inconvenience. Wherefore they, by one advice thinking it best (of good experience) for avoiding of all discord and tumult, that all manner of images should be clean taken out of all churches, and none suffered to remain, did thereupon again write their letters unto the archbishop of Canterbury, requiring his ready aid therein; in manner following :

Another Letter of the Council sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the abolishing of Images.

" AFTER our right hearty commendations to your good lordship, where now of late in the king's majesty's visitations, among other godly injunctions commanded to be generally observed through all parts of this his highness's realm, one was set forth for the taking down of all such images as had at any time been abused with pilgrimages, offerings, or censings, albeit that this said injunction hath in many parts of this realm been quietly obeyed and executed, yet in many other places much strife and contention hath risen and daily riseth, and more and more increaseth about the execution of the same; some men being so superstitious, or rather wilful, as they would by their good will retain all such images still, although they have been most manifestly abused. And in some places also the images, which by the said injunctions were taken down, be now restored and set up again; and almost in every place is contention for images, whether they have been abused or not. And while these men go on both sides contentiously to obtain their minds, contending whether this or that image hath been offered unto, kissed, censed, or otherwise abused, parts have in some places been taken in such sort, as further inconveniences be like to ensue, if remedy be not found in time. Considering therefore, that almost in no place of this realm is any sure quietness, but where all images be clean taken away and pulled down already, to the intent that all contention in every part of the realm for this matter, may be clearly taken, and that the lively image of Christ should not contend for the dead images, which be things not necessary, and without the which the churches of Christ continued most godly many years; we have thought good to signify unto you, that his highness's pleasure, with the advice and consent of us the lord protector and the rest of the council, is, that immediately upon the sight hereof, with as convenient diligence as you may, you shall not only give order that all the images remaining in any church or chapel within your diocese, be removed and taken away, but also by your letters signify unto the rest of the bishops within your province, that his highness's pleasure, for the like order to be given by them and every of them within their several dioceses. And in the execution hereof, we require both you and the rest of the said bishops to use such foresight as the same may be quietly done, with as good satisfaction of the people as may be. Thus fare your good lordship heartily well. From Somerset Place the 11th of Feb. 1548. Your lordship's assured loving friends, Edw. Somerset, Henry Arundel, Anth. Wingfield, John Russel, Tho. Semer, Wm. Paget."

When the archbishop had received these letters, he forthwith directed his precept unto Bonner bishop of London, requiring, and in the king's majesty's name commanding him, that with all speed he should as well give in charge unto the rest of the bishops within the province of Canterbury, to look immediately without delay unto the diligent and careful execution of the contents of the said letter through all places of their diocese; as also that he himself should do the like within his own city and diocese of London. Whereupon he seeming then, with like outward consent as before, to allow these doings, presently (by virtue of the said precept) did send out his Mandatum as well unto the rest of the bishops, as also again unto the bishop of Westminster, in form following:

"EDMUNDUS permissione Divina London. Episcopus per illustrissimum in Christo principem & Dominum nostrum, Dominum Edwardum sextum, Dei gratia, Angliæ, Franciæ, & Hybernæ Regem, fidei Defensorem, & in terra Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ & Hybernæ supremum caput, sufficienter & legitime authorisatus, Reverendo in Christo confratri nostro Domino Thomæ eadem permissione West. Episc. salutem & fraternam in Domino charitatem. Literas reverendissimi in Christo patris & Domini D. Tho. permissione divina Cantuar. Archiepiscopi, totius Angliæ Primatis, & Metropolitanani, tenorem literarum missarum clarissimorum & prudentissimorum dominorum de privatis consiliis dicti illustr. dom. Regis in se continen. nuper cum ea qua decuit reverentia humiliter recepimus exequend. in hæc verba. Thomas permissione divina Cantuar. &c." And then making a full recital as well of the archbishop's precept, as also of the councils letters above specified, he concluded with these words: "Quocirca nos Edmund. Episcop. antedictus, literis prædictis pro nostro officio obtemperare, uti decet, summo cupientes, vestræ fraternitati tam ex parte dicti excellentissimi Domini nostri Regis, ac præfatorum clarissimorum dominorum de privatis suis consiliis, quam prædicti Reverend. Patris Domini Cantuar. Archiepiscopi, tenore presentium committimus & mandamus, quatenus attentis & per vos diligenter consideratis literarum hujusmodi tenoribus, eos in omnibus & per omnia, juxta vim, formam, & effectum earundem, cum omni qua poteris celeritate accommoda, per totam Dioces. vestram West. debitè & effectualiter exequi faciatis & procuretis. Datum in sedibus nostris London. vicesimo die Febr. anno Dom. 1548. Et regni dicti illustrissimi domini nostri Regis, Anno secundo."

Now, by the time that these things were thus determined, the learned men which the king had appointed to assemble together for the true and right manner of administering the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ according to the rule of the scriptures of God, and first usage of the primitive Church, after their long, learned, wise, and deliberate advices, did finally conclude and agree upon one godly and uniform order of receiving the same, not much differing from the manner at this present used and authorized within this realm and Church of England, commonly called the Communion. Which agreement being by them exhibited unto the king, and of him most gladly accepted, was thereupon publicly imprinted, and by his majesty's council particularly divided and sent unto every bishop of the realm, requiring and commanding them by their letters on the king's majesty's behalf, that both they in their own persons should forthwith have diligent and careful respect to the due execution thereof, and also should with all diligence cause the books which they then sent them, to be delivered unto every parson, vicar, and curate within their diocese, that they likewise might well and sufficiently advise themselves for the better distribution of the same communion (according to the tenor of the said book) against the feast of Easter then next ensuing, as more fully appeareth by these their letters here following.

"AFTER our most hearty commendations unto your lordship, where in the parliament late holden at Westminster, it was amongst other things most godly established, that according to the first institution and use of the primitive church, the most holy sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ should be distributed to the people under the kinds of bread and wine, according to the effect whereof of the king's majesty minding, with the advice and consent of the lord protector's grace and the rest of the council, to have the said statute well executed in such sort, or like as is agreeable with the word of God (so the same may be also faithfully and reverently received of his most loving subjects, to their comforts and wealth) hath caused sundry of his majesty's most grave and well learned prelates, and other learned men in the scriptures, to assemble themselves for this matter: who, after long conference together, have with deliberate advice finally agreed upon such an order to be used in all places of the king's majesty's dominions in the distribution of the said most holy sacrament, as may appear to you by the book thereof which we send herewith unto you. Albeit, knowing your lordship's knowledge in the scriptures, and earnest good will and zeal to the setting forth of all things, according to the truth thereof, we be well assured, you will of your own good will, and upon respect to your duty, diligently set forth this most godly-order here agreed upon, and commanded to be used by the authority of the king's majesty: yet remembering the crafty practice of the devil, who ceases not by his members, to work by all ways and means, the hinderance of all godliness; and considering furthermore, that a great number of the curates of the realm, either for lack of knowledge cannot, or for want of good mind will not be so ready to set forth the same, as we would wish, and as the importance of the matter and their own bounden duties requires, we have thought good to pray and require your lordship, and nevertheless, in the king's majesty's our most dread lord's name, to command you to have an earnest diligence and careful respect both in your own person, and by all your officers and ministers also, to cause these books to be delivered to every parson, vicar, and curate within your diocese, with such diligence as they may have sufficient time well to instruct and advise themselves, for the distribution of the most holy Communion, according to the order of this book, before this Easter time, and that they may by your good means, be well directed to use such good, gentle and charitable instruction of their simple and unlearned parishioners, as may be to all their good satisfactions as much as may be, praying you to consider, that this order is set forth, to the intent there should be in all parts of the realm, and among all men one uniform manner quietly used. The execution whereof, like as it shall stand very much in the diligence of you and others of your vocation; so do we afterwards require you to have a diligent respect thereunto, as ye tender the king's majesty's pleasure, and will answer for the contrary. And thus we bid your lordship right heartily farewell. From Westminster the 13th of March, 1548.—Your lordship's loving friends, Tho. Canterbury, R. Rich, Wm. Saint John, John Russell, Hen. Arundel, Anthony Wingfield, William Peter, Edward North, Edward Wootton."

By means as well of this Letter, and the godly order of the learned, as also of the statute and act of parliament before mentioned, made for the establishing thereof, all private blasphemous masses were now by just authority fully abolished throughout this realm of England, and the right use of the sacrament of the most precious body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ truly restored instead of the same. But nevertheless, as at no time any thing can be so well done of the godly, but that the wicked will find some means subtilly to deface the same: so likewise at this present, through the perverse obstinacy and dissembling frowardness of many the inferior priests and ministers of the cathedral, and other churches of this realm, there did arise a marvellous schism and variety of fashions in celebrating the common service and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the church. For some, zealously allowing the king's proceedings, did gladly follow the order thereof; and others, though not so willingly admitting them, did yet dissemblingly and patchingly use some part of them; but many, carelessly contemning all, would still exercise their old wonted popery.

Whereof the king and his council having good intelligence, and fearing the great inconveniences and dangers that might happen through this division, and being there withal loth at the first to use any great severity towards his subjects, but rather desirous by some quiet and godly order to bring them to some conformity, did by their prudent advices again appoint the archbishop of Canterbury, with certain of the best learned and discreet bishops and other learned men, diligently to consider and ponder the premises: and thereupon, having as well an eye and respect unto the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the holy scriptures, as also to the usages of the primitive church, to draw and make one convenient and meet order, rite, and fashion of common prayer, and administration of the sacraments, to be had and used within this his realm of England, and the dominions of the same. Who after most godly and learned conferences, through the aid of the Holy Ghost, with one uniform agreement did conclude, set forth, and deliver unto the king's highness, a book in English, intituled, 'A Book of the Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the church, after the use of the church of England.' The which his highness receiving, with great comfort and quietness of mind, did forthwith exhibit unto the lords and commons of the parliament then assembled at Westminster, about the 4th of November, in the 2nd year of his reign, and in the year of our Lord 1548, and continuing unto the 14th day of March, then next ensuing.

Whereupon, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of the said parliament assembled, well and thoroughly considering, as well the most godly travel of the king's highness, of the lord protector, and other of his majesty's council, in gathering together the said archbishop, bishops, and other learned men, as the godly prayers, orders, rites, and ceremonies in the said book mentioned, with the consideration of altering those things which were altered, and retaining those things which were retained in the same book; as also the honour of God, and great quietness, which by the grace of God should ensue upon that one and uniform rite and order in such common prayer, rites, and external ceremonies to be used throughout England, Wales, Calice, and the Marches of the same, did first give unto his highness most lowly and hearty thanks for the same, and then most humbly prayed him that it might be ordained, and enacted by his majesty with the assent of the lords and commons in that parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that not only all and singular person and persons that had hithertofore offended concerning the premises others than such as were then remaining in ward in the Tower of London, (or in the Fleet) might be pardoned thereof, but also that all and singular ministers in any cathedral or parish churches or other places within the realm of England, Wales, Calice, and the marches of the same, or other the king's dominions, should from and after the feast of Pentecost next coming, be bound to say and use the matins, evensong, celebration of the Lord's Supper, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all other common and open prayer, in such order and form as was mentioned in the said book, and none other or otherwise. And albeit that they were so godly and good, that they gave occasion unto every honest and conformable man most willingly to embrace them; yet lest any obstinate persons, who willingly would disturb so godly an order and quiet in this realm, should go unpunished, they further requested, that it might be ordained and enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any manner of parson, vicar, or whatsoever other minister that ought or should say or sing, common prayer, mentioned in the said book, or minister the Sacraments, should after the said feast of Pentecost, then next coming, refuse to use the said common prayer, or to minister the Sacraments in such cathedral or parish churches, or other places, as he should use or minister the same, in such order and form as they were mentioned, and set forth in the said book; or should use wilfully, and obstinately standing in the same, any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of mass, openly or privily, or matins, even-song, administration of the Sacraments, or other open prayer than was mentioned, and set forth in the said book; or should preach, declare, or speak any thing in the derogation or depraving of the said book, or any thing therein contained, or of any part thereof, and should be thereof lawfully convicted according to the laws of this realm by verdict of twelve men, or by his own confession, or by the notorious evidence of the fact, should lose and forfeit, unto the king's highness, his heirs and successors, for his first offence one whole year's profit of such one of his benefices or spiritual promotions, as it should please the king's highness to assign and appoint; and also for the same offence should suffer imprisonment by the space of six months without bail or mainprize. But if any such person, after his first conviction, should afterwards offend again, and be thereof in form aforesaid lawfully convicted, then he should for his second offence suffer imprisonment by the space of one whole year, and should also be deprived, ipso facto, of all his spiritual promotions for ever, so that it should be lawful for the patrons and donors thereof to give the same again unto any other learned man, in like manner as if the said party so offending were dead. And if any the said person or persons should again the third time offend, and be thereof in form aforesaid lawfully convicted, then he should for the same third offence suffer imprisonment during his life. If any such person or persons aforesaid, so offending had not any benefice or spiritual promotion, that then he should for his first offence suffer imprisonment by the space of six months without bail or mainprize, and for his second offence imprisonment during his life. Which request, or rather actual agreement of the lords and commons of the parliament, being once understood of the king, was also soon ratified and confirmed by his regal consent and authority, and thereupon the said book of common prayer was presently imprinted, and commanded to be exercised throughout the whole realm and dominions thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the said statute.

Moreover in the same session of the said parliament it was enacted and established by the authority thereof; That for as much as great, horrible, and not to be rehearsed inconveniences had from time to time risen amongst the priests, ministers, and other officers of the clergy, through their compelled chastity, and by such laws as prohibited them the godly and lawful use of marriage, that therefore all and every law and laws positive, canons, constitutions, and ordinances theretofore made by the authority of man only, which did prohibit or forbid marriage to any ecclesiastical or spiritual person or persons, of what estate, condition or degree soever they were, or by what name or names they were called, which by God's law, may lawfully marry, in all and every article, branch and sentence concerning only the prohibition of the marriage of the persons aforesaid, should be utterly void and of none effect. And that all manner of forfeitures, pains, penalties, crimes or actions which were in the said laws contained, and of the same did follow, concerning the prohibition of the marriage of the said ecclesiastical persons, should be thenceforth also clearly and utterly void, frustrate and of none effect. By occasion whereof, it was thence after right lawful for any ecclesiastical person, not having the gift of chastity, most godly to live in the pure and holy estate of matrimony according to the laws and word of God. But if the first injunctions, statutes, and decrees of the prince were of many but slenderly regarded, with much less good affection were these (especially the book of common prayer) of divers now received; yea, and that of some of them, which had always before in outward shew willingly allowed the former doings, as appeareth most plainly (amongst others) by Bonner the bishop of London. Who although, by his former letters, and other mandates, he seemed hitherto to favour all the king's proceedings; yet did he at that present (notwithstanding both the first statute for the establishing of the communion, and the abolishing of all private masses, and also this statute of the ratifying and confirming of the book of common prayer) still suffer sundry idolatrous private masses of peculiar names, as the apostles mass, the lady's mass, and such like) to be daily solemnly sung within certain peculiar chapels of the cathedral church of Paul's, cloaking them with the names of the apostles communion, and our lady's communion, not once finding any fault therewith, until such time as the lords of the council, having intelligence thereof, were fain by their letters to command and charge him to look better thereunto. And then being therewith somewhat pricked forwards (perhaps by fear) he was content to direct his letters unto the dean and chapter of his cathedral church of Paul's, thereby requesting them forthwith to take such order therein, as in the tenor of the council's said letters, therewith sent unto them, did import. Both which letters I have, for the more credit, here following inserted.

A Letter directed from the King's Council to Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, for abrogating of private Masses, namely, the Apostles Mass, within the Church of St. Paul, used under the name of the Apostles Communion.

"After hearty commendations: having very credible notice that within that your cathedral church there be as yet the apostles mass, and our lady's mass, and other masses of such peculiar names, under the defence and continuation of our lady's communion, and the apostles communion, used in private chapels and other remote places of the same, and not in the chancel, contrary unto the king's majesty's proceedings, the same being for the misuse displeasing to God; for the place Paul's, in example not tolerable; for the fondness of the name, a scorn to the reverence of the communion of the Lord's body and blood: we for the augmentation of God's honour and glory, and the consonance of his majesty's laws, and the avoiding of murmur, have thought good to will and command you, that from henceforth no such masses in this manner be in your church any longer used, but that the holy blessed communion, according to the act of parliament, be ministered at the high altar of the church, and in no other places of the same, and only at such time as your high masses were wont to be used, except some number of people desire for their necessary business to have a communion in the morning, and yet the same to be executed in the chancel at the high altar, as it is appointed in the book of the public service, without cautele or digresion from the common order. And herein you shall not only satisfy our expectation of your conformity in all lawful things, but also avoid the murmur of sundry that be therewith justly offended. And so we bid your lordship heartily farewell. From Richmond, the 24th of June, Ann. 1549. Your loving friends, Edward Somerset, Wm. Saint John, Edmund Montague, R. Rich, chancellor. Francis Shrewsbury, Wm. Cecil."

Bonner's Letter to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

"To my right worshipful friends, and most loving good brethren, master Dean of Paul's, with all the Canons, Residentaries, Prebendaries, Subdeans and Ministers of the same, and every of them with speed:

"Right worshipful, with most hearty commendations. So it is, this Wednesday the 26th of June, going to dinner, I received letters from the king's council by a pursuivant, and the same I do send now herewith unto you, to the intent you may peruse them well, and proceed accordingly; praying you in case all be not present, yet those that be now resident and supplying the places, may in their absence call the company together of the church, and make declaration hereof unto them: thus committing you to God, right well to fare. Written with speed this 26th of June, at one of the clock. Your loving brother, Ed. London."

Over and besides all this, the Lord Protector, with the residue of the king's privy and learned council assembling together in the Star-Chamber about the same matter, that is, for the advancement and setting forward of the king's so godly proceedings, called before them all the justices of peace, where was uttered unto them by the lord Rich, then lord chancellor, an eloquent and learned admonition, the tenor whereof ensueth:

"It hath been used and accustomed before this time, to call at certain times the justices of peace before the king's majesty's council, to give unto them admonition or warning, diligently, as is their duty, to look to the observing of such things as be committed to their charges, according to the trust which the king's majesty hath in them. Howbeit, now at this time we call you before us, not only of custom, but rather of necessity. For hearing daily, and perceiving of necessity, as we do, the great negligence, and the little heed which is taken and given to the observing of the good and wholesome laws and orders in this realm, whereupon much disorder doth daily ensue, and the king's majesty's proclamations and orders taken by the council, as we are advertised, not executed, the people are brought to disobedience, and in a manner all his majesty's study and ours, in setting a good and most godly stay, to the honour of God and the quiet of the realm, is spent in vain, and come to nothing: the which as we have great hope and trust not to be altogether so, yet so much as it is, and so much as it lacketh of the keeping the realm in a most godly order and stay, we must needs impute and lay the fault thereof in you which are the justices of peace in every shire, to whom we are wont to direct our writings, and to whose trust and charge the king's majesty hath committed the execution of all his proclamations, of his acts of parliament, and of his laws.—We are informed that many of you are so negligent and so slack herein, that it doth appear you do look rather, as it were, through your fingers, than diligently see to the execution of the said laws and proclamations. For if you would, according to your duties, to your oath, to the trust which the king's majesty hath in you, give your diligence and care toward the execution of the same most godly statutes and injunctions, there should no disobedience, nor disorder, nor evil rule be begun or rise in any part of the realm, but it should by and by be repressed, kept down and reformed. But it is feared, and the thing itself giveth occasion thereto, that divers of you do not only not set forth, but rather hinder, so much as lieth in you, the king's majesty's proceedings, and are content that there should arise some disobedience, and that men should repine against godly orders set forth by his majesty, you do so slackly look to the execution of the same, so that in some shires, which be further off, it may appear that the people have never heard of divers of his majesty's proclamations, or if they have heard, you are content to wink at it, and to neglect it, so that it is all one as though it were never commanded. But if you do consider and remember your duties first to Almighty God, and then to the king's majesty, the wealth of the whole realm, and the safeguard of your own selves; you must needs see, that except such orders as the king's majesty hath set and hereafter shall appoint, be kept, neither can the realm be defended, if the enemy should invade, nor can it in peace stand, but upon the contempt of good and wholesome laws all disorder and inconveniences will come, the people will be wild and savage, and no man sure of his own.—If at any time there was occasion and cause to be circumspect and diligent about the same, there was never more time than now. How we stand in Scotland you know, and that there foreign power maketh great preparation to aid them, and indeed doth come to their aid; whereof we are surely informed and certified. Wherefore if there should not be good order and obedience kept in the realm, the realm were like utterly to be destroyed. Never foreign power could yet hurt, or in any part prevail in this realm, but by disobedience and disorder within ourselves. That is the way wherewith God will plague us, if he mind to punish us. And so long as we do agree among ourselves, and be obedient to our prince, and to his godly orders and laws, we may be sure that God is with us, and that foreign powers shall not prevail against us, nor hurt us.—Wherefore once again, and still we must and do lay this charge upon you that are the better of the shire, and justices of peace, that with so convenient speed as you can, you do repair down into your countries, and you shall give warning to the gentlemen of the shire, which have not necessary business here, that they repair down each man to his country, and there both you and they, who be reckoned the stay of every shire, to see good order and rule kept: You, that your sessions of gaol delivery and quarter sessions be well kept, and therein your meetings be such, that justice may be well and truly ministered, the offenders and malefactors punished according to the laws of this realm without any fear of any man, or that for favour you should suffer those to escape, which with their evil example might bring other to the like mishap, and that all vagabonds and lewd and light tale-tellers, and seditious bearers of false news of the king's majesty or of his council, or such as will preach without licence, be immediately by you repress and punished.—And if there should chance any lewd or light fellows to make any routs or riots, or unlawful assemblies, any seditious meetings, uproars, or uprisings in any place by the seditious and devilish motion of some privy traitors, that you and they appease them at the first, and apprehend the first author and causer thereof, and certify us with speed. The lightness of the rude and ignorant people must be repress and ordered by your gravity and wisdom. And here you may not, if any such thing chance, dissemble with those such lewd men, and hide yourselves, for it shall be required of you if such disorder be; and surely without your aid and help, or your dissembling, such disorder cannot be. Nor do we say that we fear any such thing, or that there is any such thing likely to chance; but we give you warning before, lest it should chance.—We have too much experience in this realm, what inconvenience cometh of such matters. And though some light persons in their rage do not consider, yet we do not doubt but you weigh it and know it well enough. And if it should chance our enemies, who are maintained by other foreign power, and the bishop of Rome, should suddenly arrive in some place in England, either driven by tempest, or of purpose to do hurt, ye should see such order kept by firing of the beacons, as hath already been written unto you by our letters, to repulse the same in so good array as you can, as we do not doubt but you will for the safeguard of your country, so that the enemy shall have little joy of his coming; and for that purpose you shall see diligently that men have horse, harness, and other furniture of weapon ready, according to the statutes and good orders of the realm, and the king's majesty's commandments. And so for this time ye may depart."

What zealous care was in this young king, and in the Lord Protector his uncle, concerning Reformation of Christ's Church, and sincere religion, by these Injunctions, Letters, Precepts, and Exhortations, as well to the bishops, as to the justices of the realm above premised, it may right well appear. Wherby we have to note, not so much the careful diligence of the king and his learned council; as the lingering slackness and drawing back, on the other side, of divers the said justices, and lawyers, but especially of bishops and old popish curates, by whose cloaked contempt, wilful winking, and stubborn disobedience, the book of the common prayer was, long after the publishing thereof, either not known at all, or else very irreverently used through many places of the realm. Which when the king by complaint of divers perfectly understood, being not a little aggrieved to see the godly agreement of the learned, the willing consent of the parliament, and his grace's own zealous desire, to take so small effect among his subjects; he decreed presently, with the advice of his whole council, again to write unto all the bishops of his realm, for speedy and diligent redress thein; willing and commanding them thereby, that as well they themselves should thenceforth have a more special regard to the due execution of the premises, as also that all others, within their several precincts and jurisdictions, should by their good instructions and willing example be the more oftener, and with better devotion, moved to use and frequent the same. As further appeareth by the contents of this Letter here ensuing:

Another Letter directed by the King and his Council, to Bonner, Bishop of London, partly rebuking him of Negligence, partly charging him to see to the better setting out of the Service Book within his Diocese.

“RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well: and whereas after great and serious debating and long conference of the bishops and other grave and well-learned men in the holy scriptures, one uniform order for common prayers and administration of the sacraments hath been, and is most godly set forth, not only by the common agreement and full assent of the nobility and commons of the late session of our late parliament, but also by the like assent of the bishops in the same parliament, and of all other the learned men of this our realm in their synods and convocations provincial: like as it was much to our comfort, to understand the godly travel then diligently and willingly taken for the true opening of things mentioned in the said book, whereby the true service and honour of Almighty God, and the right ministration of the sacraments being well and sincerely set forth, according to the scriptures and use of the primitive church, much idolatry, vain superstition, and great and slanderous abuses be taken away: so it is no small occasion of sorrow unto us, to understand by the complaints of many, that our said book so much travelled for, and also sincerely set forth, as is aforesaid, remaineth in many places of this our realm, either not known at all, or not used, or at the least if it be used, very seldom, and that in such light and irreverent sort, as the people in many places either have heard nothing, or if they hear, they neither understand, nor have that spiritual delectation in the same, that to good Christians appertaineth. The fault whereof, like as we must of reason impute to you and others of your vocation, called by God, through our appointment, to due respect to this and such like matters; so considering that, by these and such like occasions, our loving subjects remain yet still in their blindness, and superstitious errors, and in some places in as irreligious forgetfulness of God, whereby his wrath may be provoked upon us and them; and remembering withal, that amongst other cures committed to our princely charge, we think this the greatest, to see the glory and true service of him maintained and extolled, by whose clemency we knowledge ourselves to have all that we have, we could not but by advice and consent of our dearest uncle, Edward duke of Somerset, governor of our person, and protector of our realm, dominions and subjects, and the rest of our privy council, admonish you of the premises. Wherein, as it had been your office to have used an earnest diligence, and to have preferred the same in all places within your diocese, as the case required; so have we thought good to pray and require you, and nevertheless straitly to charge and command you, that from henceforth ye have an earnest and special regard to the reduce of these things, so as the curates may do their duties more often and in more reverent sort, and the people be occasioned by the good advices and examples of yourself, your chancellor, archdeacons, and other interior ministers, to come with oftener and more devotion to their said common prayers, to give thanks to God, and to be partakers of the most holy communion. Wherein shewing yourself diligent, and giving good example in your own person, you shall both discharge your duty to the great Pastor, to whom we all have to account, and also do us good service: and on the other side, if we shall hereafter, these our letters and commandment notwithstanding, hear oftsoons complaint, and find the like fault in your diocese, we shall have just cause to impute the fault thereof, and of all that ensueth thereof, unto you, and consequently be occasioned thereby to see otherwise to the redress of these things; whereof we would be sorry. And therefore we do oftsoons charge and command you, upon your allegiance, to look well upon your duty herein, as ye tender our pleasure. Given under our signet at our manor of Richmond, the 23d of July, the third year of our reign, 1549.”

The bishop of London, amongst the rest of the bishops, receiving these Letters, did, as always before, in outward shew willingly accept the same; and therefore immediately with the said letters directed this his precept unto the dean and chapter of his cathedral church, of Paul's, commanding them to look to the due accomplishing thereof accordingly.

A Letter of Bonner, to the Dean and Chapter of Pauls.

“EDMUND by the grace of God, &c. To my well-beloved brethren the dean and chapter of the cathedral church of Saint Paul in London, and to the other ministers there and every of them do send greeting. And where it is so, that of late I have received the said sovereign lord the king's majesty's letters, of such tenor as is hereunto annexed, and according to my most bounden duty am right well willing, and desiring that the said letters should be in all points duly executed and observed according to the tenor and purport of the same, as appertaineth: these therefore are to require, and also straitly to charge you and every of you on his majesty's behalf, &c. that you do admonish and command or cause to be admonished or commanded, all and singular persons, vicars, and curates of your jurisdiction, to observe and accomplish the same from time to time accordingly; furthermore requiring and likewise charging you, and every of you to make certificate herein to me, my chancellor or other my officers in this behalf, with such convenient celerity as appertaineth, both of your proceedings in the execution hereof, and also the persons and names of all such, as from henceforth shall be found negligent in doing their duties in the premises or any of them. Given at my house at Fulham, the 26th of July, 1549."

Moreover, forasmuch as the king at that instant hearing the muttering of certain rebellion then stirring, (whereof more shall be said, the Lord willing, hereafter) and also being credibly informed by divers, that through the evil example, slackness of preaching and administering the sacraments, and careless contempt of Bonner bishop of London, not only many of the people within the city of London, and other places of his diocese, were very negligent and forgetful of their duties to God, in frequenting the divine service then established and set forth by the authority of parliament, but also that divers other, utterly despising the same, did in secret places of his diocese often frequent the popish mass and other foreign rites not allowed by the laws of this realm, he thought it therefore good (having thereby just cause to suspect his former dissenting doubleness) to appoint the lord protector and the rest of his privy council to call the said bishop before them, and according to their wise and discreet judgments to deal with him for the same.

WHEREUPON the 11th day of August, 1549, they sent a messenger for him, and upon his appearance made first declaration of such informations and complaints as had been heretofore made against him. And then, after sharp admonitions and reproofs for his evil demeanours in the premises, they delivered unto him from the king (for his better reformation and amendment) certain private injunctions to be necessarily followed and observed of himself. And whereas, in the first branch of the said injunctions, he was personally assigned to preach at Paul's Cross the Sunday three weeks then next ensuing (because both the dangerous and sickly estate of the time, and also partly his own suspicious behaviour so required) they further delivered unto him in writing such articles to intreat upon in his sermon, as they thought then most meet and necessary for the time and causes aforesaid. All which injunctions and articles, for the further manifestation thereof, I have here inserted as followeth.

Certain private Injunctions and Articles given to Bonner by the Council.

"FORASMUCH as we are advertised, that amongst other disorders of our subjects at this present there be divers of our city of London, and other places within your diocese, which being very negligent and forgetful of their duty to Almighty God, of whom all good things are to be looked for, do assemble themselves very seldom, and fewer times than they were heretofore accustomed, unto common prayer and to the holy communion, being now a time when it were more needful with heart and mind to pray to our heavenly Father for his aid and succour; whereof as we be right sorry, so we do understand that through your evil example, and the slackness of your preaching and instructing of our said people to do their duties, this offence to God is most generally committed. For where heretofore upon all principal feasts, and such as were called mojus duplex, you yourself were wont to execute in person, now since the time that we by the advice of our whole parliament have set a most godly and devout order in our Church of England and Ireland, ye have very seldom or never executed upon such or other days, to the contempt of our proceedings and evil example of others. And for so much as it is also brought to our knowledge, that divers as well in London, as in other places of your diocese, do frequent and haunt foreign rites of masses, and such as be not allowed by the orders of our realm, and do contemn and forbear to praise and laud God, and pray unto his majesty after such rites and ceremonies, as in this realm are approved and set out by our authority; and further that adultery and fornication is maintained and kept openly and commonly in the said city of London and other places of your diocese, whereby the wrath of God is provoked against our people; of the which things you being heretofore admonished, yet hitherto have made no redress, as to the pastoral office, authority and cure of a bishop doth appertain; we therefore, to whom the supreme cure and charge of this church doth appertain, to avoid from us the high indignation of Almighty God, by the advice of our most entirely beloved uncle the lord protector and the rest of our privy council, have thought it no less than our most bounden duty, now at this present, and oftsoons peremptorily to admonish, charge, and warn you, that you do most straightly look upon the premises, and see them so reformed that there may appear no negligence on your behalf, upon such pain as by our laws ecclesiastical and temporal we may inflict upon you, unto deprivation or otherwise, as shall seem to us for quality of the offence reasonable. And to the intent you should the better see to the reformation of the said abuses, we have thought good to give you these injunctions following:

1. Ye shall preach at Paul's Cross in London, in proper person, the Sunday after the date hereof three weeks, and in the same sermon declare and set forth the articles hereunto annexed: and ye shall preach hereafter once every quarter of the year there, exhorting in your sermon the people to obedience, prayer, and godly living; and ye shall be present at every sermon hereafter made at Paul's Cross, if sickness or some other reasonable cause do not let you.
2. You yourself in person shall

the. ein ; willing and commanding them thereby, that as well they themselves should thenceforth have a more special regard to the due execution of the premises, as also that all others, within their several precincts and jurisdictions, should by their good instructions and willing example be the more oftener, and with better devotion, moved to use and frequent the same. As further appeareth by the contents of this Letter here ensuing :

Another Letter directed by the King and his Council, to Bonner, Bishop of London, partly rebuking him of Negligence, partly charging him to see to the better setting out of the Service Book within his Diocese.

“ RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-belovcd, we greet you well: and whereas after great and serious debating and long conference of the bishops and other grave and well-learned men in the holy scriptures, one uniform order for common prayers and administration of the sacraments hath been, and is most godly set forth, not only by the common agreement and full assent of the nobility and commons of the late session of our late parliament, but also by the like assent of the bishops in the same parliament, and of all other the learned men of this our realm in their synods and convocations provincial: like as it was much to our comfort, to understand the godly travel then diligently and willingly taken for the true opening of things mentioned in the said book, whereby the true service and honour of Almighty God, and the right ministration of the sacraments being well and sincerely set forth, according to the scriptures and use of the primitive church, much idolatry, vain superstition, and great and slanderous abuses be taken away: so it is no small occasion of sorrow unto us, to understand by the complaints of many, that our said book so much travelled for, and also sincerely set forth, as is aforesaid, remaineth in many places of this our realm, either not known at all, or not used, or at the least if it be used, very seldom, and that in such light and irreverent sort, as the people in many places either have heard nothing, or if they hear, they neither understand, nor have that spiritual delectation in the same, that to good Christians appertaineth. The fault whereof, like as we must of reason impute to you and others of your vocation, called by God, through our appointment, to due respect to this and such like matters; so considering that, by these and such like occasions, our loving subjects remain yet still in their blindness, and superstitious errors, and in some places in as irreligious forgetfulness of God, whereby his wrath may be provoked upon us and them; and remembering withal, that amongst other cures committed to our princely charge, we think this the greatest, to see the glory and true service of him maintained and extolled, by whose clemency we knowledge ourselves to have all that we have, we could not but by advice and consent of our dearest uncle, Edward

duke of Somerset, governor of our person, and protector of our realm, dominions and subjects, and the rest of our privy council, admonish you of the premises. Wherein, as it had been your office to have used an earnest diligence, and to have preferred the same in all places within your diocese, as the case required; so have we thought good to pray and require you, and nevertheless straitly to charge and command you, that from henceforth ye have an earnest and special regard to the reduce of these things, so as the curates may do their duties more often and in more reverent sort, and the people be occasioned by the good advices and examples of yourself, your chawcellor, archdeacons, and other interior ministers, to come with oftener and more devotion to their said common prayers, to give thanks to God, and to be partakers of the most holy communion. Wherein shewing yourself diligent, and giving good example in your own person, you shall both discharge your duty to the great Pastor, to whom we all have to account, and also do us good service: and on the other side, if we shall hereafter, these our letters and commandment notwithstanding, hear oftsoons complaint, and find the like fault in your diocese, we shall have just cause to impute the fault thereof, and of all that ensueth thereof, unto you, and consequently be occasioned thereby to see otherwise to the redress of these things; whereof we would be sorry. And therefore we do oftsoons charge and command you, upon your allegiance, to look well upon your duty herein, as ye tender our pleasure. Given under our signet at our manor of Richmond, the 23d of July, the third year of our reign, 1549.”

The bishop of London, amongst the rest of the bishops, receiving these Letters, did, as always before, in outward shew willingly accept the same; and therefore immediately with the said letters directed this his precept unto the dean and chapter of his cathedral church, of Paul's, commanding them to look to the due accomplishing thereof accordingly.

from henceforth every day which heretofore was accounted in this Church of England a principal feast, or major duplex, and at all such times as the bishops of London your predecessors were wont to celebrate and sing high mass, now celebrate and execute the communion at the high altar in Paul's, for the better example of all other, except sickness do let.

3. Ye shall yourself, according to your duty and the office of a bishop, call before you all such as do not come unto and frequent the common prayer and service in the church, or do not come unto God's board, and receive the communion at the least once a year, or whosoever do frequent or go unto any other rite or service than is appointed by our book, either of matins, evensong or mass in any church, chapel, or other private places within your diocese, and ye shall see all such offenders convented before you and punished, according unto the ecclesiastical laws, with severe and straight punishment therefore. Likewise ye shall see one only order used in your diocese according to our said book and none other.

4. Ye shall both by yourself, and all your officers under you, search out and convent before you more diligently than heretofore ye have done, (as appertaineth to your office, all adulterers, and see the same punished according to the ecclesiastical laws, and the authority given you in that behalf.

5. We have heard also complaints, that the Church of Paul's and other churches of London are of late more neglected, as well in reparation of the glass, as other buildings and ornaments of the same, than they were heretofore wont, and that divers and many persons in the City of malice deny the payment of their due tithes to their curates, whereby the curates are both injured and made not so well able, and in manner discouraged to do their duties. The which thing also our will and commandment is, ye shall diligently look unto, and see redressed as appertaineth.

6. And for so much as all these complaints be made, as most done and committed in London, to the intent you may look more earnestly, better, and more diligently to the reformation of them, our pleasure is that you shall abide and keep residence in your house there, as in the city, see, and principal place of your diocese, and none otherwhere for a certain time, until you shall be otherwise licensed by us."

Special Points and Articles to be entreated of by Bonner Bishop of London, in his Sermon.

1. "THAT all such as rebel against their prince get unto them damnation, and those that resist the higher power, resist the ordinances of God, and he that dieth therefore in rebellion, by the word of God is utterly damned, and so loseth both body and soul. And therefore those rebels in Devonshire and Cornwall, in Norfolk, or elsewhere, who take upon them to assemble a power and force against their king and prince, against the laws and statutes of the realm, and go about to subvert the state and order of the commonwealth, not only do deserve therefore death as traitors and rebels, but do accumulate to themselves eternal damnation, even to be in the burning fire of hell, with Lucifer, the father, and first author of pride, disobedience, and rebellion, what pretences soever they have, and what masses or holy water soever they pretend, or go about to make among themselves, as Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, for rebellion against Moses, were swallowed down alive into hell, although they pretended to sacrifice unto God.

2. Likewise in the order of the church, and external rites and ceremonies of divine service, inasmuch as God requireth humility of heart, innocency of living, knowledge of him, charity and love towards our neighbours, and obedience to his word, and to his ministers and superior powers, these we must bring to all our prayers, to all our service, and this is that sacrifice which Christ requireth, and these be those that make all things pleasant unto God. The external rites and ceremonies be but exercises of our religion, and appointable by superior powers; in chusing whereof we must obey the magistrates: The which things also we do see ever have been and shall be (as the time and place is) divers, and yet all hath pleased God, so long as these before spoken inward things be there. If any man shall use the old rites, and thereby disobey the superior power, the devotion of his ceremonies is made naught by his disobedience: so that which else (so long as the law did so stand) might be good, by pride and disobedience now is made naught: as Saul's sacrifice, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and Aaron's two children were. But whose joineth to devotion obedience, he winneth the garland. For else it is a zeal sed non secundum scientiam; a will, desire, zeal and devotion, but not after wisdom; that is, a foolish devotion, which can require no thanks or praise. And yet again, where ye obey, ye must have devotion, for God requireth the heart more than the outward doings, and therefore he that taketh the communion, or saith or heareth the service appointed by the king's majesty, must bring devotion and inward prayers with him, or else his prayers are but vain, lacking that which God requireth, that is, the heart and mind to pray to him.

3. Further, ye shall for example on Sunday come seventh night after the foresaid date celebrate the communion at Paul's Church.

4. Ye shall also set forth in your sermon, that our authority of royal power is (as of truth it is) of no less authority and force in this our young age, than is or was of any our predecessors, though the same were much elder, as may appear by example of Josias and other young kings in scripture; and therefore all our subjects to be no less bound to the obedience of our precepts, laws, and statutes, than if we were of 30 or 40 years of age."

The delivery of these Injunctions and Articles unto the Bishop (with the time of his appointed preaching) was soon after known abroad among the citizens and other the commons within the city of London, so that every man expected the time thereof, wishing to hear the same. Which time being once come, the Bishop, according to the tenor of the Injunctions, publicly preached at the cross of Paul's the first day of September. Howbeit as hypocrisy never lurketh so secretly in the hearts of the wicked, but that at one time or other God in his most righteous judgement maketh it open unto the world: so at this present was that long coloured perverse obstinacy, and the infestered hatred of this double-faced dissembler against the king's godly proceedings, most plainly manifested by his disobedient demeanor in this his sermon.—For whereas he was commanded to entreat only upon such special points as were mentioned in his articles; he yet, both besides the council's commandment, to the withdrawing of the minds of the common people, inasmuch as in him lay, from the right and true understanding of the holy sacrament ministered in the holy communion then set forth by the authority of the king's majesty (according to the true sense of the holy scripture) did spend most part of his sermon about the gross, carnal, and papistical presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and also contrary thereunto did not only slenderly touch the rest of his articles, but of a rebellious and wilful carelessness did utterly leave out unspoken the whole last article, concerning the as effectual and as lawful authority of the king's highness during his young age, as if he were thirty or forty years old; notwithstanding the same (because it was the traitorous opinion of the popish rebels) was by special commandment chiefly appointed him to entreat upon.

This contemptuous and disobedient dealing as it greatly offended most of the king's faithful and loving subjects there present, so did it much mislike the minds, and was far from the good expectation, as well of that faithful and godly preacher master John Hooper, afterwards bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, and lastly a most constant martyr for the gospel of Christ, and also of master Wm. Latimer, bachelor of divinity: and therefore they well weighing the foulness of the fact, and their bounden allegiances unto their prince, did thereupon exhibit unto the king's highness, under both their names, a bill of complaint or denunciation against the said Bishop in form following:

The Denunciation of John Hooper and William Latimer against Bonner to the king's Majesty, for leaving undone the Points aforementioned, which he was charged to preach upon.

"In most humble wise sheweth unto your majesty William Latimer and John Hooper, that where of late, as we be certainly informed from your majesty, by the hand of the right high and noble prince Edward, duke of Somerset, governor of your royal person, and protector of all your highness's realms, dominions and subjects, and the rest of your privy council, there were certain Injunctions given to the Bishop of London that now is, with Articles to be insinuated and preached unto your subjects at a certain day limited, the which Injunctions and Articles did only tend to the honour of God, and the better instructions of your highness's people to obedience and hatred of rebellion and mutiny, wherewith of late this your majesty's realm hath been marvellously vexed, to the danger of your highness's person, and the state of the whole realm, and therefore a thing at this time most necessary to be taught unto the people, that they might know their duty unto your majesty, and unto Almighty God, and especially to acknowledge your majesty in these years and age to be a perfect high and sovereign lord, and king, and supreme head, whose laws, proclamations, and commandments we are bound to obey, as well as any prince's subjects are bound to obey the laws, proclamations, and commandments of their natural and sovereign lord, notwithstanding that nature hath not yet given unto your person such age as I trust she shall, nor so many years, which we wish to be so many as any prince ever had, the which years do not make you king or prince, but the right of your birth, and lawful succession whatsoever it be, so that we all must as well acknowledge your majesty to be our king and prince, at these years, as if you were at the age of 32 or 40 years, and your laws and statutes no less to be feared and obeyed, than if your highness were fifty or an hundred years old, (the which thing not only is most certainly true, but also at this time most necessarily to be taught, especially when divers rebels have openly declared, that they would not obey your highness's laws, nor acknowledge the statutes made by your majesty to be available till you come to the age of twenty years) and this not only being so, but the same thing being commanded by your said majesty, amongst other Injunctions and Articles given in writing to the said Edmund Bonner, to be preached in his last sermon, as by the same Injunctions may appear, of the which the true copy we have when need is to be shewed: yet all this notwithstanding, the said Bonner, of what zeal or mind we cannot tell, whether favouring the opinion of the said rebels, or contemning your highness's commandment declared unto him, hath not only left out to declare the said Article, which we most and chiefly expected and looked for, but also in all the rest of his sermon did not so fully and apertly declare the said Injunctions and Articles, as to our judgement did appear they ought to have been declared, and was of no light ground looked for, entreating of other far distant and divers from the Articles upon the which he was commanded to entreat; and such as most should move and stir up the people to disorder and dissension, willingly leaving out those things which should have made quiet and obedience. Wherefore not moved of any malice, grudge, envy, or evil will to the person of the Bishop, but constrained by the love and zeal which we bear towards your highness, and of our duty and allegiance to your majesty, whose honour and safety with tranquillity, quietness, and good governance of this your realm, we do most desire, and for the discharge of our most bounden duties, to avoid all the dangers that might ensue of the concealment thereof, we most humbly do denounce and declare the same to your highness, to the intent that your majesty, by the advice aforesaid, may, if it please your highness, at this our humble denunciation, call the said Bishop to answer to the premises, the which we are ready to avow and prove, and then your highness may take further order herein, as to your princely wisdom shall seem most convenient; whose long life and most prosperous government God Almighty long continue, for the which we shall pray during our lives."

The king's majesty having thus, by the information of these two credible persons, perfect intelligence of the contemptuous and perverse negligence of this Bishop, in not accomplishing his highness's commandment given him by injunction, thought it most necessary with all convenient speed (for the avoiding of further inconveniences) to look more severely unto the due punishment of such dangerous rebellious obstinacy; and therefore by the advice of the lord protector, and the rest of his honourable council, immediately he directed forth his commission under his broad seal unto the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Rochester, and to other grave and trusty personages and counsellors, appointing and authorizing all them, or certain of them, by virtue of the same, to call before them, as well the bishop of London, as also the foresaid denouncers, and upon due examination and proof of the premises, or any other matter otherwise to be objected, further to proceed against him summarily, & de plano, according to law and justice, either to suspension, excommunication, committing to prison, or deprivation (if the quality of the offence so required) or otherwise to use any other censure, ecclesiastical, which, for the better hearing and determining of that cause, might to their wisdoms seem more pertinent, as appeareth more amply by the tenour of the Commission here ensuing:

"EDWARD the 6th, &c. To the most reverend father in God, Thomas abp. of Canterbury, metropolitan and primate of England, the right rev. father in God, Nicholas bp. of Rochester, our trusty and right well-beloved counsellors, sir Wm. Peter and sir Tho. Smith, knights, our two principal secretaries, and Wm. May, doctor of the law civil, and dean of Paul's, greeting. It is come to our knowledge, that where we by the advice of our most entirely beloved uncle Edward Duke of Somerset, governor of our person, and Protector of all our realms, dominions, and subjects, and the rest of our privy council, did give to the right reverend father in God Edmund bp. of London, upon certain complaints before made unto us, and other great considerations, certain Injunctions to be followed, done, and executed, and in a sermon appointed to him to preach by us with certain articles, and for the more sate knowledge, keeping, and observing, did exhibit the same in writing unto him by the hands of our said uncle, in the fulfilling of our counsel: all this notwithstanding, the said bishop hath in contempt of us (as it may appear) overslipped and not observed certain of the said things so by us enjoined, and other so perversely and negligently done, that the things minded of us to reformation, and for a good quiet of our subjects and our whole realm, be converted by the willful negligence or perversity of him to a great occasion of slander, tumult, and grudge amongst our people, as it hath been denounced to us in writing by certain honest and discreet persons, and otherwise called. The which thing, if they be so, we tendering the health, quietness, good order, and government of our people, have not thought convenient to be let past unpunished and unreformed, and therefore by the advice aforesaid, have appointed you 5, 4, or 3, upon whose fidelities, wisdoms, dexterities, and circumspections we have full confidence, to call before you as well the denouncers, of the said faults, as also the said bishop, and with due examinations and process, according to the law and justice to hear the said matter, and all other matters, of what kind, nature, or condition soever they shall be objected against the said bishop, summarily (et de plano) or otherwise as to your discretions shall be thought most meet, with full power and authority to suspend, excommunicate, commit to prison, or deprive the said bishop, if the offence shall so appear to merit, or to use any other censure ecclesiastical, which for the better hearing and determining of the cause shall be requisite and appertam, any law, statute, or act to the contrary notwithstanding. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents.—Witness ourself at Westminster the 8th of September, in the 3rd year of our reign."

This Commission being sealed with the king's broad seal, was by his highness's council forthwith delivered at the court unto Tho. Crommer abp. of Canterbury and the rest of the commissioners mentioned in the same, being there altogether present. Who upon the receipt thereof, determined by virtue of the same to sit at the archbishop's house at Lambeth the Wednesday then next ensuing, which was the tenth day of that present month of September, and therefore appointed the bishop of London to be summoned to appear before them, as at that time and place. The manner of whose behaviour at his appearance, because it both declareth the froward nature and stubborn condition of the person, and also what estimation and authority he thought the commissioners to be of, I thought it not unmeet first, before I enter into the process, somewhat to note and describe unto you.

At his first entry into the place within the archbishop's house at Lambeth, where the archbishop and other of the commissioners sate, he passed forth directly by them with his cap upon his head (making as though he saw them not) until one plucked him by the sleeve, willing him to do reverence unto the commissioners. Whereat he laughingly turned himself, and spake unto the archbishop on this wise; What, my lord, are you here? by my troth I saw you not. No, said the archbishop, you would not see. Well (quoth he) you sent for me, have you any thing to say to me? Yea, said the commissioners, we have here authority from the king's highness to call you to account for your sermon you made lately at Paul's Cross, for that you did not there publish to the people the article which you were commanded then to preach upon. At which words the bishop, either for that he did not greatly delight to hear of this matter, or else because he would make his friends believe that he was called to account only for his opinion in religion (as afterward in the sequel of this process it more plainly appeareth) began to turn his talk unto other matters, and said unto the archbishop; In good faith my lord I would one thing were had in more reverence than it is. What is it, said the archbishop? The blessed mass, quoth he. You have written very well of the sacrament: I marvell you do no more honour it. The archbishop of Canterbury therewith perceiving his subtilty, and seeing his gross blindness, to comment that which was utterly contrary to his opinion, said unto him again: If you think it well, it is because you understand it not. The other then adding unto his former gross ignorance an obstinate impudency, answered; I think I understand it better than you that wrote it. Unto which words the archbishop replied, Truly I will easily make a child that is but ten years old understand therein as much as you. But what is this to the matter?

Moreover, at what time as they began to enter the judicial prosecuting of their commission, and had called forth the denouncers to propound such matter as they had to object against him, he hearing them speak, fell to scurving and taunting of them, saying to the one, that he spake like a goose; and to the other, that he spake like a woodcock, utterly denying their accusations to be true. Whereupon the archbishop, seeing his peevish malice against the denouncers, asked him, if he would not believe them, whether he would credit the people there present; and therewithal (because many of them were also at the bishop's sermon at Paul's) he stood up and read the article of the king's authority during his young age; saying unto them, how say you my masters, did my lord of London preach this article? Whereunto they answered, no, no. At which words the bishop turning himself about, deciding said, will you believe this fond people?

Besides this, at all his appearings he used many irreverent, uncomely, obstinate, and forward words and behaviours towards the commissioners and others (in defacing their authority with the terms of pretended commissioners, pretended witnesses, and unjust, unlawful, and pretended proceedings, with recusation of some, and terming others daws, woodcocks, fools, and such like) which I will here omit, for they do more manifestly appear in the sequel of the story in the time and place as they happened; adding yet this much by the way, that although such stoutness of heart and will, if it had been in a cause true and rightful, might have perchance seemed in some men's judgment to be somewhat sufferable; yet to say the truth, in what case soever it be, being immoderate, as this shall appear, it besemed no wise man, and therefore much less one of his calling. For if his cause had been good, why did he not take the wrong patiently and meekly, as the true canon law of the gospel doth teach him? If it were (as it was indeed) naught and wrong, whereto served so bold sturdy stoutness, but to shew the impudency of the person, and to make the case worse which was bad enough before? But belike he was disposed to declare, if need were, what he was able to do in the law, in shifting off the matter by subtil dilatories, and frivolous cavilling about the law. And if that would not help, yet with facing and brasing, and railing upon the denouncers with furious words, and irreverent behaviour toward the king's commissioners, he thought to countenance out the matter before the people, that something might seem yet to be in him, whatsoever was in the cause. For, to conclude, for all his crafty cauteles and tergiversations alledged out of the law, yet neither his cause could be so defended, nor his behaviour so excused, but that he was therefore both justly imprisoned, and also in the end most lawfully deprived; as by the sequel of this process may well appear, the manner whereof is as followeth.

UPON Wednesday the 10th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1549, and in the third year of the reign of king Edward 6th, Thomas Cranmer abp. of Canterbury, metropolitan and primate of all England, associate with Nicholas Ridley then bishop of Rochester, sir Wm. Peter knight, one of the king's two principal secretaries, and master Wm. May, Dr. of the civil law and dean of Paul's, by virtue of the king's commission, sate judicially, upon the examination of Edmund Bonner bishop of London, within the archbishop's chamber of presence, at his house in Lambeth, before whom there then also personally appeared the said bishop. At which time the commissioners, first shewing forth their commission, requested sir Wm. Peter that he would openly publish and read the same. Which done, the abp. in the name of the rest declared unto the bishop, that a grievous complaint had been heretofore made and exhibited against him in writing, unto the king's majesty and his most honourable council, and that therefore his highness, with their advice, had committed the examination thereof unto him and other his colleagues there present, as also unto sir Tho. Smith knight, the other of his majesty's two principal secretaries, though then absent, and therewithal shewed also forth a bill of complaint exhibited unto the king by Wm. Latimer and John Hooper, ministers, which they likewise requested sir Wm. Peter to read.—These things ended, the bishop like a subtil lawyer, having most like some secret intelligence before of these matters (whatsoever he pretended to the contrary) pulled out of his bosom a solemn Protestation ready written, which he then exhibited unto the commissioners, requesting that the same might be there openly read; the copy whereof is this in tenor and form as followeth.

“EDMUNDUS Lond: Episcopus primò & ante omnia protestor quod per hanc meam comparitionem seu per aliqua per me hic dicta seu dicenda, allegata seu alleganda, proposita seu proponenda, exhibita seu exhibenda, gesta seu gerenda, objecta seu objicienda, exercita seu exercenda, facta seu fienda, petita seu petenda, non intendo in vos dominos iudices presentes tanquam in iudices mihi in hac parte competentes & idoneos aliquo modo consentire, vestram jurisdictionem presentem in hac parte aliquatenus prorogare, nisi prout ac quatenus de jure ad hoc teneat & astringat rationique consonum videatur: & sub protestatione prædicta & ea semper mihi salva (à qua recedere non intendo, sed eandem in omnibus & singulis deinceps in hoc negotio prætenso per me agendis, pro repetita haberi volo) dico & allego quod literæ commissionales prætensæ vobis (ut dicitur) in hac parte directæ, seu earum vera & legitima copia nunquam antehac mihi ostensæ aut monstr. fuerunt, nec à me aliquo modo visæ, lectæ aut cognitæ, vel mihi traditæ. Itaque contra formam & tenorem earundem, vel contra personas aliquorum vestrum, ea quæ de jure ac naturali ratione mihi competunt in hac parte, cum reverentia (qua decet) objicere, ac in debita juris forma proponere non possum in præsentem ut deberem. Quare ut defensio congrua, quæ nulli hominum deneganda est, mihi reservetur, liquidoque sciam ejusmodi exceptiones mihi in hac parte competere possunt, ac debeant, atque eas suis loco & tempore juxta juris exigentiam, pro necessaria defensione mea proponam contra vel prætensas literas commissionales hujusmodi, vel contra personas aliquorum vestrum, quatenus liceat & expediat sub protestatione prædicta, facultatem dictas prætensas literas commissionales in forma originali inspiciendi, ac earum veram, integram, & fidelem copiam debite exinde mihi fieri humiliter peto & postulo prout juris est in hac parte, tenore præsentium: nihilominus testatum manifeste relinquens, quod observantiam & reverentiam, ac obedientiam & honorem, ac cætera quæcunque serenissimæ Regiæ Majestati Domino meo supremo has

literas prætensas vobis (ut dicitur) committenti qualitercunque decet in omnibus & per omnia perpetuo humilime recogniturus sum, habiturus & præstiturus, & his exceptionibus, & defensionibus legitimis mihi de jure & natura competentibus ad defensionem meam necessariam & legitimam ac non aliter in hac parte usus.”

This Protestation being read, he requested the commissioners that he might have the bill of complaint delivered him. Which, when he had well perused, he said, that the same was very general, and so general, as that he could not directly answer thereunto. Whereunto the archbishop answered, that the special cause of the complaint against him was, for that he had transgressed the king's commandment, given unto him by his council, in that he in his late sermon made at Paul's Cross did not set forth unto the people the king's highness's royal power in his minority, according to the tenor of the article delivered unto him by them for that purpose, and for proof thereof called forth William Latimer and John Hooper, preachers, who before that time had put up the bill of complaint unto the king against him.

Upon whom the Bishop had earnestly looked, and well beheld them, he said, As for this merchant Latimer, I know him very well, and have borne with him, and winked at his doings a great while, but I have more to say to him hereafter. But as touching this other merchant Hooper, I have not seen him before, howbeit, I have heard much of his naughty preaching. And then turning himself again unto the archbishop (of purpose most like to make his friends think that he was not called thither to answer for his contemptuous disobedience, but for matters of religion) said unto him, Ah! my lord, now I see that the cause of my trouble is not for the matter that you pretend against me, but it is for that I did preach and set forth in my late sermon the true presence of the most blessed body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar. For as for these my accusers, as they be evil, infamed, notorious, and criminous persons, so are they manifest and notable heretics and seducers of the people, especially touching the Sacrament of the Altar: and most of all this Hooper. For where in my late sermon at Paul's Cross I preached, That in the blessed Sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there is the true body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, the selfsame in substance that was hanged and shed upon the cross; he the same day at afternoon, having a great rabblement with him of his damnable sect, openly in the pulpit within my diocese, did preach erroneously to the people against it; and maliciously inveighing against my sermon, denied the verity and presence of Christ's true body and blood to be in the same sacrament, and also falsely and untruly interpreted and expounded my words. And especially, where I preached and affirmed the very true body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ to be in the said Sacrament, the selfsame in substance that was hanged and shed upon the cross, he like an ass, (as he is an ass indeed) falsely changed and turned the word that into as, like an ass, saying, that I had said as it hanged, and as it was shed upon the cross.

The Archbishop hereupon perceiving the bishop's drift, and hearing him talk so much of the presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament, said unto him: My lord of London, ye speak much of a presence in the Sacrament: what presence is there, and of what presence do you mean? Wherewith the bishop being somewhat stirred and moved in mind, as appeared by his choleric countenance, spake again to the archbishop very earnestly and said, What presence my lord? I say and believe that there is the very true presence of the body and blood of Christ. What believe you, and how do you believe, my lord? Upon which words the abp. because he saw his answer dark and subtil, and minding somewhat to nip the gross absurdity of the Papias, asked him further whether he were there, face, nose, mouth, eyes, arms, and lips, with other lineaments of his body? Whereat the bishop shaking his head, said, Oh! I am right sorry to hear your grace speak these words, and therewith boldly urged the archbishop to shew his mind therein. Who wisely weighing the fond presumption of the party, with the place and occasion of their assembly, refused then so to do, saying, that their being there at that time was not to dispute of those matters, but to prosecute their commission committed to them by their prince, and therefore willed him to answer them unto such things as were objected against him.

Whereupon, under his protestation, he required to have a copy both of the commission, and also of the denunciation given unto him, with time to answer thereto. Which the commissioners willingly granted, assigning him there to appear again before them upon Friday then next following, at eight of the clock before noon, and then to answer the tenor of the denunciation. And so for that day (he complaining somewhat of the shortness of his time to answer) they altogether departed.

UPON Friday the 13th of Sept. aforementioned, four commissioners, associated then also with sir Thomas Smith knight, the other of the king's two principal secretaries, and joint commissioner with them, sat judicially in the archbishop's chapel within his house at Lambeth. Before whom, according to their former assignment there and then appeared the bishop of London. To whom the archbishop, in the name of the rest, first said, My lord of London, the last time you were before us, we laid certain articles and matter to your charge touching your disobedience to the king's majesty, and you have this day to make your answer thereunto, wherefore now shew us what you have to say for your defence.

Whereto the Bishop first asking the archbishop if he had all said and done, and he again saying yea, made this answer: My lord, the last day that I appeared before you, I remember there sat in the king's majesty's commission, your grace, you my lord of Rochester, you master secretary Peter, and you master dean of Paul's, but now I perceive theresitteth also master secretary Smith. Who because he sat not at the beginning, nor took there the Commission upon him, ought not so to do: for by the law, they which begin must continue the Commission. Whereupon the archbishop first answered, that he was no lawyer, and therefore could not certainly show what the law willet in that case, but saith he, if the law be so indeed, surely I take it to be an unreasonable law.—Well, said the bishop, there be here that know the law, and yet I say not this to the intent to stand or stick much in this point with you, but to tell it you as it were by the way; for I have here mine answer ready.

Then said master secretary Peter to the bishop. My lord, in good sooth I must say unto you, that although I have professed the law, yet by discontinuance and disuse thereof, and having been occupied a long time in other matters from study of the law, I have perhaps forgotten what the law will do precisely in this point: but admit the law were so as you say, yet yourself knoweth, my lord, that this is our certain rule in law. Quod consuetudo est juris interpret optimus, and I am sure you will not, nor cannot deny, but that the custom is commonly in this realm in all judgments and commissions used to the contrary; and in very deed we all together at the court, having the commission presented unto us, took it upon us; and therefore for you to stick in such trifling matters you shall rather in my judgment hurt yourself and your matter, than otherwise.—Truly master secretary, said the bishop, I have also of long while been disused, in the study of law, but having occasion, partly by reason of this matter to turn my books I find the law to be as I say, and yet as I said, I tell you hereof by the way, not minding to stick much with you in that point.—At which words, master secretary Smith said also unto the bishop: Well my lord of London, as cunning as you make yourself in the law, there be here that know the law as well as you; and for my part I have studied the law too, and I promise you, these be but quiddities and quirks invented to delay matters, but our commission is to proceed summarily, & de pleno, and to cut off such frivolous allegations. Well (said the bishop again) look well on your commission, and you shall find therein these words, To proceed according to the law and justice, and I ask both law and justice at your hands.

Then master secretary Peter willed him to stand no more thereupon, but to proceed unto his answer. Whereupon he took forth a writing, whereto was contained his answer to the denunciation exhibited the day before by Latimer and Hooper, and delivering it unto the archbishop, said, that it was of his own handwriting, and for lack of sufficient time written so hastily and cursorily that it could scarcely be read of any other, and therefore he desired to read it himself; and so taking it again, read it openly, the copy whereof here followeth:

The Answer of Bishop Bonner made to the Denunciation aforesaid.

“ I EDWARD bishop of London, concerning William Latimer and John Hooper, the pretended denunciators of this matter here now before you, and for answer unto the unlawful, untrue and uncharitable pretended denunciation of them, lately, indeed contrary to justice and good reason, exhibited here and read before you, under protestation heretofore made by me, and read unto you, remaining in the acts of this court, unto which I refer me, and have the same here again for repeated and rehearsed to all purposes agreeable to the law, do for my necessary defence and help alledge and say as followeth. 1. I do alledge and say, That the said William Latimer and John Hooper, or either of them, were not, nor now are to be admitted in any wise, by virtue of this or any other commission, as denunciators against me their bishop: specially, for that they and either of them have as well before the time of their pretended denunciation, and also, then and since been and be vile and infamed, notorious criminous persons, and also open and manifest notable heretics, especially concerning the sacrament of the catholic church, and namely concerning the blessed sacrament of the altar, by reason of which their heresies they were and be by the order of the said catholic church, here in this realm of England, justly and duly excommunicated and accursed, and have divided themselves thereby from the unity and integrity of Christ's catholic church, and for such persons they have been and are named, reputed, and taken openly, notoriously and commonly amongst the catholic people of this realm of England, and especially of this city of London, familiarly haunting and conversant with sacramentaries, and openly known condemned heretics, and favourers and abettors of the same and their detestable and pestilent doctrine and heresy. 2. Item, that the said John Hooper, amongst other his poisoned and venomous doctrine, and amongst other his erroneous, detestable, and abominable errors and heresies taught and spread abroad here within this realm, infecting and poisoning the king's subjects therewith, hath before the time of the said pretended denunciation, damnably and detestably made divers erroneous and heretical books, especially one, entitled a declaration of Christ and of his office, printed (as he falsely surmiseth) in Zurich, by Augustine friers, where he in many places heretically and damnably denieth the true presence of Christ's body in the blessed sacrament of the altar, and also in effect denieth the verity of Christ's blessed body upon the cross, calling it mathematical, and excluding thereby the true and very substance thereof.—3. Item, that the said Jo. Hooper both persevere and continueth still in his said poisoned and wicked venomous doctrine, in all points maintaining and defending the same and every part thereof all the ways he can, specially against the presence of Christ's blessed body in the sacrament of the Altar; and his said books, especially the said declaration of Christ and of his Office, he doth yet allow and maintain as good and catholic, where indeed it is heretical, wicked and damnable: the contents of which doctrine and book so entitled, the said Latimer, especially touching the heresy against the verity of Christ's body and his true presence in the sacrament of the Altar, hath heard, taught, read, preached, believed, holden, maintained, and kept, and so at this present doth yet believe, hold, maintain, and keep, contrary to the faith of Christ's catholic church, and the unity of the same observed amongst all true Christian people, incurring thereby heresy, excommunication, and schism, to the loss both of their souls and of their believers. 4. Item, that the said Latimer and Hooper, and either of them, being of these vile and detestable qualities, and consequently by the ordinance of the catholic church of Christ, as well of this realm, as also throughout all Christendom, being so excommunicated and cast out thereby from the said church, are not to this pretended denunciation against me their bishop, nor to any judicial act, to be admitted, nor yet to be accompanied withal, or answered unto, but are by scripture, and the order of Christ's catholic church here in this realm, utterly and truly to be excluded, avoided, detested, eschewed, and abhorred, in all manner of wise, of all faithful and true christian people, fearing God, and desiring the advancement of the truth. 5. Item, that where the said Latimer and Hooper, in their said pretended denunciation, amongst other things, do untruly deduce that they have made their said pretended denunciation, not moved of any malice or evil will, but for the good tranquillity and governance of this realm, which, as they pretend in their gay and glorious prohemie, they would seem to have a great care and solicitude of, where in very deed they and such as they are by sundry ways, and specially by their corrupt doctrine, and heretical naughty preaching and infecting of the king's majesty's people, have disturbed and greatly inquieted the good tranquillity and governance of this realm, as evidently and notorious it is well known; the truth is, that this their saying is evident and plain false: for notorious it is, and lawfully shall be proved, that the said Hooper, conspiring with the said Latimer and other heretics of their factious sect and damnable opinion, did the first day of September last past, after that I the said bishop of London had made the sermon at Paul's Cross, assemble maliciously, uncharitably, and unlawfully, a great rabblement of such as himself, within my diocese and jurisdiction, and under the colour of reading, did openly and manifestly rail and inveigh against me the said bishop, for my said sermon, not for any such matter, pretence, or cause, as is falsely and untruly surmised in the said pretended denunciation, but only and chiefly for that I the said bishop, as became a christian man, especially him that had and hath cure and charge of his flock, faithfully and truly to teach them, did, taking occasion of the communion not frequented nor revered, but neglected and contemned, confess and declare my faith and belief openly before my audience, touching the blessed sacrament of the altar ministered in the same communion, affirming as the catholic church affirmeth and teacheth, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar there is the very true body of our Saviour Christ, the self same in substance that hanged upon the cross, and the very true blood of our Saviour Christ, the self same in substance that was shed upon the cross. Against which affirmation and assertion, being catholic and true, the said J. Hooper (albeit now colourably, and falsely, and foolishly he pretendeth another matter more plausible in his opinion and judgment in sundry places of the city and suburbs of London) hath since that time maliciously inveighed and taught, learning and teaching his audience heretically, being many in number, and assembling in great routs, to reprove, contemn and despise the said blessed sacrament of the Altar, and not to have a true and faithful belief of it, as hitherto always the catholic church hath ever had, the said Wm. Latimer, and the rabblement of his complices, conspiring and agreeing in points therein, and inducing other to do the same, not making any such pretence at all, as they in their said pretended denunciation do falsely surmise and deduce, but only and chiefly offended for my said assertion, and affirmation of the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar.—Item, that where the said Wm. Latimer and John Hooper in their said pretended denunciation do further reduce and falsely surmise that I the said bishop of London had delivered to me from the king's majesty, by the hands of the lord protector's grace, and the rest of the king's majesty's council, certain injunctions with articles to be insinuated and preached to the king's majesty's subjects at a certain day limited, and after such sort, form, and manner, as is in the said pretended denunciation surmised untruly, and deduced; It is notorious and evident, as well by the tenour and continue of that writing which was to me the said bishop of London delivered by the hands of sir Thomas Smith knight, one of the two principal secretaries to the king's majesty, as otherwise, that the said surmise, in such sort and fashion as it is deduced and made, is not true in this behalf, referring me to the tenour of the said writing, which neither was signed with the king's majesty's hand, nor sealed with any his majesty's seal or signet, nor yet subscribed by any of the said council, or delivered after such sort as is alleged and pretended, as more evidently hereafter shall appear and sufficiently be proved for my lawful and necessary defence in this behalf.—

6. Item, that in case any such injunctions with articles, after such form and fashion, had so been delivered unto me as is surmised and pretended, yet false and untrue it is that I the said bishop either left out, or refused to declare the same for any such cause or causes, falsely and untruly surmised in the said pretended denunciation, or else so perversely and negligently did, as likewise in the said pretended denunciation is deduced, which thing may well appear in the discourse of my said sermon, where in substance and effect I declared faithfully and truly these points specially following; that is to wit, that all such as rebel against their prince get unto them damnation, and those that refuse the higher power resist the ordinance of God, and he that dieth therefore in rebellion is by the word of God utterly damned, and so loseth both body and soul, alleging for this purpose the 13th chapter of St. Paul to the Romans, and it at large declaring unto the audience: furthermore, speaking of the rebels in Devonshire, Cornwall, Norfolk, and elsewhere within this realm, standing in doubt whether I might put them in the place of those that put trust in themselves and despised all other, or in the place of both, doing as they did, forgetting God, not duly considering the king's majesty their supreme head next and immediately under God, forgetting their wives, their children, their kinsfolk, their alliance, acquaintance, and friends, yea themselves, and their native country, and most unnaturally rebelling against their sovereign lord and king, whom by God's law they were bound to love, serve, and faithfully obey; I did to the best of my power dissuade rebellion, and exhort the audience unto true obedience being thus commanded; and all rebellion being in like manner forbidden under pains of eternal damnation, all these rebels in Cornwall, Devonshire, Norfolk, or elsewhere, who take upon them to assemble a power and force against their king and prince, against the laws and statutes of the realm, and went about to subvert the order of the commonwealth, did not only deserve therefore death, as rebels and traitors, but also did accumulate unto themselves eternal damnation, even to be in the burning fire of hell, with Lucifer the father and first author of pride, disobedience, and rebellion. And here I did ask who had induced the said rebels thus to do: to which I answered by another question, demanding who moved and induced Eve to take the apple and break her obedience against God's commandment? who moved also and induced Cain to kill his brother Abel: yea, who moved Judas the apostle to betray his master Christ? was it not the devil? yes truly, and he it is, said I, that of his great malice and hatred to men and good order hath moved and induced these rebels to this unnatural rebellion against their prince and sovereign lord. Whereupon I asked what pretences they had, and answering thereto, said; that amongst other they had masses and holy water, upon which I exclaiming against them, said, Good Lord! is not this a marvellous thing, to palliate, colour, excuse, and maintain rebellion, and inobedience, to pretend mass or holy water, as who saith, that these things had been instituted and ordained to defend, maintain, and excuse rebellion, treason, and inobedience, which I told the audience they could not do. And thereupon I brought four texts of scripture to prove this thing that I said, alledging the 16th chapter of the first book of Kings, the 10th chapter of Leviticus, and the fourth that myself added also, the 13th of St. Luke, joined with the 5th of the Acts, setting them forth the best I could, as one not much exercised in preaching, but restrained therefrom. And here I concluded, that whatsoever pretences these rebels had of masses, holy water, or such other, it could not in any wise excuse or defend their rebellion and inobedience, referring myself herein to the indifferent hearers in the said audience. And here pulling out a writing, sent from the king's majesty's privy council unto me, touching the victory against the said rebels, which for brevity of time my memory would not serve to declare without book, I did rehearse it in writing word by word. In doing whereof it well appeared, that I did not favour the opinion of the said rebels, nor maintain their enterprise, but contrariwise did detest them and all their doings, declaring obedience to be better than sacrifice; and that in disobedience and rebellion nothing could or did please Almighty God. Further, taking occasion of the proud pharisee and the humble publican ascending into the Temple to pray, and noting the outward and external doing of them both, with the success thereof, I declared to the audience touching the order of the church and the external rites and ceremonies of the divine service, that for as much as God requireth humility of heart, innocency of living, knowledge of him, charity and love to our neighbour, and obedience to his word, to his ministers, and to the superior powers, we must bring all these things to all our prayers, to all our service, and that this is the sacrifice that Christ requireth, and that these be the things that make all other things pleasant to Almighty God; further saying, that the external rites are but exercises of religion, and appointed by superior powers, and that in the choosing thereof we must obey the magistrates, and that we also do see that those things ever have been and shall be divers, as the time and place is, and yet all hath pleased God, so long as humility of heart, innocency of living, knowing of God, charity and love to our neighbour, with obedience to God's word, God's ministers, and superior powers, are concurrent and present therewith.—7. Moreover, I then said, that if any man should use rites, and disobey thereby the superior powers, the devotion of his ceremony was made evil by his disobedience. Inasmuch that that which, standing the law, might be good, was by pride, disobedience, and rebellion, made evil and unprofitable, putting example in the fact of Saul reserving the fat sheep for sacrifice, and in Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and also in Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's two children, and in the Galileans, whose blood Pilate did mire with their sacrifices. And thereupon I told the audience that they must do herein especially two things: the first, they must join to and with their devotion faithful obedience, and then they shall win the garland, and otherwise have but a zeal, sed non secundum scientiam, deserving no thanks or praise of God; and also they must with and to their obedience join devotion, knowing that God more doth require and consider the heart, then the outward doing. And thereupon I exhorted the audience, that when they came to take the communion, or to hear or say the service, appointed by the king's majesty, they must bring devotion and inward prayer with them, or else their prayers shall be but vain, as wanting and lacking that thing which God requireth, that is, the heart and mind to pray to him. And herein because I marvelled that the communion was no more frequented now a-days, and lamenting the unreverent coming to it and using of it, fearing that it proceeded of an evil opinion and belief touching the sacrament of the altar, ministered and distributed at the same communion, and to the intent to make the people have better opinion of it than they seemed to have, I did faithfully, truly and plainly declare my belief of the said sacrament, wherewith the said Latimer and Hooper, with their complices, were so much offended and aggrieved.—8. Item that where the said William Latimer and John Hooper do further in the said pretended denunciation untruly, and uncharitably deduce and alledge, that I in my said sermon did intreat of such things, as most should move and stir up the people to disorder and dissention, it doth hereby evidently and clearly appear, that either the said pretended denunciators do take and esteem a declaration faithfully made of the loyal obedience of subjects to the king's majesty, the supreme and sovereign lord, and the great peril and danger of rebellion committed by subjects against their king and prince and sovereign lord, to be a moving, provoking and stirring up of people to discord and dissension, or else that the affirmation and assertion catholick of the verity of Christ's body and blood in the blessed sacrament of the altar, set forth by me as afore, doth effect and work such disorder and dissension: for evident it is to all those which indifferently heard my said sermon, that I (grounding myself upon scripture, and taking occasion of the Sunday then occurrent) did speak specially and earnestly of these two things, without taxing of any man specially by name, or other circumstance, to slander them thereby, and I did both set forth the obedience and duty of all subjects, generally to their king, and specially of subjects of this realm to the king's majesty that now is, whose minority to all people of this realm is more than manifest, and is also apparent, or evidently known to all the whole world beside: and also, I did then declare and lay open the imminent danger and great peril of rebellion in subjects against the high powers and authority, and also specially of the rebellion late committed by them of Devonshire, Cornwall, Norfolk, and elsewhere, against the king's majesty that now is, which I would not have done, except I both had believed that all the king's subjects without exception were bound to obey the king's majesty even as he now 'is, was, and shall be, during his life, which our Lord long preserve to all our comforts and wealth, and also that the rebellion of late so committed against his majesty was damnable, and utterly detestable and condemned by God's law; and herein I refer me to the indifferent hearers of this my sermon, wishing that this Latimer, and Hooper, with all the rest of these new preachers, did mean as faithfully, truly, obediently and catholicly, as I always have done toward the king's majesty, his honour, authority, royal power, and surety of his person and realm, and did not more move, incourage, and stir the king's majesty's subjects to sedition, tumult, and inobedience, by their erroneous doctrine and teaching, than I did at any time encourage, move, or stir any of them in any wise; or give occasion to any of the same.—9. Item, where the said Wm. Latimer and John Hooper do falsely surmise in their pretended denunciation, that it was of no light ground looked for, that I the said bishop of London should more apertly have declared the injunctions and articles aforesaid, and that it did so appear unto their judgments; I do say, that their judgments are corrupted and only set to slander and picking of quarrels in this behalf, being well assured and so credibly informed that all the worshipful and honest catholic persons of my said audience were fully satisfied both as touching obedience to the king's majesty in his tender age and minority, and also touching the penalty and great peril of punishments for the rebellion so lately committed against the said majesty by the foresaid rebels. And moreover I do say, that before my lord protector's grace, and the rest of the king's majesty's most honourable council then present, I made my excuse and alledged many impediments for my not preaching at the cross, and did not further promise but to do the best I could, which of my fidelity and conscience I did, not omitting any thing of purpose or evil will, that might be to the satisfaction of all people both good and bad in every condition and point, specially in this behalf, collecting and gathering together, with all diligent study, all that might make, in my judgment and opinion, for the better setting forth of the same."

Thus have you Bonner's Answer to the Denunciation aforesaid; wherein first he alledged, or rather shamelessly and slanderously cavilled, that those his denouncers were vile, infamed and notorious criminous persons, and also open and manifest heretics, as well against the rest of the sacraments of the church, as chiefly against the sacrament of the altar; and were for the same by the orders of, the church excommunicated and accursed, and were so taken of all the catholics of this realm, and especially Hooper; who, besides other his poisoned doctrine and heresy amongst the people, had also before the time of the denunciation made divers erroneous and heretical books against the true presence of Christ's body in the sacrament of the altar, and did also continue in the same, allowing and maintaining it as good and catholic. Which books and doctrine, chiefly against the sacrament of the altar, William Latimer had and then likewise did allow, believe, and teach, to the loss of both their own souls, and also their believers, and therefore were not now nor ought at any time to be admitted either in this their denunciation against him, or in any other judicial act; and that the rather also, because that although they pretend in their denunciation, that they made not the same of any malice or evil will towards him, but for the good tranquillity and quiet governance of this realm, yet was it notoriously known, that as well the same day at afternoon in which he the said bishop preached at the Cross of Paul's, as also at sundry other times, they two, conspiring with other of their faction, did maliciously and unlawfully within his diocese assemble together a great rabblement of such as themselves were, and there under the colour of reading did openly rail and inveigh against him, not for any the causes pretended in their denunciation, but because he had in his sermon declared, as the catholic church taught, that in the sacrament of the altar there was the very true body and blood of Christ, the same in substance that was hanged and shed upon the cross.

Then, after these vain and frivolous allegations against the denouncers, he cometh and answereth to the substance of their denunciation, and saith, that where they in the same do falsely surmise that there were delivered unto him from the king's majesty, by the hands of the lord protector and the rest of his highness's council, certain injunctions and articles to be published and declared unto the people, at a day limited in the same, their information, in such sort as it was deduced, was most false and untrue, for that the articles delivered unto him by sir Thomas Smith, one of the king's secretaries, were neither signed with the king's own hand, neither sealed with his highness's seal or signet, nor yet subscribed by any of his council, &c.

Where mark, I beseech you, the subtily of a disloyal papist, who, because the articles were not sealed by the king and his council, would make them therefore not to be of any such force, as that the breach thereof should cause him to incur the danger of contemptuous disobedience. But admit they were not signed nor sealed, of which thing by the way in the denunciation there is no mention yea or nay, yet it is manifest by the second bill of articles administered unto him by the commissioners, in the fourth act of his process, that at such time as he was before the council, those articles were by the commandment of the lord protector, openly there read unto him by one of the secretaries, and after addition of the article concerning the king's lawful power and authority during his young years, were also delivered unto him by the hands of the lord protector, in the presence of the rest of the council; who thus receiving them promised there faithfully to accomplish all the contents thereof. After which, they were again delivered unto secretary Smith, to amend such things therein as the lord protector and the rest of the council had there appointed. Which being accordingly done, as the bishop himself at the last receipt thereof confessed, were finally delivered unto him by the secretary; and therefore was this but a poor shift.

Now, after this, he maketh a supposition, that in case it were true, that the injunctions were delivered him according to their information: yet was it untrue that he did omit or refuse to declare the same for any such causes as they had alledged against him, and that did well appear in the discourse of his sermon, which tendered principally, as he said, to the disallowing and condemnation of all rebels, and chiefly of the rebels in Norfolk, Suffolk, Devonshire, and Cornwall, or elsewhere within this realm of England: Who forgetting their allegiance and duty unto their prince, assigned them by God's word as their supreme head, their natural love and care for their country, wives, children, and kinsfolk, did both deserve death bodily as traitors, and also accumulate unto themselves damnation of body and soul eternally with Satan, the father and first mover of all rebellion and disobedience; and herewithal further exclaiming against the pretences of those rebels, who amongst other things pretended the mass and holy water, with such like, which were never ordained for the purpose to colour and maintain rebellion, as he said he then proved out of the 16th of Numbers, 1 Reg. 15, Levit. 10, and 4 Luke 13, and Acts 5, in the best manner that he could, as one not exercised greatly in preaching, but restrained therefrom, but having humility of heart, innocency of living, knowledge of God, love to our neighbours, with obedience to God's word, ministers, and superior powers concurrent with them, they being external rites and ceremonies of the church, were exercises of religion, and appointable by superior powers; and yet that, which, standing the law, might be good, was by pride and disobedience made evil unprofitable.

And here he further said because he saw the people slack in coming to the communion and divine service set forth by the king's majesty, and to the intent he would make them have a better opinion in the sacrament than he thought they had, he then faithfully did declare his belief therein. Wherewith his denouncers being offended, they uncharitably and untruly deducced in their pretended denunciation, that in his sermon he did intreat of such things as most should stir up unto dissension and tumult; whereby it appeared unto him, that his denouncers either took his catholic assertion of the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, or else his faithful declaration made of the obedience of subjects unto the king's majesty their supreme and sovereign lord, with the peril and danger of rebellion committed against him, to be the cause of disorder and dissension; for that, saith he, of these two points he chiefly spake, and especially of obedience to the king; whose minority was more than manifestly known, as well amongst the people of this realm, as elsewhere throughout the world besides; which he would not have done, except he had believed, that both all his subjects were bounden to obey him, even as he then was and should be during his life, and also that the rebellion of late committed against him was detestable and condemned by God's word: and therefore he wished that his two denouncers, with all the rest of the new preachers, did mean as faithfully, obediently, and catholicly towards the king's honour, royal power, and surety of person, as he did, and had not more moved the people to tumults and disobedience by their erroneous doctrine and teaching, than he had at any time given any occasion thereunto.

Then finally he concluded and said, that whereas his aforesaid denouncers surmise, that it was of no light ground looked for, as it appeared in their judgments, that he should more apertly have declared the contents of the injunctions and articles than he did, that their judgments were in that behalf corrupted and set to slander and picking of quarrels; for he was well assured, and credibly informed, that all his honest and catholic audience were fully satisfied, both touching their obedience to the king's majesty in his tender age, and also concerning the great penalty and peril that the late rebels incurred by their disobedience. And besides that, when he was before the lord protector and the rest of the council, after he had made his excuse, and alledged many impediments for his not preaching at the cross, he did not then further promise but to do the best he could, which he hath of his fidelity and conscience accomplished, not omitting anything of purpose or evil will, that might satisfy the people in any point concerning the premises.

Whilst he was thus reading these answers, objecting against his denouncers such causes and quarrels as he before alledged, for which he would have earnestly had the denouncers to be repelled of the commissioners, the archbishop of Canterbury replied, That if there were any such law, he thought it not to be a good or godly law, but a law of the bishop of Rome. For, said he, if my matter and cause be good, what should I care who accuse me, yea although he were the devil of hell.—No sir, said the bishop of London, it is the king's law used in the realm.—Well my lord (said the archbiabop) ye be too full of your law; I would wish you had less knowledge in that law; and more knowledge in God's law, and of your duty.—Well, answered the bishop again, seeing your grace falleth to wishing, I can also wish many things to be in your person.

Then spake secretary Peter to the bishop as touching these denouncers, we are not so straited in this matter, but that we may proceed against you, either at their promotion, or without them at our pleasure.—A God's name then, said Booner, put them by, and then do as your pleasure shall be, so you do me right, for I ask but right.—Nay, said secretary Smith, you ask you wot not what: you would have us follow your mind in these quiddities and quirks; and all is nothing else but to delay justice. And you do herein as thieves, murderers, and traitors, not to have the truth known.—Say you so to me, quoth the bishop? I thank you. Well I could say somewhat to you also, were ye not in the place ye be, but let it pass. As for my matter, I fear it not, it is not so evil as you make it; for I have your own hand-writing for my discharge, which when I shall see time, I shall shew forth.—My hand? quoth the secretary. Let me see it, and let it be read openly. So it shall, said the bishop, when I shall see time. Then said Mr. Smith, you do use us thus to be seen a cunning lawyer. Indeed, quoth the bishop, I knew the law, ere you could read it. With that, secretary Peter willed the bishop to proceed in reading of his answers; who so did, and when he had finished, Latimer delivered up a writing in paper unto the archbishop and the rest of the commissioners; who then said unto the bishop of London, here be certain articles which we intend to minister unto you. The bishop therewith said, do you minister them of your office, or at the promotion of these men? (pointing to Latimer and Hooper) for I perceive they gave them unto you. Nay, said secretary Peter, we will minister them unto you, ex officio mero, and therefore took an oath of the bishop de fideliter respondendo. Who desiring a copy of the articles, required also a competent time to be given unto him to make answer thereunto.—To whom secretary Peter replied, saying, my lord here be certain of the articles touching your own fact, which you may answer unto forthwith as whether you wrote your sermon or not before you preached it. Whereunto the bishop answered, that he wrote it not, but he drew certain notes of it. Then those council, said he, and advice used you in making your sermon? To which he also answered, that he had therein used his own council and books, and yet my chaplains, quoth he, be much suspected for my doings in many things, and sometimes I for theirs, when there is no cause why.

These words ended, the commissioners assigned him Monday the 16th of September then next following, to appear before them, and to make his full answers unto all the Articles ministered unto him by them this day, the contents whereof are as followeth:

VOL. I.

The Form and Tenor of the Articles ministered unto the Bishop of London, by the King's Commissioners.

MONDAY the 16th of September, 1549, the archbishop associated with the bishop of Rochester, secretary Smith, and Dr. May dean of Paul's, sat judicially within his chapel at Lambeth: before whom there and then appeared the bishop of London, according as he was assigned in the last session: at which time he exhibited unto the commissioners in writing his answers unto the last former articles.—But before the same were there read, the archbishop said unto him, that his late answers, made the 13th of Sept. unto the Denunciation were very obscure, and therewith also contained much matter of slander against Latimer and Hooper, and much untruth, and therefore they desired there to purge themselves. Whereupon Latimer, first obtaining leave to speak, said, that the bishop of London had most falsely, untruly, and uncharitably accused him, laying to his charge many fained and untrue matters in his former answers to the denunciation, and such as he should never be able to prove. For where in his said answer he alledged, that Hugh Latimer and John Hooper, with other heretics conspiring against him, did the first day of September after the bishop's sermon assemble themselves together unlawfully against the said bishop, that saying of his was most untrue. For neither that day, nor yet before that day, nor until certain days after he ever knew or spake with Hooper. And as touching his own preaching there, openly accused by the bishop, he said he never held, taught, or preached any thing concerning the blessed sacrament, otherwise than he ought to do, nor otherwise than according to the scriptures, and true catholic faith of Christ's church; and therefore offered himself to be tried by the archbishop, or other such learned men as it should please the king's majesty, or the said commissioners to appoint; and further to suffer, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, if the bishop could justly prove true the things that he had there shamefully laid to his charge. Then Master Hooper, upon like licence obtained, said to this effect:

“ This ungodly man, pointing to the bishop, hath most uncharitably and ungodly accused me before your grace and this audience, and hath laid to my charge that I am an heretic. Whereas I take God to record, I never spake, read, taught, or preached any heresy, but only the most true and pure word of God. And where he saith, I frequent the company of heretics, I do much marvel of his so saying: for it hath pleased my lord protector's grace, my singular good lord and master, and my lady's grace, to have me with them, and I have preached before them, and much used their company, with divers other worshipful persons, and therefore I suppose this man meaneth them. And further, whereas he saith that I have made heretical books against the blessed sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, calling it mathetical, I perceive that this man knoweth not what this word mathematical these meaneth, and therefore understandeth not my book: which, I take God to be my judge, I have made truly and sincerely, and according to his holy word: and by the same his holy word and scriptures I am always and shall be ready to submit myself to your grace's judgment and the superior powers to be tried; with many such more words of like importance." Which ended, the archbishop, to shorten this matter, asked the bishop how he could prove that Hooper and Latimer assembled together against him the first of September, as he had alledged, seeing they now denied it, and therefore willed him to answer forthwith thereunto.

The bishop then answered, that he would duly prove it, so that he might be admitted to do it according to law, and with that he pulled out of his sleeve certain books, saying, I have this varlet's books which he made against the blessed Sacrament which you shall hear. Then as he was turning certain leaves thereof Hooper began again to speak: but the bishop, turning himself towards him, tauntingly said, put up your pipes, you have spoken for your part, I will meddle no more with you, and therewith read a certain sentence upon the book. Which done, he said, Lo here you may see his opinion, and what it is. At which words the people standing behind, and seeing his unreverent and unseemly demeanour and railing, fell suddenly into great laughing. Whereat the bishop being moved, and perceiving not the cause wherefore they did laugh, turned him towards them in a great rage, saying, Ah woodcocks, woodcocks.

Then said one of the commissioners, why say you so my lord? Marry, quoth he, I may well call them woodcocks, that thus will laugh, and know not whereat, not yet heard what I said or read. Well my lord of London, said the archbishop, then I perceive you would persuade this audience, that you were called hither for preaching of your belief in the sacrament of the altar, and therefore you lay to these men's charge, meaning Hooper and Latimer, that they have accused you of that. Howbeit, there was no such thing laid to your charge, and therefore this audience shall hear openly read the denunciation that is put up against you, to the intent they may the better perceive your dealing herein. And therewithal he said unto the people, My lord of London would make you believe, that he is called hither for declaring and preaching his opinion touching the sacrament of the altar: but to the intent you may perceive how he goeth about to deceive you, you shall hear the denunciation that is laid in against him read unto you, and thereupon he delivered the denunciation unto sir John Mason knight, who there read it openly. Which done, the archbishop said again unto the audience, Lo, here you hear how the bishop of London is called for no such matter as he would persuade you.

With this the bishop being in a raging heat

as one clean void of all humanity, turned himself about unto the people, saying, Well, now hear what the bishop of London saith for his part. But the commissioners, seeing his inordinate contumacy, denied him to speak any more, saying, that he used himself very disobediently, with more like words.—Notwithstanding, he still persisting in his unreverent manner of dealing with the commissioners, pulled out of his sleeve another book, and then said unto the archbishop; My lord of Canterbury, I have here a note out of your books that you made touching the blessed sacrament, wherein you do affirm the verity of the body and blood of Christ to be in the sacrament, and I have another book also of yours of the contrary opinion; which is a marvellous matter.—To the which the archbishop answered, that he made no books contrary one to another, and that he would defend his books, howbeit he thought the bishop understood them not: for I promise you, quoth he, I will find a boy of ten years old, that shall be more apt to understand that matter than you my lord of London be.

This after much multiplying of like words, the commissioners, thinking not good to spend any more waste time with him, willed him to shew forth his Answers unto the Articles objected the last day against him. Whereupon, he having them ready, did read the same openly to them. Wherein after many words of his former Protestation recited, with a marvellous lamentation to see that one of his vocation, at the malicious denunciation of vile heretics, should be used after such a strange sort, having nevertheless done the best he could to declare his obedience unto the king's majesty for the repressing and discouraging of rebellion and rebels, and also for the advancement of the verity of Christ's true body and his presence in the sacrament of the altar, for which only the malicious denouncers with their complices had studied to molest and trouble him, he then cometh to answering the Articles, and saith, that to the first, second, and fourth, he hath already in his former Answers to the Denunciation sufficiently answered, and therefore was not bound by law to answer any further.

As to the third, and fifth, he said, he began to write his sermon, but being soon weary, he did only make certain notes thereof, without help of any other, saying that he shewed them to his chaplains, requiring them to put him in remembrance thereof. Amongst the which, for the better setting forth of the king's majesty's power and authority in his minority, he had collected as well out of histories, as also out of the Scriptures, the names of divers young kings, who, notwithstanding their minority, were faithfully and obediently honoured, and reputed for very true and lawful kings; as Henry 3d being but nine years old, Edward 3d being but 13 years, Richard 2d being but eleven years, Henry 6th being not fully one year, Edward 5th being but 11 years, Henry 8th being but 18 years of age. And out of the Old Testament, Osias and Achaas who were but 16 years old, Solomon and Manasse being but 12 years, Josias, Joachim, and Josas, being but 8 years of age when they entered their reigns. All which notes with many other he had purposed to declare, if they had come into his memory, as indeed they did not, because the same was disturbed, partly for lack of use of preaching, and partly by reason of a bill that was delivered to him from the king's council, to declare the victory then had against the rebels in Norfolk and Devonshire, which, being of some good length, confounded his memory; and partly also for that his book in his sermon time fell away from him, wherein were divers of his notes which he had collected for that purpose: so that he could not remember what he would, but yet in generality he persuaded the people to obedience to the king's majesty, whose minority was manifestly known to them and to all other.

Then as to the sixth, he said he knew not the rebels opinion, and therefore could not answer thereunto. And as for answer to the seventh, eighth, ninth, and eleventh Articles which touched his pastoral office, he said, that notwithstanding his manifold and great troubles, as well by his own business and his family's sickness, as also by uncharitable informations made against him, yet he hath not failed to give order unto his officers straightly to look unto such matters, and such as he hath known, which were very few or none, he caused to be punished according to the laws. All which Answers, with other written with his own hand, hereunder follow.

The ANSWERS of Bonner unto the ARTICLES objected to him by the King's Commissioners, the first time.

" I EDMUND, bishop of London, under protestation heretofore by me made, exhibited and repeated before you, which in all my sayings and doings I intend to have for repeated and rehearsed again to all lawful effects and purposes for my honest and necessary defence, with protestation also of the nullity and iniquity of your process I had made in this behalf, and likewise of the generality, uncertainty, obscurity, contrariety, repugnancy, variety, insufficiency, and invalidity of the things alledged and deduced before you against me, as well in the commission and denunciation in divers parts, as also touching the articles and interrogatories so ministered unto me; lamenting not a little, that one of my vocation, at the malicious denunciation of vile heretical and detestable persons, should be used after this strange sort, having done the best I could to declare mine obedience unto the king's most excellent majesty, for the repressing and discouraging of rebellion and rebellious persons, and for the advancement of the verity of Christ's true body and his presence in the most blessed Sacrament of the altar. For which only the malicious denunciations with their complices have studied to molest and trouble me; although colourably they would be seen to pretend other causes, especially the good and tranquillity of this realm, which our Lord God knoweth they care nothing for, but contrariwise do let and impeach the same, corrupting and infecting with their poisoned and false doctrine, and teaching the king's subjects in this realm, to the great peril and danger thereof many ways; do answer unto certain pretended Articles and Interrogations ministered by you indeed unto me the said bishop the 13th of Sept. 1549, as followeth.

" To the first Article objected against me, I do say and for answer do refer me unto my former Answers heretofore, that is to wit, the 15th of Sept. made and exhibited by me before you unto the said pretended denunciation, touching this matter; alledging withal, that a report of things doth not absolutely prove, nor necessarily infer things to be in very deed true after such a sort, fashion, manner, and form, as sometimes they be reported and rehearsed.—To the second, I do answer and say, that this Article doth depend on the first Article next before, which after such sort, fashion, manner, and form as it is deduced, was justly by me, in my answer made unto the same, denied, and I therefore now not bounden by the law afterwards to make other answer thereunto.—To the third, I do answer and say, that I began to write a piece of my sermon, and being soon weary thereof, I did leave off, and did make only certain notes of my said sermon, and put the same notes in writing of mine own hand, without help or counsel of any other, and the same notes did shew unto my chaplains, Master Gilbert Bourne and Master John Harpsfield, both before and also since my said sermon, only desiring them to put me in remembrance of my said notes, and process to be made thereupon, and also to search out for me the names of such kings as were in their minority when they began to reign.—To the fourth, I do answer and say, that this Article doth depend upon the first and second Articles here before denied, deduced in such sort, manner, and form, as is expressed in the same, and moreover I say, that already answer is made hereunto by me, in my former answers made to the said pretended denunciation.—To the fifth, I do answer and say, that this Article also doth depend upon the first and second Articles, and that answer is made thereunto by me already in my former answers made unto the said pretended denunciation. And moreover I do say, that for the better advancement and setting forth of the king's majesty's royal power and authority even in his minority, and for the due obedience of his majesty's subjects unto his highness, even during the said minority, I had collected together as well out of histories, as also out of the Scripture of the Old Testament, the names of divers kings being in minority, who, notwithstanding their said minority, were faithfully, duly, and reverently obeyed, honoured, served, taken and reputed for very true and lawful kings, as Henry the 3d, being but nine years old when he entered to reign and govern as king. Edward the 3d, being but 13 years of age. Richard the 2d, being but 11 years of age. Henry the 6th, being not fully one year of age. Edward the 5th, being but 11 years old. Henry the 8th, being about 18 years old; and so all these kings being in their minority as the king's majesty that now is, and yet having authority and power legal, as appertaineth; and in the Old Testament, Ouis and Achis were very true kings in their minority, being but 16 years of age; Solomon and Manasses being but 14 years of age; Josias and Joachin being but 8 years of age, and Joas being but 8 years old: all which things I say I had collected in notes, communicating the same with my said two chaplains, and praying them to put me in remembrance, if in numbering of them, or in setting forth my other notes at the time of my sermon, I did fail, or have default of memory in anywise. And all these things I would have specially set forth in my said sermon if they had come to my memory, as indeed they did not, partly for disturbance of my memory not accustomed to preach in that place, partly also by reason of a certain writing that was sent me from the king's majesty's privy council, being of good length, to declare unto the people touching the victory against the rebels, specially in Norfolk, Devonshire, and Cornwall, confounding my memory in things which before I had set in good order, and partly also for the falling away of my book in the time of my said sermon, in which were contained divers of my said notes touching the king's majesty's minority, as is aforesaid, having yet nevertheless otherwise, in generality and speciality, persuaded the people to obedience, unto the king's said majesty, whose minority to them and all other is notoriously and manifestly known, and his majesty, saving of these late rebels, faithfully, truly, and reverently obeyed of all the rest of his subjects.—To the sixth, I do answer and say, that not knowing certainly of which Rebels the article meaneth, ne yet what their opinion is indeed, I ought not to be driven to make an answer hereunto, ne yet can make good and perfect answer thereon though I would.—To the seventh, I do answer and say, that albeit I have by the space of these five weeks last past and more, been in manner continually in business and trouble, as well in providing for my said sermon, as otherwise, specially by reason of my family, much vexed with sickness, to my great disquietness and charge, and also by reason that I have been so much troubled and cumbered by informations and complaints unjustly and uncharitably made against me, over and besides the having of divers and sundry persons, which daily resort and come unto me for their suits and business, both in matters of justice and otherwise, yet I have not omitted to send forth to my archdeacons and other my officers, to enquire and search diligently in this behalf, and to certify me accordingly, and yet I cannot hear certainly of any that have heard, been at, or celebrated masses or even song in the Latin tongue, after the old rite and manner, except it be in the house of my lady Mary's grace, or in the houses of the ambassadors, ne yet there nor in any of them, but by flying and not assured report, and without knowing the names and persons that so have heard, been at, or celebrate the same, and in this behalf how far I can and ought to proceed and after what sort, I do refer me unto the statute late made in that behalf.—To the eighth, I do answer and say, that this Article doth depend of the next article going before, and so consequently answer is already thereunto made.—To the ninth, I do answer and say, that touching such as either have been denounced or detected for such criminalous and culpable persons to me or my officers, there hath been process already made before my said officers, as it appeareth in my register, and the acts of my court: and moreover, I have given express commandment to my said officers, to enquire and search for more such offenders, and to certify me thereof, that I may proceed against them accordingly.—To the tenth, I do answer and say, That as touching the time mentioned in the Article, and the declaration to be made by doctor Cox, I do not well remember either the same time, or yet the special points and substance of the said doctor Cox's declaration: truth it is, I was at a sermon made at Paul's cross by the said doctor Cox, wherein he inveighed against my lord of Winchester, and as far as I can now call to my remembrance, it was touching disobedience, wherewith my lord of Winchester by the said doctor Cox seemed to be charged, and for a sermon also that my lord of Winchester was seeming to have made before the king's majesty in the court of Westminster.—To the eleventh Article being by itself delivered unto me the 14th of this present Sept. 1549, in the night at my house of London beginning thus, Item, that the rites, &c. and ending thus, The misuses thereof; I do answer and say, that I have already given commandment to my officers to make diligent search and enquiry herein, and to certify accordingly, to the intent I may proceed therein as appertaineth, and would before this time myself have also inquired and proceeded, had I not so been of all sides oppressed and pestered with multitude of other necessary business, as I have been, to my great disquietness and trouble."

