's opinion as to his legal knowledge, we have the better judgment of Sir Joseph Jekyll: and Speaker Onslow says he made a great chancellor in the business of that court, and that in more private matters he was thought an able and upright judge wherever he sat. Serjeant Davy in 1754 describes him as ever 'esteemed a great lawyer.' Even Roger North, who hated him, speaks thus favourably of him as a judge (p. 219): 'When he was in temper, and matters indifferent came before him, he became his seat of justice better than any other I ever saw in his place. He took a pleasure in mortifying fraudulent attorneys, and would deal forth his severities with a sort of majesty. He had extraordinary natural abilities, but little acquired, beyond what practice in affairs had supplied.'

In the January following his elevation he acted as high steward on the trial for high treason of Lord Delamere, who, when Mr. Booth, had formerly given too true a description of his proceedings at Chester, and was far from pleased with the acquittal. There is no doubt that soon after this Jeffreys was in some discredit at court, perhaps in consequence of the king's hearing of the extent of his pecuniary dealings with the prisoners in the west. To redeem his favour, and to aid the king's desire to introduce the Popish religion and to discover its opponents, he suggested and was made president of a new ecclesiastical commission, of which the first victim was the Bishop of London, who was suspended from his office, and under which the disgraceful proceedings against Magdalen College, Oxford, took place.

The prosecution of the seven bishops followed, for presenting a petition to the king praying that the clergy might be excused from reading the declaration which his majesty had issued proclaiming liberty of conscience. This being interpreted as seditious, a prosecution was determined on, and they were committed to the Tower. It is difficult to believe that this unwise measure could have been adopted without the concurrence and advice of the lord chancellor, the first legal functionary of the court; but he professed to Lord Clarendon that he was much troubled at the prosecution, and desired his lordship to let the bishops know his desire to be serviceable to them. This conversation, however, was after he saw the extreme unpopularity of their imprisonment, and when he wished to father it upon some other advisers, who, he said, 'would hurry the king to his destruction.' He gave a plain condemnation of his choice of the judges by asserting just before the trial that 'they were most of them rogues;' and soon after it was concluded he called them 'a thousand fools and knaves,' and Chief Justice Wright (to whose promotion to the bench he had been particularly instrumental) 'a beast.' (Clarendon's Diary, ii. 177-185.)

When King James was contemplating his departure after the arrival of the Prince of Orange, he required the chancellor to occupy

Father Petre's apartments in the palace, in order, says Barillon, to have the Great Seal near him, that he might take it with him. Accordingly Jeffreys delivered it up eight days before the king's retreat (Ibid. 223-6; Luttrell, i. 481), and, conscious of the detestation in which he was held, and the danger he ran in remaining, took means for his own escape. He disguised himself in a seaman's habit, and proceeding to Wapping to embark, he went into a cellar to take a pot. While there a scrivener came in, who, Roger North relates (p. 220), had been concerned in a Chancery suit about a 'Bummery Bird;' and one of the counsel having called him a strange fellow, who sometimes went to church, sometimes to conventicles, and it was thought he was a trimmer, the chancellor immediately fired, and cried out, 'A trimmer! I have heard much of that monster, but never saw one: come forth, Mr. Trimmer, turn round, and let me see your shape,' and rated him so long that the poor fellow was ready to drop; and when on quitting the hall he was asked how he came off, 'Came off,' said he; 'I am escaped from the terrors of that man's face, and shall have the frightful impression of it as long as I live.' The scrivener never forgot that fearful countenance, and recognising the chancellor at once under his disguise, went out and gave the alarm. The mob poured in, and he was with difficulty rescued from their fury. He was hurried, with a shouting crowd at his heels, before the lord mayor, who was so shocked at his appearance that he could not do anything, and was seized with a fit from which he never recovered. By Jeffreys' own request he was taken, in a frenzy of terror, to the Tower, guarded by two regiments of militia, whose strongest efforts could scarcely keep off the thousands who pressed around the cavalcade with execrations and threats of vengeance. (Lingard, xiii. 201; Bramston, 339; Luttrell, i. 486.) There he remained for four months, suffering much from the injuries he received from the populace in his capture, and tormented with the stone, to which he had been for some years subject. There, too, from a complication of disorders, aggravated by his drunken habits, and most probably by his recollections and his fears, he died on April 18, 1689. There also he was at first interred; but on the petition of his friends his body was removed in 1692 by warrant from Queen Mary to the church of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, where in 1810 it was discovered in a vault near the communion table, enclosed in a leaden coffin, with a plate inscribed with his name. He had formerly lived in the parish, and several members of his family were buried there. He was without hesitation excepted out of the act of indemnity, and a bill was ordered to be brought in for the forfeiture of his estate and honours, but it dropped on the dissolution of the Parliament. (Stat. Realm, vi. 178; Notes and Queries, 1st S. vii. 46.)

However forbidding a portrait may be in its prominent features, there are often some rays of light that soften the general gloom of the resemblance. Even in Jeffreys' career the circumstances attending his first marriage evidence a generous disposition in his early years; and the latter part of his life is not without some redeeming proofs of a better disposition. An instance of his gratitude is recorded in saving Sir William Clayton, to whom he owed his first advance in city honours, from being hanged, when Charles's ministry had determined to sacrifice an alderman of London for the purpose of intimidating that corporation; and, even when in the midst of his bloodiest commission, he listened with calmness to the remonstrances of a clergyman of Taunton against his proceedings, and, though they had no immediate effect on his conduct, presented him on his return to London to a canonry in Bristol Cathedral.