When he had ended the reading of these Answers, the commissioners said unto him that he had in the same very obscurely answered unto the fifth article ministered the 13th of Sept. wherefore they willed him there expressly to answer by mouth, whether he had, according to the injunctions delivered unto him, declared the Article beginning thus, You shall also set forth in your sermon that our authority, &c. Whereunto he again answered, That he had already made as full and sufficient an answer in writing, as he was bound to make by law.—The Judges then replied, that the answers already made in that part were obscure and insufficient, so that it appeared not certainly whether he had preached indeed according to the same injunction or not; and therefore they afterwards willed him, as before, directly to answer whether he had so accordingly preached or no, the bishop still yet answering as before.—The Judges again demanded of him, whether he would otherwise answer or no. To the which he said, no, unless the law did compel him. Then they asked him whether he thought the law did compel him to answer more fully or no? He answered, no; adding further that he was not bound to answer to such positions.

The commissioners, then seeing his froward contumacy, told him plainly, that if he persisted thus in his frowardness, and would not otherwise answer, they would according to law take him pro confesso, and ex abundanti receive witnesses against him, and there withal did recite again to him six of the first and principal Articles, demanding his final answer thereunto. Who said, as before, that he had already fully answered them by writing; but where they requested to have his notes, which he said he had made of his sermon, they should have them if they would send for them. And whereas in his answer to the sixth article he doubted what the opinion of the rebels was, the Judges declared unto him that their opinion was, 'That the king's majesty, before his grace came to the age of 21 years, had not so full authority to make laws and statutes, as when he came to further years; and that his subjects were not bound to obey the laws and statutes made in his young age.' Whereunto the bishop answered, that he was not of the opinion of the rebels mentioned in that article, as did well appear by his answers as well unto the denunciation, as also unto the fifth article objected against him.

Which ended, they, perceiving his scornful carelessness, presently did admit for witness, upon the articles objected against him, master John Cheke, Henry Markham, John Joseph, John Dowglas, and Richard Chambers, whom also they orenated with a corporal oath upon the holy evangelists, truly to answer and depose upon the same articles in the presence of the bishop, who under his former protestation, like a wily lawyer, protested of the nullity of the receiving, admitting, and swearing of those witnesses, with protestation also to object against the persons and sayings of the witnesses in time and place convenient; demanding also a competent and lawful time to minister interrogatories against them, with a copy of all the acts to that day. Wherewith the delegates were well pleased, and assigned him to minister his interrogatories against master Cheke on that present day, and against the rest the next day before noon.

All which Interrogatories who so listeth to peruse, may hereunder read the same as followeth:

Certain Interrogatories exhibited by Bonner to be ministered against the foresaid Witnesses, upon the Articles above mentioned the 18th of September.

Item, whether they or any of them have been in times past a frier, preacher, Minorite, Augustine, or Carmelite, monk, canon-observant, or religious person, professing solemnly poverty, chastity, and obedience, according to the laws, customs, or ordinances of this realm, then used and observed, & interrog. ut supra.—9. Item, if they or any of them do depose that I have transgressed and offended touching the fifth article, let them and every of them be examined, in virtue of their oath, whether the injunctions pretended in this behalf were signed with the king's usual signet, or rather at all, whether it was sealed with any seal, whether it was subscribed by the lord protector's grace, or any of the privy council, whether it was in full council sitting delivered unto me by the lord protector, whether it was delivered to me, the rest of the king's majesty's privy council there then sitting, whether the said days as is contained in the fifth article, by whom it was written, when, and where, & interrog. ut supra.—14. and where, and what was their conference and communication therein, & interrog. ut supra.—20. Item, that they and every of them declare and shew the true and sufficient cause of their testimony, in all and singular the premises.”

After this the Judges delegate assigned the Bishop to appear again before them upon Wednesday then next ensuing, between the hours of seven and eight of the clock before noon, in the hall of the archbishop's manor of Lambeth, there to shew the cause why he should not be declared, pro confesso, upon all the articles whereunto he had not then fully answered, and to see further process done in the matter; and so (he still protesting of the nullity and invalidity of all their proceedings) they did for that present depart.—In this meanwhile the commissioners certified the king's majesty and his council, of the bishop's demeanour towards them, and what objections he had made against their proceedings, making doubts and ambiguities whether, by the tenor of his majesty's commission, the commissioners might proceed not only at the denunciation, but also at their mere office; and also whether they might as well determine or hear the cause. Whereupon his majesty by advice aforesaid, for the better understanding thereof, did the 17th of September send unto the commissioners a full and perfect Declaration and Interpretation of his will and pleasure in the foresaid commission, giving them hereby full authority to proceed at their own discretions, as appeareth more at large by the tenor thereof ensuing:

A certain Declaration or Interpretation of the King, touching certain points and doubts in his former Commission, with licence given to the Commissioners as well to determine as to hear, in the case of Bonner.

“EDWARD 6, by the grace of God, king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, in earth the supreme head; to the most reverend father in God, Thomas abp. of Canterbury, metropolitan and primate of England, the right rev. father in God Nicolas bp. of Rochester our trusty and right well-beloved counsellors, sir Wm. Peter and sir Tho. Smith knights, our two principal secretaries, and Wm. May doctor of law civil and dean of Paul's, greeting. Where we of late, by the advice of our most entirely beloved uncle Edward duke of Somerset, governor of our person, and protector of our realms, dominions, and subjects and the rest of our privy council, have addressed unto you, five, four or three of you, our letter's patents of commission bearing date at Westminster the 8th of Sept. in the 3rd year of our reign, willing you by force thereof to hear the matters and cause of contempt therein expressed, and calling before you as well the denouncers thereof, as also the right rev. father in God Edmund bp. of London, against whom such Denunciation is made, as in our said Letters of Commission more at large doth appear, we be now credibly informed, that upon the said commission divers doubts and ambiguities have and may arise.—As whether you by the tenor of the said commission may proceed not only at the denunciation, but also of mere office. And also whether ye may as well determine as hear the said cause. For further declaration whereof we do now interpret and declare, that our full mind and pleasure, by the advice aforesaid, was by our commission, and now is, that you should proceed as well by mere office, as also by the way of denunciation, and either of them, or by any other ways or means at your discretions, whereby the truth and merits of the cause may be most speedily and best known; and that ye might and may as well finally determine as hear the said matters; in all your orders and doings, cutting away all vain and superfluous delays, and having respect to the only truth of the matter. And this our declaration we send unto you of our sure knowledge and mere motion, by the advice aforesaid, supplying all default, ceremony, and point of the law, which hath, shall, or may arise of your doings by reason of any default of words in our said former commission or any part thereof, any law, statute, or act to the contrary notwithstanding. And therefore we will and command you to proceed in the said matters accordingly, as well to our foresaid commission as this our declaration, and to fail ye not. In witness whereof we have made these our letters patents. At Hampton Court the 17th day of September.”

AFTER this Declaration being sent down and received from the king, the bp. of London, (according to the commissioners assignment the Monday before) appeared again before them upon Wednesday the 8th of Sept. in the great hall at Lambeth. Where under his wonted protestation, first he declared, that although he had already sufficiently answered all things, yet further to satisfy the term assigned unto him, to shew cause why he ought not to be declared, pro confesso, upon the articles theretofore ministered against him, and to the which he had not fully answered, he had then a matter in writing to exhibit unto them, why he ought not so to be declared, which he read there openly. Wherein first under his accustomed unreverent terms of pretended, unjust, and unlawful process and assignation, he said he was not bound by the law (for good and reasonable causes) to obey the same, especially their assignation.—And first, for that the same was only pronounced by sir Tho. Smith, one of the pretended commissioners, without the consent of his pretended colleagues; or at the least he as a commissioner did prescribe the actuary what to write, which he ought not to have done, because by law he ought not to have intermeddled therein, for that his colleagues did the first day begin to sit as judges against him the bishop, without the presence of the said sir Tho. Smith.—And secondly, because his Answers, as well unto the pretended denunciation, as also to all the articles theretofore objected against him, were as full and sufficient, as the law required (or at leastwise there was nothing good in law apparent to the contrary) and therefore he was not enforced by law further to answer thereunto without further allegation.—And because also that all their proceedings thereto were so extraordinarily done, that they had confounded all manner of lawful process, sometimes proceeding ad denunciandum, sometimes ex officio mero, and sometimes ex officio mixto, contrary unto the king's ecclesiastical laws, and contrary also unto their commission in that behalf.—And likewise because divers of the articles pretended were superfluous and impertinent, not revealing though they were proved, containing in them untruth and falsity, some obscure and uncertain, some depending upon other articles either denied or at the least qualified, some captious and deceitful to bring the answerer into a snare, and some also being articles of the law, in such sort as by the ecclesiastical laws of this realm the king's subjects were not bound to make answer thereunto.—And lastly, because that sir Tho. Smith, secretary to the king's majesty, when that the bishop was last with the council in the council chamber at White Hall, after the departure of the lord protector and the rest of the council, did himself alone (without any other) write certain articles, or injunctions (amongst the which was that of the king's authority in his minority) and afterward did copy the same at the table within the said council chamber, and so himself did deliver them unto him. By reason whereof that is not true, which in the commission, denunciation and articles was deduced and objected against him.

When these fond and frivolous objections were thus read, the archbishop seeing his inordinate and intolerable contempt towards them, charged him very sharply, saying, My lord of London, if I had sitten here only as archbishop of Canterbury, it had been your part to have used yourself more lowly, obediently and reverently towards me than you have; but seeing that I with my colleagues sit here now as delegates from the king's majesty, I must tell you plain, you have behaved yourself too much inordinately. For at every time that we have sitten in commission, you have used such unseemly fashions, without all reverence and obedience, giving taunts and checks as well unto us, with divers of the servants and chaplains, as also unto certain of the ancientest that be here, calling them fools and daws, with such like, as that you have given to the multitude an intolerable example of disobedience. And I insure you my lord, there is you and one other bishop whom I could name, that have used yourselves so contemptuously and disobediently, as the like I think hath not before been heard of or seen, whereby ye have done much harm.

At which words the gross bishop (a beast a man might justly term him) said scornfully to the archbishop, You shew yourself to be a meet judge.

The archbishop then proceeding laid to his charge how indiscretely the last day in the chapel he had called all the people woodcocks.—Whereunto he answered, that the last session Wm. Latimer, one of the denouncers, being there present, had practised with the audience that when he lifted up his hand to them, they should (and did as it were by a token given them) say as he said, and do as he did; as one time upon the lifting up of his hand, they cried, nay, nay; and at another time, yea, yea, and laughed they could not tell whereat, with such like fashions.

Unto which words Latimer, seeing his vain suspicion, replied saying, that he lifted not up his hand at any time but only to cause them to hold their peace.—Then secretary Smith said to the bishop, that in all his writings and answers that he had hitherto laid in, he would not once acknowledge them as the king's commissioners, but used always protestations with divers inkhorne and naughty terms, calling them pretended commissioners, pretended delegates, pretended commission, pretended articles, pretended proceedings, so that all things were 'pretended' with him. Indeed (said he) such terms the proctors of churches use, to delay matters for their clients, when they will not have the truth known: but you my lord to use us the king's majesty's commissioners with such terms, you do therein very lewdly and naughtily. And I pray you what other thing did the rebels?—For when letters or pardons were brought them from the king and his council, they would not credit them, but said they were none of the king's or his council's, but gentlemen's doings, and made under a bush, with such like terms. But now my lord, because hitherto we cannot make you confess whether, in your Sermon that you preached, ye omitted the article touching the king's majesty's authority in his tender age or not, but still have said that ye will not otherwise answer than ye have done, and that ye have already sufficiently answered (with many such delays) so as we can by no means induce you to confess plainly what you did, yea or nay; therefore I say, to the intent we may come to the truth, we have dilated the matter more at large, and have drawn out other articles whereunto you shall be sworn, and then I trust you will dally with us no more as you have done. For although ye make your answers in writing, yet you shall be examined by us and make your answers by mouth to the same articles, or else you shall do worse. Indeed I do not, (as I said) discommend your protestations and terms of law, if it were in a young proctor that would help his client's cause; but in you it may not be suffered so to use the king's commissioners.

Then did the delegates minister unto him certain new articles and injunctions, and did there oenerate him with a corporal oath in form of law to make a full and true answer thereunto. The bishop notwithstanding still (according to his wonted manner) under his former protestation protested of the nullity and invalidity of these articles, injunctions, and process, desiring also a copy thereof, with a competent time to answer thereunto. To whom the judges decreed a copy, commanding him to come to his examination to the archbishop the next day at 8 o'clock before noon. —Then the commissioners did receive for witness, upon these new articles now ministered unto the bishop, sir John Mason, sir Thomas Chalenor, knts. master Wm. Cicil, Armigel Wade, and Wm. Hunnings, clerks to the king's majesty's council, whom they operated with a corporal oath in the presence of the bishop, who still protesting of the nullity of their receiving and swearing, objected against them and their sayings; and therewith, repeating his interrogatories already ministered, said he had more to minister by to-morrow at 8 o'clock. —The same day and time likewise the bishop exhibited unto the commissioners an information, or rather cavillation against Wm. Latimer, for that he, notwithstanding that he had in all his talk pretended the great tranquillity of this realm, which was greatly impeached and hindered when that any of the king's subjects should think that his majesty hath not as full power and authority royal in his minority, as when his majesty came to perfect age, or should think that his subjects were not bound to obey the same, yet hath of late there in open audience reported, that he hath heard with his ears divers persons unreverently speak of the king's majesty, saying, Tush, the king is but a babe or child, what laws can he make? or what can he do in his minority? Let him have a toast and butter, or bread and milk, and that is more meet for him than to make laws and statutes, or to bind us to obey them; we are not bound to obey till he be past his minority, and come to his full and perfect age: with the hearing of which words the bishop also charged the commissioners, and that because Latimer, at the recital of the same in their presence, was neither by them controlled, nor yet caused to bring forth the same persons, but was let pass in silence, saying that he the said bishop did speak against him in that behalf, saying, That he would detect him, because that, as it appeared, he had of long time concealed the words and not opened the same in such place and to such persons as he ought to have done, but had kept the persons and sayings of them secret, either not taking the matter to be of such importance as he pretended, or else thereby unfaithfully behaving himself towards his prince, and therefore was worthy with his aiders, favourers, and counsellors to be punished.

These vain cavillations ended, the commissioners for that day finished their session, assigning the bishop to appear in that same place again upon Monday then next following, between the hours of six and nine, in the forenoon, then and there to shew a final cause why he should not be declared pro confesso. And so delivering him a copy of the Articles, they departed; the contents whereof ensue:

Articles and Positions given by the King's Commissioners to the Bishop of London, to be answered by him jointly and severally in every point the second time.

“ 1. THAT ye were sent for to the lord protector's grace, and the rest of the council, and came thither into the court at Westminster the tenth of August, or some other day of the same month. 2. That at the same time the lord protector and divers other of the king's majesty's privy council sitting in council, ye were called in, and there the said lord protector did on the king's majesty's behalf declare unto you divers faults and abuses the which were found in you, and gave you straight charge to amend them, adding threatening that else you should be otherwise looked unto. 3. That the said lord protector's grace did declare unto you, for better admonition and amendment of you, that you should have from the king's majesty, by his advice and the rest of the privy council, certain articles and injunctions, to observe and follow, given you in writing. 4. That there and then the said lord protector commanded sir Thomas Smith knight, secretary to the king's majesty, to read a certain proper book of injunctions and articles unto you, the said secretary standing at the council table's end, and you standing by and hearing the same. 5. That the said lord protector there and then willed certain things in the said book of injunctions to be reformed, as where ye were appointed to preach sooner, at your request it was appointed unto you to preach the Sunday three weeks after the date of the said writing. 6. That in the said articles the lord protector's grace found fault, because an article or commandment unto you set forth and declared of the king's majesty's authority now in his young age and of his laws and statutes in the same time, was omitted, and therefore either immediately before you came into the council chamber, or you being present and standing by, commanded the said secretary Smith to put in writing and annex it to the rest of the articles. 7. That the said secretary Smith, then and there did, immediately upon commandment, write into the said book or paper, wherein the rest of the articles were written, the said article; videlicet, You shall also set forth in your sermon, that the authority of our royal power is (as the truth it is) of no less authority and force in this our young age, then was of any of our predecessors, though the same were much elder, as may appear by example of Josias and other young kings in the scripture, and therefore all our subjects to be no less bound to the obedience of our precepts, laws, and statutes, than if we were of thirty or forty years of age. 8. That the lord protector did so deliver you the book or paper, willing first the said secretary Smith to amend all things as he had appointed. 9. That ye then and there did promise to the lord protector's grace, that ye would observe and fulfil all in the said injunctions and articles contained. 10. That all things in the said book, put in and mentioned by the said secretary Smith, and the same so read to you by him, and you first agreeing that all that was by him so written was by the lord protector's appointment, the said book was so delivered unto you then and there by the said secretary Smith in the council chamber. 11. That you have the said book in your possession, or else know where it is, the true copy whereof in effect is annexed to these articles. 12. That ye were commanded in the same injunctions to preach the Sunday three weeks after the delivery thereof at Paul's, and there to intreat upon certain articles, as is specified in the said book of injunctions, and especially in the said article beginning, Ye shall also set forth, und ending, thirty or forty years of age. 13. That for the accomplishment of part of the said injunctions and commandment, you did preach the first day of September last past at Paul's Cross. 14. That at the said sermon, contrary to your injunctions; ye omitted and left out the said article beginning, Ye shall also set forth in your sermon, &c. and ending, thirty or forty years of age. 15. Ye shall also answer whether ye think and believe that the king's majesty's subjects be bound to obey as well the laws, statutes, proclamations, and other ordinances made now in this young age of the king's majesty, as the laws, statutes, proclamations, and ordinances made by his highness's progenitors."

These Articles being thus ministered to the said bishop of London, the next day being Thursday and the 19th of Sept. the forenamed commissioners sat in the archbishop's chamber of presence at Lambeth, attending the coming of the bishop of London. Before whom there appeared Robert Johnson the bishop's register, and there did declare unto the commissioners that the bishop his master could not at that time personally appear before them without great danger of his bodily health, because that he feared to fall into a fever by reason of a cold that he had taken by too much overwatching himself the last night before, whereby he was compelled to keep his bed: nevertheless, if he could without danger of his bodily health he would appear before them the same day at afternoon. This excuse the judges were content to take in good part. Yet said master secretary Smith, That if he were sick indeed, the excuse was reasonable and to be allowed, but (quothe) I promise you, my lord hath so dallied with us, and used hitherto such delays, that we may mistrust that this is but a feigned excuse: howbeit upon your faithful declaration we are content to tarry until one of the clock at afternoon, and so they did, willing Mr. Johnson to signify then unto them whether the bishop could appear or not.

ing that, for the causes afore alledged, their master could not appear at that time neither. Whereupon master secretary Smith said unto them, My lord of London your master hath used us very homely, and sought delay; hitherto, and now perhaps, perceiving these last articles to touch the quick, and therefore loth to come to his answer, he feigneth himself sick. But because he shall not so deceive us any more, we will send the knight marshal unto him, willing him if he be sick indeed to let him alone, for that is a reasonable excuse; but if he be not sick, then to bring him forthwith to us; for I promise you he shall not use us as he hath done, we will not take it at his hands: and therefore master Johnson, said he, you do the part of a trusty servant as becometh you, but it is also your part to shew my lord his stubborn heart and disobedience, which doth him more harm than he is aware of. What, thinketh he to stand with a king in his own realm: Is this the part of a subject? Nay, I wene we shall have a new Thomas Becket. Let him take heed, for if he play these parts he may fortune to be made shorter by the head. He may appeal if he think good; but whether? To the bishop of Rome? So he may help himself forwards. I say he cannot appeal but to the same king who hath made us his judges, and to the bench of his council, and how they will take this matter when they hear of it, I doubt not. He would make men believe that he were called before us for preaching his opinion of the sacrament, wherein I assure you he did both falsely and naughtily, yea and lewdly, and more than became him, and more than he had in commandment to do, for he was not willed to speak of that matter, and perhaps he may hear more of that hereafter; but yet we will lay no such thing to his charge, and therefore we will not have him to delay us as he doth. Which ended, the delegates notwithstanding decreed to tarry again for him until two of the clock at afternoon the next day, being Friday, and the 20th of September.

The fifth Action or Process the 20th of September, against Bonner Bishop of London, before the King's Commissioners.

At which day and time the bishop appeared himself personally before them in the same chamber of presence; where first he did exhibit his Answers unto the last articles ministered unto him the 18th of September, the contents whereof hereunder follow.

The Answer of the said Bishop of London made unto the Articles ministered unto him the second time.

"THE ANSWERS of me Edmund bishop of London, under mine accustomed protestation given unto the articles of late ministered and exhibited against me here in this court, with special protestation also, that I do not intend in any wise to make answer to any of the said articles, otherwise than the law of this realm doth bind me to do, nor to speak or say contrary to any thing that in my former answers I have said or done; and that if it so chance me to do, it is not nor shall not be with my good will or full consent, and that so soon as I shall perceive it, I intend to revoke it, and so now as then, and then as now, do so in that case revoke, to all honest and lawful purposes.—To the first article I do answer and say, that there was a messenger, whose name I know not, that came unto me to Fulham, as I now remember, but I do not remember the day thereof, and he said that my lord protector's grace required me to come by and by to speak with him. And thereupon, having made the said messenger to break his fast, I repaired to the court at Westminster, but not upon the tenth day of August, but some other day of the said month.—To the second I do say, that it is obscure, uncertain, and over general, especially in those words at the same time, which may be referred to the tenth of August, and then answer already is made thereunto, and it may be referred to some other day of the said month of August, either before the tenth of August, or after. And because it remaineth undeclared, I am not bound in law to answer unto it, neither yet to these words and sentences in the said article, to wit, Then, and there, for they without declaration are uncertain, obscure, and general, and I, before the specification and declaration thereof, not bound herein to make an answer, specially having already made full and sufficient answer in this matter, according to the commission, as I do take it, and according unto the law; which also willeth, that if a certain answer be looked for, the position and article must before be certain.—To the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th articles, he answereth all after one manner and sort, as thus, that it doth depend of the former articles, to which for causes aforesaid, he saith, he is not bound in law to make answer, especially having already made.—Saying that in the 6th, he addeth thereunto, that he at no time heard the lord protector find fault, nor commanded as is deduced in the said article, so far as he doth find. Also saying the 7th article, where he addeth nevertheless confessing and acknowledging, with heart and mouth, the king's majesty's authority and regal power and minority, as well and full as in his majority. Also saving the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th articles, where he addeth, as they be deduced they are not true, as appeareth in conferring one with another.—To the 12th and 14th articles, he addeth as they be deduced they are not true; confessing nevertheless the king's majesty's authority and power regal, as before is expressed.—To the 15th article he answereth and saith, That it is a position in law, and that yet both now and heretofore he hath made answer thereunto in effect and substance, as appeareth in his former answers, and so shall do always according to the law and his bounden duty, acknowledging, as he hath already done, the king's majesty's regal power in his minority to be no less than in his majority, and the subjects bound to obey unto his grace, his laws, statutes, and ordinances, and his said authority, as well in his minority as in his majority, not allowing, but expressly condemning the opinion of all rebels holding the contrary."

After this, perceiving that master secretary Smith was somewhat more quick with him than others of the commissioners, and that he would not suffer him any longer to dally out the matter with his vain quiddities and subtilties in law, but ever earnestly urged him to go directly to his matter, and therewithal sometimes sharply rebuking him for his evil and stubborn behaviour towards them; he to de'ace his authority, as he thought, did also then exhibit in writing a Recusation of the secretary's Judgment against him. The form and manner whereof, as he exhibited it unto the judges, I thought here also to exhibit unto the reader as hereunder followeth:

"In the name of God, Amen. Forsomuch as equity, natural reason, and all good laws do require that judges shall be of that integrity, wisdom, circumspection, learning, and indifference, that exercising the office and room of a judge, they may and shall do it without hatred, malice, or grudge against any person convened or called before them, uprightly, sincerely, and duly executing and doing their office unto them in any wise committed; and forsomuch also as all judgments and process ought to have their due course, and proceed without suspicion or corruption in any wise, and finally forsomuch as very dangerous it is to appear and make defence before an incompetent judge, who commonly and accustomedly of private and unlawful corrupt affection to the one side, and for malice, hatred and envy born against the other side, rather serveth his carnal, corrupt, and wilful appetite, than any thing else is moved to obedience and keeping of good order, law, or reason, touching him that is convened and compelled to make answer against his will: I therefore Edmund bishop of London, having perceived and felt by all the sayings, proceedings, and doings of you sir Thomas Smith, knight, one of the two principal secretaries to the king's majesty, in this matter attempted and moved against me, that ye have been, and yet continually are a notorious and manifest enemy of me the said Edmund, and much offended that I should in any wise alledge and say, or use any such things for my most defence, as the law giveth me licence and liberty to do, yea, hearing most favourably and effectually my denouncers and enemies with both ears in any thing that they shall alledge, purpose, attempt, or do against me, though their persons in law are not in any wise to be heard or admitted, nor yet their sayings true, and not hearing me so much as with one ear in my lawful sayings and doings in this behalf;

but contrariwise opening your mouth at large, ye have sundry times against good wisdom and reason outraged in words and deeds against me the said Edmund, saying among other words, that I did as thieves, murderers, and traitors are wont to do, being myself as ye untruly did say, inward indeed culpable, and yet outward otherwise unable to defend the matter against me, but only by taking exceptions, and making frivolous allegations against my judges and commissioners, and that I have been and am as sturdy, wilful, and disobedient, as may be in your judgment and opinion, maintaining and upholding the rebels and their opinions, and that I shall answer by mouth, or else smart and do worse, or else ye will send me to the Tower, there to sit and be joined with Ket and Humphrey Arundel the rebels; over and besides divers other threatenings and comminatory words by you pronounced and uttered unseemly, and far unmeet to proceed out of the mouth of you that are in such room and place as ye be in.—And moreover, increasing your malice, evil will and grudge born against me, ye have amongst other things untruly surmised, written, alledged, and said, that a certain book of articles and injunctions by the lord protector's grace in the full council after a certain prescribed fashion and form in the denunciation, commission, and articles, which, de facto were induced, brought in and objected against me, was delivered unto me; and moreover of an evil will and ungodly intent and purpose, contrary to the truth, ye have withdrawn, added, altered, and qualified divers things in the same, otherwise than they were spoken and done, and yet ye are not ashamed to alledge, write, and say, that all is true, and one consonant and agreeable in all points with the other, where indeed it is not so: and yet have further (de facto) against the law, and against the commission to you directed, and against my just and lawful allegations and sayings, proceeded unlawfully and unjustly against me, attempting many things against me unlawfully and unjustly, as appeareth in the acts of this matter, to the which I do refer me so far forth as they make for me, and be expedient by me, and for me to be alledged, and referred unto yourself also unlawfully and unjustly (de facto) with your colleagues, the which without you had begun the said matters, proceeding where by the law ye so ought not to have done indeed, but abstained therefrom, as heretofore sundry times I have alledged, appearing in the acts of this court; do upon these just and reasonable causes, according to the order of the king's majesty's ecclesiastical laws, refuse, decline, and recuse you the said sir Thomas Smith, as an incompetent, unmeet, and suspect judge, against me in this behalf, and decline your pretended jurisdiction in this matter for causes aforesaid, desiring nothing but justice, and offering myself prompt and ready to prove them as far as I am bound, and according to the order of the king's majesty's ecclesiastical laws of this realm in this behalf, as time, place, and otherwise shall require."

This Recusation ended, the secretary told him plain, that notwithstanding he would proceed in his commission, and would be still his Judge until he were otherwise inhibited; and said unto him further, My lord, whereas you say in your recusation that I said, that you did like thieves, murderers, and traitors, indeed I said it, and may and will so say again, since we perceive it by your doings.—Whereunto the bishop in a great and stout rage replied, saying, Well, sir, because you sit here by virtue of the king's commission, and for that ye be secretary to his majesty, and also one of his highness's council, I must and do honour and reverence you; but as you be but sir Thomas Smith, and say as ye have said, that I do like thieves, murderers, and traitors, I say ye lie upon me, and in that case I defy you, and do what ye can to me, I fear you not, and therefore, quod facis, fac citius.—Whereat the archbishop with the other commissioners said unto him, that for such his unreverent behaviour he was worthy imprisonment.—Then the bishop, in more mad fury than before, said again unto him, A God's name ye may do de facto, send me whither you will, and I must obey you, and so will, except ye send me to the devil, for thither I will not go for you. Three things I have (to wit) a small portion of goods, a poor carcass, and mine own soul: the two first ye may take, though unjustly, to you, but as for my soul ye get not, Quia anima mea in manibus meis semper.—Well, said the secretary, then ye shall know that there is a king. Yea, sir, saith the bishop, but that is not you, neither, I am sure, will you take it upon you.—No, sir, said again the secretary, but we will make you know who it is; and with that the commissioners commanded the bishop and all the rest to depart the chamber, until they called for him again.

Now in the meanwhile that the commissioners were in consultation, the bishop with Gilbert Bourne his chaplain, Robert Warrington his commissary, and Robert Johnson his register, were tarrying in a quadrant void place, before the door of the same chamber. Where the bishop leaning on a cupboard, and seeing his chaplains very sad, said unto them in effect as followeth: Sirs, what mean you? why shew you yourselves to be sad and heavy in mind, as appeareth to me by your outward gestures and countenances? I would wish you, and I require you to be as merry as I am, (laying therewith his hand upon his breast) for afore God I am not sad nor heavy, but merry and of good comfort, and am right glad and joyful of this my trouble, which is for God's cause, and it grieveth me nothing at all.

But the great matter that grieveth me and pierceth my heart, is, for that this Hooper and such other vile heretics and beasts be suffered and licensed to preach at Paul's cross, and in other places within my diocese and cure, most detestably preaching and railing at the blessed sacrament of the altar, and denying the verity and presence of Christ his true body and blood to be there, and so infect and betray my flock.

But I say it is there in very deed, and in that opinion I will live and die, and am ready to suffer death for the same. Wherefore, ye being Christian men, I do require you and also charge and command you in the name of God, and on his behalf, as ye will answer him for the contrary, that ye go to the mayor of London, and to his brethren the aldermen, praying and also requiring them earnestly in God's name and mine, and for mine own discharge on that behalf, that from henceforth, when any such detestable and abominable preachers (and especially those which hold opinion against the blessed sacrament of the altar) do come to preach unto them, they forthwith depart out of their presence, and do not hear them, lest that they tarrying with such preachers, should not only hurt themselves in receiving their poisoned doctrine, but also give a visage to the encouragement of others, which thereby might take an occasion to think and believe that their erroneous and damnable doctrine is true and good: and this eftsoons I require and command you to do.—And then turning himself about, and beholding two of the archbishop's gentlemen, which in the same place kept the chamber door where the commissioners were in consultation, and perceiving that they had heard all his talk, he spake unto them also and said, And sirs, ye be my lord of Canterbury's gentlemen, I know ye very well; and therefore I also require and charge you in God's behalf, and in his name, that ye do the like for your parts in places where you shall chance to see and hear such corrupt and erroneous preachers, and also advertise my lord your master of the same, and of these my sayings that I have now spoken here before you, as ye are Christian men, and shall answer before God for the contrary.

With this the commissioners called for the bishop again, who did read unto them an instrument, containing a provocation to the king, which he made in manner and form here following:

“In the name of God, Amen. It shall appear to all men by this public instrument that An. Dom. 1549, the 20th day of September, the 3rd year of the reign of our most high and renowned prince Edward the 6th, by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and in earth the supreme head of the Church of England and Ireland, in a chamber within the palace of the said bishop, situated in London, and in the presence of me the public notary, and of the witnesses hereafter named, the foresaid bishop did personally appear, and there did shew forth in writing a certain protestation and appellation, the tenor whereof ensueth:

‘In the name of God, Amen. I Edmund Bishop of London, say, alledge, and propound before you, being a public notary, and these credible witnesses here present, that although I the foresaid Edmund have attained the bishopric aforesaid by the benevolence of the famous prince of memory king Henry the 8th, and was lawfully elected and translated to the same, with his rights and appurtenances, have of a long time possessed peaceably and quietly the same, and presently do possess, being taken as bishop and lawful possessor of the said bishopric, and am lawfully called, taken, and reputed notoriously and publicly; and moreover do keep residence and hospitality on the same, according to the order, state, person, and dignity, and as the revenues of the same would permit, and have exercised and done all things appertaining to my pastoral office, as the laws do require, as hereafter I trust by God's grace to do and observe, a man of good name and fame, neither suspended, excommunicated, nor interdicted, neither convict of any notable crime or fact, always obeying readily the commandment of the Church, and other my superiors in all lawful causes, nevertheless fearing upon certain probable causes, likely conjectures, threatenings, and assertions of certain injurious men my enemies, or at the least, such as little favour me, that great damage may come to me hereafter about the premises or part of them; and lest any man by any authority, commandment, denunciation, inquisition, office, or at the request of any person or persons, may attempt prejudice or hurt to me or my said dignity, either by my excommunication, interdiction, sequestration, spoiling, vexing, and perturbing by any manner of means; do appeal unto the most high and mighty prince our sovereign lord Edward the 6th by the grace of God, king of England, France, &c. and in these my writings do provoke and appeal to his regal majesty. I do also require the apostles, so much as in this case they are to be required, the first, second, and third time, earnestly, more earnestly, and most earnestly of all, that there may be given to me the protection, tuition, and defence of my foresaid most dread sovereign lord, for the safeguard of me, my dignity and title, and possession in the premises, and to all that will cleave to me in this behalf. I do also protest, that I will be contented to correct, reform, and amend this my present protestation, and to the same to add, to take away, and to bring the same into the best form and state that may be devised, by the counsel of learned men, or as the case shall require, and the same to intimate according to time and place, and the order of the law, and still shall require.’

“Upon all the which things the foresaid Edmund bishop of London did require the public notary hereunto written to make unto him, and the witnesses hereafter named, one, two, or more copies of this Protestation. These things were done the year, day, and time above written, there being present Gilbert Bourne bachelor of divinity, John Harpsfield and Robert Colen, masters of art, John Wakeling and Richard Rogers learned men, being of the diocese of Worcester, Westminster, Coventry, Litchfield, and Gloucester, and specially requested to be witnesses of the same. And I

Francis Harward of the diocese of Worcester and public notary by the king's regal authority, forsomuch as I was present when the foresaid protestation, appellation, and other the premises were done, the year of our Lord, the year of the reign of the king, the day of the month and place aforesaid, the witnesses above named being present, and forsomuch as I did inact the same, therefore to this present public instrument, written faithfully with mine own hand, I have put to my mark, being specially requested unto the same."

Which thing after he had read, he did under his protestation first intimate unto the archbishop, the bishop of Rochester, and doctor May, and then protesting also not to recede from his recusation, did likewise intimate the same unto master secretary Smith, requiring the register to make an instrument as well thereupon, as also upon his recusation, with witness to testify the same.—Then the delegates did again proceed to the examination of the last Answers, and finding the same imperfect, they demanded of him (according to the first article) what special day of August he was sent for by the lord protector: to whom he obstinately answered; that he was not bound to make other answer than he had already made, unless they did put their articles more certain: neither would he otherwise answer as long as Mr. secretary Smith was there present, whom he had before recused, and therefore would not recede from his recusation.—The secretary, seeing him so wilful and perverse, said sharply unto him, My lord, come off and make a full and perfect answer unto these articles, or else we will take other order with you to your pain.—In faith, sir, then said the bishop again, I thought ye had been learned, but now before God I perceive well that either ye be not learned indeed, or else ye have forgotten it: for I have so often answered lawfully and sufficiently, and have so oft shewed causes sufficient and reasonable, why thereunto I ought not by law to be compelled (you shewing nothing to the contrary but sensuality and will) that I must needs judge that you are too ignorant herein. Well, said Mr. Secretary, ye will not then otherwise answer? No, said the bishop, except the law do compel me. Then said the secretary, call for the knight marshal, that he may be had to ward.

With that all the rest of the commissioners charged the bishop, that he had at that time sundry ways very outrageously and irreverently behaved himself towards them sitting on the king's majesty's commission, and especially towards sir Thomas Smith his grace's secretary, and therefore, and for divers other contumelious words which he had spoken, they declared they would commit him to the Marshalsea.—By this time the marshal's deputy came before them, whom Mr. Secretary commanded to take the bishop as prisoner, and so to keep him that no man might come unto him, for if he did, he should sit by him himself. When the secretary had ended his talk, the bishop said unto him,

Well sir, it might have become you right well that my lord's grace here present, being first in commission, and your better, should have done it. Then the commissioners assigning him to be brought before them on Monday next before noon, between seven and nine of the clock in the hall of that place, there to make full answer to these articles, or else to shew cause why he should not be declared pro confesso, did for that present break up that session.

Now as the bishop was departing with the under marshal, he in a great fury turned himself again toward the commissioners, and said to sir Thomas Smith; Sir, where ye have committed me to prison, ye shall understand, that I will require no favour at your hands, but shall willingly suffer what shall be put unto me, as bolts on my heels, yea, and if ye will, irons about my middle, or where ye will.—Then departing again he yet returned once more, and so foaming out his poison, said unto the archbishop, well, my lord, I am sorry that I being a bishop am thus handled at your grace's hand; but more sorry that ye suffer abominable heretics to practise as they do in London and elsewhere, infecting and disquieting the king's liege people: and therefore I do require you, as you will answer to God and the king, that ye will henceforth abstain thus to do, for if you do not, I will accuse you before God and the king's majesty; answer to it as well as ye can. And so he departed, using many reproachful words against sundry of the common people, which stood and spake to him by the way as he went.

It was assigned as ye have heard in the fourth act prosecuted the 18th of September, that upon Monday then next following, being the 23rd day of the same month, the bishop should again appear before the commissioners, within the great hall at Lambeth, then to shew a final cause why he should not be declared pro confesso, upon all the articles whereunto he had not fully answered.—According to which assignment, the same 23rd day of September, the bishop was brought before them by the under-marshal (to whom for his disobedient and obstinate behaviour he was before that time committed) and there did first declare unto them, that his appearance at that time and place was not voluntary, but coerced, for that he was against his will brought thither by the keeper of the Marshalsea, and therewithal also under his former protestation, recusation and appeal, did then again intimate a general recusation of all the commissioners, alledging in the same, that because the archbishop with all his colleagues had neither observed the order of their commission, neither yet proceeded against him after any laudable or good fashion of judgment, but contrarywise had sundry times as well in his absence, as in his presence, attempted many things unlawfully against his person, dignity and state, especially in committing him to strait prison, and yet commanding him to make answer; and further, because that he with the rest had proceeded in commission with sir Thomas Smith, knight, supporting and maintaining all his evil doings (notwithstanding that he the said bishop had before justly recused and declined from him) he therefore did also there refuse and decline from the judgment of the said archbishop and his colleagues, and did except against their jurisdiction as suspect, and they thereby unmeet persons to proceed against him; therefore, according to his former appeal, he intended to submit himself under the tuition, protection, and defence of the king's majesty; for whose honour and reverence sake (he said) they ought not to proceed any further against him, but quietly suffer him to use the benefit of all the recusations, provocations, and other lawful remedies before alledged, with other superfluous words, at large to be read and seen as followeth:

"IN the name of God, Amen. Forasmuch as both natural reason and all good policies of laws, especially of this realm of England, do admit and suffer him that is convented before an uncompetent and suspect judge, to refuse him and to decline his jurisdiction, in as much as law and reason on the one side willet process to run uprightly and justly, and that on the other side corruption and malice laboureth to the contrary, and needeth therefore to be bridled; and because ye my lord of Canterbury with your colleagues in this behalf (deputed as ye say commissioners against me) neither have observed your said commission, neither yet proceeded hitherto against me after any laudable, lawful, or any good fashion of judgment, but contrariwise, contrary to your commission, and against the law, good reason and order, have at sundry times, and in sundry acts attempted and done many things against me unlawfully, unseemly, and unjustly, and suffer the like to be attempted and done by other, not reforming and amending the same, as appeareth in divers and sundry things remaining in your acts.—And moreover, because you my said lord with your said colleagues, have both in mine absence, being let with just causes of impediment which according to the laws of this realm I have fully alledged, and very sufficiently and justly proved according to the order of the king's ecclesiastical laws, injuriously, and much to the hinderance of my name, person, title, dignity, and state, and also otherwise, specially in my presence, against all laws, good order, and reason, without good cause or ground, attempted and done many things against me, especially touching mine imprisonment, sending me to straight ward, and yet commanding me to make answer, as appeareth in your unlawful acts.—I for these causes, and also for that ye my said lord and your said colleagues proceeding with sir Thomas Smith, knight (whom upon just and lawful causes I have refused, recused and declined) have favoured, yea maintained, supported and borne him, in his unlawful and evil doings, do also refuse, recuse, and decline you my said lord with the rest of your said colleagues agreeing and joining with you, and do except against your proceedings, doings and jurisdiction as suspect, and thereby unmeet persons to proceed herein against me.—And further I do alledge, that having been provoked to the king's most excellent majesty, as appeareth by the tenor of my provocation, remaining in your acts, whereunto I do protest that I intend to adhere and cleave, submitting myself unto the tuition, protection, and defence of his said majesty in this behalf, ye in anywise ought not (if ye regard the person and authority of his grace's royal power, as ye ought to do) proceed herein against me, especially for the honour and reverence ye ought to have unto his majesty in this behalf. And because it appeareth that ye do not duely and circumspectly consider the same, as ye ought to do, but more and more do grieve me; that considered, I both here to all purposes repeat my former recusation, provocation, and all other remedies that heretofore I have used and mentioned in your said acts; And also do by these presents refuse, recuse, and decline you my said lord, and your said colleagues, and your jurisdiction, upon causes aforesaid, offering myself prompt and ready to prove all the same, afore an arbiter and arbiters, according to the tenor and form of the law herein to be chosen requiring you all, for that honour and reverence ye ought to bear to our said sovereign lord, and his laws allowed and approved in this behalf, that ye do not attempt or do, nor yet suffer to be attempted or done, any thing in any wise against me, or unto my prejudice, but suffer me to use and enjoy the benefit of my said former and this recusation, provocation, allegation, and other lawful remedies mentioned in your said acts. And in case ye do de facto, where ye ought not de jure to attempt or suffer any thing to be attempted or done against me in any wise herein, I protest herewith, and hereby, of my great grief and hurt in that behalf, and that not only I do intend to appeal from you, but also, according to the king's ecclesiastical laws, to accuse and complain upon you, as justly and truly I both may and ought to do."

Notwithstanding these Recusations, and former appellation, the archbishop with the rest told him plain that they would be still his judges, and proceed against him according to the king's commission, until they did receive a supersedeas, which if he did obtain, they would gladly obey.—Then the bishop, seeing that they would still proceed against him, did there likewise intimate another Appellation unto the king's majesty, expressing therein in effect no other matter, but such as is already alledged in the two former Recusations and Appeal; saving that he requireth, that letters dismissories or appellatories might be given him according to the law, and that for his better safeguard he did submit himself under the protection of the king.—The commissioners for all this stuck still unto their commission, and would not in any case defer, but urged him straitly to make a more full answer to his articles than he had done. To whom the bishop said, that he would stand unto his recusations and appellations before made, and would not make other answer. Then the delegates demanded of him what cause he had to alledge, why he ought not to be declared pro confesso upon the articles whereunto he had not fully answered, the bishop still answering (as before) that he would adhere unto his appellation and recusation. Whereupon the archbishop, with consent of the rest, seeing his pertinacy pronounced him contumax, and in pain thereof declared him pro confesso, upon all the Articles which he had not answered. This done, master secretary Smith shewed forth a Letter which the bishop of London had before that time sent unto the lord mayor and the aldermen of the city of London, the tenor whereof ensueth as followeth.

“To the right honourable and my very good lord the lord mayor of London, with all his worshipful brethren, my very dear and worshipful friends, with speed: Right honourable, with my very humble recommendations; where I have perceived of late, and heard with mine ears, what vile beasts and heretics have preached unto you, or rather like themselves prated and railed against the most blessed sacrament of the altar, denying the verity and presence of Christ's true body and blood to be there, giving you and the people liberty to believe what ye list, teaching you detestably, that faith in this behalf must not be coerced, but that every man may believe as he will; by reason whereof, lest my presence and silence might unto some have been seen to have allowed their heretical doctrine, and given credit unto them, betraying my flock of the Catholic sort, ye know I departed yesterday from the heretic prater's uncharitable charity, and so could have wished that you and all other that be Catholic should have done, leaving those there with him that be already cast away, and will not be recovered. For you, tarrying with him still, shall not only hurt yourselves in receiving his poisoned doctrine, but also shall give a visage that their doctrine is tolerable by reason that ye are content to bear it, and say nothing against it. And because I cannot tell when I shall speak with you to advertise you hereof, therefore I thought good for mine own discharge and yours, thus much to write unto you; requiring and praying you again and again in God's behalf, and for mine own discharge, that ye suffer not yourselves to be abused with such naughty preachers and teachers, in hearing their evil doctrine that ye shall perceive them go about to sow. And thus our blessed Lord long and well preserve you all with this noble city in all good rest, godliness, and prosperity. Written in haste, this Monday morning, the 16th of Sept. 1549. Your faithful beadsman and poor bishop, Edmund Bonner.”

This Letter being read, the secretary demanded of him whether he wrote it not. To whom he would not otherwise answer, but that he would still adhere and stand unto his former recusations and appeals. Which the commissioners seeing, determined to continue this case in state as it was until Friday then next following, between the hours of eight and nine of the clock before noon, assigning the bishop to be there at the same time and place, then to hear a final decree of this matter, he still protesting as before.

The seventh Session or Appearance of Bonner upon Tuesday the 1st of October, before the King's Commissioners at Lambeth.

Upon Friday the commissioners, for divers urgent causes letting them, did not sit in commission according to their appointment, but deferred it until Tuesday the first of October then next following. Upon which day the bishop appearing before them, the archbishop declared unto him, that although as upon Friday last they had appointed to pronounce their final decree and sentence in this matter, yet forso-much as they thought that that sentence, although they had just cause to give it, should have been very sore against him, they had not only deferred the same until this day, but minding to be more friendly to him than he was to himself, and to use more easy, and gentle reformation towards him, had also made such suit and means for him, that although he had grievously offended the king's majesty, and very disobediently behaved himself, yet if he would in the mean while have acknowledged his fault, and have been contented to make some part of amends in submitting himself according to his bounden duty, he should have found much favour; so the sentence should not have been so sore and extreme against him, as it was like now to be, for which they were very sorry, especially to see the continuance of such stubborn disobedience, whereby they were then more enforced to give such sentence against him.

The Bishop nothing at all regarding this gentle and friendly admonition and favour, but persisting still in his wonted contumacy, drew forth a Paper, whereon he read these words following:

“I Edmund bishop of London brought in as a prisoner by his keeper, one of the Marshalsey, here before you my lord of Canterbury and your pretended colleagues, do under my former protestations heretofore by me made before you and remaining in your act, declare that this my presence here at this time is not voluntary, nor of mine own free will and consent, but utterly coerced and against my will, and that being otherwise sent for or brought before you than I am (that is as a prisoner) I would not, being at liberty, have come and appeared before you, but would have declined and refused to make any appearance at all, and would have absented myself from you, as lawfully and well I might have done, standing to, using and enjoying all and singular my lawful remedies and defences heretofore used, exercised and enjoyed, especially my provocator, and appellation heretofore interponed and made unto the king's most excellent majesty, to whom eftsoons, ex abundanti, I have both provoked and appealed, and also made supplication, as appeareth in these writings, which, under protestation aforesaid, I do exhibit and leave here with the actuary of this cause, requiring him to make an instrument thereupon, and the persons here present to bear record in that behalf; especially to the intent it may appear, I do better acknowledge the king's majesty's authority even in his tender and young age, provoking and appealing to his majesty, as my most gracious sovereign and supreme head with submission to his highness (as appeareth in my appellation and other remedies) for my tuition and defence, then othersome (I do mean you my lord of Canterbury and your said pretended colleagues) which by law and good reason ought to have deferred and given place unto such provocation, appellation, and supplication, as heretofore lawfully have been by me interponed, and made unto his majesty's most royal person and sovereign authority in this behalf."

As soon as the bishop had read these words, he did deliver as well that paper as also two other, unto the actuary, the one containing an Appellation, and the other a Supplication, unto the king's majesty; which Appellation beginneth thus: In the name of God, Amen. Wherein first he shewed how naturally every creature declineth gladly from that thing which goeth about to hurt it, and also seeketh help and remedy to withstand such hurts and injuries. Further he shewed that it is found by experience to be hurtful and dangerous to trust him that once hath hurt and beguiled, lest he might add more, rather than to take ought from. Moreover he shewed, that he had found heretofore at the hauds of the archbishop of Canterbury and the rest of the colleagues in this matter, much extremity and cruelty, injuries, losses, and griefs, contrary to God's law, and the laws and statutes of this realm, and against justice, charity and good order, being well assured if they were not stayed but proceeded, they would add more evil to evil, loss to loss, displeasure to displeasure, as (said he) their servants have reported, and they agreeably do shew the same. Again in the said appeal he shewed that the bishop of Canterbury and the other commissioners ought to have considered and done better in that matter for honour and obedience to the king's majesty, which hitherto they have not done (said he) in that they have not given place to his provocations and appellations heretofore made unto his grace, justly and lawfully, and upon good and just causes, namely, for the unjust griefs they did against him, which he said do appear in the acts of that matter; as in pronouncing him contumacem unreasonably without good cause, and further in assigning the term ad audiendum finale decretum, and in committing him to straight prison, as appeareth in their acts. Therefore he did not only ex abundanti, ad omnem juris cautelam, decline and refuse their pretended jurisdiction as before, but also by these presents here shewed he did appeal from the said archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest, unto the king's majesty, asking also those letters of appeal which the law doth admit, saying, he did not intend to go from his former provocations and appellations, but to join and cleave unto them in every part and parcel, submitting himself to the protection and defence of the king's majesty; and he therein made intimation to the archbishop of Canterbury, and to his said colleagues, to all intents and purposes that might come thereof. Furthermore, as touching the supplication above mentioned, which Bonner (as we said) put up in writing to the Commissioners, the copy thereof hereunder likewise ensueth:

"PLEASE it your most honourable good lordships, with my most humble recommendations, to understand, that albeit I have according to the laws, statutes, and ordinances of this realm made supplication, provocation, and appellation unto the king's most excellent majesty, from the unlawful and wicked process of the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Rochester, master secretary Smith, and the dean of Paul's, as also as well from their unjust interlocutory, as also their definitive sentence, whereby in law I ought to have liberty to come abroad and prosecute the same, yet such is the malignity of the judges against me, with bearing and maintenance of other which sundry and many ways have sought my ruin and destruction, that I am here penned and locked up, used very extremely at their pleasure, and for the contentation of the said master Smith, not suffered to find sureties, or to go abroad to prosecute and sue my said appellation. In consideration whereof, it may please your said good lordships to take some order and redress herein, especially for that it is now the time that the king's subsidy, now due, ought to be called upon, and justice also ministered unto his majesty's subjects, which being as I now am, I cannot be suffered to do. And thus without further extending my letter therein, considering that your great wisdoms, experience, and goodness can gather of a little, what is expedient and necessary for the whole, I do beseech Almighty God to preserve and keep well all your honourable good lordships. Written in haste this 7th of October, 1549, in the Marshalsea. Your honourable lordships poor orator, and most bounden beadsman, Edmund London."

These things ended, the archbishop said unto

him. My lord, where you say that you come concted, or else you would not have appeared, I do much marvel of you. For you would thereby make us and this audience here believe that because you are a prisoner, ye ought not therefore to answer. Which if it were true, it were enough to confound the whole state of this realm. For I dare say, that of the greatest prisoners and rebels that ever your keeper there (meaning the under-marshal) hath had under him, he cannot shew me one that hath used such defence as you have here done.—Well (quoth the bishop) if my keeper were learned in the laws, I could shew him my mind therein. Well, said the archbishop, I have read over all the laws as well as you, but to another end and purpose than you did, and yet I can find no such privilege in this matter. Then master secretary Smith did very sore burthen and charge him, how disobediently and rebellously he had always behaved himself towards the king's majesty and his authority. Whereupon, the bishop under his protestation answered again, That he was the king's majesty's lawful and true subject, and did acknowledge his highness to be his gracious sovereign lord, or else he would not have appealed unto him as he did, yea, and would gladly lay his hands and his neck also under his grace's feet, and therefore he desired that his highness's laws and justice might be ministered unto him.—Yea, quoth master secretary, you say well my lord, but I pray you what other hath all these rebels both in Norfolk, Devonshire, and Cornwall, and other places done? Have they not saffed thus? We be the king's true subjects, we acknowledge him for our king, and we will obey his laws, with such like; and yet when either commandment, letter, or pardon was brought unto them from his majesty, they believed it not, but said it was forged and made under a hedge, and was gentlemen's doings, so that indeed they neither would nor did obey any thing.—Ah sir, said the bishop, I perceive your meaning; as who should say that the bishop of London is a rebel like them. Yea, by my troth, quoth the secretary. Whereat the people laughed.

Then the dean of Paul's said unto him, That he marvelled much, and was very sorry to see him so untractable, that he would not suffer the judges to speak. To whom the bishop disdainfully answered; Well, master dean, you must say somewhat. And likewise at another time as the dean was speaking, he interrupted him and said, You may speak when your turn cometh. Then said secretary Smith, I would you knew your duty. I would quoth he again, you knew it as well as I: with an infinite deal more of other such stubborn and contemptuous talk and behaviour towards them. Which the commissioners weighing, and perceiving no likelihood of any tractable reason in him, determined that the archbishop, with their whole consent, should at that present there openly read and publish their final decree or sentence definitive against him. Which he did, pronouncing him thereby to be clean deprived from the bishopric of London, and further as in the same appeareth, in tenor as followeth:

Which ended, the Bishop immediately did therefrom appeal by word of mouth, alledging, that the same sentence there given against him, was lex nulla. The tenour of whose words I thought here to express, according as they were by him uttered, in this wise as followeth:

"I Edmund bishop of London, brought in and kept here as a prisoner against my consent and will, do under my former protestation heretofore made, and to the intent it may also appear, that I have not, being so here in this place, consented nor agreed to any thing done against me and in my prejudice, alledge and say that this sentence given here against me, is lex nulla; and so far forth as it shall appear to be aliqua, I do say it is iniqua & injusta, and that therefore I do from it, as iniqua & injusta, appeal to the most excellent and noble king Edward the 6th, by the grace of God, king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the Church of England and also Ireland, next and immediately under God here on earth, supreme head, and unto his court of chancery or parliament, as the laws, statutes, and ordinances of this realm will suffer and bear in this behalf, desiring instantly first, second and third, according to the laws, letters, reverential or dimissorie, to be given and delivered unto me in this behalf, with all things expedient, requisite, or necessary in any wise; and thereupon also the said bishop required the public notary or actuary, William Say, to make an instrument, and the witness aforesaid and other present to record the same. To whom so appealing, and requiring as afore, the said Judges delegate said, that they will declare and signify to the king's majesty what is done in this matter, and thereupon will defer or not defer to his said appellation, according as his grace's pleasure and commandment shall be given to them in that behalf, and after all this, the said bishop of London said to them, Jam functi estis officio. What will your grace do with me now, touching my imprisonment? Will ye keep me still in prison? Shall I not now be at liberty to prosecute mine appeal? To whom the Archbishop answering, said, That they perceived now more in that matter than they did at the first, and that this matter is more greater rebellion than he is aware of, and therefore said that as yet they would not discharge him, and thereupon they committed him again to his keeper in prison."

This talk finished, the Archbishop considering that most of the audience there present did not understand the meaning of the sentence being read in the Latin tongue, said to them, Because there be many of you here that understand not the Latin tongue, and so cannot tell what judgment hath been here given, I shall therefore shew you the effect thereof; and therewith did declare in English the causes expressed in the sentence, adding thereunto these words: "Because my lord of London is found guilty in these matters, therefore we have here by our sentence deprived him of our bishopric of London; and this we shew unto you to the intent that from henceforth ye shall not esteem him any more as bishop of London." Then Bunner desired the archbishop to declare likewise what he had done, and how he had appealed. But the other, seeing his froward contempt, refused it, saying, You may do it yourself. Whereupon very disdainfully again he said, Jam functi estis officio. What will your grace do with me touching my imprisonment? Will you keep me still in prison?—To whom the commissioners answered, that they perceived now more in the matter than they did before, and that his behaviour was more greater rebellion than he was aware of, and therefore they would not discharge him, but committed him again to his keeper to be kept in prison. Where he most justly remained until the death of that most worthy and godly prince king Edward 6th. After which time he wrought most horrible mischief and cruelties against the saints of God, as appeareth hereafter throughout the whole reign of queen Mary. From the executing of the which like tyranny the Lord of his great mercy keep all other such, amen.

Now, immediately after his deprivation, he writeth out of the Marshalsea other letters supplicatory unto the lord chancellor, and the rest of the king's council. Wherein he thus complaineth, that by reason of the great enmity that the duke of Somerset and sir Thomas Smith bear unto him, his often and earnest suits unto the king and his council could not be heard. He therefore most humbly desireth their lordships, for the causes aforesaid, to consider him, and to let him have liberty to prosecute his matter before them, and he would daily pray for the good preservation of their honours, as appeareth by the words of his own Supplication hereunder following.—Thus after the commissioners had finished with Bonner, he being now prisoner in the Marshalsea, leaving no shift of the law unsought how to work for himself as well as he might, drew out a certain Supplication, conceived and directed to the king's majesty, out of the said prison of the Marshalsea.

“PLEASE it your most honourable good lordships with my most humble commendations to understand, that albeit heretofore I have made such suit, and to such persons as I cannot devise to make more, or to more higher, that is to wit, to the king's most excellent majesty, and his most gracious persons in divers sorts, and also unto your most honourable good lordships being of his privy council, for redress of such notable and manifest injuries and extremities as have been contrary to all law, honesty, and good reason inflicted upon me by my lord of Canterbury, my lord of Rochester, doctor Smith, and doctor May: yet because the said doctor Smith being a minister to the duke of Somerset, and they both my deadly enemies, hath sundry ways studied and laboured my ruin and destruction, staying and letting heretofore all my lawful remedies and suits, having therein help and furtherance of these two other aforesaid persons, being ready at foot and hand to accomplish all their desires and pleasures, I shall at this present, having for a time forborn to trouble (for good respects) your most honourable good lordships with any my suits, and especially for your other manifold great affairs in the king's majesty's business, myself yet, the mean while, neither wanting good will, nor yet just cause (being where I am) to make such suit, renew my suit, and most humbly beseech your most honourable good lordships to give me leave to make most humble supplication again to your said lordships, for honest and lawful liberty to prosecute my appellation and supplication heretofore made to the king's most excellent majesty, and according to the law to make my suit for redress of the said great and manifest injuries, extremities, and wrongs done against me by the said persons. And your said lordships, over and besides the furtherance of justice many ways herein to me and other, and the collection of the king's majesty's subsidy now to be levied of the clergy in my diocese, which hitherto hath been and is stayed by reason of the premises, shall also bind me most greatly and intirely to pray daily for the good preservation of your said most honourable good lordships in all honour, felicity, and joy, long to continue and endure unto God's pleasure. Written in the Marshalsea, the 26th of October, 1549. Your lordships most faithful and assured beadsman, Edmund London.”

IN the which Supplication, first after the used form of stile, he prayed for the prosperous estate of the king long to reign. Then he shewed that his faithful heart and service to him hath, is, and shall be, as it was to his father before. Then he declared how he had been belied of evil men, and misreported not to bear a true heart to his grace, but a rebellious mind, in denying his royal power in his minority, where indeed he saith, his grace should find him always during life both in heart, word, and deed to do and acknowledge otherwise, and to be most willing to shew, &c. and to do all other things for his grace, as willingly as any other subject, or as those that were his denouncers, who he thought were not sent of his grace, but pretended commissioners, &c. Further, he complained of his denunciation by certain commissioners, who said they were sent by his grace, alledging the same not to be lawful; and of his long and sharp imprisonment, and that the commissioners observed neither law nor reasonable order, but extremity. And where he had made appeal to his grace, and he could not have it; he desired to have law to prosecute and sue his appeal for his remedy, and that he, considering his vocation, might not be shut up and put from liberty, which his meanest subjects have.—Then he desired his grace's letters of supersedeas against the commissioners, and that the matter might be heard before the council, and then he doubted not but to be found a true faithful man, and herein to have wrong. So in the end he concluded, this, prostrating himself even to the very ground, and humbly kissing his grace's feet, to be the only thing which he humbly desired, &c.

This done, and the Supplication perused, the king eftsoons giveth in charge and commandment to certain men of honour and worship, and persons skillful in the law, as to the lord Rich high chancellor, the lord treasurer, the lord marquis Dorset, the bishop of Ely, lord Wentworth, sir Anthony Wingfield, sir William Harbert, knts. Dr. Rich, Wootton, Edw. Montague lord chief justice, sir John Baker, knt. with judge Hales, John Gosnold, Dr. Oliver, and also Dr. Layson, that they scanning and perusing all such acts, matters, and monuments of the said Bonner by him exhibited, produced, propounded, and alleged, with all and singular his Protestations, Recusations, and Appellations, should upon mature consideration thereof give their direct answer upon the same, whether the Appellation of the said Bonner were to be deferred unto, whether the Sentence defined against him stood by the law sufficient and effectual, or not. Who est-

* " Queen Mary no sooner ascended the throne, than Bonner was restored to his honours, and made President of the Convocation, instead of Cranmer now disgraced. In his new office he displayed all the native ferocity of his character. He not only dismissed and excommunicated several of the clergy, but he committed some hundreds to the flames for not renouncing the doctrines of the Reformation, and on every accusation shewed himself the worthy minister of a bloody reign. On the death of Mary he paid his respects to the new queen, but Elizabeth turned away from a man stained with the blood of suffering innocence, and the bigoted ecclesiastic soon after, when summoned before the Council, refused to take the oaths of allegiance, and was again deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned. He died about the 10th year of his confinement, 5th of September 1569, and as he was excommunicated, his body was privately buried at midnight in St. George's church-yard, Southwark, that a public ceremony might not draw more strongly the indignation of the populace against his remains. In soons, after diligent discussion and considerate advisement had of all and singular the premises gave their resolute answer that the pretended appellation of Edmund Bonner aforesaid was naught and unreasonable, and in no wise to be referred unto, and that the sentence was rightly and justly pronounced. And this was the conclusion of Bonner's whole matter and Deprivation.*

his person Bonner was fat and corpulent, his character was ferocious and vindictive, his knowledge of divinity was not extensive, but he was well versed in politics and canon law. He wrote some tracts now deservedly forgotten." Lempriere.

" In the first edition of Fox's Acts and Monuments, there is a wooden print of Bonner in the act of whipping Thomas Hinshawe. Sir John Harrington tells us, that 'when Bonner was shewn this print in the book of Martyrs on purpose to vex him, he laughed at it saying, A vengeance on the fool, how could he get my picture drawn so right.' This man, whom nature seems to have designed for an executioner, was an ecclesiastical judge in the reign of Mary. He is reported to have condemned no less than 200 innocent persons to the flames; and to have caused great numbers to suffer imprisonment, racks, and tortures. He was remarkably fat and corpulent; which made one say to him, 'that he was full of guts, but empty of bowels.' He died in the Marshalsea, the 5th Sept. 1569." Grainger.

46. Proceedings against Sir JAMES HALES, Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, for his conduct at the Assizes in Kent: 1 Mary, A. D. 1553. [3 Fox's Acts and Monum. 19. Somers' Tracts, 2 coll. vol. 95.]

MR. Fox introduces this short but interesting procedure thus:

The first day of October 1553, queen Mary was crowned at Westminster, and the 10th of the same month of October then following began the parliament with a solemn mass of the Holy Ghost, after the popish manner, celebrated with great pomp in the palace of Westminster. Mass being done, the queen, accompanied with the estates of the realm, was brought into the parliament house, there according to the manner to enter and begin the consultation, at which consultation or parliament were repealed all statutes made in the time of king Henry the 8th for Premunire, and statutes made in king Edward the 6th's time for Administration of Common Prayer and the Sacrament in the English tongue. And such as would stick to the laws made in king Edward's time, till others should be established, some of them were marked, and some presently apprehended. Among whom sir James Hales, a knight of Kent, and justice of the common pleas, was one; who notwithstanding he had ventured his life in queen Mary's cause, in that he would not subscribe to the unioheriting of her by the king's will, yet for that he did at a quarter sessions give charge upon the statutes made in the time of king Henry the 8th and Edward the 6th, for the supremacy and religion, he was imprisoned in the Marshalsea, Counter, and Fleet, and so cruelly handled and put in fear by talk that the Warden of the Fleet used to have in his hearing, of such torments as were in preparing for heretics, (or for what other cause God knoweth) that he sought to rid himself out of this life by wounding himself with a knife; and afterward was contented to say as they willed him: whereupon he was discharged, but after that he never rested till he had drowned himself in a river, half a mile from his house in Kent.

The COMMUNICATION between the Lord Chancellor (Stephen Gardiner bishop of Winchester) and Judge Hales, being there among other Judges, to take his Oath in Westminster Hall, Oct. 6, 1553.

MASTER Hales, ye shall understand, that like as the queen's highness hath heretofore conceived good opinion of you, especially for that ye stood both faithfully and lawfully in her cause of just succession, refusing to set your hand to the book among others that were against her grace in that behalf: so now, through your own late deserts against certain her highness's doings, ye stand not well in her grace's favour: and therefore before ye take any oath, it shall be necessary for you to make your purgation.

Hales. I pray you, my lord, what is the cause?

Chan. Information is given, that ye have indicted certain priests in Kent for saying mass.

Hales. My lord, it is not so, I indicted none; but indeed certain indictments of like matter were brought before me at the last assizes there holden, and I gave order therein as the law required. For I have professed the law, against which in cases of justice I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in any wise dissemble, but with the same shew forth my conscience, and if it were to do again, I would do no less than I did.

Cha. Yea, master Hales, your conscience is known well enough, I know you lack no conscience.

Hales. My lord, you may do well to search your own conscience; for mine is better known to myself than to you: and to be plain, I did as well use justice in your said mass case by my conscience, as by law, wherein I am fully bent to stand in trial to the uttermost that can be objected. And if I have therein done any injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will seek no better defence, considering chiefly that it is my profession.

Cha. Why master Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your side, yet ye might have had regard to the queen's highness present doings in that case. And further, although ye seem to be more than precise in the law, yet I think ye would be very loth to yield to the extremity of such advantage as might be gathered against your proceedings in the law, as ye have sometime taken upon you in place of justice, and if it were well tried, I believe ye should not be well able to stand honestly thereto.

Hales. My lord, I am not so perfect, but I may err for lack of knowledge. But both in conscience, and such knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide in it: and if my goods and all that I have be not able to counterpoise the case, my body shall be ready to serve the turn; for they be all at the queen's highness pleasure.

Cha. Ah sir, ye be very quick and stout in your answers. But as it should seem, that which you did was more of a will favouring the opinion of your religion against the service now used, than for any occasion or zeal of justice, seeing the queen's highness doth set it forth as yet, wishing all her faithful subjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no such matter required at your hands, and yet ye shall not have your own will neither.

Hales. My Lord, I seek not wilful will, but to shew myself as I am bound in love to God, and obedience to the queen's majesty, in whose cause willingly for justice sake, all other respects set apart, I did of late, as your lordship knoweth, adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I trust it be such as pleaseth God, wherein I am ready to adventure as well my life as my substance, if I be called thereunto. And so in lack of mine own power and will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Chan. Seeing you be at this point master Hales, I will presently make an end with you. The queen's highness shall be informed of your opinion and declaration. And as her grace shall thereupon determine, ye shall have knowledge. Until such time as ye may depart as ye came, without your oath: for as it appeareth, ye are scarce worthy the place appointed.

Hales. I thank your lordship: and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I desired to take upon me; whensoever it shall please the queen's highness to ease me thereof, I shall most humbly with due contentation obey the same; and so he departed from the bar.

Not many days after this Communication, or colloquy, in Westminster-hall, which was Oct. 6, 1553, Master Hales at the commandment of the bishop was committed to the King's-bench, where he remained constant until Lent: then was he removed to the Counter in Bread street, and afterward from thence was carried to the Fleet. What afterwards befell him, has been before related.

47. Proceedings against Lady JANE GREY, and Others, for Treason: 1 Mary, A. D. 1553. [3 Fox's Acts and Monuments, 13. Bib. Cott. Somers' Tracts, 4 coll. vol. 1, p. 174. Biog. Brit.]

WHAT time, says Fox, king Edward by long sickness began to appear more feeble and weak, in the mean while during the time of this his sickness, a certain marriage was provided, concluded, and shortly also upon the same solemnised in the month of May, between the lord Gilford, son to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, the duke of Suffolk's daughter; whose mother being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king Henry's second sister, who first was married to the French king, and afterward to Charles, duke of Suffolk. But to make no long tarrance hereupon, the marriage being ended, and the king waxing every day more sick than other, whereas indeed there seemed in him no hope of recovery, it was brought to pass by the consent not only of the nobility, but also of the chief lawyers of the realm, that the king by his Testament did appoint the foresaid lady Jane, daughter to the duke of Suffolk, to be inheretrix unto the crown of England, passing over his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth. To this Order subscribed all the king's Council, and the chief of the nobility, the mayor and city of London, and almost all the judges and chief lawyers of this realm, saving only justice Hales of Kent, a man both favouring true religion, and also an upright judge, as any hath been noted in this realm, who, giving his consent unto lady Mary, would in no case subscribe to lady Jane. The causes laid against lady Mary, were as well for that it was feared she would marry with a stranger, and thereby intangle the crown; as also that she would clean alter religion, used both in king Henry her father, and also in king Edward her brother's days, and so bring in the pope, to the utter destruction of the realm, which indeed afterward came to pass, as by the course and sequel of this story may well appear.

Much probable matter they had thus to conjecture of her, by reason of her great stubbornness shewed and declared in her brother's days, as in the letters before mentioned, passing between her and king Edward, and the council, may appear. The matter being thus concluded, and after confirmed by every man's hand, king Edward, an imp of so great hope, not long after this departed by the vehemency of his sickness, when he was 16 years of age; with whom also decayed in a manner the whole flourishing estate and honour of the English nation.

When king Edward was dead, this Jane was established in the kingdom by the nobles consent, and was forthwith published queen by proclamation at London, and in other cities where was any great resort, and was there so taken and named. Between this young damsel and king Edward there was little difference in age, though in learning and knowledge of the tongues she was not only equal, but also superior unto him, being instructed of a master right nobly learned. If her fortune had been as good as was her bringing up, joined with fineness of wit, undoubtedly she might have seemed comparable not only to the house of Vespasians, Sempronians, and mother of the Gracchies, yea, to any other women beside, that deserved high praise for their singular learning; but also to the university-men, which have taken many degrees of the schools.

In the mean time while these things were a working at London, Mary, which had knowledge of her brother's death, writeth to the lords of the Council in form as followeth:

"My lords, we greet you well, and have received sure advertisement, that our dearest brother the king, our late soveraign lord, is departed to God's mercy; which news how woeful they be unto our heart, he only knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must, and do humbly submit us and our wills. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his majesty's departure and death, concerning the crown and governance of this realm of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances advancing our right, you know, the realin, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls and records appear by the authority of the king our said father, and the king, our said brother, and the subjects of this realm; so that we verily trust that there is no good true subject, that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we have of ourselves caused, and, as God shall aid and strengthen us, shall cause our right and title in this behalf to be published and proclaimed accordingly. And albeit this so weighty a matter seemeth strange, that our said brother dying upon Thursday at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof, yet we consider your wisdom and prudence to be such, that having estoons amongst you debated, pondered, and well weighed this present case with our estate, with your own estate, the common-wealth, and all our honours, we shall and may conceive great hope and trust with much assurance in your loyalty and service, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst; and that ye will, like noblemen, work the best. Nevertheless we are not ignorant of your consultations to undo the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible wherewith ye be assembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature can but fear some evil. But be it that some consideration politic, or whatsoever thing else, hath moved you thereto, yet doubt you not my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right ready to remit and fully pardon the same, and that freely, to eschew blood-shed and vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredly you will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part as appertaineth, and that we shall not be enforced to use the service of other our true subjects and friends, which in this our just and right cause, God, in whom our whole affiance is, shall send us. Wherefore my lords, we require you and charge you, and every of you, that of your allegiance which you owe to God and us, and to none other, for our honour and the surety of our person only employ yourselves, and forthwith upon receipt hereof, cause our right and title to the crown and government of this realm to be proclaimed in our city of London and other places, as to your wisdoms shall seem good, and as to this case appertaineth, not failing hereof as our very trust is in you. And thus our letter, signed with our hand, shall be your sufficient warrant in this behalf. Given under our signet at our manor of Kening-hall, the 9th of July, 1553."

To this Letter of the lady Mary, the lords of the Council make answer again, as followeth :

"Madam, we have received your letters the 9th of this instant, declaring your supposed title, which you judge yourself to have to the imperial crown of this realm, and all the dominions thereunto belonging. For answer whereof, this is to advertise you, that for as much as our sovereign lady queen Jane is, after the death of our sovereign lord Edward the 6th, a prince of most noble memory, invested and possessed with the just and right title in the imperial crown of this realm, not only by good order of old ancient laws of this realm, but also by our late sovereign lord's letters patents signed with his own hand, and sealed with the great seal of England in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, judges, with divers other grave and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound duty and allegiance, assent unto her said grace, and to none other, except we should, which faithful subjects cannot, fall into grievous and unspeakable enormities. Wherefore we can no less do, but for the quiet both of the realm and you also, to advertise you, that forasmuch as the divorce, made between the king of famous memory, king Henry the 8th, and the lady Catharine your mother, was necessary to be had both by the everlasting laws of God, and also by the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the sundry acts of parliaments remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate and unhereditary to the crown imperial of this realm, and the rules, and dominions, and possessions of the same, you will upon just consideration hereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alledged for the same, and for the just inheritance of the right line and godly order taken by the late king our sovereign lord king Edward the 6th, and agreed upon by the nobles and great personages aforesaid, surcease by any pretence to vex and molest any of our sovereign lady queen Jane her subjects from their true faith and allegiance due unto her grace: assuring you, that if you will for respect shew yourself quiet and obedient, as you ought, you shall find us all and several ready to do you any service that we with duty may, and glad with your quietness to preserve the common state of this realm: wherein you may be otherwise grievous unto us, to yourself, and to them. And thus we bid you most heartily well to fare. From the Tower of London, this 9th of July, 1553. Your ladyship's friends, shewing yourself an obedient subject, Thomas Canterbury, the marquis of Winchester, John Bedford, Will. Northampton, Thomas Ely chancellor, Northumberland, Henry Suffolk, Henry Arundel, Shrewsbury, Pembroke, Cobham, R. Rich, Huntingdon, Darcy, Cheyney, R. Colton, John Gates, W. Peter, W. Cecill, John Checke, John Mason, Edw. North, R. Bowes."

All these aforesaid, except only the duke of Northumberland, and sir John Gates, afterward were either by special favour, or special or general pardon, discharged.

After this Answer received, and the minds of the lords perceived, lady Mary speedeth herself secretly away far off from the city, hoping chiefly upon the good will of the commons, and yet perchance not destitute altogether of the secret advertisements of some of the nobles. When the Council heard of her sudden departure and perceived her stoutness, and that all came not to pass as they supposed, they gathered speedily a power of men together, appointing an army, and first assigned that the duke of Suffolk should take that enterprise in hand, and so have the leading of the band. But afterward altering their minds, they thought it best to send forth the duke of Northumberland, with certain other lords and gentlemen, and that the duke of Suffolk should keep the Tower, where the lord Gilford and the lady Jane the same time were lodged. In the which expedition the guard also, albeit they were much unwilling at the first thereunto, yet notwithstanding, through the vehement persuasions of the lord treasurer, master Chomley, and other, they were induced to assist the duke, and to set forward with him.

These things thus agreed upon, and the duke now being set forward after the best array out of London, having notwithstanding his times prescribed, and his journey appointed by the council, to the intent he might not seem to do any thing but upon warrant. Mary in the mean while tossed with much travel up and down, to work the surest way for her best advantage, withdrew herself into the quarters of Norfolk and Suffolk, where she understood the duke's name to be had in much hatred for the service that had been done there of late under king Edward, in subduing the rebels, and there gathering to her such aid of the commons in every side as she might, keeping herself close for a space within Fremingham castle. To whom first of all resorted the Suffolk men; who being always forward in promoting the proceedings of the Gospel, promised her their aid and help, so that she would not attempt the alteration of the religion, which her brother king Edward had before established, by laws and orders publicly enacted, and received by the consent of the whole realm in that behalf.

To make the matter short, unto this condition she atsoons agreed, with such promise made unto them that no innovatiou should be made of religion, as that no man would or could then have misdoubted her. Which promise, if she had as constantly kept, as they did willingly preserve her with their bodies and weapons, she had done a deed both worthy her blood, and had also made her reign more stable to herself through former tranquillity. For though a man be never so puissant of power, yet breach of promise is an evil upholder of quietness, fear is worse, but cruelty is the worst of all.

Thus Mary being guarded with the power of the Gospellers, did vanquish the duke, and all those that came with her. In consideration whereof it was an heavy word that she answered to the Suffolk men afterwards, which did make supplication to her grace to perform her promise: Forsomuch, saith she, as you being but members desire to rule your head, you shall one day well perceive, that members must obey their head, and not look to bear rule over the same. And not only that, but also to cause the more terror unto other, a certain gentleman named master Dobb, dwelling about Wyndnam side, for the same cause, that is, for advertising her by humble request of her promise, was punished, being three sundry times set on the pillory to be a gazing stock unto all men.

On the contrary side, the duke of Northumberland having his warrant under the broad seal, with all furniture in readiness, as he took his voyage, and was now forward in his way; what ado there was, what stirring on every side, what sending, what riding and posting, what letters, messages, and instructions went to and fro, what talking among the soldiers, what heart-burning among the people, what fair pretences outwardly, inwardly what privy practices there were, what speeding of ordinance daily and hourly out of the Tower, what rumours and coming down of soldiers from all quarters there was; a world it was to see, and a process to declare, enough to make a whole Ilias. The greatest help that made for the lady Mary was the short journeys of the duke, which by commission were assigned to him before, as is abovementioned. For the longer the duke lingered in his voyage, the lady Mary the more increased in puissance, the hearts of the people being mightily bent unto her. Which after the council at London perceived, and understood how the common multitude did withdraw their hearts from them to stand with her, and that certain noblemen began to go the other way, they turned their song, and proclaimed for queen the lady Mary, eldest daughter to king Henry 8th, and appointed by parliament to succeed king Edward dying without issue.

And so the duke of Northumberland, being by council and advice sent forth against her, was left destitute, and forsaken alone at Cambridge with some of his sons, and a few other, among whom the earl of Huntingdon was one: who there were arrested and brought to the Tower of London, as traitors to the crown, notwithstanding that he had there proclaimed her queen before.

Thus have ye Mary now made a queen, and the sword of authority put into her hand. Therefore when she had been thus advanced by the Gospellers, and saw all in quiet by means that her enemies were conquered, sending the duke captive to the Tower before, which was the 25th of July, she followed not long after, being brought up the 3d day of August to London, with the great rejoicing of many men, but with a greater fear of more, and yet with flattery, peradventure most great, of feigned hearts.

Thus coming up to London, her first lodging she took at the Tower, whereas the foresaid lady Jane with her husband the lord Gilford, a little before her coming, were imprisoned; where they remained waiting her pleasure almost five months. But the duke, within a month after his coming to the Tower, being adjudged to death, was brought forth to the scaffold, and there beheaded. Albeit he having a promise, and being put in hope of pardon (yea, though his head were upon the block) if he would recant and hear mass, consented thereto, and denied in words that true religion, which before time, as well in king Henry 8th's days, as in king Edward's, he had oft evidently declared himself both to favour and further: exhorting also the people to return to the catholic faith, as he termed it. Whose recantation the papists did forthwith publish and set abroad, rejoicing not a little at his conversion or rather subversion as then appeared.

Thus the duke of Northumberland, with sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, (which Palmer on the other side confessed his faith that he had learned in the gospel, and lamented that he had not lived more gospel like) being put to death; In the mean time queen Mary entering thus her reign with the blood of these men, besides hearing mass herself in the Tower, gave a heavy shew and signification hereby, but especially by the sudden delivering of Steven Gardiner out of the Tower, that she was not minded to stand to that which she so deeply had promised to the Suffolk men before, concerning the not subverting or altering the state of religion, as in very deed the surmise of the people was therein nothing deceived.

The 3rd of February, the lord Cobham was committed to the Tower, and master Wyat entered into Southwark. Who, forsomuch as he could not enter that way into London, returning another way by Kingston with his army, came up through the streets to Ludgate, and returning thence, he was resisted at Temple-Bar, and there yielded himself to sir Clement Parson, and so was brought by him to the court, and with him the residue of his army, for before, sir George Harpar and almost half of his men ran away from him at Kingstoo bridge, were also taken, and about an hundred killed, and they that were taken were had to prison, and a great many of them were hanged, and he himself afterward executed at the Tower hill, and then quartered; whose head after being set up upon Hahill, was thence stolen away, and great search made for the same. Of which story ye shall hear more, the Lord willing, hereafter.

The 12th day of Feb. was beheaded the lady Jane, to whom was sent master Fecknam, alias Howman; from the queen, two days before her death, to commune with her, and to reduce her from the doctrine of Christ to Dr. Mary's religion. The effect of which Communion are here followeth:

Fecknam. Madam, I lament your heavy case, and yet I doubt not, but that you bear out this sorrow of yours with a constant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to give christian exhortation. And as for my heavy case, I thank God, I do so little lament it, that rather I account the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour toward me, than ever he shewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you, or other which bear me good will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul's health.

Feck. I am here come to you at this present sent from the queen and her council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith: although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have, I trust, little need to travail with you much therein.

Jane. Forsooth, I heartily thank the queen's highness, which is not unkindful of her humble subject: and I hope likewise that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

Feck. What is then required of a Christian man?

Jane. That he should believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God.

Feck. What? is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a Christian, but to believe in him?

Jane. Yes, we must love him with all our heart, and with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.

Feck. Why? then faith justifieth not, nor saveth not.

Jane. Yes verily, faith, as Paul saith, only justifieth.

Feck. Why? St. Paul saith, if I have all faith without love, it is nothing.

Jane. True it is; for how can I love him whom I trust not; or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love go both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

Feck. How shall we love our neighbour?

Jane. To love our neighbour is to feed the hungry, to cloath the naked, and give drink to the thirsty, and to do to him as we would do to our selves.

Feck. Why? then it is necessary unto salvation to do good works also, and it is not sufficient to believe.

Jane. I deny that, and I affirm that faith only saveth: but it is meet for a Christian, in token that he followeth his master Christ, to do good works, yet may we not say that they profit to our salvation. For when we have done all, yet we be unprofitable servants, and faith only in Christ's blood saveth us.

Feck. How many Sacraments are there?

Jane. Two. The one the Sacrament of Baptism, and the other the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Feck. No, there are seven.

Jane. By what Scripture find you that?

Feck. Well, we will talk of that hereafter. But what is signified by your two Sacraments?

Jane. By the sacrament of Baptism I am washed with water and regenerated by the spirit, and that washing is a token to me that I am the child of God. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper offered unto me, is a sure seal and testimony that I am, by the blood of Christ which he shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting kingdom.

Feck. Why? what do you receive in that Sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?

Jane. No surely, I do not so believe. I think that at the Supper I neither receive flesh nor blood, but bread and wine: which bread when it is broken, and the wine when it is drunken, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins the body of Christ was broken, and his blood shed on the cross, and with that bread and wine I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his body, and shedding of his blood for our sins on the cross.

Feck. Why? Doth not Christ speak these words, 'Take, eat, this is my body?' require you any plainer words? doth he not say it is his body?

Jane. I grant he saith so; and so he saith, 'I am the vine, I am the door,' but he is never the more for the door nor the vine. Doth not Saint Paul say, 'He calleth things that are not as though they were?' God forbid that I should say, that I eat the very natural body and blood of Christ; for then either I should pluck away my redemption, or else there were two bodies or two Christs. One body was tormented on the cross: and if they did eat another body, then had he two bodies; or if his body were eaten, then was it not broken upon the cross, or if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of his disciples.

Feck. Why? Is it not as possible that Christ by his power could make his body both to be eaten and broken, and to be born of a woman without seed of man, as to walk upon the sea having a body, and other such like miracles as he wrought by his power only?

Jane. Yes verily; if God would have done at his Supper any miracle, he might have done so: but I say that then he minded no work nor miracle, but only to break his body, and shed his blood on the cross for our sins. But I pray you to answer me to this one question: where was Christ, when he said, 'Take, eat, this is my body,' Was he not at the table when he said so? he was at that time alive, and suffered not till the next day. What took he but bread, what brake he but bread? And what gave he but bread? Look what he took, he brake: and look what he brake, he gave; and look what he gave, they did eat: and yet all this while he himself was alive; and at supper before his disciples, or else they were deceived.

Feck. You ground your faith upon such authors as say and unsay both with a breath, and not upon the church; to whom ye ought to give credit.

Jane. No, I ground my faith on God's word, and not upon the Church. For if the Church be a good Church, the faith of the Church must be tried by God's word, and not God's word by the Church, either yet my faith. Shall I believe the Church because of antiquity? or shall I give credit to the Church that taketh away from me the half part of the Lord's Supper, and will not let any man receive it in both kinds? Which thing if they deny to us, then deny they to us part of our salvation. And I say that it is an evil Church, and not the spouse of Christ, but the spouse of the devil, that altereth the Lord's Supper, and both taketh from it, and addeth to it. To that Church (say I) God will add plagues, and from that Church will he take their part out of the book of life: do they learn that of Saint Paul when he ministered to the Corinthians in both kinds? shall I believe this Church? God forbid.

Feck. That was done for a good intent of the Church to avoid an heresy that sprang on it.

Jane. Why? shall the Church alter God's will and ordinance for good intent? How did king Saul? the Lord God defend.

With these and such like persuasions he would have had her lean to the Church, but it would not be. There were many more things whereof they reasoned, but these were the chiefest. After this, Fecknam took his leave, saying, that he was sorry for her; for I am sure quoth he, that we two shall never meet.

Jane. True it is (said she) that we shall never meet, except God turn your heart. For I am assured, unless you repent and turn to God, you are in an evil case: and I pray God, in the bowels of his mercy, to send you his holy spirit: for he hath given you his great gift of utterance, if it pleased him also to open the eyes of your heart.

"FATHER, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened: yet can I so patiently take it, as I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woeful days, than if all the world had been given unto my possessions with life lengthened at my own will. And albeit I am well assured of your impatient dolours, redoubled manifold ways, both in be-waiting your own woe, and especially (as I hear) my unfortunate state, yet my dear father (if I may without offence rejoice in my own mishaps) me seems in this I may account my self blessed that washing my hands with the innocency of my fact, my guileless blood may cry before the Lord, Mercy to the innocent.

And yet though I must needs acknowledge, that being constrained, and, as you wot well enough, continually assayed, in taking upon me I seemed to consent, and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws: yet do I assuredly trust that this my offence towards God is so much the less, in that being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honour blended never with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I presently stand. Whose death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seem right woeful, to me there is nothing that can be more welcome, than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ our Saviour. In whose steadfast faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father) the Lord that hitherto hath strengthened you, so continue you, that at the last we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

A Letter written by the lady Jane in the end of the New Testament in Greek, the which she sent unto her sister lady Catherine, the night before she suffered.

"I HAVE here sent you, good sister Catherine, a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly it is more worth than precious stones. It is the book (dear sister) of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will which he bequeathed unto us wretches: which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy, and if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do purpose to follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It shall teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more than you should have gained by the possession of your woful father's lands. For, as if God had prospered him, you should have inherited his lands; so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches, as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt. Desire with David, good sister, to understand the law of the Lord God. Live still to die, that you by death may purchase eternal life. And trust not that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life; for as soon (if God call) gueth the young as the old, and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil, and despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not; be strong in faith, and yet presume not; and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and stealth upon you as a thief in the night, you be with the evil servant found sleeping, and lest for lack of oil, you be found like the five foolish women: and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I do. Follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross: lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do (good sister) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life, the which I pray God grant you, and send you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true Christian faith, from the which (in God's name) I exhort you that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will deny his truth for to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and yet shorten your days. And if you will cleave unto him, he will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory: to the which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well, good sister, and put your only trust in God, who only must help you.

O LORD, thou God and Father of my life, hear me poor and desolate woman, which flyeth unto thee only, in all troubles and miseries. Thou O Lord art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust in thee: and therefore I being defiled with sin, encumbered with affliction, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptations, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay my sinful body: do come unto thee (O merciful Saviour) craving thy mercy and help; without the which so little hope of deliverance is left, that I may utterly despair of any liberty. Albeit it is expedient, that seeing our life standeth upon trying, we should be visited sometime with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and also know thee and ourselves the better: yet thou that saidest thou wouldest not suffer us to be tempted above our power, be merciful unto me now a miserable wretch I beseech thee: which with Solomon do cry unto thee, humbly desiring thee, that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much pressed down with adversity: lest I being too full, should deny thee my God, or being too low brought should despair, and blaspheme thee my Lord and Saviour. O merciful God, consider my misery best known unto thee, and be thou now unto me a strong tower of defence I humbly require thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, either else give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of 400 years did oppress them, and keep them in bondage. Let it therefore likewise seem good to thy fatherly goodness, to deliver me, sorrowful wretch (for whom thy son Christ shed his precious blood on the cross) out of this miserable captivity and bondage, wherein I am now. How long wilt thou be absent? For ever? Oh Lord, hast thou forgotten to be gracious; and hast thou shut up thy loving kindness in displeasure? Wilt thou be no more intreated? Is thy mercy clean gone for ever, and thy promise come utterly to an end for evermore? Why doest thou make so long tarrying? shall I despair of thy mercy O God? Far be that from me. I am thy workmanship created in Christ Jesus: give me grace therefore to tarry thy leisure, and patiently to bear thy works; assuredly knowing, that as thou canst, so thou wilt deliver me, when it shall please thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting thy goodness towards me: for thou knowest better what is good for me than I do: therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt. Only in the mean time arm me I beseech thee with thy armour, that I may stand fast, my loins being girded about with verity, having on the breastplate of righteousness, and shod with the shoes prepared by the gospel of peace; above all things taking to me the shield of faith, whereby I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is thy most holy word: praying always with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself wholly to thy will, abiding thy pleasure, and comforting myself in those troubles that it shall please thee to send me: seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot be but well all that thou doest. Hear me O merciful Father for his sake, whom thou wouldest should be a sacrifice for my sins: to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory. Amen.

After these things thus declared, it remaineth now, coming to the end of this virtuous lady, next to infer the manner of her Execution, with the words and behaviour of her at the time of her death.

FIRST when she mounted upon the scaffold, she said to the people standing thereabout: Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me: but touching the procurement and desire thereof by me or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good Christian people, this day: and therewith she wrung her hands, wherein she had her book. Then said she, I pray you all good Christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other mean, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only son Jesus Christ: and I confess, that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, loved myself and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my sins: and yet I thank God of his goodness, that he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent: and now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers. And then kneeling down, she turned her to Fecknam, saying: Shall I say this psalm? and he said, Yea. Then said she the psalm of Miserere mei Deus in English, in most devout manner throughout to the end, and then she stood up, and gave her maiden mistress Ellen her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to master Bruges, and then she untied her gown, and the hangman pressed upon her to help her off with it, but she desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frowes, paast and neckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to knit about her eyes.—Then the hangman kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw: which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, I pray you dispatch me quickly. Then she kneeled down, saying: Will you take it off before I lay me down? and the hangman said, No, madam. Then tied she the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block she said: What shall I do? where is it? where is it? One of the standers by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretched forth her body, and said: Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, and so finished her life.

Thus the 12th day of February was beheaded

the lady Jane, and with her also the lord Guilford Dudley her husband, one of the duke of Northumberland's sons, two innocents in comparison of them that sat upon them. For they did but ignorantly accept that which the others had willingly devised, and by oopen proclamation consented to take from others and give to them. And not long after the death of the lady Jane upon the 21st of the same month, was Henry duke of Suffolk her father also beheaded at the Tower Hill, the 4th day after his condemnation: about which time also were condemned for this conspiracy many gentlemen and yeomen, whereof some were executed at London and some in the country. In the number of whom was also lord Thomas Gray, brother to the said duke, being apprehended not long after in North Wales and executed for the same. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton very hardly escaped.

LADY Jane Grey was daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of Mary, dowager of France, younger daughter of Henry 7th, and sister to Henry 8th. She was born in 1537, at Bradgate-hall, Leicestershire, and from her very infancy shewed great quickness and comprehension of mind. Under Harding and Aylmer, her father's chaplains, she improved herself in the various branches of learning; and became such a proficient in languages, that she spoke and wrote with astonishing facility, the French, Italian, Latin, and it is said the Greek; and was well skilled in Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. To these high acquirements in literature, were united great beauty, the mildest manners, and the most captivating virtues of humility, benevolence and modesty. Regardless of the pleasures and frivolous occupations of the great, she sought for gratification in reading and in meditation, and she observed to her tutor, Ascham, who found her reading Plato while the rest of the family were hunting in the park, that the sport which they were enjoying, was but a shadow compared to the pleasure which she received from the sublime author. The alliances of her family, however, and their ambition, were too powerful to suffer her to live in her beloved seclusion. No sooner was the declining health of the 6th Edward perceived by his courtiers, than Dudley, duke of Northumberland, prevailed upon the unsuspecting monarch, to settle the crown on his relation, lady Jane, whose attachment to the Reformation was indubitable; and to pass over his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. When this was effected, the artful favourite married his son Guilford Dudley to the future queen, and thus paved the way to the elevation of his own family to the throne. But while others rejoiced in these plans of approaching greatness, Jane alone seemed unconcerned, and when, at last, on Edward's death, she was hailed as queen by her ambitious father-in-law, Northumberland, she refused the proffered dignity, till the authority of her father the duke of Suffolk, and the entreaties of a husband whom she tenderly loved, prevailed upon her reluctantly to consent. She was as usual, conveyed to the Tower, preparatory to her coronation, and she was proclaimed queen in the city, and honoured with all the marks of royalty. This sunshine of prosperity, was, however, but transitory; her rival Mary proved more powerful, and the kingdom seemed to espouse her cause with such loyalty, that Northumberland and Suffolk yielded to the popular voice, and lady Jane, after being treated as queen for a few days, descended again, and with exultation, to privacy. But misfortunes accompanied her fall. She saw her father-in-law and his family; her own father and his numerous adherents, brought to the Tower, and at last expire under the hand of the executioner, and she herself, together with her husband, were to complete the bloody tragedy.

The Compilers of the Biographia Britannica, who have taken great pains in collecting and arranging from the several historians of the time, the particulars relating to this most excellent person, conclude their account of her in these words:

“Lady Jane, and her husband the lord Guilford Dudley, remaining still in confinement, were, on the 3rd of Nov. 1553, carried to the Tower to Guildhall, and with archbishop Cranmer and others arraigned and convicted of high-treason before judge Morgan, who pronounced on them sentence of death, the remembrance of which afterwards affected him so far, that he died raving. From this time the unfortunate lady Jane, and her no less unhappy husband, lived in the very shadow of death, and yet not without some gleams of comfort. For in the month of December, the marquis of Northampton, who in the same cause had fallen into the like circumstances, was pardoned and discharged; and at the same time the strictness of their confinement mitigated, by permission granted to take the air in the queen's garden, and other little indulgences, that would however have been so many acts of cruelty, if the queen had then intended what she afterwards thought fit to inflict. But this, by the consent of our best historians, is allowed to be altogether improbable; and that there are good reasons to believe the queen would have spared lady Jane, since she had already pardoned her father who was much more guilty, and that she would have extended her mercy to lord Guilford Dudley as well as to his elder brothers. However, in the first parliament of her reign, an act was passed for establishing the validity of such private contracts, as were dated during Jane's nine days administration, with a proviso, that all public acts, grants of lands, or the like, if any such there were, should be void. Another act likewise passed for confirming the attainders of Northumberland, Canterbury, and the rest, who had been convicted of high treason, which perhaps was thought necessary, to confirm the opinion of the judges, who had over-ruled their plea; that what they did was in obedience to the supreme authority then subsisting: but whatever hopes lady Jane and her husband might entertain, whatever ease they might enjoy, were quickly taken away by an unhappy event, which it was impossible for them to foresee, and in which it is not so much as pretended that either of them had the least hand. There was a great spirit raised in the nation against the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain; and upon this a general insurrection was concerted, which, if it had been executed with any degree of that prudence shewn in the planning of it, or rather if the Providence of God had not interposed, could scarce have failed of succeeding; sir Tho. Wiat of Kent, a man of a great estate and a greater influence, managed those who were afraid, under colour of this marriage, the kingdom would be delivered up to a foreign prince and his partizans. Sir Peter Carew, in Cornwall, dealt with such as were desirous of seeing the princess Elizabeth upon the throne, and in the arms of Courteney, whom the queen had lately restored to the title of Devonshire, and the duke of Suffolk, to whom danger had in vain preached discretion, and who could not learn loyalty even from mercy, made use of that great interest which his large estates gave him, though he held them by the queen's favour, to mislead her subjects from their duty, and to take up arms against her person. What the real view of this design was even time has not discovered; but by rashness, and misintelligence of those at the head of it, all miscarried. The duke of Suffolk, with his brothers lord John and lord Tho. Grey, were in arms, and with a body of three hundred horse presented themselves before the city of Coventry, in which they had a strong party; but the queen having sent down the earl of Huntingdon, he secured that place, and Suffolk finding his design abortive, and his people dropping away, retired, with as many as he could keep about him, to a house of his in Leicestershire, where, having distributed what money he had to those who were the companions of his fortune, he advised them to shift for themselves, trusting to the promises of one Underwood his park-keeper, who undertook to conceal, and who is suspected to have betrayed him to the earl of Huntingdon, by whom himself and his brother lord John being apprehended, were carried to Coventry, and after some stay there, sent to London, under a guard, where they did not arrive until the 10th of Feb. and were then committed to the Tower, out of which the duke never came but to his trial and to his death. This weak and ill managed business gave the ministers an opportunity of persuading the queen, that her safety could be no otherwise provided for, than by putting lady Jane and her husband to death: to which, a learned prelate assures us, the queen was not wrought without much difficulty; and it is very remarkable, that Sanders makes the very same observation, so that the truth of it can hardly be called in question. The news of this fatal resolution made no great impression upon this excellent lady; the bitterness of death was passed, she had expected it long, and was so well prepared to meet her fate, that she was very little discomposed. But the queen's charity hurt her more than her justice. The day first fixed for her death was Friday February the 9th, and she had in some measure taken leave of the world, by writing a letter to her unhappy father, who she heard was more disturbed with the thoughts of his being the author of her death, than with the apprehension of his own*. In this serene frame of mind, Dr. Feckenham, Abbot of Westminster, came to her from the queen, who was very desirous she should follow her father in-law's example, and be reconciled to the church of Rome. He was indeed a very fit instrument (if any had been fit) for this purpose; for he had an acute wit, a very plausible manner of speaking, and a great tenderness in his nature. Lady Jane received him with much civility, and behaved towards him with so much calmness and sweetness of temper, that he could not help being overcome with her distress; so that either mistaking or pretending to mistake her meaning, he procured a respite of her execution until the 12th. Yet he did not gain any thing upon her in regard to the design upon which he was sent; on the contrary, though she heard him patiently, yet she answered all his arguments with such strength, such clearness, and such a steadiness of mind, as shewed plainly that religion had been her principal care, and that the hopes of being happy in a future state, from acting according to the dictates of her conscience in this, had fortified her not only against the fears of death, but against all doubts or apprehensions whatever. On the Sunday evening, which was the last she was to spend in this world, she wrote a letter in the Greek tongue, as some say on the blank leaves at the end of a Testament in the same language, which she bequeathed as a legacy to her sister the lady Catherine; which piece of hers, if we had no other left, would be sufficient to render her memory immortal, and therefore the substance of it in English is inserted (see p. 726). The fatal morning being come, the lord Guilford earnestly desired the officers that he might take his last farewell of her. Which though they willingly permitted, yet upon notice she advised the contrary, assuring him, that such a meeting would rather add to his afflictions, than increase that quiet wherewith they had possessed their souls for the stroke of death; that he demanded a lenitive which would put fire into the wound, and that it was to be feared her presence would rather weaken than strengthen him; that he ought to take courage from his reason, and derive constancy from his own heart; that if his soul were not firm and settled, she could not settle it by her eyes nor confirm it by her words; that he should do well to remit this interview to the other world; that there indeed friendships were happy and unions indissoluble, and that theirs would be eternal if their souls carried nothing with them of terrestrial, which might hinder them from rejoicing. All she could do was to give him a farewell out of a window as he passed toward the place of his dissolution, which he suffered on the scaffold on Tower-Hill with much Christian meekness. His dead body being laid in a car and his head wrapped up in a linen cloth, were carried to the chapel within the Tower, in the way to which, they were to pass under the window of the lady Jane; which sad spectacle she likewise beheld, but of her own accord, and not either by accident, or as some, without any colour of truth, have insinuated, by design, and with a view to increase the weight of her afflictions. About an hour after the death of her husband, she was led out by the lieutenant to the scaffold that was prepared upon the green over-against the White-Tower. It is said that the court had once taken a resolution to have her beheaded on the same scaffold with her husband; but considering how much they were both pitied, and how generally lady Jane was beloved, it was determined, to prevent any commotions, that this execution should be performed within the Tower. She was attended to and upon the scaffold by Feckenham, but she was observed not to give much heed to his discourses, keeping her eyes steadily fixed on a book of prayers which she had in her hand, after some short recollection she saluted those who were present with a countenance perfectly composed; then taking leave of Dr. Feckenham, she said, 'God will abundantly requite you, good sir, for your humanity to me, though your discourses gave me more uneasiness than all the terrors of my approaching death.' She next addressed herself to the spectators in a plain and short speech. Then kneeling down she said the Miserere in English, after which she stood up, and gave her women, Mrs. Elizabeth Tilney and Mrs. Helen, her gloves and her handkerchief; and to the lieutenant of the Tower, whom Heylin calls sir John Gage, but Holinshed, Bridges, her prayer-book. When she untied her gown, the executioner offered to assist her, but she desired him to let her alone; and turning to her women, they undressed, and gave her a handkerchief to bind about her eyes. The executioner kneeling, desired her pardon; to which she answered, "most willingly." He desiring her to stand upon the straw, which bringing her within sight of the block, she said, I pray dispatch me quickly; adding presently after, Will you take it off before I lay me down? the executioner said, No madam: upon this, the handkerchief being bound close over her eyes, she began to feel for the block, to which she was guided by one of the spectators; when she felt it, she stretched herself forward and said, Lord into thy hands I commend my spirit, and immediately, at one stroke, her head was divided from her body. Her fate was universally deplored, even by those who were best affected to queen Mary; and as she is allowed to have been a princess of great piety, it must certainly have given her much disquiet to begin her reign with such an unusual effusion of blood; and, in the present case, of her near relation, one formerly honoured with her friendship and favour, who had indeed usurped, but without desiring or enjoying, the royal diadem, which she assumed, by the constraint of an ambitious father and an imperious mother; and which, at the first motion, she cheerfully and willingly resigned. This made her exceedingly lamented at home and abroad, the fame of her learning and virtue having reached over Europe, so as to excite many commendations, and some express panegyrics in different nations and in different languages. But whereas, some of our own writers seem to doubt whether she was with child or not at the time of her decease, and foreigners have improved this into a direct assertion, that she was five months gone, it seems to be improbable, since there were at that time so many busy and inquisitive people, that if the fact had been true it must have been known, and would have been perpetually repeated in those pieces that were every day sent abroad, in order to exasperate the nation against the queen and her ministers. On the twenty-first of the same month, the father of queen Jane, Henry Grey duke of Suffolk, lost his head upon Tower-hill: neither was the jealousy excited by king Edward's appointment, and their nearness in blood to the royal line, so fully extinguished by the blood of so many victims, but that it revived in the succeeding reign, and proved a new source of disquiet to the sad remains of this unhappy family. We have treated this article the more largely, because hitherto, excepting Heylin, none of our historians have represented the public and private life of this admirable person with any tolerable degree of distinctness; but have been content to hurry over her short possession of the crown, as if it had been an ordinary insurrection, and to speak of her death in general terms of compassion, with an exaggeration of some and a suppression of other circumstances, so as to put it out of the power of the reader to form a just notion of the whole transaction."

The following curious Document, together with the Introduction, is taken from the Somers' Tracts, 4th Col. vol. 1. p. 174:

[Whoever reads the latter part of the life of Henry 8th, will soon be convinced, that he left the succession of the crown so disputable, that it could only be owing to the hand of Providence, that the nation had not, for ever after, been distracted with contrary claims.—His divorces from Catharine of Arragon, and Anne Bullen; the Acts of Parliament confirming those divorces; other subsequent Acts, which seemed to repeal what the first had ordained; the power given to the king, to appoint his successors, and to place them in what order he pleased; and his last Will itself, so embroiled the affair of the succession, that it was left full of obscurity and contradiction. For as the makers of these new laws were not swayed with justice and equity, and calculated, merely to gratify the ambition and schemes of a prince, who would have taken vengeance on those that should act in opposition to his directions, it was not possible to act in such emergencies according to the ancient laws and customs of the realm.—He, after cohabiting with Catharine of Arragon 18 years, and having several children by her, obliged the archbishop of Canterbury to pronounce him divorced from her, and his marriage with her to be null and void; but not before he had contracted a second marriage with Ann Bullen, of which he also grew weary; and, accusing his second queen of adultery, he ordered her to be beheaded, after he had been also publicly divorced from her.—His next step was to obtain an act of parliament, 1536, to confirm both these divorces, and to declare Mary and Elisabeth, the children of these two marriages, illegitimate, and incapable of succeeding to the crown, without his special will and appointment. But in an act, made in 1544, Mary and Elisabeth were declared successively to inherit the crown after Edward, still allowing the king to impose conditions on these two princesses, without which they could have no right to succeed. And Henry made his last Will and Testament in the same manner; by which preferring Edward to be his immediate successor, he left it as his opinion, that his daughters were illegitimate.—Thus far the succession was much disturbed; but what still conduced to embroil it more, was the not mentioning, in his Will, the issue of Margaret queen of Scotland, Henry's eldest sister, and placing the children of his younger sister, Mary, queen dowager of France, and duchess of Suffolk, next to his daughter Elisabeth. And,—To compleat this confusion of claims to the crown, Edward 6th confirmed the act, which declared Mary and Elisabeth illegitimate; abrogated, by his own authority, the act which gave his father power to settle the succession, and, by his own Will, excluded Mary, Elisabeth, and the queen of Scotland from the throne, and conveyed the crown to Jane Grey, by the impertunity and ambition of the duke of Northumberland, who was known to hold Edward's council in subjection; and therefore whatever methods were taken before, or after the young king's death, to secure and settle Jane on the throne, and the drawing up and publishing the following proclamation, must be looked upon as the act and deed of the said duke, and not to be ascribed to the council.—This was the state of affairs, when Edward 6th was removed by death, and by this short recapitulation it may easily be perceived, what a door of divisions and civil wars was opened by Henry 8th and his successor. For, according to their acts and wills, and letters patents, Mary, Elisabeth, the queen of Scotland, and Jane Grey, four princesses, could claim the crown after Edward's death, and each of these princesses could find in these very acts, &c. arguments to oppose, the claim of her competitors. Yet only Jane, who, though by far the youngest, was not less endowed with the gifts of nature, and preferable to all her adversaries in the endowments of her mind, and least tainted with the ambitious desire of a crown, was forced by the importunity of her relations to accept of it, and thereby fell a sacrifice to their ambition; as it is excellently well related by Dr. Heylin, in these words in his History of the Reformation. She was eldest daughter of Henry lord Grey, duke of Suffolk. Her mother was the lady Frances, daughter, and, in fine, one of the co-heirs of Charles Brandon, the late duke of Suffolk, by Mary his wife, queen dowager to Lewis 12th of France, and youngest daughter of king Henry 7th. She seemed to have been born with those attractions, which seat a sovereignty in the face of most beautiful persons; yet was her mind endued with more excellent charms, than the attractions of her face; modest and mild of disposition, courteous of carriage, and of such affable deportment, as might entitle her to the name of queen of hearts, before she was designed for queen over any subjects. These her native and obliging graces, were accompanied with some more profitable ones, of her own acquiring; which set an higher value on them, and much increased the same, both in worth and lustre. Having attained unto that age, in which other young ladies used to apply themselves to the sports and exercises of their sex, she wholly gave her mind to good arts and sciences, much furthered in that pursuit by the loving care of Mr. Elmer, under whose charge she came to such a large proficiency, that she spake the Latin and Greek tongues, with as sweet a fluency, as if they had been natural and native to her; exactly skilled in the liberal sciences, and perfectly well studied in both kinds of philosophy. Take here a story out of Mr. Ascham's Schoolm. p. 11. in his own words: One example, whether love or fear doth work more in a child, for virtue or learning, I will gladly report; which may be heard with some pleasure, and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany, I came to Broadgate in Leicestershire, to take my leave of that noble lady, Jane Grey, to whom I was exceeding much beholding. Her parents, the duke and the duchess, with all the household, gentlemen and gentlewomen, were hunting in the park; I found her in her chamber, reading Phædon Platonis in Greek, and that with as much delight, as some gentlemen would read a merry tale in Boccace. After salutation, and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her, Why she would lose such pastime in the park? Smiling, she answered me, I know, all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that I find in Plato: Alas! good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant. And how came you, madam, quoth I, to this deep knowledge, and what did chiefly allure you unto it, seeing not any women, but very few men have attained thereunto? I will tell you, saith she, and tell you a truth, which perchance you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits, that ever God gave me, is, that he sent me so sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For, when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go; eat, drink, be merry, or sad; be sowing, playing, dancing, or doing any thing else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, even so perfectly, as God made the world; or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presently sometimes, with pinches, nips, and bobs, and other ways (which I will not name, for the honour I bear them) so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell, till the time come that I must go to Mr. Elmer; who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing, whilst I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall to weeping, because whatsoever I do else, but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and whole misliking unto me. And thus my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it, all other pleasures, in very deed, be but trifles and troubles unto me. I remember this talk gladly, both because it is so worthy of memory, and because also it was the last talk that ever I had, and the last time that ever I saw that noble and worthy lady. Thus far Mr. Ascham.—By this eminent proficiency in all parts of learning, and an agreeableness in disposition, she became very dear to the young king Edward; to whom Fox not only makes her equal, but doth acknowledge her also to be his superior, in those noble studies. And for an ornament superadded to her other perfections, she was most zealously affected to the true protestant religion, then by law established; which she embraced, not out of any outward compliance with the present current of the times, but because her own most excellent judgment had been fully satisfied in the truth and purity thereof. All which did so endear her to the king, that he took great delight in her conversation. Thus lived she in these sweet contentments, till she came unto the years of marriage, when she, that never found in herself the least spark of ambition, was made the most unhappy instrument of another man's. The proud and aspiring duke of Northumberland treats with the duke of Suffolk, about a marriage between the lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth son, and the lady Jane. The marriage is concluded, and, by Northumberland's policy, the crown is transferred from king Edward, to his cousin the lady Jane, his two sisters, the lady Mary and lady Elisabeth, being passed by. Memorable is the speech she made to the two dukes, when they owned her for queen, to this effect: That the laws of the kingdom, and natural right, standing for the king's sisters*, she would beware of burthening her weak conscience with a yoke, which did belong to them: That she understood the infamy of those, who had permitted the violation of right, to gain a scepter: That it was to mock God, and deride justice, to scruple at the stealing of a shilling, and not at the usurpation of a crown. Besides (said she) I am not so young, nor so little read in the guiles of fortune, to suffer myself to be taken by them. If she enrich any, it is but to make them the subjects of her spoil: If she raise others, it is but to pleasure herself with their ruins. What she adored, but yesterday, is to-day her pastime. And, if I now permit her to adorn and crown me, I must to-morrow suffer her to crush and tear me in pieces, &c. But the ambition of the two dukes was too strong and violent, to be kept down by any such prudent considerations. So that being wearied at last with their importunities, and overcome by the intreaties of her husband, whom she dearly loved, she submitted unto that necessity which she could not vanquish, yielding her head with more unwillingness to the ravishing glories of a crown, than afterward she did to the stroke of the ax.—Accordingly the duke of Northumberland declared, in his report to the council, that this good lady Jane was so far from aspiring to the crown, as to be rather made to accept of it, by enticement and force. And, The duke had no sooner obtained lady Jane's consent, but it was resolved that the council should move with her into the Tower of London, and that she should be proclaimed in the manner following: A Proclamation, which, for its substance, antiquity, curiosity, and scarceness, well deserves the attention of the reader, and to be preserved from the injuries of time.]

VOL. I.

“ JANE by the grace of God, queen of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the church of England, and also of Ireland, under Christ, in earth the supreme head. To all our most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects, and to every of them greeting. Whereas our most dear cousin, Edward 6th, late king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and in earth the supreme head, under Christ, of the church of England and Ireland, by his letters patents, signed with his own hand, and sealed with his great seal of England, bearing date the 21st day of June, in the 7th year of his reign, in the presence of the most part of his nobles, his counsellors, judges, and divers others grave and sage personages, for the profit and surety of the whole realm thereto assenting, and subscribing their names to the same, hath by the same his letters patents recited, that forasmuch as the imperial crown of this realm, by an act made in the 35th year of the reign of the late king of worthy memory, king Henry 8th, our progenitor and great uncle, was for lack of issue of his body lawfully begotten, and for lack of issue of the body of our said late cousin, king Edward 6th, by the same act limited, and appointed to remain to the lady Mary, by the name of the lady Mary, his eldest daughter, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten, and, for default of such issue, the remainder thereof to the lady Elisabeth, by the name of the lady Elisabeth, his second daughter, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten, with such conditions, as should be limited and appointed by the said late king of worthy memory, king Henry 8th, our progenitor and great uncle, by his letters patents, under his great seal, or by his last will in writing, signed with his hand. And forasmuch as the said limitation of the imperial crown of this realm, being limited, as is aforesaid, to the said lady Mary and lady Elisabeth, being illegitimate, and not lawfully begotten, for that the marriage had between the said late king, king Henry 8th, our progenitor and great uncle, and the lady Catharine, mother to the said lady Mary, and also the marriage had between the said late king, king Henry the 8th, our progenitor and great uncle, and the lady Anne, mother to the said lady Elisabeth, were clearly and lawfully undone, by sentences of divorces, according to the word of God, and the ecclesiastical laws: And which said several divorcements have been severally ratified, and confirmed by authority of parliament, and especially in the 28th year of the reign of king Henry 8th, our said progenitor and great uncle, remaining in force, strength, and effect, whereby as well the said lady Mary, as also the said lady Elisabeth, to all intents and purposes, are, and have been clearly disabled, to ask, claim, or challenge, the said imperial crown, or any other of the honours, castles, manors, lordships, lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, as heir, or heirs to our late cousin, king Edward 6th, or as heir, or heirs to any other person, or persons whosoever, as well for the cause before rehearsed, as also, for that the said lady Mary, and lady Elisabeth, were unto our said late cousin but of the half blood, and therefore, by the ancient laws, statutes, and customs of this realm, be not inheritable unto our said late cousin, although they had been born in lawful matrimony, as indeed they were not, as by the said sentences of divorce, and the said statute of the 28th of king Henry 8th, our said progenitor and great uncle, plainly appeareth. And forasmuch also as it is to be thought, or, at the least, much to be doubted, that if the said lady Mary, or lady Elisabeth, should hereafter have, and enjoy the said imperial crown of this realm, and should then happen to marry a stranger, born out of this realm, that then the same stranger, having the government and imperial crown in his hands, would adhere and practise, not only to bring this noble free realm into the tyranny and servitude of the bishop of Rome, but also to have the laws and customs of his or their own native country or countries to be practised, and put in use within this realm, rather than the laws, statutes, and customs here of long time used; whereupon the title of inheritance of all and singular the subjects of this realm do depend, to the peril of conscience, and the utter subversion of the commonweal of this realm. Whereupon our said late dear cousin weighing and considering with himself, what ways and means were most convenient to be had for the stay of the said succession in the said imperial crown, if it should please God to call our said late cousin out of this transitory life, having no issue of his body, and calling to his remembrance, that we and the lady Catharine, and the lady Mary, our sisters, being the daughters of the lady Frances our natural mother, and then and yet wife to our natural and most loving father, Henry, duke of Suffolk, and the lady Margaret, daughter of the lady Eleanor, then deceased sister to the said lady Frances, and the late wife of our cousin Henry earl of Cumberland, were very nigh of his grace's blood of the part of his father's side, our said progenitor and great uncle; and being naturally born here within the realm, and for the very good opinion our said late cousin had of our and our said sisters and cousin Margaret's good education, did therefore upon good deliberation and advice herein had and taken, by his said letters patents declare, order, assign, limit, and appoint, that if it should fortune himself our said late cousin king Edward the 6th to decease, having no issue of his body lawfully begotten, that then the said Imperial Crown of England and Ireland, and the confines of the same, and his title to the crown of the realm of France, and all and singular honours, castles, prerogatives, privileges, pre-eminences, authorities, jurisdictions, dominions, possessions, and hereditaments, to our said late cousin king Edward the 6th, or to the said Imperial Crown belonging, or in any wise appertaining, should for lack of such issue of his body remain, come, and be unto the eldest son of the body of the said lady Frances lawfully begotten, being born into the world in his life time, and to the heirs male of the body of the same eldest son lawfully begotten, and so from son to son, as he should be of antienty in birth, of the body of the said lady Frances lawfully begotten, being born into the world in our said late cousin's life-time, and to the heirs male of the body of every such son lawfully begotten, and for default of such son born into the world in his life-time, of the body of the said lady Frances lawfully begotten; and for lack of heirs male of every such son lawfully begotten, that then the said Imperial Crown, and all and singular other the premises should remain, come, and be to us by the name of the lady Jane, eldest daughter of the said lady Frances, and to the heirs male of our body lawfully begotten, and for lack of such heir male of our body lawfully begotten, that then the said Imperial Crown, and all other the premises, should remain, come, and be to the said lady Catharine, our said second sister, and to the heirs male of the body of the said lady Catharine lawfully begotten, with divers other remainders, as by the same letters patents more plainly, and at large it may, and doth appear. Sithence the making of which letters patents, that is to say on Thursday, which was the sixth day of this instant month of July, it hath pleased God to call to his infinite mercy, our said most dear and intire beloved cousin Edward the 6th, whose soul God pardon; and for as much as he is now deceased, having no heirs of his body begotten, and that also there remain at this present time, no heirs lawfully begotten of the body of our said progenitor and great uncle king Henry the 6th; and for as much also as the said lady Frances our said mother, had no issue male begotten of her body, and born into the world in the life-time of our said cousin king Edward the 6th, so as the said Imperial Crown, and other the premises to the same belonging, or in any wise appertaining, now be, and remain to us in our actual and royal possession, by authority of the said letters patents: we do therefore by these presents signify unto all our most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects, that like as we for our part, shall by God's grace, shew ourselves a most gracious and benign sovereign queen and lady, to all our good subjects, in all their just and lawful suits and causes, and to the uttermost of our power, shall preserve and maintain God's most holy word, christian policy, and the good laws, customs, and liberties of these our realms and dominions; so we mistrust not but they and every of them will again for their parts, at all times, and in all cases, shew themselves unto us their natural liege queen and lady, most faithful, loving, and obedient subjects, according to their bounden duties and allegiances, whereby they shall please God, and do the thing that shall tend to their own preservations and sureties; willing and commanding all men of all estates, degrees, and conditions, to see our peace and accord kept, and to be obedient to our laws, as they tender our favour, and will answer for the contrary at their extreme perils. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness ourself, at our Tower of London, the 10th day of July, in the 1st year of our reign." A. D. 1553.

God save the QUEEN.

As Mary rested her Claim to the Crown of England upon the WILL of her father Henry the 6th, and as lady Jane Grey's pretensions rested on the Will of king Edward the 6th, it is thought proper to insert in this place, those two curious and important Instruments. Both are in the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum; the former is likewise in the Prerogative Office, Doctors' Commons, and the Chapter House, at Westminster.

THE WILL OF KING HENRY THE EIGHTH.

(From the Original, deposited among the Records in the Chapter House at Westminster; of which it is, as far as possible, a fac simile.)

THE WILL OF KING EDWARD THE SIXTH.

A true Copy of the counterfeit WILL* supposed to be the last Will and Testament of king Edward the Sixth. Forged and published under the Great Seal of England by the Confederacy of the Dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland on the behalf of the Lady Jane, eldest Daughter to the said Duke of Suffolk, and testified with the hands of 101 of the Nobility and principal men of note of this Kingdom dated the 21st. day of June Anno 1553.

EDWARD the Sixth by the Grace of God King of England France and Ireland Defender of the Faith and the Church of England and also of Ireland in each the supreme head to all our nobles and other our good loving faithful and obedient subjects Greeting in our Lord God everlasting, for as much as it hath pleased the goodness of Almighty God to visit us with a long and weary sickness whereby we do feel our self to be with the same partly grown into some weakness, Albeit not doubting in the grace and goodnes of God but to be shortly by his mighty power restored to our former health and strength and to live here in this transitory world and life such and so long time as it shall please God to stand with his most godly providence and determination whereunto we do with all our heart most humbly wholly and clearly submit ourself and willing now to our remembrance how necessary a thing it is have the estate of the imperial crown of these our noble realms of England and Ireland and our title of France and the dominions and marches of the same to be so continued and preserved as the same be not destitute of such a head and governor as shall be aye and meet to rule and govern the same our realms and other dominions for the quiet preservation of the commonwealth of our good loving and faithful subjects, which said imperial crown together with all the titles honours preeminences and hereditaments thereunto belonging did lawfully descend and come by good faith right and lawful title and course of inheritance in fee simple to our late and most dear father of worthy memory king Henry the eighth being lawful and true inheritor thereof in fee simple by the antient laws statutes and customs of this realm and notwithstanding that in the time of our said late father that is to say in the 35th year of his reign there was then one statute made intituled an act concerning the establishment of the kings majesties thereof then in the Imperial Crown of this realm whereby it is enacted that in case it should happen our said late father and we then being his only son and heir apparent to decease without heirs of his body lawfully begotten to have and inherit the said Imperial Crown and other of our said late fathers dominions according and in such manner and form as in the said act made in the said 35th year is declared, that then the said Imperial Crown and all other the premises specified in the said act should be to the lady Mary by the name of the lady Mary our said late fathers daughter and to the heirs of the body of the said lady Mary lawfully begotten with such conditions as by our said father should be limited by his letters patent under his great seal or by his last will in writing signed with his hand and for default of such issue the said Imperial Crown and other the premises should be to the lady Elizabeth by the name of the lady Elizabeth our said late fathers second daughter and to the heirs of the body of the said lady Elizabeth lawfully begotten with such conditions as by the said late father should be limited by his letters patent under his great seal or by his last will in writing signed with his hand as in the said act made in the said 35th year of our said late fathers reign and amongst the divers and sundry other things and provisions therein contained more plainly and at large it doth and may appear and for as much as the said limitation of the Imperial Crown of this Realm being limited by authority of parliament as is aforesaid to the said lady Mary and lady Elizabeth being illegitimate and not lawfully begotten, for as much as the marriage had between our said late father and the lady Catherine mother to the said lady Mary was dearly and lawfully undone and separation between them had by sentence of divorce according to the ecclesiastical laws. And likewise the marriage had between our said late father and the lady Anne mother to the said lady Elizabeth was also clearly and lawfully undone and separation between them had by sentence of divorce according to the ecclesiastical laws which said several divorcements have been severally ratified and confirmed by authority of divers acts of parliament remaining in their full force strength and effect whereby as well the said lady Mary as also the said lady Elizabeth to all intents and purposes are and be clearly disabled to ask claim or challenge the Imperial Crown or any other of our honors castles manors lordships lands tenements and hereditaments as heir or heirs to us or to any other person or persons whatsoever as well for the cause before rehearsed as also for that, that the said lady Mary and lady Elizabeth be unto us but of the half blood, and therefore by the ancient laws, statutes and customs of this realm be not inheritable unto us although they were legitimate as they be not indeed and for as much also as it is to be thought or at the least much to be doubted that the said lady Mary or lady Elizabeth should hereafter have and enjoy the said Imperial Crown of this realm and should then happen to marry with any stranger born out of this realm that then the same stranger having the government and the Imperial Crown in his hands would rather adhere and practise to have the laws and conformities of his or their own native country or countries to be practised or put in force within this our realm than the laws statutes and customs here of long time used whereupon the title of inheritance of all and singular our loving subjects do depend which would then tend to the utter subversion of the commonwealth of this our realm which God defend upon all which causes and matters and upon divers other considerations concerning the same we have oftentimes as well since the time of our sickness as in the time of our health weighed and considered with ourself what ways and means were most convenient to be had for the staye of our said succession in the said Imperial Crown if it should please God to call us out of this transitory life having no issue of our body lawfully begotten and calling to our remembrance that the lady Jane the lady Catherine and the lady Mary daughters of our entirely beloved cousin the lady Frances now wife to our loving cousin and faithful counsellor Henry duke of Suffolk and the lady Margaret daughter of our late cousins the lady Eleanora deceased sister to the said lady Frances and the late wife of our well beloved cousin Henry earl of Cumberland being very nigh of our whole blood of the part of our fathers side and being natural born here within the realm and have been also very honourably brought up and exercised in good and godly learning and other noble virtues so as there is great trust and hope to be had in them that they be and shall very well inclined to the advancement and setting forth of our commonwealth doth therefore upon good deliberation and advice herein had and taken and having also thanks to the living God our full whole and perfect memory do by these presents declare order assign limit and appoint that if it shall fortune us to decease having no issue of our body lawfully begotten that then the said Imperial Crown of this our Realms of England and Ireland and of the confines of the same and our title to the crown and realme of France and all and singular honors castles prerogatives privileges pre-eminences authorities jurisdictions dominions possessions and hereditaments to us and our said imperial crowne belonging or in any wise appertaining shall for lack of such issue of our body remain come and become the eldest sons of the body of the said lady Francis lawfully begotten being born into the world in our life time and to the heirs male of the body of the said elder the son lawfully begotten and so from son to son as he shall be of seniority in birth of the body of the said lady Frances lawfully begotten or being born into the world in our life time and to the heirs male of the body of every such son lawfully begotten and for default of such son born into the world in our life time of the body of the said lady Frances lawfully begotten and for lack of the heirs male of every such son lawfully begotten that then the said imperial crowne and all and singular other the premises shall remaine come and be to the lady Jane eldest daughter of the said

Mem. This is a true Copy of Edward the 6th's Will taken out of the Original under the Great Seal which Robert Cotton delivered to the King's Majesty the 17th of April 1611 at Royston to be cancelled.

Rapin's Account of the making of this Instrument is as follows :

" Mean while Edward was still troubled with a deflection upon his lungs, which wasted him by degrees, and daily grew more dangerous. Some affirm downright, that a slow poison had been given him, and throw the suspicion of it upon the duke of Northumberland. Others only insinuate such a thing, without saying it positively. But when all is done, both speak only by conjecture, without giving any proof. The young king saw death approaching without any fears as to himself. But he could not reflect, without an extreme concern, on the state Religion would be in under his sister Mary, who was to succeed him. It is very probable the duke of Northumberland, who hardly ever left him since his illness, took care to heighten his fears in that respect, on purpose to bring him the more easily to the pass he desired. All hopes however of the king's recovery were not given over till the middle of May, when in all likelihood the physicians told the duke of Northumberland his case was desperate. Then it was that he matched the Lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth son, the only one unmarried, with Jane Grey, eldest daughter of the new duke of Suffolk, by Francis Brandon, who was by Henry 8th's Will the next in the succession after the princess Elizabeth. At the same time Jane's two sisters were also married; the second, the lady Catherine, to the earl of Pembroke's eldest son, the lord Herbert; the third, the lady Mary, [who was crooked] to [the king's groom-porter] Martin Keys. These marriages were solemnized about the end of May, when there was no hope of the king's recovery. At last, one day as the young king was expressing the excessive trouble he was under, when he considered the princess Mary his sister would do her utmost endeavour to destroy the reformation, the duke of Northumberland broke the ice. He represented to the king that there was but one way to prevent the misfortune England was threatened with, in case the princess Mary ascended the throne after him; and that was, to settle the crown on the lady Jane Grey his daughter-in-law. Indeed it was natural in excluding Mary, to transfer the crown to her sister Elizabeth, whom the king tenderly loved, and who was a hearty friend to the reformation. But probably the duke told the king, that as he could not set aside Mary but on the specious pretence of her being illegitimated, the same reason was in force with regard to Elizabeth, since the marriages of their mothers were alike annulled. That therefore, either the succession was to be left as the late king had settled it, or the princesses were to be both excluded together. Very likely the young king who found himself dying, and who thought only of saving the reformation from the impending destruction, was prevailed upon by this argument, to sacrifice the princess Elizabeth. Besides, he had a very great esteem and affection for Jane Grey, who was an accomplished lady both in body and mind.—However this be, the king having taken the resolution suggested to him by the duke of Northumberland, three judges of the realm were sent for, and required to draw an assignment of the crown to Jane Grey. The judges desired a little time to consider of it. At last they answered, they could not take upon them to do any such thing, without being guilty of high-treason. Adding, that all the privy-counsellors who consented to the assignment, would unavoidably be liable to the pains expressed in the act of parliament made for that purpose. Upon which the duke of Northumberland fell into such a passion, that he had like to have beaten the judges; nevertheless they stood to what they had said. On the 15th of June they were sent for again, and at length by threats and the expedient of a pardon under the great seal, they were wrought upon to draw the settlement of the crown, which was signed by all the rest of the judges except Hales, who could never be prevailed with to do it. All the privy-counsellors set their hands to it likewise on the 21st of the same month. Cranmer was absent that day on purpose to avoid signing: but the king importuned him so much, that he set his hand at last as a witness, as it is pretended, and not as a privy-counsellor."

48. Arraignment and Execution of HENRY GREY duke of SUFFOLK: 1 MARY, A. D. 1553. [Cotton. MSS. in Brit. Museum. 3 Fox's Acts and Monum. 617.]

AS to the duke of Suffolk, there is in the Cottonian collection a brief MS. account of him in the following words:

Henry Fitzalan lord Maltravers and lord steward of her majesty's household and lord high steward of England at the Arraignment of Henry lord Grey duke of Suffolk, father of the lady Jane, married to Guilford Dudley:

This Henry duke of Suffolk being condemned by his peers for combining in rebellion with Wyatt against the Queen and her proceedings with Spain had sentence of death pronounced against him, which he suffered the 23rd of Feb. upon the Tower-hill, where he most christianly made profession of his faith with great repentance of his fact.—This duke's facility too by practice had occasioned the troubles wherewith this realm had for some years been distracted, and his rash ingratitude, the queen having once pardoned him beyond expectation, had diverted the current of the queen's clemency towards his daughter the lady Jane, whose life, it was generally conceived, she would have pardoned but her father's miscounselled rashness hastened her death.

Upon Saturday, being the 17th of February, the duke of Suffolk was arraigned at Westminster, and the same day condemned to die by his peers, the earl of Arundel was chief judge for this day. Upon the Sunday following, which was the 18th day of the said month, sessions was kept in London, which hath not before been kept upon the Sunday. Upon the Monday, the 19th of Feb. lord Cobham's three sons, and four other men were arraigned at Westminster : of which sons the youngest was condemned, whose name was Thomas, and the other two came not at the bar, and the other four were condemned. Upon the Tuesday, being the 20th of Feb. the lord John Gray was arraigned at Westminster, and there condemned the same day, and other three men, whereof one was named Nailor. Upon Wednesday, the 21st of Feb. the lord Thomas Gray, and sir James Croft were brought through London to the Tower with a number of horsemen. Upon the Thursday, being the 22nd of Feb. sir Nicholas Throgmorton was committed to the Tower.

Upon the Friday, being the 23d of Feb. 1554, the duke of Suffolk was beheaded at the Tower-hill, the order of whose death here followeth :

On Friday the 23rd of Feb. 1554, about nine of the clock in the forenoon, the lord Henry Gray, duke of Suffolk, was brought forth of the Tower of London unto the scaffold on the Tower-hill, with a great company, &c. and in his coming thither, there accompanied him doctor Weston as his ghostly father, notwithstanding, as it should seem, against the will of the said duke. For when the duke went up to the scaffold, the said Weston being on the left hand, pleased to go up with him. The duke with his hand, put him down again off the stairs : and Weston, taking hold of the duke, forced him down likewise. And as they ascended the second time, the duke again put him down.—Then Weston said that it was the queen's pleasure he should so do. Wherewith the duke casting his hands abroad, ascended up the scaffold, and paused a pretty while after. And then he said : " Masters, I have offended the queen, and her laws, and thereby am justly condemned to die, and am willing to die, desiring all men to be obedient, and I pray God that this my death may be an example to all men, beseeching you all to bear me witness, that I die in the faith of Christ, trusting to be saved by his blood only, and by no other trumpery, the which died for me, and for all them that truly repent, and stedfastly trust in him. And I do repent, desiring you all to pray to God for me ; and that when you see my breath depart from me, you will pray to God that he may receive my soul." And then he desired all men to forgive him, saying that the queen had forgiven him.

Then Mr. Weston declared with a loud voice that the queen's majesty had forgiven him. With that divers of the standers by said with meetly good and audible voice : Such forgiveness God send thee, meaning Dr. Weston. Then the duke kneeled down upon his knees, and said the Psalm Miserere mei Deus unto the end, holding up his hands, and looking up to heaven. And when he had ended the Psalm, he said, In manus tuas Domine commendo spiritum meum, &c. Then he arose and stood up, and delivered his cap and his scarf unto the executioner.

Then the said executioner kneeled down, and asked the duke forgiveness. And the duke said God forgive thee, and I do : and when thou doest thine office, I pray thee do it well, and bring me out of this world quickly, and God have mercy to thee. Then stood there a man and said, My lord how shall I do for the money that you do owe me ? and the duke said, Alas good fellow, I pray thee trouble me not now, but go thy way to my officers. Then he knit a kercher about his face, and kneeled down and said, ' Our Father which art in heaven, &c.' unto the end. And then he said, Christ have mercy upon me, and laid down his head on the block, and the executioner took the axe, and at the first chop stroke off his head, and held it up to the people, &c.

The same day a number of prisoners had their pardon, and came through the city with their halters about their necks. There were in number about 200.

49. The Trials of JOHN DUDLEY duke of Northumberland, WILLIAM PARR marquis of Northampton, and JOHN DUDLEY earl of Warwick, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward, at Westminster, 18th August, 1 MARY, A. D. 1553; and also of Sir JOHN GATES, Sir HENRY GATES, Sir ANDREW DUDLEY, and Sir THOMAS PALMER, at Westminster, for the same Crime, the day following. [Harleian MSS. 2 Kennett's Compl. Hist. 334.]

["The Proceedings against these noblemen and others, for asserting the Title of the lady Jane Grey to the Crown, and opposing that of queen Mary, seem to deserve a place in this Collection, chiefly on account of the questions of law proposed to the court by the duke of Northumberland, previously to his confession of the Indictment. The Harleian Manuscript, which we shall first lay before the reader, is copied from Hollingshead, except the latter part about the marquis of Northampton and the earl of Warwick. The next account of the transaction is immediately taken from the translation of bishop Godwin's 'Annals of Mary,' in Kennet's 'Complete History of England,' but is acknowledged by bishop Godwin to be extracted from the great French Historian of his own time, the president de Thou." Hargrave.]

THOMAS duke of Norfolk sitting as high steward of England, on the 18th day of August were brought before him John Dudley duke of Northumberland, William Parris marquisse of Northampton, and the earle of Warwicke, sonne to the duke of Northumberland. The duke of Northumberland, att his cominge to the barre, vsed greate reverence towards the judges, and protestinge his faith and obedience to the queene's majesty, whome he confessed grievously to haue offended, he said; that hee meant not to speake any thinge in defence of himselfe; but would first vnderstand the opinion of the courte in two points. 1. Whether a man, doinge an acte by the authority of the prince and counsell, and by a warrant of the greate seale of England, and doinge nothinge without the same, may bee charged for treason for any thinge which hee might doe by warrant thereof? 2. Whether any such persons, as were equally culpable in that crime, and those by whose letters and commaundements he was directed in all his doings, might bee his judges, or passe vpon his tryall att his death?

Wherevnto was answered, That, as concerning the first, the greate seale, which hee layd for his warrant, was not the seale of the lawfull queene of the realme, nor passed by authority, but the seale of an Usurper, and therefore would bee noe warrant for him.—

And to the second, it was alleaged, that, if any were as deeply to bee touched as himselfe in that case, yet as longe as noe atteindor were of record against them, they were neverthelesse persons able in the laws to passe vpon any tryall, and not to bee challenged thereon, but att the princes pleasure.

After which Answers, the duke vsinge fewe words, declared his earnest repentance in the case, (for hee saw, that to stand vpon vttering any reasonable matter would little prevaile) and moved the duke of Norfolk to bee a meanes vnto the queene for mercy, and without further answeare confessed the Indictment; by whose example alsoe the other prisoners arraigned with him did likewise confesse the indictment produced against them, and therevpon had judgment.

The Judgment beinge pronounced, hee craved favour of such a death as was executed on noblemen, and not the other; hee beseeching also that a favourable regard might bee had of his children in respect of theirs age, and that hee might bee permitted to confesse with some learned divine for the settlinge of his conscience; and lastly, that her majestie would bee pleased to send vnto him fowre of her counsell for the discovery of some things which might concerne the state.

The marquisse of Northampton pleaded to his Lurdiment, that after the beginninge of these tumults hee had forborne the execution of any publique office; and that all the while hee, intent to huntinge and other sports, did not partake in the conspiracy; but it beinge manifest that hee wast party with the duke of Northumberland, sentence passed on him likewise.

The earle of Warwicke, fyndinge that the Judges in soe greate a cause, admitted noe excuse of age, with greate resolucion heard his condemnation pronounced against him, cravinge only this favour; that, whereas the goods of those who are condemned for treason are totally confiscated; yet her majestie would bee pleased, that out of them his debts might bee payd. — After this they were all returned agayne to the Tower.

On the 18th of August, the duke of Norfolk sitting as lord high steward, those concerned in the Rebellion were tried at Westminster;

where the duke of Northumberland, with his eldest son the earl of Warwick, and the marquis of Northampton, were found guilty of High Treason. The account of that day's proceedings, and of the day following, I shall here transcribe from Thuanus, a writer of great fame; because, though I do not entirely approve all he has set down, I think he keeps very near to truth, and the reader, perhaps, will not be ill entertained with the variety of opinions upon this matter.

"The duke of Northumberland, says he, alledged, That he did nothing but by order of the council, yet this would not excuse him; so that he was condemned as a traitor. When the sentence was pronounced, he begged that it might be mitigated, as to the manner of his death, and that his children, in regard to their tender years, might find mercy; and that he might have the liberty of speaking with some learned divine (for the settling of his conscience). And lastly, that her majesty would be pleased to send to him four of her privy-council, to whom he had some things to communicate, relating to the public. Then came on the trial of the marquis of Northampton, who pretended, that he had not any hand in the rebellion, nor was engaged in any party, but having no public post, had spent all the time in his usual diversion of hunting, and other sports (a). However, it appeared that he was engaged on Northumberland's side, and therefore he was likewise condemned. Afterwards, the earl of Warwick, Northumberland's eldest son, when the plea of his youth would not be admitted in excuse of so great a crime, received his sentence of death with a wonderful constancy; and only prayed her majesty, that out of his estate confiscated, his debts might be discharged. These were presently sent back to the Tower. The next day, sir Andrew Dudley, Northumberland's brother, and sir John Gates, who was supposed the first author of setting up lady Jane, with his brother Henry Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were condemned. The 22d of August they were brought out to execution, having two days before received the Sacrament in prison. Northumberland, by the persuasion of Heath, afterwards archbishop of York, made a speech to the people, in which he confessed his crime and repentance, and advised all who were present to adhere to the ancient religion of their forefathers, and rejecting the new opinions, as the source of all the evils that had befallen them for 30 years past, to drive the preachers of them, as trumpeters of sedition, out of the kingdom, if they would approve themselves innocent before God and the public. He declared that in his heart he had always been for the old religion, and appealed for the truth of this to his intimate friend the bishop of Worcester, but he had temporised out of ambition, for which he now was a sincere penitent; and lastly, that he willingly submitted to his death, which he owned he had deserved. Having said this, he recommended himself to God, and desiring the prayers of the spectators, prepared to receive the stroke; and immediately the executioner performed his office. Northumberland's exhortations variously affected the minds of the people, who were amazed to hear him speak against that religion, which he had professed for above 30 years; and on the account of which chiefly he had advised king Edward to exclude his sisters. Most have written, that being a cunning man, and fond of life, he did this in hopes of a pardon; and that when he looked round him and saw he was deceived, he repented of it (b). He was charged, upon no trivial conjectures, with having poisoned the late king. But nothing of this was mentioned at his trial; because his judges undertook not the examination into king Edward's death, but only the business of the rebellion against queen Mary. Gates too and Palmer underwent the same punishment."

(b) Fox, who lived in these times, confirms and clears this matter: who writes, that the duke had a promise made him of a pardon; yea, though his head were upon the block, on condition he would recant, and hear mass. On which promise he firmly relied, and did what was required; and still born up with the same hope, on the scaffold denied, in word and outward profession, that true religion which he had often, both in king Henry's and king Edward's days, evidently declared himself to favour and further. ## 50. Proceedings against THOMAS CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, for Treason and Heresy: 2 MARY, 3 PHIL. & MARY, A. D. 1554, 1556. [3 Fox's Acts and Monum. 647.]

KING Edward the sixth, a prince of most worthy towardness, falling sick, when he perceived that his death was at hand, and the force of his painful disease would not suffer him to live longer, and knowing that his sister

Mary was wholly wedded to popish religion, bequeathed the succession of this realm to the lady Jane, a lady of great birth, but of greater learning, being niece to king Henry 8th by his sister, by consent of the council and lawyers of this realm*. To this Testament of the king's, when all the nobles of the realm, states and judges had subscribed; they sent for the Archbishop, and required him that he also would subscribe. But he excusing himself on this manner, said, that it was otherwise in the Testament of king Henry his father, and that he had sworn to the succession of Mary, as then the next heir, by which oath he was so bound, that without manifest perjury he could not go from it. The Council answered, that they were not ignorant of that, and that they had conscience as well as he, and moreover that they were sworn to that Testament, and therefore he should not think there was any danger therein, or that he should be in more peril of perjury than the rest. To this the Archbishop answered, that he was judge of no man's conscience but his own: and therefore as he would not be prejudicial to others, so he would not commit his conscience unto other men's facts, or cast himself into danger, seeing that every man should give account of his own conscience, and not of other men's. And as concerning subscription, before he had spoken with the king himself, he utterly refused to do it.

The king therefore being demanded of the Archbishop concerning this matter, said, that the nobles and lawyers of the realm counselled him unto it, and persuaded him that the bond of the first testament could nothing let, but that this lady Jane might succeed him as heir, and the people without danger acknowledge her as their queen. Who then demanding leave of the king, that he might first talk with certain lawyers that were in the court; when they all agreed that by law of the realm it might be so, returning to the king, with much ado he subscribed.

Well, not long after this, king Edward died, being almost 16 years old, to the great sorrow, but greater calamity of the whole realm. After whose decease immediately it was commanded that the lady Jane, which was unwilling thereunto, should be proclaimed queen. Which thing much disliked the common people; not that they did so much favour Mary, before whom they saw the lady Jane preferred, as for the hatred conceived against some, whom they could not favour.

Besides this, other causes there happened also of discord between the nobles and the commons the same time: for what injuries of commons and inclosures wrongfully holden, with other inordinate pollings and uncharitable dealing between the landlords and tenants, I cannot tell. But in fine, thus the matter fell out, that Mary hearing of the death of her brother, and shifting for herself, was so assisted by the commons, that eftsoons she prevailed. Who, being established in the possession of the realm, not long after came to London, and after she had caused first the two fathers, the duke of Northumberland and the duke of Sufffolk to be executed, likewise she caused the lady Jane, being both in age tender, and innocent from this crime, after she could by no means be turned from the constancy of her faith, together with her husband, to be beheaded.—The rest of the nobles paying fines were forgiven, the archbishop of Canterbury only excepted. Who though he desired pardon by means of his friends, could obtain none; insomuch that the queen would not once vouchsafe to see him. For as yet the old grudge against the archbishop for the divorcement of her mother, remained hid in the bottom of her heart. Besides this divorce, she remembered the state of religion changed; all which was imputed to the archbishop as the cause thereof.

While these things were in doing, a rumour was in all mens mouths, that the archbishop, to curry favour with the queen, had promised to say a dirge mass after the old custom, for the funeral of king Edward her brother. Neither wanted there some which reported that he had already said mass at Canterbury; which mass indeed was said by Dr. Thornton. This rumour Cranmer thinking speedily to stuy, gave forth a writing of his purgation.

This Bill being thus written, and lying openly in a window in his chamber, cometh in by chance master Story, bishop then of Rochester, who after he had read and perused the same, required of the archbishop to have a copy of the bill. The abp. when he had granted and permitted the same to master Story, by the occasion thereof master Story lending it to some friend of his, there were divers copies taken out thereof, and the thing published abroad among the common people; insomuch that every scrivener's shop almost, was occupied in writing and copying out the same: and so at length some of these copies coming to the bishop's hands, and so brought to the council, and they sending it to the commissioners, the matter was known, and so he commanded to appear.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer at his day prefixed, appeared before the said commissioners, bringing a true inventory, as he was commanded, of all his goods. That done, a bishop of the queen's privy council, (Dr. Heath, bishop after of York) being one of the said commissioners, after the inventory was received, bringing in mention of the bill; My lord, said he, there is a bill put forth in your name, wherein you seem to be aggrieved with setting up the mass again; we doubt not but you are sorry that it is gone abroad.—To whom the archbishop answered again, saying, As I do not deny myself to be the very author of that bill or letter, so must I confess here unto you, concerning the same bill, that I am sorry that the said bill went from me in such sort as it did. For when I had written it, Dr. Story got the copy of me, and is now come abroad, and as I understand, the city is full of it. For which I am sorry, that it so passed my hands: for I intended otherwise to have made it in a more large and ample manner, and minded to have set it on Paul's church door, and on the doors of all the churches in London, with mine own seal joined thereto.

At which words, when they saw the constancy of the man, they dismissed him, affirming that they had no more at that present to say unto him, but that shortly he should hear further. The said bishop declared afterward to one of Dr. Cranmer's friends, that notwithstanding his attainder of treason, the queen's determination at that time was, that Cranmer should only have been deprived of his archbishopric, and have had a sufficient living assigned him, upon his exhibiting of a true inventory, with commandment to keep his house without meddling in matters of religion. But how true that was, I have not to say. This is certain, that not long after this, he was sent unto the Tower, and soon after condemned of Treason. Notwithstanding the queen, when she could not honestly deny him his pardon, seeing all the rest were discharged, and specially, seeing he last, of all other, subscribed to king Edward's request, and that against his own will, released to him his action of Treason, and accused him only of Heresy; which liked the archbishop right well, and came to pass as he wished, because the cause was not his own, but Christ's; not the queen's, but the church's. Thus stood the cause of Cranmer, till at length it was determined by the queen and the council, that he should be removed from the Tower where he was prisoner, to Oxford, there to dispute with the doctors and divines. And privily word was sent before to them of Oxford to prepare themselves, and make them ready to dispute. And although the queen and the bishops had concluded before what should become of him, yet it pleased them that the matter should be debated with arguments, that under some honest shew of disputation the murder of the man might be covered. Neither could their hasty speed of revenge abide any long delay; and therefore in all haste he was carried to Oxford.

Without reciting the particulars of this disputation or his condemnation by the university and the prolocutor, we now proceed to his final judgment and order of condemnation, which was the 12th day of September, 1553, and seven days before the condemnation of bishop Ridley and master Latimer. The story whereof here followeth, faithfully corrected by the Report and Narration (coming by chance to our hands) of one who being both present (hereat, and also a devout favourer of the see and faction of Rome, can lack no credit (I trowe) with such, which seek what they can to discredit whatsoever maketh not with their phantasied religion of Rome.

After the disputations done and finished in Oxford between the doctors of both universities, and the three worthy bishops, Dr. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, ye heard then how sentence condemnatory immediately upon the same was ministered against them by Dr. Weston and other of the university, whereby they were judged to be heretics, and so committed to the mayor and sheriffs of Oxford. But forasmuch as the sentence given against them was void in law (for at that time the authority of the pope was not yet received into the land) therefore was a new commission sent from Rome, and a new process framed for the conviction of these reverend and godly learned men aforesaid. In which commission, first was Dr. James Brooks bishop of Gloucester the pope's subdelegate, with Dr. Martin, and Dr. Story, commissioners in the king and queen's behalf, for the execution of the same. Of the which three commissioners above named, as touching Dr. Martin, this by the way is to be understood, that although he was used for an instrument of the Pope's side, to serve a turn (whose book also is extant against the lawful marriage of priests) yet notwithstanding neither was he so bitter an enemy in this persecution, as other commissioners were; and also in this time of queen Elizabeth, where divers other doctors of the Arches refused to be sworn against the pope, he denied not the oath; and yet notwithstanding not altogether here to be excused. But to the purpose of this story. Whereof first it shall be requisite to declare the circumstance, and the whole state of the matter, as in a general description, before we come to their orations, according as in a parcel of a certain letter touching the same, it came to our hands.

Imprimis, here is to be understood, that at the coming down of the foresaid commissioners, which was upon Thursday, the 12th of Sept. 1553, in the Church of Saint Mary, and in the East end of the said church at the high altar, was erected a solemn scaffold for bishop Brooks aforesaid, representing the pope's person, ten foot high. The seat was made that he might sit under the sacrament of the altar. And on the right hand of the pope's delegate beneath him sat Dr. Martin, and on the left hand sat Dr. Story the king and queen's commissioners, which were both doctors of the civil law, and underneath them other doctors, scribes, and pharisees also, with the pope's collector, and a rabblement of such other like.

And thus these bishops being placed in their pontificalibus, the bishop of Canterbury was sent for to come before them. He having intelligence of them that were there, thus ordered himself. He came forth of the prison to the church of saint Mary, set forth with bills and gloves for fear he should start away, being clothed in a fair black gown, with his hood on both shoulders, such as doctors of divinity in the university use to wear. Who, after he was come into the church, and did see them sit in their pontificalibus, he did not put off his cap to any of them, but stood still till that he was called. And anon one of the proctors for the pope, or else his doctor, called 'Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, appear here and make answer to that shall be laid to thy charge; that is to say, for Blasphemy, Incontinency,

Upon this he being brought more near unto the scaffold, where the foresaid bishop sat, he first well viewed the place of judgment, and spying where the king and queen's majesty's proctors were, putting off his cap, he first humbly bowing his knee to the ground, made reverence to the one, and after to the other. That done, beholding the bishop in the face, he put on his honnet again, making no manner of token of obedience towards him at all. Whereat the bishop being offended, said unto him, That it might beseem him right well, weighing the authority he did represent, to do his duty unto him. Whereunto Dr. Cranmer answered and said, That he had oncè taken a solemn oath, never to consent to the admitting of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm of England again; and that he had done it advisedly, and meant by God's grace to keep it; and therefore would commit nothing either by sign or token, which might argue his consent to the receiving of the same, and so he desired the said bishop to judge of him, and that he did it not for any contempt to his person, which he could have been content to have honoured as well as any of the other, if his commission had come from as good an authority as theirs. This answered he both modestly, wisely, and patiently, with his cap on his head, not once bowing or making any reverence to him that represented the pope's person, which was wonderously of the people marked that was there present and saw it, and marked it as nigh as could be possible.

WHEN after many means used, they perceived that the archbishop would not move his bonnet, the bishop proceeded in these words following: "My lord, at this present we are come to you as Commissioners, and for you, not intruding ourselves by our own authority, but sent by Commission, partly from the pope's holiness, partly from the king and queen's most excellent majesties not to your utter discomfort, but to your comfort if you will yourself. We come not to judge you, but to put you in remembrance of that you have been, and shall be. Neither come we to dispute with you but to examine you in certain matters; which being done, to make relation thereof to him that hath power to judge you. The first being well taken, shall make the second to be well taken. For if you of your part be moved to come to a conformity, then shall not only we of our side take joy of our examination, but also they that have sent us. And first, as charity doth move us, I would think good somewhat to exhort you, and that by the second chapter of Saint John in the Apoc. Memor esto unde escideris, & age penitentiam, & prima opera fac.

Sin minus, i. Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do the first works, or if not, and so as ye know what followeth. Remember yourself from whence you have fallen. You have fallen from the universal and catholic church of Christ, from the very true and received faith of all christendom, and that by open heresy. You have fallen from your promise to God, from your fidelity and allegiance, and that by open preaching, marriage, and adultery. You have fallen from your sovereign prince and queen by open treason. Remember therefore from whence you are fallen. Your fall is great, the danger cannot be seen. Wherefore when I say, remember from whence you are fallen, I put you in mind not only of your fall, but also of the state you were in before your fall. You were sometime, as I and other poor men, in a mean estate, God I take to witness, I speak it to no reproach or abasement of you, but to put you in memory, how God hath called you from a low to an high degree, from one degree to another, from better to better, and never gave you over, till he had appointed you Legatum natum, Metropolitanum Anglie, Pastorem gregis sui. Such great trust did he put you in, in his church, what could he do more? for even as he ordained Moses to be a ruler over his Church of Israel, and gave him full authority upon the same: so did he make you over his Church of England. And when did he this for you? forsooth when you gave no occasion or cause of mistrust either to him, or to his magistrates. For although it be conjectured, that in all your time ye were not upright in the honour and faith of Christ, but rather set up of purpose as a fit instrument, whereby the church might be spoiled and brought into ruin; yet may it appear by many your doings otherwise, and I for my part, as it behoveth each one of us, shall think the best. For who was thought as then more devout? who was more religious in the face of the world? Who was thought to have more conscience of a vow making, and observing the order of the church, more earnest in the defence of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar than ye were? and then all things prospered with you; your prince favoured you; yea God himself favoured you; your candlestick was set up in the highest place of the church, and the light of your candle was over all the church; I would God it had so continued still. But after ye began to fall by schism, and would not acknowledge the pope's holiness as supreme head, but would stoutly uphold the unlawful requests of king Henry the 8th, and would bear with that should not be born withal, then began you to fancy unlawful liberty, and when you had exiled a good conscience, then ensued great shipwreck in the sea, which was out of the true and catholic church, cast into the sea of desperation; for as he saith; Extra Ecclesiam non est salus, i. Without the church there is no salvation. When ye had forsaken God, God forsook you, and gave you over to your own will and suffered you to fall from schism to apostasy, from apostasy to heresy, and from heresy to perjury, from perjury to treason, and so in conclusion, into the full indignation of our sovereign prince, which you may think a just punishment of God, for your other abominable opinions. After that, ye fell lower and lower, and now to the lowest degree of all, to the end of honour and life. For if the light of your candle be as it hath been hitherto dusky your candlestick is like to be removed, and have a great fall, so low, and so far out of knowledge, that it shall be quite out of God's favour, and past all hope of recovery: Quia in inferno nulla est redemptio, i. For in hell there is no redemption. The danger whereof being so great, very pity causeth me to say, Memor esto unde cecideris, i. Remember from whence thou hast fallen. I add also, and whither you fall. But here peradventure you will say to me. What sir, my fall is not so great as you make it. I have not yet fallen from the catholic church. For that is not the catholic church that the pope is head of. There is another church. But as touching that I answer; you are sure of that as the Donatists were, for they said that they had the true church, and that the name of true Christians remained only in Africk, where only their seditious sect was preached: and as you think, so thought Novatus, that all they that did acknowledge their supreme head at the see of Rome, were out of the church of Christ. But here Saint Cyprian defending Cornelius against Novatus, libro secundo, epistola sexta, saith on this wise; Ecclesia una est, qua cum sit una, intus & foris esse non potest. So that if Novatus were in the true church, then was not Cornelius, who indeed by lawful succession succeeded pope Fabian. Here Saint Cyprian intendeth by the whole process to prove, and concludeth thereupon, that the true church was only Rome. Gather you then what will follow of your fall. But you will say peradventure, that you fell not by heresy, and so said the Arrians, alledging for themselves that they had Scripture, and going about to persuade their schism by Scripture; for indeed they had more places by two and forty, which by their torture seemed to depend upon Scripture, than the Catholics had. So did the Martians provoke their heresy to Scripture. But those are no Scriptures; for they are not truly alledged, nor truly interpreted, but untruly wrested and wrong, according to their own fantasies. And therefore were they all justly condemned, for their wrong taking of the Scriptures, and the church repleth against them, saying; Qui estis vos? quando? quid agitis in meo, non mei? The church saith, what make you here in my heritage? from whence came you? the Scripture is mine inheritance; I am right heir thereof. I hold it by true succession of the apostles: for as the apostles required me to hold, so do I hold it. The apostles have received me, and put me in my right, and have rejected you as bastards, having no title thereunto.—Also ye will deny that ye have fallen by apostasy, by breaking your vow; and so Vigilantius said, insomuch that he would admit none to his ministry, but those that had their wives bagged with children. What now? Shall we say that Vigilantius did not fall therefore? Did not Donatus and Novatus fall, because they said so, and brought Scripture for their defence? Then let us believe as we list, pretending well, and say so; nay, there is no man so blind that will say so. For except the church which condemneth them for their say so, do approve us for to do so, then will she condemn you also. So that your denial will not stand. And therefore I tell you, remember from whence ye are fallen, and how long ye shall fall, if you hold on as you do begin. But I trust you will not continue, but revoke yourself in time, and the remedy followeth.—Age penitentiam, & prima opera fac, for by such means as ye have fallen ye must rise again. First, your heart hath fallen, then your tongue and your pen, and besides your own damage hath caused many more to fall. Therefore, first your heart must turn, and then shall the tongue and the pen be quickly turned; Sin minus, veniam tibi cito, & movebo candela-brum tuum de loco suo.—I need not to teach you a method to turn; you know the ready way yourself. But I would God I could but exhort you to the right and truth, then the way should soon be found out. For if ye remember how many ye have brought by abominable heresy into the way of perdition, I doubt not but very conscience would move you, as much for them as for yourself, to come again. And so would you spare neither tongue nor pen, if heart were once reformed; for as touching that point, the Holy Ghost toucheth their hearts very near by the mouth of his holy prophet Ezekiel, when he requireth the blood of his flock at the priest's hands, for lack of good and wholesome food. How much more should this touch your guilty heart, having overmuch diligence to teach them the way of perdition, and feeding them with baggage and corrupt food, which is heresy. Qui convertere fecerit peccatorem ab errore vite sue, salvam faciet animam suam a morte, & operiet multitudinem peccatorum suorum, i. He that shall convert a sinner from his wicked life, shall save his soul from death, and shall cover the multitude of sins. So that if it be true that he who converteth a sinner, saveth a soul; then the contrary must needs be true, that he that perverteth a soul, and teacheth him the way of perdition, must needs be damned.—Origines super Paulum ad Romanos; The damnation of those that preach heresy doth increase to the day of judgment. The more that perish by heretical doctrine, the more grievous shall their torment be, that minister such doctrine. Berengarius who seemed to fear that danger, provided for it in his life time, but not without a troubled and disquiet conscience. He did not only repent, but recant, and not so much for himself, as for them whom he had with most pestilent heresies infected. For as he lay in his death bed upon Epiphany day, he demanded of them that were present, Is this, quoth he,

the day of Epiphany, and appearing of the Lord? They answered him, Yea. Then, quoth he, this day shall the Lord appear to me, either to my comfort, either to my discomfort. This remorse argueth, that he feared the danger of them whom he had taught, and led out of the faith of Christ. Origines upon him saith in this wise; although his own blood was not upon his head, for that he did repent, and was sorry for his former errors, yet being converted, he feared the blood of them whom he had infected; and who received his doctrine.—Let this move you even at the last point. Inasmuch as your case is not unlike to Berengarius, let your repentance be like also. And what should stay you, tell me, from this godly return? fear, that ye have gone so far, ye may not return? nay, then I may say as David said, Illic trepidaverunt ubi non erat timor. Ye fear where ye have no cause to fear. For if ye repent and be heartily sorry for your former heresy and apostasy, ye need not to fear. For as God of his part is merciful and gracious to the repentant sinner, so is the king, so is the queen merciful, which ye may well perceive by your own case, since ye might have suffered a great while ago for treason committed against her highness, but that ye have been spared and reserved upon hope of amendment, which she conceived very good of you, but now (as it seemeth) is but a very desperate hope. And what do you thereby? Secundum duritiam cordis thesaurizas tibi iram in die ire, i. According to the hardness of your heart ye treasure up to yourself anger in the day of wrath.—Well, what is it then, if fear do not hinder you? shame, to unsay that that you have said? Nay, it is no shame, unless ye think it shame to agree with the true and the catholic church of Christ. And if that be shame then blame St. Paul who persecuted the disciples of Christ with the sword, then blame St. Peter, who denied his master Christ with an oath, that he never knew him. St. Cyprian before his return being a witch; St. Austen being nine years out of the church: They thought it no shame after their return of that they had returned. Shall it then be shame for you to convert and consent with the church of Christ? No, no.—What is it then that doth let you? glory of the world? nay, as for the vanity of the world, I for my part judge not in you; being a man of learning, and knowing your estate.—And as for the loss of your estimation, it is ten to one that where you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, it is ten to one, I say, that ye shall be as well still, yea and rather better.—And as for the winning of good men, there is no doubt but all that be here present, and the whole congregation of Christ's church also will more rejoice of your return, than they were sorry for your fall. And as for the other, ye need not to doubt, for they shall all come after; and to say the truth, if you should lose them for ever it were no force, ye should have no loss thereby at all. I do not here touch them which should confirm your estimation. For as St. Paul after his conversion was received into the church of Christ with wonderful joy to the whole congregation, even so shall you be. The fame of your return shall be spread abroad throughout all Christendom, where your face was never known.—But you will say perhaps, your conscience will not suffer you. My lord, there is a good conscience, and there is a bad conscience. The good conscience have not they, as St. Paul declareth to Timothy concerning Hymeneus and Alexander. The evil and bad conscience is, saith St. Cyprian, well to be known by his mark. What mark? this conscience is marked with the print of heresy. This conscience is a naughty, filthy, and a branded conscience, which I trust is not in you. I have conceived a better hope of you than so, or else would I never go about to persuade or exhort you. But what conscience should stay you to return to the catholic faith and universal church of Christ? what conscience doth separate you to that devilish and several church? to a liberty which never had ground in the holy scriptures? If you judge your liberty to be good, then judge you all Christendom to do evil besides you.—O what a presumptuous persuasion is this, upon this utterly to forsake the church of Christ? under what colour or pretence do you this? for the abuses? as though in your church were no abuses: yes that there were. And if you forsake the universal church for the abuses, why do you not then forsake your particular church, and so be fitting from one to another? that is not the next way, to slip from the church for the abuses; for if you had seen abuses, you should rather have endeavoured for a reformation then for a defection. He is a good chirurgeon, who for a little pain in the toe will cut off the whole leg. He helpeth well the tooth-ach, which cutteth away the head by the shoulders. It is mere folly to amend abuses by abuses. Ye are like Diogenes; for Diogenes on a time envying the cleanliness of Plato, said on this wise, Ecce calco fastum Platonis. Plato answered, Sed alio fastu. So that Diogenes seemed more faulty of the two.—But when we have said all that we can, peradventure you will say, I will not return. And to that I say, I will not answer. Nevertheless, hear what Christ saith to such obstinate and stiffnecked people in the parable of the supper. When he had sent out his men to call them in that were appointed, and they would not come, he bad his servants go into the ways and streets, to compel men to come in: Cogite intrare. If then the church will not lose any member that may be compelled to come in, ye must think it good to take the compulsion, lest you lose your part of the supper which the Lord hath prepared for you; and this compulsion standeth well with charity.—But it may perhaps, that some hath animated you to stick to your tackle, and not to give over, bearing you in hand that your opinion is good, and that ye shall die in a good quarrel, and God shall accept your oblation. But hear what Christ saith of a meaner gift; if thou come to the altar to offer thy oblation, and knowest that thy brother hath somewhat to say against thee, leave there thy gift, and go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer up thy gift, or else thy brother will make thy offering unsavoury before God. This he said unto all the world, to the end they should know how their offerings should be received, if they were not according.—Remember you therefore before you offer up your offering, whether your gift be qualified or no. Remember the Church of Rome, and also of England, where not one only brother, but a number have matter against you, so just that they will make your burnt offering to stink before God, except you be reconciled. If you must needs appoint upon a sacrifice, make yet a mean first to them that have to lay against you. I say no more than the church hath allowed me to say. For the sacrifice that is offered without the church is not profitable. The premises therefore considered, for God's sake, I say, Memor esto unde excideris, & age penitentiam, & prima opera fac. Sin minus, &c. Cast not yourself away, spare your body, spare your soul, spare them also whom ye have seduced, spare the shedding of Christ's blood for you in vain. Hardea not your heart, acknowledge the truth, yield to the prescript word of God, to the Catholic Church of Rome, to the received verity of all Christendom. Wed not yourself to your own self-will. Stand not too much in your own conceit, think not yourself wiser than all Christendom is besides you. Leave off this unjust cavil. How? leave what? leave reason, leave wonder, and believe as the Catholic Church doth believe and teach you. Persuade with yourself, that Extra Ecclesiam non est salus, i. Without the church there is no salvation. And thus much have I said of charity. If this poor simple exhortation of mine may sink into your head, and take effect with you, then have I said as I would have said, otherwise not as I would, but as I could for this present."

"ALBEIT there be two governments, the one spiritual, and the other temporal, the one having the keys, the other the sword, yet in all ages we read that for the honour and glory of God both these powers have been adjoined together. For if we read the old Testament, we shall find that so did Josias and Ezekias. So did the king of the Ninivites compel a general fast through all the whole city. So did Darius in breaking the great idol, Bell, and delivered godly Daniel out of the den of lions. So did Nebuchadnezzar make and institute laws against the blasphemers of God. But to let pass these examples, with a great number more, and to come to Christ's time, it is not unknown what great travel they took to set forth God's honour: and although the rule and government of the church did only appertain to the spirituality, yet for the suppression of heresies and schisms, kings were admitted as aiders thereunto. First, Constantius the Great called a council at Nice for the suppression of the Arians sect, where the same time was raised a great contention among them. And after long disputation had, when the fathers could not agree upon the putting down of the Arians they referred their judgment to Constantine. God forbid, quoth Constantine; you ought to rule me, and not I you. And as Constantine did, so did Theodosius against the Nestorians, so did Marcianus against Manicheus. Jovinian made a law, that no man should marry with a nun, that had wedded herself to the church.—So had king Henry the 8th the title of defender of the faith, because he wrote against Luther and his complices. So these 900 years the kings of Spain had that title of catholic, for the expulsion of the Arians; and to say the truth, the king and queen's majesties do nothing degenerate from their ancestors, taking upon them to restore again the title to be defender of the faith, to the right heir thereof, the pope's holiness.—Therefore these two princes, perceiving this noble realm, how it hath been brought from the unity of the true and Catholic Church, the which you and your confederates do, and have renounced; perceiving also that you do persist in your detestable errors, and will by no means be revoked from the same, have made their humble request and petition to the pope's holiness, Paulus 4th, as supreme head of the church of Christ, declaring to him, that where you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, and at your consecration took two solem oaths, for your due obedience to be given to the see of Rome, to become a true preacher or pastor of his flock, yet contrary to your oath and allegiance, for unity have sowed discord; for chastity, marriage and adultery; for obedience, contention; and for faith, ye have been the author of all mischief. The pope's holiness considering their request and petition, hath granted them, that according to the censure of this realm process should be made against you. And whereas in this late time, you both excluded charity and justice, yet hath his holiness decreed, that you shall have both charity and justice shewed unto you. He willeth you should have the laws in most ample manner to answer in your behalf, and that you shall here come before my lord of Gloucester, as high commissioner from his holiness, to the examination of such articles as shall be proposed against you, and that we should require the examination of you, in the king and queen's majesty's behalf. The king and queen as touching themselves, because by the law they cannot appear personally, Quia sunt illustres persone, have appointed as their attornies, Dr. Story and me. Wherefore here I offer to your good lordship our proxy, sealed with the broad seal of England, and offer myself to be proctor in the king's majesty's behalf. I exhibit here also certain articles, containing the manifest adultery and perjury: also books of heresy made partly by him, partly set forth by his authority. And here I produce him as party principal, to answer to your good lordship.

Thus when Dr. Martin had ended his Oration, the Archbishop beginneth, as here followeth:

Cranmer. Shall I then make my Answer?

Martin. As you think good, no man shall let you.

And here the archbishop kneeling down on both knees towards the west, said first the Lord's Prayer. Then rising up he reciteth the Articles of the Creed. Which done, he entereth with his protestation in form as followeth:

The FAITH and PROFESSION of Doctor Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, before the Commissioners.

CRANMER. This I do profess as touching my faith, and make my Protestation, which I desire you to note. I will never consent that the bishop of Rome shall have any jurisdiction within this realm.

Story. Take a note thereof.

Martin. Mark master Cranmer how you answer for yourself. You refuse and deny him, by whose laws ye yet do remain in life, being otherwise attainted of high treason, and but a dead man by the laws of this realm.

Cran. I protest before God I was no traitor, but indeed I confessed more at my arraignment than was true.

Martin. That is not to be reasoned at this present. Ye know ye were condemned for a traitor, and Res judicatu pro veritate accipitur. But to proceed to your matter.

Cran. I will never consent to the bishop of Rome, for then should I give myself to the devil; for I have made an oath to the king, and I must obey the king by God's laws. By the Scripture the king is chief, and no foreign person in his own realm above him. There is no subject but to a king. I am a subject, I owe my fidelity to the crown. The pope is contrary to the crown. I cannot obey both; for no man can serve two masters at once, as you in the beginning of your oration declared by the sword and the keys, attributing the keys to the pope, and the sword to the king. But I say the king hath both. Therefore he that is subject to Rome, and the laws of Rome, he is perjured; for the pope's and the judge's laws are contrary, they are uncertain and confounded. A priest indebted by the laws of the realm, shall be sued before a temporal judge; by the pope's laws contrary. The pope doth the king injury, in that he hath his power from the pope. The king is head in his own realm: but the pope claimeth all bishops, priests, curates, &c. So the pope in every realm hath a realm.—Again, by the laws of Rome the benefice must be given by the bishop; by the laws of the realm, the patron giveth the benefice. Herein the laws be as contrary as fire and water. No man can by the laws of Rome proceed in a Præmu-nire, and so is the law of the realm expell'd, and the king standeth accursed in maintaining his own laws. Therefore in consideration that the king and queen take their power of him, as though God should give it to them there is no true subject, unless he be abrogate, seeing the crown is holden of him being out of the realm.—The bishop of Rome is contrary to God, and injurious to his laws; for God commanded all men to be diligent in the knowledge of his law; and therefore hath appointed one holy day in the week at the least, for the people to come to the church and hear the word of God expounded unto them, and that they might the better understand it, to hear it in their mother tongue which they know. The pope doth contrary; for he willeth the service to be had in the Latin tongue, which they do not understand. God would have it to be perceived; the pope will not. When the priest giveth thanks, God would that the people should do so too, and God will them to confess altogether; the pope will not.—Now as concerning the Sacrament, I have taught no false doctrine of the sacrament of the altar: for if it can be proved by any doctor above a thousand years after Christ, that Christ's body is there really, I will give over. My book was made seven years ago, and no man hath brought any authors against it. I believe that whoso eateth and drinketh that sacrament, Christ is within them, whole Christ, his nativity, passion, resurrection and ascension; but not that corporally that sitteth in heaven. Now Christ commanded all to drink of the cup; the pope taketh it away from the lay men, also yet one saith, that if Christ had died for the devil, that he should drink thereof. Christ biddeth us to obey the king, etiam discolo. The bishop of Rome biddeth us to obey him: therefore unless he be Antichrist, I cannot tell what to make of him. Wherefore if I should obey him, I cannot obey Christ. He is like the devil in his doings; for the devil said to Christ, if thou wilt fall down and worship me, I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world. Thus he took upon him to give that which was not his own. Even so the bishop of Rome giveth princes their crowns, being none of his own; for where princes either by election, either by succession, either by inheritance obtain their crown, he saith that they should have it from him.—Christ saith, that Antichrist shall be. And who shall he be? Forsooth he that advanceth himself above all other creatures. Now if there be none already that hath advanced himself after such sort besides the pope, then in the mean time let him be Antichrist.

Story. Pleaseth it you to make an end?

Cran. For he will be the vicar of Christ, he will dispense with the Old and New Testament also, yea and with apostasy.—Now I have declared why I cannot with my conscience obey the pope. I speak not this for hatred I bear to him that now supplieth the room, for I know him not. I pray God give him grace not to follow his ancestors. Neither say I this for my defence, but to declare my conscience for the zeal that I bear to God's word trodden under foot by the bishop of Rome. I cast fear apart, for Christ said to his Apostles, that in the latter days they should suffer much sorrow, and be put to death for his name's sake: fear them not, saith he, but fear him which when he hath killed the body, hath power to cast the soul into fire everlasting. Also Christ saith, that he that will live shall die, and he that loseth his life for my name's sake, he shall find it again. Moreover he said, confess me before men, and be not afraid; for if you do so, I will stand with you; if you shrink from me, I will shrink from you. This is a comfortable and a terrible saying, this maketh me to set all fear apart. I say therefore the bishop of Rome treadeth under foot God's laws and the king's.—The pope would give bishoprics; so would the king. But at the last the king got the upper hand, and so are all bishops perjured first to the pope, and then to the king.—The crown hath nothing to do with the clergy. For if a clerk come before a judge, the judge shall make process against him, but not to execute any laws. For if the judge should put him to execution, then is the king accused in maintaining his own laws. And therefore say I, that he is neither true to God, neither to the king, that first received the pope. But I shall heartily pray for such counsellors, as may inform her the truth; for the king and queen, if they be well informed, will do well.

Martin. As you understand, then if they maintain the supremacy of Rome, they cannot maintain England too.

Cran. I require you to declare to the king and queen what I have said, and how their oaths do stand with the realm and the pope. St. Gregory saith, he that taketh upon him to be head of the universal church, is worse than the Antichrist. If any man can shew me, that it is not against God's word to hold his stirrup when he taketh his horse, and kiss his feet (as kings do) then will I kiss his feet also.—And you for your part, my lord, are perjured; for now ye sit judge for the pope, and yet you did receive your bishoprick of the king. You have taken an oath to be adversary to the realm; for the pope's laws are contrary to the laws of the realm.

Glocester. You were the cause that I did forsake the pope, and did swear that he ought not to be supreme head, and gave it to king Henry 8th, that he ought to be it, and this you made me to do.

Cramer. To this I answer, said he; you report me ill, and say not the truth, and I will prove it here before you all. The truth is, that my predecessor, bishop Warrham, gave the supremacy to king Henry 8th, and said that he ought to have it before the bishop of Rome, and that God's word would bear him. And upon the same was there sent to both the Universities Oxford and Cambridge, to know what the word of God would do touching the supremacy, and it was reasoned upon, and argued at length. So at the last both the Universities agreed, and set to their seals, and sent it to king Henry 8th to the court, that he ought to be supreme head, and not the pope. Whereupon you were then doctor of divinity at that time, and your consent was thereunto, as by your hand doth appear. Therefore you misreport me, that I was the cause of your falling away from the pope, but it was yourself. All this was in bishop Warrham's time, and whilst he was alive, so that it was three quarters of a year after ere ever I had the bishoprick of Canterbury in my hands, and before I might do any thing. So that here ye have reported of me that which ye cannot prove, which is evil done.—All this while his cap was on his head.

Glocester. We come to examine you, and you, me think, examine us.

Dr. Story's ORATION.

STORY. Pleaseth it your good lordship, because it hath pleased the king and queen's majesties to appoint my companion and me to hear the examination of this man before your good lordship, to give me leave somewhat to talk in that behalf. Although I know that in talk with heretics there cometh hurt to all men; for it wearieth the stedfast, troubleth the doubtful, and taketh in snare the weak and simple: yet because he saith, he is not bound to answer your lordship sitting for the pope's holiness, because of a Premunire, and the word of God as he termeth it; I think good somewhat to say, that all men may see how he runneth out of his race of reason into the rage of common talk, such as here I trust hath done much good. And as the king and queen's majesties will be glad to hear of your most charitable dealing with him; so will they be weary to hear the blundering of this stubborn heretic. And where he alledgeth divinity, mingling fas nefasque together, he should not have been heard. For shall it be sufficient for him to alledge, the judge is not competent? Do we not see that in the common law it is not lawful for a man in Westminster hall to refuse his judge? And shall we dispute contra eum qui negat principia? Although there be here a great company of learned men, that know it unmeet so to do, yet have I here a plain canon, wherein he declareth himself convicted ipso facto. The canon is this; 'Sit ergo ruinae suo dolore prostratus quisquis Apostolicis volverit contraire decretis, nec locum deinceps inter Sacerdotes habeat, sed exors a sancto fiat ministerio, nec de eo ejus judicio quisquam posthac curam habeat, quin jam damnatus a sancta & Apostolica Ecclesia sua inobedientia ac praesumptione a quoquam esse non dubitetur. Quin majoris excommunicationis dejectione est abjiciendus, cui sanctae Ecclesiae commissa fuerit disciplina, qui non solum jussionibus praelatae sanctae Ecclesiae parere debuit, sed etiam alia, ne praeterirent insinuare. Sitque alienus a divinis & pontificalibus officiis qui noluerit praecipis Apostolicis obtemperare.'—

He hath alleged many matters against the Supremacy, but maliciously. Ye say that the king in his realm is supreme head of the church. Well sir, you will grant me that there was a perfect catholic church before any king was christened. Then if it were a perfect church, it must needs have a head, which must needs be before any king was member thereof; for you know Constantius the emperor was the first christened king that ever was. And although you are bound (as saint Paul saith) to obey your rulers, and kings have rule of the people, yet doth it not follow that they have cure of souls: for a fortiori, the head may do that the minister cannot do; but the priest may consecrate, and the king cannot, therefore the king is not head. It was licensed by Christ to every man to bring into the sheepfold, and to augment the flock, but not to rule, for that was only given to Peter. And where the apostles do call upon men to obey their princes, cui tributum, tributum; cui vectigal, vectigal; they perceiving that men were bent to a kind of liberty and disobedience, were enforced to exhort them to obedience and payment of their tribute, which exhortation extendeth only to temporal matters.—And again, where you say that the bishop of Rome maketh laws contrary to the laws of the realm, that is not true; for this is a maxim in the law; Quod in particulari excipitur, non facit universale falsum.—Now as touching that monstrous talk of your conscience, that is no conscience that ye profess; it is but, privata scientia, electio and secta. And as yet for all your glorious babble, you have not proved by God's laws that ye ought not to answer the pope's holiness.—The Canons which be received of all Christendom compel you to answer, therefore you are bound so to do. And although this realm of late time, through such schismatics as you were, hath exiled and banished the canons, yet that cannot make for you. For you know yourself, that par in parem, nec pars in totum aliquid statueret potest. Wherefore this isle, being indeed but a member of the whole, could not determine against the whole. That notwithstanding the same laws, being put away by parliament, are now received again by a parliament, and have as full authority now as they had then, and they will now that ye answer to the pope's holiness; therefore by the laws of this realm ye are bound to answer him. Wherefore, my good lord, all that this Thomas Cranmer (I cannot otherwise term him, considering his disobedience) hath brought for his defence, shall nothing prevail with you, nor take any effect. Require him therefore to answer directly to your good lordship; command him to set aside his trifles, and to be obedient to the laws and ordinances of this realm. Take witness here of his stubborn contempt against the king and queen's majesties, and compel him to answer directly to such articles as we shall here lay against him, and in refusal, your good lordship is to excommunicate him.

As soon as Dr. Story had thus ended his tale, beginneth Dr. Martin again to enter speech with the abp.; which Talk I thought here likewise not to let pass, although the report of the same be such, as the author thereof seemeth in his writing very partial; for as he expresseth the speech of Dr. Martin at full, and to the uttermost of his diligence, leaving out nothing in that part, that either was or could be said more; so again on the other part, how raw and weak he leaveth the matter, it is easy to perceive, who neither comprehendeth all that Dr. Cranmer again answered for his defence, nor yet in those short speeches which he expresseth, seemeth to discharge the part of a sincere and faithful reporter. Notwithstanding such as it is, I thought good to let the reader understand, who in perusing the same, may use therein his own judgment and consideration.

VOL. I.

TALK between Dr. Martin and the Archbishop.

Martin. Master Cranmer, ye have told here a long glorious tale, pretending some matter of conscience in appearance, but in verity you have no conscience at all. You say that you have sworn once to king Henry the 8th against the Pope's jurisdiction, and therefore you may never forswear the same; and so ye make a great matter of conscience in the breach of the said oath. Here will I ask you a question or two. What if ye made an oath to an harlot, to live with her in continual adultery, ought you to keep it?

Cran. I think no.

Mart. What if you did swear never to lend a poor man one penny, ought you to keep it?

Cran. I think not.

Mart. Herod did swear whatsoever his harlot asked of him he would give her, and he gave her John Baptist's head; did he well in keeping his oath?

Cran. I think not.

Mart. Jephtha, one of the judges of Israel, did swear unto God, that if he would give him victory over his enemies, he would offer unto God the first soul that came forth of his house; it happened that his own daughter came first, and he slew her to save his oath. Did he well?

Cran. I think not.

Mart. So saith St. Ambrose de Officiis. Miserabilis necessitas, quæ solvitur parricidio, id est. It is a miserable necessity, which is paid with parricide. Then master Cranmer you can no less confess by the premises but that you ought not to have conscience of every oath, but if it be just, lawful, and advisedly taken.

Cran. So was that oath.

Mart. That is not so, for first it was unjust, for it tended to the taking away of another man's right. It was not lawful, for the laws of God and the Church were against it. Besides, it was not voluntary; for every man and woman were compelled to take it.

Cran. It pleaseth you to say so.

Mart. Let all the world be judge. But, sir, you that pretend to have such a conscience to break an oath. I pray you, did you never swear and break the same?

Cran. I remember not.

Mart. I will help your memory. Did you never swear obedience to the See of Rome?

Cran. Indeed I did once swear unto the same.

Mart. Yea, that you did twice, as appeareth by records and writings here ready to be shewed.

Cran. But I remember I saved all by protestation that I made by the counsel of the best learned men I could get at that time.

Mart. Hearken good people what this man saith. He made a protestation one day, to keep never a whit of that which he would swear the next day; was this the part of a Christian man? If a Christian man would bargain with a Turk, and before he maketh his bargain solemnly, before witness readeth in his paper that he holdeth secretly in his hand, or peradventure protesteth before one or two, that he mindeth not to perform whatsoever he shall promise to the Turk; I say, if a Christian man should serve a Turk in this manner, that the Christian man were worse than the Turk. What would you then say to this man that made a solemn oath and promise unto God and his Church, and made a protestation before quite contrary?

Cran. That which I did, I did by the best learned men's advice I could get at that time.

Mart. I protest before all the learned men here, that there is no learning will save your perjury herein; for there be two rules of the civil law clean contrary against you: and so brought forth his rules, which being done, he proceeded further. But will you have the truth of the matter. King Henry the 8th even then meant the lamentable change which after you see came to pass; and to further his pitiful proceedings from the divorcement of his most lawful wife, to the detestable departing from the blessed unity of Christ's Church, this man made aforesaid protestation; and on the other side, he letted not to make two solemn oaths quite contrary, and why? for otherwise by the laws and canons of this realm, he could not aspire to the archbishopric of Canterbury.

Cran. I protest before you all, there was never man came more unwillingly to a bishopric, than I did to that. Inasmuch that when king Henry did send for me in post, that I should come over, I prolonged my journey by several weeks at the least, thinking that he would be forgetful of me in the mean time.

Mart. You declare well by the way that the king took you to be a man of good conscience, who could not find within all his realm any man that would set forth his strange attempts, but was enforced to send for you in post to come out of Germany. What may we conjecture hereby, but that there was a compact between you being then queen Anne's chaplain, and the king; give me the archbishopric of Canterbury, and I will give you licence to live in adultery.

Martin. Let your protestation joined with the rest of your talk, give judgment: Hinc prima mali labes. Of that your execrable perjury, and his coloured and too shamefully suffered adultery, came heresy and all mischief to this realm.—And thus have I spoken as touching the conscience you make for breaking your heretical oath made to the king. But to break your former oath made at two sundry times both to God and his church, you have no conscience at all. And now to answer another part of your oration, wherein you bring in God's word, that you have it on your side and no man else, and that the pope hath devised a new Scripture contrary to the Scriptures of God; ye play herein as the pharisees did, which cried always, 'Verbum Domini, Verbum Domini,' The word of the Lord, the word of the Lord, when they meant nothing so. This bettereth not your cause, because you have God's word for you; for Basilides and Photinus the heretics said, that they had God's word to maintain their heresy. So Nestorius, so Macedonius, so Pelagius, and briefly all the heretics that ever were, pretended that they had God's word for them; yea, and so the devil being the father of heresies, alledged God's word for him, saying, Scriptum est. It is written: so said he to Christ, Mitte te de orsum, Cast thyself downward, which you applied most falsely against the pope. But if you mark the devil's language well, it agreed with your proceedings most truly. For Mitte te de orsum, Cast thyself downward, said he, and so taught you to cast all things downward. Down with the sacrament, down with the mass, down with the altars, down with the arms of Christ, and up with a lion and a dog, down with the abbeyes, down with chauntries, down with hospitals and colleges, down with fasting and prayer, yea down with all that good and godly is. All your proceedings and preachings tended to no other, but to fulfill the devil's request, Mitte te de orsum. And therefore tell not us that you have God's word. For God hath given us by his word a mark to know that your teaching proceeded not of God, but of the devil, and that your doctrine came not of Christ, but of Antichrist. For Christ foresaid, there should come against his church, Lupi rapaces, id est, ravening wolves, and Pseudoapostoli, id est, false apostles. But how should we know them? Christ teacheth us, saying Ex fructibus eorum cognoscetis eos, id est, by their fruits ye shall know them. Why, what be their fruits? Saint Paul declareth: Post carnem in concupiscentia, & immunditia ambulant: potestatem contemnunt, &c. i. After the flesh they walk in concupiscentie and uncleanness; they contemn potestates. Again, In diebus nostrissimis erunt periculosu tempora, erunt scipson amantes, cupidi, elati, immorigeri parentibus, proditores, &c. i. In the latter days there shall be perilous times. Then shall there be men loving themselves, covetous, proud, disobedient to parents, treason-workers. Whether these be not the fruits of your gospel, I refer me to this worshipful audience; whether the said gospel began not with perjury, proceeded with adultery, was maintained with heresy, and ended in conspiracy.—Now sir, two points more I marked in your raging discourse that you made here: the one against the holy Sacrament; the other against the pope's jurisdiction, and the authority of the see apostolic.—Touching the first, ye say you have God's word with you, yea and all the doctors. I would here ask but one question of you; whether God's word be contrary to itself, and whether the doctors teach doctrine contrary to themselves, or no? For you master Cranmer have taught in this high Sacrament of the altar three contrary doctrines, and yet you pretended in every one Verbum Domini.

Cran. Nay, I taught but two contrary doctrines in the same.

Mart. What doctrine taught you when you condemned Lambert the sacramentary in the king's presence in Whitehall?

Cran. I maintained then the papists doctrine.

Mart. That is to say, the catholic and universal doctrine of Christ's Church. And how when king Henry died? did you not translate Justus Jonas book?

Cran. I did so.

Mart. Then there you defended another doctrine touching the Sacrament, by the same token, that you sent to Lynne your printer, that whereas in the first print there was an affirmative, that is to say, Christ's body really in the Sacrament, you sent then to your printer to put in a 'not,' whereby it came miraculously to pass, that Christ's body was clean conveyed out of the Sacrament.

Cran. I remember there were two printers of my said book, but where the same 'not' was put in, I cannot tell.

Mart. Then from a Lutheran ye became a Zuinglian, which is the vilest heresy of all in the high mystery of the Sacrament, and for the same heresy you did help to burn Lambert the sacramentary, which you now call the catholic faith, and God's word.

Cran. I grant that then I believed otherwise than I do now, and so I did, until my lord of London, Doctor Ridley, did confer with me, and by sundry persuasions and authorities of doctors drew me quite from my opinion.

Mart. Now sir, as touching the last part of your oration, you denied that the pope's holiness was supreme head of the Church of Christ.

Cran. I did so.

Mart. Who say you then is supreme head?

Cran. Christ.

Mart. But whom hath Christ left here in earth his vicar and head of his Church?

Cran. Nobody.

Mart. Ah, why told you not king Henry this when you made him supreme head? and now no body is. This is treason against his own person as you then made him.

Cran. I mean not but every king in his own realm and dominion is supreme head, and so was he supreme head of the Church of Christ in England.

Mart. Is this always true? and was it ever so in Christ's Church?

Cran. It was so.

Mart. Then what say you by Nero? he was the mightiest prince of the earth after Christ was ascended: was he head of Christ's Church?

Cran. Nero was Peter's head.

Mart. I ask whether Nero was head of the church or no: if he were not, it is false that you said before, that all princes be, and ever were heads of the church within their realms.

Cran. Nay, it is true, for Nero was head of the Church, that is, in worldly respect of the temporal bodies of men, of whom the Church consisteth; for so he beheaded Peter and the apostles. And the Turk too is head of the church in Turkey.

Mart. Then he that beheaded the heads of the Church, and crucified the apostles, was head of Christ's Church; and he that was never member of the Church, is head of the Church, by your new found understanding of God's word.

It is not to be supposed contrary, but much other matter passed in this Communion between them, especially on the archbishop's behalf. Whose answers I do not think to be so slender, nor altogether in the same form of words framed, if the truth, as it was, might be known: but so it pleased the notary thereof, being too much partially addicted to his mother see of Rome in favour of his faction, to diminish and drive down the other side, either in not shewing all, or in reporting the thing otherwise than it was; as the common guise is of most writers, to what side their affection most weigheth, their oration commonly inclineth. But let us proceed further in the story of this matter.

It followed then (saith this reporter) when the Archbishop thus had answered, and the standers by began to murmur against him; the Judges not content with his answers, willed him to answer directly to the interrogatories, which Interrogatories articulated against him in form of law, were these under following.

INTERROGATORIES objected to the Archbishop, with his ANSWERS annexed to the same.

1. Interrog. First was objected, that he the foresaid Thomas Cranmer, being yet free, and before he entered into holy orders, married one Joan, surnamed Black or Brown, dwelling at the sign of the Dolphin in Cambridge. Ans. Whereunto he answered, that whether she was called Black or Brown, he knew not, but that he married there one Joan, that he granted.—2. That after the death of the foresaid wife, he entered into holy orders, and after that was made archbishop by the pope. Ans. He received (he said) a certain bull of the pope, which he delivered unto the king, and was made archbishop by him.—3. Item, that he being in holy orders, married another woman as his second wife named Anne, and so was twice married. Ans. To this he granted.—4. Item, in the time of king Henry the 8th, he kept the said wife secretly, and had children by her. Ans. Hereunto also he granted; affirming that it was better for him to have his own, than to do like other priests, holding and keeping other men's wives.—5. Item, in the time of king Edward, he brought out the said wife openly, affirming and professing publicly the same to be his wife. Ans. He denied not but he so did, and lawfully might do the same, forasmuch as the laws of the realm did so permit him.—6. Item, that he shamed not openly to glory himself to have had his wife in secret many years. Ans. And though he so did (he said) there was no cause why he should be ashamed thereof.—7. Item, that the said Thomas Cranmer falling afterward into the deep bottom of errors, did fly and refuse the authority of the Church, did hold and follow the heresy concerning the Sacrament of the altar, and also did compile, and caused to be set abroad divers books. Ans. Whereunto when the names of the books were recited to him, he denied not such books which he was the author of. As touching the treatise of Peter Martyr upon the Sacrament, he denied that he ever saw it before it was abroad, yet did approve and well like of the same. As for the Catechism, the book of Articles, with the other book against Winchester, he granted the same to be his doings.—8. Item, that he compelled many against their wills to subscribe to the same Articles. Ans. He exhorted (he said) such as were willing to subscribe; but against their wills he compelled none.—9. Item, forasmuch as he surceased not to perpetuate enormous and inordinate crimes, he was therefore cast into the Tower, and from thence was brought to Oxford, at what time it was commonly thought that the parliament there should be holden. Ans. To this he said, that he knew no such enormous and inordinate crimes that ever he committed.—10. Item, that in the said city of Oxford he did openly maintain his heresy, and there was convicted upon the same. Ans. He defended (he said) there the cause of the Sacrament, but that he was convicted in the same, that he denied.—11. Item, when he persevered still in the same, he was by the public censure of the university pronounced an heretic, and his books to be heretical. Ans. That he was so denounced, he denied not; but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.—12. Item, that he was and is notoriously infamed with the note of schism, as who not only himself receded from the catholic church and the see of Rome, but also moved the king and subjects of this realm to the same. Ans. As touching the receding, that he well granted; but that receding or departing, said he, was only from the see of Rome, and had it in no matter of any schism.—13. Item, that he had been twice sworn to the pope; and withal Dr. Martin brought out the instrument of the public notary, wherein was contained his protestation made when he should be consecrated, asking if he had any thing else protested. Ans. Whereunto he answered, that he did nothing but by the laws of the realm.—14. Item, that he the said archbishop of Canterbury did not only offend in the premises, but also in taking upon him the authority of the see of Rome, in that, without leave or licence from the said see, he consecrated bishops and priests. Ans. He granted, that he did execute such things as were wont to be referred to the pope, at what time it was permitted to him by the public laws and determination of the realm.—15. Item, that when the whole realm had subscribed to the authority of the pope, he only still persisted in his error. Ans. That he did not admit the pope's authority, he confessed to be true. But that he erred in the same, that he denied.—16. Item, that all and singular the premises be true. Ans. That likewise he granted, excepting those things whereunto he had now answered.

After he had thus answered to the Objections aforesaid, and the public notary had entered the same, the Judges and Commissioners, as having now accomplished that wherefore they came, were about to rise up and depart. But the bishop of Gloucester thinking it not the best so to dismiss the people, being somewhat stirred with the words of the Archbishop, began in his Oration in the hearing of the people, thus to declaim:

“MASTER CRANMER, I cannot otherwise term you, considering your obstinacy, I am right sorry, I am right heartily sorry to hear such words escape your mouth so unadvisedly. I had conceived a right good hope of your amendment. I supposed that this obstinacy of your's came not of a vain glory, but rather of a corrupt conscience, which was the occasion that I hoped so well of your return. But now I perceive by your foolish babble, that it is far otherwise. Ye are so puffed up with vain glory, there is such a cauteria of heresy crept into your conscience, that I am clean void of hope, and my hope is turned into perdition. Who can save that will be lost? God would have you to be saved, and you refuse it. Perditio tua super te Israel; tantummodo in me salvatio tua, ait Dominus per Prophetam, i. Thy perdition is only upon thyself, O Israel; only in me is thy salvation, saith the Lord by his prophet. You have uttered so erroneous talk, with such open malice against the pope's holiness, with such open lying against the Church of Rome, with such open blasphemy against the Sacrament of the altar, that no mouth could have expressed more maliciously, more lyingly, more blasphemously.—To reason with you, although I would of myself to satisfy this audience, yet may I not by our commission, neither can I find how I may do it with the Scriptures: For the apostle doth command that such a one should not only not be talked withal, but also shunned and avoided, saying; Hereticum hominem post unum aut alterum conventum, devota, sciens quod hujusmodi per-versus est et delinquit, quum sit proprio iudicio condemnatus, i. An heretical person after once or twice conferring, shun, knowing that he is perverse and sinneth, being of his own judgment condemned. Ye have been conferred withal not once or twice, but oftentimes, ye have oft been lovingly admonished, ye have been oft secretly disputed with. And the last year in the open school, in open disputations, ye have been openly convict, ye have been openly driven out of the school with hisses: your book which ye brag you made seven years ago, and no man answered it, Marcus Antonius hath sufficiently detected and confuted, and yet ye persist still in your wonted heresy.—Wherefore being so oft admonished, conferred withal, and convicted, if ye deny you to be the man whom the apostle noteth, bear then what Origen saith, who wrote above 1300 years ago, and interpreteth the saying of the apostle in this way, in Apologia Pamphili. Hereticus est omnis ille habendus, qui Christo se credere profectur, et aliter de Christi veritate sentit quam se habet Ecclesiastica traditio. Even now ye professed a kind of Christianity and holiness unto us, for at your beginning you fell down upon your knees, and said the Lord's Prayer (God wot like an hypocrite) and then standing upon your feet, you rehearsed the articles of your faith, but to what end I pray you also, but to cloak that inward heresy rooted in you, that you might blind the poor, simple, and unlearned peoples' eyes? For what will they say or think, if they do not thus say? Good Lord, what mean these men to say that he is an heretic, they are deceived, this is a good Christian, he believeth as we believe.—But is this sufficient to escape the name of an heretic? To the simple and unlearned it is sufficient, but for you that have professed a greater knowledge and higher doctrine, it is not enough to recite your belief. For unless, as Origen saith, ye believe all things that the Church hath decreed besides, you are no Christian man. In the which because you do halt, and will come to no conformity; from henceforth ye are to be taken for an heretic, with whom we ought neither to dispute, neither to reason, whom we ought rather to eschew and avoid.—Nevertheless, although I do not intend to reason with you, but to give you up as an abject and out-cast from God's favour, yet because ye have uttered, to the annoying of the people, such pestilent heresies as may do harm among some rude and unlearned, I think meet, and not abs re, somewhat to say herein; not because I hope to have any good at your hands, which I would willingly wish, but that I may establish the simple people which be here present, lest they being seduced by your diabolical doctrine, may perish thereby.—And first, as it behoveth every man to purge himself first before he enter with any other, where you accuse me of an oath made against the bishop of Rome, I confess it, and deny it not, and therefore do say with the rest of this realm, good and catholic men, the saying of the prophet; Peccavimus cum patribus nostris, injuste egimus, iniquitatem fecimus, i. We have sinned with our fathers, we have done unjustly and wickedly. D. licita juventutis mee, & ignorantias meas ne memineris Domine, i. The sins of my youth, and my ignorances, O Lord do not remember. I was then a young man, and as young a scholar here in the university.—I knew not then what an oath did mean, and yet to say the truth, I did it compelled, compelled I say by your master Cranmer, and here were you the author and cause of my perjury, you are to be blamed herein, and not I. Now where you say I made two oaths, the one contrary to the other, it is not so, for the oath I made to the pope's holiness appertaineth only to spiritual things: The other oath I made to the king, pertaineth only to temporal things; that is to say, that I do acknowledge all my temporal livings to proceed only from the king, and from none else. But all men may say, as you agree in this, so ye agree in the rest of your opinions.—Now sir, as concerning the supremacy which is only due to the see of Rome, a word or two. Although there be a number of places which do confirm that Christ appointed Peter head of the church, yet this is a most evident place. When Christ demanded of his apostles whom men called him, they answered; Some Elia, some a prophet, &c. But Christ replied unto Peter, and said, Whom sayest thou Peter that I am? Peter answered; Tu es Christus, filius Dei: and Christ replied, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram edificabo. Ecclesiam meam. The doctor's interpreting this place, super hanc Petram, expounded it, id est, non solum super fidem Petri, sed super te Petre. And why did Christ change his name from Simon to Peter, which in Latin is a stone, but only to declare that he was only the foundation and head of the church.—Again, where Christ demanded of Peter, being amongst the rest of his apostles, three times a new, Petre, omnes me? he gave him charge over his sheep, Pasce oves meas, pasce agnos meos. Which place Chrysostom interpreting, saith, Pasce, hoc est, loco mei esto prepositus & caput fratrum tuorum. To conclude, when they came that required didrachma of Christ, he commanded Peter to cast his net into the sea, and to take out of the fish's mouth that he took, stateram, hoc est, duplex didrachma, & da inquit pro te & me Petre. Which words do signify, that when he had paid for them two, he had paid for all the rest. For as in the old law there were appointed two heads over the people of Israel, Moses and Aaron, Moses as chief, and Aaron next head under him; so in the new law there were two heads of the church, which were Christ and Peter. Christ is head of all, and Peter next under him. St. Austin in 75 quæst. Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Salvator (inquit) quum pro se et Petro dari jubebat didrachma, pro omnibus ipsum dari censuit, ipsum enim constituit caput eorum, i. Our Saviour Christ, saith St. Austin, commanding the tribute to be given for him and for Peter, meant thereby the same to be given for all other, for he appointed him to be head of them. What can be more plain than this? But I will not tarry upon this matter.—Now as touching the pope's laws, where you say they be contrary, because the service which should be, as you say, in English, is in Latin; I answer, whosoever will take the pains to peruse the chapter, which is in 1. Corinth. 14. shall find, that his meaning is concerning preaching, and obiter only of praying. Again, where you say, that the pope's holiness doth take away one part of the sacrament from the laymen, and Christ would have it under both, ye can say no more but this; Bibite ex eo omnes, i. Drink ye all of this. And what followeth; Et biberunt ex eo omnes, i. And all drank thereof. Now if a man would be so prostrate with you, he might say that Christ gave it only to his apostles, in whose places succeeded priests, and not laymen.—And admit that Christ commanded it to be received under both kinds, yet the church hath authority to change that, as well as other. Ye read, that Christ calling his apostles together, said unto them; Ite, predicate Evangelium omni nationi, baptizantes in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti, i. Go and preach the gospel to every nation, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and the Holy Ghost. But the apostles, being desirous to publish Christ's name every where, did baptize only in Christ's name. Again, Christ before his last supper washed his apostles feet, saying, Si ego lavi pedes vestros Dominus et Magister, et vos debetis alter alterius lavare pedes, i. If I have washed your feet being your Lord and Master, also you ought to wash the feet one of another. Exemplum dedi vobis, i. I have given you example. This was a precept, yet hath the church altered it, lest the simple people should not think a rebaptization in it. So because saith the apostle, Accepi à Domino quod et tradidi vobis. Dominus noster qua nocte tradebatur, &c. i. I have received of the Lord the same which I have delivered to you, that our Lord the same night in which he was betrayed, &c. Notwithstanding that this was a precept that the sacrament should be ministered after supper, the church hath altered it, and commanded it to be received fasting. And where Christ did break the bread, we receive the whole host. Christ ministered sitting at the table, we standing at the altar. It was also commanded in Acts 25th, that Christian men should abstain à suffucato et sanguine, i. From strangled and blood. But the church perceiving it to be a precept but for a time, hath altered it. Christ commanded to keep holy, Diem Sabbati, The sabbath day, and the church hath altered it to Sunday. If then the church may change things that be so expressed in the scriptures; she may also change the form of receiving of laymen under both kinds, for divers occasions. First, that in carrying it to the sick, the blood may not be shed, lost, or misused. And next, that no occasion might be given to heretics to think that there is not so much under one kind, as under both.—But why would you have it under both kinds, I pray you else, but only to pervert and contrary the commandment of the church? For when you had it under both kinds, you believed in neither. And we having but one, believe both kinds. Now sir, as concerning the sacrament of the altar, where you say, you have a number of doctors of your side, and we none of our side, that is to say, to confirm the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, indeed one to stop your mouth, I think it not possible to find. Nevertheless, where your request is to have one shewed unto you, and then you will recant, I will shew you two.—St. Austin, super Psal. 35. Ferebatur manibus suis, I find not how this is true in David, saith he, literally, that he was born in his own hands; but in Christ I find it literally, when he gave his body to his apostles at his last supper.—Again, St. Cyprian, de Cena Domini, saith, Panis quem Dominus noster discipulis suis porrigebat, non effigie, sed natura mutatus, omnipotentia verbi factus est caro. What can be more plain than this? yet to your exposition it is not plain enough. But give me your figurative, significative, and such other like terms, and I will defend that Christ hath not yet ascended; no nor yet that he was incarnate, &c. Wherefore I can do no other but put you in the number of them, whom Chrysostom spake of in this wise, saying; Audi, homo fidelis qui contra hereticum contendis, si Pharisei convicti, et non placati et heretici, &c. Hear, O thou Christian man, wilt thou do more than Christ could do? Christ confuted the Pharisees, yet could he not put them to silence; Et fortior es tu Christo? And art thou stronger than Christ? Wilt thou go about to bring them to silence that will receive no answer? as who should say, thou canst not. Thus much I have said, not for you master Cranmer, for my hope that I conceived of you is now gone and past; but somewhat to satisfy the rude and unlearned people, that they perceiving your arrogant lying and lying arrogancy, may the better eschew your detestable and abominable schism."

And thus ended the prelate his worshipful tale. After whom Dr. Story taketh the matter, and thus inferred in words, as followeth: "Master Cranmer, you have made a goodly process concerning your heretical oath made to the king, but you forget your oath made to the see apostolic. As concerning your oath made to the king, if you made it to him only, it took an end by his death, and so it is released: if you made it to his successors, well sir, the true successors have the empire, and they will you to dissolve the same, and become a member of Christ's Church again, and it standeth well with charity." To this the archbishop answered again, saith the reporter: but what his answer was, that he suppresseth, and returneth to the words of Dr. Story, who imperiously turning his speech again to the archbishop, said as followeth: ' Hold your peace, sir, and so shall it right well become you, considering that I gave you licence before to say your fancy. Your oath was no oath: for it lacked the three points of an oath, that is to say, Judicium, Justitiam, et Veritatem.'

These with the like words to the same effect being uttered by Dr. Story, seeking to break up and make an end of that Session, he afterwards called for Witnesses to be produced, who should be sworn upon the book, to utter and declare the next day whatsoever they knew, or could remember to be inferred against Dr. Cramer's Heresy. The names of the Witnesses are these: Dr. Marshal, commissary, and dean of Christ's Church; Dr. Smith, under commissary; Dr. Tresham, Dr. Crooke, M. London, M. Curtop, M. Warde, M. Series.

After the Depositions of which witnesses being taken, Dr. Story admonished the Archbishop, permitting him to make his exceptions, if he thought any of the said Witnesses were to be refused. Who then would admit none of them all, being men perjured, and not in Christian religion. For if to swear, said he, against the pope were unlawful, they should rather have given their lives, than their oath. But if it were lawful, then are they perjured, to defend him who they forswear before. Nevertheless, this answer of the archbishop being lightly regarded, as little to the purpose appertaining, he was commanded again to the place from whence he came. Who at his departing out, like as at his first coming in, shewed low obedience to Dr. Martin, and to Dr. Story, the queen's commissioners. Then Dr. Story pointing him to the bishop of Gloucester, said, that he ought rather to give reverence unto him. So the reverend archbishop departing without any obeisance exhibited to the bishop, all the other rose up, and departed every one to his own. And thus brake up the session for that day, about two of the clock at afternoon.

And thus much hitherto concerning the summary effect of this Action or Session, with the Orations, Discourses, and Articles commenced against the archbishop of Canterbury, also with the Reasons and Answers of the said archbishop to their objections and interrogatories. Touching which his Answers, for so much as they being recited by report of a Papist (as is aforesaid) seem to be not indifferently handled, it shall therefore not greatly be out of our matter, as ye have heard the Orations of bishop Brooks, with the reasons and talk of the other commissioners, amplified and set forth at large on the one side, so now in repeating the words and answers of the other part, to declare and set forth somewhat more amply and effectually, what speech the said archbishop used for himself in the same action, by the faithful relation and testimony of certain other, who were likewise there present, and do thus report the effect of the archbishop's words, answering to the first Oration of bishop Brooks, in manner as followeth:

" My lord, you have very learnedly and eloquently in your Oration put me in remembrance of many things touching myself, wherein I do not mean to spend the time in answering of them. I acknowledge God's goodness to me in all his gifts, and thank him as heartily for this state wherein I find myself now, as ever I did for the time of my prosperity; and it is not the loss of my promotions that grieveth me. The greatest grief I have at this time is, and one of the greatest that ever I had in all my life, to see the king and queen's majesties by their proctors here to become my accusers; and that in their own realm and country, before a foreign power. If I have transgressed the laws of the land, their majesties have sufficient authority and power both from God, and by the ordinance of this realm, to punish me, whereunto I both have, and at all times shall be content to submit myself.—Alas! What hath the pope to do in England? whose jurisdiction is so far different from the jurisdiction of this realm, that it is impossible to be true to the one, and true to the other. The laws also are so divers, that whosoever sweareth to both, must needs incur perjury to the one. Which as oft as I remember, even for the love that I bear to her grace, I cannot but be heartily sorry to think upon it, how that her highness the day of her coronation, at which time she took a solemn oath to observe all the laws and liberties of this realm of England, at the same time also took an oath to the bishop of Rome, and promised to maintain that see. The state of England being so repugnant to the supremacy of the pope, it was impossible but she must needs be forsworn in the one. Wherein if her grace had been faithfully advertised by her council, then surely she would never have done it.—The laws of this realm are, that the king of England is the supreme and sole governor of all his countries and dominions: and that he holdeth his crown and sceptre of himself, by the ancient laws, customs, and descents of the kings of the realm, and of none other. The pope saith, that all emperors and kings hold their crowns and regalities of him, and that he may depose them when he list; which is high treason for any man to affirm and think, being born within the king's dominions.—The laws of England are, that all bishops and priests offending in cases of felony or treason, are to be judged and tried by the laws and customs of the realm. The pope's laws are, that the secular power cannot judge the spiritual power, and that they are not under their jurisdiction; which robbeth the king of the one part of his people.—The laws also of England are, that whosoever hindereth the execution or proceeding of the laws of England for any other forcigu laws, ecclesiastical or temporal, incurth the danger of a Præmunire. The pope's laws are that whosoever hindereth the proceedings or executions of his laws, for any other laws, of any other king or country, both the prince himself, his council, all his officers, scribes, clerks, and whosoever give consent or aid to the making or executing of any such laws, stand accursed. A heavy case (if his curse were any thing worth) that the king and queen cannot use their own laws, but they and all theirs must stand accursed. These things and many more examples he alledged, which (he said) stirred him that he could not give his consent to the receiving of such an enemy into the realm, so subverting the dignity and ancient liberties of the same.—And as for the matter of Heresy and Schism, wherewith he was charged, he protested and called God to witness, that he knew none that he maintained. But if that were an heresy to deny the pope's authority, and the religion which the see of Rome hath published to the world these later years, then all the ancient fathers of the primitive church, the apostles and Christ himself taught heresy: and he desired all them present to bear him witness, that he took the traditions and religion of that usurping prelate to be most erroneous, false, and against the doctrine of the whole scripture; which he had oftentimes well proved by writing, and the author of the same to be very Antichrist, so often preached of by the apostles and prophets, in whom did most evidently concur all signs and tokens whereby he was pointed out to the world to be known.—For it was most evident that he had advanced himself above all emperors and kings of the world, whom he affirmeth to hold their estates and empires of him, as of their chief, and to be at his commandment to depose and erect at his good will and pleasure, and that the stories made mention of his intolerable and insolent pride, and tyranny, used over them in such sort, as no king would have used to his Christian subjects, nor yet a good master to his servants, setting his feet on the emperor's neck, affirming that to be verified in him, which was spoken only of our Saviour Jesus Christ, in these words, Super aspidem & basilicum ambulabis, & conculcabis leonem & draconem. Other some had he made to hold his stirrup, others he had displaced and removed from their empires and seats royal: and not content herewithal, more insolent than Lucifer, he hath occupied not only the highest place in this world, above kings and princes, but hath further presumed to sit in the seat of Almighty God, which only he reserved to himself, which is the conscience of man; and to keep the possession thereof, he hath promised forgiveness of sins totiens quotiens.—He hath brought in gods of his own framing, and invented a new religion, full of gain and lucre, quite contrary to the doctrine of the holy scripture, only for the maintaining of his kingdom, displacing Christ from his glory, and holding his people in a miserable servitude of blindness, to the loss of a great number of souls, which God at the latter day shall exact at his head; boasting many times in his canons and decrees, that he can dispense Contra Petrum, contra Paulum, contra vetus & novum Testamentum; and that he Plenitudine potestatis, tantum potest quantum Deus: That is, Against Peter, against Paul, against the old and new Testament: and of the fulness of power may do as much as God. O Lord, who ever heard such blasphemy? If there be any man that can advance himself above him, let him be judged Antichrist.—This enemy of God and of our redemption, is so evidently pointed out in the scriptures by such manifest signs and tokens, which all so clearly appear in him, that except a man will shut up his eyes and heart against the light, he cannot but know him: and therefore for my part I will never give my consent to the receiving of him into this church of England. And you my lord, and the rest that sit here in commission, consider well and examine your own consciences; you have sworn against him, you are learned, and can judge of the truth. I pray God you be not wilfully blind. As for me, I have herein discharged mine own conscience toward the world, and I will write also my mind to her grace, touching this matter." The copy of which Letter sent to the queen, ye shall find after in the end of his story.

While he in this sort made his Answer, ye heard before how Dr. Story and Martin divers times interrupted him with blasphemous talk, and would fain have had the bishop of Gloucester to put him to silence: who notwithstanding did not, but suffered him to end his tale at full. After this he heard also how they proceeded to examine him of divers Articles, whereof the chief was, That at the time of his creating abp. of Canterbury, he was sworn to the pope, and had his institution and induction from him, and promised to maintain then the authority of that see, and therefore was perjured: wherefore he should rather stick to his first oath, and return to his old fold again, than to continue obstinately in an oath forced in the time of schism.

To that he answered, saving his protestation (which term he used before all his Answers) that at such time as archbishop Warham died, he was ambassador in Germany for the king, who sent for him thereupon home, and having intelligence by some of his friends (who were near about the king) how he meant to bestow the same bishopric upon him, and therefore counselled him in that case to make haste home, he feeling in himself a great inability to such a promotion, and very sorry to leave his study, and especially considering by what means he must have it, which was clean against his conscience which he could not utter without great peril and danger, devised an excuse to the king of matter of great importance, for the which his longer abode there should be most necessary, thinking by that means in his absence, that the king would have bestowed it upon some other, and so remained there by that device, one half year after the king had written for him to come home. But after that no such matter fell out, as he seemed to make suspicion of, the king sent for him again. Who after his return, understanding still the archbishops to be reserved for him, made means by divers of his best friends to shift it off, desiring rather some smaller living; that he might more quietly follow his book.—To be brief, when the king himself spoke with him, declaring that his full intention, for his service sake, and for the good opinion he conceived of him, was to bestow that dignity upon him, after long disabling of himself, perceiving he could by no persuasions alter the king's determination, he broke frankly his conscience with him, most humbly craving first his grace's pardon, for that he should declare unto his highness. Which obtained, he declared, that if he accepted the office, then he must receive it at the pope's hand, which he neither would, nor could do, for that his highness was only the supreme governor of this church of England, as well in causes ecclesiastical as temporal, and that the full right and donation of all manner of bishoprics and benefices, as well as of any other temporal dignities, and promotions, appertained to his grace, and not to any other foreign authority, whatsoever it was, and therefore if he might in that vocation serve God, him, and his country, seeing it was his pleasure so to have it, he would accept it, and receive it of his majesty, and of none other stranger, who had no authority within this realm, neither in any such gift, nor in any other thing. Whereat the king, said he, staying a while and musing, asked me how I was able to prove it. At which time I alledged many texts out of the Scriptures, and the Fathers also, approving the supreme and highest authority of kings in their realms and dominions, disclosing therewithal the intolerable usurpation of the pope of Rome.—Afterwards it pleased his highness (quoth the archbishop) many and sundry times to talk with me of it, and perceiving that I could not be brought to acknowledge the authority of the bishop of Rome, the king himself called doctor Oliver, and other civil lawyers, and devised with them how he might bestow it upon me, inforcing me nothing against my conscience. Who thereupon informed him, that I might do it by the way of protestation, and so one to be sent to Rome, who might take the oath, and do every thing in my name. Which when I understood, I said, he should do it super animam suam: and I indeed bona fide made my protestation, that I did not acknowledge his authority any further, than as it agreed with the express word of God, and that it might be lawful for me at all times to speak against him, and to impugn his errors, when time and occasion should serve me. And this my protestation did I cause to be enrolled, and there I think it remaineth.

They objected to him also that he was married, which he confessed. Whereupon Dr. Martin said, that his children were bond-men to the see of Canterbury. At which saying the archbishop smiled, and asked him if a priest at his benefice kept a concubine, and had by her bastards, whether they were bondsmen to the benefice or no, saying, I trust you will make my children's causes no worse.

After this Dr. Martin demanded of him who was Supreme Head of the Church of England? Marry, quoth my lord of Canterbury, Christ is head of this member, as he is of the whole body of the universal church. Why, quoth Dr. Martin, you made king Henry 8th supreme head of the Church. Yea, said the archbishop, of all the people of England, as well ecclesiastical as temporal. And not of the church, said Martin? No said he, for Christ is only head of his church, and of the faith and religion of the same. The king is head and governor of his people, which are the visible church. What (quoth Martin) you never durst tell the king so. Yes, that I durst, quoth he, and did, in the publication of his stile, wherein he was named supreme head of the church; there was never other thing meant. A number of other fund and foolish objections were made, with repetition whereof I thought not to trouble the reader.

Thus after they had received his Answers to all their Objections, they cited him (as is aforesaid) to appear at Rome within fourscore days, to make there his personal answers: which he said if the king and queen would send him, he would be content to do, and so thence was carried to prison again, where he continually remained, notwithstanding that he was commanded to appear at Rome.

Wherein all men that have eyes to see may easily perceive the crafty practice of these prelates, and the visored face of their justice, as though the court of Rome would condemn no man before he answered for himself, as all law and equity required. But the very same instant time, the holiness of that unholy father, contrary to all reason and justice, sent his letter executory unto the king and queen to degrade and deprive him of his dignity: which thing he did not only before the 80 days were ended, but before there were 20 days spent. Furthermore, whereas the said Archbishop was first detained in strait prison so that he could not appear (as was notorious both in England and also in the Romish court) and therefore had a lawful and most just excuse of his absence by all laws, both popish and other: yet in the end of the said fourscore days, was that worthy martyr decreed Contumax, that is, sturdily, forwardly, and wilfully absent, and in pain of the same his absence condemned and put to death.

This Letter or Sentence definitive of the pope was dated about the 1st day of January and was delivered here in England about the midst of February. Upon the receipt of which letters another session was appointed for the Archbishop to appear the 14th day of Feb. before certain Commissioners directed down by the queen, the chief whereof was the bishop of Ely, Dr. Thurlby. Concerning which Dr. Thurlby by the way here is to be noted, that albeit he was not the said archbishop's household chaplain, yet he was so familiarly acquainted with him, so dearly beloved, so inwardly accepted and advanced of him (not like a chaplain, but rather like a natural brother) that there was never any thing in the archbishop's house so dear, were it plate, jewel, horse, maps, books, or any thing else, but if Thurlby did never so little commend it (a subtle kind of begging) the archbishop by and by, either gave it to him, or shortly sent it after him to his house. So greatly was the archbishop enamoured with him, that whosoever would obtain any thing of him, most commonly would make their way before by Dr. Thurlby. Which by matter of the said Dr. Thurlby, I thought here to recite, not so much to upbraid the man with the vice of unthankfulness, as chiefly and only for this, to admonish him of old benefits received, whereby he may the better remember his old benefactor, and so to favour the cause and quarrel of him whom he was so singularly bounden unto. With the said Dr. Thurlby bishop of Ely, was also assigned in the same commission Dr. Bonner bishop of London, which two coming to Oxford upon St. Valentine's day, as the pope's delegates, with a new commission from Rome, by the virtue thereof commanded the archbishop aforesaid to come before them, in the choir of Christ's church, before the high altar, where they sitting (according to their manner) in their pontificalibus, first begun as the fashion is, to read their commission: wherein was contained, how that in the court of Rome all things being indifferently examined, both the articles laid to his charge, with the answers made unto them, and witnesses examined on both parts, and council heard as well on the king and queen's behalf his accusers, as on the behalf of Thomas Cranmer the party guilty, so that he wanted nothing appertaining to his necessary defence, &c. Which foresaid commission, as it was in reading, O Lord, said the archbishop, what lies be these, that I being continually in prison, and never could be suffered to have counsel or advocate at home, should produce witness and appoint my counsel at Rome? God must needs punish this open and shameless lying. They read on the commission which came from the pope, Plenitudine potestatis, supplying all manner of defects in law or process, committed in dealing with the archbishop, and giving them full authority to proceed to deprivation and degradation of them, and so upon excommunication to deliver him up to the secular power, Omni appellatione remota.

When the Commission was read thus, they proceeding thereupon to his degradation, first clothed and disguised him; putting on him a surplus, and then an albe; after that the vestiment of a subdeacon, and every other furniture, as a priest ready to masse. When they had apparelled him so far, What, said he, I think I shall say mass: Yea, said Cosins, one of Bonner's chaplains, my lord I trust to see you say mass for all this. Do you so, quoth he? that shall you never see, nor will I ever do it.—Then they invested him in all manner of robes of a bishop and archbishop, as he is at his installing, saving that as every thing then is most rich and costly, so every thing in this of canvas and old clouts, with a mitre and a pall of the same suit done upon him in mockery, and then the crosier staff was put in his hand.

This done after the pope's pontifical form and manner, Bonner, who by the space of many years had borne, as it seemeth, no great good will towards him, and now rejoiced to see this day wherein he might triumph over him, and take his pleasure at full, began to stretch out his eloquence, making his oration to the assembly, after this manner of sort.

"THIS is the man that hath ever despised the pope's holiness, and now is to be judged by him. This is the man who hath pulled down so many churches, and now is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that condemned the blessed sacrament of the altar, and now is come to be condemned before that blessed sacrament hanging over the altar. This is the man that like Lucifer sat in the place of Christ upon an altar to judge other, and now is come before an altar to be judged himself."

Whereunto the Archbishop interrupting him said, That in that he belied him, as he did in many other things: for that which he would now seem to charge him withal, was his own fault, if it was any, and none of his. For the thing you mean, was in Paul's church, said he, where I came to sit in Commission; and there was a scaffold prepared for me and others, by you and your officers; and whether there were any altar under it or not, I could not perceive it, nor once suspected it, wherefore you do wittingly evil to charge me with it.—But Bonner went on still in his rhetorical repetition, lying and railing against the archbishop, beginning every sentence with 'this is the man, this is the man,' till at length there was never a man but was weary of the unmannerly usage of him in that time and place: insomuch that the bishop of Ely aforesaid divers times pulled him by the sleeve to make an end, and said to him afterward when they went to dinner, that he had broken promise with him: for he had intreated him earnestly to use him with reverence.

After all this done and finished, they began then to bustle towards his degrading, and first to take from him his crosier staff out of his hands which he held fast, and refused to deliver, and withal, imitating the example of Martin Luther, pulled an appeal out of his left sleeve under the wrist, which he there and then delivered unto them, saying, "I appeal to the next General Council; and herein I have comprehended my cause and form of it, which I desire may be admitted;" and prayed divers of the standers by, by name to be witnesses, and especially M. Curtop, to whom he spoke twice, &c. The copy of which his Appellation, because it was not printed before, I thought here to exhibit, ad rei memoriam, as in form here followeth:

The tenor of the APPEAL of the Archbishop of Canterbury from the Pope, to the next General Council.

"IN the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost.—First, my plain protestation made, that I intend to speak nothing against one holy, catholic and apostolical church, or the authority thereof, the which authority I have in great reverence, and to whom my mind is in all things to obey, and if any thing peradventure, either by slipperiness of tongue, or by indignation of abuses, or else by the provocation of mine adversaries be spoken or done otherwise than well, or not with such reverence as becometh me, I am most ready to amend it.—Although the bishop of Rome, whom they call pope, beareth the room of Christ in earth, and hath authority of God, yet by that power or authority he is not become unsinnable, neither hath he received that power to destroy, but to edify the congregation. Therefore if he shall command any thing that is not right to be done, he ought to take it patiently and in good part, in case he be not therein obeyed. And he must not be obeyed, if he command any thing against the precepts of God: no rather he may lawfully be resisted, even as Paul withstood Peter. And if he being aided by help of princes deceived perchance by false suggestion, or with evil counsel, cannot be resisted, but the remedies of withstanding him be taken away, there is nevertheless one remedy of appealing, which no prince can take away, uttered by the very law of nature: forso-much as it is a certain defence, which is meet for every body by the law of God, of nature, and of man.—And whereas the laws do permit a man to appeal, not only from the griefs and injuries done, but also from such as shall be done hereafter, or threatened to be done, in so much that the inferior cannot make laws of not appealing to a superior power; and since it is openly enough confessed, that a holy general council lawfully gathered together in the holy Ghost, and representing the holy Catholic church, is above the pope, especially in matters concerning faith; that he cannot make decrees that men shall not appeal from him to a general council: therefore I Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, or in time past ruler of the metropolitanical church of Canterbury, doctor in divinity, do say and publish before you the public notary, and witnesses here present, with mind and intent to challenge and appeal from the persons and griefs underneath written, and to proffer myself in place and time convenient and meet to prove the articles that follow. And I openly confess, that I would lawfully have published them before this day, if I might have had either liberty to come abroad myself, or licence of a notary and witnesses. But further than I am able to do, I know well is not required of the laws. 1st I say and publish, that James by the mercy of God priest, called Cardinal of the Pit, and of the title of our lady in the way of the church of Rome, judge and commissary specially deputed of our most holy lord the pope, as he affirmed, caused me to be cited to Rome, there to appear fourscore days after the citation served on me, to make answer to certain articles touching the peril of my state and life: and whereas I was kept in prison with most straight ward, so that I could in no wise be suffered to go to Rome, nor to come out of prison, and in so grievous causes concerning state and life, no man is bound to send a proctor, and though I would never so fain send my proctor, yet by reason of poverty I am not able, for all that ever I had, wherewith I should bear my proctor's costs and charges, is quite taken from me, nevertheless the most reverend cardinal aforesaid doth sore threaten me, that whether I shall appear or not, he will nevertheless yet proceed in judgment against me. Wherein I feel myself so grieved, that nothing can be imagined more mischievous or further from reason.—2. The reverend father James Brooks, by the mercy of God bishop of Gloucester, judge and under-deputy, as he affirmed, of the most reverend cardinal, caused me to be cited at Oxford, where I was then kept in prison, to answer to certain articles, concerning the danger of my state and life. And when I being unlearned and ignorant in the laws, desired council of the learned in the law, that thing was most unrighteously denied me, contrary to the equity of all laws both of God and man. Wherein again I feel me most wrongfully grieved.—3. And when I refused the said bishop of Gloucester to be my judge, for most just causes, which I then declared, he nevertheless went on still, and made process against me, contrary to the rule of the laws of appealing, which say, 'A judge that is refused ought not to proceed in the cause, but to leave off.' And when he had required of me answers to certain Articles, I refused to make him any answer: I said I would yet gladly make answer to the most renowned king and queen's deputies or attorneys then present, with this condition notwithstanding, that mine answer should be extrajudicial, and that was permitted me. And with this my protestation made and admitted, I made answer; but mine answer was sudden and unprovided for: and therefore I desired to have a copy of mine answers, that I might put to, take away, change and amend them; and this was also permitted me. Nevertheless, contrary to his promise made unto me, no respect had to my protestation, nor licence given to amend mine answer, the said reverend father bishop of Gloucester, as I hear, commanded mine answers to be inacted contrary to the equity of the law. In which thing again I feel me much grieved.—4. Furthermore, I could not for many causes admit the bishop of Rome's usurped authority in this realm, nor consent to it: First my solemn oath letting me, which I made in the time of king Henry the 8th, of most famous memory, according to the laws of England: Secondly, because I knew the authority of the bishop of Rome, which he usurpeth, to be against the crown, customs, and laws of this realm of England, insomuch, that neither the king can be crowned in this realm, without the most grievous crime of perjury, nor may hishops enjoy their bishoprics, nor judgments to be used according to the laws and customs of this realm, except by the bishop of Rome's authority, be accursed both the king and queen, the judges, writers, and executors of the laws and customs, with all that consent to them. Finally, the whole realm shall be accursed.—5. Moreover, that heinous and usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, through reservations of the bishoprics, provisions, annuities, dispensations, pardons, appellations, bulls, and other cursed merchandise of Rome, was wout exceedingly to spoil and consume the riches and substance of this realm, all which things should follow again by recognising and receiving of that usurped authority unto the unmeasurable loss of this realm.—6. Finally, it is most evident by that usurped authority, not only the crown of England to be under yoke, the laws and customs of this realm to be thrown down and trodden under foot, but also the most holy decrees of councils, together with the precepts both of the gospel and of God.—When in times past the sun of righteousness being risen in the world, Christian religion by the preaching of the apostles began to be spread very far abroad and to flourish, insomuch that their sound went out into all the world; innumerable people, which walked in darkness, saw a great light, God's glory every where published did flourish, the only care and care of ministers of the church was purely and sincerely to preach Christ, the people to embrace and follow Christ's doctrine. Then the church of Rome, as it were lady of the world, both was, and also was counted worthily the mother of other churches, for as much as then the first begat to Christ, nourished with the food of pure doctrine, did help them with their riches, succoured the oppressed, and was a sanctuary for the miserable, she rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept. Then by the examples of the bishops of Rome, riches were despised, worldly glory and pomp was trodden under foot, pleasures and riot nothing regarded. Then this frail and uncertain life, being full of all miseries, was laughed to scorn, while through the example of Romish Martyrs, men did every where press forward to the life to come. But afterward when the ungraciousness of damnable ambition, never satisfied avarice, and the horrible enormity of vices had corrupted and taken the see of Rome; there followed every where almost the deformities of all churches, growing out of kind into the manners of the church their mother, leaving their former innocency and purity, and slipping into foul and heinous usages.—For the foresaid and many other griefs and abuses, which I intend to prove, and do proffer myself in time convenient to prove hereafter, since reformation of the above mentioned abuses, is not to be looked for of the bishop of Rome, neither can I hope by reason of his wicked abuses and usurped authority, to have him an equal judge in his own cause: Therefore I do challenge and appeal in these writings from the pope, having no good council, and from the above named pretences, commissions, and judges, from their citations, processes, and from all other things that have or shall follow thereupon, and from every one of them, and from all their sentences, censures, pains, and punishments, of cursing, suspension, and interdicting, and from all others whatsoever their denouncings and declarations (as they pretend) of schism, of heresy, adultery, deprivation, degrading by them or by any of them, in any manner wise attempted, done, and set forward to be attempted, to be done, and to be set forward hereafter, saving always their honours and reverences, as unequal and unrighteous, most tyrannical and violent, and from every grief to come, which shall happen to me, as well for myself as for all and every one that cleaveth to me, or will hereafter be on my side, unto a free general council, that shall hereafter lawfully be, and in a sure place, to the which place I or a proctor deputed by me, may freely and with safety come, and to him or them, to whom a man may by the law, privilege, custom, or otherwise challenge and appeal.—And I desire the first, the second, and the third time, instantly, more instantly, and most instantly, that I may have messengers, if there be any man that will and can give me them. And I make open promise of prosecuting this mine Appellation, by the way of disannulling abuse, inequality, and unrighteousness, or otherwise as I shall be better able: choice and liberty reserved to me, to put to, diminish, change, correct, and interpret my sayings, and to reform all things after a better fashion, saving always to me every other benefit of the law, and to them that either be, or will be on my part.—And touching my doctrine of the Sacrament, and other my doctrine, of what kind soever it be, I protest that it was never my mind to write, speak, or understand any thing contrary to the most holy word of God, or else against the holy catholic church of Christ, but purely and simply to imitate and teach those things only, which I had learned of the sacred Scripture, and of the holy catholic church of Christ from the beginning, and also according to the exposition of the most holy and learned fathers and martyrs of the Church.—And if any thing hath peradventure chanced otherwise than I thought; I may err, but heretic I cannot be, forasmuch as I am ready in all things to follow the judgment of the most sacred word of God, and of the holy catholic Church, desiring none other thing, than meekly and gently to be taught, if any where, which God forbid, I have swerved from the truth.—And I protest and openly confess, that in all my doctrine and preaching, both of the Sacrament, and of other my doctrine whatsoever it be, not only I mean and judge those things, as the catholic Church, and the most holy fathers of old with one accord have meant and judged, but also I would gladly use the same words that they used, and not use any other words, but to set my hand to all and singular their speeches, phrases, ways and forms of speech, which they do use in their treatises upon the Sacrament, and to keep still their interpretation. But in this thing I only am accused for an heretic, because I allow not the doctrine lately brought in of the Sacrament, and because I consent not to words not accustomed in Scripture, and unknown to the ancient fathers, but newly invented and brought in by men, and belonged to the destruction of souls, and overthrowing of the pure and old religion. Given, &c."

This Appeal being put up to the bishop of Ely, he said, My lord, our Commission is to proceed against you, Omnia appellatione remota, and therefore we cannot admit it. Why, quoth he, then you do me the more wrong: for my case is not as every private man's case. The matter is between the pope and me immediate, and none otherwise: and I think no man ought to be a judge in his own cause.—Well, quoth Ely, if it may be admitted it shall, and so received it of him. And then began he to persuade earnestly with the archbishop to consider his state, and to weigh it well, while there was time to do him good, promising to become a suitor to the king and queen for him; and so protested his great love and friendship that had been between them, heartily weeping, so that for a time he could not go on with his tale. After going forward, he earnestly affirmed, that if it had not been the king and queen's commandment, whom he could not deny, else no worldly commodity should have made him to have done it, concluding that to be one of the sorrowfullest things that ever happened unto him. The archbishop gently seeming to comfort him, said, he was very well content withal: and so proceeded they to his degradation.—When they came to take off his pall, which is a solemn vesture of an archbishop, then said he, Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall? Which imported as much as they being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereunto one of them said, in that they were but bishops, they were his inferiors, and not competent judges: but being the pope's delegates, they might take his pall, and so they did, and so proceeding took every thing in order from him, as it was put on. Then a barber clipped his hair round about, and the bishop scraped the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein bishop Bonner behaved himself, as roughly and unmannerly, as the other bishop was to him soft and gentle. Whilst they were thus doing, All this, quoth the archbishop, needed not: I had myself done with this gear long ago. Last of all they stripped him out of his gown into his jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beadle's gown, full bare and nearly worn, and as evil favouredly made, as one might lightly see, and a townsman's cap on his head, and so delivered him to the secular power.—After this pageant of degradation, and all was finished, then spake lord Bonner, saying to him, Now are you no lord any more: and so whensoever he spake to the people of him, as he was continually barking against him, ever he used this term, This gentleman here, &c.

And thus with great compassion and pity of every man in this evil-favoured gown was he carried to prison. Whom there followed a gentleman of Gloucestershire with the archbishop's own gown, who, standing by, and being thought to be toward one of the bishops, had it delivered unto him; who by the way talking with him, said, the bishop of Ely protested his friendship with tears. Yet, said he, he might have used a great deal more friendship towards me, and never have been the worse thought on, for I have well deserved it: and going into the prison up with him, asked him if he would drink. Who answered him, saying, if he had a piece of salt-fish, that he had better will to eat: for he had been that day somewhat troubled with this matter, and had eaten little, but now that it is past, my heart, said he, is well quieted. Whereupon the gentleman said, he would give him money with all his heart, for he was able to do it. But he being one toward the law, and fearing master Farmer's case, durst therefore give him nothing, but gave money to the bailiffs that stood by, and said, that if they were good men, they would bestow it on him, for my lord of Canterbury had not one penny in his purse to help him, and so left him, my lord bidding him earnestly farewell, commending himself to his prayers and all his friends. That night this gentleman was staid by Bonner and Ely, for giving him this money: and but for the help of friends, he had been sent up to the council. Such was the cruelty and iniquity of the time, that men could not do good without punishment.

IN this mean time, while the Archbishop was thus remaining in durance, whom they had kept now in prison almost the space of three years, the doctors and divines of Oxford busied themselves all that ever they could about master Cranmer, to have him recant, assaying by all crafty practices and allurements they might devise how to bring their purpose to pass. And to the intent they might win him easily, they had him to the dean's house of Christ's Church in the said university, where he lacked no delicate fare, played at the bowls, had his pleasure for walking, and all other things that might bring him from Christ, over and besides all this, secretly and slightly they suborned certain men, which when they could not expugn him by arguments and disputation, should by entreaty and fair promises, or any other means allure him to Recantation; perceiving otherwise what a great wound they should receive, if the archbishop had stood stedfast in his sentence: and again on the other side, how great profit they should get, if he as the principal standard-bearer, should be overthrown. By reason whereof the wily papists flocked about him, with threatening, flattering, intreating, and promising, and all other means; specially Henry Sydall, and Friar John a Spaniard, de Villa Garcina, to the end to drive him, to the uttermost of their possibility, from his former sentence to recantation.

First, they set forth how acceptable it would be both to the king and queen, and especially how gainful to him, and for his soul's health the same should be. They added moreover, how the council and the noblemen bare him good will. They put him in hope, that he should not only have his life, but also be restored to his antient dignity, saying, it was but a small matter, and so easy that they required him to do, only that he would subscribe to a few words with his own hand; which if he did, there should be nothing in the realm that the queen would not easily grant him, whether he would have riches or dignity, or else if he had rather live a private life in quiet rest, in whatsoever place he listed, without all public ministry, only that he would set his name in two words to a little leaf of paper; but if he refused, there was no hope of health and pardon: for the queen was so purposed, that she would have Cranmer a catholic, or else no Cranmer at all. Therefore he should chuse whether he thought it better to end his life shortly in the flames and firebrands now ready to be kindled, than with much honour to prolong his life, until the course of nature did call him; for there was no middle way.—Moreover, they exhorted him that he would look to his wealth, his estimation and quietness, saying, that he was not so old, but that many years yet remained in this his so lusty age; and if he would not do it in respect of the queen, yet he should do it for respect of his life, and not suffer that other men should be more careful for his health than he was himself: saying, that this was agreeable to his notable learning and virtues; which being adjoined with his life would be profitable both to himself, and to many other; but being extinct by death, should be fruitful to no man; that he should take good heed that he went not too far; yet there was time enough to restore all things safe, and nothing wanted, if he wanted not to himself. Therefore they would him to lay hold upon the occasion of his health while it was offered, lest if he would now refuse it while it was offered, he might hereafter seek it when he could not have it.

Finally, if the desire of life did nothing move him, yet he should remember that to die is grievous in all ages, and especially in these his years and flower of dignity it were more grievous: but to die in the fire and such torments, is most grievous of all. With these and like provocations these fair flatterers ceased not to solicit and urge him, using all means they could to draw him to their side; whose force his manly constancy did a great while resist. But at last when they made no end of calling and crying upon him, the archbishop being overcome, whether through their importunity, or by his own imbecility, or of what mind I cannot tell, at length gave his hand.

It might be supposed, that it was done for the hope of life, and better days to come. But as we may since perceive by a letter of his sent to a lawyer, the most cause why he desired his time to be delayed, was that he would make an end of Marcus Antonius, which he had already begun: but howsoever it was, plain it was, to be against his conscience. The form of which Recantation made by the friars and doctors, whereto he subscribed, was this:

"I THOMAS CRANMER late Archbishop of Canterbury, do renounce, abhor, and detest, all manner of heresies and errors of Luther and Zwinglius, and all other teachings which be contrary to sound and true doctrines. And I believe most constantly in my heart, and with my mouth I confess one holy and catholic church visible, without the which there is no salvation; and thereof I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to be supreme head in earth, whom I know to be the highest bishop and pope, and Christ's vicar, unto whom all Christian people ought to be subject.—And as concerning the sacraments, I believe and worship in the sacrament of the altar the very body and blood of Christ, being contained most truly under the forms of bread and wine; the bread through the mighty power of God being turned into the body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood. And in the other six sacraments also, like as in this, I believe and hold as the universal church holdeth, and the church of Rome judgeth and determineth.—Furthermore, I believe that there is a place of purgatory, where souls departed be punished for a time, for whom the Church doth godly and wholesomely pray, like as it doth honour saints and make prayers to them. Finally, in all things I profess, that I do not otherwise believe, than the catholic church and the church of Rome holdeth and teacheth. I am sorry that ever I held or thought otherwise. And I beseech Almighty God, that of his mercy he will vouchsafe to forgive me, whatsoever I have offended against God or his church, and also I desire and beseech all Christian people to pray for me. And all such as have been deceived either by mine example or doctrine, I require them by the blood of Jesus Christ, that they will return to the unity of the church, that we may be all of one mind, without schism or division.—And to conclude, as I submit myself to the catholic church of Christ, and to the supreme head thereof, so I submit myself unto the most excellent majesties of Philip and Mary, king and queen of this realm of England, &c. and to all other their laws and ordinances, being ready always as a faithful subject ever to obey them. And God is my witness that I have not done this for favour or fear of any person, but willingly and of mine own mind, as well to the discharge of mine own conscience, as to the instruction of other."

This Recantation of the archbishop was not so soon conceived, but the doctors and prelates without delay caused the same to be imprinted, and set abroad in all men's hands. Whereunto for better credit, first was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a solemn subscription, then followed the witnesses of this Recantation, Henry Syddall, and Friar John de Villa Garcia. All this while Cranmer was in certain assurance of his life, although the same was faithfully promised to him by the doctors; but after that they had their purpose, the rest they committed to all adventure, as became men of that religion to do. The queen, having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his Recantation very gladly: but of her purpose to put him to death she would nothing relent.

Now was Cranmer's cause in a miserable taking, who neither inwardly had any quietness in his own conscience, nor yet outwardly any help in his adversaries. Besides this, on the one side was praise, on the other side scorn, on both sides danger, so that neither he could die honestly, nor yet dishonestly live. And whereas he sought profit, he fell into double disprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid secret shame, nor yet with evil men the note of dissimulation.

In the mean time, while these things were a doing, as I said, in the prison amongst the doctors, the queen taking secret counsel, how to dispatch Cranmer out of the way, who as yet knew nothing of her secret hate, and looked for nothing less than death, appointed Dr. Cole, and secretly gave him in commandment, that against the 21st of March, he should prepare a Funeral Sermon for Cranmer's burning, and so instructing him orderly and diligently of her will and pleasure in that behalf, sendeth him away.

Soon after, the lord Williams of Tame, and the lord Shandoys, sir Tho. Bridges, and sir John Brown were sent for, with other worshipful men and justices, commanded in the queen's name to be at Oxford at the same day, with their servants and retinue, lest Cranmer's death should raise there any tumult.

Cole the doctor having this lesson given him before, and charged by her commandment, returned to Oxford, ready to play his part; who as the day of execution drew near, even the day before, came into the prison to Cranmer; to try whether he abode in the catholic faith wherein before he had left him. To whom, when Cranmer had answered, that by God's grace he would daily be more confirmed in the catholic faith; Cole departing for that time, the next day following repaired to the archbishop again, giving no signification as yet of his death that was prepared: and therefore in the morning, which was the 21st day of March, appointed for Cranmer's execution, the said Cole coming to him, asked if he had any money. To whom when he answered that he had none, he delivered him fifteen crowns to give the poor to whom he would: and so exhorting him so much as he could to constancy in faith, departed thence about his business, as to his sermon appertained.

By this partly, and other like arguments, the Archbishop began more and more to surmise what they went about. Then because the day was not far past, and the lords and knights that were looked for were not yet come, there came to him the Spanish friar, witness of his Recantation, bringing a paper with Articles, which Cranmer should openly profess in his recantation before the people, earnestly desiring him that he would write the said instrument with the articles with his own hand, and sign it with his name: which when he had done, the said friar desired that he would write another copy thereof, which should remain with him, and that he did also. But yet the archbishop being not ignorant whereunto their secret devices tended, and thinking that the time was at hand in which he could no longer dissemble the profession of his faith with Christ's people, he put secretly in his bosom his prayer with his exhortation, written in another paper, which he minded to recite to the people, before he should make the last profession of his faith, fearing lest if they had heard the confession of his faith first, they would not afterward have suffered him to exhort the people.

Soon after about nine of the clock, the lord Williams, sir Thomas Bridges, sir John Brown, and the other justices, with certain other noblemen, that were sent of the queen's council, came to Oxford with a great train of waiting men. Also of the other multitude on every side (as is wont in such a matter) was made a great concourse, and greater expectation. For first of all, they that were of the pope's side were in great hope that day to hear something of Cranmer that should establish the vanity of their opinion: the other part, which were endued with a better mind, could not yet doubt, that he which by continual study and labour for so many years, had set forth the doctrine of the gospel, either would or could now in the last act of his life forsake his part. Briefly, as every man's will inclined, either to this part or to that, so according to the diversity of their desires, every man wished and hoped for. And yet because in an uncertain thing the certainty could be known of none what would be the end; all their minds were hanging between hope and doubt. So that the greater expectation was in so doubtful a matter, the more was the multitude, that was gathered thither to hear and behold.

In this so great frequency and expectation,

Cranmer at the length cometh from Bocardo prison unto St. Mary's Church, because it was a foul and rainy day, the chief church in the university, in this order. The mayor went before, next him the aldermen in their place and degree; after them was Cranmer brought between two friars, which mumbling to and fro certain psalms in the streets, answered one another until they came to the church door, and there they began the song of Simeon, Nunc dimittis, and entering into the church, the psalm-saying friars brought him to his standing, and there left him. There was a stage set over against the pulpit, of a mean height from the ground, where Cranmer had his standing, waiting until Cole made him ready to his sermon.

The lamentable case and sight of that man gave a sorrowful spectacle to all Christian eyes that beheld him. He that late was Archbishop, Metropolitan, and Primate of England, and the king's privy Chancellor, being now in a bare and ragged gown, and ill favourably clothed, with an old square cap, exposed to the contempt of all men, did admonish men not only of his own calamity, but also of their state and fortune. For who would not pity his case, and bewail his fortune, and might not fear his own chance, to see such a prelate, so grave a counsellor, and of so long continued honour, after so many dignities, in his old years to be deprived of his estate, adjudged to die, and in so painful a death to end his life, and now presently from such fresh ornaments, to descend to such vile and ragged apparel.

In this habit, when he had stood a good space upon the stage, turning to a pillar near adjoining thereunto, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed unto God once or twice, till at the length Dr. Cole coming into the pulpit, and beginning his Sermon, entered first into mention of Tobias and Zachariah. Whom after he had praised in the beginning of his sermon for their perseverance in the true worshipping of God, he then divided his whole sermon into three parts (according to the soleinn custom of the schools) intending to speak first of the mercy of God: secondly, of his justice to be shewed: and last of all, how the prince's secrets are not to be opened. And proceeding a little from the beginning, he took occasion by and by to turn his tale to Cranmer, and with many hot words reproved him, that once he being indued with the savour and feeling of wholesome and catholic doctrine, fell into the contrary opinion of pernicious error; which he had not only defended by writings, and all his power, but also allured other men to do the like, with great liberality of gifts, as it were, appointing rewards for error: and after he had allured them by all means did cherish them.

It were too long to repeat all things, that in long order were pronounced. The sum of his tripartite declamation was, that he said God's mercy was so tempered with his justice, that he did not altogether require punishment according to the merits of offenders, nor yet sometimes suffered the same altogether to go unpunished, yea though they had repented. As in David, who when he was bidden choose of three kinds of punishments which he would, and he had chosen pestilence for three days; the Lord forgave him half the time, but did not release all: and that the same thing came to pass in him also, to whom although pardon and reconciliation was due according to the canons, seeing he repented him of his errors, yet there were causes why the queen and the council at this time judged him to death: of which, lest he should marvel too much, he should hear some. First, that being a Traitor, he had dissolved the lawful matrimony between the king her father and mother; besides the driving out of the pope's authority, while he was metropolitan. Secondly, that he had been an Heretick, from whom as from an author and only fountain all heretical doctrine and schismatical opinions, that so many years have prevailed in England, did first rise and spring; of which he had not been a secret favourer only, but also a most earnest defender even to the end of his life, sowing them abroad by writings and arguments, privately and openly, not without great ruin and decay of the catholic church. And further, it seemed meet, according to the law of equality, that as the death of the duke of Northumberland of late, made even with Thomas More chancellor that died for the church, so there should be one that should make even with Fisher of Rochester; and because that Ridley, Hooper, Ferrar, were not able to make even with that man, it seemed that Cranmer should be joined to them to fill up their part of equality. Besides these there were other just and weighty causes, which seemed to the queen and council, which was not meet at that time to be opened to the common people.

After this, turning his tale to the hearers, he bade all men beware by this man's example, that among men nothing is so high, that can promise itself safety on the earth, and that God's vengeance is equally stretched against all men, and spareth none: therefore they should beware and learn to fear their prince. And seeing the queen's majesty would not spare so notable a man as this, much less in the like cause she would spare other men, that no man should think to make thereby any defence of his error, either in riches or any kind of authority, they had now an example to teach them all, by whose calamity every man might consider his own fortune; who from the top of dignity, none being more honourable than he in the whole realm, and next the king, was fallen into so great misery, as they might now see, being a man of so high degree, sometime one of the chiefest prelates in the church, and an archbishop, the chief of the council, the 2nd person in the realm of long time, a man thought in greatest assurance, having a king on his side; notwithstanding till his authority and defence, to be debased from high estate to a low degree, of a counsellor to become a caitiff, and to be set in so wretched a state, that the poorest wretch would not change condition with him; briefly so heaped with misery on all sides, that neither was left in him any hope of better fortune, nor place for worse.

The latter part of his Sermon he converted to the archbishop, whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of Scripture, as with these and such like; bidding him not to mistrust, but he should incontinently receive that the thief did, to whom Christ said, Hodie cum eris in Paradiso, That is, 'This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise.' and out of St. Paul he armed him against the terror of the fire, by this, Dominus fidelis est, non sinet vos tentari ultra quam ferre potestis, That is, 'The Lord is faithful, which will not suffer you to be tempted above your strength:' by the example of the three children, to whom God made the flame to seem like a pleasant dew, adding also the rejoicing of St. Andrew in his cross, the patience of St. Laurence on the fire, assuring him, that God, if he called on him, and to such as die in his faith, either would abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to abide it.

He glorified God much in his conversion, because it appeared to be only his work, declaring what travel and conference had been with him to convert him, and all prevailed not, till that it pleased God of his mercy to reclaim him, and call him home. In discoursing of which place, he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doings, thus tempering his judgment and talk of him, that all the time (said he) he flowed in riches and honour, he was unworthy of his life: and now that he might not live, he was unworthy of death. But lest he should carry with him no comfort, he would diligently labour (he said) and also he did promise in the name of all the priests that were present, that immediately after his death there should be dirges, masses, and funerals executed for him in all the churches of Oxford for the succour of his soul.

Cranmer in all this mean time, with what great grief of mind he stood hearing this Sermon, the outward shews of his body and countenance did better express, than any man can declare; one while lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, and then again for shame letting them down to the earth. A man might have seen the very image and shape of perfect sorrow lively in him expressed. More than 20 several times the tears gushed out abundantly, dropping down marvellously from his fatherly face. They which were present, do testify that they never saw in any child more tears, than burst out from him at that time, all the sermon while; but especially when they recited his prayer before the people. It is marvellous what commiseration and pity moved all men's hearts, that beheld so heavy a countenance, and such abundance of tears in an old man of so reverend dignity.

Cole, after he had ended his Sermon, called back the people that were ready to depart, to prayers. Brethren, said he, lest any man should doubt of this man's earnest conversion and repentance, you shall hear him speak before you, and therefore I pray you master Cranmer, that you will now perform that you promised not long ago; namely, that you would openly express the true and undoubted profession of your faith, that you may take away all suspicion from men, and that all men may understand that you are a Catholic indeed. I will do it, said the Archbishop, and that with a good will; who by and by rising up, and putting off his cap, began to speak thus unto the people:

"I desire you, well beloved brethren in the Lord, that you will pray to God for me, to forgive me my sins, which above all men, both in number and greatness, I have committed. But among all the rest, there is one offence which most of all at this time doth vex and trouble me, whereof in process of my talk you shall hear more in his proper place; and then putting his hand into his bosom, he drew forth his Prayer, which he recited to the people in this sense:

The PRAYER of Dr. Cranmer.

"GOOD Christian people, my dearly beloved brethren and sisters in Christ, I beseech you most heartily to pray for me to Almighty God, that he will forgive me all my sins and offences, which be many, without number, and great above measure. But yet one thing grieveth my conscience more than all the rest, whereof God willing, I intend to speak more hereafter. But how great and how many soever my sins be, I beseech you to pray God of his mercy to pardon and forgive them all."

And here kneeling down, he said:

"O Father of heaven, O Son of God, Redeemer of the world; O Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me most wretched caitiff and miserable sinner. I have offended both against heaven and earth, more than my tongue can express. Whither then may I go, or whither shall I flee? To heaven I may be ashamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no place of refuge or succour. To thee, therefore, O Lord, do I run; to thee do I humble myself, saying, O Lord my God, my sins be great, but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. The great mystery that God became man, was not wrought for little or few offences. Thou didst not give thy Son, O heavenly Father, unto death for small sins only, but for all the greatest sins of the world, so that the sinner return to thee with his whole heart, as I do here at this present. Wherefore have mercy on me O God, whose property is always to have mercy, have mercy upon me O Lord, for thy great mercy. I crave nothing for mine own merits, but for thy name's sake, that it may be hallowed thereby, and for thy dear Son, Jesus Christ's sake. And now therefore, our Father of heaven, hallowed be thy name, &c."—And then he rising, said:

time of his death to give some good exhortation that others may remember the same before their death, and be the better thereby: so I beseech God grant me grace, that I may speak something at this my departing, whereby God may be glorified, and you edified.—First, it is an heavy case to see that so many folk so much dote upon the love of this false world, and be so careful for it, that of the love of God, or the world to come, they seem to care very little or nothing. Therefore this shall be my first exhortation, that you set not your minds overmuch upon this glozing world, but upon God, and upon the world to come; and to learn to know what this lesson meaneth, which St. John teacheth, 'that the love of this world is hatred against God.'—The second exhortation is, that next under God you obey your king and queen willingly and gladly, without murmuring or grudging; not for fear of them only, but much more for the fear of God; knowing that they be God's ministers, appointed by God to rule and govern you: and therefore whosoever resisteth them, resisteth the ordinance of God.—The third exhortation is, that you love altogether like brethren and sisters. For alas, pity it is to see what contention and hatred one Christian man beareth to another, not taking each other as brother and sister, but rather as strangers and mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and bear well away this one lesson, To do good unto all men, as much as in you lieth, and to hurt no man, no more than you would hurt your own natural loving brother or sister. For this you may be sure of, that whosoever hateth any person, and goeth about maliciously to hinder or hurt him, surely, and without all doubt God is not with that man, although he think himself never so much in God's favour.—The fourth exhortation shall be to them that have great substance and riches of this world, that they will well consider and weigh three sayings of the Scripture. One is of our Saviour Christ himself, who saith, Luke 18. 'It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.' A sore saying, and yet spoken of him that knoweth the truth. The second is of St. John, 1 John 3, whose saying is this, 'He that hath the substance of this world, and seeing his brother in necessity, and shutteth up his mercy from him, how can he say that he loveth God?' The third is of Saint James, who speaketh to the covetous rich man after this manner, 'Weep you and howl for the misery that shall come upon you: your riches do rot, your cloaths be moth-eaten, your gold and silver doth canker and rust, and their rust shall bear witness against you, and consume you like fire: you gather a hoard or treasure of God's indignation against the last day.' Let them that be rich ponder well these three sentences: for if they ever had occasion to shew their charity, they have it now at this present, the poor people being so many, and victuals so dear.—And now for as much as I am come to the last end of my life, whereupon hangeth all my life past, and all my life to come, either to live with my master Christ for ever in joy, or else to be in pain for ever, with wicked devils in hell, and I see before mine eyes presently either heaven ready to receive me, and else hell ready to swallow me up: I shall therefore declare unto you my very faith how I believe, without any colour of dissimulation: for now is no time to dissemble, whatsoever I have said or written in times past. First, I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, &c. And I believe every article of the catholic faith, every word, and sentence taught by our Saviour Jesus Christ, his apostles and prophets, in the new and old Testament. And now I come to the great thing, that so much troubleth my conscience, more than any thing that ever I did or said in my whole life, and that is the setting abroad of a writing contrary to the truth; which now here I renounce and refuse, as things written with my hand, contrary to the truth which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death, and to save my life if it might be, and that is, all such bills and papers which I have written or signed with my hand since my degradation; wherein I have written many things untrue. And forasmuch as my hand offended, writing contrary to my heart, my hand shall first be punished therefore: for may I come to the fire it shall be first burned.—And as for the pope, I refuse him, as Christ's enemy and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine. And as for the Sacrament, I believe as I have taught in my book against the bishop of Winchester, the which my book teacheth so true a doctrine of the Sacrament, that it shall stand at the last day before the judgment of God, where the papistical doctrine contrary thereto shall be ashamed to shew her face."

Here the standers by were all astonished, marvelled, were amazed, did look one upon another, whose expectation he had so notably deceived. Some began to admonish him of his Recantation, and to accuse him of falshood. Briefly it was a world to see the doctors beguiled of so great an hope. I think there was never cruelty more notably or better in time deluded and deceived. For it is not to be doubted but they looked for a glorious victory and a perpetual triumph by this man's retractation. Who as soon as they heard these things, began to let down their ears, to rage, fret, and fume; and so much the more, because they could not revenge their grief; for they could now no longer threaten or hurt him. For the most miserable man in the world can die but once: and whereas of necessity he must needs die that day, though the Papists had been never so well pleased: now being never so much offended with him, yet could he not be twice killed of them. And so when they could do nothing else unto him, yet lest they should say nothing, they ceased not to object unto him his falshood and dissimulation. Unto which accusation he answered, Ah my masters (quoth he) do not you take it so. Always since I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of falshood, and a lover of simplicity, and never before this time have I dissembled; and in saying this, all the tears that remained in his body, appeared in his eyes. And when he began to speak more of the Sacrament and of the Papacy, some of them began to cry out, yelp, and bawl, and specially Cole cried out upon him: Stop the heretic's mouth and take him away.—And then Cranmer being pulled down from the stage was led to the fire, accompanied with those friars, vexing, troubling, and threatening him most cruelly. What madness (say they) hath brought thee again into this error, by which thou wilt draw innumerable souls with thee into hell? To whom he answered nothing, but directed all his talk to the people, saying that to one troubling him in the way he spake, and exhorted him to get him home to his study, and apply his book diligently, saying, if he did diligently call upon God, by reading more he should get knowledge. But the other Spanish barker, raging and foaming, was almost out of his wits, always having this in his mouth, Non fecisti? Didest thou it not? But when he came to the place where the holy bishops and martyrs of God, Hugh Latimer and Ridley, were burnt before him for the confession of the truth, kneeling down he prayed to God, and not long tarrying in his prayers, putting off his garments to his shirt, he prepared himself to death. His shirt was made long down to his feet. His feet were bare. Likewise his head, when both his caps were off, was so bare, that one hair could not be seen upon it. His beard was long and thick, covering his face with marvellous gravity. Such a countenance of gravity moved the hearts both of his friends, and of his enemies.

Then the Spanish friars John and Richard, of whom mention was made before, began to exhort him and play their parts with him, afresh but with vain and lost labour. Cranmer with stedfast purpose abiding in the profession of his doctrine, gave his hand to certain old men, and other that stood by bidding them farewell.—And when he had thought to have done so likewise to Ely, the said Ely drew back his hand and refused, saying, it was not lawful to salute heretics, and specially such a one as falsely returned unto the opinions that he had forsworn. And if he had known before that he would have done so, he would never have used his company so familiarly, and clad those sergeants and citizens, which had not refused to give him their hands. This Ely was a priest lately made, and student in divinity, being then one of the fellows of Brasen-nose. Then was an iron chain tied about Cranmer, whom when they perceived to be more stedfast than that he could be moved from his sentence, they commanded the fire to be set unto him.

And when the wood was kindled, and the fire began to burn near him, stretching out his arms, he put his right hand into the flame, which he held so stedfast and immoveable (saving that once with the same hand he wiped his face) that all men might see his hand burned before his body was touched. His body did so abide the burning of the flame with such constancy and steadfastness, that standing always in one place without moving his body, he seemed to move no more than the stake to which he was bound; his eyes were lifted up into heaven, and oftentimes he repeated his unworthy right hand, so long as his voice would suffer him; and using often the words of Stephen, 'Lord Jesus receive my spirit,' in the greatness of the flame he gave up the ghost.*

This fortitude of mind, which perchance is rare and not found among the Spaniards, when friar John saw, he said it came not of fortitude, but of desperation, although such manner of examples which are of the like constancy, have been common here in England, ran to the lord Williams of Tame, crying that the archbishop was vexed in mind, and died in great desperation. But he which was not ignorant of the archbishop's constancy, being unknown to the Spaniards, smiled only, and (as it were) by silence rebuked the friar's folly. And this was the end of this learned archbishop, whom, lest by evil subscribing he should have perished, by well recanting God preserved: and lest he should have lived longer with shame and reproach, it pleased God rather to take him away, to the glory of his name and profit of his church. So good was the Lord both to his church in fortifying the same with the testimony and blood of such a martyr, and so good also to the man with this cross of tribulation, to purge his offences in this world, not only of his recantation, but also of his standing against John Lambert and Mr. Allen, or if there were any other, with whose burning and blood his hands had been before any thing polluted. But especially he had to rejoice, that dying in such a cause he was to be numbered amongst Christ's martyrs, much more worthy the name of Saint Thomas of Canterbury, than he whom the pope falsely before did canonise.

And thus have you the full Story concerning the Life and Death of this reverend archbishop and martyr of God, Thomas Cranmer, and also of divers other the learned sort of Christ's martyrs burned in queen Mary's time, of whom this archbishop was the last, being burnt about the very middle time of the reign of that queen, and almost the very middle man of all the martyrs which were burned in all her reign besides. Now after the Life and Story of this foresaid archbishop discoursed, let us adjoin withal his Letters, beginning first with his famous Letter to queen Mary, which he wrote unto her incontinent after he was cited up to Rome by

* On the same day that Cranmer ended his life, (says bishop Godwin) cardinal Pole took sacerdotal orders at Greenwich; and the next day, Naboth being dead, he possessed himself of his vineyard, being consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. Three days afterwards, on the feast of annunciation, attended by many of the nobility to Bow-church, he received the pall with great pomp and ceremony.

LETTERS OF DR. THOMAS CRANMER, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

To the Queen's Highness.

"It may please your majesty to pardon my presumption, that I dare be so bold to write to your highness. But very necessity constraineth me, that your majesty may know my mind, rather by mine own writing than by other men's reports. So it is that upon Wednesday, being the twelfth day of this month, I was cited to appear at Rome the 20th day after, there to make answer to such matters as should be objected against me upon the behalf of the king, and your most excellent majesty, which matters the Thursday following were objected against me by Dr. Martin, and Dr. Story your majesty's proctors before the bishop of Gloucester, sitting in judgment by commission from Rome. But (alas) it cannot but grieve the heart of a natural subject, to be accused of the king and queen of his own realm; and specially before an outward judge, or by authority coming from any person out of this realm: where the king and queen, as if they were subjects within their own realm, shall complain, and require justice at a stranger's hands against their own subject, being already condemned to death by their own laws. As though the king and queen could not do or have justice within their own realms against their own subjects, but they must seek it at strangers hands in a strange land; the like whereof (I think) was never seen. I would have wished to have had some meaner adversaries: and I think that death shall not grieve me much more, than to have my most dread and most gracious sovereign lord and lady, to whom under God I do own all obedience, to be mine accusers in judgment within their own realm, before any stranger and outward power. But forasmuch as in the time of the prince of most famous memory king Henry 8th your grace's father, I was sworn never to consent, that the bishop of Rome should have or exercise any authority or jurisdiction in this realm of England, therefore lest I should allow his authority contrary to mine oath, I refused to make answer to the bishop of Gloucester sitting here in judgment by the pope's authority, lest I should run into perjury.—Another cause why I refused the pope's authority is this, that his authority, as he claimeth it, repugneth to the crown imperial of this realm, and to the laws of the same; which every true subject is bound to defend. First, for that the pope saith, that all manner of power, as well temporal as spiritual, is given first to him of God; and that the temporal power he giveth unto emperors and kings, to use it under him, but so as it be always at his commandment and beck.—But contrary to this claim, the imperial crown and jurisdiction temporal of this realm is taken immediately from God, to be used under him only, and is subject unto none, but to God alone.

Moreover, to the imperial laws and customs of this realm the king in his coronation, and all justices when they receive their offices, be sworn, and all the whole realm is bound to defend and maintain. But contrary hereunto, the pope by his authority maketh void, and commandeth to blot out of our books, all laws and customs being repugnant to his laws, and declareth accused all rulers and governors, all the makers, writers, and executors of such laws or customs; as it appeareth by many of the pope's laws, whereof one or two I shall release. In the decrees dist. 10. is written thus, 'Constitutiones contra canones & decreta præsulum Romanorum vel bonos mores, nullius sunt inopimenti.' That is, The constitutions or statutes enacted against the canons and decrees of the bishops of Rome or their good customs, are of none effect. Also 'extra. de sententia excommunicationis, novcrit, excommunicamus omnes hæreticos utriusque sexus, quocunque nomine censentur, & fautores, & receptores, & defensores eorum; nec non & qui de cætero servari fecerint statuta edita & consuetudines contra ecclesie libertatem, nisi ea de capitularibus suis intra duos menses post hujusmodi publicationem sententie fecerint amoveri.' Item, excommunicamus statuarios, & scriptores statutorum ipsorum, nec non potestates, consules, rectores, & consiliarios locorum, ubi de cætera hujusmodi statuta & consuetudines editæ fuerint vel servatæ; nec non & illos qui secundum ea presumpserint judicare, vel in publicam formam scribere judicata.' That is to say, We excommunicate all heretics of both sexes, what name soever they be called by, and their fautors, and receptors, and defenders; and also them that shall hereafter cause to be observed the statutes and customs made against the liberty of the church, except they cause the same to be put out of their records and chapters within two months after the publication thereof. Also we excommunicate the statute makers and writers of those statutes, and all the potestates, consuls, governors and counsellors of places, where such statutes and customs shall be made or kept; and also those that shall presume to give judgment according to them, or shall notify in public form the matter so adjudged.—Now by these laws, if the bishop of Rome's authority which he claimeth by God, be lawful, all your grace's laws and customs of your realm, being contrary to the pope's laws, be nought, and as well your majesty, as your judges, justices, and all other executors of the same, stand accused amongst heretics, which God forbid. And yet this curse can never be avoided (if the pope have such power as he claimeth) until such times as the laws and customs of this realm, being contrary to his laws, be taken away and blotted out of the law books. And although there be many laws of this realm contrary to the laws of Rome, yet I named but a few; as to convict a clerk before any temporal judge of this realm for debt, felony, murder, or for any other crime; which clerks by the pope's laws be so exempt from the king's laws, that they can be nowhere sued but before their ordinary.—Also the pope by his laws may give all bishoprics and benefices spiritual; which by the laws of this realm can be given but only by the king and other patrons of the same, except they fall into the lapse. By the pope's laws, jus patronatus shall be sued only before the ecclesiastical judge; but by the laws of the realm it shall be sued before the temporal judge.—And to be short, the laws of this realm do agree with the pope's laws like fire and water. And yet the kings of this realm have provided for their laws by the premunire; so that if any man have let the execution of the laws of this realm by any authority from the see of Rome, he falleth into the premunire. But to meet with this, the popes have provided for their laws by cursing. For whosoever letteth the pope's laws to have full course within this realm, by the pope's power standeth accursed. So that the pope's power treadeth all the laws and customs of this realm under his feet, cursing all that execute them, until such time as they do give place unto his laws.—But it may be said, that notwithstanding all the pope's decrees, yet we do execute still the laws and customs of this realm. Nay, not all quietly without interruption of the pope. And where we do execute them, yet we do it unjustly, if the pope's power be of force, and for the same we stand excommunicate, and shall do, until we leave the execution of our own laws and customs. Thus we be well reconciled to Rome, allowing such authority, whereby the realm standeth accursed before God, if the pope have any such authority.—These things, as I suppose, were not fully opened in the parliament-house, when the pope's authority was received again within this realm; for if they had, I do not believe that either the king or queen's majesty, or the nobles of this realm, or the commons of the same would ever have consented to receive again such a foreign authority, so injurious, hurtful, and prejudicial as well to the crown, as to the laws and customs and state of this realm, as whereby they must needs acknowledge themselves to be accursed. But none could open this matter well but the clergy, and such of them as had read the pope's laws, whereby the pope had made himself as it were a god. These seek to maintain the pope whom they desired to have their chief head, to the intent they might have as it were a kingdom and laws within themselves, distinct from the laws of the crown, and wherewith the crown may not meddle; and so being exempted from the laws of the realm, might live in this realm like lords and kings, without damage or fear of any man, so that they please their high and supreme head at Rome. For this consideration, I ween, some that knew the truth, held their peace in the parliament, whereas if they had done their duties to the crown and whole realm, they should have opened their mouths, declared the truth, and shewed the perils and dangers that might ensue to the crown and realm.—And if I should agree to allow such authority within this realm, whereby I must needs confess, that your most gracious highness, and also your realm should ever continue accursed, until ye shall cease from the execution of your own laws and customs of your realm; I could not think myself true either to your highness, or to this my natural country, knowing that I do know. Ignorance, I know, may excuse other men; but he that knoweth how prejudicial and injurious the power and authority which he challengeth every where, is to the crown, laws, and customs of this realm, and yet will allow the same, I cannot see in any wise how he can keep his due allegiance, fidelity, and truth to the crown and state of this realm.—Another cause I alledged, why I could not allow the authority of the pope, which is this; that by his authority he subverteth not only the laws of this realm, but also the laws of God: so that whosoever be under his authority, he suffereth them not to be under Christ's religion purely, as Christ did command. And for one example I brought forth, that whereas by God's laws all Christian people be bounden diligently to learn his word, that they may know how to believe and live accordingly, for that purpose he ordained holidays, when they ought, leaving apart all other business, to give themselves wholly to know and serve God. Therefore God's will and commandment is, that when the people be gathered together, ministers should use such language as the people may understand and take profit thereby, or else hold their peace. For as an harp or lute, if it give no certain sound that men may know what is stricken, who can dance after it? for all the sound is in vain; so is it in vain, and profiteth nothing, saith Almighty God by the mouth of saint Paul, if the priest speak to the people in a language which they know not; for else he may profit himself: but profiteth not the people, saith saint Paul. But herein I was answered thus; that saint Paul spake only of preaching, that the preacher should preach in a tongue which the people did know, or else his preaching availeth nothing; but if the preaching availeth nothing, being spoken in a language which the people understand not, how should any other service avail them, being spoken in the same language? And yet that saint Paul meant not only of preaching, it appeareth plainly by his own word. For he speaketh by name expressly of praying, singing, and thanking of God, and of all other things which the priests say in the churches, whereunto the people say amen; which they use not in preaching, but in other divine service: that whether the priests rehearse the wonderful works of God, or the great benefits of God unto mankind above all other creatures, or give thanks unto God, or make open profession of their faith, or humble confession of their sins, with earnest request of mercy and forgiveness, or make suit or request unto God for any thing; then all the people understanding what the priests say, might give their minds and voices with them, and say amen, that is to say, allow what the priests say, that the rehearsal of God's universal works and benefits, the giving of thanks, the profession of faith, the confession of sins, and the requests and petitions of the priests and of the people might ascend up into the ears of God altogether, and be as a sweet savour, odour, and incense in his nose; and thus was it used many hundred years after Christ's ascension. But the aforesaid things cannot be done when the priests speak to the people in a language not known, and so they, or their clerk in their name, say Amen, but they cannot tell whereunto. Whereas saint Paul saith, How can the people say Amen to thy well saying, when they understand not what thou sayest? And thus was saint Paul understood of all interpreters, both the Greeks and Latins, old and new, school authors and other that I have read, until above thirty years past. At which time one Eckius with other of his sort began to devise a new exposition, understanding St. Paul of preaching only.—But when a good number of the best learned men reputed within this realm, some favouring the old, some the new learning, as they term it, (where indeed that which they call the old, is the new, and that which they call the new, is indeed the old) but when a great number of such learned men of both sorts, were gathered together at Windsor, for the reformation of the service of the church; it was agreed by both, without controversy, not one saying contrary, that the service of the church ought to be in the mother tongue, and that saint Paul in the fourteenth chapter to the Corinthians was so to be understood. And so is saint Paul to be understood in the civil law, more than a thousand years past, where Justinianus, a most godly emperor in a synod writeth on this manner: 'Jubemus ut omnes Episcopi pariter & presbyteri non tacito modo, sed clara voce, quæ à fideli populo exaudiatur, sacram oblationem & preces in sacro Bapismate adhibitas celebrent, quo majori exinde devotione in depromendis Domini Dei laudibus audientium animi afficiantur. Ita enim & Divus Paulus docet in Epistola ad Corinth. Si solummodo benedicat spiritus, quomodo is qui privati locum tenet; dicet ad gratiarum actionem tuam, Amen? quandoquidem quid dicas non videt. Tu quidem pulchre gratias agis, alter autem non edificatur.' That is to say, We command that all bishops and priests celebrate the holy oblation and prayers used in holy baptism, not after a still close manner, but with a clear loud voice, that they may be plainly heard of the faithful people, so as the hearers minds may be lifted up thereby with the greater devotion, in uttering the praises of the Lord God. For so Paul teacheth also in the Epistle to the Corinthians, 'If the spirit do only bless, or say well, how shall he that occupieth the place of a private person, say, Amen, to thy thanksgiving? for he perceiveth not what thou sayest. Thou doest give thanks well, but the other is not edified.' And not only the civil law, and all other writers a thousand and five hundred years continually together have expounded saint Paul not of preaching, only, but of other service said in the church: but also reason giveth the same, that if men be commanded to hear any thing, it must be spoken in a language which the hearers understand, or else, as saint Paul saith, what availeth it to hear? So that the pope giving a contrary commandment, that the people coming to the church shall hear they wot not what, and shall answer they know not whereto, taketh upon him to command, not only against reason, but also directly against God.—And again I said, whereas our Saviour Christ ordained the sacrament of his most precious body and blood to be received of all Christian people under the forms of bread and wine, and said of the cup, 'Drink ye all of this:' the pope giveth a clean contrary commandment, that no lay man shall drink of the cup of their salvation; as though the cup of salvation by the blood of Christ pertained not to lay men. And whereas Theophilus Alexandricus, whose works saint Hierome did translate about eleven hundred years past, saith, 'That if Christ had been crucified for the devils, his cup should not be denied them;' yet the pope denieth the cup of Christ to Christian people, for whom Christ was crucified. So that if I should obey the pope in these things, I must needs disobey my Saviour Christ.—But I was answered hereunto, as commonly the papists do answer, that under the form of bread is whole Christ's flesh and blood: so that who-soever receiveth the form of bread, receiveth as well Christ's blood as his flesh. Let it be so, yet in the form of bread only, Christ's blood is not drunk, but eaten; nor is it received in the cup in the form of wine, as Christ commanded, but eaten with the flesh under the form of bread. And moreover, the bread is not the sacrament of his blood, but of his flesh only; nor is the cup the sacrament of his flesh, but of his blood only. And so the pope keepeth from all lay persons, the sacrament of their redemption by Christ's blood, which Christ commandeth to be given unto them.—And furthermore, Christ ordained the sacrament in two kinds, the one separated from the other, to be a representation of his death, where his blood was separated from his flesh, which is not represented in one kind alone: So that the lay people receive not the whole sacrament whereby Christ's death is represented as he commanded.—Moreover, as the pope taketh upon him to give the temporal sword, by royal and imperial power, to kings and princes: so doth he likewise take upon him to depose them from their imperial states, if they be disobedient to him, and commandeth the subjects to disobey their princes, assoyling the subjects as well of their obedience, as of their lawful oaths made unto their true kings and princes, directly contrary to God's commandment, who commandeth all subjects to obey their kings, or their rulers under them.—One John, patriarch of Constantinople, in the time of St. Gregory claimed superiority above all other bishops. To whom St. Gregory writeth, that therein he did injury to his three brethren, which were equal with him, that is to say, the bishop of Rome, the bishop of Alexandria, and of Antiochia: which three were patriarchal sees; as well as Constantinople, and were brethren one to another. But, saith St. Gregory, if any one shall exalt himself above all the rest, to be the universal bishop, the same passeth in pride. But now the bishop of Rome exalteth himself not only above all kings and emperors, and above all the whole world, but takes upon him to give and take away, to set up and pull down, as he shall think good. And as the devil having no such authority, yet took upon him to give unto Christ all the kingdoms of the world, if he would fall down and worship him: in like manner the pope taketh upon him to give empires and kingdoms being none of his, to such as will fall down and worship him, and kiss his feet.—And moreover, his layes and glosses so flatter him, that they fain he may command emperors and kings to hold his stirrup when he lighteth upon his horse, and to be his footmen: and that, if any emperor and king give him any thing, they give him nothing but that is his own, and that he may dispense against God's word, against both the old and new Testament, against St. Paul's epistles, and against the gospel. And furthermore whatsoever he doth, although he draw innumerable people by heaps with himself into hell, yet may no mortal man reprove him, because he being judge of all men, may be judged of no man. And thus he sitteth in the temple of God, as if he were a god, and nameth himself God's vicar, and yet he dispenseth against God. If this be not to play Antichrist's part, I cannot tell what is Antichrist, which is no more to say, but Christ's enemy and adversary: who shall sit in the temple of God, advancing himself above all other, yet by hypocrisy and feigned religion, shall subvert the true religion of Christ, and under pretence and colour of Christian religion shall work against Christ, and therefore hath the name of Antichrist, and therefore hath the name of Antichrist. Now if any man lift himself higher than the pope hath done, who lifteth himself above all the world; or can be more adversary to Christ, than to dispense against God's laws, and where Christ hath given any commandment, to command directly the contrary, that man must needs be taken for Antichrist. But until the time that such a person may be found, men may easily conjecture where to find Antichrist.—Wherefore, seeing the pope thus to overthrow both God's laws and man's laws, taketh upon him to make emperors and kings to be vassals and subjects unto him, especially the crown of this realm, with the laws and customs of the same; I see no mean how I may consent to admit his usurped power within this realm, contrary to mine oath, mine obedience to God's law, mine allegiance and duty to your majesty, and my love and affection to this realm.—Thus that I have spoken against the power and authority of the pope, I have not spoken, I take God to record and judge, for any malice I owe to the pope's person, whom

I know not, but I shall pray to God to give him grace, that he may seek above all things to promote God's honour and glory, and not to follow the trade of his predecessors in these latter days.—Nor have I spoken it for fear of punishment, and to avoid the same, thinking it rather an occasion to aggravate than to diminish my trouble; but I have spoken it for my most bounden duty to the crown, liberties, laws, and customs of this realm of England, but most specially to discharge my conscience in uttering the truth to God's glory, casting away all fear by the comfort which I have in Christ, who saith; 'Fear not them that kill the body, and cannot kill the soul, but fear him that can cast both body and soul into hell fire.' He that for fear to lose this life will forsake the truth, shall lose the everlasting life: And he that for the truth's sake will spend his life, shall find everlasting life. And Christ promiseth to stand fast with them before his Father, which will stand fast with him here. Which comfort is so great, that whosoever hath his eyes fixed upon Christ, cannot greatly pass on this life, knowing that he may be sure to have Christ stand by him in the presence of his Father in heaven.—And as touching the sacrament, I said; Forasmuch as the whole matter standeth in the understanding of these words of Christ: 'This is my body; this is my blood.' I said that Christ in these words made demonstration of the bread and wine, and spake figuratively, calling bread his body, and wine his blood, because he ordained them to be sacraments of his body and blood. And where the papists say in those two points contrary unto me, that Christ called not bread his body, but a substance uncertain, nor spake figuratively: herein I said I would be judged by the old Church, and which doctrine could be proved the elder, that I would stand unto. And forasmuch as I have alleged in my book many old authors, both Greeks and Latins, which above a thousand years after Christ continually taught as I do; if they could bring forth but one old author, that saith in these two points as they say, I offered six or seven years ago, and do offer yet still, that I will give place unto them.—But when I bring forth any author that saith in most plain terms as I do, yet saith the other part, that the authors meant not so; as who should say, that the authors spake one thing, and meant clean contrary. And upon the other part, when they cannot find any one author, that saith in words as they say; yet say they, that the authors meant as they say. Now, whether I or they speak more to the purpose herein, I refer me to the judgment of all indifferent hearers; yea the old church of Rome, above a thousand years together, neither believed nor used the Sacrament, as the church of Rome hath done of late years.—For in the beginning, the church of Rome taught a pure and a sound doctrine of the Sacrament. But after that the church of Rome fell into a new doctrine of transubstantiation; with the doctrine they changed the use of the Sacrament contrary to that Christ commanded, and the old church of Rome used above a thousand years. And yet to deface the old, they say that the new is the old; wherein for my part I am content to stand to the trial. But their doctrine is so fond and uncomfortable, that I marvel that any man would allow it, if he knew what it is. But howsoever they bear the people in hand, that which they write in their books, hath neither truth nor comfort.—For by their doctrine, of one body of Christ is made two bodies; one natural, having distance of members, with form and proportion of man's perfect body, and this body is in heaven; but the body of Christ in the Sacrament, by their own doctrine, must needs be a monstrous body, having neither distance of members, nor form, fashion or proportion of a man's natural body. And such a body is in the Sacrament, teach they, and goeth into the mouth with the form of bread, and entereth no further than the form of bread goeth, nor tarrieth no longer than the form of bread is by natural heat in digesting. So that when the form of bread is digested, that body of Christ is gone. And forasmuch as evil men be as long in digesting as good men, the body of Christ, by their doctrine, entereth as far, and tarrieth as long in wicked men as in godly men. And what comfort can be herein to any Christian man, to receive Christ's unshapen body, and it to enter no further than the stomach, and to depart by and by as soon as the bread is consumed?—It seemeth to me a more sound and comfortable doctrine, that Christ hath but one body, and that hath form and fashion of a man's true body; which body spiritually entereth into the whole man, body and soul: and though the Sacrament be consumed, yet whole Christ remaineth, and feedeth the receiver unto eternal life, if he continue in godliness, and never departeth until the receiver forsake him. And as for the wicked, they have not Christ within them at all, who cannot be where Belial is. And this is my faith, and, as me seemeth, a sound doctrine, according to God's word, and sufficient for a Christian to believe in that matter. And if it can be shewed unto me, that the pope's authority is not prejudicial to the things before mentioned, or that my doctrine in the Sacrament is erroneous, which I think cannot be shewed, then I never was nor will be so perverse to stand wilfully in mine own opinion, but I shall with all humility submit myself unto the pope, not only to kiss his feet, but another part also.—Another cause why I refused to take the bishop of Gloucester for my judge, was the respect of his own person, being more than once perjured. First, for that he being divers times sworn never to consent that the bishop of Rome should have any jurisdiction within this realm, but to take the king and his successors for supreme heads of this realm, as by God's laws they be: contrary to that lawful oath the said bishop sat then in judgment by authority from Rome, wherein he was perjured, and not worthy to sit as a judge.—The second perjury was, that he took his bishopric both of the queen's majesty and of the pope, making to each of them a solemn oath; which oaths be so contrary, that the one must needs be perjured. And furthermore in swearing to the pope to maintain his laws, decrees, constitutions, ordinances, reservations, and provisions, he declareth himself an enemy to the imperial crown, and to the laws and state of this realm, whereby he declareth himself not worthy to sit as a judge within this realm. And for these considerations I refused to take him for my judge."

This was written in another Letter to the Queen.

"I LEARNED by doctor Martin, that at the day of your majesty's coronation, you took an oath of obedience to the pope of Rome, and the same time you took another oath to this realm, to maintain the laws, liberties, and customs of the same. And if your majesty did make an oath to the pope, I think it was according to the other oaths which he useth to minister to princes; which is, to be obedient to him, to defend his person, to maintain his authority, honour, laws, lands and privileges. And if it be so, which I know not but by report, then I beseech your majesty to look upon your oath made to the crown and realm, and to expend and weigh the two oaths together, to see how they do agree, and then do as your grace's conscience shall give you: For I am surely persuaded, that willingly your majesty will not offend, nor do against your conscience for any thing.—But I fearine that there be contradictions in your oaths, and that those which should have informed your grace thoroughly, did not their duties therein. And if your majesty ponder the two oaths diligently, I think you shall perceive you were deceived; and then your highness may use the matter as God shall put in your heart. Furthermore, I am kept here from company of learned men, from books, from counsel, from pen and ink, saving at this time to write unto your majesty, which all were necessary for a man being in my case. Wherefore I beseech your majesty, that I may have such of these as may stand with your majesty's pleasure. And as for my appearance at Rome, if your majesty will give me leave, I will appear there. And I trust that God shall put in my mouth to defend his truth there, as well as here. But I refer it wholly to your majesty's pleasure."

Another Letter of the Archbishop to Dr. Martin and Dr. Story.

"I HAVE me commended unto you. And as I promised, I have sent my letters unto the queen's majesty unsigned, praying you to sign them, and deliver them with all speed. I might have sent them by the carrier sooner, but not surer. But hearing master bailiff say, that he would go to the court on Friday, I thought him a meet messenger to send my letters by. For better is later and surer, than sooner, and never to be delivered. Yet one thing I have written to the queen's majesty inclosed and sealed; which I require you may be so delivered without delay, and not be opened until it be delivered unto her grace's own hands. I have written all that I remember I said, except that which I spake against the bishop of Gloucester's own person, which I thought not meet to write. And in some places I have written more than I said, which I would have answered to the bishop if you would have suffered me.

You promised I should see mine answers to the sixteen Articles, that I might correct, amend, and change them where I thought good, which your promise you kept not. And mine answer was not made upon my oath, nor repeated, nor made in Judicio, but extra Judicium, as I protested; nor to the bishop of Gloucester as judge, but to you the king's and queen's proctors. I trust you deal sincerely with me without fraud or craft, and use me as you would wish to be in like case yourselves. Remember, that Qua mensura mensi fueritis, eadem remetiatur vobis, i. What measure you mete, the same shall be measured to you again. Thus fare you well, and God send you his spirit to induce you into truth."

Ye heard before how the archbishop Dr. Cranmer in the month of February was cited up to Rome, and in the month of March next following was degraded by the bishop of Ely and bishop Bonner. In time of which his degradation he put up his Appellation. In this his Appellation, because he needed the help of some good and godly lawyer, he writeth to a certain friend of his about the same: the copy of which letter in Latin is before expressed in the old book of Acts, there to be read, page 1492. The English of the same I thought good here to insert, as under ensueth:

"THE law of nature requireth of all men, that so far forth as it may be done without offence, to God, every one should seek to defend and preserve his own life. Which thing, when I about three days ago bethought myself of, and therewithal remembered how that Martin Luther appealed in his time from pope Leo the 10th; to a general council, lest I should seem rashly and unadvisedly to cast away myself, I determined to appeal in like sort to some lawful and free general council. But seeing the order and form of an appeal pertaineth to the lawyers, whereof I myself am ignorant, and seeing that Luther's appeal cometh not to my hand, I purposed to break my mind in this matter to some faithful friend and skilful in the law, whose help I might use in this behalf, and you only among other came to my remembrance as a man most meet in this university for my purpose. But this is a matter that requireth great silence, so that no man know of it before it be done. It is so that I am summoned to make mine answer at Rome, the 16th day of this month; before the which day I think it good, after sentence pronounced, to make mine Appeal. But whether I should first appeal from the judge delegate to the pope, and so afterward to the general council, or else leaving the pope, I should appeal immediately to the council, herein I stand in need of your counsel.—Many causes there be for the which I think good to appeal. First, because I am by an oath bound never to consent to the receiving of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm. Besides this, whereas I utterly refused to make answer to the articles objected unto me by the bishop of Gloucester, appointed by the pope to be my judge, yet I was content to answer Martin and Story, with this protestation, that mine answer should not be taken as made before a judge, nor yet in place of judgment, but as pertaining nothing to judgment at all; and moreover, after I had made mine answer, I required to have a copy of the same, that I might either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good. The which though both the bishop of Gloucester, and also the king and queen's proctors promised me, yet have they altogether broken promise with me, and have not permitted me to correct my said answers, according to my request, and yet notwithstanding have, as I understand, registered the same as acts formally done in place of judgment.—Finally, forasmuch as all this my trouble cometh upon my departing from the bishop of Rome, and from the popish religion, so that now the quarrel is betwixt the pope himself and me, and no man can be a lawful and indifferent judge in his own cause, it seemeth, methinks, good reason, that I should be suffered to appear to some general council in this matter; specially seeing the law of nature, as they say, denieth no man the remedy of appeal in such cases.—Now, since it is very requisite that this matter should be kept as close as may be, if perhaps for lack of perfect skill herein you shall have need of further advice; then I beseech you even for the fidelity and love you bear to me in Christ, that you will open to no creature alive whose the case is. And forasmuch as the time is now at hand, and the matter requireth great expedition, let me obtain thus much of you, I beseech you, that laying aside all other your studies and business for the time, you will apply this my matter only, till you have brought it to pass. The chiefest cause in very deed, to tell you the truth, of this mine appeal is, that I might gain time, if it shall so please God, to live until I have finished mine answer against Marcus Antonius Constantius, which I have now in hand. But if the adversaries of the truth will not admit mine appeal, as I fear they will not, God's will be done; I pass not upon it, so that God may therein be glorified, be it by my life, or by my death. For it is much better for me to die in Christ's quarrel and to reign with him; than here to be shut up, and kept in the prison of this body, unless it were to continue yet still awhile in this warfare, for the commodity and profit of my brethren, and to the further advancing of God's glory. To whom be all glory for evermore, Amen.—There is also yet another cause why I think good to appeal, that whereas I am cited to go to Rome to answer there for myself, I am notwithstanding kept here fast in prison, that I cannot there appear at the time appointed. And moreover, forasmuch as the state I stand in is a matter of life and death, so that I have great need of learned council for my defence in this behalf; yet when I made my earnest request for the same, all manner of counsel and help of proctors, advocates and lawyers was utterly denied me. Your loving friend, Tho. CRANMER."

VOL. I.

"THE true comforter in all distress is only God, through his son Jesus Christ; and whosoever hath him, hath company enough although he were in a wilderness all alone: and be that hath twenty thousand in his company, if God be absent, is in a miserable wilderness and desolation. In him is all comfort, and without him is none. Wherefore I beseech you seek your dwelling there where as you may truly and rightly serve God, and dwell in him, and have him ever dwelling in you. What can be so heavy a burden as an unquiet conscience, to be in such a place as a man cannot be suffered to serve God in Christ's religion? If you be loath to depart from your kin and friends, remember that Christ calleth them his mother, sisters and brothers, that do his Father's will. Where we find therefore God truly honoured according to his will, there we can lack neither friend nor kin.—If you be loath to depart for the slandering of God's word, remember that Christ, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country unto Samaria, to avoid the malice of the Scribes and Pharisees; and commanded his apostles that if they were pursued in one place, they should fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a basket out at a window, to avoid the persecution of Aretas? And what wisdom and policy he used from time to time to escape the malice of his enemies, the Acts of the apostles do declare. And after the same sort did the other apostles; albeit, when it came to such a point, that they could no longer escape danger of the persecutors of God's true religion, then they shewed themselves, that they flying before came not of fear, but of godly wisdom to do more good; and that they would not rashly without urgent necessity offer themselves to death, which had been but a temptation of God. Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they stood boldly to the profession of Christ; then they shewed how little they passed of death: how much they feared God more than men, how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this short and miserable life. Wherefore I exhort you as well by Christ's commandment, as by the example of him and his apostles, to withdraw yourself from the malice of yours and God's enemies, into some place where God is most purely served, which is no slandering of the truth, but a preserving of yourself to God, and the truth, and to the society and comfort of Christ's little flock. And that you will do, do it with speed, lest by your own folly you fall into the persecutors hands. And the Lord send his holy spirit to lead and guide you wheresoever you go, and all that be godly will say, Amen."

Unto these former Letters of Dr. Cranmer archbishop, written by him unto others, it seemeth to me not much out of place to annex withal a certain Letter also of Dr. Taylor, written to him and his fellow-prisoners: the tenor of which letter here followeth:

"To my dear fathers, and brethren, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Dr. Latimer, prisoners in Oxford, for the faithful testimony of God's holy word. Right reverend fathers in the Lord, I wish you to enjoy continually God's grace and peace through Jesus Christ; and God be praised again for this your most excellent promotion which ye are called unto at this present, that is, that ye are counted worthy to be allowed amongst the number of Christ's records and witnesses. England hath had but a few learned bishops, that would stick to Christ ad ignem inclusive. Once again I thank God heartily in Christ for your most happy onset, most valiant proceeding, most constant suffering of all such infamies, hissings, clappings, taunts, open rebukes, loss of living and liberty, for the defence of God's cause, truth, and glory. I cannot utter with pen how I rejoice in my heart for you three such captains in the foreward under Christ's cross, banner, or standard in such a cause and skirmish, when not only one or two of our dear Redeemer's strong holds are besieged, but all his chief castles ordained for our safeguard, are traitorously impugned. This your enterprise in the sight of all that be in heaven, and of all God's people in earth, is most pleasant to behold. This is another manner of nobility, than to be in the fore front in worldly warfares. For God's sake pray for us, for we fail not daily to pray for you. We are stronger and stronger in the Lord, his name be praised, and we doubt not but ye be so in Christ's own sweet school. Heaven is all and wholly of our side; therefore Gaudete in Domino semper, & iterum gaudete & exultate, i. Rejoice always in the Lord: and again, rejoice and be glad. Your assured in Christ, ROWLAND TAYLOR."

Te Cranmere, gravis solum prope fecerat error;
Sed revocas lubricos ad meliora pedes.
Te docuit lapsus magis ut vestigia firmes,

“PAULUS Episcopus servus servorum Dei charissimo in Christo filio Philippo Regi, & charissimæ in Christo filiæ Mariæ Reginae Angliæ, Franciæ, illustribus ac venerabilibus fratribus Londinensi & Eliensi Episcopis salutem, & apostolicam benedictionem. Dudum per literas vestras charissime fili Philippe Rex, & Christiana filia Maria Regina nobis significatur, quod iniquitatis filius Thomas Cranmerus, olim Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis, in hæreses aliaque tam grandia & enormia crimina erat prolapsus, quod non solum regimine ecclesiæ Cantuariensis se reddiderat indignum, verum etiam majori poenæ se fecerat obnoxium. The celebrated Mr. Whiston 'suspected the authenticity of the RECANTATION ascribed to Cranmer, and published a Tract on the subject; which being somewhat curious and very scarce, we here reprint, together with Strype's Account of the Archbishop's Death.

AN ENQUIRY INTO THE EVIDENCE OF ARCHBISHOP CRANMER'S RECANTATION: &c.

BEFORE I give my Reasons for this suspicion, I shall set down the Copy of this Recantation verbatim, from Mr. Fox's Acts and Monuments, p. 666, London, 1641, fol. [Here follows the Recantation, as given in p. 812.]—Thus far in Mr. Fox's Copy: without the addition of any date, or subscription under the archbishop's hand, or any witnesses that it was written by him. The foregoing words indeed are these, 'the Form of which Recantation, made by the friars and doctors, whereto Cranmer subscribed, was this,' whereby it appears that Mr. Fox believed Cranmer did subscribe this entire form. Yet does he add after the form itself, what makes it probable he did not believe he subscribed it himself, but that his name was put to it by some of those prelates and doctors who were then present. 'This Recantation of the archbishop,' says Mr. Fox, 'was not so soon conceived; but the doctors and prelates, without delay, caused the same to be imprinted, and set abroad in all mens hands. Whereunto, for better credit, first was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a solemn subscription. Then followed the witnesses of this Recantation. Henry Svdal, and friar John de Villa Gacina. All this while Cranmer was in no certain assurance of his life; although the same was faithfully promised him by the doctors. But after that they had their purpose, the rest they committed to all adventure, as became men of that religion to do. The queen having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his Recantation very gladly; but of her purpose to put him to death she would nothing relent:' (p. 813). So far Mr. Fox.

A strange story this; that so solemn a Recantation of archbishop Cranmer, primate of all England, should be published as his own, without any other witnesses, than two such obscure persons as Henry Sydal, never, that I know of, afterward heard of, and friar John de Villa Garcia, one brought from Spain to pervert the university of Oxford to Popery.—Now, as to this entire copy of a Recantation, it seems to me to consist of two very different parts: the first part, ending with “without which there is no salvation,” is of such a nature as Cranmer might himself draw up and sign, as literally true and catholic in his opinion: though it must be confessed it is very capable of a popish sense also. The second part is about six times as large; and is such as Cranmer could not possibly draw up, nor subscribe, with truth, in any sense whatsoever. Which two parts are therefore to be accurately distinguished from each other, and considered in quite different views. The former is in stile and language very like that of archbishop Cranmer's; but the other quite different from it. The contents, which declare not only his readiness to renounce all the errors of other people, and to endeavour to follow nothing but what was originally true and sound doctrine, is very agreeable to Cranmer also; who left all the modern notions, and most diligently searched into the New Testament, and the primitive writers, for true and pure christianity. (a) In which search indeed he had been all along truly indefatigable. This confession of ‘one holy and catholic church’ is Cranmer's own declaration, in his Appeal from the pope to a General Council at this very time (p. 805): and his declaring it to be a visible Church he confessed, was then the protestant notion; as we learn by one of the other martyr's confessions, and by Cranmer's stiling the king head of the visible Church, in his Answer to Dr. Martin (p. 781) and both about the very same time also. And as to the additional character of that Church here, that ‘without,’ or ‘out of it there is no Salvation,’ I take it to have been the common doctrine of all at that time, both Protestants and Papists, without exception.—And so far, I suppose, Cranmer might go at this time: especially since he had hopes of saving his life by such a subscription. He might also assure Dr. Cole, who was sent to try whether he abode in his declared purpose, that ‘by God's grace he would daily be more confirmed in the catholic faith,’ (p. 813) of which catholic faith he owned himself to be at his death. He might endeavour to please the queen so far, because she, it seems, insisted that ‘she would have Cranmer a catholic, or else no Cranmer at all,’ that is, that his declaring himself a catholic, was absolutely necessary to his life and restoration; as the friar informed him. And this I suppose was all that Dr. Cole referred to, when he put Cranmer in mind of some promise of his, as he was going to the stake, and which he allowed, viz. ‘that he was to express the true and undoubted Profession of his Faith, that he might take away all suspicion from men; and that all men might understand that he was a catholic indeed.’ (p. 818.) All which passages seem to me to belong to this first part of the present Recantation, and to nothing else.

It is indeed not impossible that he might transcribe some copies of this entire Recantation, as it was proposed to him by the Papists; and those Papists might give out, what they so much wished, that he was disposed to give his consent to the whole; and might print it and publish it, in the way of forgery, as Cranmer's own Recantation: which we shall see great evidence anon that they really did. And for his permission of such copies to go abroad under his hand, he might sorely repent him afterward: as the words he spoke at that stake, to be produced hereafter, would incline one to suppose. However, that he never did either draw up, or really sign this whole pretended Recantation before us, as consenting thereto, the following Arguments will render highly probable:

1. The known Character of abp. Cranmer for sincerity and courage, will not permit us easily to believe that ever he made such a Recantation; much less that he continued in it for about a month or five weeks together, as the present accounts do imply. As to his known sincerity, take his own words, as he spakethem at his death, and which the general course and conduct of his life bear witness to be true. When his adversaries reproached him with recanting at the stake his former Recantation, and thereby being guilty of falshood and dissimulation, he answered, ‘Ah, my masters, do not you take it so. Always since I lived hitherto I have been a hater of falshood, and a lover of simplicity; and never before this time have I dissembled.’ (p. 820). And as to his courage and boldness in his confession, he was one of the most eminent of all our Reformers. He was ever one of the most open and forward speakers and writers for the protestant religion against Popery of all others: as appears through his whole history. Particularly, when he first perceived himself in imminent danger under queen Mary, and her cruel ministers; and was by some advised to fly beyond sea; which in other cases he did not only approve of, but strongly recommend; bishop Burnet informs us that he said, “He would not dissuade others from that course, now that they saw persecution rising: but considering the station he was in, and the hand he had in all the changes that were made, he thought it so indecent a thing for him to fly, that no intreaties should ever persuade him to it.”(b) Bishop Ridley also, just before himself was burnt, “Expressed his great joy for what he heard of Cranmer's godly and fatherly constancy; whose integrity and uprightness, gravity and innocence was known to the whole nation. And be blessed God that had given, in his reverend old age, such a man to be the witness of his truth. For miserable and hard-hearted was he, whom the godliness and constant confession of so worthy, so grave, and so innocent a man would not move to acknowledge and confess his truth."(c) See also Cranmer's large and solemn Appeal from the Pope to a General-Council, delivered in open court on Feb. 14, when he was degraded: which was but ten days before the date of the writ for his burning, and fewer days before the time of this pretended Recantation.

2. The tenor and stile of the first clauses of this Recantation, are very different from the tenor and stile of the rest: the former points are such also as might, with strict truth, be signed by any Protestant or Catholic Christian; but the latter such as could be signed, with truth, by none but by a thorough papist: both which differences have been already observed.

3. This pretended Recantation has no date to it, as bishop Burnet truly observes; and the Copy in Fox assures us. Which yet, in such nice cases, does not use to be omitted. A form of recantation proposed was not to be dated: but a real subscription to it ought not certainly to be without such a date.

4. The main parts of this pretended Recantation at least were drawn up, not by Cranmer, but by certain papists: as is not only clear by their contents, but expressly affirmed by Mr. Fox, in these words, already quoted: "The form of which Recantation, made by the friars and doctors, whereto Cranmer subscribed, was this." Nor is it all probable that the same persons drew up the first clauses of this Recantation who drew up the latter: they are every way so unlike to one another.

5. Thomas Cranmer's name in Fox is not at the end, as his own subscription; but in the beginning only; as it would naturally be in a form proposed to him. Accordingly we shall soon find, that what he agreed to was subscribed by him as his Declaration of his real sentiments: but that this was no more than the first branch of the present form. But of these observations already.

6. What first moved me to suspect this whole matter, was the obscurity, and fowness, and temper of the principal or only actors and witnesses therein, Henry Sydal and friar John de Villa Garcina. These two inconsiderable persons, or chiefly the friar (for we never afterward meet with Henry Sydal in this whole process,) were, it seems, able to persuade the archbishop, and that in a very few days time, to such a Recantation, as neither cardinal Pole, nor any of the other bishops, learned doctors or prelates, during his two years and an half's imprisonment, could do: and this with such arguments, set down in the Acts and Monuments, as were fitter to affright an ignorant and timorous woman, than to convince the very learned and courageous abp. Cranmer. Nor is it easily accountable, how not so much as the Dean of Christ Church, with whom he had lately lived; nor any of his canons; nor any of the heads of the university of Oxford where he was, and was so well known, should appear to have the least hand in either this Conversion of Cranmer, or in his Recantation: no not so much as to be witnesses to his signing it. All this seems to me to look very suspiciously.

7. What Cranmer really signed, was, not a large and public Recantation; but certain Bills or Papers containing only a few words, in a little leaf of paper, as Mr. Fox himself describes it. Which well agrees to the first small branch, which I suppose to have been really Cranmer's; but not so well to this intire Recantation, which is about seven times as long; especially not as made a sort of public instrument, and solemnly signed, with Cranmer's name, and attested by two witnesses, as is pretended. Nor do the number of these Bills or Papers written by Cranmer, which were several by Fox's and Cranmer's own testimonies; and no fewer than seventeen by the testimony of Sanders, at all agree with this one long instrument of Recantation, which his enemies printed and published in his name; but very well to this very short bill or paper at the beginning of it. Of which many copies might soon be written and dispersed by him: and of which he might easily write and sign two copies on the morning he was to suffer, as we are informed he did; but not so easily of the larger Recantation, as the friar pretended.

8. This large Recantation, as pretended to be signed by Cranmer, and published a month or five weeks before his death, very ill agrees with what Mr. Fox relates, as happening the very morning of his execution, viz. that "Friar John, the witness to the former Recantation, brought him a Paper, with Articles; which Cranmer should openly profess in his Recantation before the people; earnestly desiring him that he would write the said Instrument, with the Articles, with his own hand; and sign it with his name." (p. 814). What occasion for all this, if they had an attested Copy of a full Recantation already printed and published, with his own hand subscribed thereto? And stranger it is what follows in Fox, that "He did it:" And that when the friar desired that he would write another copy thereof, which should remain with him, that he did that also.

9. This is still more strange, when we remember, that it was now a month or five weeks since his former Recantation was pretended to have been made and signed by him; and that in hopes of life and preferment, which hopes were now almost all gone; and Cranmer had now prepared himself to recant any such recantation at his death, as Mr. Fox informs us.

10. However, it is plainly incredible, that on the very morning of his execution, Cranmer should write these two copies of his large and full Recantation, and sign them with his own hand, as the sense of his own mind: and yet, "At the very same time, secretly put another paper into his bosom, containing his Prayer for the stake, and his Exhortation to the people; when he designed to declare his abhorrence of any thing like such a Recantation:" which yet is Mr. Fox's account in this place. This is too vile, and impious, and desperate, and jesuitical to be supposed of any common Christian: much less of the most open-hearted, and sincere, and upright, and religious abp. Cranmer. Whether the two Papers that Cranmer is said to have transcribed and signed with his hand, the morning of his execution, at the earnest desire of the Spanish friar, contained the intire Recantation still extant, and only signed as a true copy of what was proposed to him, but he had never consented to: or, whether it were no more than the former clauses of it, which he had given out as his real belief, I cannot certainly determine; but suspect they were these small clauses, and no other. Although the friar, who is said to have procured these copies, and perhaps some other of the Papists also, were very willing they should be confounded. As indeed they have been most fatally confounded to this very day.

11. This Spanish friar, the principal actor in this whole tragedy, when Cranmer, at the stake, declared himself, according to his promises, to die in the catholic faith; but in a sense very different from what he expected; raged, and foamed, and was almost out of his wits, always having this in his mouth, Non fecisti? Did'st thou it not? (p. 821). As if Cranmer did not then own the making such a Recantation, as he had ascribed to him.

12. Although Mr. Fox was made to believe that the queen knew of this full Recantation of Cranmer's, and received it very gladly, and this before Feb. 24th, 1555, when she signed the Writ for his burning; as all that follow him have also supposed; yet does (d) bishop Burnet find it hard to believe, that such a Recantation could be made by him when the danger was so remote; and therefore he supposes it not done till after the Writ was finally sent down to Oxford for his burning, directly contrary to Mr. Fox, to Dr. Cole's Sermon at his burning, and to Sander's History. The reason of this difficulty is obvious: but the foundation of the difficulty is only this, that Cranmer did make that Recantation. Which I confess seems to me not a little incredible.

13. The very Writ for burning Cranmer gives no power to burn him; but as 'pertinaciously holding and defending' his heretical opinions. Which seems to be authentic evidence that the court knew nothing of that large and full Recantation, the friar pretended he had signed in his presence, before the date of that writ for his execution.

14. Had this Recantation been known to be genuine at that time, and made before the going out of the writ for burning Cranmer, by what law did the queen sign such a writ? And by what law did the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford execute it? All ecclesiastical proceedings against heretics still allowing of a Recantation and doing penance, as always sufficient for the offender's preservation. The constant method, even in queen Mary's time, was this, That such heretics must either turn beforehand, or burn; but no farther. Nay, so extensive was this practice then, that though the pretended heretics had been obstinate until they came to the very stake, (e) yet was there frequently a pardon ready for them at that stake, if they would but there make a Recantation. So that this signing, and sending, and executing the writ for the burning of Cranmer, is little less than a demonstration that he had never made such a Recantation as friar John pretended he had.

15. Which demonstration is still farther confirmed, by what bishop Burnet (f) found in the Council Book itself, relating to this pretended Recantation: where we have this most authentic Account; that, "on the 13th of March, (almost three weeks after the date of the Writ for burning Cranmer, as an obstinate heretic,) and eight days before he was burnt, the Privy-council were concerned when they heard Cranmer's Paper of Recantation was printed. Rydall and Copland, two printers, were required to deliver to Cawood, the queen's printer, the Books of his Recantation, to be burned by him." Now since "the doctors and prelates," as Mr. Fox was informed, "caused this Recantation to be printed:" As also that, "the queen received that Recantation very gladly:" if all this had been really true, how comes the queen's Privy-council to dislike it? Nay, to order the remaining copies of this Recantation itself to be delivered up to the queen's printer to be burnt? Had the Privy-council been satisfied that this Recantation was genuine, this procedure seems not a little absurd and incredible. It is much more likely that the Council ordered it to be burnt as a known forgery; and as capable of raising a groundless compassion and indignation in the people; when they should believe Cranmer was become a thorough Roman Catholic, and yet was to be burnt as an obstinate Protestant Heretic.

16. Dr. Cole, in his Funeral Sermon, though he supposes that Cranmer was become a Catholic, and would own himself to die in the Catholic Faith, as he had declared in the first clauses of this Paper; which there is little reason to doubt but he did really write, and really sign; yet does he not pretend he had made any such full and particular Recantation hitherto. Nay, on the contrary, he then charges him with "having been not a secret favourer only; but also a most earnest defender of heretical opinions, even to the end of his life." Nor does the great and uncertain expectation of both Protestants and Papists what religion he would declare himself to be of at his death allow us to suppose he had so long ago, and that very morning also, signed such an intire Recantation.

17. There is still extant a Letter of Cardinal Pole's to Cranmer, of which you have some account in bishop Burnet, which if it were sent to him, as some think, (g) 'a very little while before his Execution,' as he informs us, is sufficient evidence that then the Cardinal neither knew nor expected the least Recantation from him.

18. We have not the least evidence, that I know of, that any of the Protestant Confessors or Martyrs in queen Mary's reign did acknowledge that Cranmer ever had made such a Recantation. They still reckon him as one, nay usually as the principal of their glorious Martyrs, upon all occasions. As do the papists also still reckon him among the notorious heretics. Of all which we have many instances later than his death, and still without the least intimation that he had ever made such a Recantation in any of them. Which intire silence in both parties is no small evidence that it was not then believed he had made that real Recantation, which the Spanish Friar pretended.

19. Cranmer himself, as Mr. Fox was informed, when at the stake he sorely repented of some small "bills, or papers, or writing which he had sent abroad, which he owns he had written with his hand, contrary to truth which he thought with his heart, and wrote for fear of death, and to save his life, if it might be, since his Degradation, wherein he had written many things untrue," (p. 820,) yet did he, at the same time, almost directly deny that he had ever made this real Recantation, charged upon him by the Spanish friar. For Mr. Fox assures us, that when at that time his enemies ceased not to object unto him his falshood and dissimulation, because, after all, he died a zealous Protestant, he answered to that accusation, in the words already set down. "Ah! my masters, quoth he, Do not you take it so. Always, since I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of falshood, and a lover of simplicity; and never before this time have I dissembled." Which very ill agrees with what the Friar pretended, that he had continued in the grossest hypocrisy and falshood for four or five weeks together, ever since he made that intire Recantation.

20. If there were not here some knavery or forgery in the case, why was not the queen's resolution (h) to have him burnt notified to him a few days, or however several hours, before he was to die? Why was Dr. Cole who had been before appointed to preach his Funeral Sermon on March 21st, obliged to keep the day silent? Why did the same Dr. Cole, the very morning Cranmer was to die, still conceal it from him, when he went to see him? Nay, Why did he, upon Cranmer's owning he had no money, present him then, and not till then, with fifteen crowns, to give to the poor to whom he would, when he was just going to die? Why did the Spanish friar attempt to get two copies of a Recantation under Cranmer's hand the very same morning? And all this without any intimation that he was to die immediately? Why was he left destitute, without mercy, or so much as one friend to support or advise him, or to be a faithful witness what was then said or done by him? And why did some of the Papists, particularly this Dr. Cole, cry out, as soon as they perceived Cranmer had declared himself a Protestant, 'Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away:' as this History informs us? I think we have great reason to suspect that all this barbarity and haste and hurry for a sudden execution was intended to conceal somewhat which was not fit to be made public: and that it was done on purpose that sincere and honest Cranmer's pretended Recantation, might still be believed to be real: and that the poor man might have no opportunity to clear his innocence any farther in this matter. And indeed, one would almost wonder that Mr. Fox did not himself suspect this fraud and forgery; since he informs us that "the Papists secretly and slightly suborned certain men, which when they could not expugn him by arguments and disputation, should by intreaty, and fair promises, or any other means allure him to Recantation. That the wily Papists flocked about him, with threatening, flattering, intreating, and promising, and all other means, especially Henry Sydal, and Friar John, a Spaniard de Villa Garcina, to the end to drive him to the uttermost of their possibility from his former Sentence to Recantation." (p. 811).

N. B. This Recantation may well be supposed only a pretended one, and a forgery of the papists. For this was not the first time that Cranmer was scandalized in this manner. We find that bishop Bonner (i) himself believed he was become very humble at the beginning of queen Mary's reign, and 'ready to submit himself in all things,' without any real foundation. We find also, about the same time, the report was so current that he had himself consented to set up the mass at Canterbury, and that he had undertaken to sing mass before the queen (k), that he was obliged to vindicate himself in a public paper, still extant. Nay the main parts of this Recantation before us may possibly be as old as these early rumours. For Sanders affirms us that (l) Cranmer feigned himself a catholic, and signed his retraction seventeen times with his own hand, before his condemnation. Whereas in this form he owns himself to be late archbishop of Canterbury only: which he would never have allowed till after Feb. 14th, 1555-6, when he was degraded: as all the other evidence already produced does also assure us. They who have a mind to compare one popish forgery with another, may look in Mr. Fox, and there find such another Recantation, ascribed to the famous lord Cobham, in the days of Henry 5th (m). Only with this difference, that the lord Cobham's Recantation seems never to have been so much as seen by him: which we cannot certainly say of this ascribed to abp. Cranmer; though both, I suppose, equally spurious and jesuitical forgeries.

It is not here quite unworthy of our remark, that Cranmer's peculiar punishment of burning his right hand, before the rest of his body; that right hand which wrote the several Bills or Papers whereby he gave occasion to the report that he had made a real and intire Recantation; seems more accountable on the supposition that it was rather the many Bills or Papers he had incautiously written or transcribed with his right hand; than any one or two full Recantations, to which he had wickedly consented with his mind, which occasioned that unusual experiment or signal of detestation. And if any suppose that the consumption, first of his right hand, and then of the rest of his body by the fire, while yet his heart, as all agree, remained unburnt, was extraordinary, and providential; the natural consequence of it is, that while his right hand was, after a sort, guilty, in writing; yet was not his heart, the emblem of his mind, properly guilty in consenting to any ungodly Recantation. #### POSTSCRIPT.

This was written by me before the date already set down. Nor have I altered any thing which I then wrote; but print it now exactly according to the original copy. What I am now to add, is with relation to the accounts of this matter given us by Mr. Strype, in his Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 383, 389, and in the 3d vol. of his Ecclesiastical Memorials, p. 232, 238, which I had not seen when I wrote the foregoing Paper. Which two Memorials seem to me to afford farther grounds for the same suspicion. For we may thence observe;

1. That of the five other copies of Cranmer's Recantations, given us by Mr. Strype, four of them are very short, and so very like the first branch of the Recantation before us: and might generally be of Cranmer's own drawing up, and might be signed by him as like the other, not much against his own opinion; yet very capable of a popish sense also. But the last is not only very long, but very different from all the rest; and indeed very like the grossest forgery. Yet does Mr. Strype assure us, in his Ecclesiastical Memorials, 'That this was said to be written and subscribed by Cranmer's own hand: But that it was ever proved to be such, he saith not. Nor do I easily believe Cranmer would ever sign such a gross, and tedious, and wild Recantation as this is.

2. What Recantation Cranmer owned at the stake, and repented of, was not the signing one or two large open Recantations; but, as we have seen already, and as an honest Roman catholic there present gives the Account to be set down presently, "Setting forth writings contrary to the truth. Things written with his hand contrary to the truth. All such Bills which he had written or signed with his own hand contrary to the truth, since his degradation: Wherein he had written many things untrue." Which small bills excellently well agree with the five suspicious small bills, set down by Mr. Fox and Mr. Strype, said by Mr. Fox to 'contain only a few words, in a little leaf of paper,' but very ill with one or two other pretended full and large and express Recantations of the protestant religion. And what makes this somewhat the more probable is this; that he immediately adds, at the stake, a retractation of the worst thing in all those little bills: when he says, that "as for the pope he refused him, as Christ's enemy, and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine?" (n) Whose supremacy yet, as owned by king, queen, and parliament at least, if not farther, he had owned and submitted himself to in more than one of those five short bills before mentioned. Which are all I suppose that he ever signed.

3. The very publishers of those four other short Bills or Recantations own, that one of them, which yet was not worded worse than the rest, nor was properly any Recantation of the protestant religion at all, was soon after retracted by himself again, and recalled: which plainly proves, that when Cranmer was trying by certain of these Concessions or Papers like some sort of Recantations, whether he could save his life, without renouncing the protestant religion, his conscience was so tender, that he retracted one of those small and modest Concessions or Retractions again: and that it was almost impossible for him at the same time to sign either of those long and horrible Recantations that his enemies published for him.

4. Mr. Strype himself, who believed that Cranmer did thus several times openly recant the protestant religion, confesses that the papists did print a forged Account of what Cranmer spake at his Execution, and compares in two columns, "What he was to have spoken, and what the papists gave out (in a print falsely) he did speak; and what he spake indeed; As was by hundreds of witnesses present notoriously known (o). That they published in print these writings of the archbishop, bearing this title. "All the subscriptions and recantations of Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, truly set forth both in Latin and English; agreeably to the originals, and subscribed with his own hand. Visum & Examinatum per Reverendum Patrem & Dominum D. Edmundum Episcop. Londinensem." And adds, that this profligate bishop Bonner, to serve an end, prostituted his faith and credit, by testifying a thing so notoriously known to be quite otherwise, in relation to the archbishop's last speech before mentioned." He also adds, at the conclusion of the first column, that "this grievous lie is said to be printed at London, by Cawood, the queen's printer: Cum privilegio, ann. 1556." And at the conclusion of the second column he adds likewise, that "Cranmer would have spoken of the sacrament, and of the papacy: but that they bad 'Stop his mouth and pull him down.'" If here be not great reason to suspect fraud and knavery in this whole matter, I am much mistaken. See the like tricking and roguery about a Recantation used by the papists, to that learned and excellent person Angelus Merula: till at length they were going to burn him in his old age; but that he fell down dead at the stake, before the fire was kindled. Of which we have a full Account in Gerard Brandt's History of the Reformation, in the Low Countries. Which is also well worth the perusal of the inquisitive reader upon this occasion.—Nor have I published this Paper, which is very remote from my general course of study and enquiries, as pretending at all to demonstrative evidence; but to strong reasons for suspicion: and in order to set more proper persons upon further researches: being still desirous that what is really true and right may be known by and prevail with all mankind.

MR. STRYPE'S ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP CRANMER'S DEATH. Memorials, p. 384.

MR. STRYPE having printed a remarkable Account of Cranmer's Death, in the words of a certain grave person unknown, as he styles him, but a papist, who was an eye and ear witness, and related these matters, as it seems, very justly, in a Letter from Oxon to his Friend, I shall here re-print it verbatim. And recommend it to the Christian reader's serious perusal and consideration.

"But that I know for our great friendship, and long-continued love, you look even of duty, that I should signify to you of the truth of such things as here chanceth among us: I would not at this time have written to you the unfortunate end, and doubtful tragedy of T. C. late bishop of Canterbury: because I little pleasure take in beholding such heavy sights. And when they are once overpassed, I like not to rehearse them again: being but a renewing of my woe, and doubling my grief. For although his former life, and wretched end, deserves a greater misery (if any greater might have chanced, than chanced unto him) yet setting aside his offences to God and his country, and beholding the man without his faults, I think there was none that pitied not his case, and bewailed his fortune, and feared not his own chance, to see so noble a prelate, so grave a counsellor, of so long-continued honour, after so many dignities, in his old years to be deprived of his estate, adjudged to die, and in so painful a death to end his life. I have no delight to increase it. Alas, it is too much of itself, that ever so heavy a case should betide to man, and man to deserve it.

"But to come to the matter: on Saturday last, being the 21st of March, was his day appointed to die. And because the morning was much rainy, the Sermon appointed by Mr. Dr. Cole to be made at the Stake, was made in St. Mary's Church. Whither Dr. Cranmer was brought by the mayor and aldermen, and my lord Williams. With whom came divers gentlemen of the shire, sir T. A. Bridges, sir John Browne, and others. Where was prepared over against the pulpit, an high place for him, that all the people might see him. And when he had ascended it, he kneeled down and prayed, weeping tenderly: which moved a great number to tears, that had conceived an assured hope of his Conversion and Repentance.

"Then Mr. Cole began his Sermon. The sum whereof was this. First, He declared causes, why it was expedient, that he should suffer, notwithstanding his reconciliation. The chief are these, One was, for that he had been a great cause of all this alteration in this realm of England. And when the matter of the Divorce, between king Henry 8th, and queen Catherine (p), was commenced in the court of Rome, he having nothing to do with it, set upon it, as judge, which was the entry to all the inconveniencies that followed. Yet in that he excused him, that he thought he did it not of malice, but by the persuasions and advice of certain Learned Men. Another was, that he had been the great setter forth of all this Heresy received into the Church in this last time; had written in it, had disputed, had continued it, even to the last hour: and that it had never been seen in this realm, (but in the time of Schism) that any man continuing so long, hath been pardoned: and that it was not to be remitted for example-sake. Other causes he alledged, but these were the chief, why it was not thought good to pardon him. Other causes beside, he said, moved the queen, and the council thereto, which were not meet and convenient for every one to understand them.

"The second Part touched the audience, how they should consider this thing: That they should hereby take example to fear God: and that there was no power against the Lord: having before their eyes a man of so high degree, sometime one of the chiefest prelates of the Church, an archbishop, the chief of the council, the second peer in the realm of long time: a man, as might be thought, in greatest assurance, a king of his side; notwithstanding all his authority and defence to be debased from an high estate to a low degree; of a counsellor to be a caitiff; and to be set in so wretched estate, that the poorest wretch would not change conditions with him.

“The last and end appertained unto him. Whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of Scripture. And with these, and such, bidding him nothing mistrust but he should incontinently receive that the thief did: To whom Christ said, Hodie mecum eris in Paradiso. And out of St. Paul armed him against the terrors of the fire, by this; Dominus fidelis est: Non sinet vos tentari ultra quam ferre potestis: By the example of the three children; to whom God made the flame seem like a pleasant dew. He added hereunto the rejoicing of St. Andrew in his cross; the patience of St. Laurence on the fire: ascertaining him, that God, if he called on him, and to such as die in his faith, either will abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to abide it. He glorified God much in his conversion; because it appeared only to be his work: declaring what travel and conference had been used with him to convert him, and all prevailed not, until it pleased God of his mercy to reclaim him, and call him home. In discoursing of which place, he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doing.

“And I had almost forgotten to tell you, that Mr. Cole promised him, that he should be prayed for in every church in Oxford, and should have mass and Dirige sung for him; and spake to all the priests present to say mass for his soul.

“When he had ended his Sermon, he desired all the people to pray for him: Mr. Cranmer kneeling down with them, and praying for himself. I think there was never such a number so earnestly praying together. For they, that hated him before, now loved him for his conversion, and hope of continuance. They that loved him before could not suddenly hate him, having hope of his confession again of his fall. So love and hope increased devotion on every side.

“I shall not need, for the time of Sermon, to describe his behaviour, his sorrowful countenance, his heavy cheer, his face bedewed with tears; sometime lifting his eyes to heaven in hope, sometime casting them down to the earth for shame; to be brief, an image of sorrow: the dolor of his heart bursting out at his eyes in plenty of tears: retaining ever a quiet and grave behaviour. Which increased the pity in men's hearts, that they unfeignedly loved him, hoping it had been his repentance for his transgression and error. I shall not need, I say, to point it out unto you; you can much better imagine it yourself.

“When praying was done, he stood up, and having leave to speak, said, ‘Good people, I had intended indeed to desire you to pray for me; which because Mr. Doctor hath desired, and you have done already, I thank you most heartily for it. And now will I pray for myself, as I could best devise for mine own comfort, and say the prayer, word for word, as I have here written it.’ And he read it standing: and after kneeled down, and said the Lord's Prayer; and all the people on their knees devoutly praying with him. His Prayer was thus:

“‘O Father of heaven; O Son of God redeemer of the world; O Holy Ghost, proceeding from them both, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me most wretched caitiff, and miserable sinner. I who have offended both heaven and earth, and more grievously than any tongue can express, whether then may I go, or whither should I fly for succour? To heaven I may be ashamed to lift up mine eyes; and in earth I find no refuge. What shall I then do? shall I despair? God forbid. O good God, thou art merciful, and refuseth none that come unto thee for succour. To thee therefore do I run. To thee do I humble myself: saying, O Lord God, my sins be great, but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. O God the Son, thou wast not made man, this great misery was not wrought, for few or small offences. Nor thou didst not give thy Son unto death, O God the Father, for our little and small sins only, but for all the greatest sins of the world: so that the sinner return unto thee with a penitent heart; as I do here at this present. Wherefore have mercy upon me, O Lord, whose property is always to have mercy. For although my sins be great, yet thy mercy is greater. I crave nothing, O Lord, for mine own merits, but for thy name's sake, that it may be glorified thereby: And for thy dear Son Jesus Christ's sake. And now therefore, Our Father, which art in heaven, &c.’

“Then rising, he said, ‘Every man desireth, good people, at the time of their death, to give some good exhortation, that other may remember after their deaths, and be the better thereby. So I beseech God grant me grace, that I may speak something at this my departing, whereby God may be glorified, and you edified. First, It is an heavy case to see, that many folks be so much doted upon the love of this false world, and so careful for it, that or the love of God, or the love of the world to come, they seem to care very little or nothing therefore. This shall be my first exhortation. That you set not over-much by this false glossing world, but upon God and the world to come. And learn to know what this lesson meaneth, which St. John teacheth, ‘That the love of this world is hatred against God.’—The second exhortation is, That next unto God, you obey your king and queen, willingly and gladly, without murmur or grudging: And not for fear of them only, but much more for the fear of God: knowing, that they be God's ministers, appointed by God to rule and govern you. And therefore whoso resisteth them, resisteth God's ordinance.—The third Exhortation is, That you love altogether like brethren, ' and sisters. For alas ! pity it is to see, what ' contention and hatred one Christian-man hath

 ' to another: not taking each other, as sisters ' and brothers; but rather as strangers and ' mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and ' bear well away this one lesson, To do good to
 ' all men as much as in you lieth, and to hurt
 ' no man, no more than you would hurt your ' own natural and loving brother or sister.
 ' For this you may be sure of, that whosoever
 ' hateth any person, and goeth about malici' ously to hinder or hurt him, surely, and with-
 ' out all doubt, God is not with that man,
 ' although he think himself never so much in ' God's favour.—The fourth Exhortation shall be
 ' to them that have great substance and riches
 ' of this world, That they will well consider and ' weigh those sayings of the scripture. One is
 ' of our Saviour Christ himself, who saith, ' It ' is hard for a rich man to enter into heaven :'
 ' A sore saying, and yet spoke by him, that ' knew the truth. The second is of St. John,
 ' whose saying is this, ' He that hath the sub' stance of this world, and seeth his brother in
 ' necessity, and shutteth up his mercy from him,
 ' how can he say, he loveth God? Much more
 ' might I speak of every part; but time suf-
 ' ficeh not. I do but put you in remembrance ' of things. Let all them that be rich, ponder ' well those sentences: for if ever they had any ' occasion to shew their charity, they have now
 ' at this present, the poor people being so ' many, and victuals so dear. For though I ' have been long in prison, yet I have heard of ' the great penury of the poor. Consider, that ' that which is given to the poor, is given to ' God. Whom we have not otherwise present
 ' corporally with us, but in the poor.—And now
 ' for so much as I am come to the last end of ' my life, whereupon hangeth all my life passed,
 ' and my life to come, either to live with my
 ' saviour Christ in heaven, in joy, or else to be ' in pain ever with wicked devils in hell; and ' I see before mine eyes presently either heaven
 ' ready to receive me, or hell ready to swallow
 ' me up; I shall therefore declare unto you my ' very faith, how I believe, without colour of dis-
 ' simulation. For now is no time to dissemble,
 ' whatsoever I have written in times past.—
 ' First, I believe in God the Father Almighty,
 ' Maker of heaven and earth, &c. and every arti' cle of the catholic faith, every word and sen' tence taught by our Saviour Christ, his apostles
 ' and prophets, in the Old and New Testament.
 '—And now I come to the great thing that trou-
 ' bleth my conscience more than any other thing ' that ever I said or did in my life: And that is,
 ' the setting abroad of writings, contrary to the ' truth. Which here now I renounce, and re' fuse, as things written with my hand, contrary ' to the truth, which I thought in my heart, and ' writ for fear of death, and to save my life, if it ' might be: And that is, all such bills, which I ' have written or signed with mine own hand,
 ' since my degradation: Wherein I have written
 ' many things untrue. And forasmuch as my ' hand offended in writing contrary to my heart,

' therefore my hand shall first be punished. For
 ' if I may come to the fire, it shall be first burned.
 ' And as for the pope, I refuse him, as Christ's ' enemy and Anti-Christ, with all his false doc' trine.'

" And here being admonished of his Recantation, and dissembling, he said, Alas, my lord, I have been a man, that all my life loved plain-ness, and never dissembled 'till now against the truth; which I am most sorry for. He added hereunto, that for the Sacrament, he believed as he had taught in his book against the bishop of Winchester. And here he was suffered to speak no more.

" So that his speech contained chiefly three points, love to God, love to the king, and love to the neighbour. In the which talk he held men very suspense, which all depended upon the conclusion. Where he so far deceived all mens expectations, that at the hearing thereof, they were much amazed; and let him go on a while, till my lord Williams bad him play the Christian man, and remember himself. To whom he answered, ' That he so did: for now he spake truth."

" Then he was carried away; and a great number, that did run to see him go so wickedly to his death, ran after him, exhorting him, while time was to remember himself. And one friar John, a godly and well-learned man, all the way travelled with him to reduce him.
 But it would not be. What they said in particular I cannot tell, but the effect appeared in the end. For at the stake he professed, that he died in all such opinions as he had taught, and oft repented him of his Recantation.

" Coming to the stake with a cheerful countenance, and willing mind, he put off his garments, with haste, and stood upright in his shirt; and a batchelor of divinity, named Elye, of Brazen-nose-college, laboured to convert him to his former Recantation, with the two Spanish friars. But when the friars saw his constancy, they said in Latin one to another, ' Let us go from him; We ought not to be nigh him:
 For the devil is with him.' But the batchelor in divinity was more earnest with him. Unto whom he answered, That as concerning his Re-cantation, he repented it right sore, because he knew it was against the truth; with other words more. Whereupon the lord Williams cried, Make short, Make short. Then the bishop took certain of his friends by the hand.
 But the batchelor of divinity refused to take him by the hand, and blamed all others that so did, and said, he was sorry that he ever came in his company. And yet again he required him to agree to his former Recantation. And the bishop answered, (shewing his hand) ' This is the hand that wrote it, and therefore shall it suffer first punishment.'—Fire being now put to him, he stretched out his right hand, and thrust it into the flame, and held it there a good space, before the fire came to any other part of his body; where his hand was seen of every man sensibly burning, crying with a loud voice,
 ' This hand hath offended.' As soon as the fire got up, he was very soon dead, never stirring or crying all the while.

“ His patience in the torment, his courage in dying, if it had been taken either for the glory of God, the wealth of his country, or the testimony of truth, as it was for a pernicious error, and subversion of true religion, I could worthily have commended the example, and matched it with the fame of any father of antient time : But seeing that not the death, but the cause and quarrel thereof, commendeth the sufferer, I cannot but much dispraise his obstinate stubbornness and sturdiness in dying, and specially in so evil a cause. Surely his death much grieved every man, but not after one sort.

Some] pitied to see his body so tormented with the fire raging upon the silly carcass, that counted not of the folly. Other that passed not much of the body, lamented to see him spill his soul wretchedly without redemption, to be plinged for ever. His friends sorrowed for love : his enemies for pity : strangers for a common kind of humanity, whereby we are bound one to another. Thus I have enforced myself, for your sake to discourse this heavy narration, contrary to my mind : And being more than half weary I make a short end, wishing you a quiet life, with less honour ; and easier death, with more praise. The 23d of March. Yours, J. A.”

51. The Arraignment of Sir THOMAS WYAT, knight, at Westminster, for High Treason : 1 MARY, 14th March, A. D. 1554. [From the MS. of D. Brereton Bouchier, late of Barnesly in Gloucestershire, 9007-8. See Catalogi Librorum Manuscript. Angliæ & Hiberniæ, tom. ii. part 1. p. 256. 8 Rapin, 131.]

THOU art indicted, sir Thomas Wyatt, knight, for that thou, on the 14th day of February, didst, at Brentford in the county of Middlesex, levy war against our sovereign lady and queen, her crown and dignity : How sayest thou? art thou Guilty, or no?

Wyat. My lords, if I should plead Guilty, should I not be then excluded afterwards to use certain things that I have to say?

Court. You shall, Mr. Wyatt, have leave to say and be heard what you can.

Wyat. Then my lords, must I confess Guilty, as, in the end, truth must enforce me to say : I must acknowledge this to be a just plague for my sins, which I most grievously have committed against God, who hath suffered me to fall into this beastly brutishness, and horrible offence of Treason. And lo in me the like, and as such, who attempted like enterprise from the beginning : for peruse the Chronicles through, and you shall read, that never Rebellion against their natural prince and country, from the beginning, prospered : Henry the 4th was but a rebel, for so must I call him ; he continued not long, but at the end definite, it fell into the right line again : and the usurpation revenged in his blood ; for the love of God, all you gentlemen that be here, remember, and be taught by examples past, as also by this my present infelicity, and most heinous offence. O most miserable, mischievous, and beastly, furious imagination of mine : for I thought, that by the marriage of the prince of Spain, the second person of this realm should have been in danger. And I who have lived a freeman born, should together with my country have been brought to bondage and servitude by aliens and strangers ; which brutish beastliness then seemed reason, and wrought so far, and to such effect, as it led me to the use and practice of this my committed Treason : but now, understanding the great commodity, honour, and surety, which this realm shall receive by this marriage, if it shall please the queen to be merciful unto me, there is no man living that shall more trustily and more faithfully serve her highness, whatsoever the quarrel be : I served the queen's highness against the duke of Northumberland, as my lord of Arundel can witness : my grandfather was upon the rack for her majesty's grandfather : my father served king Henry 8th and I served him likewise ; as also her grace's brother, and in witness of my blood lost, in the field, I carry a maim. I alledge not all this, either to merit or advance, for by this beastly brutishness, to which most miserably I am fallen unto, I have not only procured my own death, but overthrown my house and name, and defaced all my father's well-doings, if ever there were any.—I will not justify myself in any thing, neither can I alledge any excuse of my offences, but most humbly submit myself to the queen's majesty's mercy and pity ; desiring you, my lord of Sussex, and you Mr. Hastings, with all the rest, to be a mean to the queen's highness for mercy ; for pity is the greatest treasure that ever God gave to man, and it is that which he specially hath chosen to himself, which if her highness will vouchsafe on me her mercy to bestow it on him who shall be most glad to serve her highness, and readiest to die in her grace's cause : for I protest before the Judge of all Judges, I never meant hurt against her highness person.

The Queen's Attorney. Mr. Wyatt, you have great cause to be sorry and repentant for the fault whereby you have not only undone yourself, but also numbers of other gentlemen, who being true men, might have served their country : yet, if you had gone no further, it might the better have been borne withal : not so contented, you procured the duke of Suffolk, a man soon trained to your purpose, and his two brothers also, by which, without the queen's mercy, you have overthrown the noble house: yet not so staid, you attempted the second person of this realm, who should have been all our comforts, whereby her honour is brought into question; or what end it will come unto, God knoweth, and this are you the author of.

Wyat. Good Mr. Attorney, as I will not in any thing justify myself, so being in decay to much, overcharge me not with more mischief, and make or shew to be that I was not: I am loath to touch any man openly, but that for mine own discharge, I am driven for to do; and as I have given in Confession, so I affirm, that my lord of Devonshire sent sir Edward Rogers for me to come to his house, and when I came, he break the whole Treason unto me; he said, that he himself would go, and I cannot tell, but he said he would do many things: this proves I was not the first.

The Queen's Solicitor. As Mr. Attorney hath moved you, that is, to repent your offence, so I for my part, wish you the same: but what meant you first, when you rose, to write to my lady Elizabeth's grace, that she should remove further from the queen, and after that my lord of Norfolk's men fled from him at Rochester bridge to you, as a joyful news you sent to my lady Elizabeth of your good success, and she again sent you thanks: is not this true?

Wyat. What I have written, I confess, and it is true.

The Master of the Horse's Question. Mr. Wyatt, were not this your words, and in these terms, when Mr. Cornwallis and I were sent unto you from the queen, you answered us, That the queen should go to the Tower, and you to have her person with the Tower in keeping, also the treasure, and such of the counsellors as you would require; for you said you had rather be trusted than trust.

Solicitor. This shall be ever called Wyatt's Rebellion, as the Rebellion of Wat Tyler was called Wat Tyler's.

Attorney. Mr. Wyatt, were you not privy how the queen should have been slain, as she did waik? I do not burden you to consent to this: for thus much must I say, you disliked it.

Wyat. Mr. Attorney, I first opened this, coming to my remembrance when I heard William Thomas would have slain himself, for it was his devise; and he brake in this wise to sir Nicholas Arnold, if the queen were killed, quoth he, all were well, and there is not so fit a man to do it as John Fitzwilliams. Sir Nicholas Arnold told it sir James Croftes, and he told it John Fitzwilliams, and John Fitzwilliams told it me, and thus at the 4th hand I heard it. Then made I a cudgel with a whole brent in it, with a whole iron and half a yard of—in it, and sought John Fitzwilliams a whole day, and could not find him. The next day, I sent the cudgel by my man, and bade him bob him well, for the knave is but a spy, and to utter it he durst not, and therefore be bold to heat him; thus my man carried the cudgel three days, to have beaten him: by this it may appear, how much I abhorred that practice.

Then was the Letter shewed which he wrote to the duke of Suffolk, Mr. Wyatt being then in Southwark, that he should meet him at Kingston-Bridge, and so to go to London with him, although he came with the sewer company. Wyatt at the first remembered no such letter; but when it was shewed him, he confessed his hand.—It was demanded of him, what he meant to write to my lady Elizabeth: and after his Pardon offered, to refuse also the bountifulness of the queen to my lady Elizabeth's grace, among other things besides recited.

Wyat. My lords, as my fault is most vile and heinous, for the which I ask God mercy, and next him my sovereign lady and queen, whom I most grievously have offended, appealing wholly to her mercy, without which I cannot challenge any thing aithence my offence committed. I have served her highness in such sort and degree as I either could or am able; for I have uttered what I know in all things, whereby I might deliver her highness from such after peril as the concealment of traitors or treason might prejudice or hurt: I have done this for her highness security, as I am bounden thereunto by duty and truth, which truly I have declared; for I think and certainly believe, she is as careful over this realm as of that her chiefest jewel: I must confess that of all the services I have been in, there was never a more desperate journey taken in hand, and to the end continued most desperately. And whereas it was asked why I refused the queen's highness's Pardon offered, unhappy man what shall I say?—When I was once entered in that devilish desperateness, there was no way but to wade through with it that I had taken in hand; for I thought others had been as forward as I myself; and following the enterprise, used all possible means that might endure the same, as writing to my lady Elizabeth, and making the Proclamation in Southwark. Well, there resteth now in the queen's highness, either of justice by death, which justly I have deserved with Wat Tyler, to make me an open example to the world's end: or else of her mercy to save me, and use my service in such sort as her highness thinks me meet and able to do: and albeit that her grace hath this my request in writing, yet I most humbly beseech you to be a means to the queen's highness for her mercy and pity, which is my last hope and only refuge; and I beseech God that the queen may be so merciful unto me, as I mean to serve her majesty faithfully and truly. God's will be done on me. If there be but two true men, I will be the one to die at her grace's feet:—And so ended. The Lords promised to be a means for him: his countenance was doleful, and tears gushed out continually.—He was afterwards executed.

mas Wyat's Conspiracy is extracted from Rapin, vol. vii. p. 129.

“After the treaty of the queen's marriage with Philip was made public, complaints and murmurs were every where heard. The protestants in particular believed themselves lost, and feared to see erected in England a Spanish inquisition. But they were not the only murmurers. Independently of religion, the greatest part of the nation was not free from the fears of king Philip's introducing the Spanish tyranny into England, of which the Indies, the Low-Countries, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the dutchy of Milan, afforded recent instances. In a word, few persons could believe that the emperor had agreed to the articles stipulated in the treaty, with any design to observe them. At last, these murmurs grew into a conspiracy against the queen, of which the marriage was either the cause or pretence. The duke of Suffolk, sir Thomas Wyat (a), sir Peter Carew, formed the design of a general insurrection. Carew was to act in Cornwall, Wyat in Kent, and the duke of Suffolk in Warwickshire, which is in the center of the kingdom. Carew managed so ill, that his plot was discovered (b), and one of his complices arrested before he had concerted his affairs. This sent him into France, and Wyat, upon his flight, hastened the execution of his enterprize, though it was the design of the conspirators to wait the arrival of Philip for a more plausible colour to their insurrection. Wyat therefore resolving to push his point, though he was yet unprepared, went to Maidstone with a few followers, and gave out he took up arms to prevent England from being invaded. Afterwards he marched to Rochester, from whence he writ to the sheriff to desire his assistance. But the sheriff, instead of espousing his cause, required him to lay down his arms, and assembled forces to oppose him.—This rebellion alarmed the court (c), where nothing was ready to allay it, the queen having dismissed her forces, when she thought herself out of danger. Wherefore she sent a herald to Wyat with a full pardon, if he would lay down his arms in 24 hours. But he refused the offer of pardon. Mean time, the court was so unprepared, that the duke of Norfolk was sent with only 600 of the city trained-bands (d), commanded by an officer named Bret. Whilst this was doing, the sheriff of Kent, (e) as he was going to join the duke of Norfolk, met and defeated Knevet, who with some troops, was marching to join

Wyat, and killed sixty of his men. This ill success so alarmed Wyat, that he had now resolved to consult his own safety (f), when an unexpected accident inspired him with fresh courage. Sir George Harper, one of Wyat's adherents, pretending to desert him, went to the duke of Norfolk, and so artfully managed the trained-bands, that they took part with the rebels, and quitting the duke, joined Wyat (g).—With this reinforcement and his other troops, making together a body of 4,000 men, Wyat marched towards London. He met near Deptford two messengers from the queen, who in her name asked what would content him. He demanded the Tower and the queen's person to be put into his hands, and the council to be changed as he should think proper. This demand being rejected, the queen repaired to Guildhall, and acquainted the magistrates with Wyat's answer. She then spoke of her marriage, and told them she had done nothing in it but by the advice of her council. And, to give them a proof of the confidence she reposed in them, she resolved to stay in the city, though many advised her to withdraw to the Tower.—Wyat in the mean time continued his march, and reached the borough of Southwark the 3d of February, expecting to enter the city without any difficulty. But the bridge being strongly barricaded and guarded, he was obliged to march along the Thames to Kingston, ten miles from London. Here he found the bridge broken, and spent some hours in repairing it. He then passed to the other side with his army, increased now to near 6,000 men. After that, he continued his march to London, and after some time lost in repairing one of his broken carriages, reached Hyde-Park about nine in the morning, the 7th of February. The time unseasonably spent in repairing the carriage, rendered his undertaking abortive. For in that interval Harper, who had been so serviceable in bringing over the trained-bands, deserted, and posting to court, discovered his intentions to march through Westminster, and enter the city by Ludgate. This advice came seasonably to the earl of Pembroke and lord Clinton, who, at the head of some troops, had resolved to engage him as he entered the city. But, observing he was entangling himself in the streets where he could not extend his troops, they thought it better to let him pass, after orders given to shut the gate through which he designed to enter.—Wyat still prepossessed that the citizens would favour his undertaking, left his cannon under a guard at Hyde-Park, and entering Westminster (A), pursued his march through the Strand, in his way to Ludgate. As he advanced, care was taken to cut off his retreat by barricades and men placed at all the avenues. He believed himself now at the height of his wishes, when he found the gate into the city shut against him. He then first discovered his danger, and, perceiving it was impossible to retire, lost all courage. As he was endeavouring to return, a herald came to him, and exhorting him not to sacrifice the lives of so many followers, he surrendered quietly, and was sent to prison. This unfortunate man, who doubtless had but a slender capacity, foolishly imagined, without having good assurances, that the city of London would declare in his favour, and that proved his ruin. If his measures had been better taken, the queen and her ministers would have been greatly embarrassed, at a time when the government, weak as it was, had already created many enemies. But the ill success of this enterprise so strengthened the queen's authority, that henceforward she found no more resistance. After the taking of Wyatt, his men being dispersed, were taken at pleasure, and filled the prisons.

While Wyatt was acting in Kent and London, the duke of Suffolk had made but small progress in the county of Warwick. He would not have been so much as suspected, had not an express been seized, sent to him by Wyatt to inform him of the reasons which had obliged him to hasten his undertaking, and to pray him to be as expeditious as possible. Upon this advice, the earl of Huntington had orders to arrest him. The duke was informed, and being not yet secure of fifty horse, chose to conceal himself in the house of one of his domestics, who basely betrayed him to the earl of Huntington, by whom he was conveyed to the Tower the 11th of February. Such was the success of this conspiracy. Had it been managed by abler heads, it might have been attended with great consequences. But few men of reputation cared to put themselves under the conduct of such leaders. If it had caused only the death of the principal actors, they might have been said to meet the just reward of their folly. But it produced two considerable effects, one fatal to an illustrious and innocent person, and the other to all protestants. Not that religion had any share in the conspiracy, Wyatt himself being a Roman catholic, and the queen in her proclamation not accusing the protestants, though since some historians have been pleased to brand them. But as the queen's authority was strengthened by the ill success of this undertaking, she turned it entirely to the ruin of the reformed and the reformation. The duke of Suffolk being concerned in the conspiracy, the court easily understood his design was to replace his daughter the lady Jane on the throne; and this determined the queen to sacrifice her to her own safety.

“Two days after the taking of Wyatt a message was sent to Jane Grey and her husband to bid them prepare for death. Jane, as she had long expected it, received the message with great resolution. Mean while, Dr. Fecknam who brought it, and had orders to exhort her to change her religion, preposterously imagining she desired some time to be determined, obtained three days respite of her execution. But she let him know, it was no satisfaction to her. She was well assured, the jealousy of the government would not suffer her to live, and therefore she had employed the whole time of her confinement in a preparation for death. Some have believed, that without this last attempt of the duke of Suffolk, the queen would have spared his daughter. But as afterwards such numbers were put to death for their religion, it is not likely that Jane, so firmly attached to the protestant religion, would have been more mercifully used than the rest, even though the queen could have prevailed with herself to pardon her treason. Be this as it will, she was executed the 12th of February, after seeing the headless body of her husband pass by her, as he was brought back from execution to be interred in the chapel of the Tower. She shewed to the last moment a great constancy and piety, and an immovable adherence to the reformation, owning however herself guilty of a great sin in accepting a crown which belonged not to her. The duke of Suffolk her father was tried the 17th of the same month, and executed the 21st, with great grief for having been the cause of his daughter's death.

“Next, Wyatt was brought to his trial, where he offered to make great discoveries, if his life might be saved. He accused even the princess Elizabeth and the earl of Devonshire as concerned in the conspiracy. This did not prevent his sentence, but only gained him a respite of two months, because of the hopes of drawing from him considerable discoveries. Mean time the earl of Devonshire was committed to the Tower, and the princess Elizabeth, though indisposed, was brought to London and closely confined in Whitehall, without liberty to speak to any person. On the 11th of March following she was sent to the Tower.—The 14th and 15th of February, Bret, commander of Wyatt's forces and 58 more, were hanged. Some days after, 600 prisoners with halts about their necks waited on the queen, and received their pardon. But this was not capable to efface the impression made in men's minds by so many executions for a conspiracy in which was no effusion of blood. The fault was thrown on Gardiner, who was accused of leading the queen to an excessive jealousy of her authority, and the most extreme rigour. An affair happened at the same time, which also greatly alarmed and filled the people with fears of the queen's intending to rule with too extensive a power. Sir Nicholas Throckmorton being accused and tried as an accomplice in the conspiracy, was acquitted by his Jury for want of sufficient proof to condemn him. For this the jury were severely fined. So the juries were deprived of the liberty of judging according to their consciences, and instead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the court stood affected to the prisoners, and by that determine their verdict. This rigour exercised upon the jury was fatal to sir John Throckmorton, who was found guilty upon the same evidence on which his brother had been acquitted.

The respite granted to Wyatt had a quite contrary effect to what the court expected. This unhappy man, who had accused Elizabeth and the earl of Devonshire only in hopes of a pardon, finding he must die, fully cleared them in his second examination: and for fear his last declaration should be suppressed, he renewed it at the place of execution. He was executed on the 11th of April 1554.

52. The Trial of Sir NICHOLAS THROCKMORTON, knight, in the Guildhall of London, for High Treason: 1 MARY, April 17, 1554: Together with the Proceedings against Sir Nicholas Throckmorton's JURY. [3 Hollingshead, 1104, 1121, 1126.]

THE Commissioners appointed to try him were, sir Thomas White, knight, lord mayor of London, the earl of Shrewsbury, the earl of Derby, sir Tho. Bromley, lord chief justice of England, sir Nicholas Hare, master of the Rolls, sir Francis Englefield, master of the court of wards and liberties; sir R. Southwell, one of the privy-council; sir Edw. Walgrave, one of the privy-council; sir Roger Cholmeley; sir Wm. Porteman, one of the justices of the king's-bench; sir Edw. Saunders, one of the justices of the common pleas; master Stanford and master Dyer, sergeants; master Edward Griffin, attorney general; master Sendall, and Peter Tichborne, clerks of the crown.

First, after Proclamation made, and the Commission read, the lieutenant of the Tower, master Tho. Bridges, brought the prisoner to the bar: then silence was commanded, and Sendall said to the prisoner as followeth:

Sendall. Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, hold up thy hand, Thou art before this time indicted of High-Treason, &c. that thou then and there didst falsly and traiterously, &c. conspire and imagine the death of the queen's majesty, &c. and falsly and traiterously did levy war against the queen within her realm, &c. and also thou was adherent to the queen's enemies within her realm, giving to them aid and comfort, &c. and also falsly and traiterously did conspire and intend to depose and deprive the queen of her royal estate, and so finally destroy her, &c. and also thou didst falsly and traiterously devise and conclude to take violently the Tower of London, &c. Of all which Treasons and every of them in manner and form, &c. art thou Guilty or Not guilty?

Throckmorton. May it please you my lords and masters, which be authorised by the queen's commission to be judges this day, to give me leave to speak a few words, which doth both concern you and me, before I answer to the Indictment, and not altogether impertinent to the matter, and then plead to the Indictment.

Bromley. No, the order is not so, you must first plead whether you be guilty or no.

Throckmorton. If that be your order and law, judge accordingly to it.

Hare. You must first answer to the matter wherewith you are charged, and then you may talk at your pleasure.

Throckmorton. But things spoken, out of place were as good not spoken.

Bromley. These be but delays to spend time, therefore answer as the law willetth you.

Throckmorton. My lords, I pray you make not too much haste with me, neither think not long for your dinner, for my case requireth leisure, and you have well dined when you have done justice truly. Christ said, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst for righteousness.'

Bromley. I can forbear my dinner as well as you, and care as little as you peradventure.

Shrewsbury. Come you hither to check us, Throckmorton? we will not be so used, no, no, I for my part have forborn my breakfast, dinner and supper, to serve the queen.

Throckmorton. Yea, my good lord, I know it right well: I meant not to touch your lordship, for your service and pains is evidently known to all men.

Southwell. Mr. Throckmorton, this talk need not, we know what we have to do, and you would teach us our duties; you hurt your matter, go to! go to!

Throckmorton. M. Southwell, you mistake me, I meant not to teach you, nor none of you, but to remember you of that I trust you all be well instructed in, and so I satisfy myself, since I shall not speak, thinking you all know what you have to do, or ought to know, so I will answer to the Indictment, and do plead Not guilty to the whole, and to every part thereof.

Sendall. How wilt thou be tried?

Throckmorton. Shall I be tried as I would, or as I should?

Bronley. You shall be tried as the law will, and therefore you must say, by God and by the country.

Throckmorton. Is that your law for me? It is not as I would; but since you will have it so, I am pleased with it, and do desire to be tried by faithful just men, which more fear God than the world.

The Names of the Jurors were, Lucas, Yong, Martyn, Beswicke, Bascfield, Kightley, Lowe, Whetston, Pointer, Bankes, Calthorp, Cater. What time the Attorney went forthwith to Mr. Cholmley, and shewed him the sheriffs return, who being acquainted with the citizens, knowing the corruptions and dexterities of them in such cases, noted certain to be challenged for the queen, (a rare case) and the same men being known to be sufficient and indifferent, and that no exceptions were to be taken to them, but only for their upright honesties, notwithstanding the Attorney prompting serjeant Dier; the said serjeant challenged one Bacon, and another citizen peremptorily for the queen. Then the prisoner demanded the cause of the challenge: the serjeant answered, we need not shew you the cause of the challenge for the queen. Then the inquest was furnished with other honest men, that is to say, Whetston and Lucas, so the prisoner used these words:

Throckmorton. I trust you have not provided for me this day, as in times past I knew another gentleman occupying this woful place was provided for. It chanced one of the Justices upon jealousy of the prisoner's acquittal, for the goodness of his cause, said to another of his companions, a justice, when the jury did appear, I like not this jury for our purpose, they seem to be too pitiful and too charitable to condemn the prisoner. No, no, said the other Judge (viz. Cholmley) I warrant you, they be picked fellows for the nonce, he shall drink of the same cup his fellows have done. I was then a looker on of the pageant as others be now here, but now wo is me, I am a player in that woful tragedy. Well, for these and such other like the black ox bath of late trodden on some of their feet, but my trust is, I shall not be so used.—Whilst this talk was, Cholmley consulted with the Attorney about the Jury, which the prisoner espied, and then said as here ensueth, Ah, ah, master Cholmley, will this foul packing never be left?

Cholmley. Why what do I, pray you, Mr. Throckmorton? I did nothing, I am sure you do pick quarrels to me.

Throckmorton. Well master Cholmley, if you do well, it is better for you, God help you.

The Jury then was sworn, and Proclamation made, that whosoever would give Evidence against sir Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, should come in and be heard, for the prisoner stood upon his deliverance: whereupon serjeant Stanford presented himself to speak.

Throckmorton. And it may please you master Serjeant, and the others my masters of the Queen's learned counsel, like as I was minded to have said a few words to the Commissioners, if I might have had leave, for their better remembrance of their duties in this place of justice, and concerning direct indifferency to be used towards me this day; so by your patience I do think good to say somewhat to you, and to the rest of the queen's learned council, appointed to give evidence against me, and albeit you and the rest by order be appointed to give evidence against me, and entertained to set forth the Depositions and Matter against me, yet I pray you remember I am not alienate from you, but that I am your Christian brother? neither you so charged, but you ought to consider equity, nor yet so privileged, but that you have a duty of God appointed you how you shall do your office, which if you exceed, will be grievously required at your hands. It is lawful for you to use your gifts, which I know God hath largely given you, as your learning, art and eloquence, so as thereby you do not seduce the minds of the simple and unlearned Jury, to credit matters otherwise than they be. For master Serjeant, I know how by persuasions, enforcements, presumptions, applying, implying, inferring, conjecturing, deducing of arguments, wresting and exceeding the law, the circumstances, the depositions and confessions, that unlearned men may be enchanted to think and judge those that be things indifferent, or at the worst but oversights, to be great Treasons; such power orators have, and such ignorance the unlearned have. Almighty God by the mouth of his prophet, doth conclude such advocates be cursed, speaking these words, 'Cursed be he that doth his office craftily, corruptly, and maliciously.' And consider also, that my blood shall be required at your hands, and punished in you and yours, to the third and fourth generation. Notwithstanding you and the Justices excuse always such erroneous doings, when they be after called in question by the Verdict of the twelve men; but I assure you, the purgation serveth you as it did Pilate, and you wash your hands of the bloodshed, as Pilate did of Christ's. And now to your matter.

Stanford. And it please you, my lords, I doubt not to prove evidently and manifestly, that Throckmorton is worthily and rightly indicted and arraigned of these Treasons, and that he was a principal deviser, procurer and contriver of the late Rebellion, and that Wyat was but his minister. How say you, Throckmorton, did not you send Winter to Wyat into Kent, and did devise that the Tower of London should be taken, with other Instructions concerning Wyat's stir and rebellion?

Throckmorton. May it please you that I shall answer particularly to the matters objected against me, in as much as my memory is not good, and the same much decayed since my grievous imprisonment, with want of sleep, and other disquietness: I confess I did say to Winter, that Wyat was desirous to speak with him, as I understood.

Stanford. Yea sir, and you devised together of the taking of the Tower of London, and of the other great treasons.

Throckmorton. No, I did not so; prove it.

Stanford. Yea sir, you met with Winter sundry times, as shall appear, and in sundry places.

Throckmorton. That granted, proveth no such matter as is supposed in the indictment.

Stanford read Winter's Confession, which was of this effect; 'That Throckmorton met with Winter one day in Tower-street, and told him, that sir Thomas Wyat was desirous to speak with him, and Winter demanded where Wyat was: Throckmorton answered, at his house in Kent, not far from Gillingham, as I heard say, where the ships lie. Then they parted at that time; and shortly after Throckmorton met with Winter, unto whom Winter said, Master Wyat doth much mislike the coming of the Spaniards into this realm, and feareth their short arrival here in as much as daily he heareth thereof; doth see daily divers of them arrive here, scattered like soldiers; and therefore he thinketh good the Tower of London should be taken by a sleight, before the prince came, lest that piece be delivered to the Spaniards. How say you Throckmorton to it? Throckmorton answered, I mislike it for divers respects; even so do I, said Winter. At another time Throckmorton met me the said Winter in Paul's, when he had sent one to my house to seek me before; and he said to me, you are Admiral of the Fleet that now goeth into Spain. I answered, yea. Throckmorton said, when will your ships be ready? I said, within ten days. Throckmorton said, I understand you are appointed to conduct and carry the Lord Privy Seal into Spain; and considering the danger of the Frenchmen, which you say arm them to the sea apace, me think it well done, you put my said lord and his train on land in the West country to avoid all danger. Throckmorton said also, that Wyat changed his purpose, for taking the Tower of London: I said I was glad of it; and as for the Frenchmen, I care not much for them, I will so handle the matter, that the queen's ships shall be I warrant you in safeguard. Another time I met with Mr. Throckmorton when I came from the emperor's ambassador's, unto whom I declared, that the emperor had sent me a fair chain, and showed it unto Throckmorton, who said, For this chain you have sold your country. I said, it is neither French king nor emperor that can make me sell my country, but I will be a true Englishman: then they parted. This is the sum of the talk betwix Throckmorton and Winter.'

Stanford. Now my masters of the Jury, you have heard my sayings confirmed with Winter's Confession: how say you Throckmorton, can you deny it? if you will, you shall have Winter justify it to your face.

Throckmorton. My lords, shall it please you that I shall answer?

Bromley. Yea, say your mind.

Throckmorton. I may truly deny some part of this Confession; but because there is nothing material greatly, I suppose the whole to be true, and what is herein deposed, sufficient to bring me within the compass of the Indictment.

Stanford. It appeareth that you were of counsel with Wyat, inasmuch as you sent Winter down to him, who uttered unto him divers traitorous devices.

Throckmorton. This is but conjectural; yet since you will construe so maliciously, I will recount how I sent Winter to Wyat: and then I pray you of the Jury, judge better than master Serjeant doth. I met by chance a servant of master Wyat's, who demanded of me for Winter, and shewed me, that his master would gladly speak with him; and so without any further declaration, desired me, if I met Winter, to tell him master Wyat's mind, and where he was. Thus much for the sending down of Winter.

Attorney. Yea, sir, but how say you to the taking of the Tower of London, which is treason?

Throckmorton. I answer, though Wyat thought meet to attempt so dangerous an enterprize, and that Winter informed me of it, you cannot extend Wyat's devices to be mine, and to bring me within the compass of Treason; for what manner of reasoning or proof is this, Wyat would have taken the Tower, ergo Throckmorton is a Traitor? Winter doth make my purgation in his own Confession, even now read as it was by master Serjeant, though I say nothing; for Winter doth avow there, that I did much mislike it. And because you shall the better understand that I did always not allow these master Wyat's devices, I had these words to Winter, when he informed me of it; I think master Wyat would no Englishman hurt, and this enterprize cannot be done without the hurt and slaughter of both parties; for I know him that hath the charge of the peace, and his brother, both men of good service; the one had in charge a piece of great importance, Boulogne I mean, which was stoutly assailed, and notwithstanding he made a good account of it for his time, that like I am sure he will do by this his charge. Moreover, to account the taking of the Tower is very dangerous by the law. These were my words to Winter. And besides, it is very unlike, that I of all men would confederate in such a matter against the Lieutenant of the Tower, whose daughter my brother hath married, and his house and mine allied together by marriage sundry times within these few years.

Hare. But how say you to this, that Wyat and you had conference together sundry times at Warner's house, and in other places?

Throckmorton. This is a very general charge, to have conference; but why was it not as lawful for me to confer with Wyat, as with you, or any other man? I then knew no more by Wyat, than by any other; and to prove to talk with Wyat was lawful and indifferent, the last day I did talk with Wyat, I saw my lord of Arundel, with other noblemen and gentlemen, talk with him familiarly in the chamber of presence.

Hare. But they did not conspire nor talk of any stir against the Spaniards as you did pretend, and meant it against the queen; for you, Croftes, Rogers and Warner, did oftentimes devise in Warner's house about your traitorous purposes, or else what did you so often there?

Throckmorton. I confess I did mislike the queen's Marriage with Spain, and also the coming of the Spaniards hither; and then me thought I had reason to do so, for I did learn the reasons of my misliking of you master Hare, master Southwell, and others in the parliament house; there I did see the whole consent of the realm against it; and I a hearer, but no speaker, did learn my misliking of those matters, confirmed by many sundry reasons amongst you: but as concerning any stir or uproar against the Spaniards, I never made any, neither procured any to be made; and for my much resort to master Warner's house, it was not to confer with master Wyat, but to shew my friendship to my very good lord the marquis of Northampton, who was lodged there when he was enlarged.

Stanford. Did not you, Throckmorton, tell Winter that Wyat had changed his mind for the taking of the Tower; whereby it appeared evidently that you knew of his doings?

Throckmorton. Truly I did not tell him so, but I care not greatly to give you that weapon to play you withal: now let us see what you can make of it?

Stanford. Yea, sir, that proveth that you were privy to Wyat's mind in all his devices and treasons, and that there was sending betwixt you and Wyat from time to time.

Throckmorton. What Mr. Serjeant, doth this prove against me, that I knew Wyat did repent him of an evil devised enterprise? Is it to know Wyat's repentance, sin? No, it is but a venial sin; if it be any, it is not deadly. But where is the messenger or message that Wyat sent to me touching his alteration? and yet it was lawful enough for me to hear from Wyat at that time, as from any other man, for any act that I knew he had done.

Dyer. And it may please you my lords, and you my masters of the Jury, to prove that Throckmorton is a principal doer in this Rebellion, there is yet many other things to be declared: amongst other, there is Croftes's Confession, who sayeth, that he and you and your accomplices, did many times devise about the whole matters, and he made you privy to all his determinations, and you shewed him that you would go into the west country with the earl of Devon, to sir Peter Caroe, accompanied with others.

Throckmorton. Master Croftes is yet living, and is here this day; how happeneth it be brought face to face to justify this matter, neither hath been of all this time? Will you know the truth? either he said not so, or he will not abide by it, but honestly hath reformed himself. And as for knowing his devices, I was so well acquainted with them, that I can name none of them, nor you neither, as matter known to me.

Attorney. But why did you advise Winter to land my lord privy seal in the west country?

Throckmorton. He that told you that my mind was to land him there, doth partly tell you a reason why I said so, if you would remember as well the one as the other; but because you are so forgetful, I will recite wherefore: In communication betwixt Winter and me, as he declared to me that the Spaniards provided to bring their prince hither, so the Frenchmen prepared to interrupt his arrival, for they began to arm to the sea, and had already certain ships on the west coast, as he heard, unto whom I said, that peradventure not only the queen's ships under his charge might be in jeopardy, but also my lord privy seal, and all his train, the Frenchmen being well prepared to meet with them; and therefore for all events it were good you should put my said lord in the west country, in case you espy any jeopardy. - But what doth this prove to the treasons, if I were not able to give convenient reasons to my talk?

Stanford. Marry, sir, now cometh the proofs of your Treasons: you shall hear what Cuthbert Vaughan sayeth against you.

Then serjeant Stanford did read Vaughan's Confession tending to this effect, That Vaughan coming out of Kent, met with Throckmorton at Mr. Warner's house, who after he had done commendations from Wyat to him, desired to know where Crofts was; Throckmorton answered, either at Arundel house where he lodgeth, or in Paul's. Then Vaughan desired to know how things went at London, saying, Mr. Wyat and we of Kent do much mislike the Marriage with Spain, and the coming of the Spaniards for divers respects; howbeit, if other countries mislike them as Kent doth, they shall be but hardly welcome: and so they parted. Shortly after Throckmorton met with Vaughan in Paul's, unto whom Throckmorton declared with sundry circumstances, that the western men were in readiness to come forwards; and that sir Peter Caroe had sent unto him even now, and that he had in order a good band of horsemen, and another of footmen. Then Vaughan demanded what the earl of Devon would do; Throckmorton answered he will mar all, for he will not go hence; and yet sir Peter Caroe would meet him with a band both of horsemen and footmen, by the way of Andover, for his safeguard; and also he should have been well accompanied from hence with other gentlemen, yet all this will not move him to depart hence. Moreover, the said earl hath, as is said, discovered all the whole matter to the chancellor, or else it is come out by his tailor, about the trimming of a shirt of mail, and the making of a cloak. At another time, Vaughan saith, Throckmorton shewed him, that he had sent a post to sir Peter Caroe to come forward with as much speed as might be, and to bring his force with him. And also Throckmorton advised Vaughan to will Mr. Wyat come forward with his power, for now was the time, inasmuch as the Londoners would take his part, if the matter were presented unto them. Vaughan said also, that Throckmorton and Warner should have ridden with the said earl westward. Moreover, the said Vaughan deposed, that Throckmorton shewed him in talk of the earl of Pembroke, that the said earl would not fight against them, though he would not take their parts. Also Vaughan said, That Throckmorton shewed him that he would ride down to Berkshire to sir Francis Englefield's house, there to meet his eldest brother, to move him to take his part. And this was the sum of Cutbert Vaughan's Confession:

Stanford. How say you, doth not here appear evident matter to prove you a principal, who not only gave order to sir Peter Caroe and his adherents, for their rebellious acts in the west country; but also procured Wyat to make his Rebellion, appointing him and the others also, when they should attempt their enterprise, and how they should order their doings from time to time? besides all this evident matter, you were specially appointed to go away with the earl of Devon, as one that would direct all things, and give order to all men; and therefore Throckmorton, since this matter is so manifest, and the evidence so apparent, I would advise you to confess your fault, and submit yourself to the queen's mercy.

Bromley. How say you, will you confess the matter? and it will be best for you.

Throckmorton. No, I will never accuse myself unjustly; but inasmuch as I am come hither to be tried, I pray you let me have the law favourably.

Attorney. It is apparent that you lay at London as a factor, to give intelligence as well to them in the west, as to Wyat in Kent.

Throckmorton. How prove you that, or who doth accuse me but this condemned man?

Attorney. Why, will you deny this matter? you shall have Vaughan justify his whole Confession here before your face.

Throckmorton. It shall not need, I know his unshamefacedness, he hath avowed some of this untrue talk before this time to my face; and it is not otherwise like, considering the price, but he will do the same again.

Attorney. My lords and masters, you shall have Vaughan to justify this here before you all, and confirm it with a book oath.

Throckmorton. He that hath said and lied, will not, being in this case, stick to swear and lie.

Then was Cutbert Vaughan brought into the open Court.

Sendall. How say you, Cutbert Vaughan, is this your own Confession, and will you abide by all that is here written?

Vaughan. Let me see it, and I will tell you. Then his Confession was shewed him.

Attorney. Because you of the jury the better may credit him, I pray you my lords let Vaughan be sworn.

Then was Vaughan sworn on a book to say nothing but the truth.

Vaughan. It may please you my lords and masters, I could have been well content to have chose 7 years imprisonment, though I had been a free man in the law, rather than I would this day have given evidence against sir Nicholas Throckmorton, unto whom I bear no displeasure; but sitheince I must needs confess my knowledge, I must confess all that is there written is true. How say you Mr. Throckmorton, was there any displeasure between you and me, to move me to say aught against you?

Throckmorton. Not, that I know: how say you Vaughan, what acquaintance was there between you and me, and what letters of credit, or token did you bring me from Wyat, or any other, to move me to trust you?

Vaughan. As for acquaintance, I knew you as I did other gentlemen; and as for letters, I brought you none other but commendations from Mr. Wyat, as I did to divers other of his acquaintance at London.

Throckmorton. You might as well forge the commendations as the rest; but if you have done with Vaughan, my lords, I pray you give me leave to answer.

Bromley. Speak, and be short.

Throckmorton. I speak generally to all that be here present, but especially to you of my jury, touching the credit of Vaughan's Depositions against me, a condemned man; and after to the matter: and note, I pray you, the circumstances, the better to induce somewhat material. First, I pray you remember the small familiarity betwixt Vaughan and me, as he hath avowed before you, and moreover, to procure credit at my hand, he brought neither letter nor token from Wyat, nor from any other to me, which he also hath confessed here, and I will suppose Vaughan to be in as good condition as any other man here, that is to say, an uncondemned man; yet I refer it to your good judgment, whether it were like that I knowing only Vaughan's person from another man, and having none other acquaintance with him, would so frankly discover my mind to him in so dangerous a matter. How like, I say, is this, when divers of these gentlemen now in captivity, being my very familiars, could not depose any such matter against me, and nevertheless upon their examinations have said what they could? And though I be no wise man, I am not so rash to utter to an unknown man, for so may I call him in comparison, a matter so dangerous for me to speak, and him to hear; but because my truth and his falsehood shall the better appear unto you, I will declare his inconstancy in uttering this his evidence; and for my better credit, it may please you, Mr. Southwell, I take you to witness, when Vaughan first justified this his unjust accusation against me before the lord Paget, the lord chamberlain, you Mr. Southwell, and others, he referred the confirmation of this surmised matter to a letter sent from him to sir Tho. Wyat; which letter doth neither appear, nor any Testimony of the said Mr. Wyat against me touching the matter: for I doubt not sir Tho. Wyat hath been examined of me, and hath said what he could directly or indirectly. Also Vaughan saith, that young Edward Wyat could confirm this matter, as one that knew this pretended discourse betwixt Vaughan and me; and thereupon I made suit that Edward Wyat might either be brought face to face to me, or otherwise be examined.

Southwell. Mr. Throckmorton, you mistake your matter, for Vaughan said, that Edward Wyat did know some part of the matter, and also was privy to the letter that Vaughan sent to sir Tho. Wyat.

Throckmorton. Yea, sir, that was Vaughan's last shift, when I charged him before the master of the horse, and you, with his former allegations touching his witness; whom when he espied, would not do so lewdly as he thought, then he used this alteration: but where is Edw. Wyat's depositions of any thing against me, now it appeareth neither his first nor his last tale to be true? For you know, Mr. Bridges, and so doth my lord your brother, that I desired twice or thrice Edw. Wyat should be examined; and I am sure, and most assured, he hath been willed to say what he could, and here is nothing deposed by him against me, either touching any letter or other conference; or where is Vaughan's letter sent by sir Tho. Wyat concerning my talk?—But now I will speak of Vaughan's present estate, in that he is a condemned man, whose testimony is nothing worth by any law; and because false witness be mentioned in the Gospel, treating of Accusation, heark I pray you what St. Jerome saith, expounding the place: it is demanded why Christ's accusers be called false witnesses, which did report Christ's words not as he spake them; they be false witnesses, saith St. Jerome, which do add, alter, wrest, double or do speak for hope to avoid death, or for malice to procure another man's death: for all men may easily gather he cannot speak truly of me, or in the case of another man's life, where he hath hope of his own by accusation. Thus much speaketh St. Jerome of false witness. By the civil law there be many exceptions to be taken against such Testimonies; but because we be not governed by that law, neither I have my trial by it, it shall be superfluous to trouble you therewith, and therefore you shall hear what your own law doth say. There was a statute made in my late sovereign lord and master his time, touching Accusation, and these be the words: 'Be it enacted, That no person or persons, &c. shall be indicted, arraigned, condemned, or convicted for any offence of Treason, Petit Treason, Misprision of Treason, for which the same offender shall suffer any pains of death, imprisonment, loss or forfeiture of his goods, lands, &c. unless the same offender be accused by two sufficient and lawful witnesses, or shall willingly

'without violence confess the same.' And also in the 6th year of his reign, it is thus ratified as ensueth: 'That no person nor persons shall be indicted, arraigned, condemned, convicted or attainted of the Treasons or Offences aforesaid, or for any other Treasons that now be, or hereafter shall be, unless the same offender or offenders be thereof accused by two lawful and sufficient accusers; which at the time of Arraignment of the parties so accused, if they be then living, shall be brought in person before the said party accused, and avow and maintain that they have to say against the said party, to prove him guilty of the Treasons or offence contained in the Bill of Indictment laid against the party arraigned, unless the said party arraigned shall be willing without violence to confess the same.'—Here note I pray you, that our law doth require two lawful and sufficient Accusers to be brought face to face, and Vaughan is but one, and the same most unlawful and insufficient; for whib can be more unlawful and insufficient than a condemned man, and such one as knoweth to accuse me is the mean to save his own life? Remember, I pray you, now long and how many times Vaughan's execution hath been respited, and how often he hath been conjured to accuse, (which by God's grace he withstood until the last hour) what time perceiving there was no way to live, but to speak against me or some other, his former grace being taken away, did redeem his life most unjustly and shamefully, as you see.

Hare. Why should he accuse you more than any other, seeing there was no displeasure betwixt you, if the matter had not been true?

Throckmorton. Because he must either speak of some man, or suffer death; and then he did rather choose to hurt him he did least know, and so loved least, than any other well known to him, whom he loved most. But to you of my Jury I speak especially, and therefore I pray you note what I say: In a matter of less weight than trial of life and land, a man may by the law take Exceptions to such as be impaneled, to try the controversies betwixt the parties: as for example, a man may challenge that the sheriff is his enemy, and therefore hath made a partial return, or because one of the jury is the sheriff my adversary's servant; and also in case my adversary's villain or bondman be empaneled, I may lawfully challenge him, because the adversary part hath power over his villain's lands and goods, and hath the use of his body for servile office: much more I may of right take exception to Vaughan's Testimony, my life and all that I have depending thereupon; and the same Vaughan being more bound to the queen's highness, than my adversary, (that woe is me therefore, but so the law doth here so term her majesty) than any villain is to his lord; for her highness hath not only power over his body, lands, and goods, but over his life also.

Stanford. Yea, the exceptions are to be taken against the Jury in that case; but not against the witness or accuser, and therefore your argument serveth little for you.

Throckmorton. That is not so, for the use of the Jury, and the witness, and the effect of their doings doth serve me to my purpose, as the law shall discuss. And thus I make my comparison: by the civil law the judge doth give Sentence upon the Depositions of the witness, and by your law the Judge doth give Judgment upon the verdict of the Jury, so as the effect is both one to finish the matter, trial in law, as well by the depositions of the witness, as by the jury's verdict, though they vary in form and circumstance; and so Vaughan's testimony being credited, may be the material cause of my condemnation, as the jury may be induced by his deposition to speak their verdict, and so finally thereupon the judge to give sentence. Therefore I may use the same exceptions against the jury, or any of them, as the principal mean, that shall occasion my condemnation.

Bronley. Why, do you deny, that every part of Vaughan's tale is untrue?

Attorney. You may see he will deny all, and say there was no such communication betwixt them.

Throckmorton. I confess some part of Vaughan's Confession to be true, as the name, the places, the time, and some part of the matter.

Attorney. So you of the Jury may perceive the prisoner doth confess something to be true.

Throckmorton. As touching my sending to sir Peter Caroe, or his sending to me, or concerning my advice to Mr. Wyat to stir, or to repair hither, or touching the earl of Devon parting hence, and my going with him, and also concerning the matter of the earl of Pembroke, I do avow and say that Vaughan hath said untruly.

Southwell. As for my lord of Pembroke, you need not excuse the matter, for he hath shewed himself clear in these matters like a nobleman, and that we all know.

Hare. Why what was the talk betwixt Vaughan and you so long in Paul's, if these were not so, and what meant your oft meetings?

Throckmorton. As for our often meetings, they were of no set purpose, but by chance, and yet no oftener than twice; but sithence you would know what communication passed betwixt us in Paul's church, I will declare. We talked of the incommodities of the Marriage of the queen with the prince of Spain, and how grievous the Spaniards would be to us here. Vaughan said, that it should be very dangerous for any man that truly professed the gospel to live here, such was the Spaniards cruelty, and especially against christian men. Whereunto I answered, it was the plague of God come justly upon us; and now Almighty God dealt with us, as he did with the Israelites, taking from them for their unthankfulness their godly kings, and did send tyrants to reign over them; even so he handled us Englishmen, which had a most godly and virtuous prince to reign over us, my late sovereign lord and master king Edward, under whom we might both safely and lawfully profess God's word; which with our lewd doings, demeanor, and living, we handled so irreverently, that to whip us for our faults, he would send us strangers, yea such very tyrants to exercise great tyranny over us, and did take away the virtuous and faithful king from amongst us; for every man of every estate did colour his naughty affections with a pretence of religion, and made the gospel a stalking horse to bring their evil desires to effect. This was the sum of our talk in Paul's, somewhat more dilated.

Stanford. That it may appear yet more evidently how Throckmorton was a principal doer and counsellor in this matter, you shall hear his own Confession of his own hand writing. The Clerk did begin to read; Throckmorton desired master Stanford to read it, and the Jury well to mark it. Then master Stanford did read the prisoner's own Confession to this effect, That Throckmorton had conference with Wyat, Caroe, Croftes, Rogers, and Warner, as well of the queen's Marriage with the prince of Spain, as also of Religion, and did particularly confer with every the forenamed of the matters aforesaid. Moreover, with sir Thomas Wyat, the prisoner talked of the bruit, that the Western Men should much mislike the coming of the Spaniards into this realm, being reported also that they intended to interrupt their arrival here: And also that it was said, that they were in consultation about the same at Exeter. Wyat also did say, that sir Peter Caroe could not bring the same matter to good effect, nor was there any man so meet to bring it to good effect, as the earl of Devon; and especially in the west country, in as much as they did not draw all by one line. Then Throckmorton asked how the Kentishmen were affected to the Spaniards? Wyat said, the people like them evil enough, and that appeared now at the coming of the count Eginont, for they were ready to stir against him and his train, supposing it had been the prince; but said Wyat, sir Robt. Southwell, master Baker, and master Moyle, and their affinity, which be in good credit in some places of the shire, will for other malicious respects hinder the liberty of their country. Then Throckmorton should say, though I know there hath been an unkindness betwixt master Southwell and you for a money matter, wherein I travelled to make you friends, I doubt not, but in so honest a matter as this is, he will for the safeguard of his country join with you, and so you may be sure of the lord Burgaine and his force. Then Wyat said, it is for another matter than for money that we disagree, wherein he hath handled me and others very doubly and un-neighbourly; howbeit, he can do no other, neither to me, nor to any other man, and therefore I forgive him. Item, with sir Peter Caroe, Throckmorton had conference touching the impeachment of the landing of the said

prince, and touching provision of armour and ammunition, as ensueth; that is to say, that sir Peter Caroe told Throckmorton, that he trusted his countrymen would be true Englishmen, and would not agree to let the Spaniards to govern them. Item, the said sir Peter Caroe said, the matter importing the French king as it did, he thought the French king would work to lunder the Spaniards coming hither, with whom the said sir Peter did think good to practise for armour, ammunitions and money. Then Throckmorton did advise him to beware that he brought any Frenchmen into the realm forceably, in as much as he could as evil abide the Frenchmen after that sort as the Spaniards. And also Throckmorton thought the French king unable to give aid to us, by means of the great consumption in their own wars. Master Caroe said, as touching the bringing in of Frenchmen, he meant it not, for he loved neither party, but to serve his own country, and to help his country from bondage; declaring further to Throckmorton, that he had a small bark of his own to work his practise by; and so he said, that shortly he intended to depart to his own country to understand the devotion of his countrymen. Item, Throckmorton did say, he would for his part hinder the coming in of the Spaniards as much as he could by persuasion. Item, to sir Edw. Warner, he had and did bemoan his own estate, and the tyranny of the time extended upon divers honest persons for religion, and wished it were lawful for all of each religion to live safely according to their conscience; for the law, ex officio, will be intolerable, and the clergy's discipline now may rather be resembled to the Turks tyranny, than to the teaching of Christian religion. This was the sum of the matter, which was read in the foresaid confession, as matters most grievous against the prisoner. Then Throckmorton said, sithence Mr. Serjeant you have read and gathered the place as you think, that maketh most against me; I pray you take the pains, and read further, that hereafter whatsoever become of me, thy words be not perverted and abused to the hurt of some others, and especially against the great personages, of whom I have been sundry times (as appeareth by my answers) examined; for I perceive the net was not cast only for little fishes, but for the great ones, justu adagium.

Stanford. It shall be but loss of time, and we have other things to charge you withall, and this that you desire doth make nothing for you.

Dyer. And for the better confirmation of all the Treasons objected against the prisoner, and therein to prove him guilty, you of the Jury shall hear the duke of Suffolk's Depositions against him, who was a principal, and hath suffered accordingly. Then the said Serjeant read the duke's Confession touching the prisoner, amounting to this effect; That the lord Thomas Grey did inform the said duke, that sir Nich. Throckmorton was privy to the whole devices against the Spaniards, and was one that should go into the West-country with the earl of Devonshire.

Throckmorton. But what doth the principal author of this matter say against me, I mean the lord Thomas Grey, who is yet living? Why is not his Deposition brought against me, for so it ought to be, if he can say any thing? Will you know the truth? Neither the lord Tho. Grey hath said, can say, or will say any thing against me, notwithstanding the duke his brother's Confession and Accusation, who hath affirmed many other things besides the truth. I speak not without certain knowledge: for the lord Thomas Grey, being my prison-fellow for a small time, informed me, that the duke his brother had misreported him in many things, amongst others in matters touching me, which he had declared to you Mr. Southwell, and other the examiners not long ago. I am sure if the lord Thomas could or would have said any thing, it should have been here now: And as to the duke's Confession, it is not material, for he doth refer the matter to the lord Thomas's report, who hath made my purgation.

Attorney. And it please you my Lords, and you my masters of the Jury, besides these matters touching Wyat's Rebellion, sir Peter Caroe's Treasons, and confederating with the duke of Suffolk; and besides the prisoner's Conspiracy with the earl of Devon, with Crofts, Rogers, Warner, and sundry others in sundry places, it shall manifestly appear unto you, that Throckmorton did conspire the queen's majesty's Death with Wm. Thomas, sir Nich. Arnold, and other Traitors intending the same; which is the greatest matter of all others, and most to be abhorred; and for the proof hereof you shall hear what Arnold saith. Then was sir Nich. Arnold's Confession read, affirming that Throckmorton shewed unto him, riding betwixt Hinam and Crosse Laund in Gloucestershire, that John Fitzwilliams was very much displeased with William Thomas.

Attorney. Wm. Thomas devised, that John Fitzwilliams should kill the queen; and Throckmorton knew of it, as appeareth by Arnold's Confession.

Throckmorton. First, I deny that I said any such thing to Mr. Arnold; and though he be an honest man, he may either forget himself, or devise means how to unburthen himself of so weighty a matter as this is; for he is charged with the matter as principal, which I did perceive when he charged me with his tale; and therefore I do blame him the less, that he seeketh how to discharge himself, using me as a witness, if he could so transfer the device to Wm. Thomas. But truly, I never spake any such words unto him; and for my better Declaration, I did see John Fitzwilliams here even now, who can testify, that he never shewed me of any displeasure betwixt them; and as I know nothing of the displeasure betwixt them, so I know nothing of the cause. I pray you, my lords, let him be called to depose in this matter what he can.

Then John Fitzwilliams drew to the bar, and presented himself to depose his knowledge in the matter in open court.

Attorney. I pray you, my lords, suffer him not to be sworn, neither to speak; we have nothing to do with him.

Throckmorton. Why should he not be suffered to tell truth? And why be ye not so well contented to hear truth for me, as untruth against me?

Hare. Who called you hither, Fitzwilliams, or commanded you to speak? you are a very busy officer.

Throckmorton. I called him, and do humbly desire that he may speak and be heard as well as Vaughan, or else I am not indifferently used; especially seeing master Attorney doth so press this matter against me.

Southwell. Go you ways Fitzwilliams, the court hath nothing to do with you; peradventure you would not be so ready in a good cause.

Then John Fitzwilliams departed the court, and was not suffered to speak.

Throckmorton. Since this gentleman's Declaration may not be admitted, I trust you of the Jury can perceive, it was not for any thing he had to say against me; but contrarywise, that it was feared he would speak for me. And now to master Arnold's Depositions against me, I say I did not tell him any such words; so as if it were material, there is but his yea and my nay. But because the words be not sore strained against me, I pray you, master Attorney, why might not I have told master Arnold, that John Fitzwilliams was angry with Wm. Thomas, and yet know no cause of the anger? it might be understood, to disagree oftentimes. Who doth confess that I know any thing of Wm. Thomas's device touching the queen's Death? I will answer, no man: for master Arnold doth mention no word of that matter, but of the displeasures betwixt them; and to speak that, doth neither prove Treason, nor knowledge of Treason. Is here all the Evidence against me that you have to bring me within the compass of the Indictment.

Stanford. Methink the matters confessed by others against you, together with your own confession, will weigh shrewdly. But how say you to the Rising in Kent, and to Wyat's attempt against the queen's royal person at her palace?

Bromley. Why do you not read Wyat's Accusation to him, which doth make him partner to his Treasons?

Southwell. Wyat has grievously accused you, and in many things that others have confirmed.

Throckmorton. Whatsoever Wyat hath said of me in hope of his life, he unsaid it at his death. For since I came into this Hall, I heard one say (but I know him not) that Wyat, upon the scaffold, did not only purge my lady Elizabeth her grace, and the earl of Devonshire, but also all the gentlemen in the Tower, saying, they were all ignorant of the stir and commotion; in which number I take myself.

Hare. Notwithstanding he said, all that he had written and confessed to the council, was true.

Throckmorton. Nay, sir, by your patience, master Wyat said not so, that was master doctor's Addition.

Southwell. It appeareth you have added good intelligence.

Throckmorton. Almighty God provided that revelation for me this day since I came hither: for I have been in close prison these 58 days, where I heard nothing but what the birds told me, which did fly over my head. And now to you of my Jury I speak especially, whom I desire to mark attentively, what shall be said: I have been indicted, as it appeareth, and now am arraigned of compassing the queen's majesty's death, of levying war against the queen, of taking the Tower of London, of deposing and depriving the queen of her royal estate, and finally to destroy her, and of adherence to the queen's enemies. Of all which Treasons, to prove me guilty, the queen's learned council hath given in Evidence these points material: that is to say, for the compassing or imagining the queen's death, and the destruction of her royal person, sir Nich. Arnold's Depositions; which is, that I should say to the said sir Nicholas in Gloucestershire, that master John Fitzwilliams was angry with Wm. Thomas. Whereunto I have answered, as you have heard, both denying the matter; and for the proof on my side, do take exception, because there is no witness but one. And nevertheless, though it were granted, the Depositions prove nothing concerning the queen's death. For levying of war against the queen, there is alledged my conference with sir Tho. Wyat, sir James Crofts, sir Edw. Rogers, sir Edw. Warner, against the Marriage with Spain, and the coming of the Spaniards hither; which talk I do not deny in sort as I spake it, and meant it; and notwithstanding the malicious gathering this day of my conference, proveth yet no levying of war. There is also alledged for proof of the same Article, sir James Croft's Confession, which as you remember implieth no such thing, but general talk against the Marriage with Spain, and of my departing westward with the earl of Devon, which the said James doth not avow, and therefore I pray you consider it as not spoken. There is also for proof of the said article, the duke of Suffolk's Confession, with whom I never had conference; and therefore he avouched the tale of his brother's mouth, who hath made my purgation in those matters, and yet if the matter were proved, they be not greatly material in law. There is also alledged for the further proof of the same Article, and for deposing and depriving the queen of her royal estate, and for my adhering to the queen's enemies, Cuthbert Vaughan's Confession, whose testimony I have sufficiently disproved by sundry authorities and circumstances, and principally by your own law, which doth require two lawful and sufficient witnesses to be brought face to face. Also for the taking of the Tower of London, there is alledged Winter's Depositions, which uttereth my unliking, when he uttereth unto me sir Thomas Wyatt's resolution and device for attempting of the said peace. And last of all, to enforce these matters, mine own Confession is engrieved greatly against me, wherein there doth appear neither Treason, neither concealment of Treason, neither whispering of Treason, nor procurement of Treason. And for as much as I am come hither to be tried by the law, though my innocency of all these points maerial objected, be apparent to acquit me, whereunto I do principally cleave; yet I will for your better credit and satisfactions shew you evidently, that if you would believe all the Depositions laid against me, which I trust you will not do, I ought not to be attained of the Treason comprised within my Indictment, considering the Statute of Repeal the last parliament, of all Treasons, other than such as be declared in the 25th year of king Edward 3d; both which statutes I pray you my lords may be read here to the inquest.

Bromley. No, for there shall be no books brought at your desire; we know the law sufficiently without book.

Throckmorton. Do you bring me hither to try me by the law, and will not shew me the law? What is your knowledge of the law to these men's satisfactions, which have my trial in hand? I pray you, my lords, and my lords all, let the statutes be read, as well for the queen, as for me.

Stanford. My lord chief justice can shew the law, and will, if the Jury do doubt of any point.

Throckmorton. You know it were indifferent that I should know and hear the law whereby I am adjudged; and forasmuch as the Statute is in English, men of meaner learning than the Justices, can understand it, or else how should we know when we offend?

Hare. You know not what belongeth to your case, and therefore we must teach you: it appertaineth not to us to provide books for you, neither sit we here to be taught of you; you should have taken better heed to the law before you had come hither.

Throckmorton. Because I am ignorant, I would learn, and therefore I have more need to see the law, and partly as well for the instructions of the Jury, as for my own satisfaction, which methink, were for the honour of this presence. And now if it please you my lord chief justice, I do direct my speech specially to you. What time it pleased the queen's majesty, to call you to this honourable office, I did learn of a great personage of her highness's privy council, that amongst other good instructions, her majesty charged and enjoined you to minister the law and justice indifferently without respect of persons. And notwithstanding the old error amongst you, which did not admit any witness to speak, or any other matter to be heard in the favour of the adversary, her majesty being party, her highness's pleasure was, that whatsoever could be brought in the favour of the subject, should be admitted to be heard. And moreover, that you specially, and likewise all other justices, should not persuade themselves to sit in judgment otherwise for her highness, than for her subject. Therefore this manner of indifferent proceeding being principally enjoined by God's commaundment, which I had thought partly to have remembered you and others here in commission in the beginning, if I might have had leave; and the same also being commaunded you by the queen's own mouth, methink you ought of right to suffer me to have the statutes read openly, and also to reject nothing that could be spoken in my defence: and in thus doing you shall shew yourselves worthy ministers, and fit for so worthy a mistress.

Bromley. You mistake the matter, the queen spake those words to master Morgan chief justice of the Common Pleas; but you have no cause to complain, for you have been suffered to talk at your pleasure.

Hare. What would you do with the Statute-Book? the Jury doth not require it, they have heard the Evidence, and they must upon their conscience try whether you be guilty or no, so as the book needeth not: if they will not credit the Evidence so apparent, then they know what they have to do.

Chobley. You ought not to have any books read here at your appointment, for where doth arise any doubt in the law, the judges sit here to inform the court; and now you do but spend time.

Attorney. I pray you my lord chief justice repeat the Evidence for the queen, and give the Jury their Charge, for the prisoner will keep you here all day.

Bromley. How say you, have you any more to say for yourself?

Throckmorton. You seem to give and offer me the law, but in very deed I have only the form and the image of the law; nevertheless, since I cannot be suffered to have the statutes read openly in the Book, I will by your patience guess at them, as I may, and I pray you to help me if I mistake, for it is long since I did see them. The Statute of Repeal made the last parliament hath these words, 'Be it enacted by the queen, that from henceforth none act, deed, or offence, being by act of parliament or statute made Treason, Petit Treason, or Misprision of Treason, by words, writing, printing, ciphering, deeds, or otherwise whatsoever, shall be taken, had, deemed, or adjudged Treason, Petit Treason; but only such as be declared, or expressed to be Treason, in or by an act of parliament made in the 25th year of Edward 3d, touching and concerning Treasons, and the Declarations of Treasons, and none other.' Here may you see this statute doth refer all the offences aforesaid, to the statute of the 25th of Edward 3d, which statute hath these words touching and concerning the Treasons that I am indicted and arraigned of; that is to say, 'Whosoever

'doth compass or imagine the death of the king, or levy war against the king in his realm, or being adherent to the king's enemies within this realm, or elsewhere, and be thereof probably attained by open deed by people of their condition, shall be adjudged a Traitor.' Now I pray you of my Jury which have my life in trial, note well what things at this day be Treasons, and how these Treasons must be tried and discerned, that is to say, by open deed, which the laws doth at some time term overt act. And now I ask, notwithstanding my Indicement, which is but matter alledged, where doth appear the open deed of any compassing or imagining the queen's death; or where doth appear any open deed of being adherent to the queen's enemies, giving to them aid and comfort; or where doth appear any open deed of taking the Tower of London?

Bromley. Why do not you of the Queen's learned counsel answer him? Methink Throckmorton, you need not to have the Statutes, for you have them meetly perfectly.

Stanford. You are deceived, to conclude all Treasons by the statute of the 25th of Edw. the 3rd; for that Statute is but a Declaration of certain Treasons, which were Treasons before at the common law. Even so there doth remain divers other treasons at this day at the common law, which be not expressed by that statute, as the Judges can declare. Nevertheless, there is matter sufficient alledged and proved against you to bring you within the compass of the same statute.

Throckmorton. I pray you express those matters that bring me within the compass of the Statute of Edw. the 3rd; for the words be these, 'And be thereof attained by open deed by people of like condition.'

Bromley. Throckmorton, you deceive yourself, and mistake these words, 'by people of their condition;' for thereby the law doth understand the discovering of your treasons. As for example, Wyat and the other rebels, attained for their great treasons, already declare you to be his and their adherent, in as much as divers and sundry times you had conference with him and them about the treason; so as Wyat is now one of your condition; who as the world knoweth, hath committed an open traiterous fact.

Throckmorton. By your leave, my lord, this is a very strange and singular understanding. For I suppose the meaning of the law-makers did understand these words, 'By people of their condition,' of the state and condition of those persons which should be on the inquest to try the party arraigned, guilty or not guilty, and nothing to the bevraying of the offence by another man's act as you say: for what have I to do with Wyat's acts, that was not nigh him by 100 miles?

Attorney. Will you take upon you to skill better of the law than the Judges? I doubt not but you of the Jury will credit as it becometh you.

Cholmley. Concerning the true understanding of these words, 'By people of their condition,' my lord chief justice here hath declared the truth; for Wyat was one of your condition, that is to say, of your conspiracy.

Hare. You do not deny, Throckmorton, but that there hath been conference, and sending between Wyat and you, and he and Winter doth confess the same, with others; so as it is plain, Wyat may well be called one of your condition.

Throckmorton. Well, seeing you my Judges rule the understanding of these words in the Statute, 'By people of your condition,' thus strangely against me, I will not stand longer upon them. But where doth appear in me an open deed, whereunto the Treason is specially referred?

Bromley. If three or four do talk, devise, and conspire together of a traiterous act to be done, and afterwards one of them doth commit Treason, as Wyat did; then the law doth repute them, and every of them as their acts; so as Wyat's acts do imply and argue your open deed, and so the law doth term it and take it.

Throckmorton. These be marvellous expositions, and wonderful implications, that another man's act, whereof I was not privy, should be accounted mine; for Wyat did purge me that I knew nothing of his stir.

Hare. Yea, Sir, but you were a principal procurer and contriver of Wyat's Rebellion, though you were not with him when he made the stir. And as my lord here hath said, the law always doth adjudge him a traitor, which was privy and doth procure treason, or any other man to commit treason, or a traiterous act, as you did Wyat, and others; for so the overt act of those which did it by your procurement, shall in this case be accounted your open deed. We have a common case in the law, if one by procurement should disseise you of your land, the law holdeth us both wrong doers, and giveth remedy as well against the one as the other.

Throckmorton. For God's sake apply not such constructions against me; and though my present estate doth not move you, yet it were well you should consider your office, and think what measure you give to others, you yourselves I say shall assuredly receive the same again. The state of mortal life is such, that men know full little what hangeth over them. I put on within this 12 months such a mind, that I, most woeful wight, was as unlike to stand here, as some of you that sit there. As to your case last recited, whereby you would conclude, I have remembered and learned of you master Hare, and you master Stanford in the Parliament House, where you did sit to make laws, to expound and explain the ambiguities and doubts of law sincerely, and that without affections: There I say, I learned of you, and others my masters of the law, this difference betwixt such cases as you remembered one even now, and the Statute whereby I am to be tried. There is a Maxim or principle in the law, which ought not to be violated,

'That no penal Statute may, ought, or should be construed, expounded, extended, or wrested, otherwise than the simple words and nude letter of the same statute doth warrant and signify.' And amongst divers good and notable reasons by you these in the Parliament House debated, master Serjeant Stanford, I noted this one, why the said Maxim ought to be inviolable: you said, considering the private affections many times both of princes and ministers within this realm, for that they were men, and would and could err, it should be no security, but very dangerous to the subject, to refer the construction, and extending of penal statutes to any judge's equity, as you termed it, which might either by fear, of the higher powers be seduced, or by ignorance and folly abused. And that is an answer by procurement.

Bromley. Notwithstanding the principle, as you alledge it, and the preciseness of your sticking to the bare words of the Statute, it doth appear and remain of record in our learning, that divers cases have been adjudged Treason, without the express words of the statute, as the queen's learned council there can declare.

Attorney. It doth appear, the prisoner did not only intice or procure Wyat, Caroe, Rogers, and others, to commit their traitorous acts, and there doth his open facts appear, which Vaughan's Confession doth witness; but also he did mind shortly after to associate himself with those traitors; for he minded to have departed with the earl of Devonshire westward.

Throckmorton. My innocency concerning these matters, I trust, sufficiently appeareth by my former Answers, notwithstanding the condemned man's unjust Accusation. But because the true understanding of the Statute is in question; I say, procurement, and specially by words only, is without the compass of it: and that I do learn and prove by the principle which I learned of master Stanford.

Stanford. Master Throckmorton, you and I may not agree this day in the understanding of the law, for I am for the queen, and you speak for yourself: the Judges' must determine the matter.

Bromley. He that doth procure another man to commit a felony or a murder, I am sure you know well enough, the law doth adjudge the procurer there, a felon or a murderer; and in case of Treason, it hath been always so taken and reputed.

Throckmorton. I do and must cleave to my innocency, for I procured no man to commit Treason; but yet for my learning I desire to hear some case so ruled, when the law was as it is now. I do confess it, that at such time there were Statutes provided for the procurer, counsellor, aider, abettor, and such like, as there were in king Henry 8th's time, you might lawfully make this cruel construction, and bring the procurer within the compass of the law. But these statutes being repealed, you ought not now so to do; and as to the principal in Treason, for the principal and accessories in felony and murder be triable and punishable by the common law; and so in those cases the Judges may use their equity, extending the determination of the fault as they think good: but in Treason it is otherwise, the same being limited by Statute Law, which I say and avow is restrained from any Judge's construction by the Maxim that I recited.

Stanford. Your lordships do know a case in Rd. 3's time, where the procurer to counterfeit false money, was judged a Traitor, and the law was as it is now.

Hare. Master Serjeant doth remember you Throckmorton, of an experience before our time, that the law hath been so taken, and yet the procurer was not expressed in the statute, but the law hath been always so taken.

Throckmorton. I never studied the law, whereof I do much repeat me; yet I remember, whilst Penal Statutes were talked of in the Parliament-House, you the learned men of the house remembered some Cases contrary to this last spoken of. And if I misreport them, I pray you help me. In the like case you speak of concerning the procurer to counterfeit false Money, at one time the procurer was judged a felon, and at another time neither felon nor traitor; so as some of your predecessors adjudged the procurer no traitor in the same case, but leaned to their principle, though some other extend their constructions too large. And here is two cases with me, for one against me.

Bromley. Because you reply so sore upon the principle, I will remember, where one taking the Great Seal of England from one writing, and putting it to another, was adjudged a Traitor in Henry 4's time, and yet his act was not within the express words of the Statute of Edw. the third: There be divers other such like cases that may be alledged and need were.

Throckmorton. I pray you my Lord Chief Justice, call to your good remembrance, that in the self same case of the Seal (a), Justice Spilman, a grave and well learned man, since that time, would not condemn the offender, but did reprove that former Judgment by you last remembered, as erroneous.

Stanford. If I had thought you had been so well furnished with Book Cases I would have been better provided for you.

Throckmorton. I have nothing but I learned of you specially master Serjeant, and of others my masters of the law in the Parliament House; and therefore I may say with the propbet, Salutem ex inimicis nostris.

Southwell. You have a very good memory.

Attorney. If the prisoner may avoid his Treasons after this manner the queen's surety shall be in great jeopardy. For Jack Cade, the Blacksmith, and divers other Traitors, sometime alledging the law for them, sometime they meant no harm to the king, but against his counsel; as Wyat, the duke of Suffolk, and these did against the Spaniards, when there was no Spaniards within the realm. The duke and his brethren did mistake the law, as you do, yet at length did confess their ignorance, and submitted themselves. And so were you best to do.

Throckmorton. As to Cade and the Blacksmith, I am not so well acquainted with their Treasons as you be; but I have read in the Chronicle, they were in the field with a force against the prince, whereby a manifest act did appear. As to the duke of Suffolk's doings, they appertain not to me. And though you would compare my speech and talk against the Spaniards, to the duke's acts, who assembled a force in arms, it is evident they differ much: I am sorry to enquire any other mans doings; but it serveth me for a piece of my Defence, and therefore I wish that no man should gather evil of it. God forbid that words and acts be thus confounded.

Attorney. Sir W. Stanley used this shift that the prisoner useth now, he said he did not levy war against king Henry 7th, but said to the duke of Buckingham, that in a good quarrel he would aid him with 500 men: and nevertheless Stanley was for those words attainted, who as all the world knoweth, had before that timeserved the king very faithfully and truly (b).

Throckmorton. I pray you master Attorney do not conclude me by blind contraries. Whether you alludge Stanley's Case truly or no, I know not. But admit it be as you say, what doth this prove against me? I promised no aid to master Wyat, nor to any other. The duke of Buckingham levied war against the king, with whom Stanley was confederate so to do, as you say.

Attorney. I pray you, my lords that be the queen's Commissioners, suffer not the prisoner to use the queen's learned counsel thus; I was never interrupted thus in my life, nor I never knew any thus suffered to talk, as this prisoner is suffered: some of us will come no more at the bar, and we be thus handled.

Bromley. Throckmorton, you must suffer the queen's learned counsel to speak, or else we must take order with you; you have had leave to talk at your pleasure.

Hare. It is proved that you did talk with Wyat against the coming of the Spaniards, and devised to interrupt their arrival, and you promised to do what you could against them: whereupon Wyat being encouraged by you, did levy a force, and attempted war against the queen's royal person.

Throckmorton. It was no treason, nor no procurement of treason, to talk against the coming hither of the Spaniards, neither it was treason for me to say, I would hinder their coming hither as much as I could, understanding me rightly as I meant it; yea though you would extend it to the worst, it was but words, it was not treason at this day as the law standeth; and as for Wyat's doings, they touch me nothing, for at his death, when it was no time to report untruly, he purged me.

Bromley. By sundry cases remembered here by the queen's learned counsel, as you have heard, that procurement which did appear no otherwise but by words, and those you would make nothing, hath been of long time, and by sundry well learned men in the laws adjudged Treason. And therefore your procurement being so evident as it is, we may lawfully say it was Treason, because Wyat performed a traitorous act.

Throckmorton. As to the said alledged four precedents against me, I have recited as many for me, and I would you my Lord Chief Justice should incline your judgments rather after the example of your honourable predecessors, justice Markham, and others, which did eschew corrupt judgments, judging directly and sincerely after the law, and the principles in the same, than after such men, as swerving from the truth, the maxim, and the law, did judge corruptly, maliciously, and affectionately.

Bromley. Justice Markham had reason to warrant his doings; for it did appear, a merchant of London was arraigned and slanderously accused of Treason for compassing and imagining the king's Death, he did say 'he would make his son heir of the Crown,' and the merchant meant it of a House in Cheapside at the sign of the Crown; but your Case is not so.

Throckmorton. My case doth differ, I grant, but specially because I have not such a Judge; yet there is another cause to restrain these your strange and extraordinary constructions; that is to say, a Proviso in the latter end of the Statute of Edw. 3. having these words: 'Provided always, if any other case of supposed Treason shall chance hereafter to come in question or trial before any justice, other than is in the said statute expressed, that then the justice shall forbear to adjudge the said case, until it be shewed to the Parliament to try, whether it should be Treason or Felony.' Here you are restrained by express words to adjudge any case that is not manifestly mentioned before, and until it be shewed to the Parliament.

Portman. That Proviso I understand of cases, that may come in trial, which hath been in ure, but the law hath always taken the Procurer to be a principal offender.

Sanders. The law always in cases of Treason doth account all principals, and no accessories as in other offences; and therefore a man offending in Treason, either by covert act or procurement, whereupon an open deed hath ensued, as in this case, is adjudged by the law a principal traitor.

Throckmorton. You adjudge, methink, procurement very hardly, besides the principal, and besides the good example of your best and most godly learned predecessors, the Judges of the realm, as I have partly declared; and notwithstanding this grievous racking and extending of this word procurement, I am not in the danger of it, for it doth appear by no Deposition, that

(b) See No. 25, p. 277.

I procured neither one nor other to attempt any act.

Stanford. The Jury have to try, whether it be so or no, let it weigh as it will.

Hare. I know no mean so apparent to try Procurement as by words, and that mean is probable enough against you, as well by your own Confession, as by other men's Depositions.

Throckmorton. To talk of the queen's Marriage with the prince of Spain, and also the coming hither of the Spaniards, is not to procure Treason to be done; for then the whole Parliament house, I mean the Common house, did procure Treason: but since you will make no difference betwixt words and acts, I pray you remember a Statute made in my late sovereign lord and master's time, king Edward the 6th, which apparently expresseth the difference; these be the words: 'Whosoever doth compass, or imagine to depose the king of his royal estate by open preaching, express words or sayings, shall for the first offence lose and forfeit to the king all his and their goods and chattels, and also shall suffer imprisonment of their bodies at the king's will and pleasure. Whosoever, &c. for the second offence shall lose and forfeit to the king the whole issues and profits of all his or their lands, tenements, and other hereditaments, benefices, prebends, and other spiritual promotions. Whosoever, &c. for the third offence, shall for term of life or lives of such offender or offenders, &c. and shall also forfeit to the king's majesty all his or their goods and chattels, and suffer during his or their lives perpetual imprisonment of his or their bodies. But whosoever, &c. by writing, cyphering, or act, shall for the first offence be adjudged a Traitor, and suffer the pains of death.' Here you may perceive how the whole realm and all your judgments hath before this understood words and acts, diversly and apparently; and therefore the judgments of the parliament did assign diversity of punishments, because they would not confound the true understanding of words and deeds, appointing for compassing and imagining by word, imprisonment; and for compassing and imagining by open deed, pains of death.

Bromley. It is agreed by the whole Bench, that the Procurer and the Adherent be deemed always traitors, when as a traitorous act was committed by any one of the same conspiracy; and there is apparent proof of your adhering to Wyat, by your own confession and other ways.

Throckmorton. Adhering and procuring be not all one; for the statute of Edw. 3 doth speak of adhering, but not of procuring, and yet adhering ought not to be further extended, than to the queen's enemies within her realm, for so the statute doth limit the understanding. And Wyat was not the queen's enemy, for he was not so reputed, when I talked with him last; and our speech implied no enmity, neither tended to any treason, or procuring of treason: and therefore I pray you of the jury note, though I argue the law, I alledge my innocency, as the best part of my defence.

Hare. Your adhering to the queen's enemies within the realm is evidently proved: for Wyat was the queen's enemy within the realm, as the whole realm knoweth it, and he hath confessed it, both at his Arraignment and at his Death.

Throckmorton. By your leave, neither Wyat at his Arraignment, nor at his Death, did confess, that he was the queen's enemy, when I talked last with him, neither he was reputed nor taken in 14 days after, until he assembled a force in arms, what time I was at your house, master Inglefield, where I learned the first intelligence of Wyat's stir. And I ask you, who doth depose that there passed any manner of advertisement betwixt Wyat and me, after he had discovered his doings, and shewed himself an enemy? If I had been so disposed, who did let me, that I did not repair to Wyat, or to send to him, or to the duke of Suffolk either, who was in mine own country? and thither I might have gone and conveyed myself with him, unsuspected for my departing homewards.

Inglefield. It is true that you were there at my house, accompanied with others your brethren, and, to my knowledge, ignorant of these matters.

Bromley. Throckmorton, you confessed you talked with Wyat and others against the coming of the Spaniards, and of the taking of the Tower of London; whereupon Wyat levied a force of men against the Spaniards he said, and so you say all, but indeed it was against the queen, which he confessed at length: therefore Wyat's acts do prove you counsellor and procurer, howsoever you would avoid the matter.

Throckmorton. Methink you would conclude me with a mishapen argument in logick, and you will give me leave, I will make another.

Stanford. The judges sit not here to make disputations, but to declare the law, which hath been sufficiently done, if you would consider it.

Hare. You have heard reason and the law, if you will conceive it.

Throckmorton. Oh merciful God! Oh eternal Father, which seest all things, what manner of proceedings are these? To what purpose serveth the Statute of Repeal the last parliament, where I heard some of you here present, and divers other of the queen's learned council grievously inveigh against the cruel and bloody laws of king Henry 3th, and against some laws made in my late sovereign lord and master's time, king Edw. 6th.? Some termed them Draco's Laws, which were written in blood (a): some said they were more intolerable than any laws, that Dionysius or any other tyrant made. In conclusion, as many men, so many bitter terms and names those laws had. And moreover, the preface of the same Statute doth recite, that for words only, many great personages, and others of good behaviour, hath been most cruelly cast away by these former sanguinolent thirsty laws, with many other suggestions for the repeal of the same. And now let us put on indifferent eyes, and thoroughly consider with ourselves, as you the Judges handle the constructions of the statute of Edw. 3d, with your equity and extensions, whether we be not in much worse case now than we were when those cruel laws yoked us. These laws albeit they were grievous and captious, yet they had the very propriety of a law after St. Paul's description: for those laws did admonish us, and discover our sins plainly unto us; and when a man is warned, he is half armed. These laws, as they be handled, be very baits to catch us, and only prepared for the same, and no laws; for at the first sight they ascertain us we be delivered from our old bondage, and by the late repeal of the last parliament we live in more security. But when it pleaseth the higher powers to call any man's life and sayings in question, then there be constructions, interpretations, and extensions reserved to the justices and judges equity, that the party tryable, as I am now, shall find himself in much worse case, than before when those cruel laws stood in force. Thus our amendment is from God's blessing into the warm sun; but I require you honest men, which are to try my life, consider these opinions of my life: judges be rather agreeable to the time, than to the truth; for their judgments be repugnant to their own principle, repugnant to their godly and best learned predecessors opinions, repugnant, I say, to the Proviso in the Statute of Repeal made in the last parliament.

Attorney. Master Throckmorton, quiet yourself, and it shall be the better for you.

Throckmorton. Master Attorney, I am not so unquiet as you be, and yet our cases are not alike; but because I am so tedious to you, and have long troubled this presence, it may please my Lord Chief Justice to repeat the Evidence, wherewith I am charged, and my Answers to all the Objections, if there be no other matter to lay against me.

Then the Chief Justice Bromley remembered particularly all the Depositions and Evidences given against the prisoner, and either for want of good memory, or good will, the prisoner's Answers were in part not recited: whereupon the prisoner craved indifferency, and did help the Judge's old memory with his own recital.

Sendall. My Masters of the Jury, you have to inquire, whether sir Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, here prisoner at the bar, be guilty of these Treasons, or any of them, whereof he hath been indicted and this day arraigned, yea or no: And if you find him Guilty, you shall enquire what lands, tenements, goods, and chattels he had at the day of his Treasons committed, or at any time since; and whether he fled for the Treasons or no, if you find him not guilty.

Throckmorton. Have you said what is to be said?

VOL. I.

Sendall. Yea, for this time.

Throckmorton. Then I pray you give me leave to speak a few words to the Jury: The weight and gravity of my cause hath greatly occasioned me to trouble you here long, and therefore I mind not to entertain you here long with any prolix oration: you perceive notwithstanding this day great contention betwixt the Judges and the queen's learned council on the one party, and me the poor and woeful prisoner on the other party. The trial of our whole controversy, the trial of my innocency, the trial of my life, lands, and goods, and the destruction of my posterity for ever, doth rest in your good judgments. And albeit many this day have greatly inveighed against me, the final determination thereof is transferred only to you: how grievous and horrible the shedding of innocents blood is in the sight of Almighty God, I trust you do remember. Therefore take heed, I say, for Christ's sake, do not defile your consciences with such heinous and notable crimes; they be grievously and terribly punished, as in this world and vale of misery upon the children's children to the third and fourth generation, and in the world to come with everlasting fire and damnation. Lift up your minds to God, and care not too much for the world; look not back to the flesh-pots of Egypt, which will allure you from heavenly respects to worldly security, and can thereof neither make you any surety. Believe I pray you, the queen and her magistrates be more delighted with favourable equity, than with rash cruelty; and in that you be all citizens, I will take my leave of you with St. Paul's farewell to the Ephesians, citizens also you be, whom he took to record that he was pure from shedding any blood; a special token, a doctrine left for your instruction, that every of you may wash his hands of innocents bloodshed, when you shall take your leave of this wretched world; the Holy Ghost be amongst you.

Sendall. Come hither, serjeant, take the Jury with you, and suffer no man to come at them, but to be ordered as the law appointeth, until they be agreed upon their Verdict.

Throckmorton. It may please you my lords and masters which be Commissioners, to give order, that no person have access or conference with the Jury, neither that any of the queen's learned council be suffered to repair to them, or to talk with any of them, until they present themselves here in open court, to publish their Verdict.

Upon the Prisoner's suit on this behalf, the Bench gave order, that two serjeants were sworn to suffer no man to repair to the Jury, until they were agreed.

Then the prisoner was by commandment of the Bench withdrawn from the bar, and the court adjourned until three of the clock at afternoon; at which hour the Commissioners returned to the Guildhall, and there did tarry until the Jury were agreed upon the Verdict. And about five of the clock, their agreement being advertised to the Commissioners, the said prisoner, sir Nicholas Throckmorton, was again brought to the bar, where also the jury did repair; and being demanded whether they were agreed upon their Verdict, answered universally with one voice, Yea. Then it was asked, who should speak for them; they answered, Whetston the foreman.

Sendall. Nicholas Throckmorton knight, hold up thy hand.

Then the Prisoner did so upon the summons.

Sendall. You that be of the Jury, look upon the prisoner.

The Jury did as they were enjoined.

Sendall. How say you, is master Throckmorton knight, there prisoner at the bar, guilty of the Treasons wherof he hath been indicted and arraigned in manner and form, yea or no?

Whetston No.

Sendall. How say you, did he fly upon them.

Whetston. No, we find no such thing.

Throckmorton. I had forgot to answer that question before; but you have found according to truth: and for the better warranty of your doings, understand that I came to London, and so to the queen's counsel unbrought, when I understood they demanded for me; and yet I was almost an hundred miles hence, where if I had not presumed upon my truth, I could have withdrawn myself from catching.

Bromley. How say you the rest of ye, is Whetston's Verdict all your Verdicts?

The whole Inquest answered, Yea.

Bromley. Remember yourselves better, have you considered substantially the whole Evidence in sort as it was declared and recited? the matter doth touch the queen's highness, and yourselves also, take good heed what you do.

Whetston. My lord, we have thoroughly considered the Evidence laid against the prisoner, and his Answers to all these matters, and accordingly we have found him not guilty, agreeable to all our consciences.

Bromley. If you have done well, it is the better for you.

Throckmorton. It is better to be tried than to live suspected: 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a mighty Salvation for us in the house of his servant David.' And it may please you my Lord Chief Justice, forasmuch as I have been indicted and arraigned of sundry Treasons, and have according to the law put my trial to God and my country, that is to say, to these honest men which have found me not guilty; I humbly beseech you to give me such benefit, acquittal, and judgment, as the law in this case doth appoint.

When the Prisoner had said these words, the commissioners consulted together.

Throckmorton. May it please you my lord chief justice to pronounce Sentence for my discharge.

Bromley. Whereas you do ask the benefit that the law in such case doth appoint, I will give it you, viz. That where you have been indicted of sundry high Treasons, and have been here this day before the queen's commissioners and justices arraigned of the said Treasons, whereunto you have pleaded Not guilty, and have for a trial therein put yourself on God and your country, and they have found you Not guilty, the court doth award that you be clearly discharged paying your fees. Notwithstanding, master Lieutenant take him with you again, for there are other matters to charge him with.

Throckmorton. It may please you my lords and masters of the queen's highness's privy council, to be on my behalf humble suitors to her majesty, that like as the law this day (God be praised) hath purged me of the Treasons wherewith I was most dangerously charged, so it might please her excellent majesty to purge me in her private judgment, and both to give and forget my over rash boldness, that I used in talk of her highness's Marriage with the prince of Spain, matters too far above my capacity, and I very unable to consider the gravity thereof; a matter impertinent for me a private person to talk of, which did appertain to her highness's privy council to have in deliberation, and if it shall please her highness of her bountiful liberality, to remit my former oversights, I shall think myself happy for trial of the danger that I have this day escaped, and may thereby admonish me to eschew things above my reach, and also to instruct me to deal with matters agreeable to my vocation; and God save the queen's majesty, and grant the same long to reign over us, and the same Lord be praised for you the magistrates, before whom I have had my trial this day indifferently by the law, and you have proceeded with me accordingly, and the grace of God be amongst you now and ever.

There was no Answer made by any of the bench to the prisoner's suit, but the Attorney did speak these words:

Attorney. And it please you my lords, forasmuch as it seemeth these men of the Jury, which have strangely acquitted the prisoner of his Treasons wherof he was indicted, will forthwith depart the court; I pray you for the queen, that they, and every of them, may be bound in a recognizance of 500*l.* a piece, to answer to such matters as they shall be charged with in the queen's behalf, whensoever they shall be charged or called.

Whetston. I pray you, my lords, be good unto us, and let us not be molested for discharging our consciences truly? we be poor merchant-men, and have great charge upon our hands, and our livings do depend upon our travails; therefore it may please you to appoint us a certain day for our appearance, because perhaps else some of us may be in foreign parts about our business.

The Court being dissatisfied with the Verdict, committed the Jury to prison.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST SIR NICHOLAS THROCKMORTON'S JURY. [3 Holing. 1121, 1126.]

ON Friday the 26th of Oct. those men who had been of Throckmorton's Inquest, being in number eight (for the other four were delivered out of prison, for that they submitted themselves, and said they had offended) whereof Emanuel Lucar and Whetston were chief, were called before the Council in the Star-Chamber, where they affirmed, that they had done all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good consciences, even as they should answer before God at the day of judgment; and Lucar said openly before all the lords, that they had done in the matter like honest men, and true and faithful subjects; and therefore they humbly besought the lord chancellor and the other lords to be means to the king's and queen's majesties, that they might be discharged and set at liberty, and said, that they were all contented to submit themselves to their majesties, saving and reserving their truth, consciences and honesties. The lords taking their words in evil part, judged them worthy to pay excessive fines; some said they were worthy to pay a thousand pounds apiece, others that Lucar and Whetston were worthy to pay a thousand marks apiece, and the rest 500*l.* pounds apiece. In conclusion sentence was given by the lord chancellor, that they should pay a thousand marks apiece the least, and that they should go to prison again, and there remain, till further order were taken for their punishment.—Upon the 10th of Nov. the sheriffs of London had commandment to take an inventory of each one of their goods, and to seal up their doors, which was done the same day. Whetston, Lucar and Kightly were adjudged to pay 2000*l.* apiece, and the rest 1000 marks apiece, to be paid within one fortnight after. From this payment were exempted those four who had confessed their fault and submitted themselves, viz. Loe, Pointer, Beswicks, and Cate. Upon Wednesday the 12th of Dec. five of the eight Jurors, who lay in the Fleet, were discharged and set at liberty upon paying their fines, which were 220 pounds apiece. The other three put up a supplication, therein declaring their goods did not amount to the sum of that, which they were appointed to pay; and so upon that declaration, paying threescore pounds apiece, they were delivered out of prison on St. Thomas's day, being the 21st of December. *

* Sir Nicholas Throckmorton being accused and tried as an accomplice in Wyat's conspiracy, was acquitted by his Jury for want of sufficient proof to condemn him; for this the Jury were severely fined. So the Juries were deprived of the liberty of judging according to their consciences, and, instead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the court stood affected to the prisoners, and by that determine their verdicts. This rigour executed upon the Jury was fatal to sir John Throckmorton, who was found guilty upon the same evidence on which his brother had been acquitted. 7 Rapin 134.

In Peck's "Memoirs of the Life and Poetical Works of Milton," 4to. is a Poem entitled "The Legend of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, knt. Chief Butler of England, who died by poison, A. D. 1570, an Historical Poem; by (his nephew) Sir Thomas Throckmorton, kt." in which are the following stanzas :

Because the Chronicle doth show at large
My Accusation and Acquittal both
I mean thereby to ease me of that charge,
Lest that my being tedious thou do loath,
Yet read it when thou hast convenient leisure:
Perhaps my passed pain shall bring thee pleasure.

There shalt thou view a President not rife,
How I arraign'd of Treason was set free
By Jaror's Verdict, not to lose my life :
The only a per se of my degree,

Yet five escaped of nobilitie.

53. The Trial of JAMES earl BOTHWELL, for the Murder of Henry lord Darnley, Husband of Mary Queen of Scots; at the Senate House of Edinburgh : 9 ELIZ. April 12, A. D. 1567. [Buchanan's Hist. of Scotland, B. 18. and Appendix 30. Laing's Hist. of Scot. i. 65. ii. 311.]

AT the Justice Court of our sovereign lady the queen held and begun in the Senate-House of Edinburgh, the 12th day of April, 1567, by the noble and potent lord Archibald earl of Argyll, lord Campbell, and Lord Justice General for our sovereign lady, in all parts of her realm, where there is a Convention and lawful Assembly of Judges. In this Court appeared personally in Judgment Mr. John Spence of Conde, and Robert Crichton of Choc, Advocates of our sovereign lady, and in her name; and there the said Mr. John Spence produced letters from our said sovereign lady, executed and indorsed with the Summons: the tenor of which Letters, Endorsements, and Summons hereafter follows :

MARY, by the grace of God, queen of Scotland. To our beloved masters William Purves, William Lawson, Gawin Ramsey messengers, our sheriffs in that part conjunctly and severally constitute, greeting. Whereas it has been most humbly remonstrated to us by our beloved and faithful Counsellors, Mr. John Spence of Conde, and Robert Crichton of Choc, our advocates, that they are informed that our well beloved cousin and counsellor Matthew earl of Lennox, father of our most dear spouse, has asserted, That James earl Bothwell, lord Hallis and Creyghton, &c. and some others, were the contrivers of the traitorous, cruel, detestable, and abominable Murder of his highness, committed the 9th day of February last past, in the dead of the night, in his Palace, for the time being, in our city of Edinburgh, near the Church in the fields, wilfully and with premeditated felony; and have declared their suspicion of the said earl and others, as having committed the said cruel and horrid Murder. And having therefore resolved that the truth of it should be tried, in a course of justice, with all possible diligence and brevity, we have by the advice of the lords of our privy-council, and also at the humble request and petition of the said earl Bothwell made to us and in our presence; offering to submit himself to a fair trial of what he is charged with, according to the laws of the land, ordered a court of justice to meet in the Senate-House of Edinburgh on the 12th of April next ensuing, in order to do justice upon the said earl and others for committing the said cruel and abominable crime and offence, as is more at large set forth in an Act inserted in the Registers of our said Privy-Council. Therefore it is our pleasure, and we enjoin and command you most expressly, that, incontinent these our letters seen, you proceed, and, in our name and authority, summon the said Matthew earl of Lennox, at his own house, to appear together with all others of our subjects, having and pretending to have interest in this cause, by public Proclamation made at the Market crosses of our towns of Edinburgh, Dumbarton, Glasgow, Lanerk, and other places necessary, to the end that they may appear before our Judges, or their deputies, in our Senate-House at Edinburgh, on the said 12th day of April next ensuing, and join with us in the prosecution of this cause, by giving them a summons. And in case that they do not appear, we order that our Judges, or their deputies, shall proceed and give sentence the same day, according to the laws and customs of our realm, without any further delay or prolongation; and that you summon every one of them to appear the same day, under the penalty of a fine of 40*l.* sterling, for which they shall answer before us as for their own act and deed. And for this end, we give to every one of you conjunctly and severally our full power, by these our letters, to the intent that you may deliver and execute them duly, and indorse them to him who shall be the bearer thereof. Given under our seal at Edinburgh the 27th day of March, and of our reign the 25th, in the year 1567. Signed accordingly by advice of the queen's council. MARY.

What was indorsed on the back of the said Commission.

The 19th day of March, 1567. I William Purves, messenger and sheriff constitute for that part, according to the command of the Letters of our sovereign lady, and in her name and authority, have summoned Matthew earl of Lennox, and all others of her majesty's subjects, having and pretending to have interest in what is within specified, by public Proclamation, made at the market cross of the city of Edinburgh, in order to appear before the Judges or their deputies in the Senate-House at Edinburgh, the 12th day of April next ensuing, and to prosecute and join with our said sovereign lady, in the cause herein set forth, with the summons as it is mentioned in the said Commission; a copy of which I have affixed to the cross of the said market, in presence of John Andersoun and David Land, and many others. And in further testimony of this my execution and indorsement, I have hereunto set my seal. Signed WILLIAM PURVES.

Another Summons.

The last day of March but one, the 1st and 2nd days of April, in the year above-mentioned, I Gawin Ramsey messenger, and one of the sheriffs constitute for that part, went according to the command contained in the Letters of our sovereign lady, and in her name and authority summoned the said Matthew earl of Lennox, particularly at his houses in Glasgow and Dumbarton. And whereas I sought him, but could not find him in person, nor her majesty's other subjects, pretending to have interest in the prosecution of the cause herein set forth, I made a Proclamation at the market crosses of the towns of Glasgow, Dumbarton, and Lanerk, in order to make them appear before the judge or his deputy, at the said Senate-House of Edinburgh, on the said 12th day of April next ensuing, and to join in the prosecution with the queen our said sovereign lady, in the action within-mentioned, with the summons, as it is there declared, and according to the form and tenor of her letters, of which I have set up a copy on each of the said crosses in those markets. I have done and executed the above before the witnesses that follow, viz. George Herbesoun, Nich. Andrew, Robert Letteric messenger; Wm. Smollet, John Hamilton, Jam. Bannatine, Robert Hamilton, and many others. And in further testimony hereof, I have signed these presents with my sign manual. GAWIN RAMSEY, messenger.

Another Summons.

The 1st day of April, 1567, I William Lawson, messenger, and sheriff constitute for that part, went according to the command signified in the Commission of our sovereign lady to the market cross of Perth, and there, by public Proclamation made according to law, I summoned Matthew earl of Lennox, and all other subjects of our said sovereign lady, having and pretending to have interests, in order to prosecute James earl Bothwell, lord of Hallis and Creyghton, &c. and others, for the cruel Murder committed on the king; and have affixed a copy on the said cross, according to the form and tenor of these presents. And this in presence of the witnesses hereafter named, viz. James Mareschal, Alex. Borthwith, and John Anderson, messengers, and many others. And in further testimony of this my Execution and Indorsement, I have signed these presents with my sign manual. Signed accordingly, WILLIAM LAWSON, messenger, with my own hand.

The Indictment.

You James earl Bothwell, lord of Hallis, Creyghton, &c. are indicted on account of the cruel and horrid Murder of the most excellent, most high and most mighty prince the king, the late most dear spouse of the queen's majesty, our sovereign lady, committed in the dead of the night, at his house near the Church of the Fields in this city, as he was taking his rest, by treasonably setting fire to a great quantity of gunpowder in the said house, by the violence whereof the whole house was blown up into the air, and the king himself by you killed traitorously and cruelly, wilfully, and by premeditated felony. And this you did the 9th day of Feb. last past, in the dead of the night as aforesaid, as is notorious, and you cannot deny.

Upon the producing of which Letters, so executed, indorsed, and published, the said Advocate demanded an Act and instrument in the court, and required that the Judge should proceed according to the form of them.

These Letters being read in Judgment with the indorsements, the judge, by virtue thereof, ordered the said James earl Bothwell to be called as Defendant of the one part, and Matthew earl of Lennox, and all other subjects of our said sovereign lady, pretending to prosecute this matter, as Plaintiffs on the other part; that they might appear in court, and exhibit their Complaints and Defences, according to the laws of the realm.

And immediately appeared in Judgment the said James earl Bothwell, and entered the Court in person; after which he chose master David Bothwick of Lutchill, and Mr. Edmund Hay, for his Advocates, who appearing also in Judgment, were admitted by the Judge for that effect.

Appeared also Mr. Henry Kinloch, calling himself proctor for his master Andrew lord Errol, constable of Scotland, and alledged, that the constable of the realm had at all times been owned to be the only judge competent of men of that quality, when accused of having committed murder and bloodshed near the prince's chamber, and four miles round; and therefore his said master being at present constable of this realm, ought to be judge to James earl Bothwell, and others his accomplices, summoned to appear this day, and to be charged with the above mentioned act of the cruel Murder of Henry king of Scotland. And in case that Archibald earl of Argyle, as Justice-General of this realm, proceed and take cognizance of this fact, the said Mr. Henry, proctor above-mentioned, protested solemnly that this trial should not be prejudicial to the said constable, his office, right, title, profit, jurisdiction, and possession, in any manner whatever; but that he might exercise his said jurisdiction in all such causes for time to come, according to the seisin of his office, and take cognizance of them, as his predecessors had been used to do in the like case. This he would make appear, by the possession which his predecessors had of it at all times and otherwise; and he required that this Protestation should be registered in the Acts, and affirmed that the jurisdiction of the present judge ought not to be allowed in this case.

The Judge having no regard to this Protestation, did, by advice of his assessor, decree, that he would take cognizance of the fact notwithstanding, since nothing had been produced by the said Mr. Henry, to verify the contents of what he had alledged and protested: Of all which the earl Bothwell demanded an Act and Instrument.

The said Matthew earl of Lennox, and other subjects of our sovereign lady, having and pretending to have interest in this prosecution, being called several times to appear, and to join with the said Advocates in prosecuting the said action, there appeared Robert Cunningham, who called himself servant to the said Matthew earl of Lennox, and exhibited a Writing, signed with his own hand in full court, as being authorized thereunto, and made a Protestation and Requisition of the whole, agreeable to the said writing; of which the tenor follows:

My lords, I am come hither, being sent by my master my lord of Lennox, to declare the cause why he is this day absent, having full power from him for that effect, as the truth is. The cause then of his absence is the shortness of the time allowed him, and that he is hindered to have his friends and servants, who ought to accompany him for his honour, and the safety of his person, considering the strength of the opposite party, and that he has no assistance from any of his friends, but must stand by himself: Therefore his lordship has commanded me to require another competent day, according to the importance of this cause, that he may be here present; but if you will proceed now, I protest, that I may, without offence to any person, make use of the authority committed to me by my said lord and master, of which I demand an Act.—Item. I protest, that if those who assist in this Judgment and Inquest upon the persons accused, do undertake to acquit them of the king's Murder, that it shall be held as a voluntary error, and not of ignorance; since it is notoriously known who they are that have murdered the king, as my said lord and master affirms; of which Protestation I require an Act thus signed, Robert Cunningham: of the production of which Writing and Protestation the said Robert demanded an Act and Instrument.

The Judge considering the Writing and Protestation produced by the said Robert Cunningham, and having regard to the Letters sent to our sovereign lady, by Matthew earl of Lennox, also produced and read in judgment, the tenor of which is hereafter inserted; by which Letters and Writing the said earl of Lennox requires, that a brief and summary trial may be made of this cause: and having also regard to the Act, and the Order thereupon taken by the lords of the privy-council, and other such things; and to what the advocates insist upon as to the same fact, requiring that justice may be done to the said earl Bothwell; and taking notice likewise of the Request and Demand which he has made, that the whole may be thoroughly examined; the Judge, by the advice of the lords and barons his assistants, found that they ought to proceed to the decision of the said Cause the same day, according to the laws of the realm, notwithstanding the Writing and Protestation produced by the said Robert Cunningham, and that in the meantime he shall be admitted to join with and assist the said advocates, for the final Trial of the said cause, if he thinks good.

MADAM; I return most humble thanks to your majesty for the gracious and consolatory letters which I received the 24th of this present month: by which I perceive that it is your majesty's pleasure to put off the Trial of this late execrable fact, till the Parliament meets. May it please your majesty to consider, that though I be assured that your highness must needs think the time long till the truth of this fact be found out, and the authors of it punished according to their demerits; yet I most humbly beg pardon of your majesty for troubling and importuning you so often as I am forced to do, the affair being such as touches me so near; and therefore most humbly request, that your majesty would take in good part my advice as follows: It is, that it is too long to wait for the meeting of the parliament; besides, this is not an affair of that sort, which uses to be treated of in parliament, but being such, and of so great importance, it is evident to every one, it ought rather to be inquired into with all diligence, that the authors may suffer an exemplary punishment. I know that your majesty is much more able to judge of it than I; but being informed that certain Placarts or Writings have been affixed to the Gate of the Senate-House of Edinburgh, which answered to your majesty's first and second Proclamation, and named some persons as authors of the said cruel Murder, I most humbly request of your majesty, for the honour of God, and for that of your majesty and your realm, and for the welfare and peace of it, that you would be pleased not only to cause those who are named in the said placarts to be apprehended and put in safe custody, but likewise to assemble your nobility with all possible diligence, and then to summon by Proclamation the authors of the said Placarts to appear for the ends therein mentioned; and if they appear not, your majesty may, by the advice of your nobility and council, set at liberty those who are therein named. Your majesty will do an honourable act in bringing this matter to this issue, that according as the matter shall appear to your majesty, you may punish and chastise the authors of this cruel fact; or if the said Placarts shall be found false and of no validity, those who are charged may be acquitted and set at liberty, according to your majesty's good pleasure. Madam, I pray God Almighty to take your majesty into his protection and safeguard, and to preserve you in health and happy prosperity. From Howstoun the 26th of Feb.

MADAM, I beseech your majesty to attend to what follows: Your highness in your last letters acquainted me, that if there were any names in the Placarts, which were set up at the door of the Senate-House of Edinburgh, of such persons as I thought worthy of condemnation, for the Murder of the king your majesty's husband, you would, according to my advice, make it your business to bring them to Trial, according to the laws of this realm, and as the nature of the crime required. May it therefore please your majesty to know, that from the time I received your said Letters, I always expected that some of those bloody murderers would be made openly known to you; but since I perceive they are not, I cannot find in my heart to conceal them from you any longer. Your majesty therefore has here the Names of those whom I greatly suspect, viz. The earl of Bothwell, sir James Balfour, and Gilbert Balfour his brother; master David Chambers; black master John Spence; the siew Francisus Bastian, John de Burdeaux, and Joseph, the brother of Davy Rizio: whom I most humbly beseech your majesty, according to my former Petition, not only to cause to be apprehended and committed to safe custody, but also with all diligence to assemble your nobility and council, and then to take such advice about the fact of the persons abovementioned, as they may be duly examined. And as I hope, so I make no doubt, but that by proceeding in this manner, the spirit of God will assist toward bringing it to a good conclusion. Herein your majesty will do an act holy and honourable for yourself, who are a party, and highly satisfy those who stand in any relation to the deceased, whom you loved so dearly. And not doubting that your majesty will give proper orders for the whole, according to the importance of the matter (as I most humbly beseech you to do) I shall pray to Almighty God to take you into his protection, and to give you long life and health with grace, that your reign may be both long and prosperous. How-stoun, March 17.

Andrew earl of Rothes, George earl of Caithness, Gilbert earl of Cassils, lord John Hamilton, commendator of Arbroth, son to the duke, James lord Rosse, Robert lord Semple, John Maxwell lord Harris, Lawrence lord Oliphant, John master of Forbes, John Gourdon of Lochinvar, Robert lord Boyde, James Cockburn of Lanton, John Somerville of Cumbusnethan, Moubray of Barnboulg, and Ogilbye of Boyue.

The above-named being chosen, admitted, and sworn to give sentence according to custom, and the earl of Bothwell being accused by Indictment of the crime above declared, and submitting and referring himself to the Sentence of the said Judges, they went out of the Senate-House to another place: and after having long disputed together upon all the articles of the said Accusation, they did each of them, one after another, declare the said James earl of Bothwell quit and absolved of the whole, and every part of the Murder of the king, and in general of whatever depended on the said accusation.

Afterwards, the said George earl of Caithness, chancellor or president at the said Trial (i. e. Foreman of the Jury) as well in his own name as that of the other judges, demanded an Act, to the end that as well the advocates, as the said Robert Cunningham, having a proxy from the earl of Lennox, and all others whomsoever, might be debarred hereafter from producing any other Writing or Proofs whatsoever, in order to support the said Indictment, and that the Judges might not be induced to give any other opinion than they had done before; the rather because nobody had proved the truth of the Accusation, nor so much as any part of it, and that no accuser appeared but the above-mentioned, who were presented in order to carry on the Trial: and therefore the Judges having regard to the same, declared him free as far as they could have any knowledge of the fact, with a Protestation, that this might not be afterwards imputed to them as a fault. Which Act and Protestation, when the said earl of Caithness president and some of the judges above-mentioned, returned to the court in the Senate-House, and before the pronouncing of the aforesaid Sentence, was, at the request of the said earl of Caithness, read publicly, and in full court, and he demanded an Act and Instrument of it, protesting as above.

Extracted from the Registers of the Acts of our sovereign lady's court of justice, by me John Bellenden of Auchmoule knight, and clerk general of the said court, under my sign manual. Signed, John Bellenden, clerk of the court.

Note, That at the same time Protestation was made by George earl of Caithness, Chancellor of the said Assize, that the said Dictate or Indictment was not in this point true, viz. alledging the murder to be committed the 9th day of Feb., for that indeed the murder was committed the next day, being the 10th day in the morning, at two hours after midnight, which in law was and ought to be truly accounted the 10th day: and so the acquittal that way, but cavillingly defended.

The Proclamations and Placarts, in Answer to them mentioned in the Trial, and others that happened after, were as follows.

Incontinent after the Murder of the king, the 10th of February, 1566, a Proclamation was issued, setting forth, that whoever would discover the Murderers should have 2000*l.* sterling. This Proclamation was answered by a Placart, fixed on the door of the Senate-house of Edinburgh, on the 16th day of February, in form as follows: 'Whereas public Notice has been given, that whosoever will discover the Murderers of the king, should have 2000*l.* sterling; I who have made enquiry by those who committed the act itself, affirm, that the authors of the said Murder are the earl of Bothwell, sir James Balfour, the curate Elisk, master David Chambers, and black master John Spens, who above all was the principal author of this Murder; and the queen, who consented to it at the persuasion of the said earl of Bothwell, by the witchcraft of the lady Buccleugh.'—Upon this, another Proclamation was issued the same day, requiring the person who had set up the Placart to appear, own, and subscribe it in person, that he might have the sum promised by the former Proclamation, and more if he deserved it, as the queen and her council should think fit.

To this the following Answer was given and set up at the same place the day following.—'Forasmuch as a Proclamation has been issued since I set up my former, requiring that I should come to subscribe and own it: for Answer I do likewise require, that the money may be consigned into the hands of some man of substance, and I will appear next Sunday, and four others with me, and then I will subscribe and maintain what I have said. Moreover, I require that the Sieur Francis Bastein, and Joseph the queen's goldsmith, may be apprehended; and I will declare what each of them and their accomplices did in particular.' To this no answer was returned.

Though the earl of Bothwell was acquitted as above-mentioned, yet knowing that the world did still esteem him guilty, he did, in order to clear himself further, set up a Paper in the Market-place, bearing, that albeit he had been acquitted by law, yet to make his innocence the more manifest, he was ready to try the same by single-combat, with any man of honourable birth and reputation, who would accuse him of the king's Murder.

To which Answer was made by another Placart, set up immediately after in the same place, 'That forasmuch as the said earl of Bothwell had caused a Placart to be set up, signed with his own hand, whereby he challenged any man of quality, and of a fair reputation, who would and dared to say that he was guilty of the Death of the king;' adding, that he who said it, or went about to support that charge, should be forced to eat his words; a gentleman of honour and good renown accepted his offer, and said, he would prove by the law of arms that he was the principal author of that horrid Murder, of which the Judges had rashly acquitted him for fear of death, after so much inquiry had been made into it. And whereas the king of France and the queen of England required, by their ambassadors, that the said Murder might be punished, he also intreats their majesties to insist with the queen, his sovereign lady, that by her consent a time and place may be appointed in their countries to combat the earl, according to the law of arms, in their presence, or in that of their deputies; at which time and place he promises and swears, on the word of a gentleman, to be present and do his duty, provided their majesties will, by Proclamation, grant Safe-conduct to him and his company, to pass and repass through their dominions without any molestation. He refers it to the judgment of the readers and hearers what just cause he has to desire this of the king of France and the queen of England, and by this he advertises the rest of the Murderers to prepare themselves; for he will give each of them the like Challenge, and publish their names in writing, that they may be known to every body.—To this Bothwell made no reply.

Some time afterwards, Bothwell was constrained to fly the kingdom, and went first to the Orcaes, and then to the isles of Shetland, where being reduced to extreme want, he turned pirate: but being in danger of being taken, he went to Denmark; where, not being able to give a good account of himself, he was taken into custody; and afterwards being known by some merchants, he was clapt up close prisoner; and after a loathsome imprisonment for ten years, that and other miseries made him distracted; and thus he came to a most ignominious death, suitable to his vile and wicked course of life.

Extracted from Laing's History of Scotland,
vol. i. p. 65*.

THE Trial took place on Saturday, April 12th, and Bothwell, who had returned on

* Upon the subject of queen Mary's concern in the murder of her husband, many well known volumes have been written. Some correspondence between Robertson and Hume about this is in the Appendix to Dugald Stewart's

Thursday, with the queen from Seton, appeared with armed retainers, and a band of hired soldiers, who paraded the streets with their ensigns displayed. The fact is now universally believed, that Morton conducted the whole trial, and appeared at the bar with Bothwell; but an examination of this circumstance only serves to illustrate the progress of historical falsehood. In the instructions from the lords and abbots of Mary's party, her commissioners in England are directed to plead, in answer to the marriage, 'that most part of the nobility, and principally of the usurpers, Morton, Semple, and Lindsay, gave their consent to the earl Bothwell, and to remove all suspicion, had declared him innocent by a public assize, ratified in parliament by the three estates.' But the queen herself, in her Instructions to her Commissioners, and in their reply to Murray, during the Conferences at York, maintains only, that Bothwell had received his Acquittal from an assize of his peers, confirmed in parliament by the nobility present, her opponents and others; and her answer to the accusation at Westminster, that she prevented the investigation and punishment of the murder to which she was necessary, refers to her former reply at York. Amidst the artful fictions with which the simple fact of the bond is invested, no intimation was then given of Morton's activity, or even presence at the trial, or of the concern of his associates in the acquittal of Bothwell. Two years afterwards, in a pamphlet published under a fictitious name, Lesly resorts to the former instructions of the lords and abbots, and asserts explicitly what he was afraid even to hint obscurely when confronted at the conference with Morton and Lindsay; 'that Morton, Semple, Lindsay, and their adherents, especially procured, and with all diligence laboured his purgation and acquittal, which the three estates confirmed afterwards by act of parliament.' An additional fact, unknown to Lesly in Scotland, was brought forward in France, 1572, by the anonymous author of 'L' Innocence de Marie,' that Morton accompanied Bothwell before the judges. Blackwood scrupled not to intimate, in 1587, that Morton himself was one of Bothwell's judges; and in 'Maria Innocens,' published abroad, 1588, under a fictitious name, Turner, a Scottish priest and professor at Ingolstadt, affirms, without hesitation, that Morton actually pleaded the cause of Bothwell. This last assertion is, with some modifications, preferred by Camden, that Bothwell's cause was sustained or conducted by Morton; and the fictions of an anonymous French writer, and a Scottish refugee, are eagerly snatched at by modern apologists, as historical facts. But the real authors of Bothwell's Acquittal are easily ascertained. Argyle, justice general, and Caithness, chancellor, or foreman of the jury, sat, with Bothwell, Lesley, and Lethington, in the privy council that appointed the Trial. That Pitcairn, commendator of Dumfermline, lord Lindsay, Macgill, and Balneaves, sat as assessors to the justice general, is another convenient assertion, for which there is no proof. Three of the jury, Herreis, Boyd, and Gordon of Lochinvar, were selected as Mary's commissioners in England; Rothes, Cassilis, Ross and others, subscribed the bonds for her release, or defence on her escape from Lochleven; and of the fifteen jurors, Semple alone adhered afterwards to Murray. The Trial was directed or conducted therefore by Argyle, and Caithness, Lesly and his coadjutors at the conferences in England; nor is a vague imputation published by Lesly two years afterwards, under a fictitious name, sufficient to transfer the acquittal of Bothwell, from himself and his coadjutors, to Morton and his friends. The crown lawyers disclaimed, in effect, all share in the prosecution, except their concurrence. No evidence whatsoever was produced. On the contrary, Lennox was cited as a private accuser, to support the charge, when Cunningham, a young man of his household, appearing unexpectedly, excused his absence till his friends could be collected to protect his person; required the trial to be adjourned to procure support against the greatness of his adversary, and protested for an assize of wilful error if the murderers should be absolved. The demand was over-ruled, and the jury acquitted Bothwell of all share in the murder; but their foreman was instructed to protest in opposition to Cunningham, that as no evidence was produced to justify a different verdict, they were not liable for wilful error. From these circumstances it appears, that the trial was directed by Bothwell himself, and that his acquittal was managed and pronounced by the friends of the queen. But whether conducted by Morton or not, it is also evident, that from a collusive trial, directed by Bothwell, with an armed force to suppress the evidence, and prevent the appearance of the accuser, the queen could never have conceived that he was innocent, when, in the opinion of the whole nation, as well as of impartial posterity, the circumstances of his acquittal served only to establish the reality of his guilt. The plain, and the only sound conclusion is, that in consequence of the remonstrances from France and England, Mary sought in the trial for such a decent pretext to her friends abroad, rather than to her subjects at home, as might justify her intended marriage with Bothwell: that he was accused indeed by public report, but acquitted by a judicial sentence of all concern in the murder of her late husband.

"The Acquittal was no sooner pronounced, than Bothwell posted up a public challenge, offering as a vindication of his innocence, to fight hand to hand, with any person of good reputation, who should dare to maintain that he was guilty of the murder; but the challenge occasioned another placard, in which the charge was renewed. As if his innocence, however, were now incontestible, he was appointed on Monday, the second day after his trial, to carry the crown and sceptre, a mark of distinguished favour, at the opening of parliament. The commissioners for its opening, and the lords of articles were selected from the queen's friends; and if Morton's name appears in the articles, we at the same time discover the abbots of Kilmwinning and Aberbrothick, Lesly and Herreis, Bothwell and Argyle. There was no investigation attempted, nor the least notice taken of the king's murder; but a severe act was passed against the placards, that whosoever first discovered and neglected to suppress them, should suffer the same capital or arbitrary punishment with the authors themselves."

"Buchanan, Melvil, and Spottiswood assure us, that Bothwell died mad, and the two last, writing after James had wintered in Denmark, must have known the fact. Turner, in order to authenticate the confession, first asserted, in 1588, that Bothwell's madness was a fiction of Buchanan's, and the credulous Whitaker believes, on Goodall's authority, that he lived at large, unconfined, in Denmark. But Crawford's MS. informs us, that he was committed to close prison till his death; the Summarium de Morte Mariae, published 1587, that, "in Dania captus, amentis obiit" (Jebb, ii. 166), and Thuanus assures us, seemingly from particular information, that as soon as discovered, he was imprisoned at Drachholm, "in aratissimis vinculis, in qui buscum accusatus esset ab amicis cujusdam nobilis virginis Norvegicae, quam ante plures annos, pacto matrimonio violatam, alia, super inducta, deseruerat, post decennium accedente amentia dignum flagitiosa vita exitum habuit," ii. 551. The Norwegian lady whom he had debauched when betrothed to her some years before, and deserted for another, explains a passage in Buchanan, that before his marriage with the queen, duas uxores adhuc vivas habuit, tertiam ipse nuper suum fassus adulterium dimisisset; (lib. xviii. 357) and suggested the crimes in his confession, that he had debauched a Danish lord's two daughters, and two daughters of a lord at Lubbeck, &c. His body was greatly swelled in summer, 1575, (Murden, 285); and he seems to have died about the end of that year. His age has been strangely controverted. Buchanan had represented James, instead of Patrick, earl of Bothwell, as Lennox's rival for the queen regent's hand; and Tytler, who was slightly versed in the controversy, and in the history of the period, grasped at the mistake, and concluded that Bothwell, who courted the mother in 1544, must have been an old man, upwards of sixty, when he married the daughter in 1567. Tytler, 3 edit. 281. The mistake had been previously corrected by Thomas Crawford (Notes on Buchanan, 141) and by Ruddiman (Buchananari Opera, i. 452); but when lord Hailes discovered that Patrick, Bothwell's father, died in September 1556, and that Mary herself described Bothwell eight years afterwards, as "in his verie youth at his first enteris into this realm, immediately after the deceise of his fadder." (Remarks, 173. Anderson, i. 89), lord Elibank and Tytler devised another conclusion, that Buchanan, by anticipation, described Bothwell by his future titles, when courting the queen regent in 1544, and that he was forty-four at least when he married the queen. Lord Elibank's letter to lord Hailes, 30. Tytler, ii. 155. To argue against such writers would be ridiculous, as it is sufficient to state their misquotation of Buchanan. Accessit æmulus Jacobus Hepburnus comes Bothwelliæ, &c. Is enim ab Jacobo quinto relegatus, ac etatim eo mortuo domum reversus, eisdem artibus reginæ viduæ nuptias ambiebat," &c. lib. xvi. p. 285. The earl of Bothwell, whom James had banished in 1537, was Patrick, the earl formerly imprisoned in 1531, and divorced from his wife, most probably on his return from exile, when he paid his addresses to the queen regent. Goodall, ii. 319. Bothwell's mother was alive at the murder of Darnley (Paris's First Confession); and if born when his father was banished, Bothwell himself might be nineteen at his father's death, and less than thirty on his marriage with the queen. From her words quoted above, he appears to have returned from abroad immediately after his father's death; and I conceive that he was then in Denmark or Norway where he married and deserted his first wife for another, as he passed through England to France, on his banishment in 1563. Douglas, in his Peerage, creates an intermediate Patrick earl of Bothwell; but in 1519, we discover a lord Hailes, by Buchanan called James Hepburn, who assassinated David Hume prior of Coldingham, to whose sister he was married. La-dessus ie trouve ung coing ou trou entre deux portes et le va dire, Mons. venes-vous-en, sy vous estes otant pressé; et estans là dedans, ie ferme la porte sur nous, et luy oste sa robbe, commençant à le destascher. Il me regarde, et me demande comment ie me portoy? luy disant que ie me portoy bien, la grace a Dieu et a luy, me tenant pour bien recompense du service que luy avois faict de m'avoyer faict donner l'estat de varlet de chambre ches la Royne. Il me respondist que ce n'estoit pas asses, et qu'il me feroit davantage. Je luy dis que ie me contentois, et que ie ne pouvoys davantage a la maison de la

Royne, voyant mon equalite, et que ie me contentois. Il me dict que ie ne chomneroy de rien que ie luy dise, car disoit-il, tu m'as faict bon et loyal service depuis que tu m'a servy; car ie sçay que tu as couvert mon deshonneur que tu avois occation de fouller quant tu vins de mon service hors d'Angleterre. Mons. ce dict-ie, ie nay faict que tor de serviteur. Et bien, ce dict-il, pour autant que ie t'ay trouvé fydelle serviteur, ie te veulx dire vne chose, mais il te fault garder sur ta vie que nul ne le sache. (Mons. ce di-ie) il n'appertient au serviteur quant le maistre luy dit quelque chose de le reveler, et s'y est chose que vous pensez que ie ne puisse garder, ne me le dictes point. Sçais tu (ce dict-il) que cest; cest que sy ce Roy-là qui est la d— a jamais les pieds sur nous autres seigneurs, il nous vult dominer et estre cruel, et de nous autres siegneurs ne le vouldons pas souffrir, et aussy ce n'est la façon de ce pais, et pour cela nous avons conclud nous autres de le faire sault—de dedans ceste maison es l'air avecques de la pouldre, de oyant ie ne le dis mot ains baisse la veue basse mon sens et mon cuer ce tourne de l'avoyr ony ainsy parler. Il me regarde, me demandant que ie pense? Mons. (ce di-ie) je pense à ce que vous me dictes, qui est une grand chose. Qu'en pense tu? (ce dit-il) Que j'en pense, Mons.? (ce di-je) vous me perdonnez sy ie vous die selon mon pouvre esprit ce que j'en pense. Que veulx tu dire? (se dit-il) tu veulx prescher. Non, Mons. vous orres. Et bien (se dit-il) dis, dis. Mons. (ce di-je) depuis cinq ou six ans que ie vous ay faict service ie vous ay tousiours veu en grands troubles, et n'ay sceu jamais voyr d'amis qui ayent faict pour vous; maintenant, Mons. vous estes hors de tous ces troubles, la grace à Dieu, et plus en court à ce que tout le monde diet que jamais; pour ma part ie voye que chascun vous faict la court, petis et grands, mais ie ne sçay pas que vous rit qui vous veult veoyr autrement, ie ne sçay pas vous estes du pais Mons. Davantage l'on dict que vous estes le plus grand terrien de ce pais icy, et aussy que vous estes marie qui est l'heure quant vng homme prend ce ply la que il ce fault arester ou jamais. Maintenant, Mons. sy vous entreprenez ceste chose-là qui est grande, ce sera le plus grand trouble que vous eustes jamais, par dessus les autres, car chascun cryera ha harault sur vous, et vous le voyres. Et bien (ce dict-il) as-tu faict? Vous me perdonnez, Mons. s'il vous plaist, sy ie vous ay diest selon mon pouvre esprit (ce di-ie). Et beste que tu es (ce dict-il) pense tu que ie fay cecy tout seul de moy mesme? Monsieur, ie ne sçay pas comment vous le faictes, mais ie sçay bien que ce sera le plus grand trouble que vous eustes oncques. (Ce dict-il) et comment sera-ce? car j'ay disia Leddington qui est estymé l'ung des meilleurs esprits de ce pais-cy, et qui est l'entreprenneur de tout cecy; en apres j'ay Mons. d'Argyle mon frere, Mons. de Hontlye, Mons. de Morton, Ruthen, et Lindsey. Ses trois-là une fois ne me faudront jamais, car j'ay parlé pour leur grace; et ay tous les signes de ceux-cy que ie t'ay nommes, et aussy avons envie de le faire dernièrement que nous fismes à cragmiller, mais c'est que tu es un beste et povre d'esprit, qui ne merite d'entendre chose de consequence. Ma foy, Monsieur (ce di-ie) il est vray, car mon esprit n'est point pour telle chose, mais bien pour vous faire service a ce que ie porray, et bien bien Mons. ilz vous porront bien faire maistre et principal de ce fait-là, mais quant ce sera fait ilz porront aussy mettre le tout sur vous, et les premiers qui cryeront ha harault apres vous, et les ceulx qui vous boutteront le premier à mort, s'ilz peuvent. He! Mons., ie vous prie m'en dire d'ung que vos ne m'aves point nommé: ie scay bien que cestuy-la est aymé en ce pais du commuen peuple, et aussy de nous autres François, que quant il gouvernoyt l'espace de deux ou trois ans, il n'avoit point de troubles au pais, tout le monde ce portoit bien, l'argent corroit, maintenant on ne peut veoyr homme qui ait moyen, et ne voyt-on que troubles; cestuy-la est sage et sy a des amys allies. Qui est certuy-la? (ce me dict-il). Cest Mons. (ce di-ie) Mons. le Conte de Morra: je vous prie me dire quelle part cestuy-la prend? (Ce dit-il), il ne se veult point mesler. Mons. (ce di-ie), il est sage. Adonc Mons. de Boduel retourne la teste vers moy et me deist, Mons. de Morra, Mons. de Morra, il ne veult n'ayder ne nuyre, mais c'est tout ung. Bien, bien, Mons. (ce di-le) il ne le faicte sans cause, et vous le voyrez. La-dessus il me commande de prendre la clef de la chambre de le Royne à Kirkafilde. Je luy dis, Mons. vous me perdoneres, s'il vous plaist, pour autant que ie suis estrangier, et aussy que ce n'est mon estat, l'huyssier me porra demander que l'en veulz faire et il aura raison. Et pourquoy (ce dit-il) n'est-tu vallet de chambre de la Royne? Il est vraye, Mons. (ce di-ie) mais vous scavez qu'à la maison d'ung prince chascue officier à son office, et entre les autres l'huyssier a le sien, l'estat duquel est de garder la clef de la chambre. Pourquoi donc (ce dict-il) t'ay-ie mis à la chambre de la Royne sy non pour en tyrer du service? Helas! Mons. (ce di-ie) c'est bien pour vous faire service à ce que ie porrois, mais ie pensois en moy mesme sans rien dire (le craignant) si j'eusse pensé telle chose, iamais la chambre ne m'eust chambree. La-dessus il s'en alla de moy de ce trou ou coing-la, ou il avoit faict ses affaires. Luy estant party de moy, je prens mon manteau et mon espee et m'en voys pormener dans la grand esglise, et pensoys en beaucoup de fortunes que j'avoys du passé eschapiés de luy, et commençois à remercier Dieu qui m'avoit delivré d'aveques luy, luy demandant du bon cuer d'estre hors de sa compaignie pour attant que ie congnoissois ses vices fort terribles, et principalement ung donct l'on dict que j'en suis sy bon serviteur, me reportant à Dieu, qui congnoit ce que luy en ay dict, comment ce seroyt sa ruyne. Plus de six ans il y a, et qu'il soit ainsy qu'on demande au lard de Petincrief, qui'a ouy parler pourquoy je sortis de son service hors d'Angleterre; il me battist et me tormentast à coups de pied sur le ventre, pour me faire faire chose que ie n'avoys envie de faire, donct il m'en a remercié en Escosse, que l'avoys couvert son honneur la ou j'avois occasion de le fouller. Apres avoir pensé à tout cela pour me resoudre de ce fait meschant que l'avoys entendu et qu'il m'avoit dict, ie demande à mon Dieu, qu'il me conseillassat voyant le fait sy grand il estonnoit mon esprit; et que sy à ceste heure-la Mons. du Croque eust esté en ce pais, ie n'eusse point esté en ceste peine icy. Quant ie vis qu'il ny avoit autre remede que d'avoyn patience, et qu'il ny avoit chemin pour m'en aller sy non par Angleterre, la ou j'eusse esté prins et arresté per faulte de passeport, et aussy que cest trahyson contre le prince au serviteur de s'en aller sans congé, et aussy que ie ne sceu prouver pourquoy ie m'en allois sy non per Mons. de Bodvel qui ne m'eust iamais advoe; voyant comme chascun peult penser que cela gysoit beaucoup à son honneur, et à des autres Seigneurs à ce qu'il me disoit. Or donques ce chemin-la ne me vallut rien, je me resoulz dessus ung poynct que sy ce meurtre ce feroit de brief c'estoit ma ruyne, pour autant que ie congnoissois l'homme qui n'eust iamais failli de moy commander, et s'il y auroit dix ou douze jours entre deux, j'auray esperance de bien faire, car s'il va navire de quelque coste que se soyt, qu'en Angleterre j'estoys delibere de me desrober pourquoy ie me resoulz au sortier de l'esglise de scavoyr de luy quant ce seroyt. De Vendredy donc ques ie m'en vois à luy sortier de sa chambre, comme il alloit chez la Royne, et aussytot qu'il me veist il me demande sy ie avoys prins ceste clef. Je luy dis que je regarderoys a le faire; il me dict que je ne faillisse dont point, car c'estoit à Dymanche qu'ilz vouldoyent faire à mettre leur fait en execution. A ceste heure-la je sors d'avecques luy plus fasche que iamais, et m'en vais sur le chemin du petit Leith tout expres pour trouver navire; et quant ie fus a moytie chemin ie desvoys en moy-mesme, or est-il bon a voyr que tu as l'esprit bien perdu, pour autant qu'il ny a plus que de main entre deux, quant ores le vent seroyt bon, as-tu la puissance de louer ou fretter une navire tout seul ou expres; la-dessus ie m'oste du grand chemin et me destorne à part, priant Dieu de me conseiller, car de faire bruyt de cela j'estoys mort. Ceste jour-la ce passe en ce point, et aussy le Samedi toute la matynée. L'apres disner il me demande encores ceste clef; je luy dis, Mons., helas! comment le feray-je? Pourquoy (ce dict-il) qui t'en gardera? N'es-tu pas serviteur de la Royne? Il est vray, Mons., mais ce n'est point mon estat de prendre les clefs. Mais dy moy (ce dict-il) et pourquoy? Une foy ie ne le veulz rien commander en ce fait-la. J'ay des clefs asses sans toy, car il n'y a porte ceans donct je n'ay le clef, car Mons. Jacques Balfor et moy avons esté toute la nuycte pour veoyr et chercher le meilleur endroit et passage pour executer nostre affaire, et pour trouver bonne entree; mais ceste qui tu es une beste, car ie ne te veulx employer en ce faict-la, car j'ay des gens assez sans toy, et aussy que je sçay que tu n'as point de cuer. La-dessus ie entre en la chambre de la Royne, la ou Marguerite et quelques aultres estoient attendantz la Royne, qui estoit en la chambre du Roy. Adonc le bruyt vint incontinent que la Royne s'en alloyt à l'Abbaie; tout le monde sort hors de sa chambre, et moy le dernier, prenant la clef de la dict chambre, et m'en voys à l'Abbaie apres elle, la ou je trouve Mons. de Bodvel, qui me demande sy j'avoys ceste clef. Ouy, Mons. (ce di-ie). Il me commande de la garder. Au bout d'une heure Marguerite me prie d'aller à Kirkefeld querir une couverture de maytres à la chambre de la Royne, ce que je fais et prens ung garçon avecque moy et entre en la dict chambre, en presens de Sande Duram le jeune, et le porte-faix du Roy, et feis emporter la dite couverture, le dict Duram me demande la clef. Je luy dis que ce n'estoit pas à moy à la donner, mais bien à l'huysier, luy pryant de me perdonner. Bien, donc (ce dict-il) puisque ne le mé volvez donner. Ladessus ie m'en vins à l'Abbaie à la chambre de la Royne et delivre la couverture à Marguerite, ceste jouer-la de Sabinedy estant ainssy passé, je m'en alloys me coucher.

Le Dymenche matin ie me leve à six heures, et m'en vois pormener dedaus le parc, et en ung vallou ie me metz à prier Dieu, et luy demander conseil de ce faict meschant, car ie n'ay sceu trouver aultre moyen que de laisser couller l'eau du russeau qui estoit sy ord, en apres m'estant resolu, ie m'en retourne a l'Abbay, la ou ie trouve trois officiers de la Royne, et m'en allay desieusier quant et eulx, et m'en revins a neufue heures à la chambre de la Royne, la ou l'oye nouvelle que Mons. de Morray veuoit prendre son congé de la Royne pour aller veoyr Madame sa femme: moy entendant ceste parole l'aperseu incontinant qu'il le faisoit pour se destorner de se faict meschant. La-dessus ie m'en allois me pormener Lastarik et m'en vois soubvenir des paroles que j'avoys dictes du dict Seigneur de Morray à Mons. de Bodvel, et aussy ce qu'il m'en avoit respondu. A ceste heure-la ie dis en moy mesme, O Mons. de Morray tu es homme de bien, pleust à Dieu que tu sceus mon cuer, je n'auray pas tant de mal que j'ay; et ayant bien pense je m'en revins à la chambre de la Royne, la ou elle alloit disner auz noces de Bastien; toutesfois je m'en allay disner à la ville et apres disner me pormener, et estant revenu j'entendis que la Royne alloyt souper chez Mons. d'Argylle, la ou j'estois derrier elle luy servant desciant, et comme elle lavoyt ses mains apres souper, elle me demande sy j'avoys osté la couverture de maytre de sa chambre au logis du Roy? Je luy dis qu'ouy; lors les seigneurs se levant de table, donc Mons. de Bodvel m'appelle, et me méne seul avecques luy au logis de sa mere, la ou il ne fust gueres qu'il s'en alla au logis de Lard d'Ormiston, parler à luy et à son frere Hobe, et nous prend tout-troys avecques luy et s'en va à Cougait et parle à Jehan Hay et à Jehan Hepbron' qu'il trouve à la rue. Apres avoir parle à eux' il s'en va tout seul et moy au logis du Roy, ot à mye chemin au logis il me dict, or sçais-tu qu'il y a, tu t'en yras à la chambre de la Royne à Kirkefeld, et quand Jehan Hepbron, Jehan Hay, et le Lard Ormiston entrouit, et qu'ilz auront faict ce que ilz ont envie de faire, tu sortyras et t'en viendras à la chambre du Roy, ou tu t'en yras la ou tu voudras. Helas! Mons. (ce di-je) vous me commandes ma mort. Et pourquoy (ce dict-il) te commande-je de faire quelque chose? Il est veritable, ce di-je, Mons. mais ie sçay bien que cest ma mort. Mais dis moy pourquoy (ce dict-il) sy ie te commandois de faire ce que les aultres font, tu le pourroys dire, mais ie sçay bien que tu n'as point de cuer; une fois les aultres n'ont que faire de toy, car ilz entrent bien sans toy, car ilz ont des clefs asses; il n'y a porte ceans donct ilz n'eut ayent les clefs. Bien, Mons. (ce di-ie) ie m'y en voys. La-dessus il se departe de moy et s'en vais au logis du Roy, et entre en sa chambre, la ou estoit la Royne et aucuns des Seigneurs, et ie m'en vins à la petite court, entre à la cuisine demaundant une chandelle au cuy-synier que j'alumis. Sur ces entre faictz voicy Jehan Hebron et Jehan Hay qui entrent en la chambre, la ou i'estois et purtoys de la pouldre dedaus des sacz qu'ilz misrent au milieu de la dict chambre. En ce faysant voycy Mons. de Bodvil, qui survient et parle au eulx dysant, mon Dieu que vous faictes de bruyt, on oyt d'enhault tout ce que vous faictes, et ainsi me regarde et me demande ce que ie fayssoys, et que ie m'en allasse à la chambre du Roy apres luy, ce que je feis, et me trouve aupres de Mons. d'Argylle, avec qui Mons. de Bodvel parloit, et le dict Seigneur d'Argylle m'accaroysoyt et me touche sur le dos sanz me dire mot. Et n'estant en la chambre du Roy la longueur d'une pater noster que la Royne s'en va vers l'Abbaye et monte là ou estoit les noces, et moy ie m'en vois en ung coing la ou Mons. de Bodvel me vint trouver, me demandant ce que j'avoys d'ainsy faire la myne, et que sy ie la fayssoys ainsi devant la Royne, qu'il m'accoustroit en telle façon que ie ne fus jamais. Je ne m'en soucy pas (ce di-ie) que vous faictes de moy à ceste heure-cy, vous priant me donner congé de m'aller coucher, car ie suis mallade. Non, ce dit-il, veulx que vous veniez avecques moy; volvez vous laisser ces deux gentilhommes-là Jehan Hay et Jehan Hepbron? Helas! Mons. ce di-ie, que feres vous davantage pour moy, car mon cuer ne me peut servir à telle chose? Je veulx que vous venies (ce dict-il) bien done Mons. (ce di-ie) allons. La-dessus il s'en va à sa chambre changer d'habillemetz et prend le tailler et moy avecques luy, et s'en va au jardin du logis du Roy, la ou le tailler demeure à la muraille. Et moy aupres, le dict Seigneur de Bodvel s'en va à la porte du jardin, et puis revint vers nous, la ou Jehan Hepbron et Jehan Hay s'en veindrent et incontinant comme ilz avoyent parlé à luy, voyla comme ung tempesté ou ung tonnoyre qui va eslever, de la peur que j'eu ie cheus en terre les cheveux dressés comme allaines dysant, hélas! Mons., qu'est ce cecy? Il me dicte, je me suis trouve à des enterprises grandes, mais iamais enterprise ne me fait sy grand peur que cestuy. Je luy dis, per ma foy, Mons., de telle chose que cecy il n'en viendra iamais bien, et vous le voyres. O beste (ce dit-il) me menacent de me fraper de sa dague, mais ne la tire point. Là-dessus il commence à s'en aller bien viste, et nous apres luy, et s'en cuydoit aller per Leyth Wynd, mais il ne sceut. Il envoya donc Hepbron parler à portier pour ouvrir la porte, et qu'aussy le monde comencoyt à venir, il s'en va per derrier le Cannongait, et Jehan Hay et moy nous en allames la grand rue. Je disoys à Jehan Hay à telle chose que cecy n'en adviendra iamais bien. Il est vray (ce dit-il) nous avons bien offensé Dieu, mais il n'y a remede, il se faulte monstrier verteux et prier Dieu. Hélas! (ce di-je) Mons. m'a menacé de me frapper de sa dague, mais je voudrois bien qu'il l'eust fait pour mon honneur. Paris, ce dict-il, prenes en patience, car vous congnoyssez bien l'homme. Là-dessus ie m'en allay coucher dans mon lict et luy au sien, mais je ne scay ou, moy estant levé le Lundy matin envyron sept ou huit heures, je m'en vins à la chambre du dit Seigneur de Bodvel, et incontynent qu'il me voyt il me demande que j'avoys à faire la mine? Je luy dis que j'avoys que jamais or n'y argent ne me remettroyt en point que i'estoys. Pourquoi? (ce dict-il) Porce, Mons. que ie scay bien que je sera pris pour le principall de ce fait-cy. Ha! ouy (ce dit-il) tu es bien homme que ie voudrois bien prendre pour ung tel fait. Ladessus il s'en va en bas en une chambre et m'envoye querir par le dit tailler la ou il avoit en la chambre le Lard Ormeston, Hobe Ormiston, Jehan Hepbron Dagliche, Porrey et moy.

Mons. de Bodvel me demande que j'avoys à faire telle mine, et sy j'avoys promis quelque chose au Roy, et s'il estoit mon maistre? Non, Mons. (ce di-je). Et voye-tu point (ce dict-il) ces gentilhommes qui ont terres, rentes et revennes, femmes et enfans, et ont tout voutu abandonner pour me faire service, et si tu pense avoir offensé Dieu, le peche n'est en toy, cest à moy, car je t'ay commandé, et tu ne scroys estre repris de ce fait, car ce sont les Seigneurs mesmes de ce pais, avec moy, qu'avont commis le crime, et voudrois qui'l meust coste oo...escus et ne t'en avoyr iamais parlé. Per ma foy, Mons. (ce di-je) ie la voudrois bien, or bien Paris il se fault monstrier verteux, et pour toutes ies iherues du monde, il ne fault rien dire, et s'y vous avez envie de vous en aller, vous vous en yres bientost, et du depuis ie l'ay demandé congé plus d'une denyee douzaine de fois, et ne le scue iamais avoyer; et voyla tout ce que ie say touchant ce fait.

Et premierment; Interrogé quant premierment il entra en credit vers la Roynie. Responce que ce fust comme la Roynie estoit à Callendar allant à Glascou, qu'alors elle luy bailla une bourse la ou il avoit environ 3 ou 4 cens escus, pour la porter à Mons. de Boduel, lequel, apres avoir receu la dicte bourse sur le chemyn entre Callendar et Glascou, luy dict que le dict Paris s'en allast avecques la Roynie, et qu'il se tint pres d'elle, et qu'il regardast bien à ce qu'elle feroit, luy dysant que la Roynie luy donneroyt des lettres pour les luy porter; la Roynie estant arryué à Glascou luy dict, je t'envoyeray à Lislebourg, tiens-toy prest, et ayant demeure la deux jours avecques la dict dame, laquelle escript des lettres et luy les bailla, dysant, vous direz de bouche à Mons. de Boduel qu'il bailla ces lettres qui s'adressent à Mons. de Ledington à luy mesmes, et qu'il parle à luy, et voyes le parler ensemble et regardes la façon de faire, et quelle mine ilz feront, car c'est, ce disoyt-elle, pour savoyr lequel est meilleur pour loger le Roy à Craigmiller ou à Kirkafeild, affin d'avoyr bon air; car, s'il logoyt à l'Abbaye, le Prince pourroyt bien prendre sa malladie, à cause que ses serviteurs ne pourroyent leur en garder d'aller veoyr le Prince: en oultre qu'il dict au dict de Boddel que le Roy la vouloyt baiser, mais elle ne pas voulla de peur de sa malladye, et plus que Reres en tesmoigneroyt bien. Et chose (ce dict-elle) vous direz à Mons. de Boduell que je ne ja vamaiz vers le Roy que Reres n'y est, et voyt tout ce que je fais. Item, la Roynie luy dict, Paris hastes-vous dé revenir, car je ne hougeray dicy jusques au temps que vous m'aures raporté la responce.

Estant le dict Paris arryvé à Lislebourg trouve le dit de Boduel en son logis à l'Abbaye. lequel luy dist, ha! Paris, tu es le bien venu. Mons., ce dict-il, voycy des lettres que la Roynie vous envoie, et aussi à Mons. de Lidingtoun, vous pryant de les luy delivrer, et que je vous vis parler ensemble, pour veoyr vos façons de faire, et comment vous vous accordiez ensemble. Fort bien, ce dict-il, car j'ay ce jourdhuy parlé à luy, et luy a donné une haquene. Le lendemain le dict Paris dict qu'il vint au logis du dit de Boduel par trois foys le chercher à 8, 9 et 10 heures, et ne le sceut jamais trouver, mais à la fin Powrye le portier luy vist, qu'il l'allast chercher à la haulte ville, que peraventure il le trouveroyt en quelqz lieu au conseil, et l'ayant cherché il voyt venir une troupe de gens de vers le Kirkafeild, la ou estoit le dict Seigneur de Boduel et Mons. Jacques Balfour, coste a coste ensemble, lesquels s'en alloient disner au logis du dict Mons. Jacques. Le dict Paris pryà Mons. de Boduel de le despescher vers la Roynie. Apres disner (ce dict-il) je le feray; et quant il retourna querir sa despesche apres disner, il trouve le Seigneur de Boiduell et le dict Mons. Jacques seulz teste a testé en une chambre, et le dict Seigneur de Boiduel qui escrivait de sa propre main, et apres avoyr fait, il dist à Paris, voyla ta responce, retourne t'en à la

Royne et me recommends bien humblement à sa bonne grace. et luy dictes que tout yra bien, car Mons. Jacques Balsfour et moy n'avons dormis tout la nuyte ains avons mis ordre en toute, et avons apreste le logis, et dictes à la Royne que je luy envoye ce dyamant que tu luy porteras, et que s'y j'avoy mon cuetur je le luy enverroye tresvullentiers, mais je ne l'ay pas moi. Va t'en à Mons. de Ledington et luy demandes s'il veult rescrire à la Royne, ce que le dict Paris faist, et le trouve à la chambre des comptes, et luy demande s'il plasyot rendre la responce aux lettres de la Royne que Mons. de Boduel luy avoyt baillies. Ouy (ce dit-il) et la-dessus il prend du papier incontinent et escript, et ayant fait le dict Paris luy dict que la Royne l'avoyt commande de luy demander lequel des deux logis seroyt le millieur pour le Roy, car elle ne bougeray dela jusqu'à ce qu'il l'auroyt raporté sa responce. Le dit Letington luy respondit que le Kirkasfeld seroyt bon, et que le dit Seigneur de Boduel et luy avoyent advise ensemble la-dessus. Ainsy le dict Paris partit pour son aller à Glascou vers la Royne; et étant de retour à Glascou et avoyt fait son messaige qui luy estoyt donné des diz Seigneurs de bouche, la Royne luy demanda s'il avoyt veu parler Messieurs de Boduel et Lethingtoun ensemble; dict que non, mais que Mons. de Boduel luy avoyt dict qu'ilz avoyent parlé de bon vysage ensemble, et que le dict Sieur de Lethingtoun estoyt du tout à luy, et que le logis estoyt prest. Item, comme elle retournoyt de Glascou vers Lislebourg avec le Roy à Kalendar, il s'adresse ung homme de Mons. de Boduel au dict Paris et luy baille une lettre pour la presenter à la Royne, ce qu'il feist, laquelle luy demanda s'y l'homme estoyt seur. Je pense, ce dit-il, Madame qu'il n'eust voulu vous envoyer homme qu'il n'en fust seur. La-dessus en s'en allant coucher elle rescript une lettre, et y meist dedans ung anneau et la luy bailla pour la bailler au dict homme porteur, chose qu'il feist, pour la rapporter au dict Sieur de Boduel; apres le Royne et le Roy estans à Lythkow, elle dict au dict Paris qu'il vouloit mettre Guilbert Courlle vallet de chambre ches le Roy, pour ce qu'il estoyt de bon esprit, afin de veoyr ce que le Roy feroyt, car elle ne ce froyt point à Sande Duram. Du dict lieu Jehan Hay fust par elle despesché vers Mons. de Boduel, auquel elle parla asses long temps, en apres aussy Paris avec des brasseletz au dit Sieur Boduel (le dict Paris arryvent a Lislebourg luy baille les brasseletz) lequel Sieur estoyt prest de monter à cheval pour aller trouver le Roy et la Royne, avec lequel le dict Paris retourne au devant du Roy, lequel ils conduyrent jusques à son logis à Kirkasfeld.

Interrogé s'il savoyt aucun priveauté entre la Royne et Mons. de Boduel durant le temps que le Roy gysoit à Kirkasfeld: respond, que Mons. de Boiduel luy avoyt dict que toutes les nuytz Jehan Hephron seroyt le guet soubz les galleries à Sancte-croyx, cependant que lady Reress yroyt bien taird le querir pour l'amner à la chambre de la Royne, luy deffendant, assavoyr à Paris, sur la vie de ne dire que sa femme estoyt avecques luy.

Interrogé s'il savoyt de l'entrepris du meurtre du Roy depuis son arryvement à Kirkasfeld jusques au jour de l'execution: respond, que non aultrement que ce qu'il en a desia depose en sa desposition faite le neuvieme de ce mois, en adioustant que le jour que Mons. de Boduel luy avoyt communiqué le fait de meurtre du Roy, qui fust le mesme jour que la Royne couchast au logis du Roy à Kirkasfeld, (ainsy comme il y en souvient fort bien) et comme le dit Paris vouloyt dresser le lict de la Royne en sa chambre qui estoyt droyt soubz la chambre du Roy, ainsy que Mons. de Boduel luy avoyt commandé lors qu'il parloyt avecques luy au trou la ou il le detaschoyt pour faire ses affaires, le dict Sieur de Boiduel defendist au dit Paris de ne dresser le lict de la Royne droict soubz le lict du Roy, car je y veulx mettre la pouldre en cest endroyt-la ce dit-il. Et ceste mesmes nuyt-la apres que le lict fust dressé en la chambre de la Royne; ce que je fis au mesme endroyt la ou il me fust deffendu par le dict de Boduel, la Royne me dist, sot que tu es, je ne veulx pas que mon lict soyt en cest endroyt-la, et de fait le feist oster: par lesquelles parolles j'ay aperceu à mon esprit qu'elle avoyt cognoissance du fait. La-dessus je prins la hardiesse de luy dire, Madame, Mons. de Boiduel ma commande luy porter les clefs de votre chambre, et qu'il a envie de y faire quelque chose; c'est de faire saulter le Roy en l'air par pouldre qu'il y fera mettre; ne me parle poynt de cela ceste heure-cy, ce dict elle, fais en ce que tu voudras. La-dessus je ne l'osoyz parler plus avant. A ceste heure-cy je commence à consyderer que j'estoys employé en ce fait meschant, auparavant par parolles couvertes et desguisees estant envoyé de Glascou vers Mons. de Boiduel, pour scavoyr lequel des logis estoyent le millieur, et par ce aussy qu'il m'a respondu alors, quant il me renvoye vers le Royne, vous la direz, sy elle vous demande ce que je fais, que j'ay veillé toute ceste nuyt et Mr. Jacques Balsfour, pour aprestre le logis du Roy. Estant interrogé sy la Royne passoyt plus oultre ceste nuyte sur ce purpos, la dict que non, mais le pressoyt apres plus fort que jamais de parler à elle de pourpos de Mons. de Bodnel de sa femme et de aultres choses. Et estant couchée ne dormoyt point toute la nuyte, ains escryvout des lettres au dict Sieur de Boiduel, et les envoye par le dict Paris au Sieur de Boduel, environ onze à douze heures de nuyt, mais riens de creance. Et ayant delivré ceste lettre au dict Sieur de Boduel, il rescript estant au lict et en baillant la responce au dit Paris, il luy dict, dictes à la Royne que je ne dormiray point que je ne escheve mon entrepris, quant je debuoyz trayner la picque toute ma vie pour l'amour d'elle.

Et étant de retour vers la Royne Vendredy au matin, luy ayant racompté ces mesmes parolles que luy avoyt dictes Mons. de Boiduel, Et bien, Paris (ce dict-elle en riant) il n'en viendra jamais sy Dieu plaist à ce poynt-là, et ce dysoyst-elle estant au lict. Et comme elle s'abilloyt le dit Paris prend les deux clefs de la chambre de la Roïne selon le commandement du dit Sieur de Boduel, et les luy aporte. Lequel ayant faict sortir toute le monde de sa chambre, prend le clef d'ung coffre qui avoyt en sa pochette, et apres avoyr ouvert le dit coffre, en tire des aultres clefs contrefaictes toute neufues, et en regardant les unes apres des aultres, dict à Paris, ha ! ouy, elles sont bien ; raporte celles-là, et il remaist les contrefaictes dedans le coffre.

Estoit interrogué s'il scavoyt qui avoyt fait et baillie les clefs contrefaictes au dit Sieur de Boduel : respond, qu'il n'en savoyt rien, sy non que le dit Sieur de Boduel luy dist qu'il avoit toutes les clefs des portes de ce logis-là, et que luy et maistre Jacques Balfour avoyent esté tout une nuyt pour chercher et savoyr la meilleure entree, comme il a desia déposé ; mais cependant que le dict Paris estoyt absent avecques ces clefs, Archibald Bethon, huysieur, demande les cleuz pour laisser sortir la Roïne au jardin, et ne les pouvant trouver, la Roïne en fust fasché, et dict tout haut à Paris à son retour, Paris ! pourquoy avez-vous emporté les clefs de ma chambre, lequel ne luy respondit mot sur l'heure ; mais apres la trouvant a part luy list, ha ! Madame, pourquoy m'avez vous dict devant le monde que j'avoys pris les clefs de votre chambre, voyant que vous savyz bien le pourquoy. Ha ! ce dit-elle, Paris c'est tout ung ; ne te soucy, ne te soucy ; et d'autant qu'il en pourroyt avoyr bon souvenance il dict, que ce Vendredy la nuyt la Roïne coucha encores au logis du Roy, et luy renvoya derechef porter des lettres au dict Sieur de Boduel.

Interrogué s'il avoyt rien entendu de ce propos le Sabmedy au matin : respond que non, sy non que la Roïne deist en presence de ceulx de sa chambre qu'il y avoyt eu quelque querelle entre le Roy et Mons. de Sancte Croix, lequel avoyt bon moyen à ceste heure-la de tuer le Roy, car il n'y avoyt en la chambre alors qu'elle pour les departir ; et dict outre qu'apres disner le dict Sieur de Boduel luy commande de prendre la clef de la chambre de la Roïne, chose qu'il n'avoyt envie de faire, mais comme la Roïne sortoyt de sa chambre elle le regarde, et luy commande de prendre la dit clef. Et au soy la Roïne estant à l'Abbaye, elle envoie le dit Paris vers Mons. de Boduel, luy commandant luy dire de bouche ; alles vous en à Mons. de Boduel et luy dictes, qu'il me semble qu'il seroit le mieulx que Mons. de Sancte Croix avec Guillaume Blakatre aillent à la chambre du Roy, faire ce que le dict de Boduel scait, et qu'il parle à Mons. de Sancte Croix touchant ce purpos, car il seroyt mieulx ainsy qu'aultrement, et pour ce n'en seroit qu'ng peu prisonnier dedans le chasteau. Apres avoyr le dict Paris racompé ce fait à Mons. de Boduel il luy dict, je parleray à Mons. de Sancte Croix, et puis j'iray parler moy mesmes à la Roïne. Le dit Paris n'a souvenance d'aultre chose que se feist ce jour-là, mais le reste est contenu en sa premier deposition jusques à ce que la Roïne arryva en l'Abbaye, et Mons. de Boduel s'estant aussy retiré en sa chambre avec le dit Paris, survint Mons. de Honteley, en compaignye de deux ou troys serviteurs, et ce par le chemin derrier l'Abbaye qui menie droyt au logis de feu Mons. de Ruthuen ; et apres qu'ilz avoyent parlé en l'oreille ensemble, comme Mons. de Boduel avoyt desia commence de changer ses habillemetz, le dict de Boduel deist apres au dit Paris, que Mons. de Honteley s'estoyt offert d'aller avecques luy, mais qu'il ne le vouloyt mener. Quant et luy, et apres que Mons. de Honteley se fust party pour aller coucher, le dict de Boduel prend le tailler et Paris avecques luy, comme il est dict en sa premiere deposition.

Le Lundy matin entre neuf et dix heures, le dict Paris dict qu'il entre dans la chambre de la Roïne laquelle estoyt bien close, et son lict le tendu du moyr en signe de deuil, et de la chandelle allumer dedans ycelle la ou Madame de Brant luy donnoyt à desieusner d'ung oeuf frais, la ou aussy Mons. de Boduel arryve et parle à elle secretement souz courtine. Ce jour-là Lundy, se passe ainsy sans ce que le dict Paris parle à elle. Mardy au matin elle se leve, et le dict Paris estant entré en sa chambre, la Roïne luy demande, Paris qu'as-tu ? Helas ! ce dict-il, Madame, je voyz que chascun me regarde de costé. Ne te chaille, ce dict-elle, je te feray bon vvsayge, et personne ne t'osecroyt dire mot. Cependant elle ne le dict chose de consequence jusques à ce qu'elle vouloyt aller à Seton, alors elle luy demandast de prendre une cassette ou il y avoyt des corceletz d'escus que le thresorier luy avoyt apporté de France, pour la porter à la chambre de Mons. de Boduel, qui estoyt à ceste heure-là logé dedans le pallays, au dessus de la chambre la ou ce tenoyt le conseil ; et puis apres luy commandast de prendre son coffre des bagues et le faire porter au chasteau, et le delivrer entre les mains du Sieur de Skirling, pour lors cappitaine souz Mons. de Boduel, chose qu'il feist ; en apres elle voyant le dict Paris tout fasché, elle pressoyt souvent de faire service à Mons. de Boduel, ce qu'il n'avoyt envie de faire, ains demandoyt souvent son congé, et voyant cela à la parfin elle luy dict, Paris, alles-vous consoller avecques Mr. Jacques Balfour ; cest ung homme d'esprit, je m'y suis consollé par plusieurs foys et me consolle de present.

Item. Interrogué du premier pryvenuté qu'il a cogneu estre entre la Roïne et Mons. de Boduel : respond, que c'estoyt alors que le dit de Boduel condoysoit la Roïne vers Glascou, quant elle aloyt querir le Roy. A Callender apres souper assez tard Lady Reres vint à la chambre de Mons. de Boduel et voyt le dict Paris la, et demande que fait ce Paris icy. Cest tout ung, ce dict-il, Paris ne dyra chose que je luy deffend de dire, et la-dessus elle l'amene à la chambre de la Roynie : cecy cestoyt le soyr devant que le lendemain la Roynie l'envoya la bourse par Paris au dict Sieur de Boduel.

Item. En outre il dict et declare, qu'environ le temps que le dict de Boduel fust fait Duc, la Roynie lui baillast le buffett et vesselle de l'argent de Monsieur le Prince la ou estoyt ses armoyries pour la porter à Mons. de Bouthaile, lequel luy dict que cestoyt pour en faire oster la marque de Prince et y mettre la sienne, ce qu'il delyvra à ung qui a espouse une Marguerite Hepbron, (mais il ne scait bonnement son nom) lequel comme il luy dict il le debvoyt bailler à Mr. Jacques Bolfour pour le faire faire.

Item. Il dict et confesse que la nuyt suparavant que la Roynie fust ravie et enlevée du dict Sieur de Boduel, que Mons. d'Ormistoun vint parler à la Roynie bien secretement à Lythquow : la-dessus la Roynie escript une lettre par le dict Paris et par ce qu'il ne scavoyt bien le chemin, la Roynie le feist conduyre par le dict Ormistoun chez Monsieur de Halton, la ou le dict Sieur de Boduel estoit en bonne compagnie, et mesmes les capitaines couchés supres de luy et daultres ; et trouvant le dict Sieur de Boduel endormy les veille et luy dict, Monsieur, voyla des lettres que la Roynie vous envoie. Et bien, Paris, ce dit-il, couche toy la ung peu ; cependant je m'envoys escryre, et apres avoir escript il dict au dit Paris, recommande me humblement à la majestie et luy dices que j'yray aujourdhu y la trouver sur la chemyn au pont.

Item. Estant interrogué s'il savoyt pourquoy Joseph s'en alla de ce pays : respond, que la Roynie luy dict, Paris il fault que tu trouves quelque chose en ton esprit pour faire peur à Joseph, afin qu'il s'en aille : et voyant qu'il ne pouvoyt rien faire elle luy dict, je feray faire une lettre que tu perdras derrier luy pour luy faire peur ; mas luy ne pouvant ce faire elle le feist dire par le justice clerk, comme il peust, qu'il eust à comparoistre au parlement, chose qu'il affrayast grandement, et courut ça et la demandant son congé, enfin la Roynie baille neuf vingtz escus à Paris pour les bailler à Joseph, afin qu'il s'en allast, ce qu'il feist, et ainsy ayant receu la dict somme il s'en alla.

Item, dict, que Jehan Hay souvent apres la mort du Roy le conseylloyt et le confortoyt bien, et qu'aulture ne le consolloyt, sy non que souvent comment Mons. de Honteley le voyant defaict, le demandoyt Paris, qu'as tu ?

The Castell of Edinburgh, Dec. 13, 1573.

THE quihilk day John Brande, minister at Hallyrud-house, being sent to the laird of black Ormistoun, to give him comfort be the promiss of God's word offerit to sinners, and als wa to requyre the said laird to glorife God in shawing of the truth, &c. ; after lang conference, and prayers made, above the space of ane hour, or thelrby, the said John Brand minister said unto him, Sir, althocht I am trewlie persuadit that the haill trewth ye have shawen me of this matter, yit, because divers and greater doubts are passit of you, and also the memorie of men are bot weak, theirfoir, gif ye thought guid, I wald wryte certaine of they things briefeley that you have spoken ; quha answerit meiklie, for God's saike doe the samen ; wreit even as I shall speike. As I shall answer unto God, with whom I hope this night to sowp, I shall declare unto you the haill, from the beginning unto the end of my pairt. First, I confess that the earle Bothwell shew that samen wickit deid unto me, in his own chalmer in the abbey, on Fryday before the deid wes done, and requyred me to take pairt with him therein, because, as he alledged, I wes ane man of activeness, (alace theirfor !) quhair I utterly refusit, and said, God forbid, bot, gif it were upon the field, to fight with your lo. unto the death, I sould not feir my skinn cutting. Then the said earle said unto me, tuishe, Ormistoun, ye need not take feir of this, for the haill lords hes concluded the samen langyne in Craigmiller, all that wes ther with the quein, and nane darr find falt with it quben it shall be done. Efter the quihilk, I departit hame to Kaitis Tames, quihilk was Thomas Henderson's house in Edinburgh, for his mother was called Kait : being in part seik, I lay doun in my bed, and lay all Saturday, chieffie for that cause, believing that way to have put off that evil hour ; and swa I knew na farder of it quhill Sunday at night, quhere I being in my chalmer in the Black Frier Wynd, gangand beltit in ane gown, John Hepburne and John Hay of Talla come unto me, and said the queinis grace and lords are past up to sie the king, and my lord is standand at the Black Frier Wynd fute, and bids you come to him incontinent ; quhere I layd my gown from me, and tuik ane ryding clock, because I beleivit all had been weil aneweche now agreit, seing they had passit up to visit him ; and cuming at the first I mist the said earle, for he had couniten upe another crosse to seik me himselfe, in my awn chalmer, and thair he fand my cousing Hob, quhom he brought with him, and thairafter met togidder in the middis of the Wynd, wha tuike me againe, and we all passit up to the Freier Yaird, through the slape, quhair Pareis and Archie Betoun com and met us, and said all wes feady preparit for the setting of the lunt ; and they all enquiryt how it sould be set to ; and, after diverse speakingis, I said, take ane piece of lunt of thrie or four inch lang, and kindle the ane end of it, and lay to the cold end, and it wald burn syne to the train, and swa will blaw up; efter the quhilk, the queine passing hame, the erle Bothwell said, speid, and clois all the duris, for they had 13 fals keys of the lodging maide, and givin, as they said to me, be him that aught the house. Efter the quhilk I departit incontinent, and came not nearer, as I shall answer befor God, nor the dur; and as I was cumand hame it strake ten hours, when then I pasit to Katis Tames hous, to avoyd suspitioun, that na man sould say I was at the deid doings, for I was an hour and mair in my bed or the blast and crack was. Being requyrit be the said minister, gif he knew not that the king was utherways handit be menes handes, for it is comonlie spokin he was brought furth and wirryit, quha ansrit, as I sall answer to my God, I knew nothing but he was blawin up; and did enquire the samyn maist dilligentlie at John Jhepburne and John Hay and all that tarreit behind me, quha swore unto me, they never kweu nae uther thing bot he was blawin up; and swa I think it was ane work done be God for the punishment of money wickit men, quhair of I am ane, and ane great sinner before God, for the quhilk I ask God mercy.

Thirdly, Being requyrit, gif he knew na farther bereafter, ansrit, at the pasche thairafter, when the brute begouth to rys upon us, and all cryit, ane vengeance upon them that slew the king, it prickit my conscience, and I come unto the erle Bothwell in his chamber, and said to him, quhat devil is this now, my lord, that every body suspectis you of this deid, and cryes, ane vengeance for the samen, and few or no uther spoken of bot yow. Aneuther thing you said to me: quha ansrit, I sall let you sie some thing that I had for me; quha lute me sie ane contract subscriyvit be four or fyve handwrittes, quhilk he affirmit to me was the subscription of the erle of Huntlie, Argyll, the secretar Maitland, and sir James Balfour, and alleaged that mony mae promisit, wha wald assist him gif he were put at; and thairafter read the said contract, quhilk, as I remember, containit thir words, in effect: "That, for, samikle it was thought expedient and maist profitable for the commoun wealth, be the bail nobilitie and lords undersubscriyvit, that sick ane young fool and proud tirrane sould not reign nor bear reull over thame; and that for diverse causes, thairfoir, that thays all bad concludit that he sould be put off by ane way or uther, and quhosoevir, sould take the deid in hand, or do it, they sould defend and fortifie it as thamselvis, for it sould be every ane of their awin, recknit and halden done be thamselvis." Quhilk writting, as said earl shew unto me, was devysit be sir James. Balfour, subscriyvit be them all ane quarter of ane year befor the deid was done; after the quhilk I never spake to the said earle of it quhill the day he gate his assyse, quhaire the said earle standing at the barr, luing down sad lyke, I plukit upon him and said, fye, my lord, what devil is this ye are doand. Your face shawes what ye are: hald up your face, for Godis sake, and luik blythlie; ye might luike swa and ye were gangand to the deid. Allace, and wo worth them that ever devysit it, I trow it sall garr us all murne: quha ansrit me, had your tongue; I wald not yet it wer roe do: I have ane out gait fra it, cum as it may, and that ye will know belyve.

Forder, the tyme when my brother was hurt be the laird of Seffaird, first com word to me that they war slayne, and then thair came ane bill from thamselvis, and said they wer onley hurt, and wald not die; but ane thing did them mair ewill than the hurting, viz. that ane commouna bruit was risen, that I was at the king's slaughter, and theiffoir disirit me to get some guid way to purge mysele, that it pass na farther, or else ye have done with it; quhilk bill I tuike and gave to the erle Bothwell, wha tuike it and gave it to the quein, and she tuike it and read it, and gave it to the erle Huntlie; thair present, wha read it, and thairafter turnit unto me, and turnit her back, and gave an thiring with her shoulder, and passit away, and spake nothing to me. This is the huill thing I know, ather affoir or efter, as I sall ansuer to my God, with whom I hope to supe. Efter the quhilk being inquiryed, gif ever the quein spake unto him at any tyme, or gif he knew what wes the quenis mynd unto it, ansrit, as I shall ansuer to God shoe spake never to me nor I to hir of it, nor I know nathing of hir part but as my lord Bothwell shaw me; for I will not speike bot the trewth for all the gold of the earth, quhilk I desyre you, guid minister, bear record hearof as ye have written, quhilk I pray yow read over to me: let me alswa see it; quhilk I did affoir Archibald Dowglass constabill of the castell, and George Towers of Bristo, with uthers divers gentlemen and servants being in the chalmer, quhilk beand done, he said, for God's saike, sit down and pray for me, for I have bein ane greit sinner utherwyse, for the quhilk my God this day is punishing me, for of all men ou the earth, I have bein ane of the proudest and heich myndit, and maist filthie of my body, abusing myself dyvers ways. Bot specially I have shed innocent blood of ane Michael Hunter with my awin hands: allace thairfoir, because the said Michael havand me lyeing upon my back, haveing ane fork in his hand, myght have slayne me gif he pleasit, and did it not, quhilk of all things greives me maist in conscience: alswa in a rage I hangit a poor man for an horse; with mony uther wickit deids; for the quhilk, I aske my God mercy, for its not mervell that I have bein wickit, for the wickit companie that ever I have bein in, bot speciallie within thir seven yearis bypast, quhilk I never saw twa guid men or ane guid deid, bot all kind of wickedness; and yit my God wald not suffer me to be lost, and hes drawn me from them as out of bell, and hes given me lazer and space, with guid companie, to repent, for the quhilk I thank him, and is ansrit that I am ane of his elect.

Their words, with mony mae, cryand continually unto his God, even to the very end, cryand, my Lord Jesus, sweit Jesus, have mercy upon me; as you have had upon uther sinners, in sick sort, that he was, to the appearance of man, one of the maist penitent sinners that has bein sein this lang tyme and may be comptit ane example of God's mercies to all penitent sinners.

The Earl of MORTOUN'S CONFESSION.

The sume off all that CONFERENCE that was betwix the Eirle of Morton, John Durie, and Mr. Walter Balcanquell, and the cheif things that they hard of him quhairof they can remember, that day, that the said eirle suffered, quhilk was the 2d of Junii, 1581.

FIRST, the said eirle being exhorted that he sould not be discouraged in consideration of that estate quhairinto ance he was in this world in honour and glorie, and of the downcast quhairunto now he was brought, but rather in consideration of the glorie to come, he sould rejoice and be of gude comfort, his answer was, as concerning all the glorie that I have had in this world, I cair not for it, because I am persuaded now that all the honours, riches, friends, pleasures, and quabatsomever I had in the world, is but vanitie, and as concerning the estate quhairunto now I am brought, I thank God for it, and am at this poynt, that I am content rather to render my lyfe then to live, because I know that as God has appoynted the tyme of my death, so has he appoynted the manner thereof; and therefore, seeing that now is the time, and this is the manner that best pleiseth my God to take me, I am content, and as for my lyfe in this world, I cair not for it a penny, in respect of that immortalitie and everlasting joy quhilk I luke for, and quhairof I am assured.

2. Being requyred quhat was his part or knowledge in the king's murther, he answered with this attestation, as I sall answer to my Lord God, I sall declare trewlie all my knowledge in that matter, the soume quhairof is this: Efter my returning out of England, quhair I was banished for Davie's slaughter, I came out of Wederburn to Whittinghame, quhair the eirle Bothwell and I met together in the yaird of Whittinghame, quhair, efter long communing the eirle Bothwell proponed to me the king's murther, requyring what wald be my part thereiu, seeing it was the queines mynd that the king sould be taine away, because, as he said, she blamed the king mair of Davie's slaughter than me. My answer to the eirle Bothwell was this, that I wald not in any ways mell with that matter, and that for this cause, because I am but new cuned out of trouble, quhairof as yet I am not red, being discharged to cum neir the court be seven mylls, and therefore, I cannot enter myself in such a trouble againe. Efter this answer, Mr. Archbald Douglas entered in conference with me in that purpose, persuading me to agrie to the eirle Bothwell's desyre. Last of all the eirle Bothwell, being in Whittinghame, thairafter earnestly proponed the same matter again to me, persuading me thairto, because so was the queines mynd, and shoe wald have it to be done. Unto this my answer was, I desyred the eirle Bothwell to bring me the queines hand wryt of this matter for a warrant, and then I sould give him ane answer: utherwayes I wald not mell therewith, quhilk warrant he never purchaised (reported, Calderwood's MS.) unto me. Then being inquyred quhat wald have beine his part in case he had gotten the queines warrant in that matter, wald he in respect thairof, melled with such a filthie murther as that? He answered, gif I had gotten the queines wryt, and so had knowen her mynd, I was purposed to have banished myselfe againe, and turned my back on Scotland quhile I had sein a better occasion. Then following forth his discourse of this matter, he said, I being at St. Andro's to vissit the eirle of Angus a little before the murther, Mr. Archbald Douglas came to me there, both with wryt and credit of the eirle Bothwell to shew unto me that the purpose of the kings murther was to be done, and neir a poynt, and to request my concurrence and asystance thereunto. My answer was to him, that I wald give no answer to that purpose, seeing I had not gotten the queines warrant in wryt, quhilk was promised, and thairfore seeing the eirle Bothwell never reported any warrant of the queine to me, I never melled farther with it. Then being inquyred whether he gave Mr. Archbald Douglas any command to be there in his name, he answered, I never commanded him. Being inquyred gif he gave him any counsel thereunto, he answered, I never counselled him to it: being inquyred if he gave him any counsel in the contrair, he answered I never counselled him in the contrair. Then it was said to him, that it was a dangerous thing for him that his servand and depender was to puss to such a wicked purpose, and he knowing thereof stayed him not, sieing it would be counted his deid: he answered, Mr. Arch-

bald at that tyme was a depender upon the eirle Bothwell, making court for himself, rather then a depender of myne. Efter this following forth the same discourse, he said Mr. Archbald, efter the deid was done, shew to me that he was at the deid docing, and came to the Kirk of Field yard with the eirle Bothwell and Huntlie. Then being requyred if he received Mr. Archbald efter the murther, he answered I did indeed. Then it was said to him, appeiruntlie my lord, ye cannot complain justlie of the sentence that is given against you, sieing with your own mouth ye confess the foreknowledge and concealling of the king's murther, for quihlk two poynts onlie ye could not be able to abyd the law. He answered that I know to be trew indeid, but yet they sould have considered the danger that the reveilling of it wald have brought me to at that tyme; for I durst not reveill it for feir of my lyfe. For at that tyme to whom sould I have reveiled it? To the queene? she was the doer thereof. I was mynded to have told it to the king's selfe (father, Calderwood) but I durst not for my lyfe, for I knew him to be a haire of such nature, that there was nothing told him but he wald reveill it to hir againe. Being enquiryed why he wald not sinsyne reveill it to the king's majesty, he answered I durst not, for the same feir. Then he said, efter the eirle Bothwell was cleingd by an assyse, sundrie of the nobilitie, and I subscribed also a bond with the eirle Bothwell, that if any sould lay the king's murder to his charge, we sould assyst him in the constrairie, and thereafter I subscribed to the queines marriage with the eirle Bothwell, as sundrie others of the nobilitie did, being charged thereto by the queines wryt and command. Then being inquiryed in name of the living God, that sieing this murther of the king's was one of the most filthy acts that ever was done in Scotland, and the secrets thereof hes not yet been declared, who was the chief deid doers, or whether he was wirried or blown in the air, and therefore to declare if he knew any farther secret thereunto; he answered, as I sall answer to God, I know no more secret in that matter then I have already told and heard bo the deposition of such as hes already suffered for it, quihlk depositions are yet extant. Being inquiryed if he knew any presentlie to be about the king, who was doers of that work, by whose companie the king or common weill might be hurt, he answered, I know none, and will acuse none. Last of all, it was said to him concerning this purpose, that in respect of his own deposition, his part wald be suspected to be more foull nor he declared, he speired for what reason. It was answered, ye being in authoritie, howbeit ye punisht others for the murther, yet ye punisht not Mr. Archbald, whom ke knew to be guilty thereof; he answered, I punisht him not indeid, neither durst I, for the causes before showne. [As the remaining articles of this long confession relate to transactions during his regency and afterwards, we proceed to the conclusion.]

Thereafter he was called to dinner at two after noune, and being at dinner, sieing the brethren of the ministres were informed that there was wrong report made of his confessioun to the king, and that he sould have confessed meikle uther wayes then he did, whereby the king might have had ane war opinion of him, they thought gude to send down some before his suffering, to inform the king's majesty of the facts of his confessioun, as namely, David Fergusone, John Durrie, and John Brand, who, before his death, at length told the simple truth of his confessioun to the king's majesty. At their returning againe from the Abbey, his keiper requyred him that he sould cum forth to the scaffold, he answered, sieing they have troubled me this day over meikle with warldly things, I supposed they sould have given me this one nyght leasor to have advysed rypely with my God. His keiper said all things are readye now, my lord, and I think they will not stay: he answered, and I am readye also, I praye my God; and so, one comfortable prayer being made, he passed down to the gate, mynding to goe directly to the scaffold; but the eirle of Arrane stayed him, and brought him back againe to his chalmer, and required of him that he sould tarrie till his confessioun were put in wryt, and subscribed with his hand and the ministres that were present. He answered, no, my lord, I pray you trouble me no more with these things, for I have now other thing to advyse on, that is, to prepar me for my God, sieing that I am now at a poynt to go to death, I cannot wryt in the estate wherein now I am. All the honest men can testifie what I have spoken in the matter; with quihlk answer the eirle of Arran being satisfied, he said unto him, now my lord, ye will be reconciled with me, for I have nothing upon any particular against you. He answered, it is not tyme now to remember on querels, I have no querel to you nor any man; I forgive you and all others, as I will all to forgive me; and so thereafter with a gude courage he past to the scaffold, and being upon the scaffold, he repeats in few words the substance of these things, the quihlk before he had confessed, except that he concealed Mr. Archbald Douglas his name, and eiked some word and exhortatioun to the people, quihlk he spake not before, as namely, he said, Sure I am the king sall lose a gude servant this day, and so he exhorted the people, saying, I testify before God, I have professed the evangell, quihlk this day is teachd and professed in Scotland, and so also now I will willinglje lay down my lyfe in the professioun thereof; and howbeit, I have not walked therein as I aught, yet I am assured God will be merciful to me; and I pray you all, gude christians, to pray for me; and I charge you all, in the name of God, that are professors of the evangell, that ye continue in the true professioun thereof, and maintain it to your power, as I sould have, God willing, with my lyfe, lands, and all, gif I had had dayes, quihlk if ye doe, I assure you God sall be merciful to you; but if ye do not, be sure the vengeance of God shall light upon you both in bodie and soul. As concerning all the rest of the things quihik he spake comfortably upon the scaffold, he spake them more amply before, and therefore we think it not needful to repeat.

When all his speeches were ended upon the scaffold, a comfortable prayer was made by Mr. James Lawson, during the time of quihik prayer, the erle lay grovelling upon his face, before the place of execution, his bodie making great rebounding with sighs and sobes, quihik was evident signs of the inward and mighty working of the spreit of God, as they who were present and knew what it was to be earnestly moved in prayer, might eysily persave. The prayer being ended, and efter that sundrie came unto him to be reconciled with him before his death, quihik he most lovingly did receive, and efter that he had taken us all by the hand, that were about him, and bidden us farewell in the Lord, he passed both constantlie, patientlie, and humblie, without feir of deith to the place of execution, and laid craig under the axe, his hand being unbound, and thairefter Mr. Walter putting him always in mind of Christ; and crying in his eirs thir words following, untill his head was stricken off, Lord Jesus receive my soul; in thy hands, Lord, in thy hands I commit my spreit, quihik words he was speaking till the axe fell on his neck, and so quhatsoever he had been before, he constantlie died the trew servant of God; and howbeit by his unfriends alledged, that as he lived prouddie, so he died prouddie, the charitable servants of God could perceive nothing in him but all kind of humility in his death, in so meikle that we are assured that his soul is received in the glorie of heaven, to the quihik the Lord bring us all. Amen.

Morton's Confession is confirmed by Archibald Douglas's Letter to Mary, which we reprint from Robertson's History to complete the Evidence.

PLEASE YOUR majesty, I received your letter of the date the 12th of November, and in like manner has seen some part of the contents of one other of the same date, directed to Monsieur de Movisir, ambassador for his majesty the most christian king, both which are agreeable to your princely dignity, as by the one your highness desires to know the true cause of my banishment, and offers unto me all favour if I shall be innocent of the heinous facts committed in the person of your husband of good memory, so by the other the said ambassador is willet to declare unto me, if your husband's marder could be laid justly against me, that you could not sollicit in my cause, neither yet for any person that was participant of that execrable fact, but would seek the revenge thereof, when you should have any means to do it; your majesty's offer, if I be innocent of that crime, is most favourable, and your desire to know the truth of the same is most equitable; and therefore that I should with all my simplicity, sincerity and truth answer thereunto is most reasonable, to the end that your princely dignity may be my help, if my innocence shall sufficiently appear, and procure my condemnation, if I be culpable in any matter, except in the knowledge of the evil disposed minds of the most part of your nobility against your said husband, and not revealing of it, which I am assured was sufficiently known to himself and to all that had judgment never so little in that realm; which also I was constrained to understand, as he, that was specially employed betwixt the earl Morton, and a good number of your nobility, that they might with all humility intercede at your majesty's hand for his relief, in such matters as are more specially contained in the declaration following, which I am constrained for my own justification, by this letter to call to your majesty's remembrance. Notwithstanding that I am assured to my grief, the reading thereof will not smally offend your princely mind. It may please your majesty to remember, that in the year of God 1566, the said earl of Morton, with divers other nobility and gent. were declared rebels to your majesty, and banished your realm for insolent murder committed in your majesty's own chamber, which they alledged was done by command of your husband, who notwithstanding affirmed that he was compelled by them to subscribe the warrant given for that effect; howsoever the truth of that matter remains amongst them, it appertains not to me at this time to be curious; true it is that I was one of that number, that heavily offended against your majesty, and passed in France the time of our banishment, at the desire of the Vest, to humbly pray your brother the most Christian king, to intercede that our offences might be pardoned, and your majesty's clemency extended towards us, albeit divers of no small reputation, in that realm, was of the opinion, that the said fact merited neither to be requisite for, nor yet pardoned. Always such was the careful mind of his majesty towards the quietness of that realm, that the dealing in that cause was committed to Mons. de Movisir, who was directed at that time to go into Scotland, to congratulate the happy birth of your son, whom Almighty God of his goodness may long preserve in happy estate and perpetual felicity; the careful travel of the said de Movisir was so effectual, and your majesty's mind so inclined to mercy, that within short space thereafter, I was permitted to repair in Scotland, to deal with earls Murray, Athol, Bodvel, Arguile, and secretary Ledington, in the name and behalf of the said earl Morton, lords Reven, Linsay, and remanent complotis, that they might make offer in the names of the said earl, of any matter that might satisfy your majesty's wrath, and procure your clemency to be extended in their favours; at my coming to them, after I had opened the effect of my message, they declared that the marriage betwix you and your husband had been the occasion already of great evil in that realm, and if your husband should be suffered to follow the appetite and mind of such as was about him, that kind of dealing might produce with time worse effects; for helping of such inconvenience that might fall out by that kind of dealing; they had thought it convenient to join themselves in league and band with some other noblemen, resolved to obey your majesty as their natural sovereign, and have nothing to do with your husband's command whatsoever, if the said earl would for himself enter into that band and confederacy with them, they could be content to humbly request and travel by all means with your majesty for his pardon, but before they could any further proceed, they desired to know the said earl's mind herein; when I had answered, that he nor his friends, at my departure, could not know that any such like matter would be proponit, and therefore was not instructed what to answer therein, they desired that I should return sufficiently instructed in this matter to Sterling, before the baptism of your son, whom God might preserve; this message was faithfully delivered by me at Newcastle in England, where the said earl then remained, in presence of his friends and company, where they all condescended to have no farther dealing with your husband, and to enter into the said band. With this deliberation I returned to Sterling, where at the request of the most christian king and the queen's majesty of England by their ambassadors present, your majesty's gracious pardon was granted unto them all, under condition always that they should remain banished forth of the realm, the space of two years, and farther during your majesty's pleasure, which limitation was after mitigated at the humble request of your own nobility, so that immediately after the said earl of Morton repaired into Scotland to Qubittingame, where the earl Bodvell and secretary Ledington come to him; what speech passed there amongst them, as God shall be my judge, I knew nothing at that time, but at their departure I was requested by the said earl Morton to accompany the earl Bodvell and secretary to Edenburgh, and to return with such answer as they should obtain of your majesty, which being given to me by the said persons, as God shall be my judge, was no other than these words, "Schaw to the earl Morton that the queen will hear no speech of that matter appointed unto him;" when I crafit that the answer might be made more sensible, secretary Ledington said, that the earl would sufficiently understand it, albeit, few or none at that time understand what passed amongst them. It is known to all men, als veill be railing letters past betwixt the said earl and Lidington when they become in divers factions, as also ane buck sett furth by the ministers, wherein they affirm that the earl of Morton has confessed to them, before his death, that the earl Bodvell come to Qubittingame to propon the calling away off the king your husband, to the which proposition the said earl of Morton affirms that he could give no answer unto such time he might know your majesty's mind therein, which he never received. As to the abominable murder, it is known too by the depositions of many persons that were executed to the death for the committing thereof, that the same was executed by them, and at the command of such of the nobility, as had subscribed band for that effect: by this unpleasant declaration, the most part thereof known to yourself, and the remainder may be understood by the aforesaid witnesses that was examined in torture, and that are extant in the custody of the ordinary judges in Scotland, my innocency so far as may concern any fact does appear sufficiently to your majesty. And as for my dealing aforesaid, I can be no otherwise charged therein, but as what would accuse the vessel that preserves the vine from harm, for the intemperancy of such as immoderately use the same. As for the special cause of my banishment, I think the same has proceeded upon an opinion conceived, that I was able to accuse the earl of Morton of so much matter as they alledge himself to have confessed before he died, and would not be induced, for loss of reputation, to perform any part thereof. If this be the occasion of my trouble, as I suppose it is, what punishment I should deserve, I remit me to your majesty's better judgment, who well knows how careful ever ilk gentleman should be of his fame, reputation and honour, and how far ever ilk man should abhor the name of a pultroun, and how indecent it would have been to me to accuse the earl of Morton, being so near of his kin, notwithstanding all the injuries I was constrained to receive at his hand all the time of his government, and for no other cause, but for shewing of particular friendship to particular friends in the time of the last cruel troubles in Scotland. Sorry I be now to accuse him in any matter being dead, and more sorry that being on lyff, be such kind of dealing obtained that name of Ingrate. Always for my own part I have been banished my native country those three years and four months, living in anxiety of mind, my holl guds in Scotland, which were not small, intermittit and disponit upon, and has continually since the time I was relieved out of my last troubles at the desire of Monsieur de Movisir, attended to know your majesty's pleasure, and to await upon what service it should please your majesty for to command. Upon the 8th of April inst. your good friend secretary Walsinghame has declared unto me, that her highness thought it expedient that I should retire myself where I pleased, I declared unto him I had no means whereby I might perform that desire, until such time as I should receive it from your majesty. Neither knew I where it would please your highness to direct me until such time as I should have received further information from you. Upon this occasion, and partly by permission, I have taken the hardress to write this present letter, whereby your majesty may understand any part of my troubles past, and strait present. As to my intention future, I will never deny that I am fully resolved to spend the rest of my days in your majesty's service, and the king your son's, wheresoever I shall be directed by your majesty, and for the better performing thereof, if so shall be her majesty's pleasure, to recommend the tryal of my innocency, and examination of the verity of the preceding narration, to the king your son, with request that I may be pardoned for such offences as concerned your majesty's service, and var common to all men the time of his les aige and perdonit to all, except me, I should be the bearer thereof myself, and be directed in whatsoever service it should please your majesty for to command. Most humble I beseech your majesty to consider hereof, and to be so gracious as to give order, that I may have means to serve your majesty according to the sincerity of my meaning, and so expecting your majesty's answer, after the kissing your hand with all humility, I take leave from London.

56. The Trial of THOMAS HOWARD duke of Norfolk, before the Lords at Westminster, for High Treason: 14 ELIZ. Jan. 36, A. D. 1571. [M. S. Brit. Mus. 1427.]

FIRST of all, there was prepared in Westminster-hall a large scaffold, about a foot distant from the Chancery-Court; and to the same scaffold a long passage, about six foot broad, and high built all the way as far as to the Common-Pleas bar. In the middle, on the south-side of the scaffold, was erected a chair, somewhat higher than the rest, with a cloth of state for the Lord High Steward of England, who for that day was George earl of Shrewsbury. On both sides of the Lord High Steward, sat the lords in this order:

On the right hand of the Lord High Steward.

Reynold earl of Kent,
Thomas earl of Sussex,
Ambrose e. of Warwick
— earl of Pembroke,
Robert e. of Leicester,
Ld. Clinton, Lord High
Admiral of England,
Wm. lord Burleigh,
James lord Mountjoy,
Lord Wentworth,
Lewis lord Mordant,
Lord Chandois,
Oliver lord St. John of Blctshoe.

Earl of Worcester,
Earl of Huntingdon,
Francis e. of Bedford,
Edward e. of Hertford,
Viscount Hereford,
William lord Howard of Effingham,
Lord Grey of Wilton,
Lord Sandes,
Lord Burgh,
Lord St. John,
Lord Rich,
Lord North,
Thos. lord Buckhurst,
Lord De La Ware.

On both sides of the Lord High Steward, on a lower form at the lords feet, sat the Judges, viz. on the right hand; sir Robert Catlin, lord chief justice of England; sir James Dyer, lord chief justice of the common pleas; sir Edw. Saunders, lord chief baron of the exchequer. On the left hand, the rest of the Judges sat according to their order.

At the feet of the lord high steward, directly before him, in a hollow place cut in the scaffold for that purpose, sat Mr. Miles Sands clerk of the crown with his secondary. Next, beneath the Justices in the same row, sat at the right hand, viz. on the East-side, sir Francis Knowle, with three of the queen's household, and sir Walter Mildmay chancellor of the Exchequer, with several others of the queen's Privy-Council. On the left side, on the West part of the said scaffold in the same degree, sat next the Judges, Dr. Wilson, master of the requests, and several other persons of note.

On the North part of the scaffold, directly before the bar where the Prisoner came, sat Mr. Nicholas Barram the queen's serjeant, Mr. Gilbert Gerard the queen's attorney-general, Mr. Thomas Bromley solicitor-general, and Mr. Thomas Wilbrabam the queen's attorney of the court of wards. On the right hand, by permission, sat Mr. W. Fleetwood recorder of London; and on their left hands were Mr. Thomas Norton, who wrote down this Trial upon the scaffold, as also Garter king at arms, two gentlemen ushers, and two serjeants at arms.

The Lord High Steward being set in his chair, and all the lords and others set in their places, with a great number of people in the Hall, the Hall being kept by the knight marshal, and the warden of the Fleet, and their servants with tipstaves; about half an hour past 8 in the morning the lord high steward stood up at his chair bare-headed, and Mr. Norris the gentleman-usher holding the white rod before him, Littleton the serjeant at arms made proclamation as follows: 'My Lord's grace, the queen's majesty's commissioner, High-Steward of England, commandeth every man to keep silence on pain of Imprisonment, and to hear the queen's majesty's Commission read.' Which then was read by the clerk of the crown. Then the said lord high steward sat down again in his chair, and the gentleman-usher delivered him the white rod, which he held in his hand a great while; and after the Indictment read, re-delivered it to the gentleman-usher, who held it up before him all the time of the Arraignment. Then Littleton the serjeant again made Oyer, and proclaimed thus: 'Thomas Edwards, serjeant at arms, return thy precept;' which being put in immediately, he delivered to the clerk of the crown the names of the peers summoned for the Trial. Then Littleton the Serjeant again made Oyer, and proclaimed thus: 'All earls, viscounts, and barons, summoned to appear this day, every one answer to your names on pain of future peril.' Then were all the lords called in order by their names of baptism, and surnames of dignity, beginning at the ancientest; and every one severally, as he was called, stood and signified their appearance.

Their Order of Ancientry, as they were called, was thus: Reynold earl of Kent, Wm. earl of Worcester, Tho. earl of Sussex, Henry earl of Huntingdon, Ambrose earl of Warwick, Francis earl of Bedford, Wm. earl of Pembroke, Edw. earl of Hertford, Robert earl of Leicester, Walter visc. Hereford, Edw. lord Clinton, Wm. lord Howard of Effingham, Wm. lord Burleigh, lord Grey of Wilton, James lord Mountjoy, lord Sandes, lord Wentworth, lord Burgh, Lewis lord Mordant, lord St. John, Robert lord Rich, lord North, lord Chandois, Oliver lord St. John of Bletshoe, Thomas lord Buckhurst, lord De La Ware.

Then the Serjeant again made Oyer, and proclaimed thus: 'Robert Catlin knight, Chief Justice of England, return thy Certiorari and thy Precept;' which was immediately delivered to the clerk of the crown, and read. The serjeant again made Oyer, and proclaimed thus: 'Lieutenant of the Tower of London, return thy Habeas Corpus, and bring forth thy Prisoner Thomas duke of Norfolk.'

Then was the duke brought upon the long half pace to the bar, sir Owen Hopton lieutenant of the Tower leading him by the right hand, and sir Peter Garowe by the left, and so he was placed at the bar, they still holding him by the arms; the chamberlain of the Tower, with the axe of the Tower, standing with the edge towards sir Peter: while behind the duke stood Mr. Henry Skipwith, who after the duke's Imprisonment, was appointed to attend on him in the Tower.

Then the Duke with a haughty look, and oft biting his lip, surveyed the lords on each side him. In the mean time the Lieutenant of the Tower delivered in his return; then the serjeant made Oyer and Proclamation of silence, while the Clerk of the Crown said to the duke thus: 'Thomas duke of Norfolk, late of Remming-hall in the county of Norfolk, hold up thy hand.' Which the duke did very lustily. Then the clerk of the crown read the INDICTMENT,* the tenor whereof is thus:

"Middlesex.

"The Jury present and say, in behalf of our lady the queen, That Thomas duke of Norfolk, late of Remming-hall in the county of Norfolk, as a false Traitor against the most illustrious and Christian princess Elizabeth, queen of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. and his sovereign lady, not having the fear of God in his heart, nor weighing his due allegiance, but seduced by the instigation of the Devil, contrary to that cordial affection and bounden duty that true and faithful subjects of our said lady the queen do bear, and of right ought to bear, towards our said lady the queen; and intending to cut off and destroy the said queen Elizabeth, the 22d day of Sept. in the 11th year of the reign of our said sovereign lady queen Elizabeth, and divers other days and times before and after, at the Charter-House in the county of Middlesex, hath falsely, maliciously and traitorously conspired, imagined and gone about not only to deprive, depose, and cast out the said queen, his sovereign lady, from her royal dignity, title, power, and government of her kingdom of England; but, also to bring about and compass the death and final destruction of our said sovereign lady the queen, and to make and raise Sedition in the said kingdom of England, and to spread a miserable Civil War amongst the subjects of our said lady the queen, and to procure and make an Insurrection and Rebellion against our said lady the queen, his supreme and natural lady; and so to make public war within the realm of England contrary to our said lady the queen, and the government of her said kingdom, and to endeavour a change and alteration of the sincere worship of God, well and religiously established in the said kingdom; and also totally to subvert and destroy the whole constitution of the said state, so happily instituted and ordained in all its parts, with divers aliens and foreigners, not the subjects of our said lady the queen, hostilely to invade the said kingdom of England, and to make cruel war against our said lady the queen and her dominions.—And for the compassing and bringing to pass all the said wicked and notorious treasons, imaginations, and intentions proposed as aforesaid, he the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, well and truly knew and understood, that Mary late queen of Scots had laid claim and pretended a title and interest to the present possession and dignity of the imperial crown of this kingdom of England; well and truly knowing and understanding, that the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots, had falsely, wickedly, and unjustly said and affirmed, That our aforesaid lady, queen Elizabeth, had no right and title to the crown of this realm of England: And also well and truly knowing and understanding, that the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots, had falsely, wickedly, and unjustly usurped the stile, title, and regal name of this kingdom of England; and that she, the aforesaid Mary late queen of Scots, had impaled and joined the arms of the kingdom of England with the arms of the kingdom of Scotland, as well in her seals and plate, as other things, without any difference and distinction. And furthermore, well and truly knowing and understanding, that the said Mary, late queen of Scots, had not revoked or renounced her wicked and unjust claims and usurpations aforesaid, the 23d day of Sept. in the 11th year of our said lady, now queen of England, and divers other days and places before and after the said time, at the Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously sought and endea-vowed, without the assent, consent, or agreement of the aforesaid our lady queen Elizabeth, his supreme and sovereign lady, to be joined in marriage with the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots. And for this reason and cause he the said duke aforesaid, the 23rd day of Sept. in the 11th year aforesaid, and divers other days and places before and after, at Charter-House aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously writ divers letters to the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots; and as well as letters, sent several pledges or tokens to the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots, the 23d day of Sept. aforesaid, in the year aforesaid, and divers other days and times before and after. And also on the said 23d day of Sept. in the 11th year of the reign of the said queen Elizabeth, and divers other days and places before and after, at Charter-house aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly, and traitorously gave to, and accommodated the said Mary, late queen of Scots, with divers sums of money; which the said Mary, late queen of Scots, falsely and traitorously had and received of him the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, the 23rd day of Sept. aforesaid, in the year aforesaid, at Charter-house aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid; notwithstanding the aforesaid duke had been distinctly and especially forbid and prohibited by the aforesaid lady queen Elizabeth, upon his allegiance, that he should upon no account whatsoever hold Correspondence, or treat with the aforesaid Mary late queen of Scots, concerning Marriage with her the said Mary late queen of Scots; and notwithstanding the aforesaid duke, by divers letters and instruments writ with his own hand to the said lady queen Elizabeth, his supreme sovereign lady, publicly denied and renounced the aforesaid Marriage, protesting that he the said duke was never engaged, or had proceeded in the said Marriage.—And also the said Jurors, upon their corporal oaths, further present and say, That Thomas earl of Northumberland, late of Topcliffe in the county of York, and Anne his wife; Charles earl of Westmoreland, late of Branspeth in the county of Durham; Richard Norton, late of Norton Comers in the county of York; Thomas Markenfield late of Markenfield in the said county, esquires; together with several other false Traitors, rebels, and public enemies of our said lady queen Elizabeth, not having the fear of God before their eyes, nor considering their due allegiance, but seduced by the instigation of the devil, imagined, devised, and conspired to deprive and depose the said lady queen Elizabeth from her royal dignity, title, and power of her kingdom of England; and also to bring about and compass the death and final destruction of the said lady queen Elizabeth, with the intention and design to complete and fulfil all their traitorous conspiracies and devices, on the 16th day of Nov. in the 11th year of the reign of the said queen, at Rippon in the said county of York; by their own consent and appointment, they did falsely and traitorously meet and assemble themselves together, with a great multitude of people, to the number of 4,000 men and more, ready armed and prepared for open war against their said queen Elizabeth, their supreme and sovereign lady, at Rippon aforesaid, the 16th day of Nov. aforesaid, in the year aforesaid, falsely and traitorously they were ready prepared and armed to execute all and singular the treasons and conspiracies aforesaid, of the said Thomas earl of Northumberland and Anne his wife, Charles earl of Westmoreland, Richard Norton, and Thomas Markenfield, with many others of the said false traitors and rebels aforesaid, by due form of law legally indicted, and afterwards upon that legally outlawed and attainted, as they now stand upon record in her said majesty's court of queen's-bench.—And after the perpetration and commission of the aforesaid wicked treasons, in manner aforesaid by them committed, the aforesaid Tho. earl of Northumberland, and Anne his wife; Charles earl of Westmoreland, R. Norton, and Thomas Markenfield; with many other false traitors and rebels aforesaid, the 20th day of Dec. in the 12th year of the reign of our said sovereign lady the queen, for those Treasons fled out of this kingdom into the kingdom of Scotland; and there resided, and were received, aided and assisted by several noblemen, and other great men of the said kingdom of Scotland, viz. by James duke of Chastelleroiy, the earl of Huntley, Mr. Harris, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Firmherst, and other Scots, then subjects of the said kingdom of Scotland, detained from our said lady queen Elizabeth, in and towards which noblemen, and other great men of the aforesaid kingdom of Scotland, the said lady queen Elizabeth afterwards proclaimed, and caused war to be made upon the said rebels, as public enemies to her kingdom of England, by Tho. earl of Sussex, her majesty's lord lieutenant, and lieutenant-general of the north, with a powerful and strong army to oppose the enemy. Upon which account, Charles earl of Westmoreland, Anne, wife of Thomas earl of Northumberland, Rd. Norton, and Tho. Markenfield, fled from the aforesaid kingdom of Scotland, and transported themselves to Antwerp in Brabant, where they resided. And there the same Charles earl of Westmoreland, Anne wife of the said Tho. earl of Northumberland, Rd. Norton, and Tho. Markenfield, contrary to their due allegiance, staid in manifest contempt of the said queen and her laws. Yet the aforesaid Thomas duke of Norfolk, not ignorant of the premises, but well and truly knowing all and singular the transactions in manner and form aforesaid, the 6th day of August, in the 12th year of the reign of the said queen Elizabeth, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, and divers other days and places afore and after, falsely and traitorously took care, and caused to be sent, delivered and distributed, several sums of money, to aid, assist, and support the aforesaid Charles earl of Westmoreland, and Anne wife of Tho. earl of Northumberland.—And further, That the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, the 16th day of July, in the 13th year of the reign of the said lady Elizabeth, queen of England, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, and divers other days and places afore and after, falsely and traitorously adhered to, aided and assisted James duke of Chastelleroy, earl of Huntley, Mr. Harris, Mr. Hume, Mr. Burleigh, and Mr. Firmherst, public enemies to our said lady Elizabeth, then queen of England.—And further, the Jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths, present and say, That whereas Pius Quintus, sometime bishop of Rome, was and is known to be a deadly and public enemy to our said lady queen Eliz. and her kingdom of England; that the said Tho. duke of Norfolk well and truly knowing and understanding this, the 10th day of March, in the 13th year of the reign of the said lady queen Eliz. at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, and divers other days and places afore and after, with intention to produce the said traitorous effects, falsely, subtilly, and traitorously consented, consulted, advised, and procured one Robert Ridolph, a foreign merchant beyond the seas, and out of the kingdom of England, to send to the aforesaid bishop of Rome, to Philip king of Spain, and to the duke of Alva, to obtain of the aforesaid bishop of Rome certain sums of money, towards the raising and maintaining of an army to invade this kingdom of England, and to make war in the said kingdom, against the aforesaid lady Elizabeth, queen of England, &c. And that the said king of Spain, by the mediation of the said duke of Alva, did send into this kingdom of England a certain army of Germans to invade and make open and cruel war against the said lady queen Elizabeth.—And also that the same Thomas duke of Norfolk, the same 10th day of March, in the said 13th year of the reign of the said lady queen Eliz. aforesaid, and divers other days and places afore and after, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, wickedly, and traitorously conspired, consented, and agreed with the aforesaid Robert Ridolph, to advance, stir up, and raise within this kingdom of England, all the forces and power that he the aforesaid Thomas duke of Norfolk and his confederates were by any means capable of raising, or engaging others to raise within this kingdom of England, to join with the aforesaid army, and with other subjects of this kingdom of England, whom the said duke of Norfolk could gather together and join with the said army by the said king of Spain, in order to make open war against our said lady queen Elizabeth, within this her kingdom of England; and to take away and free Mary, late queen of Scots, out of the custody and possession of our said lady Elizabeth queen of England; and at the same time to deprive, depose, and eject the most illustrious and Christian princess queen Elizabeth, from her royal dignity, title, power, prebeminence, and government of this kingdom of England: and at the same time, him the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, to join himself in marriage with the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots.

And further, the Jurors upon their oaths present and say, That the aforesaid Robert Ridolph had writ and composed three distinct and separate Letters of credit, in the name of the aforesaid Thomas duke of Norfolk, for him the said Robert Ridolph, in his false, wicked and treasonous messages aforesaid; viz. one of those letters to the aforesaid duke of Alva, another to the aforesaid bishop of Rome, and a third to the aforesaid Philip king of Spain. That afterwards the same Thomas duke of Norfolk falsely and traitorously intending, willing, and desiring success and effect from the aforesaid false and traitorous messages, by the aforesaid Robert Ridolph, as appeareth by his sending one Wm. Baker gent. one of the servants of the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, the 20th day of March in the 13th year of the reign of the queen, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely and traitorously sent to Guerraw Despeis, ambassador of the said Philip king of Spain, to declare, shew, and affirm to the aforesaid ambassador of the aforesaid Philip king of Spain, that he the said Thomas duke of Norfolk had affirmed and would affirm the aforesaid credential letters to the aforesaid duke of Alva, the bishop of Rome, and Philip king of Spain composed and writ in his name, were as valid to all intents and purposes, as if he the said Thomas duke of Norfolk had writ them with his own hand.—And further, the said Jurors upon their oaths present and say, That the aforesaid Robert Ridolph, the 24th day of March, in the 13th year of the reign of the said lady Eliz. queen of England aforesaid, at Dover, in the county of Kent, took his journey to several parts beyond the seas, in order to execute, perfect, and complete the said treasonable messages, with the consent and agreement of the aforesaid Thomas duke of Norfolk. And afterwards the aforesaid Robert Ridolph conveyed, declared, and communicated the said wicked and traitorous messages in foreign countries and parts beyond the sea, as well to the aforesaid duke of Alva as to the aforesaid bishop of Rome. And that the aforesaid Robert Ridolph, amongst his many other false and traitorous Messages, conveyed one Letter in unusual characters called Cyphers, which the aforesaid duke of Alva caused to be writ and sent to Thomas duke of Norfolk; which very letter, as declared to be writ and sent, he the said duke of Norfolk, the 18th day of April, in the 13th year of the reign of the said queen Eliz. aforesaid, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely and traitorously received and had; and then and there gave and delivered to the aforesaid Wm. Baker his servant several written pages in known letters, commonly to be deciphered: and the said Papers in common and known ci-phers or characters he the said duke afterwards on the 25th day of April, in the 13th year of the reign of the said queen Eliz. at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely and traiterously received, inspected, and read over the said papers, and then and there falsely and traiterously retained and kept them. By which letters of the said Robert Ridolph to him the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, amongst other things, are signified and he makes known what a kind audience and reception he the said Robert met with from the aforesaid duke of Alva in his wicked and traitorous messages aforesaid. And that the said duke of Alva required and willed the friends and abettors of the said confederacy to be ready, whensoever a foreign power should be sent into this kingdom of England.—And furthermore, the same Jurors upon their oaths present and say, That the said Thomas duke of Norfolk, the 16th day of June, in the 13th year of the reign of the said lady queen Elizabeth, at Charter-House aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely and traiterously received a Letter directed to him: the said duke, from Pius Quintus bishop of Rome; by which the said bishop of Rome promised to the said duke of Norfolk, aid, help, and assistances towards executing the said wicked and traitorous designs of the aforesaid Mary, late queen of Scots, contrary to their due allegiance, and the peace of our sovereign lady Elizabeth, now queen of England, her crown and dignity, and in manifest contempt of the laws of this kingdom, as well as the worst and most pernicious example of all other delinquents in the like case, and contrary to the form of several statutes in this case made and provided.

After the reading of the Indictment, the clerk of the crown said to the duke: How sayest thou, Thomas duke of Norfolk, art thou guilty of these Treasons whereof thou art indicted, in manner and form as thou art thereof indicted, Yea or No?

Thereupon the Duke began, and said to this effect: May it please your grace; and you the rest of my lords here, the hearing of this Indictment giveth me occasion to enter into the making of a suit, which I meant not to have done before my coming hither: I beseech you, if the law will permit it, that I may have counsel allowed me for the answering of this Indictment.

The Lord Chief Justice answered, That in case of High-Treason he cannot have counsel allowed: and that he was to answer to his own fact only, which himself best knew, and might without counsel sufficiently answer.

Duke. That you may understand that I speak it not without some ground, these be the causes that move me to make this suit: I was told before I came here, that I was indicted upon the Statute of the 25th of Edw. 3. I have had very short warning to provide to answer so great a matter; I have not had 14 hours in all, both day and night, and now I neither hear the same statute alledged, and yet I am put at once to the whole herd of laws, not knowing which particularity to answer unto. The Indictment containeth sundry points and matters to touch me by circumstance, and so to draw me into matter of Treason, which are not treasons themselves: therefore with reverence and humble submission I am led to think I may have counsel. And this I shew, that you may think I move not this suit without any ground. I am hardly handled, I have had short warning, and no books; neither Book of Statutes, nor so much as the Breviate of Statutes. I am brought to fight without a weapon: yet I remember one case in law, I think it is in the first year of king Henry 7. It is the case of one Humphrey Stafford, which was indicted of High-Treason, and had counsel allowed him: if the precedent in his case be such, as it may extend to me, I require it at your hands, that I may have it allowed: I shew you my ground why I crave it, I refer me to your opinions therein.

Then sir James Dyer, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-pleas, said: My Lord, That case of Humphrey Stafford in primo of Henry 7, was about pleading of Sanctuary, for that he was taken out of sanctuary at Culneham, which belonged to the abbot of Abingdon: so the question was, whether he should be allowed sanctuary in that case, and with that form of pleading, which was matter of law: In which case he had counsel, and not upon the point or fact of High Treason; but only for the allowance of sanctuary, and whether it might be allowed, being claimed by prescription, and without shewing any former allowances in Eyre and such like matters; but all our Books do forbid allowing of counsel in the point of Treason; but only it is to be answered Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Duke. Humphrey Stafford's Case was High-Treason, and he had counsel. I must submit myself to your opinions: I beseech you, weigh what case I stand in. I stand here before you for my life, lands and goods, my children and my posterity, and that which I esteem most of all, for my honesty; I forbear to speak of my honour. I am unlearned: if I ask any thing, and not in such words as I ought, I beseech you bear with me, and let me have that favour that the law allows me. If the law do not allow me counsel, I must submit me to your opinions. I beseech you, consider of me; my blood will ask vengeance, if I be unjustly condemned: I honour your learnings and your gravities: I beseech you, have consideration of me, and grant me what the law will permit me. I am now to make another suit to you, my lords the Judges: I beseech you, tell me, if my Indictment be perfect and sufficient in law; and whether in whole, or in the parts, and in which parts, that I may know to what I should answer.

Lord Chief Justice Catlin. For the sufficiency of your indictment, it hath been well debated and considered by us all; and we have all, with one assent, resolved, and so do certify you, that if the causes in the indictment expressed, be true in fact, the indictment is wholly and in every part sufficient.

Duke. Be all the points Treasons?

L. C. J. Caitlin. All be Treasons, if the truth of the case be so in fact.

Duke. I will tell you what moveth me to ask you this: I have heard of the case of the lord Scroope; it was in the time of Henry the 4th, (the Judges said Henry the 5th) he confessed the Indictment, and yet traversed that the points thereof were no Treasons.

L. C. J. Caitlin. My lord, he had his Judgment for Treason upon that Indictment, and was executed.

Then the Clerk of the Crown said again, How sayest thou, Thomas duke of Norfolk, art thou guilty of the Treasons whereof thou art here indicted, in manner and form as thou art indicted, Yea, or No? The Duke answered, Not Guilty. The Clerk said, By whom wilt thou be tried? The Duke said, By God and my Peers.

Then the Duke spake to the lords, and said thus: Now I am not to use a short speech, which I meant before to have used, but that the reading of the Indictment hath driven me to other occasions. Although these heinous Treasons and outrageous faults objected against me, do much abash me: yet I conceive no small comfort, to think under how gracious a queen and sovereign lady I live, which well appeareth by her most gracious proceeding with me according to the course of law. Her majesty seeketh not my blood, but giveth me the Trial which the laws admit, and in the most favourable manner that I can require; for which I am most bounden to her majesty. Now I am to make two suits: the one to your grace, my Lord High Steward, That as your place requireth to do justice, so it may please you to extend to me your lawful favour, that I may have justice, and that I may not be overlaid in speeches: my memory was never good, it is now much worse than it was; sore troubles, sore cares, closeness in prison, evil rest, have much decayed my memory; so as I pray God, that this day it fail me not, and another time I will forgive it: I beseech this of you, my lord high steward. The second request, I thought to make to you, my lords, my peers: I think myself happy to have my Trial in such a company. A much greater matter, if I could have greater, I durst put it into your hands, and (a very few excepted) even into every one of your hands singly; that opinion I have of you. I know religion beareth a stroke among you, which, I hope, so ruleth your consciences, that for no respect you will swerve from justice; you will not bring a worm into your own consciences; you will not burden your souls with condemning me wrongfully; you will not do what God's law and right alloweth not. This above all things comforteth me, next unto her majesty's most gracious favour of my lawful trial. If I had not made a full account to have this for the way of my lawful purgation, I needed not to have been here at this time, neither for matters passed two years ago, nor for that whereof I am charged at this present. I have chosen, my peers, I have chosen rather to come here to be tried by you, than with needless and cowardly running away, to have left a gap open for my enemies slanderously to lay to my charge in my absence what they could maliciously invent. I have this day (though I am sorry for any cause to come in this case before you) even the day that I could wish to be tried by such peers. I will not enter into particularities, and discourse my whole cause at large, but answer from point to point, as I shall be charged; for my memory was never good, and it is now worse than ever it was. Yet one request more I beseech of you, my peers, which I with favour may ask, and you with justice may grant; unhappy man that I am, though I have to this Indictment pleaded Not Guilty of the Treasons therein objected against me, nor of no Treasons; yet I confess, as I have with all humility, and with tears confessed, and as some of you, my lords, here present can witness, that I have neglected my duty to the queen's most excellent majesty, in cases inferior to treason, and that be no parts of treason: I have laid them at her majesty's feet, and poured them forth before her in Confession, so far as my conscience will suffer me to declare. Let, I beseech you, neither my Confession already made of inferior faults, that be not in compass of treason; nor, if I shall now in mine Answers confess them again, if they be objected against me; lead you to judge the worse of me in the greater case. Let each fault have his own pine; I beseech you, remember the differences and degrees of offences, and not to mix my smaller faults with this great cause: let these mean crimes rest at her majesty's feet, where I with all humility have laid them. Thus I beseech you all, have consideration of me.

Then spake the Queen's Serjeant, Mr. Barrham, and said to this effect. It hath appeared to your grace and your lordships all, that the duke of Norfolk is by this Indictment charged with three principal points of High Treason: the first is, That forgetting his allegiance and duty to his sovereign lady the queen, he hath traiterously imagined, devised and practised, to deprive and depose the queen's majesty of and from the crown of this realm, and her royal stile, name and dignity, and to bring her to death and destruction; and so to alter the whole state of government of this realm. The second point is, That he hath traiterously relieved and comforted the English rebels that levied war against her majesty within her realm, and which since fled into Scotland, and from thence beyond the sea. The third point is, That he hath traiterously given relief and maintenance to the duke of Chastelleroi, the earl of Huntley, the lord Harris, the lord Hume, and other Scots, the queen's majesty's public enemies, succourers and detainers of the said rebels. To prove these great Treasons, there is in this Indictment set forth unto you good and sufficient matter; first, to prove that the duke of Norfolk sought, imagined, compassed and practised to deprive and depose the queen's majesty of her royal crown, estate and dignity; and consequently to bring her to death and destruction, are alledged two matters: the first is, That the duke knowing the Scottish queen falsely and unjustly to claim and pretend title, to have and enjoy the present possession of the crown of England; and that she untruly usurped the name and stile of this realm; and that she gave and quartered the arms of England without difference; and that she continued in that fact, and usurped claim without renunciation thereof, and without acknowledging her error unto the queen's majesty, though she hath been thereto required: He, I say, knowing all this, yet without the queen's maj.'s assent against her majesty's special and express commandment upon his allegiance, and against his own promise and protestation upon his faith, hath nevertheless secretly sought and practised to join himself with the said Scottish queen in Marriage, and to advance and maintain her said false and pretended title to the present possession of the crowne of this realm; which cannot be without purpose to depose and deprive the queen's majesty, and consequently to bring her to death and destruction. The second is, that the duke of Norfolk hath conspired and practised to procure strangers to enter into this realm, and invade the same, and to make open war against her majesty, within her own realm; and so forcibly to work her deposing, deprivation, death and destruction. Hereupon the said duke hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon his peers; yours therefore is the trial. And now for Evidence to prove him guilty of the treasons contained in the said Indictment, it may please your lordships to hear such a matter as I shall for the queen bring forth against him.

Duke. I am occasioned, by the speech of Mr. Serjeant, to gather what I shall find in the rest of them; a meaning with circumstance to draw me into treason, with eloquence to overlay me, and to exasperate matters extremely against me, and to enforce things that be not treasons indeed. I beseech you, my masters, for God's sake do your duty, remember equity, consider conscience, and what I am: I am no stranger, I am a Christian man, and an English man. You may do your duties to the queen sufficiently, and yet deal conscientiously with me, and heap not, unconscionably, circumstances to cloy my memory. Go directly to the Indictment, it is no praise nor glory for you to overlay me. I am unlearned, unable to speak, and worst of all to speak for myself; I have neither good utterance, as the world well knoweth, nor understanding: for God's sake do not overlay me with superfluous matter. One thing I had forgotten: I knew a man suspected is half condemned. Now as it happened in my last trouble, so at this time there want not to put abroad to the world, and heap up things which I never thought; a great number of such there be, as I see many here at this present. They have published, that I took an oath of things which afterwards proved contrary; blame me not that I mistrust the worst, because I have found the worst. But to take away scruple from you, true it is, that I took an oath, but not generally, but to special points. And now when I take an oath to points, to draw me to the whole, and to take pars pro toto, is great injury. To prove that I took that oath to parts, and not to the whole, I refused to set my hand without expressing of the point; for my hand, my oath, and my heart shall go all together. And for further proof that my oath was but to special points, I can name good witnesses to whom I did presently, within three hours after my oath taken, specially report the three points that I made mine oath unto. This, I say, to take from you the scruple of such matter as I have been charged with, and which perhaps you have heard of me to my discredit.

Then said Mr. Serjeant Barrham, I have yet given no Evidence, and for that Oath you are not once yet charged withal. I have done nothing yet but recited the matter contained in the Indictment; now will I bring forth matter for the queen in Evidence, and will prove the things in the Indictment to be true. There are alledged three great Treasons, as I have before said; the first only I will deal with, that is, to prove that the duke of Norfolk imagined, compassed and conspired, to deprive and depose the queen's majesty, our sovereign lady, of her crown and royal estate and dignity: and I will use the second matter but for inducement of the first, by shewing how the Scottish queen falsely and unjustly claimed the present possession of the crown of this realm; and that he knowing that the Scottish queen so unjustly claimed the said crown, that she quartered the arms of England, that she usurped the style and royal name; that she hath not acknowledged her error, nor renounced her untrue and unjust claim and usurpation, though she hath been required thereunto; and whereto himself hath been privy and hath dealt in treaty, as a chief commissioner for the queen's majesty for that purpose: this matter, I say, I will set out; how he knowing all this, yet without the assent of the queen's majesty, against her highness's express commandment upon his allegiance, against his own faith and promise to the contrary, practised to join himself in Marriage with the said queen of Scots: and I mean to join thereto an intent of his, to advance and maintain that unjust title of the Scottish queen. If then this attempting to join himself in marriage with the Scottish queen shall be proved unto you, and that he knew of her unjust claim and pretence of title, and that thereby he joined himself to advance and maintain the said title, this must needs tend to a purpose and imagining to depose and deprive the queen's majesty, and thereupon consequently to bring her to death and destruction, which is High Treason within the compass of the statute of 25 of king Edw. 3. For whoso shall imagine and go about to maintain a title to the present possession of the queen's crown, and to join himself in marriage with her that so claimeth, without doubt he meaneth to aspire to the crown himself; and so meaning, it plainly followeth, that he cannot suffer her majesty to reign, and his jealousy cannot suffer her to live where he desireth to reign.—Now will I show you the manner of his procuring to match himself in marriage with the Scottish queen, and first the beginning thereof: first of all, to prove how secretly he dealt to that end, by suits and means, before he was a commissioner, to examine causes between the Scottish queen, and the young king her son, and other the lords of Scotland. Before that time there were secret suits and practices, between them by motions, by messages, by letters and tokens, and pleaded so far forth, as that the Scottish queen took it, that she was assured of his good-will. For when commission was directed to him, and to the earl of Sussex, and to sir Ralph Sadler, counsellors of the duchy of Lancaster, the Scottish queen had reposed full affiance in the duke of Norfolk, to have at his hands favourable hearing; and so she reported, and so indeed it followed. And where you speak of an Oath, and seem so loth to be disproved, and would so feign have it taken, that your oath, hand, and heart go all together; there was an oath specially appointed for the commissioners, that they should deal in that matter between the Scottish queen and her son and nobility, directly, sincerely, and uprightly, and to weigh all things that should be objected or answered on either part indifferently without all partiality. Then after this oath taken, the duke being the first named commissioner, this oath notwithstanding, dealt indirectly, deceived the queen's majesty's trust, and demeaned him partially against his said oath, wherein he committed wilful perjury: besides that, without regard of his oath of a sworn counsellor to the queen's majesty of her privy council, he disclosed her majesty's secrets, and fell to practising for matching himself with the Scottish queen in marriage. Now shall I prove his knowledge at the same time, that the Scottish queen pretended title to the present possession of the crown of this realm.

Duke. Then the duke asked, if all the treasons contained in his Indictment were upon the statute of king Edw. 3, and it was answered by Mr. Serjeant and Mr. Attorney-General, that they were grounded upon the same statute only. Then the duke began thus: Here the matters that Mr. Serjeant hath proved against me stand in two points; by which he chargeth me with imagining the deprivation and death of the queen's majesty, and with indirect and untrue dealing in the Scottish queen's cause; and therein he burdeneth me with perjury. The Scottish cause hath divers pleas, and therefore bear with me, I pray you, if I cast back again to rehearse my doing therein, for my memory is not good: as for my dealing therein, God is my witness, that I have done uprightly.

Serj. Then Mr. Serjeant urged him to confess if he had knowledge that the Scottish queen pretended Title to the present possession of the crown of England; offering, if the duke would deny it, to make proof of it.

Duke. I will make mine own Confession; I pray you to teach me not how to answer or confess, because it is the first ground that you build upon against me: and because I know not whether my peers do all know it or no, I will make a short Declaration of my doings in that matter with the Scottish queen.

Serj. First we pray your grace (speaking to the Lord High Steward) that he may directly answer, whether he knew that the Scottish queen so claimed or no; if he say no, we will prove it.

Duke. Then being ruled over by the lord high steward, that he should answer directly to that question, he answered, That indeed he knew that she had so claimed but with circumstance.

Serj. Say plainly, Did you know it or no? for if you say nay, we can prove it.

Duke. You handle me hardly, you would so trap me by circumstance and infer upon me that she was the queen's enemy, and so make me a traitor. I will answer directly to the whole matter of my dealing with her.

Serj. Answer to the parts as they fall out. Did you know that she claimed the present possession of the crown? That she usurped the arms and royal style of this realm? and that she made no renunciation of that usurped pretence? If you say you knew it not, we will prove every part of it.

Duke. I did not know it in such sort as is alleged; I know that renunciation of that claim was offered, and upon certain causes respited.

Serj. It is well known, and yourself then knew it, That the Scottish queen claimed the present possession of the crown of England, quartered the arms of England with the arms of Scotland, and usurped the style of this realm; and that there was a French power sent to prosecute it by invading this land by the way of Scotland: your self was made the queen's majesty's lieutenant, and levied an army to expulse them. Afterward the queen's majesty sent her ambassadors, which met with the French lords and Scottish queen's commissioners at Edinburgh, and agreed upon a treaty of peace; in which one special Article was, that the Scottish queen should acknowledge her error, and should renounce her pretended Claim to the present possession of the crown of this realm. It was not done, nor yet is done. My lord of Norfolk was at this treaty; and when this last commission went out, when the commissioners sat at York about the matter between the Scottish queen, her son, and the nobility of Scotland, wherein were commissioners the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Sussex, and Mr. Chancellor of the Dutchy; one special Instruction was for the Scottish queen's Recognition of her unjust claim, and to require that she should ratify the former treaty of peace. The duke knoweth well it was not done.

Duke. What is this to me? I need not enter to defend her doings, I like them not. It is not my case, but that you make it my case; else I would not meddle with it, answer it who would for me. Indeed I have heard, that being covert-baron then, married to the French king, in her husband's life she made claim to the crown of England, and quartered the arms of England with the arms of Scotland. I have heard also, That sir Nich. Throckmorton made complaint thereof, and moved for redress, and thereupon it was laid down. I have heard that she hath been requested to make renunciation of that Claim when the peace was concluded, when Montmorency came over, and time was taken for it. After this there grew amity between the queen's majesty and the Scottish queen; the queen took her for her friend, sent ambassadors unto her, and christened her child; all this excluded enmity. And when my lord of Bedford was there, and moved her for ratifying of the Treaty, and for the Renunciation, she refused not; but said, she would send to shew causes why she did it not presently. And then it was refused not absolutely, but upon certain words, and the treating thereof committed to my lord Burleigh and Mr. Wotton. As for our commission at York, it took no end; the matter was brought up hither, and here was sat upon at Westminster in the Parliament-Chamber. And this is my understanding, that she claimed the crown, and I have not otherwise known it.

Serj. Thus have you confessed far enough, That you knew that she did pretend title to the present possession of the crown; that she quartered the arms, and usurped the royal stile of this realm.

Duke. It was in her husband's time, when she was covert-baron.

Serj. You knew also how since her husband's time, she hath not renounced that claim; and you had, in special, instruction to require it when you were commissioner.

Duke. A full renunciation was offered when the lord Burleigh was with her, and our commission was ended, and the matter brought up hither.

Serj. But what was the cause why it took no end by your commission; Yourself was the cause that the commission broke up; because you dealt indirectly; you set out your own affection and partiality, and behaved yourself partially, without regard to the queen's majesty's special commandment, without regard of your oath, then specially taken for that commission, or of your oath as a counsellor: you uttered your partiality, you disclosed to the other side aforehand the queen's secrets: you devised with the one side, and gave them counsel how to deal for stay of the matter: you did prevaricate the queen's intention: and when you were by your commission to examine the Scottish queen's adulteries, and her murdering of her husband, you practised with those that were dealers for the Scottish queen, and you told them, by way of advice, That if these matters went forwards to hearing, the earl Murray, and his side, would disclose all the foul matter that they could, both by her letters and other evidences, to her dishonour; and that the queen's majesty had some such counsellors about her, as if these things were once produced, she would cause them to be published, that all foreign princes should understand them, to the Scottish queen's great infamy, and to move foreign princes, to proceed no further suing for her. And this was the cause of the breach and dissolution of your commission.

Duke. You said you would prove that I knew of the Scottish queen's claiming the present possession of the crown.

Serj. Yourself have confessed it; for you know there was yet no renunciation made, and you were special commissioner for that purpose: and though your commission took no effect, yet by that, that the requiring of the renunciation was matter of your instructions, and the same not done, it is plain that you knew sufficiently of her former unjust claiming of the present possession of the crown: And now will we by good evidence prove your partial and indirect dealing in that commission. Here I will produce matter of your own conference at York with Ledington and the bishop of Ross, and how yourself told them, that you understood at Lyth, that rigorous matter would be set out by the earl Murray and the rest of that side, against the Scottish queen, touching her whoredom and the murder of her husband. You gave advice to stay the earl of Murray, from so doing: you told the Scottish queen's ministers, how the queen of England had some counsellors that could cause her to publish all those matters to the Scottish queen's infamy; you practised with them to devise to qualify the matter: you told the way that you thought best to do it; you advised them to deal with the earl of Murray, that the matter might be compounded, or else so to handle it, that it might take no end.

Duke. Here the duke took advantage of that Mr. Serjeant had said, That the duke understood at Lyth: for the duke then protested, that at that time he had never been at Lyth. Whereupon the lord Burleigh dissolved that knot, and said on the duke's behalf to Mr. Serjeant:

Burleigh. You were best proceed with your evidence: you may mistake: my lord Norfolk had not then been at Lyth, otherwise than he and I were there once secretly in a morning. The cause of this error rose thus: In one Scottish Paper produced for that matter, was contained, how the duke understood at Lyth, which in Scotch is as much as at length; which Mr. Serjeant, in perusing the matters for Evidence delivered unto him, took for Lyth, as the clerk of the crown also afterwards did in reading the same paper. Then was produced an Examination of the bishop of Ross, taken at the Tower, Nov. 5, 1571, as followeth:

The Scottish queen told the bishop of Ross, that the conference at York was to make the earl of Murray, and other her disobedient subjects, to answer before the queen's majesty of England's commissioners, for their unnatural and unjust proceedings against her; and that after their offences acknowledged for the queen of England's pleasure, they should be remitted, and received into favour again, and so all matters compounded.

The Bishop's Answer to this was, That he was sorry she had agreed to any conference wherein they should be accused; for he was assured in that case, they would utter all that they could for their defences, although it were for her dishonour, and of the whole realm: for they would be loth to confess openly that they were evil subjects, and she a good princess; and therefore he wished that the matter might be treated by way of concord, before any entry to accusations: and to that end he counselled her to travel with her friends at court to York. To this she replied, that there was no such danger in the matter as I supposed; for she trusted I would find the judges favourable, principally the duke of Norfolk, who was first in commission; and doubted not but the earl of Sussex would be ruled by him as his tender friend; and sir Ralph Sadler would not gainstand their advice; and that Liggons had been at Bolton, by whose message, told by him to the lord Scroope, he understood of the duke's good will towards her, and the bruit was also spread abroad of a marriage between the duke and her; and besides, that she had many good friends in the country that did favour her, and seek to her, such as the earl of Northumberland and his lady, by whom she had many intelligences and messages; the Nortons, Markenfield and others, who would all be with the duke at York, and would persuade him to favour her case. In the mean time, before our passage to York, Robert Melvin came to Bolton with letters, sent by Ledington from Faulx Castle to the queen my mistress, to advertise her, that the earl of Murray was wholly bent to utter all that he could against her, and to that effect had carried with him all the letters which he had to produce against her, for proof of the murder, whereof he had recovered the copies, and had caused his wife to write them, which he sent to the queen; and that he had not come into England in the earl of Murray's company, unless it had been to do her service, and to travel for mitigation of those rigors intended; desiring to be certified by Robert Melvin, that she wished to stay those rigorous accusations: and because he was well acquainted with the duke of Norfolk, desired him to travel with the duke in his favour, and that he would confer with the bishop of Ross, by whom he should understand his whole mind particularly from time to time. After this, Robert

Melvin at York did bring me to Ledington's lodging, where we talked almost a whole night; where he told, That he had conferred with the duke, who seemed to bear great good-will to the queen my mistress, and had willed him to counsel the earl of Murray, and others, to abstain from uttering any dishonest matter against the queen, but to grant to some compositions amongst themselves: so that Ledington said, it appeared to him, that the duke had some intention to marry with the queen, as the bruit was; and that he did verily believe, that if it were followed, the marriage would take effect, which would be most of all other things for the queen's honour and weal: and willed me to speak with the duke secretly alone, without the commissioners, and Ledington should advertise the duke to appoint the time convenient, as he did one day in the morning by seven of the clock, before the meeting of the commissioners. I talked with the duke alone in a gallery, where he uttered to me, That he bore good will to the queen my mistress, and that he had talked with the earl Murray at length, (b) and had seen the Letters which they had to produce against the queen my mistress, and other Defences, whereby there would such matter be proved against her, that would dishonour her for ever; and if it were once published, the queen's majesty of England would get counsel by such as loved not the queen my mistress, to publish the same to the world, and to send ambassadors to all other princes, to make the same known to them; so that they would make no further suit for her delivery, and perhaps greater rigour might ensue to her person: Therefore he advised me to confer with Ledington; and that betwixt him and me, we might find some means to stay the rigour intended; and promised all that he could do to that effect, by Ledington's advertisement, he would do. I replied, that Ledington would have her to ratify the dimission made at Lochlevin for a time, for he had assured her it could hurt her no more, being kept prisoner in England, than that which was done in Lochlevin: for so should she stay the uttering of any matter against her, and within six months she should be restored to her country with honour; and so might revoke all done by her.

To this the Duke: What if that were done to be quit of the present infamy and slander, and let him work out the rest? I told him, we were come to that conference for to make an agreement, and not to answer to accusations: and therefore wished him to further the agreement amongst us. He answered, That their commission was only to hear the differences amongst us; and if I would propound any thing, he would like well of it, and should advertise the queen's majesty, his mistress, thereof, and get her answer. In this conference, the duke did oftentimes insinuate the good will that he did bear to the queen my mistress, but spoke nothing to me particularly of the Marriage at that time; but referred all to Ledington. Upon this I did confer with Ledington divers times, by whose advice I rode to Bolton, to speak with my mistress, in the time of my conference; and during my remaining there, the conference was broken up, and the whole commissioners for our part, came to Bolton. And so my lord Harris and I were sent to London. In the mean time, Robert Melvin came to Bolton to the queen, with messages of Ledington's, of such conference as he had with the duke at the hunting in the Fields, where I believe Ledington did well encourage the duke to attempt the Marriage, as he told me afterwards; declaring her properties and the honour and commodities that might ensue to them, both thereby; and that the duke did give good ear thereto, wishing to the queen to follow that course. In the mean time, the duke had Liggons, and others, going between them and the lady Scroope, who did entertain the matter betwixt them. After this, the duke coming to Hampton-Court, Ledington made the mean with the duke, to cause him to send Liggons to deal with me upon this behalf, and to give me some favourable advertisement of the weal for our cause, and likewise the duke caused the lord Lumley sometimes to speak with me, to advise me what was best to be done, and especially when the Spanish ambassador had spoken to me of the Marriage of one of the House of Austria; the duke, by my lord Lumley, counselled me to open the matter to the queen's majesty, by my lord of Arundel, which might be an occasion to move her to like better of the match with him, than with any foreigner. And then he sent me word by Liggons, that the queen's majesty was informed of such a like bruit, of his Marriage with the queen of Scots; but he had satisfied her well enough, and so still did follow the matter, and did treat thereupon with the earl of Murray and Ledington at Hampton-Court: by whose advice Robert Melvin was sent to the queen, my mistress, at Rippon, to move the matter upon the earl of Murray's behalf, with a full determination, that the earl of Murray liked of it: which message I heard afterwards that Murray alledged he did send it, for fear of some enterprise against him, at Northallerton, in his return to Scotland. And so after this manner the matter had been entertained betwixt the queen and the duke from time to time, as is at length declared in the former Examinations.

Serj. The effect of all, is the Duke's partial and untrue dealing; for that before the bishop of Ross' going to York, the Scottish Queen declared to the bishop of Ross, that she doubted not of the favour of the duke of Norfolk: for she told him that my lady Scroope had by motions and means assured her of his good will, and she doubted not of my lord of Sussex's, for the great friendship and tender love he bare to the duke; and she made account that Mr. Sadler would be friendly, for that he alone would not stand to them both. It appeareth also, for further proof of his partial dealing, that though he was sworn, both as a counsellor to the queen's majesty, and also specially for the matter of this commission; yet he indirectly, secretly, and underhand, dealt with Ledington, and told him, how that the earl of Murray and his side intended to utter sharp matter against the Scottish queen. The duke gave his advice how to stay it, and so dealt partially, and against the queen's majesty's special trust and commandment, and against his own Oath and Promise. Next after that, in conference had with the duke of Norfolk on the Scottish queen's part, the duke declared his good will that he bare to the Scottish queen: he shewed how, that if the same matter of Evidence against her, were once uttered by the earl of Murray, some of the queen's counsellors of England would procure her majesty to publish them. He advised that the matter should be compounded with the earl of Murray; and that he should not stick, being here in England, and not at her own liberty, for the present time, to be content to ratify the dimission of the crown of Scotland, which she made at Lochlevin; and so she might be restored into her own country and then she might undo all again at her pleasure: and upon pretence of constraint and fear, as well revoke that which she should in England, as she before revoked that which she had done at Lochlevin in Scotland. Also the duke at that time was privy to the device, that Ledington accompanied the earl Murray only to understand his secrets, and to betray him; and that Ledington stole away the Letters, and kept them one night, and caused his wife to write them out. Howbeit, the same were but Copies translated out of French into Scotch; which, when Ledington's wife had written out, he caused them to be sent to the Scottish queen: she laboured to translate them again into French, as near as she could to the originals wherein she wrote them; but that was not possible to do, but there was some variance in the phrase; by which variance, as God would, the subtlety of that practice came to light.

Duke. What if all this be true? What is this to the matter? Any dealing of mine with the Scottish queen by my sister Scroope's means, I utterly deny. As for Ledington, and the bishop of Ross, what their Speeches were to me, I care not; I am to answer but for mine own Speeches.

Serj. The bishop of Ross accuseth you of your own speeches, and this he doth, being examined freely, and without any compulsion.

Duke. He is a Scot.

Serj. A Scot is a Christian man.

Duke. At my being at York in commission, Ledington broke with me himself to have the matter compounded between the Scottish queen and the earl of Murray. I told him that our commission was only to hear indifferently what should be alleged on both parts, and thereof truly to make report. What hurt is this? The bishop of Ross afterwards sent for me, that he might speak with me: when we met, he moved me for the compounding of the matter, as Ledington had done. I told him, that our commission was but to hear and report, as I had told Ledington before; and therefore if they would fall to compounding, I willed them to devise the means themselves, and to make offers; and thereupon we would advertise the queen's majesty thereof, as we would of all the matters alleged. If it be otherwise, and as you say, let my letters be looked on, and see if they contain any such matter. If the bishop of Ross, for fear or for malice, have said untruly; if being a Scot, he care not how many English men, by his false testimony, he bring to destruction; I beseech you let not that hurt me.

Serj. You made the first motion of compounding the matter to Ledington yourself; and another time to the bishop of Ross, you offered to further it all that you could.

Duke. I never saw the bishop of Ross before I came to York; and would I, think you, deal so dangerously with a Scot that I never saw before? Also, I did by my letters signify to the queen's majesty our proceeding, and my misliking of the Scottish queen's part: let that letter be seen; which letter was written after my talk with Ledington. I wrote it when I went from York, and I never saw the bishop of Ross afterward, till I came to London.

Serj. The writing of your letters to the queen's majesty, wherein you advertised against the Scottish queen, and though the same were written after your conference with Ledington and the bishop of Ross, is no proof but that you dealt partially for the Scottish queen; for those letters were written by others, as well as yourself, namely, by my lord of Sussex, and Mr. Chancellor of the duchy: and you could not otherwise do, but to signify, notwithstanding your partial secret dealing; for else you should have too openly bewrayed your intention.

Duke. When Ledington moved me of the Marriage of the Scottish queen, I utterly refused it.

Serj. That is not so: and for proof, as well of your partial dealing in the Commission as for the Marriage, there shall be brought forth sufficient Evidence.

Here was alleged how a Letter had been written to the earl of Murray, requiring to be advertised by him of so much as he knew concerning the Doings of the duke of Norfolk, both for the matter of the Commission, and the practice of his Marriage with the Scottish queen: and the earl Murray's Answer to the same Letter was produced, and read, as followeth:

Note, That the beginning and ending of this Letter was not read; but so much only as pertained to the matter, viz.:

"In York, at the meeting of all the Commissioners, I found very honourable and neutral dealing with the duke and others her highness's commissioners, in the beginning of the cause, as in the making of the Oaths to proceed sincerely, &c. During which time, I only entered into general speech, sticking at our just defence in the matters that were objected against us by the said queen's commissioners; looking certainly for none other thing but a summary cognition in the causes of controversy, with a small declaratory to have followed. Upon a certain day, the lord Ledington's secretary rid with the duke to Cawood; what purpose they held, I cannot say: but that night, Ledington returning, and entering in conference with me upon the state of our action, I was advised by him to pass to the duke, and to require familiar conference; by the which I might have some feeling to what issue our matters would tend. According to which advice, having gotten time and place convenient in the gallery of the house where the duke was lodged; after renewing of our first acquaintance made at Berwick, the time before the siege of Lyth, and some speeches passed betwixt us, he began to say to me how he in England had favour and credit, and I in Scotland good-will and friendship of many. It was thought there could be none more fit instruments to travel for the continuance of the amity betwixt the two realms, than we two. And from that discourse upon the state of both, and how I was entered in that action tending so far to the queen's dishonour, I was willed by him to consider how matters stood in this isle, what honour I had received of the queen, and what inconveniencies her defamation in the matters laid to her charge, might breed to her posterity, whose respect was not little to the crown of England. There was but one babe, the Hamilton's, my unfriend, had the next respect; and if I should, the issue of her body would be the more affectionate to me and mine, than any other that could attain to that room: and so it should be meetest that she affirmed her dimission made in Lochlevin, and we to abstract the letters of her hand writ, that she should not be defamed in England. My reply to that was, how the matter had passed in parliament, and the letters seen to many; so that the abstracting of the same, could not then serve her to any purpose: and yet should we in that doing bring the ignominy upon us, affirming it could not be sure for us that way to proceed, seeing the queen's majesty of England was not made privy to the matter, as she behoved to be, in respect we were purposely come into England for that end, and for the justifying of the grounds of our cause. The duke's answer was, he would take in hand to handle matters well enough at the court. After this, at the occasion of certain articles that were required to be resolved in, before we entered directly in the declaration of the very ground of our action, we came up to the court; where some new commissioners were adjoined to the former, and the hearing of the matter ordained to be in the parliament house at Westminster. In presence of which commissioners for the said queen, and partly through the sharp rebuking of the queen's majesty of England's commissioners we uttered the grounds of the action, and produced such evidences, letters, and probations as we had, which might move the queen's majesty to think well of our cause. Whereupon expecting her highness's declaration, and seeing no likelihood of the same to be suddenly given, but daily motions made to come to an accord with the said queen, our matters at home in Scotland in the mean season standing in hazard and danger; we were put to the uttermost point of our wit to imagine whereunto the matters would tend: for albeit we had left nothing undone for the justification of our cause, it appeared yet no end, but continual motions made, to come to some accord with the queen, and restore her to whole or half reign. I had no other answer to give them, but that I could neither do against conscience nor honour in that matter. Notwithstanding, seeing this my plain answer wrought no end or dispatch to us, and that I was informed that the duke began to mislike of me, and to speak of me as that I had reported of the said queen irreverently, calling her whore and murderer; I was advised to pass to him, and to give him good words, and to purge myself of the things objected to me; that I should not upon the sudden enter in his evil grace, nor have him to our enemy, considering his greatness: it being therewithal whispered and shewed to me, that if I departed, he stauding discontented and not satisfied, I might peradventure find such trouble in my way, as my throat might be cut before I came to Berwick. And therefore since it might well enough appear that he aspired to her marriage, I should not put him in utter despair that my good-will cannot be had therein. So, few days before my departing, I came to the park at Hampton-Court, where the duke and I met together; and there I declared, that it was come to my ears how some misreport should be made of me to him, as that I should speak irreverently and rashly of the said queen, my sovereign's mother, such words as before expressed, that he might perceive my affection to be so alienated from her, as I could not love her, nor be content of her preferment. Howbeit, he might persuade himself of the contrary; for as she once was the creature in the earth that I loved best, having that honour to be so near unto me, and having received such advancement and honour by her, I was not so unnatural ever to wish her body harm, or to speak of her as was untruly reported of me, howsoever the truth were in itself. And as the preservation of her son, now my sovereign, had moved me to enter in this cause, and that her own pressing was the occasion of that which was uttered to her infamy; so whensoever God shall move her heart to repent of her by-past behaviour and life, and after her known repentance, that she should be separate from that ungodly and unlawful marriage that she was entered in, and then after were joined with such a godly and honourable personage, as were affectioned to the true religion, and whom we might trust; I could find in my heart to love her, and to shew her as great pleasure, favour, and good-will, as ever I did in my life. And in case he should be that personage, there was none whom I should better like of, the queen's majesty of England being made privy to the matter, and she allowing thereof; which being done, I should labour in all things that I could, to her honour and pleasure, that were not prejudicial to the king my sovereign's estate: and prayed him not to think otherwise of me, for my affection was rather buried and hid within me, waiting until God should direct her to know herself, than utterly alienate and abstracted from her. Which he seemed to accept in very good part, saying, Earl of Murray, thou knowest of me that thing whereunto I will make none in England nor Scotland privy, and thou hast Norfolk's life in thy hands. So departing, I came to my lodging, &c.—Thus have I plainly declared how I have been dealt withal for this marriage, and how just necessity moved me not to repugn directly that which the duke reported so bent unto. And for my threatenings to assent to the same, I have expressed the manner. The persons that laid the terror before me, were of mine own company, and the duke since hath spoken, that it was his writing which saved my life at that time. In conclusion, I pray you persuade her majesty, that she let no speeches, nor any other thing passed and objected to my prejudice, move her majesty to alter her favour towards me, or any ways to doubt of my assured constancy towards her highness: for in any thing that may tend to her honour and surety, I will, while I live, bestow myself, and all that will do for me, notwithstanding any hazard or danger; as proof shall declare, when her majesty finds time to employ me."

Serj. Thus appeareth it, That the duke of Norfolk first travelled with Ledington for stay and compounding the matter, and afterward likewise with the bishop of Ross, and at both times first moved it of himself: so now the earl of Murray also by his Letters doth testify, that in conference with him, it came first of the duke to move the stay of the contention, and to what end the duke did it, namely, for that he aspired to the marriage of the Scottish queen, and therein made account of her respect to the crown of England; and that without the queen's majesty's assent or knowledge. Now shall you also see, for further proof thereof, the bishop of Ross's letter to the Scottish queen: For the bishop of Ross went from York to Bolton, as you have before heard in his examination. On the way, before he came to Bolton to the Scottish queen, from his lodging he wrote a letter to her, which letter was lost by his servant; but as good hap was, he reserved a copy thereof, and negligently left it behind him in his lodging at Newcastle, where the earl of Murray half a year after being lodged in the same chamber, found it, and sent it to the queen's majesty's council; and here it is all written with the bishop's own hand, as himself, being examined thereof, hath confessed. Here he setteth out the conference between the duke of Norfolk and Ledington, and himself. He sheweth the duke of Norfolk's advice to the Scottish queen, for a letter by her to be written to the queen's majesty; and also he openeth the duke's advice, how to work for the Scottish queen, with disclosing the queen's majesty's secrets.

Here was the said Letter produced, and read as followeth:

Copy of the LETTER sent from York by the Bishop of Ross to the Queen Mother, to the Queen our Sovereign Lady, then remaining at Bolton.

"PLEASE your majesty, I conferred at great length with A. (c) one great part of the night; who assured me he had reasoned with B. (d) this Saturday, as yesterday on the fields who C. (e) determined to him, that it was D.'s (f) determinate purpose not to end your cause at this time, but to hold the same in suspense: and did what was in her power to cause us: E. (g) pursued extremely, to the effect F. (h) and his adherents might utter all that they could to your dishonour; to the effect, as was supposed, to cause you come in disdain with the whole subjects of this realm, that you may be the more unable to attempt any thing to her disadvantage; and to this effect is all her intention. And when they have produced all they can against you, the queen will not appoint the matter instantly, but transport you up in the country, and reserve you there till she think time to shew you favour; which is not able to be hastily, because of your uncles in France, and the fear she hath of yourself to be her unfriend. And therefore their counsel is, that you write a writing to the queen, meaning that you are informed concerning your subjects, which have offended you, this in effect: That your majesty hearing the estate of your affairs, as they proceed in York, was informed that her majesty was informed of you, that you could not godly remit your subjects in such sort, as they might credit you hereafter: which was one great cause of the stay of this controversy to be ended. And therefore persuading her grace effectuously not to trust any who made such narration; but like as you had rendered you in her hands, as most tender you of any living, so prayed her grace to take no opinion of you; but you would use her counsel in all your affairs, and would prefer her friendship to all others, as well uncles as others, and assure her to keep that thing you would promise to your subjects by her advice. And if her grace discredit you, you would be glad to satisfy her in that point, to be removed within her realm in secret and quiet manner, where her grace pleased, unto the time her grace were fully satisfied, and all occasion of discredit removed from her; so that in the mean time your realm were holden in quietness, and your true subjects restored and maintained in your own estate, and such other things tending to this effect. And affirms, that they believe that this may be occasion to cause her credit you better, that you offer safer, and may come, that within two or three months she may become better minded toward your grace; for now while she is not well minded, and will not shew you any pleasure, for the causes aforesaid."

Duke. Here be many things and many parts very hard for me to remember; and here be produced three witnesses against me, Ledington, the bishop of Ross, and the earl of Murray. Hereunto I will answer as my memory will serve me: Ledington, because he and I were acquainted at Leith, came to me and practised to search at my hands, and to feel how the queen's majesty was satisfied. I told him, that 'till I heard what the queen's majesty would resolve, I could tell him nothing: and so time spent away. And in the mean season, upon a Saturday, I being at dinner with the lord of Sussex, Ledington came in; and after dinner talking with me, he brake more earnestly for me with the Scottish queen, and for a Marriage between her and me, which I utterly refused, as by my letters from York to the queen's majesty it may appear; wherein I signified my opinion of the Scottish queen, or else she must be maintained by the queen of England. I said to him again, that the queen's majesty sought the quietness of that realm; but for any advice of restoring the Scottish queen into her country, I could not see how it might be considered: and so I advised him to submit the whole matter to the queen's majesty's judgment. Otherwise he and I never talked. Of those other doings, between Ledington and the Scottish queen, I know nothing. The bishop of Ross shortly after said to me, and intreated to have my help for compounding of the matter, as you know well he can speak fair. I told him I could do nothing without my fellows, and only in such manner as was prescribed by our commission. I told him also, that we were but to hear and certify; and for the matter of compounding, they were best to make offers themselves; for we were but to receive such devices as they should chuse, and to give advertisement of the same. To what end should I need to utter the matters of the earl of Murray's part to the other side, when Ledington himself was present, and privy to all? I spake not with the bishop of Ross, but at that time only. And as for that advice, to avoid the discovering of those rigorous matters by the earl, and the publishing thereof to the queen's majesty, to the Scottish queen's infamy; I never disclosed any such secret, nor gave any such advice: only I did advise the bishop of Ross, that he and that side should hold themselves contented with the queen's majesty's dealing, and with the determination taken at Hampton-court, which was such as might content them, and such as my lord Burleigh then disliked. As for the earl of Murray, he began with me, and not I with him: he came to me at Cawood, and prayed me to tell him what end would come of the matter. I said, I knew not; for it must come from the queen's majesty: we knew not of the differing of the commission at that time, nor till such time as Mr. Sadler was sent for. How could I tell him, and knew it not myself? I never yielded to the Marriage between the Scottish queen and me: I cannot gather such matter of looks alone, I never dealt more therein, but only that Ledington broke it. Have I not answered all these matters? If I have not, put me in any thing I have omitted, and I will answer it.

Serj. Your answer is but only denial; Ledington and the rest write otherwise, that you made the first motion to them: and therefore Ledington, by practice between you and him, sent the earl of Murray to you, under pretence of searching to learn the state of their own cause, to be moved by you for the marriage; upon your answer, it is but yea and nay between you. If you meant directly, then needed you not to have dealt so secretly in conference with Ledington, without the rest of the Commissioners; and besides Ledington's conference with you, both the bishop of Ross and the earl Murray affirm your practising with them to the same intent: which is sufficient proof against your own bare denial.

Duke. The earl Murray sought my life, the other are not of credit; yet all these prove not that I dealt in the matter of the marriage with the Scottish queen, in any respect of her claim to the crown of England. If the bishop of Ross, or any other, can say otherwise, let them be brought before me face to face. I have often so desired it, but I could not obtain it.

Serj. The bishop of Ross confesseth it; this is his own hand; and here you shall have, by witnesses, proved the duke's assent to the marriage with the Scottish queen: and to practise the furtherance thereof, you shall see how that afterwards he was privy to a device, that the earl Murray should have been murdered at Northallerton, in his way homeward, by the Nortons, Markenfield, and other rebels: and afterwards, being satisfied at the earl Murray's hands, a Letter was written to stay that device: containing also a device of compounding the matter, and how the earl Murray had assented to the marriage.

Here was contained the bishop of Ross's Confession, in Article the ninth: wherein appeareth, 'That the earl Murray should have been murdered by the way, going home into Scotland: and that the bishop of Ross wrote to the Scottish queen that the duke of Norfolk advised her to stay that murder, because the earl Murray had yielded his good will to the marriage as followeth:

"To the 9th he saith, That the earl of Murray was in fear to have been murdered by the way, in his return to Scotland; whereupon this Examinee by the duke's advice, did write to the queen of Scots, that the attempt might be stayed, for that Murray had yielded to the duke to be favourable; and the murder should have been executed about Northallerton, by the Nortons, Markenfield, and others, as this Examinee was advertised by the Scottish queen's servants that came from Bolton."

Serj. Thus it appeareth, that the duke so far assented to the marriage, that rather than it should not have taken effect, he was contented that the earl of Murray should have been murdered.

Duke. The unkindness between the earl Murray and me, was not about this matter of his mistress the Scottish queen, but for another cause: it was because the earl Murray had reported that I sought the marriage of the Scottish queen. I charged him therewith by message, he excused himself thereof, and laid it upon the earl Morston and the bishop of Orkney; and for the device of murdering him, I was never privy to it. And where the Article saith, that I heard it by the Scottish queen's servants that came from Bolton, it is not true. I never heard of it till Whitsuntide after, when John Wood came, and then I heard it not but by the bishop of Ross; neither did I hear that it should have been done by the Nortons, but by my brother of Westmoreland being an hunting, when the earl Murray spying a great company on the hill-side, imagined that he should have been slain.

Serj. You shall also understand, that the duke himself wrote to the earl of Murray, wherein is plainly declared his practise and assent to the Marriage: which very Letter we have not, but the copy thereof, under the regent's own hand, which the regent sent to the queen's majesty, whereby the matter most plainly appeareth.

"My good Lord; I have received your courteous letter, whereby I do not only perceive you well affected for the advancement of your common weal, and the uniting of this island, but also your good mind towards me: which two points I cannot but note to your special commendation, and my great comfort. As you shall prove me industrious to assist you with all my power in the one, so shall you not find me ungrateful in the other, but really to requite you to my uttermost for your friendship so frankly offered; the rather I shall have occasion to employ myself for the just reward of your deserts, the sooner I shall think myself in nature, friendship, and conscience discharged of my obligation. In the mean time, good my lord, assure yourself, that you have not only purchased a faithful friend, but also a natural brother, who is not, nor will not be less careful for your weal and surety, than his own honour and credit: whereof I am fully persuaded you doubt not: and therefore in that point I need not to be over-tedious, but briefly to return to that you desire to be satisfied of, which is, for my marriage with all sincerity with your sister; wherein I must deal plainly with your lordship, as my only friend, that I have so far proceeded herein, as I, with conscience, can neither revoke that I have done, nor never do mean, while I do live, to go back from this that is done, nor with honour proceed further, until such time as you there shall remove such stumbling-blocks, as be impeachment to our more apparent proceeding: which when by me it shall be finished, upon mine honour the rest shall follow to your contentment and comfort. Wherefore my earnest request, at this present to my good lord, is, that you will proceed herein with such expedition, as the enemies of this good purpose, which will be no small number, against the uniting of this land into one kingdom in time coming, and the maintenance of God's true religion, may not have opportunity, through the delay given them, to hinder our intended determination; against the which I am of opinion, there will be no practices by foreign princes omitted. This I hope will be sufficient to resolve you, my lord, of your desire touching the marriage; referring myself wholly, for your more ample instruction and satisfaction in all points, to my lord Boid, who hath commission both by the queen of Scotland, your sister, and also by me, to resolve you of all doubts, whom I wish you to credit as myself. You shall not want the furtherance in this enterprize of the most part of the noblemen of this realm; whose faithful friendship in this case, and all other my actions, I have to my contentment sufficiently proved. Thus being persuaded that your lordship's endeavour is for the maintenance of God's glory, and the advancement of the common weal of this island, I have adventured to impart my secret determination, as to one whom I make account to be assured of, and unto whom I wish long life and prosperous health, to his hearts desire. So with my hearty commendations at this present, without further molestation, I am, my good lord, your faithful and most assured friend."—From my house in London, July 1.

"I have heard you have been in the North of Scotland, and doubt not but you have satisfied the request I made for the bishop of Ross, and have caused his servants to be obeyed of his benefices; and what is left undone, I pray you cause it to be effectually furthered. He hath the queen of Scots letter, directed to you for that effect; but trusting that my request shall make him to be obeyed, ere the other come to your hands, wherein you shall do me singular pleasure. NORFOLK."

Duke. All these are Letters, and answered two years ago, when Mr. Sadler and Mr. Attorney were sent to examine me upon Interrogatories. Indeed I must confess my folly; it is an ill cook that cannot lick his own fingers. The bishop of Ross wrote the Letter, and he licked his own fingers. The earl of Murray wrote to me very humbly, and that he was at my commandment, with such like words. I having no leisure to write answer to him, drew articles to give him thanks: but that the noblemen liked of that marriage, and that I wished no man's friendship more than his in it, the bishop of Ross added of his own, and put it in cipher in this form, which cipher I had not then.

Serj. This is the very Copy of your own Letter.

Duke. See my Answer made in my first troubles, two years past.

Serj. The queen's majesty understanding the duke's intention to marry with the Scottish queen, the duke himself by way of prevention, complained to her majesty of the ruinour that was spread against him, that he sought the Scottish queen's marriage, and prayed it might be examined. In which her complaint, as I have heard her majesty herself declare it, and some here of my lords have likewise heard it, he said, among other things, To what end should I seek to marry her, being so wicked a woman, such a notorious adulteress and murderer? I love to sleep upon a safe pillow: I account myself, to your majesty's good favour, as good a prince at home in my Bowling-Alley at Norwich, as she is, though she were in the middle of her kingdom. The Revenues of the crown of Scotland, all the ordinary Charges deducted, about the necessary affairs of the realm, are not comparable to mine own that I enjoy by your goodness, as I have heard of the chief officers of that realm; considering also that her kingdom is not in her hand, but possessed by another; if I should seek to match with her, knowing, as I do know, that she pretendeth a title to the present possession of your crown, your majesty might justly charge me with seeking your own crown from your head. This the duke spake to the queen's majesty, in his excuse, when the fame went of his Marriage with the Scottish queen, when yet, beside that time, he had dealt earnestly in it.

Duke. I may not nor will not stand against her majesty's Testimony, I must give place unto it; but hereof I was examined two years ago, and then I declared, as I now do, that at that time I intended not the Marriage. And true it is, that I have at sundry times, some at one time, and some at another, used some of those kind of speeches; but at that time I dealt not with that Marriage, nor minded it.

Serj. Your own Confession is otherwise: for yourself have since confessed, that you concealed from the queen your conferences with Ledington and Ross about the marriage, both the conferences had at York and at Hampton-Court.

Duke. I never consented to the Marriage at those times of their conferences, and so I might well use their speeches.

Then was produced his own Examination the 6th Nov. 1571, and it was read, and he com-fessed his concealment of those Speeches and Conferences before used about the Marriage, and that it had indeed been moved, but not concluded on: he remembereth that the queen charged him straightly not to proceed in that Marriage; but he remembereth not that she charged him upon his allegiance.

The Duke of Norfolk, the 6th of Nov. 1571.

To the first and second, he saith, That he remembereth that at Hampton-Court upon a report made by Robert Melvin, so declared by Woolcock, that this examinant had gone about a matter of Marriage with the Scottish queen for himself, wherein he took himself to be much wronged, and desired to have the matter examined; for that he had not dealt in that matter, and doth not remember what the queen's majesty said unto him at that time: at which time he said for himself, That he intended no such thing, nor meant any such thing; and yet he confesseth, That he did not declare to the queen's majesty, at that time, of any speech that had been used unto him by Ledington at York, and the earl of Murray at Hampton-Court, touching the said Marriage. Being at Titchfield, the queen's majesty called him to her Gallery, asking of him, Whether he had dealt any wise for the Marriage of the queen of Scots, as it was reported? Whereunto he answered, He thought her majesty had heard by others. But she willed him to declare the truth, because she had rather hear it of himself: and so he declared, That he had received Letters from her; that the matter had been moved and written unto her; but he had not made any conclusion in that matter with her. Whereupon her majesty shewing herself to mislike thereof, commanded and charged him that he should not deal any further therein with the queen of Scots, nor any other person in that matter: but that he was charged upon his allegiance, he doth not certainly remember; but that he was straitly commanded, he doth well remember.

At length he confessed, that he was charged upon his Allegiance.

Serj. At Titchfield the queen's majesty expressly commanded the duke of Norfolk upon his allegiance, as himself hath now confessed, not to proceed in that Marriage with the Scottish queen: Now, if we prove that this commandment notwithstanding, and against his own promise, he afterward still proceeded; and that much more earnestly than before; and yet nevertheless, that he had all the while conceived an evil opinion against the Scottish queen, and upon the sight of her Letters, and other Evidences, shewed he thought her plainly guilty of abominable whoredom, of the murder of her husband, and signified it by letters, and declared the same his opinion to Bannister: And also, That he made no account of her kingdom of Scotland, which she had not in possession; or if she would hate it; yet he counted it not comparable to his own dukedom. He (I say) so doing, and so conceiving and so declaring, and yet still more and more prosecuting the Marriage, cannot be said to have prosecuted it, in respect of her person, but of some other thing (forsooth the crown of England) which he hoped to attain under her pretended title. You never saw her, you could not then be carried with love of her person; you conceived ill opinion of her, so could you not be led with love of her conditions; the fame of her good qualities and virtuous conditions you never heard much of, except it were by herself, or the bishop of Ross, or some of her ministers; her Kingdom of Scotland you esteemed not, both because she had it not in possession, but it was in possession of her son, by her own demise ratified by parliament, and for that it was not of so good value as your own possessions were. To what end then pursued you the Marriage? To no other end surely, but to advance and maintain the false and pretended title to the present possession of the crown of England, and for the attaining thereof, to practise the deprivation, death and destruction of the queen's majesty. If further, we shall plainly prove that after your departing from the court, you meant not only to prosecute the Marriage, but also to prosecute it with force, against the queen in her own realm; then it must needs be with intent of her majesty's deprivation and destruction, and so High-Treason, within compass of the statute of 25 of Edward the 3rd. For whose shall take upon him to prosecute and maintain a Title to the Crown by force against the queen, and within her own realm, must needs make account that the queen must and will resist that force: if then that force may overcome the prince's force, what is the likelihood then to ensue? There must needs follow deprivation of the queen, and thereupon her Death and Destruction: for the jealousy of an Usurper by force, can in no wise suffer a rightful prince to live. Now to prove your intention to pursue the Marriage with force against the queen: In your Journey towards London, you entered into conference and device between another and you for taking the Tower of London, with all the queen's Ordnance, Ammunition and Treasure therein, and to have kept the Tower by force against the queen, and so to have brought the Marriage to pass by force, whether the queen would or no. But it took not effect; for the queen's majesty having understanding thereof before provided, for enforcing the place with new supply; and Mr. Pelham, lieutenant of the ordnance was, for that purpose, put in with sufficient power. Afterward being at your own house, the Charter-House, the queen's majesty understanding of these attempts, sent for you; whereunto you make a feigned excuse of doubt of sickness, and that you had taken physick, so that for four or five days you could not journey: promising after those four or five days, to wait on her majesty, according to your duty. And immediately after this excuse sent, without tarrying four or five days, or any more days, the same night, you by and by stole away into Norfolk, and there intended to have levied force: but that the queen's majesty and her council suspecting your purpose, had secretly sent into those parts before, and taken order for impeaching of your intention. If this then be proved true, That you still prosecuted the Marriage, without liking of her person, without estimation of her possessions, with only respect to her false title to the crown of England, and with force; and sithence it cannot be pursued with force against the queen, nor force levied against her majesty, without purpose to suppress her majesty's force, and to depose her from her crown and dignity; and he that so seeketh to depose her must needs be thought that he will not suffer her to live; all these matters considered, the seeking of this Marriage in this form must needs be High-Treason, within compass of the Statute of 25 of Edw. 3rd.

Here was produced the Duke's own Letter, and the other commissioners, from York to the queen's majesty; wherein is signified the great abomination of the Scottish queen, appearing in her own Letters and the certainty of the truth of those Letters, both by offer of oath of those that exhibited them, and by discourses of some matters there: which could not be written but by herself, being known to none other. The Commissioners Letter is as followeth:

"Afterwards they shewed unto us an horrible and long letter of her own hand (as they say) containing foul matter, and abominable to be either thought of, or to be written by a princess, with divers fond Ballads of her own hand; which Letters, Ballads, and other Writings before specified, were closed in a little coffer of silver and gilt, heretofore given to her by Bothwell. The said Letters and Ballads did discover such inordinate and filthy love, between her and Bothwell, her loathsomness and abhorring of her husband that was murdered, and the conspiracy of his death, in such sort as every good and godly man cannot but detest and abhor the same. And those men here do constantly affirm the said Letters and other Writings, which they produce of her own hand, to be her own hand indeed, and do offer to swear and to take their oath thereupon; as indeed the matter contained in them being such as could hardly be invented or devised by any other than by herself; for that the discourse of some things, which were unknown to any other than to herself and Bothwell, doth the rather persuade us to believe that they be indeed of her own hand-writing. And as it is hard to counterfeit so many and so long Letters; so the matters of them, and the manner how these men came by them is such, as it seemeth that God, in whose sight the murder and blood of the innocent is abominable, would not permit the same to be hid or concealed. In a Paper herein inclosed, we have noted to your majesty the chief and principal points of their Letters, written (as they say) with her own hand, to the intent it may please your majesty to consider of them, and so to judge whether the same be sufficient to convince her of the detestable crime of the Murder of her husband; which in our opinion and consciences, if the said Letters be written with her own hand, as we believe they be, is very hard to be avoided."

Duke. This maketh for me; for this proveth that I so much misliking her, and signifying by my Letter so much against her; dealt not on that side when I was at York, where this letter was written.

Serj. There were others joined with you in the letter, so that you could not otherwise write, however you otherwise dealt: but this maketh much against you, for it proved you had an evil opinion of her, and so could not seek the Marriage in respect of her person, but only in respect of her false title; and that not to the kingdom of Scotland, which she had not, and which you despised, but to the crown of England. Now you shall, to the same end, hear your own Report against her to Bannister.

Duke. Bannister was shrewdly cramped when he told that tale. I beseech you let me have him brought face to face.

Serj. No more than you were.

Then was read Bannister's Confession, in Oct., 12th Eliz.

This sheweth that you had an evil opinion of her, and so no affection to the person; therefore your seeking of that Marriage was for another respect; and therefore Ledington, Ross, and you practised the matter at York.

Duke. They broke it to me. What is this to me? Did I consent?

Serj. You consented.

Duke. No.

Serj. They say plainly, that you practised to withdraw the things that might charge her.

Wilbraham. You have said, that the bishop of Ross hath accused you of malice; but you answer nothing to that which the bishop of Ross wrote to his mistress, the Scottish queen, in secrecy, wherein could be no malice.

Duke. Ledington broke it to me, and the earl Murray broke it to me. I pray you, let them be brought face to face to me: I have often required it, and the law I trust is so.

Serj. The law was so for a time, in some cases of Treason: but, since, the law hath been found too hard and dangerous for the prince, and it hath been repealed. You intended to have proceeded with the Marriage by force; and for proof thereof, you have heard of the device for taking of the Tower. Now to prove further your purpose to pursue your enterprise by force, let be read the confession of the bishop of Ross to the second article.

To the second Article. The duke being after conferred with by the bishop of Ross, from his mistress, to know what he would do in the matter of the marriage, if the queen would not assent, said, he knew she would, though not at the first; because most of the council and noblemen thought it meet; and that he had known the minds of most of the noblemen. And after, when the queen was offended with him coming from Southampton, he told the bishop he would depart into his own country, and so was resolved, by the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who would do the like; and there would take purpose, by the advice of his countrymen and friends, and do that was likeliest for the advancement of the cause. The bishop said, the queen's majesty would by force fetch him out of his country. He answered; That no nobleman in England would accept that charge at her commandment; for he knew their minds, specially for those in the North, who would assist. And if that he might once have that open quarrel against her, that she would first pursue him, he would have friends enough to assist him, and that the Scottish queen should be safely enough provided for; for that was the principal mark he shot at, and would do what he could to have her in his hands. And the earls of Arundel and Pembroke had promised to do as he did; and they in the North had promised the like. Item, Liggons told the Bishop, that the duke was resolved to go through with the matter by force, if the queen would not assent to it. At this time common messages past between the Scottish queen and the duke, and them of the North.

Duke. All is false, saying that the bishop of Ross once spake with me; and then understanding him to be a suspected man, I desired him to forbear to come to me; nevertheless, by his great earnestness and importunity, that I would but once admit him to come to me, at length he came, and then he moved me for certain money of the Scottish queen's, about 2000*l.* remaining in my keeping: one letter he brought me, and no more letters, until after my first trouble. As for my going into Norfolk, I can bring good witness, that I meant not to go into Norfolk, four hours before I went, and that I spake not with him in two days before. It is of good ground that I have prayed to have the bishop of Ross brought to me in private Examination face to face, whereby I might have put him in remembrance of truth; but I have not had him face to face, nor have been suffered to bring forth Witnesses, Proofs, and Arguments, as might have made for my purgation. As for sending of Letters, to my lord of Northumberland, or my brother of Westmoreland, all is false; I never received letters from them in all my time. If ever I sent to them, or received from them any letters in three quarters of a year before, let me never be credited.

Serj. You shall have Proofs that the bishop of Ross hath said it. You stand much upon your own credit: now therefore to your credit, I will say somewhat against your oath specially taken, when you were appointed commission for the matter at York; and against your oath of a counsellor to the queen, you dealt indirectly and partially; you deceived the queen's trust, and disclosed her secrets.

VOL. I.

Duke. I deny it.

Serj. It is well proved that at Hampton-Court, being examined of the matter by the queen, you dissembled it: being examined of Money lent by you to the Scottish queen, you denied it: being charged upon your Allegiance, you promised not to proceed further in the matter. Notwithstanding that express commandment of her majesty; yet, against your duty, against your promise and faith, you still proceeded.

Duke. I confess this was mine error; but I have already made humble Petition to my peers, not to confound my faults together, nor to mingle my inferior offences with this great Cause.

Serj. Sithence the commandment given to you at Titchfield, not to proceed in dealing with the Scottish queen in any wise, you have continually dealt with her: you have lent her money; you have maintained Liggons, your man and your solicitor, continually to advertise you, from the bishop of Glasgow, and the Pope's Nuncio; and you have advertised him from hence. He hath had money of you, and you have received letters from him four times in coffers.

Duke. Liggons is not my solicitor.

Serj. He is your solicitor, and so yourself have expounded him; for where the Scottish queen, in her Letters speaketh of your solicitor, being asked whom she meant thereby, you have answered, Liggons.

Duke. At the first indeed she so called him; but Solicitor is no name of use. He hath not been so since my first Trouble; and so for her calling, it is no matter, she once called me Legista.

Serj. He is your solicitor; for she so taketh him, and yourself do so expound it.

Then was read his own Confession, of Money lent 2000*l.* and received, &c. The duke confessed this receiving and lending of Money. Then was read the bishop of Ross's Confession, concerning Money sent by Barthwick, and of money delivered to Francis Bishop.

Duke. This I deny not.

Serj. Francis Bishop was a Traitor.

Duke. I knew him not.

Serj. Now for the matter of taking the Tower.

Duke. I deny it.

Serj. Was it not mentioned unto you in the way, when you came from Titchfield, by one that came to you, and moved you a device between you and another, for taking the Tower?

Duke. I have confessed that such a motion was made to me, but I never assented to it.

Serj. You concealed it: and to what end should you have taken the Tower, but to have kept it against the queen by force? But you say you liked not the motion, you asked advice of it.

Duke. Indeed I told one of it: Owen met me by the way from Titchfield, and told me how we were all in danger, and said, That some of our friends thought it was best to take the Tower. I refused to do it, and said, Take the Tower! That were a proper device indeed! And thence I went to my lord of Pembroke's, and there dined; and then I told my lord of Pembroke of that device; whereunto he answered, We are well, and safe enough: let them that be faulty take the Tower, if they will. And to what end should I have taken the Tower?

Serj. To maintain by force that which you had practised against the queen's majesty's commandment, which was the Marriage with the Scottish queen.

Duke. I had not then dealt with it.

Serj. It is well proved that you had; and afterward, at your house at Charter-House, you received letters, messages, and tokens from the Scottish queen; you received from her a brooch, with a hand cutting down a vine; and this poesy upon it, Virescit vulnere Virtus. But, my lord, do green vines grow when they be cut? And a green vine it was.

Wilbraham. My lord, you still say you deal not at this time, or that time, against her majesty's commandment? I pray you at what time, since her majesty's commandment upon your allegiance, did you forbear to deal with the Scottish queen?

Serj. Beside this you have given advice as a counsellor to the Scottish queen, against the queen's majesty: namely, when in Treaty between the queen's majesty and her, there were three Articles propounded on the queen's majesty's part; the one for the delivery of her son into the queen's majesty's custody; the other for delivering the English rebels that were fled into Scotland; the third for delivering of certain holds in Scotland into English men's possession: he gave advice herein as a counsellor, against the queen his sovereign lady. The Articles were expressly sent to the duke to have his advice, before that the Scottish queen would resolve of any Answer; and she respited her Answer to be made according to his direction. He gave advice, that she should in no wise deliver her son, for it was against her own safety, not knowing whether she delivered him into her friends hands or no. As for the Rebels, she should in no wise deliver them, for it were against her honour: and as for the holds, she should not deliver any; for it were against the safety of her friends in Scotland.

Duke. For advising not to deliver the Rebels, I deny that ever I gave any such Advice. As for Delivery of her son, I advised her no otherwise but thus, that I wished her to bestow him there, where she might have sure friends.

Serj. Thus, contrary to your oath, allegiance, and fidelity, and against the credit that you would fain be thought of, you became, by your own confession, a counsellor to a foreign prince against your own sovereign lady.

Burleigh. My lord, did you ever desire to have any Proofs or Witnesses produced for your part, to prove any thing that might make for you? And were you denied?

Duke. I have divers times prayed, that if any thing were denied to be true which I said, I might be driven to my proof of it.

Burleigh. I ask it, because I have not heard it reported to her majesty that you made any such request, to have any special Witnesses examined or Proofs heard, on your part.

Here was produced and read the Confession of Hickford, to the 3rd Article.

Duke. I advised her, touching her son, that she should first be well assured that he should be bestowed among her friends. For her castles, I advised her, that she should in any wise take heed, that they might not after come into the hands of her enemies; for so if she delivered Edinburgh-Castle, she should not be safe in Holyrood-House.

Serj. How standeth this with the duty and oath of a counsellor, to give Advice to a foreign prince against the queen's majesty?

Duke. I excuse it not, herein I confess my error; I beseech you call not these my inferior faults, which I have confessed, among the greater wherewith I am charged.

Serj. Thus appeareth how he hath given Advice against the queen to the Scottish queen. Now it shall be further proved unto you, that where the Scottish queen is here in custody as the queen's prisoner, he hath also been privy to devices for conveying her away.

Here was produced the Confession of Barker. Oct. 5, 1571. Article 13.

Duke. This is not true, saving that indeed advice was broken to me of conveying her way at a window, at a gallery's-end, in one of my lord of Shrewsbury's houses, of the which window the bishop of Ross had taken a measure; but this device was overthrown at such time as it was told me. As for that which Barker hath here confessed, it is utterly false.

Serj. Now shall you hear the duke's own Confession.

Here was read the Duke's Examination, 13 Octobris.

Serj. Besides this, the duke being in prison in the Tower, made a Submission to the queen's majesty, confessed his error in dealing with the Scottish queen, and promised, upon his faith and allegiance, never to deal with that Marriage, or with any other matter touching the Scottish queen.

Duke. I confess I did so.

Serj. Before his subscribing his said Submission, he first made the Scottish queen privy to it, and sent her a double of it.

Duke. I sent it to the bishop of Ross.

Serj. All is one.

Duke. I confess it.

Serj. What should move my lord of Norfolk now so earnestly still to pursue this Marriage? You see he liked not the person, she was not of good fame, he so signified to the queen, he so reported to Bannister. The kingdom of Scotland he esteemed not, and also it was out of her possession, in the hands of the king her son, by her own dismissal ratified by parliament. Forsooth he had an old blind Prophecy lying by him: In exaltatione Luna Leo succumbet, & Leo cum Levis conjungetur, & catuli eorum regnabunt; which belike is thus to be expounded, At the exaltation of the Moon (which was the rising of the earl of Northumberland that giveth the moon) the Lion (which is the queen's majesty) shall be overthrown; then shall the Lion be joined with a Lion (which is the duke of Norfolk with the Scottish queen, for they both bear lions in their arms) and their Whelps shall reign (that is, their posterity shall have the kingdom).

Duke. I do not remember any such Prophecy.

Serj. It was in your own keeping.

Duke. What should I do with it?

Serj. Such blind Prophecies have oft deceived noblemen.

Duke. This is nothing to the purpose; I kept it not to any such end.

Serj. You uttered it to your servant Hickford.

Here was produced and read Hickford's Testimony.

Duke. A toy! You see I call it a foolish Prophecy.

Serj. Where had you it?

Duke. I remember it not.

Serj. Hitherto have you heard the Evidence to prove the duke's imagination, compassing, and conspiracy, to deprive the queen's majesty of the crown and her royal estate, and so to bring her highness to death and destruction. For proving this his intent, you have heard those matters proved, his practice to join himself in Marriage with the Scottish queen whom he then well knew falsely to claim and pretend title to the present possession of the crown of England: also his prosecuting the same Marriage without the queen's majesty's knowledge, against her highness's express commandment upon his allegiance, against his faith, promise, and submission; yea, to pursue that with force, and to use the advice and strength of his friends to maintain the same force against the queen; his hearkening to blind prophecies, money by him lent to the Scottish queen, and against the queen his sovereign lady. If then his purpose so were to pursue it with force, it must needs follow, that the same must be of intent, imagination, and compassing, to deprive and depose the queen's majesty from her crown, royal estate, and dignity, and to advance and maintain that false and usurped title of the Scottish queen unto the present possession of the crown of England, and so consequently, for maintenance of his imagination and purpose, to compass the queen's majesty's death and destruction. Now shall you further hear Proof of his own words, declaring the same intent to pursue the Marriage by force, and rather to lose his life than to give it over.

CAVENDISH'S Deposition.

That at his several Journees unto the places of the queen of Scots abode, the duke procured him to labour the cause of his Marriage with her with all diligence. Item, That her majesty being at Southampton, Richard Candish, a certain night walking in his chamber, and persuading him by all means to labour for the queen's favour concerning that Marriage; the duke affirmed, that before he lost that Marriage he would lose his life; and said moreover, that if ever he handled thing wisely or cunningly, I would say it was the matter of that Marriage, if I knew it from the beginning. Item, That the Monday at night, after the duke's departure from Southampton, Rd. Candish being at Hayward-House with him, in the company of the lord Lumley, the duke and the said lord Lumley, talking secretly together, suddenly the duke brake out into this Speech.

'Candish,' quoth he, 'is able to accuse me of no disloyal practices.' Whereat the lord Lumley, as it were wondering, 'Can he not indeed,' quoth he? 'No indeed,' quoth the duke; and turning to Candish, said, 'Candish, I in this case defy thee, say thy worst.' To which Candish answered, 'Besides the practice of this Marriage, I truly can accuse you of none.' Item, The duke, at another time, in the said house, asked, Candish, 'If God take away the queen's majesty, whether he could assure him of his brother Candish, and procure his said brother to promise unto him sir Robert Ningfield?' Item, At his last being at Remminghall, among many others talking, he had this speech; 'Candish,' quoth he, 'nothing will undo us but the Rising of the northern lords.' To whom I answered, God forbid that any such thing should be, for it will undo us all; whereat he replying, said, 'I fear they will rise.'

Duke. The Duke looking upon Cavendish with a scornful and smiling countenance, said, You are an honest man! That which he saith of the Talk between him and me at Southampton, is utterly false: At that time you were most earnest on my part, and came to me as for succour, for that as you said your cousin Christmas was fallen out with you. When we rode to my lord of Pembroke's, you came to me and told me, my lord Burleigh findeth me well, I will ride with him and find his humour, and I will face that fellow thoroughly; so from Salisbury you said you would ride to Leicester, and so home with my lord Burleigh, and you doubted not to bring me such word from him as should satisfy me. You told me how my lord of Leicester was firm, and sir Nicholas Throckmorton my sure friend, and that they would both join to deal with the queen for me; and how sir Nicholas sent me word, That he doubted not the queen would take order to my contentation at her next coming to a staid house. Then came you to London, and though I had no great liking of you, yet because you were loth to lie at Arundel's, and were somewhat ill at ease, I let you lie in my house. I never made great account of you; my lord of Leicester made us first acquainted: your brother your know was not my friend. I then took you as I now find you. While you could hold on, you shewed your Letters that you did write on my behalf; then you came to me and said, you had need, and borrowed money of me; I had none at that time, but I sent it you by Bowes. I was warned by divers of my friends to take heed of you; you dealt with Dier and with Straunge very maliciously. As for the Speech at Remming Hall, that you speak of me, it is untrue; I dealt not with you there about any such matter; I left you at London, I looked not for you; when you came, I was glad to be rid of you; you said you were going to Norwich, and I was glad you were going, and willed you to look at my house at Norwich, and tell me how you liked it: out of the north I heard nothing in six weeks before. You suddenly slipped away from me, and then came I up to London ward; you are an honest man, indeed! It is all false that he hath said.

Then Cavendish began to report and justify what he had said, and to put the Duke in remembrance, when the duke gave him reproachful words of discredit.

Serj. He is sworn, there needeth no more proving; you sent Havers to the earl of Westmorland.

Then was alledged the Examination of one Haveling touching Havers, whom the duke sent to the earl of Northumberland, with this Message, 'That if the two earls should rise, let were undone.'

Duke. This may be seen of two years old, and by me fully declared and answered.

Then was read the Confession of Havers. Then was alledged a Letter of the Scottish queen's in cypher to the duke, containing, that the lord of Shrewsbury had told her, that the earl of Northumberland was delivered to the earl of Sussex; for which she was very sorrowful three days together, for fear of cumbering of friends if he were taken.

Serj. What friends was she so careful for, that she wrote to the duke, unless she thought it should light upon the duke himself?

Duke. That letter never came to my hands.

Serj. It was found in the bag which you willed to be burned.

Then the said Letter was read.

Duke. All this is nothing to me.

Serj. This proveth in you a practice to the Rebellion: for all her sorrow of the yielding of the earl of Northumberland was; for fear he should bewray and cumber her friends.

Duke. That toucheth not me; for I am sure the earl of Northumberland hath been sought for me, and yet he cannot accuse me.

Serj. Had it not concerned you, it had not been written to you.

Duke. Some Letters never came to my hands: sometime they came to the bishop of Ross, sometime to Bannister, sometime not all deciphered; as Straunge and Bowes, and other that have been messengers for me, can tell.

Here Mr. Attorney began to prosecute the second Part, and spake first to this effect:

Attorney. Now you have heard enough of the first matter. In this indictment are contained three principal Treasons, whereof the first is imagining and conspiring the deprivation, death, and destruction of the queen's majesty: for proof hereof, it hath been truly said, That to imagine, compass, or procure the deposing or death of the prince, is High-Treason by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and at the common law; for the statute is but a Declaration what was Treason at common law: which Imagination, when it appeareth by overt fact, must needs be judged Treason; for overt fact is but a shewing of a man's mind, which when a man by outward speech or deed hath uttered, it must needs be judged that so was his meaning; which must be gathered by such means, as it may be made to appear. For no traitor is so bold, to say expressly, he will depose or kill the king; but often it hath been seen, that they go about indirectly, and by means that tend to that end: and therefore he that goeth about to stir the people to rebellion, or to levy war within the realm, to assail or withstand the prince by force, is taken to seek the death of the prince. Now therefore to prove that the duke of Norfolk hath imagined and compassed the deposing and death of the queen's majesty, this hath been shewed you: first, by secret and indirect means he sought to join himself in Marriage with the Scottish queen, who pretendeth title to the queen's crown. Thus he did without the queen's privity, against her highness's express commandment upon his allegiance, against his own promise and submission. First, being at York, a Commissioner appointed by the queen, contrary to his oath and charge, he dealt indirectly and partially, and played an untrue part with the queen; he secretly practised for the Marriage. This being objected against him, he hath denied it: you have heard it testified by three Witnesses, the earl of Murray, Ledington, and the bishop of Ross. So it appeareth, that all the practice and indirect dealing was to this end, to compass the Deprivation and Death of the queen's majesty; for he well knew that the Scottish queen made Title to the present possession of the crown of England; that she denied the queen's majesty to be lawful queen of this realm; that she usurped the royal stile; that she quartered the arms of England without any difference: all this he knew, he was of the queen's privy council at the same time; he knew that she made no renunciation of her unjust Claim, though it were required of her. It was also one Article in the Commission where he himself was Commissioner, To require the Recognition of her error, and of the queen's majesty's present right: he knew well it was not done. If the Scottish queen claimed such present title, then was she no friend to the queen's majesty, but a seeker of her highness's overthrow and destruction: and yet the duke of Norfolk knowing this, practised to compass this Marriage. Wherefore, I pray you, sought he that Marriage; yea, and sought it as he meant to achieve it with force? It was not in respect of her person, for he knew her not; it could not be for any good report of her virtuous conditions, for he had an evil opinion of her: he did by his writing certify against her, he declared to Bannister that he thought very ill of her. It was not for her Title to the kingdom of Scotland, for neither was she possessed of it, neither did he esteem it though she had it. Wherefore sought he her then? surely in respect of that unjust Claim and Title that she pretended to the present possession of the crown of England; which title cannot be maintained without evident purpose to depose the queen's majesty, and to bring her to Death and Destruction, which is plain Treason by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, for no more can England bear two queens, than the world can bear two suns. And how should we have maintained it, but with force? And how could that have been, without depriving of the queen's majesty from the royal estate? and how could that have been done, without compassing her highness's death and destruction? for the jealousy of an usurper cannot suffer the just prince to live. This your honours are to search and consider, and to your judgments we refer it. Now my lord of Norfolk's chief and only Answer is but his bare Denial, which is no sufficient Answer; specially sith he himself hath fallen into so great discredit, by doing against his word, his hand, his oath. He promised, being commanded upon his Allegiance, never to deal in that matter; he promised, by his Submission under his own hand, utterly to forsake it, and to deal no more with the Scottish queen for that Marriage, nor any other matter: he promised by oath specially taken when he was Commissioner for hearing the matter at York, to do therein directly and indifferently without partiality. All these Oaths and Promises he hath broken, beside the oath of a counsellor which he hath also broken, in disclosing the queen's secrets, and in secret practising against her express commandment. Now also, since he was last apprehended and committed, he hath denied certain things, which he hath afterward, being constrained with strength of proof, confessed; yea, he hath denied those things upon his oath, which he hath afterward granted to be true: so is he not to be believed upon his word, if his own word discredit him, how great soever he be in degree.

Duke. Upon the Statute of 25 Edw. 3 he inferreth; that it is Treason to imagine or compass the Deprivation and Death of the queen's majesty; as the Lord forbid, and I pray God I may sooner be buried in the earth, than I should seek or attempt any thing to the Destruction of her majesty's person. There is a Maxim in law, that penal statutes must be construed strictly, and no penal statute ought to be extended further than the very words. Now in all that my accusers have deposed or said against me, how false soever it be, there is not one of them that say I went about any hurt to her majesty's person, or that I levied or practised to levy any power against her, or to do any of those things that are contained for Treasons within the words of the Statute. Is the bishop of Ross a sufficient Witness against me? There be points enough in the law to prove him no sufficient witness: He is a stranger and a Scot; a stranger can be no sufficient witness, much less a Scot: for whereas when there is peace between the queen's majesty and a foreign realm, the people of that foreign realm may freely come and traffic in this realm; yet though there be a peace between England and Scotland, if a Scot come into England without a passport, he may be a lawful prisoner. Again, I cannot tell what he may fear. Bracton saith, That Witnesses must be liberi homines, free men, full age, honest, and of good report: the bishop of Ross is none such. So is nothing proved of any Overt-fact against me, neither am I accused by any but the bishop of Ross, who can be no sufficient Witness against me. What care I what Hamlin says? It toucheth me not. As for Havers, I never sent him with any such Message: indeed I asked him what company he found with my brother of Westmoreland. He told me, he found none but my brother Westmoreland. But as for my lord of Northumberland, I sent not to him. If I might have brought forth my Proofs, I could have brought forth proofs of good fame, that I sent no such message; I could have proved it by Confessions, and not by hearsay. So is only the bishop of Ross Witness against me, and what he is, all you perceive. I never heard of the Rebellion, till sir Henry Nevill told me of it. If I had had such a mind when I was in Norfolk, I needed not to have come hither; I could have made a shift well enough. If I had intended any such Rebellion or Treason, I would not have put my lord of Northumberland in trust withall, nor yet my brother of Westmoreland, nor would have come hither to put my head in the halter in the Tower: but being as I was, in such place where I might have shifted, I would have kept me from coming here well enough. If fear had moved me, and that I doubted of mine own case, I could easily have avoided. So, I say, to prove me guilty of Treason, you must shew some overt-fact that I have done against her majesty's person: And to the Witnesses, I think I have said sufficiently. As touching my dealing with the Scottish queen, so far as I dealt without compass of Treason, this I say for my meaner faults, inferior to treason, I have with all repentance and humility submitted myself to the queen's majesty, I beseech you confound not those with this case: but in my dealing with her about Marriage, I pray you draw it not to such intention, to advance her title against the queen; because though she once made such claim, yet considering what amity hath since been between the queen and her, to make her now an enemy, is hard; and surely to marry her, though I treated of it, I never concluded, minded, nor intended. Where it is said I was privy to the device of her taking away, I utterly deny it. If I had been so, I would not have been against her, nor would have certified against her; I ever advised her to submit herself to the queen's majesty: but when no overt-act of Treason can be proved against me, to bring me in thus by arguments and circumstances, I think it very hard. If I should have stolen her away, I could not do it alone: was I so destitute of friends, that I could not make any man privy to it? And who is there that accuseth me of it, that may spend five marks a year? Now sith nothing is proved against me by any Witness sufficient, I beseech you consider favourably of me. Indeed my brother of Westmoreland sent me his man with recommendations; and I sent him, by his man, a ring which my sister had sent me before; and also Havers with this Message, 'Commend me to my Brother of Westmoreland, and tell him that I am well, mine Innocency shall deliver me:' but nothing touching any Rising at all. If ever I were privy to that Rebellion, then condemn me of all the treasons that you lay against me.

Attorney. My lord and I are now at issue upon this point; I affirm it with Proofs, and his lordship barely denieth it. If his intent were to compass the Marriage, knowing her to pretend title to the present possession of the Crown; then must this grow to an Imagining to depose the queen, and then it is Treason (i). An overt-fact is a Declaration of the Mind; Letters, Tokens, Speeches, Messages, and such like, be overt-facts. Now if you had married her, you must have maintained her pretended Title, which you could not have done without manifest purpose and compassing to depose the queen, and to bring her to death, which is High-Treason. Now beside, there is one other fact, which I will give you in Evidence; which most evidently proveth the duke of Norfolk's Imagination and Compassing to depose and destroy the queen. It is well known that Pius 5th the bishop of Rome, is the queen's majesty's notorious enemy, he hath been so published; he hath shewed himself in his proceedings: he hath shewed it in his Bulls, they have been brought into this realm, and some have suffered for them. The duke of Norfolk knowing it to be so, hath practised with his factor, hath sent unto the pope for aid and force against the queen: he conferred with one Rodolph a Merchant Stranger, to go over sea to the duke of Alva, and to the pope, in the name of the Scottish queen and the duke of Norfolk, and to procure power to invade this realm, for the advancement of the Scottish queen's false Title to the crown of this realm; and in the mean time, the duke promised to move her friends to levy such power as they were able, to assist the strangers when they came in. If this be proved to you, then is it flat Treason. To use force against her majesty in her own realm, must needs be done with intent to depose her, which force she must needs resist; which if she be not able to do then followeth her Death and Destruction. My lords, here goeth still all to one manner of purpose, his own bare denial, and allowing of no sufficient Witness; but here God himself shall be witness; this is a matter opened by God himself. It was known, that a Treason was in hand; many searches were made to understand it, no man could by any travel find it out, till God himself opened it; so as the Saying is fulfilled, 'What is done in secret shall be made open.' The Treasons my lords of the council knew of; it appeared in April last, that such a Treason was; but whom it toucheth was not known to them, no not to him that opened it. So as God hath opened it, to affirm these mean men to be of credit. The Treason being known to the privy council half a year together, yet could they not understand the party, till God disclosed it by marvellous chance. In August last there was 600*l.* of money prepared to be sent with Letters into Scotland to the queen's enemies, for their relief and maintenance, and by the duke of Norfolk's appointment to be conveyed to his man Bannister, and so into Scotland. This money was delivered to one Brown of Shrewsbury, by one of the duke's servants, one Hickford; who said to Brown, 'Here is 50*l.* I pray you help that it be conveyed to Mr. Bannister's dwelling near Shrewsbury.' Brown having received the money, though the bulk was somewhat like the proportion of 50*l.* in silver, yet the weight, by reason it was gold, made him suspect it: whereupon he went to one of the queen's privy council, and disclosed his suspicion, that so he might learn what he carried. This bag being opened, there was found 600*l.* in gold, and certain letters withal, to the queen's enemies, and to Bannister: Whereupon the duke's man, that sent the money, was apprehended; and then, by God's good providence, was it found that this Treason touched the duke of Norfolk, under the Name and Cipher of Quarante 40, and another nobler man was signified by the Cipher of 3 Trente. Then fell out new matters: certain of the duke's servants examined, whether they knew of any Cipher used to any man by the name Quarante, they confessed that Quarante was the duke of Norfolk; they were kept in several places, the bishop also a prisoner in a place several from them all, and yet they all agreed in one. So God's work hath enforced their credit by their agreement, being severally kept. Thus came it to light by God's own work. Now see what the cause was: The great Treason was contained in Letters written in cipher, to one signified by the Number Quarante; this Quarante was for the duke, and so the duke confesseth. What cause had they to suspect him? Letters from Rodolph made mention of great Treason, and of provision of men from beyond the seas, to invade this realm; according to his order and request, who was meant by Quarante. If then we shall prove unto you that Rodolph had this Message and

Commission from the Scottish queen and the duke of Norfolk, to treat with the pope, king Philip and the duke of Alva, for the bringing in of 10,000 men to invade England, and to make war against the queen in her own realm; there must needs be compassing to depose the queen, and to bring her to Death, and so High-Treason: For he that will levy force to invade or make war in a prince's realm, and that in maintenance of a Title to the present enjoying of the crown, doth what he can to depose the prince, and consequently also doth what he can to destroy the prince. Now to prove that the duke of Norfolk dealt in this manner, sent this Message, and practised to bring in this force of strangers, and to levy War against the queen within the realm, it shall be good first to shew what manner of man this Rodolph was: He was one that lived divers years here in this realm, a notable traitor and enemy to the queen and realm of England, and of long time the pope's Factor. In the duke's first Trouble, this Rodolph was suspected of such practices, and therefore by the council committed to the custody of Mr. Walsingham, till October was twelvemonth; and for that no evident matter appeared, he was delivered again in the November following: So soon as he was delivered, he by and by opened to the bishop of Ross, that he was Factor for the Pope; he shewed him his Commission, and sundry Letters written to him by the pope's nuncio in France, about matters of the practice a long time. This Rodolph was well known to the Scottish queen, the pope himself and his nuncio recommending him to the Scottish queen: The duke was made privy of it, and made him privy to his dealings, and kept it secret from the queen and her council. When the Bull was brought over, that Felton died for, this Rodolph had six copies of it, and dispersed them; whereof he gave one to the bishop of Ross, one other to the Spanish ambassador, and the third to the French ambassador, and the rest we know not what he did with them. Now the duke knowing him to be such a one, he was a fit man to deal with. That he was such a one, and that the duke well knew it, and sent him in message to the duke of Alva, and to the pope, you shall see plainly proved. Then what his message was, you shall see also disclosed, and how things hidden will, by God's providence, come to light. The Letters were written in cipher, and deciphered, and the Cipher hid in the tiles, and found by chance; so as it may appear God's own work to open these Treasons.

Here the Duke took exception to his saying, that the Cipher was found in the tiles; and said, it was not the Cipher that was found there, but the Alphabet: so the Duke always in his Speech called the Letters or matter written in strange characters, the Cipher; and the paper of the characters themselves he called the Alphabet, which Mr. Attorney usually called the Cipher.

Then was read the Bishop of Ross's Confession the 3d of November, to the 5th Article. Also Ross's Confession ad 7 Artic. litera 6. Also his Confession the last of October, Article 23. All this the Duke denied, and said, I never saw any Letters from the pope, but one, which I will speak of anon.

Then was read the bishop of Ross's Confession to the 6th, 7th, and 8th, making mention of a Pacquet, wherein was one Letter to the duke, by the title of Quarante. Then was read the bishop's Confession, dated 26th of October, fo. 2, concerning Andrew Beton's coming.

Att. The Duke had these deciphered, and read them.

Then was read Barker's Confession, 6th of Nov. Art. 3.

Att. Thus plainly appeareth, that the duke was privy to these Messages to the pope, and Conference with his Factor: now it resteth to understand what followeth of this course begun with Rodolph the pope's factor; what Messages were sent; what practices devised; and what ensued. Upon this Letter, the Scottish queen wrote a Letter to the bishop of Ross, wherein she wrote back a Discourse of her Estate and Device, what she thought best to be done, referring all to the direction of the duke of Norfolk. Here is the Letter itself to be seen.—This Letter came to the bishop of Ross; he sent it over to the duke, with a Letter from the Scottish queen to the duke. This Letter was deciphered, and found hidden in the duke's house under the mats in an entry, in the way as the duke went to his bed-chamber: the Cipher itself was found in the tiles of the house. This plainly declareth, how the duke in dealing with the Scottish queen and the pope pursued his purpose of advancing the Scottish queen to the crown of England: that the Scottish queen was in practice for it with the pope, and referred the Dispatch of Rodolph to the duke; and the receipt of those Letters is confessed by Hickford, and by the duke himself.

Here was read the Letter of the Scottish Queen to the Bishop of Ross.

Att. By this Letter appeareth, how the Scottish queen hath set out the whole Plot of the Treason: a Message should be sent for Aid from foreign parts; Rodolph the fittest man to be the messenger; and that Rodolph should be dispatched to go about it, when the duke of Norfolk would. The Device was to move king Philip for Aid, upon a consideration of her State here, to enter into deliberation of the time and opportunities to set her friends to field, and to seize themselves of her. This is confessed by Hickford; and this Letter is also confessed by the duke himself, that he received it about January was twelve-month, and it was hid under the mats.

Duke. I bid that the Letter should be burnt.

Att. God would not have it so; but that it should remain for disclosing the matter.

Duke. As touching Rodolph, what manner of man he was, is no matter to use: I know of no more, nor am to be charged with no more than I myself am privy to. I never dealt with him about any cause of mine. I received no such Letter, but that which Barker said came from him, which was not that of January that you speak of, about two years ago; and as for Instructions and Letters about that January was twelve-month, I received none.

Burleigh. Here the lord Burleigh said to Mr. Attorney, You may mistake, it was this time twelve-month, for now we are in January. And so Mr. Attorney remembering this present month to be January, referred the Letter to January now a year past; and said, This Letter that I now charged you with, came to your hands at this January was twelve-month: it came first to the Scottish queen's hands; she took occasion upon considering her own case here in England, in France, and in her own country, that it was best for her to cleave unto Spain. She wrote to the bishop of Ross her Discourse to that end: she counted Rodolph the fittest messenger; matter was devised for his Instructions; she referred the Dispatch wholly to the duke of Norfolk; the duke dealt in it, his Message appeareth. And thus it continued till March; and then, according to the Plot before laid, Rodolph was dispatched, and went over indeed.

Duke. What was delivered to Barker, I know not; that is nothing to me. I am sure they will not say they delivered it me, nor that I received any such Letters or Instructions. This I say, the bishop sent me a Letter of the Scottish queen's, together with a letter of his own: in her Letter she complaineth of her own subjects, and saith, she will seek other means for her relief. This Letter was decyphered; I misliked the Device, and bad that the Letter should be burned; so the Letter in Cypher was burned, and the Alphabet was saved. I sent word that I misliked all those devices, and I advised the Scottish queen to depend only upon the queen's majesty, or else, if she would take any other cause, both I and all other her friends in England, would give her over; and thereupon it was that I said, that the queen, if she fell to such practices, would publish her Letters and Doings to her infamy. Upon which my words, the bishop of Ross excused himself, and laid all this matter, of this new Device, to Beyton and Rowley. It is not true that Barker made me privy to any such Message or Instructions, as hath been alledged. Also he is not to be allowed for a witness against me, for he hath confessed Treason against himself; and persons outlawed, or attainted of Treason, are no sufficient Witnesses.

Cattin. My lord, there is none of those Witnesses, that have declared matter against you, outlawed, or attainted of Treason, or yet indicted.

Duke. They are worse; for they have confessed Treason.

Att. The bishop of Ross, at this time, was in custody, and these men also that have confessed against you, were also kept in custody, kept asunder in several places, and severally examined, agreed all in one, and your own Confessions agree with them: how can this be imagined and false? All these do testify it with one consent. The bishop of Ross, when he first came to the city, was examined of these things, he denied all, he stood in it earnestly; when questions were asked him, he said, He was an ambassador, and not so to be dealt with, but to be referred to his own mistress the Scottish queen. When he was committed to the Tower, and there again examined seeing things confessed already; and by the manner of the questions that were asked, perceiving some light that the truth was known: then he confessed also, and in his Confessions doth agree fully with Barker and the rest; which consent could not possibly be, if the matter were not true; besides that, he hath in his Confession touched himself.

Duke. They have not agreed in Confession against me, that I told them any such thing: but one of them told another, and so from hand to hand it went among them.

Att. Well, you see what is confessed, and with what consent we are at issue; here is but your lordship's Denial; I leave it to my lords here to consider of the Proofs. If you had been a good subject, being then a prisoner in your own house, when such dangerous matter came to your understanding, you would have opened it, that the queen's majesty and her counsel might have provided to withstand them, but you did it not. The duke of Norfolk found flat Treason intended; Rodolph was the messenger that procured it; the duke knew it; Rodolph was referred to the duke's Dispatch, upon the Conference of the bishop of Ross and Rodolph about the matter, and the Scottish queen's willingness to have him sent about the matter. Thus it proceeded: It was agreed that Rodolph should have his Message in writing; and at the same Conference, Barker being also among them, it was agreed, and set down in his Instructions, that his Message should be this: He should go to the pope and the king of Spain, in the name of the Scottish queen and of the duke of Norfolk, to require of them money and men for the enterprize. Rodolph required to speak with the duke: Barker brought him to the duke at Howard-house; there they talked together, the duke and Rodolph a whole hour, till it was nine of the clock at night. After this Talk, the duke delivered to Barker a Paper, saying, that Rodolph left it with him; which Paper contained the sum of the Treason, and therein was also a Paper of the Names of divers noblemen, knights, and gentlemen in Cypher, whom they counted that they would take the duke's part, but they counted without their host; so that there was for every name a Cypher, of the which 40 was for the duke, and 30 for the lord Lumley. Barker received it of the duke, and delivered it again to Rodolph. Upon this Cypher of 40, fell out the understanding of the Treason.

Here was read Barker's Deposition, 10 Oct. Interr. 8. Item, Barker to the 22 Interr.

Att. In this Bill the duke is proved to be 40, the duke himself hath also confessed that 40 standeth for his own name. Barker brought Rodolph to the duke, which the duke also confessed, and that Barker brought him Instructions for Rodolph's money.

Here Mr. Treasurer and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, sworn, did testify that Barker made all these Confessions freely, without compulsion. Also Mr. Wilson, sworn, did testify the same; and that Barker was never offered torture, nor was once in the prison where the rack was: but the duke said Barker saw where his fellow had been.

Att. Did not Barker bring Rodolph to you at 9 of the clock at night? Did he not leave with you Instructions in French?

Duke. I confess it.

Then was read Barker to the 16th.

Att. Rodolph came also the second time to the duke; after he was come from the duke, he said to Barker, That the duke and he were agreed of his Journey, and that the duke prayed him to depart with speed. This Message was to procure men and money for the Enterprize of the Treason; and on this Message the duke dispatched him.

Duke. Touching Rodolph's coming, I have indeed confessed that he came to me. I was in summer was twelve-month bound in recognizance for 1800*l.* to Rodolph, for my lord of Arundel, and for my brother Lumley; the day was passed whereby I stood in danger of my recognizance. I sent to Rodolph to intreat him to cancel my recognizance, and I offered to give him 20 yards of velvet; Rodolph would not be persuaded, but desired to speak with me himself, which Barker reported to me. I was very loth that he should come to me, for he was in trouble at my last trouble, and so I thought his coming to me would be suspicious. Barker promised that he would bring him to me secretly, and at such a time as it should not be known to make any suspicion. So Rodolph came to me, and I did what I could to intreat him about my Recognizance, and I could not persuade him more, than to promise that he would not sue me. He told me of his trouble and of his Imprisonment at Mr. Walsingham's, and what words Mr. Walsingham gave unto him, also of the Scottish queen; and that he should deal with the duke of Alva for Money for her to her own use, and for necessaries, as he had done before. He prayed also my Letters in the Scottish queen's favour to the duke of Alva: I began to mislike him, and was loth to write; I sought ways to shift me from him; I said I was not well at ease; I could not write, and it was late, and so I would not deal. As for the Bill of Names, I saw none such, nor understood of any such, till the Letter that came over from Rodolph about Easter. I delivered a Writing to Barker; I confess it; but it was about that matter which I have confessed already for my Recognizance; and so I dealt not with any such matter as is alledged against me, nor received any other instructions, but only as I have said, about my own matters.

Att. My lord, this is but your own saying, and it carrieth no likelihood: but Barker goeth nearer to you: he telleth you plainly what the Instructions were: it was to king Philip for men, and to the pope for money.

Duke. Barker hath confessed himself a Traitor, and therefore is no sufficient Witness against me. I never knew of any such Bill of Names, nor such Instruction in French.

Att. It is sufficiently proved. Now Rodolph came to you again a second time.

Duke. I deny it: he came no more to me.

Att. That is not so: for Barker telleth plainly, not only the time, but also the several ways by which he himself brought Rodolph to you.

Duke. There be ways enough, he might have devised also a dozen ways more, if he would, in that house.

Here was read Barker ad 11.

Att. Lo! he telleth you which way Rodolph came to you.

Duke. So he may devise more ways when he will.

Att. Now you shall also hear it confessed by the bishop of Ross, who at the time of his Confession was in prison, not knowing what Barker had said.

Here was read Ross's Confession of that matter. Here was also read Rosse, the 6th of November.

Att. Here you see how the duke agreeth with Barker. And there was read Rosse more, the 6th of November; how Rodolph made account of his time, and of his return before the parliament ended.

Then Mr. Attorney made a brief Rehearsal of the Matters contained in those Confessions, and shewed the Agreement of Ross and Barker; and then was read Ross, fol. 3. touching Rodolph's Account of his old soldiers, that he could bring against the English, of the duke of Medina's coming, of 7000 Spaniards to be spared. Now the duke had satisfied Rodolph for his credit, and though the duke subscribed not, yet if the duke were a Christian man, he was assured of him, and so would assure foreign princes on the duke's part.

Then was read the Confession of the bishop of Ross, to the 18th.

Now shall you hear further: Rodolph, before his Voyage, moved to have letters of credit, that he might deal with foreign princes; whereupon three Letters were devised, to commend Rodolph to the Pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Alva, and to give him credit in his Message, that he might be able to procure Aid for the Scottish queen, and for the advancement of the Catholic Faith. The duke answered, I am loth to write; for if I write, the queen's majesty hath great intelligence, and so if my Writing should come to light, all were marr'd; and so he would not write. Then the bishop of Ross, and Barker, traveled earnestly with him to subscribe the Letters ; but he would not. Then, at length, it was advised and agreed among them, that if the duke should send one to the Spanish ambassador, to declare his assent to affirm the Letters, it should satisfy Rodolph and the foreign princes, though he subscribed not : wherewith the duke was content, and sent Barker with the bishop of Ross, and Rodolph, to declare to the Spanish ambassador, that the duke was content to affirm the Letter, and to let it pass in his name. And so the Spanish ambassador recommended Rodolph's Message in the duke's name, without the duke's subscription.

Here was read the bishop of Ross, ult. Oct. ad 20.—Also Barker was read of the same matter.

Att. Thus it is plainly proved : and if they say true, as it cannot be that they can so agree, if it were not true ; then can it not be denied that the duke is guilty of all this Treason.

Duke. Here is too much at once for me to answer without book ; my memory is not so good, to run through every thing, as they do that have their books and their notes lying before them : therefore, I pray you, if I forgot to answer to any thing, remember me of it.—It is said, That there are two or three Witnesses against me ; all this two or three are but one witness : for Rodolph said it to the bishop of Ross, and of his mouth the bishop told it to Barker, and so from mouth to mouth ; they are all but one witness. Besides that they have confessed themselves wholly in Treason, and now they would bring me in with them too ; and so are no sufficient witnesses against me. Note, I pray you, the Advices, and see how likely they are : ten thousand men must be landed, whereof three or four thousand must be horsemen ; they must land at Harwich, and a port in my county ; neither is Harwich a port in my county : and I am not of so little skill, that I would have three or four thousand horsemen land in Essex, the unfittest place for horsemen to land in all England, a county best inhabited of noblemen, gentlemen, and other ability to resist them : And who would land horsemen in Essex, a county all full of lanes, woods, ditches and marshes ? I would have chosen some other county rather, if I had been so minded. Again, in respect of Religion, I would not have landed them in Essex, that came to destroy religion, and so should have found but little assistance. And would I have brought in power, or joined with them to the overthrow of Religion ? It hath lately been said by that side, that I could not be recovered from my religion : I would not be changed from my religion ; I had rather be torn with wild horses. Besides that the county of Essex, adjoining to the county of Suffolk, is most unfit for that purpose ; no county in England more replenished with protestants nor of better ability, and none more likely to withstand papists. As for moving of friends, I never dealt to move any person in the matter ; I never made provision for it ; I provided no armour, shot, powder, nor money.

I made no friends privy to any such intent. Some presumption it is, that if I had intended any such matter, I would have made some privy to it. I was no otherwise so destitute of friends, I would have provided armour, shot, and powder ; I would have provided money ; I am sure there was not much money found. For armour, I had not at my house here past eight armours which were of proof, and a hundred harquebusses ; and besides this, I bestowed not 10*l.* in armour these ten years : powder I have not two barrels ; yea, not above a barrel in all. So see the likelihood of their devices ; no conference of friends to take part ; no provision of furniture ; a country, both in religion and situation, unapt for the matter.—Where they say Rodolph told Barker, and Barker told me ; and Barker came from Ross and from Rodolph to me, and from me to Ross, to declare that I was content to affirm the Letters of Credit, I deny it. As for my consent, that the Spanish Ambassador should affirm the Letters in my name, how unlikely a thing it is, that I was content to affirm them, but not to subscribe them ; as if I knew not how small is the difference between subscribing and affirming ; and as if I had such slender wit. Rodolph never came to me but once ; indeed I heard that Rodolph would fain have come to me again the second time, but I would not ; Barker earnestly urged it, but I refused. To please the curious Italian head of Rodolph, they devised it among them to deal with the Spanish ambassador. As for me, I never heard from the Spanish ambassador in the matter ; I never saw him but once at my Lord Treasurer's. I was angry with Barker for going to him in my name ; and he excused it, and said, he could not otherwise content the bishop of Ross and Rodolph ; and so that affirming of the Letters was Barker's own doing, and not mine. I would they might, in our private Examinations, have been brought face to face with me. I could have put them in mind of things ; they have confessed Treason of themselves, and they would bring me in with them, and lay it on my shoulders. I am hardly handled, I have been 18 weeks committed, I can speak with no body ; if I might have had them face to face, and been allowed to bring forth my proofs, I would have brought forth direct matter and proofs, and therewith made them remember themselves. Consider, I beseech you, what they be that accuse me ; the presumptions be in all likelihood, that I should not so do as they accuse me ; and as for them, they be persons that have accused themselves of Treason, and so be of no credit. As for mine own Examinations, they wholly agree in such sort as I have here declared in mine Answer.

Attorney. Your Answer is nothing but bare denial : and here are three Witnesses against you, and all three severally examined, have agreed in one ; and Barker hath directly confessed ; and if you doubt of impulsion, you shall bear how willingly and how freely he confessed it, because the same Examination was taken before sir Thomas Smith, and subscribed with his hand: Mr. Wilson upon his oath declared the same to be sir Thomas Smith's hand.

Duke. Where it is said, that I should bid them to write, or should affirm their Writing, it is not true. Indeed Banister spake to me to write for Money for the Scottish queen, and I refused to do it. If I should have dealt in any such matter, I would have trusted one Banister afore fifteen Barkers. And as for your number of Witnesses in this manner by hands one from another, twenty witnesses may prove but one witness.

Att. You shall hear your own Confession agreeing with them: you were content Rodolph should use your name to the duke of Alva, and that he should assure the duke you were a Catholic, and that he should shew tokens to prove it, for that you kept papists in your house, and were a friend to papists.

Here was read the duke's Confession, 10 Oct. ad interr. 58.

Here his own hand confessed the matter.

Duke. I saw the Instructions indeed, and this matter was in it. They sought to have it thought I was a Catholic, to serve their purpose, and did put it in of themselves; but I allowed it not, I would rather be torn with wild horses than forsake my religion.

Att. These Instructions remained still in your custody: why did you not burn these, as well as you say that you commanded the Letter to be burned?

Duke. Because it was their writing and not mine.

Willb. You are content it should be extant; to what purpose was that if you misliked it?

Att. Your lordship shall yet see further a Letter of the bishop of Ross, written to the Scottish queen, wherein the whole plot and course of the Treason is plainly set out at large; the letter came to the Scottish queen's hands while my Lord Steward was there, which my lord steward affirmed. So the Letter was read.

Duke. The bishop of Ross is no sufficient Witness against me, for the causes that I have declared.

Att. I leave his credit to my lords here to consider, let them weigh it as they see cause. Now come to consider your own doings; since your last Imprisonment, Letters have been conveyed unto you, and you have sent letters abroad, by many subtle and secret ways of conveyance, one letter you sent out written with red-ocre, wherein plainly appeareth that you feared the matter, and that something was confessed, and that you were afraid of more; you willed the bishop of Ross should take all upon him, because he was an ambassador, and that a Bag of Writings should be sought out and burned.

Here the Letter written in red-ocre was read, which the duke confessed to be his own.

Att. This Letter gave occasion to seek the Bag, and so were the Writings found under boards fast nailed, and thereby was understood that Quarante was the duke; and so by God's work broke out the whole practise of the Treason. This Letter was directed to nobody.

Duke. It was written to Bayly, and Bayly received it. I can answer this letter well enough. Here I am charged with two matters, for matter of my Confessions, and for burning the Bags of letters. As for that which is, there said, that I confessed nothing but what I saw confessed by others, the truth is I received a Letter wherein I was charged, that I had accused some falsely, I wrote to satisfy; that I had not accused any of any matter of Treason, nor could if I would; and this was the meaning of that part of my letter.

Att. Where is the letter whereby you were charged that you had accused falsely?

Duke. I kept it not; think you I would keep letters? Burned letters do no hurt. As for burning the Writings in the bag, it maketh nothing against me in this case; for they were nothing but private letters of the Scottish queen's, written before and when I was last in trouble, long before this matter. At Banister's coming up at Easter last, he brought them to me, and I willed Barker to lay them up: what needed such searching for elder matters? I had them be made away, for they were but private matters between the Scottish queen and me.

Att. There was the letter that disclosed you to be Quarante, whereby the Treason was known: now here is also another Letter of your own, which you secretly sent out of the Tower, which sheweth your guiltiness, in the matter of the great Treason with Rodolph.

Here the Duke's other Letter was read.

Duke. This was only, as I have declared before, for my conference with Rodolph, for the matter of Money, both touching mine own Recognizance, and procuring of money for the Scottish queen, for her necessity.

Att. By the whole course of the matter that goeth before, it is for the Treason, and not for the Money. Here is also another Letter of your own, which carrieth manifest presumptions of the Treason, where, among other things, you willed Barker to confess no further, if he love his life: besides other most manifest suspicious matters.

Duke. I wrote it not in respect of any fear that Barker could hurt me, when I willed that Barker should confess no more, as he loved his life: For indeed he might touch himself in Treason, (as he hath done) but not me, for I never consented to it.

Att. Now shall you see how the matter proceeded further: After the dispatch of Rodolph, in Lent last, as he had made shew before, that he intended to go over sea, and was all this while practising about this Treason; at length being frightened with these Messages, he came to sue to the queen for a pass-port, which was granted him, and he carried over two geldings with him, which is evident proof that he went over. Now shall you see what effect it took and by the Answer you shall discern the Message, and practice: Being beyond the sea, and having done his Message, he sent advertisement to the duke how he sped, and likewise from the pope; which plainly discloseth the whole purpose and plot of the Treason, as shall be declared unto your lordships.

Here began Mr. Solicitor.

Solicitor. For that the time is spent, and your lordships, I think, are weary, I will not now make any collection what hath been gathered of the attempt of Marriage with the Scottish queen, only I will deal with the matter of Rodolph's Message, and the effect thereof: And the duke's adhering to the queen's enemies and Rebels, shall be another part. In this matter of Rodolph, hath been laid before you a plain plot for a Rebellion, and for Invasion of the realm; set forth in the Scottish queen's Letter, which was deciphered by Hickford, by the duke's commandment, as hath been said unto you: the effect whereof was as hath been declared.—And here he repeated the effect of that Letter, containing the Device of putting men into the field, and to seize the Scottish queen. Now if the device were followed, and if the duke were a doer in it, if he were a consentor unto it, if Rodolph were practised with for the Journey, if he received his Message to that end, if he went and pursued it, if he sent Answer accordingly; then it must needs be that here is matter of High-Treason, and the duke of Norfolk guilty of it. It hath been shewed by the Declaration of Barker, and of the bishop of Ross, how Rodolph was the pope's Factor, was commended by the Scottish queen for a fit messenger in this matter, was conferred with about it, Articles were devised, they were shewed the duke, and the duke himself hath confessed that he spake with Rodolph, and that he saw the Instructions. Now is the question, How far the Instructions extended, whether to matter of High-Treason, as hath been alledged, or no? The duke saith for his excuse, That the Instructions were but for a private cause of Money, and that when Rodolph required him to write his Letters, the duke refused and cast him off. See how this accordeth: If it were but a private cause, whereto served that refusal to write? As well he might by Letters, as by Instructions, pursued in a private cause. What needeth that secret coming in the night-time about a private cause? The duke himself confesseth, that the Instructions were shewed him before Rodolph came to him; he confesseth also that Rodolph was commended by the Scottish queen; the Instructions have here been shewed, containing the matter of his Journey, and extending to the Treason: He came to confer with the duke. Now let your lordships judge why, and about what matters they conferred.—

The bishop of Ross and Barker do, of their own knowledge, declare, how, for furniture of this Message, there were letters of credit devised in the name of the Scottish queen and the duke of Norfolk, to the pope, the Spanish king, and the duke of Alva; the duke refused to subscribe them, for fear, if he should deal too openly, the Treason might perhaps to some appear: therefore a Device was found out how to save the matter, That he should, by his servant, affirm the Letters to the Spanish ambassador, and so they should, by the Spanish ambassador's commendation, pass with as good credit as if they had been subscribed. This Device was performed, his assent was witnessed, and the letters of credit confirmed accordingly. Rodolph went over to the duke of Alva, and from thence to the pope; he returned answer of his Message, and gave advertisement to the duke. Did not he send his answer concerning the very Instructions that have been alledged, and the matter of Treason, and not of a private cause? And to whom? Sent he not answer to the duke, by the name of Quarante? Would Rodolph make answer to, and advertise him that never sent him, and of a matter that he never sent him about? By this you may see the intent of the Message. Now shall you see what Answer was returned.

The bishop of Ross, after this, sent over a servant of his, one Charles Bayly, to fetch certain Books that were printed in those parts; books containing very seditious matter, whereof I have seen some, by permission, tending to these ends. First, therein is conveyed to the Scottish queen a Title to the crown of England, a Descent above the Conquest, and so labouring to impair the interest of all our kings that have reigned since the Conquest. Then the Judgment of the right of the crown of this realm is reduced to an universal law which they call Jus Gentium, and the discerning thereof exempted from the laws of this realm. And of that universal law they establish one universal Judge, whom they insinuate to be the pope, whose Bulls you see have passed in prejudice of the queen's majesty's undoubted right. This Charles Bayly being in those parts for this occasion of the Books, met with Rodolph at Brussels, after that Rodolph had had his dispatch from the duke of Alva, and was hastening to the pope; and therefore having haste of his journey, and much to write, and small leisure, he desired Charles Bayly to write for him two Letters for two noblemen of this realm, both in Cipher: but to whom the Letters were directed, Charles himself could not tell; for Rodolph subscribed the letters himself, one to Quarante, the other to Trente; Charles Bayly bringing their Books and Letters, was taken at Dover, the books were brought to the Council, the packet of Letters were conveyed away to the bishop of Ross: and daily more and more grew the suspicion, by reason of the repair of the bishop of Ross's servants to the Marshalsea, where Charles was. At length there were Letters taken between the bishop of Ross and Charles, mentioning the recovery of Rodolph's packet. In this packet was the advertisement of the success of the voyage, from Rodolph to the duke, by the name of 40. This Letter of Rodolph's was sent to the duke from the bishop of Ross by Barker; Barker delivered it to the duke, from whence it was sent back again to the bp. of Ross by Gutbert, and by Gutbert it was deciphered, and carried again to the duke by Barker: upon this occasion Gutbert was sought for, the duke conveyed him away, and this conveying away of Gutbert, the duke hath confessed. If this be thus, then must it needs be that Rodolph was sent by him, and to such end as the letter bringeth answer of. In the Letter, this was contained, That Rodolph had spoken with the duke of Alva; that he had very good and loving audience; that the duke of Alva lovingly promised all the help that he could; and that he would commend the cause to the king of Spain his master: and he advised Rodolph to go forward to the pope, and that he said he could not do farther without more warrant, which he would seek to procure. Also certain questions were asked by the duke of Alva; as, What fort was between the haven where they should land and London? How near London it was? So the nearness of London was respected, how incommodious soever your lordship saith the place was for horsemen. These questions belike depended upon the matter propounded, which touch the Plot of the Treason, and not a private cause, as your lordship pretendeth. The duke of Norfolk confesseth the receipt of these Letters, and the deciphering of them. So Charles Bayly, by Rodolph's request, wrote the two letters in cyphers; Rodolph himself directed them to 40 and 30. Charles being taken, and confessing the writing, and bringing of these letters, and the matter contained in them in April last, yet knew not who was 40 nor 30. This was strangely conveyed, treason known in matter, and yet the person not known to himself that wrote it.

Here was read Charles Bayly's Letter.

These Letters of Rodolph were conveyed to the bishop of Ross to deliver to 30 and 40, referring the rest to his Dispatch at Rome. And this falleth out also very likely for the time; for Rodolph departed home about Easter before.

Solic. Now you see to what end the effect of the Message tended; you see what it was, and how it was done; you see how it was received, and the duke of Alva's Questions upon it: now you shall see the contents of the Answer, by the Examinations of the bishop of Ross, and Barker; the receipt of the Letters of Answer the duke himself hath confessed.

Duke. Where they say this Message was sent by my privy, by reason that I was meant by 40; I deny it; I never wrote by Rodolph, I refused to do it, I knew not his letters were to me, but as Barker said: and it was not likely they should be to me; for it was a matter which I was not privy of, and in a cypher which I had not; Rodolph left no Cypher with me. As for the taking of the packet, I knew nothing of it; the letter I never saw in cypher; Barker brought me a decypher, telling me, That 40 was for me, and 30 for the queen of Scots. When he told me first he had the cypher, I asked what I should do with it, and how I should read it, having no cypher? Barker answered, that it was left with Gutbert; for Rodolph, at his departure, had told him, That he would write answer of the money for the Scottish queen, and that he would leave the cypher with Gutbert; and that he had so done, and in the letters deciphered did appear, that the duke of Alva had promised aid of money for the Scottish queen for her necessities; but he could not yet do it for want of commission, but as soon as he had commission he would. When I heard of this I disliked this dealing with the duke of Alva, having before refused to write to him in the matter at Rodolph's request; and I threatened Barker if he so dealt any more with me. The Letters might be to me, as Barker said, but I knew not so much.

Solic. This your Answer is in all no more than a bare denying, and so be all your Speeches, all upon your own credit only.

Here was read Barker's Confession, ad 2, 3, concerning Rodolph's Letters in Cypher, and the Decyphering by Gutbert, and the port where the Walloons should have landed, &c.—Then was read the bishop of Ross's to the 12 and 13, to the same effect.

Then Mr. Solicitor recited again the effect of the letters, and the said confessions of Ross and Barker, and proceeded farther thus:

You see all these agree in one concerning the contents of the Letter; now the Letter being deciphered by Gutbert, and Gutbert being able to discover the whole, this Gutbert, when he was sent for by the council, was conveyed away by the duke's means, as the duke himself hath confessed.

Duke. It may be Barker received this Letter as you spake of, and that Gutbert deciphered it, and that it contained the matters that you alludge; it may be that they kept that letter still to themselves, and might bring me another letter, containing only such matter as I was contented with, containing the private cause.

Solic. An unlikely matter; but thus you see the duke confesseth the receipt of the Letter, he only denieth that it was to this effect. It was confessed, that a letter to this effect was written to 40; he also confesseth, that 40 was for the duke himself. The duke of Alva's Questions proved the form of the matter; the duke read that Letter.

Duke. I read not that letter, but of another matter, and you bring but one witness to prove it.

Solic. There be two witnesses, Barker and the bishop of Ross, severally examined, who agreed directly, expressing it. And Bayly also wrote the letter himself containing the Treason, and not knowing to whom the letter was directed, accordeth with them.

Duke. Barker and Gutbert might make the letter themselves, and put in and out what they list.

Solic. Why did Rodolph write you a letter at all?

Duke. I know not. Barker presented me the letters out of Cypher, and I had not the cypher, nor saw any such letter as you alledge.

Solic. It appeareth farther, how after this dispatch with the duke of Alva, Rodolph went forward on his Message to the pope; and having also good success there, he so advertised again. The pope sent letters to the duke and the Scottish queen, to this effect, That he liked well of their Enterprizes, &c. Would Rodolph have gone to the pope and procured letters, if he had not had Instructions accordingly? The duke himself hath confessed such a Letter, conceived there came Letters, both of one tenour; the one by the way of France, the other by the way of Flanders: the effect you have heard, and the receipt is confessed.

Duke. Barker indeed brought me about 6 or 7 lines, written in a Roman hand in Latin, beginning thus, Dilecte fili, salutem. I asked what it was? and Barker told me, it was a letter from the pope to me: wherewith I was offended, and said, A Letter to me from the pope! What have I to do with him, that is enemy to my religion and country? How cometh this to pass? so I received it, and not otherwise: and Barker excused it, and said, That Rodolph had procured it for his own credit.

Here was read Barker, ad 29.

Solic. Thus you see the effect of this Letter, and how this was directed to the duke from Rodolph, also by the name of 40, deciphered by Gutbert, and delivered to the duke by Barker. The duke received it and read it, and said, Rodolph hath been at Rome, I perceive there will nothing be done this year. By this it appeareth, that he reproved not Barker at all for bringing it unto him, for Barker brought it him twice: would he have brought it him the second time, if the duke had been angry with him for it at the first?

Duke. I knew not at the first time what it was, for it was in Cipher.

Then was read Barker's Confession to the eighth.

Duke. Barker is not of credit, he accuseth me falsely.

Solic. He was your servant, and of near place and credit about you; why should he accuse you wrongfully?

Duke. He was not of credit about me; for I used him not this 14 years.

Solic. That is not so, as hath well appeared. Besides this, the conveying away of Gutbert, which was done by your means, and who deciphered this Letter, and could have disclosed the matter, proveth a great guiltiness.

Duke. He was conveyed away at his own request made, and not for my safety.

Solic. You caused him to be conveyed away, and were privy to his conveying.

Duke. Barker removed him: indeed I was not privy.

Solic. You moved Bowes to join with Barker to do it.

Then Mr. Solicitor said farther to the peers; I have also, my lords, one thing more to say to you from the queen's majesty's own mouth: The lords that be here of the privy-council do know it very well, not meet here in open presence to be uttered, because it toucheth others that are not here now to be named; but by her highness's order, we pray that their lordships will impart it unto you more particularly. In Flanders, by the ambassador of a foreign prince, there the whole plot of this Treason was discovered, and by a servant of his brought to her majesty's intelligence; the minister not meaning to conceal so foul and dishonourable a practice, gave intelligence hither by letters, and hath therein disclosed the whole Treason in such form as hath here been proved unto you: wherefore I refer the more particular Declaration thereof to the peers of the privy-council.

Then began Mr. Wilbraham, Attorney of the Wards, and said to this effect:

Wilbraham. There is yet something unspeaken, it consisteth in two points, I will be short in both. The matters are plain, and easy to understand. Let my lord answer, and your lordships shall easily judge of them. Here have been set forth before you the imagining and practising of the Deprivation and Death of the queen's majesty, with bringing in of Strangers into the realm to invade and levy war, with the apparitions both miserable and many. This request I am now to make, that for proof of these Treasons, that I will intreat you to have in memory what hath before been said; for though the Proofs of these Treasons we divide to several parts, for ease and shortness, as the seeking of the Marriage, Rodolph's Voyage, the success thereof, and the Residence that remaineth, ought all to be compared together; any one appearing plainly true, giveth credit to the rest. The queen's majesty's proceeding in this Trial is very honourable, mild, and gracious: the Confessions have been made by the parties freely, without torture or constraint. You shall see each of them, and each part so prove the other, as the whole shall be clearly out of doubt; where the earl of Northumberland and his wife, the earl of Westmoreland, Richard Norton, and others in the north parts raised Rebellions, and levied open War against the queen's majesty within her realm; and being overthrown by the queen's power fled into Scotland, and there were received by the duke of Chastelleroy, the lord Harris, the lord Hume, the lord Buccleugh, and others, and by them were comforted and detained against the queen's majesty, requiring to have them delivered. Her majesty being denied to have them restored, published and proclaimed open War against those Detainers of her Rebels, and appointed the earl of Sussex, her lieutenant-general, with an army to invade Scotland, and there to pursue those her enemies, sparing the rest. He entered into the land, made open war upon them, blew up their houses with powder, wasted their countries, and drove the Rebels out of Scotland. The one matter now that I am to disclose, is, That the duke of Norfolk knowing all this, yet did adhere unto, comforted and relieved the said Rebels; he procured Money to be distributed to the earl of Westmoreland, the countess of Northumberland, and other of them; and this is manifest Treason. The other matter is, That the duke of Norfolk knowing all this to be true, adhered unto, comforted and relieved the said lords of Scotland, the queen's enemies, receivers and detainers of her Rebels; and this is also Treason. And first for the aiding of the Rebels: after this Rebellion, and their overthrow by the queen's power, they fled into Scotland, (a very bare country) where they were driven to hard shifts, so were they enforced to sue to the Pope for help; they wrote to him, the Scottish queen wrote in their favour to the Pope's Nuncio, the matter was pursued for them by one D. Morton: this Morton was he that was the procurer of the Bull that was sent over against the queen's majesty; this Morton was he that reconciled the earl of Northumberland to the Romish church, by a Bull of Absolution: he went to the Pope on their message; the Pope granted them relief, and wrote Letters in the mean time to comfort them, which were directed thus: 'Thomas & Carolo Northumbria & Westmorlandiæ Comitibus, reliquisque Nobilibus Catholicis partium Borealiū Regni Angliæ: To Thomas and Charles, earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, and other of the Catholic noblemen of the North parts of the realm of England. Belike, so calling them noble in the fulfilling of D. Story's promise, that by their rebellious Enterprize they were now of Worshipful become Honourable.

Here was read the Effect of the Pope's Letters to the Rebels.

The Letters hereof came to the bishop of Ross; the money was assigned in Flanders; the bishop of Ross sent to the duke of Norfolk for his advice, and for his help to convey the Money to them. The bishop thought it best to have the Money sent by the West-Borderers, where the lord Harris was, and with him Leonard Davis: the duke, for their special displeasures to Leonard Davis, was not willing that Leonard Davis should have part of it; but had more mind to have his brother of Westmoreland relieved, and to that end he devised with Bannister for the sending of the money. In the mean time, behold how that course was interrupted: The queen's majesty had a Treaty with the queen of Scots, wherein one special Article was, That the Rebels should be delivered. This the Scottish queen was loth and liked not to do; she asked the duke of Norfolk's counsel in it; he advised that in no wise they should be delivered, for that were too much against her honour: nevertheless, for that he feared that the Article concerning the delivery of the Rebels might be some stay to such conclusion, as otherwise they might have liked of, he gave advice that the Rebels should depart out of Scotland. Ross wrote to them to that end, and therewith sent them the pope's letters, and so they all departed out of Scotland into Flanders, except only Leonard Davis, who remained with the lord Harris and the earl of Northumberland, who would also fain have been gone if he might; and so by this occasion, and by Bannister's means, was this sending of the money into Scotland disappointed. Then was there another Device taken, to distribute it in Flanders; and because it should not all be suddenly wasted, it was agreed by the bishop of Ross, that it should be distributed monthly.—This Order was opened to the duke by Barker, the duke liked well of it, and willed it to be done accordingly. A man was sent over for this purpose, and the Money distributed. The countess of Northumberland wrote over to the bishop of Ross a Letter of Thanks. Hereupon report was made to the duke, that it was done as he had appointed. Now the duke will ask us, What proof we have hereof? We say, The Confessions of Ross and Barker. Against this he taketh exception; his only answer is his bare denial, and his defacing of their credit. He saith they are Traitors, and have confessed Treason against themselves, and not to be received for sufficient Witnesses against him. This hath been well answered already by my lords the Justices, that by the law they are sufficient Witnesses. You may not stand upon your honour and difference of degree, and thereby limit how far they are to be credited. But now let us examine their credit, and their likeliness to tell truth, and how meet in this case they are to be believed. First, For the bishop of Ross, he is a wise man, he is learned, he is a Bishop, he is an ambassador, a great friend to the duke of Norfolk; so far in credit with the Scottish queen, that he hath been the principal doer of all her affairs; so the fittest man for this Treason, the meetest man to be used in it, since the Scottish queen's Title is the ground of the Treason. Who then but such a man was fit to be used? Who meetest to be heard in such a matter than he? A Scot, a wise man, well acquainted with the matters, well able to deal in them, ever at hand, and every way the meetest man. He was a Scot, say you; the more to blame the duke of Norfolk to deal so with him, against the express commandment of his sovereign upon his allegiance, and against his own faith, submission and promise, and so himself unworthier man to be believed than the Scottish witness. Why should the bishop of Ross accuse him falsely? What should move him to it? He accuseth you, he also proveth it against you; he is the aptest man to know it, the aptest of all other to repeat it. And why will you say he is so oft produced for every matter against you? Surely great cause, great difference between him and all other; he knew all; he dealt in all, and where the rest had every one but his part to play, the bishop of Ross continually kept the stage; he had a long part, he answered all men; when every man brought forth their tallies, he kept the stocks of all; he speaketh of that he understandeth, he speaketh credibly, he carrieth proof and consent of other. Speaketh he of malice against the duke? That cannot be, the duke never offended him; the duke was ever his greatest friend, and he the greatest friend to the duke, and the chief advancer of the Marriage that the duke so earnestly sought, as most beneficial; he hath in his Confession touched his own mistress, upon whom he depended, to whom he ought no malice; he hath disclosed the treacheries of the pope, him he hath offended, he gets no more benefices at his hand; he hath offended the king of Spain and the duke of Alva, he is fallen out with all his friends, he is fallen from all his commodious hopes by his confession. Besides that, how hath he told it? Not at the first as of malice, and desirous to do the duke a shrewd turn; but with leisure, after other former confessions. He held off, and disclosed nothing, till his face, though it were a face of brass, could no longer withstand apparent truth disclosed by others; except he had been mad and a stark fool, as he is very wise, he would not have thrust himself into all those hardinesses, to tell an untruth to his own so great loss and hindrance. Would he, being wise, for malice to the duke of Norfolk, undo his own mistress the Scottish queen; and bring upon himself the hatred of the duke of Alva, the Spanish king, and the pope; and so lose all his friends, and make them his foes, and indanger himself, and undo himself, with confessing Treason against himself, for only malice of the duke of Norfolk? It cannot be true; I must needs believe him because it is Treason that he speaketh of the man's own faculty: he is a credible traitor. If he had told us a matter of virtue, good life, and true religion, it had been a vanity to hear the bishop of Ross speak; but speaking of Treason, he is the skilfullest man, and meepest to be heard. As for Hickford and Bannister, they be both still in credit, the duke excepteth not against them, and yet they accuse him deeply. For comparison of their Values and Credit, the duke is noble, and these are said not able to spend five marks. What then? Indeed their honour is less, but their understanding is great, and their credit sufficient. Barker is disliked, and counted by the duke not worthy to be believed. It is disliked that he is still brought forth, he is as the base instrument still played on. There is good cause why the duke so continually used him: you must understand that things must be done by means and instruments: the heads need the service of inferior members; the heads do devise, the hands and the feet do put in execution. If the duke of Norfolk should for every Message and matter to be treated with the bishop of Ross, Rodolph, and the Spanish ambassador, or other, have himself trotted through dirty Smithfield, and the streets of London, unto Thames street, and other places, it must needs have been wondered at, and would not have been without notable suspicion. But Barker, a sly fellow, sufficient for skill, exercised in the matters, acquainted with the practices, might well go dreaming to, all places without suspicion. Sometimes upon a robbery or a shrewd turn done, the length of a foot in the snow, or in the mire, hath betrayed the doer; so the foot may sometimes accuse the head. Barker was one of the duke's secretaries, privy to his greatest affairs, the writer of his Ciphers, the common carrier of ciphered and deciphered letters, the common conveyer and sender of his Messages and Letters between him and the queen of Scots: the duke himself agreeth with them in confessing of sundry circumstances of the matters, which he calleth his errors and inferior faults; with these men he dealt in them himself, gave them credit, therefore it is no reason himself should take from them the credit of their confessions.—But he saith there are but two of them; the fault is in the duke of Norfolk, there are no more, for there are more if they were here, and by the duke's means they are absent: Liggons, Gutbert, and Rodolph could tell it also. The one of them, Liggons, he hath sent away, and findeth him in France. Gutbert, as the duke himself hath confessed, the duke hath caused to be carried away. Rodolph is, by the duke himself, sent out of the realm on his message, and not returned, it is no reason that their absence excuse him, for it is not reason that he should take advantage of his own wrong, that hath made them be absent; so their absence must stand for great Testimony against him, and be judged to concur with them that are present, and have confessed.—Rodolph, the greatest Testimony of all, is in person withdrawn; but his Letters speak lively. He hath testified by his Letters against the duke, and of a matter that himself well knew, not constrained, not examined, but with the tenor and course of the proceeding of the Treason, advertising the duke of the answer of his Message. You say he dealt for you in other private matters, not in the Treason: if that were so, then the pope had not given him charge to deal with the Scottish queen, and you; the Scottish queen had not commended him to you; the Instructions had not been so penned; the Answer had not been so returned. But saith the duke, It is true, Rodolph talked with me indeed, he required my Letters to the duke of Alva, for the Scottish queen; he moved me about these matters; but I was angry with him, I would not write by him, I departed from him in anger, and thus in anger away he went. And whither went he? Even strait to the duke of Alva, and from thence to the pope, even to the same places and persons to whom he should have gone for the duke, if the duke had been without anger, best pleased and contented with his Journey. To what intent, and of what Message went he thither? Even the same that the duke said he was angry to be moved of, and refused to write in. What effect hath it? Gentle audience, great promises and agreement to the requests, as if he had travailed not for a man angry with the matter, but most desirous. What Answer returned he? Even the same that accordeth with the Instructions concerning the Treason, the very plat and ground of his Message. He reporteth Questions asked by the duke of Alva, agreeing only with the matter of the Treason, and no private case. Would he have written answer to him that sent him not? Would he have written as to please him with good news of a good audience that sent him not? From whence departed he in anger? He writeth of the course to be kept in execution of the Treason, which he would not have done to him that was angry to hear of it. He braggeth of his 10,000 Walloons, old beaten Soldiers. If the duke of Norfolk had been a true man, and angry with the matter, as he now saith, and done his duty; though they had come, his Walloons, his old beaten soldiers, might have been so new beaten of the old English fashion, as they were never so swung in their lives.

This Point Mr. Attorney spake with such a grace, such cheerfulness of heart and voice, as if he had been ready to be one at the doing of it; like a hearty true Englishman, a good christian, a good subject, a man enough for his religion, prince and country.

If the duke says it was the Scottish queen's message only, and not his (for advancement of her wrongful Claim by force) he knowing this, Why sought he to marry her against the queen's majesty's will, and to pursue it by force? If he say it was Barker's single device, to send these messages, to procure these Treasons, and work all these mischiefs of his own head; to what end I pray you should Barker do it, but to advance the Marriage of the duke his master, and the Scottish queen? And was this without the duke's privity? Could Barker compel the duke to take a wife at his pleasure? Examine now all these Witnesses, and weigh their credits together; consider them severally, their credits are great; join them altogether, they be much greater, but severally examined, and all according in one, they be greatest of all, and not possible to be false. Add to that the duke's own Confessions of circumstances concerning himself, and their uttering of matters of Treason against themselves; consider the difference of dangers in telling truly or falsely: for if they uttered it, and it were true, then stood they but in danger of their bodily life; if they should falsely accuse, yet that accusation suffering against themselves for treasons, they lost both body and soul, in falsely accusing others. The duke was their master, they his servants, and his true servants, and such as were to gain by his prosperity; would they untruly accuse him, the stay of their preferment? For though they be traitors, and howsoever they be otherwise without credit, yet against the duke of Norfolk they are well to be believed.

Now on the other side consider the duke's own credit, which he hath by his own doings impaired and made inferior to these of lower degree: You have heard of his oath especially taken for the Commission at York, to deal truly and sincerely; he kept it not, he so dealt as if an oath were of no great weight with him. His oath of a counsellor he hath broken, both in disclosing of secrets, and in giving advice to a foreign prince, and a competitor of the queen's crown against the queen's majesty his sovereign lady. Now may it not be that these men of mean degree and value, against whom it is not alledged that they have been at any time perjured may be produced and credited against him that hath so little esteemed his oath? I have heard also, that there was an oath wilfully taken upon a bible, in denying of things laid to his charge, and yet the matter found true, and by himself within a short space confessed: so that his oath, his hand, and his word, bear no sway with him.—He submitted himself, he subscribed his Submission, and sealed it; he added solemn promises upon his faith and allegiance, not to proceed in the marriage between the Scottish queen and himself: but he kept not touch, he broke promise also, and yet he saith his hand, mouth and heart go together. If they go together in the right way, it is well; but when they go together in untruth, it is evil and dangerous: therefore it is not for my lord of Norfolk to stand so much upon the discrediting of the Witnesses, and advancing of his own credit, which himself hath so much decayed. Now I will go to the Proof.

Duke. I shall hardly come, after so smooth a tale as Mr. Attorney of the Wards can tell; yet one good proof I have to my comfort, that they be as please your lordships to weigh them. If you would not have dealt thus untruly with me, I would not have taken exception against them, though I chiefly challenge none but Barker, in whom you may see what fear may do; besides that they have confessed themselves Traitors, and so men of no conscience or credit. It is well known that Barker's stomach is nothing; he hath been known well enough. Fear hath done much in him. The bishop of Ross is also a fearful man. As touching Barker and the bishop of Ross, Bracton hath a saying, That witnesses must be freemen and not traitors, neither outlawed nor attainted.

Catlin. None of them be outlawed, attainted, or indicted.

Duke. I mean not that they were indicted, but they be in as ill case, for they have confessed themselves Traitors. He saith also, they must be legales, lawful men, and so cannot strangers be, as the bishop of Ross and Rodolph; it is these strangers that charge me only; the other having dealt so disloyally and confessed it against themselves, are not to be believed. As for Barker, I have not used him for my secretary these 13 years: he entered with the bishop of Ross, and dealt with him in these matters against my knowledge.

Catlin. Bracton indeed is an old writer of our Law, and by Bracton he may be a Witness; a stranger, a bondman may be a witness: ask you all the Judges here.—And the Judges affirmed that he may.

Duke. If a Stranger be to give Evidence whereby lands should be recovered, you shall not recover upon that Evidence given by a Stranger.

Wilbraham. This were a strange device, that Scots might not be Witnesses; for so, if a man would commit Treason, and make none privy but Scots, the Treason were unpunishable; and so were a kind of men found out, with whom a man might freely conspire Treason.

Duke. You say my Indictment is only upon the statute of 25 Edw. 3. That statute standeth upon three points, compassing the Death of the prince's person, levying of War against the prince, and aiding of the prince's enemies; and all these must be proved overt-fact. If by any way, by any overt-fact, you can prove that I have directly touched the prince's person, or done any of the said things that the statute extendeth to, I will yield myself guilty. If any thing be doubtful, the Statute referreth it to the judgment of the parliament.

Catlin. Usage is the best expounder of the law, that is, the common use how the statute hath been taken and expounded; and the same statute is but the declaration of the common law.

Duke. The preamble of the Statute is to bring the laws of treason to a certainty, that men may certainly know what is treason.

Attorney-Gen. You complained of your close keeping, that you had no Books to provide for your Answer; it seemeth you have had books and counsel, you alledge Books, Statutes, and Bracton; I am sure the study of such books is not your profession.

Duke. I have been in trouble these two years, think you that in all this time I have had cause to look for myself?

Attorney-Gen. But if you stand still upon proof, whether you have done any thing to the destruction of the prince's person, if the lords upon the Evidence already produced, do think the matters true in fact that are already alledged against you, surely the same must needs be construed a compassing of the queen's Death; for the Law of Treason hath ever been largely construed for the prince's safety. Think you that practising to levy War within the realm is not Treason? Yes, indeed is it; and a compassing of the prince's Death. Sir William Stanley's Case was this: he did but send Clifford over sea, to hearken and send him word what Perkin Warbeck was; that if he thought Perkin was such a man as he was said to be, he would take his part. This was Stanley's Case, and this was judged Treason, and a compassing of the king's Death.

Here was read Barker's Confession the 6th of November.

Duke. I never dealt with that Money, nor heard of it; I dealt not at that time with Barker, nor heard any thing of the rebels, since they went into Flanders.

Then was read the bishop of Ross's Confession of the same matter, 6 November, ad 5.

And again Ross, 6 Nov. Fo. Also Ross, 29, of 1700 crowns sent by Moreton's means, and what Moreton was.

Wilbraham. You hear how the Money was procured; how it was distributed by the duke's order, and Thanks written by the countess of Northumberland for the receipt of it, which was also declared to the duke. You shall hear, that after the practice of the Marriage, it was a general rule between the Scottish queen and the duke, That the bishop of Ross should never propose to the queen's majesty's council, nor deal in any great matter, but by the advice and directions of the duke of Norfolk.

Here was read, for the proof thereof, the bishop of Ross.

Wilb. This is a plain course.

Duke. What doth this make against me?

Wilb. That he followed his Commission, that he kept his manner of conference continually, and that according to that use, the Money was distributed by your directions.

Duke. He dealt not with me in a great time, and I can tell when he broke off and dealt no more with me; I was never privy to the distribution of the Money, nor I never spake with Barker about it; I was in the Tower at that time.

Wilb. That was when you were not in the Tower; they lurked in Flanders a while in great necessity, without apparel, and suddenly, with this money, they were waxed gay; and these men have confessed that it is distributed by your order and direction.

Duke. None accuse me but three, one absent, a stranger, and a traitor.

Wilb. And if every one that is privy to Treason must be refused for Witnesses, then should no treason be proved; for none can tell it but they that be privy, and all such are guilty.

Now to the second point, That you adhered to, and aided the Scottish Lords, the queen's majesty's Enemies, and Maintainers of her Rebels. The Rebels, after their flying into Scotland, were there received by the duke of Chastelleroi, the lord Harris, the lord Hume, the lord of Buccleugh and others; and being there, they entered again of new into the realm, and made new roads, and burned and wasted England with fire and sword. Those Scots, that thus assisted the Rebels, the nobles of Scotland that remained in amity with the queen's majesty, went about to suppress. The queen's majesty proclaimed open War against them; she appointed my lord of Sussex her Lieutenant, with a strong army to invade them, and to pursue both the rebels and the said Scots that were her enemies. This my lord of Sussex pursued, made open war upon them, burned their towns, houses, corn and goods, blew up their castles with powder, and kept good peace with the rest: So were they published the queen's enemies, both by Proclamation, which is here ready to be shewed, and by open war itself, the best proclamation of all. The queen's power there tarried a great while, some came home, some remained still in Hume-castle, and other places.

These thus know the queen's enemies, and so published, the Scots that were the queen's friends did still pursue so far, that the said Scottish queen hearing thereof, complained to the duke of Norfolk, viz. How she had no aid from France, and if none came at all, her friends in Scotland must of force be constrained to yield: She prayed the duke of Norfolk's advice. The duke made answer, and Hickford wrote it to the Scottish queen, That she should procure the French ambassador's letters to them in Scotland, to put them in some good hope, that they might hold out a while till aid come. The Scottish queen accordingly wrote to the French ambassador M. de la Mot; he by and by wrote six letters to the lord Harris and other lords of Scotland, with fair and comfortable promises. The packet of these letters were sent to the duke, he had it, he caused it to be sent with a letter to Bannister, to convey it to Lowther upon the west borders of Scotland, and that Lowther should convey it over to the lord Harris. Hickford, the duke's secretary, delivered this French packet, and the other letter to Henry the duke's footman, who carried it to Bannister, and Bannister sent it to Lowther, by Colborn, his servant: and to dissemble the cause of his servant's going, and to know some certainty, whether it came to Lowther's hand or no, Hill feigned a privy token between him and Lowther, about the gathering of the rent of the lord Dacre's lands. Lowther sent over the packet, and returned answer to Bannister, that he had sent it to the lord Harris, and willed Colborn to tell him, which was their privy token, that though it were troublesome, yet he would gather up the rents for him.

Here was read Barker's Confession, 14 Sept. That in July last he received the packet, &c. —Also, Hickford's Confession the same day, with a great Protestation why he confessed not at the first, but carried till Barker had disclosed; because he would not be counted a betrayer of his master.

Wilbraham. You hear how Barker bewrayeth it; you hear also how Hickford himself confesseth it: and in what manner, I pray you, do they disclose it? they make no haste to accuse the duke, but all by leisure; and Hickford maketh it a matter of great consciences, to utter it against his master: and here is a lesson meet to be learned of all servants. Many supposed it a Treason and foul offence to utter their master's treasons; they must otherwise think it is a dangerous opinion.

Duke. I challenge not this man.

Then was read Hickford's Examination, 11 Oct. Also Bannister, 17 Sept. 1. The same Bannister, 29 Nov. pa. Also Bannister, 28 and 29 Sept. ante. 5, and 6.

Will. Thus it appeareth, that those the Scottish queen's friends in Scotland, for whom she sorrowed and feared their yielding, were the queen's majesty's enemies; and how to those the duke adhered, those he comforted, for those he procured the comfortable Letters to be sent, as you have heard.

Duke. I confess it, that I caused the Letters to be sent, but that I procured the Letters to be written, I remember not; but therein I trust Bannister's memory.

Will. Now for sending Money to relieve the queen's majesty's enemies, and touching the 6,000*l.* the French ambassador had 1,400 crowns ready to relieve them, which he sent to the Scottish queen, to know how it should be bestowed. She would have had the duke to make it up 3,000 crowns; she sent 1,000 more herself, and referred the direction of all to the duke himself. The duke having the chief charge of all, willed 2,000 crowns to be conveyed to the queen's majesty's Enemies in Scotland. The bishop of Ross had devised, that it should be sent sewed in Panton's doublet. The duke was made privy to do it on the Sunday after Bartholomew-day: because Panton was a Scot, and like to be searched, this device was misliked, so was the money delivered to Brown of Shrewsbury; and so he rehearsed the manner of the delivery to Brown, and the Letters in Cypher, as it was afore rehearsed by Mr. Attorney-General.

Duke. I received the Money at Thambour's hands; I was not by at the writing of the Letter in Cypher.

Will. I said not so.

Then was read the Letter to Bannister: 'you shall receive a bag by this Bearer, &c.'

Duke. I do not deny the conveying of the Money; but it never came to the queen's Enemies hands.

Will. It was out of our possession; Panton was sent before to receive the Money.

Duke. Not of my knowledge. And as for Grange and Ledington, I have not heard they were the queen's enemies.

Will. That is no matter; for the Indictment is generally of the queen's Enemies, and you know the Money went to the lord Harris.

Duke. Lord Harris was not appointed to have any part of it.

Will. This is no matter, it was a comfort to him, being the queen's Enemy, to be the Factor, and to have the countenance and distribution of it at his pleasure: beside that, you may be sure he would not let all pass without some share to himself.

Duke. May a subject be the queen's majesty's Enemy, while the prince is her friend, and in amity with her?

Catlin. In some cases it may be so: As in France, if the dukedom of Britany should rebel against the French king, and should (during the amity between the French and queen's majesty) invade England, those Britons were the French king's subjects, and the queen's enemies, though the French king remaineth in amity; and so in your case.

Duke. Where was the Proclamation made?

Will. The Proclamation was made in England, and here it is to be shewed; but the war itself is sufficient Proclamation. The queen's army was sent against him, and the queen is not otherwise bound to proclaim.

Duke. I trust my lords the peers will have consideration of me, who they be that accuse me, the bishop of Ross and strangers; and the rest over-reached in Treason themselves.

The Lord Steward asked if they had aught else to say. The duke said, I trust to God and my truth. Then the prisoner was withdrawn.

Then the Serjeant made an O Yes! saying, 'My lord grace the queen's commissioner, high-steward of England, chargeth all men to keep silence upon peril of Imprisonment.'

Then the Lord Steward spake to the lords, and willed them to go together.

Note, That the Money was taken up by the way.

Then the Lords withdrew themselves into a place prepared in the Chancery Court for consultation, and the prisoner was withdrawn. The Lords continued in consultation an hour and a quarter; the Lord Steward still remained in his seat. After an hour and a quarter, which was immediately after eight of the clock at night, the Lords came again upon the Scaffold, and took their places, as they were afore; and then the Lord Steward demanded of every of them severally, sitting in their places, beginning at the youngest baron, in this manner:

'My lord De la Ware, What say you, Is the prisoner guilty of these Treasons or not?' And they all severally answered in Order and Form following:

L. La Ware, Buckhurst, St. John of Bletshoe, North, Rich, St. John, Mordant, Burghe, Wentworth, Sandes, Mountjoy, Grey of Wilton, Burleigh, Howard, Hereford, Leicester, Hertford, Pembroke, Bedford, Warwick, Huntington, Sussex, Worcester, Kent, GUILTY.

Then the Lieutenant was, by the Serjeant, commanded to bring again the prisoner to the Bar, which he did.

Then the Lord Steward said thus: 'Thomas duke of Norfolk, thou hast been heretofore indicted of High Treason, and hast been arraigned upon the same, and hast pleaded Not Guilty, and hast put thyself upon thy peers; the lords, thy peers, have found thee Guilty: What hast thou to say, why I may not proceed to judgment?' The duke answered, 'The Lord's will be done, God be judge between me and my false accusers.'—Then the axe was turned the edge towards him.

Then stood up Mr. Serjeant Barham, and said, 'It appeareth that Thomas duke of Norfolk hath heretofore been indicted of High-Treason, and now hath been arraigned upon the same, and hath pleaded Not Guilty, and hath put himself upon his peers; now the lords his peers, upon consideration of the Evidence shewed forth to prove the indictment, have found him Guilty. I am most humbly to pray of your grace Judgment against him for the queen's majesty, according to the Verdict.'

Then said the Lord Steward: 'Thomas duke of Norfolk, whereas thou hast heretofore been indicted of High-Treason, and hast been arraigned upon the same, and hast pleaded Not Guilty; and hast put thyself upon thy peers and the lords thy peers have found thee Guilty: Wherefore thou shalt be had from hence to the Tower of London, from thence thou shalt be drawn through the midst of the streets of London to Tyburn, the place of execution; there thou shalt be hanged, and being alive thou shalt be cut down quick, thy bowels shall be taken forth of thy body, and burnt before thy face, thy head shall be smitten off, thy body shall be divided into four parts or quarters; thy head and thy quarters to be set up where it shall please the queen's majesty to appoint; and the Lord have mercy upon thee.'

Then the duke said, "This is the Judgment of a Traitor, and I shall die as a true man to the queen, as any liveth;" knocking himself hard upon the breast, he said, "I will not desire any of you all to make any petition for my life; I will not desire to live, I am at a point. And my lords, seeing you have put me out of your company, I trust shortly to be in better company: only I beseech you my lords, to be humble suitors to the queen's majesty for my poor orphan children, that it will please her majesty to be good to my poor orphan children, and to take order for the payment of my debts, and some consideration of my poor servants; for I am at a point. God doth know how true a heart I bear to her majesty, and how true a heart to my country, whatsoever this day hath been falsely objected against me. Farewell, my lords."

Then the Lieutenant was commanded to avoid his prisoner; which thing was done. Then the serjeant made an O Yes! and proclaimed thus; 'My lord's grace, the queen's commissioner, high steward of England, chargeth all persons to depart in God's peace and the queen's, and hath dissolved his Commission.' And therewith the Lord Steward standing up afore his chair, broke his rod in the midst, and the people cryed, God save the Queen. Amen.

The Duke's Execution.

On the 2d of June 1572, about eight in the morning, the Duke was brought to a Scaffold erected on Tower-hill, attended by Alexander Nowel, dean of St. Paul's, who having desired the people to keep silence, the duke said:

"It is not rare, good People, to see a man come to die; although, thanks be to God, since the beginning of the queen's majesty's reign in this place hath not been any; such hath been, and is the mercifulness of her majesty, whom God long preserve. But since it is my fortune to be the first, I pray God I may be the last. You know I have been long looked for in this present Case of mine, divers times in this place; but by her majesty's clemency prolonged hitherto.* It is not common

* Carubden says, that so many designs were set on foot to deliver the duke of Norfolk out of the Tower, as hastened his Execution, which had been put off for near four months. In fine, the duke was beheaded on a scaffold, on to see a man of my vocation to be a speaker; nevertheless I will be brief, and gladly shew you the estate of those Offences which my conscience doth burden me for. I have been by my peers found worthy of Death, whereof I do acquit them; for I come not hither to justify myself, neither yet to charge my peers with injustice, but rather submit myself to this which God hath prepared for me. And thus considering the weakness of my flesh and blood, that at such a time a man's senses will partly fail, I do mind to divide my Speeches into three parts, desiring you to take it full and whole, and not to tear it in pieces.—And first, in dealing in matters temporal towards the queen of Scots, I dealt not as a good subject, for that I made not the queen's majesty privy thereunto, which indeed I confess I ought to have done; for this Offence I was committed to this house (pointing to the Tower) and, upon my humble Submission, delivered; then making Promise to the queen's majesty (whom I pray God long to prosper) never to deal in those matters again: But contrary to my Submission and promise made to the queen's majesty, abusing her clemency towards me; which hath and doth grieve me more than any one thing hath done; I dealt in this matter again, perfectly for saving my life, and other causes which I could alledge.

[Here Mr. Sheriff Branch, standing by the Duke, desired him very courteously to make an end as short as might be, for the time did spend.]

Then the duke beginning again, said, "It hath been bruited, that I took my Oath, and received the Sacrament, that I should never deal in those matters again; which is untrue; and yet the Oath too much.

[Now Mr. Christopher, one of the Officers, hearing these Words, desired the Duke to be short: We are come hither, said he, to see you put to Execution, and we must not delay while these Speeches pass from you, for in this we hazard our lives.]

Then the Duke said, "I do not excuse myself, but I come to discharge my conscience, and to acquit my peers, and not to complain of any injustice, for I have deserved this, and more a great deal, in that I have abused the queen's majesty's mercy towards me; whom once again, with hands lifted up, I pray God long to preserve and reign over you, and that my death may be an end of all troubles. And to augment my fault, it is said I had familiarity with evil dealers: Indeed I will confess and tell you, that I never saw, nor never had conference, but once with one Rodolph, and yet never against the queen's majesty, God is my judge; although many lewd offers and motions were made to me; for it is well known I had to do with him, by reason I was bound to him by Recognizance for a great sum of Money. And as for the two Letters that came from the pope, I confess I did see them, the one ciphered, the other deciphered; I never consented to them, neither was I consenting to the late Rebellion in the north, notwithstanding I come not hither as unguilty.—To the second Part, I know I have not only been thought to be a papist, but a Favourer of papists, and a Maintainer of them. God is my Judge, before whom I stand, (lifting up his eyes), I thank God I was never a papist since I knew what Religion meant; but I did always detest Papistry, and all the vain toys thereof, embracing ever, from the bottom of my heart, the true Religion of Jesus Christ, trusting, by the assurance of faith in his blood, that he is my only Redeemer and Saviour: Indeed I must confess that I had servants and friends that were papists; but if thereby I have offended God's church, or any Protestant, I desire God and them to forgive me.—Well, now to the third Point, wherein I am to shew how much I am bound to the queen's majesty for her mercifulness towards me, in that her majesty hath promised to be good and gracious to my poor children. I remember good father Latimer making a Sermon in a more honourable place than this is, out of the pulpit, neither do I compare myself to him, he said, 'That God did oftentimes take away a good and gracious prince, for the sins and disobedience of his subjects;' which God grant not to be in these days, but that it will please God to continue and increase her majesty's years; yea, until the world's end, if it be his blessed will and pleasure. You have a most gracious queen, as I must needs confess, and also godly Religion; therefore look that your livings and conversations be answerable to the Religion of Christ that proves you; that God may prosper the prince, overthrow the pope, and maintain your wealth and quietness. Let not my person, good people, make my Speech worse; they that have factions, I speak not particularly, but generally, let them beware they be given over betimes; seek not to breviate God's doings, lest God prevent yours."

Tower-hill, June the 2nd. He died with great courage and magnanimity amidst a vast crowd of sorrowful and weeping spectators; for it is incredible, says our author, "how dearly he was beloved by the populace, whose good-will he had gained by a munificence and affability suitable to so great a prince."

And then the Sheriff hastening him, he turned to the People, and embracing sir Henry Lee, said, "I have, and always have had as true a heart to my prince as ever any subject hath had." And so sir Henry Lee staying him by the left arm, he kneeled down and asked the queen's Forgiveness; and rising again, he embraced Mr. Dean of Paul's with a cheerful countenance; and afterwards for the most part shaking those that were on the scaffold by the hands, and desiring them to pray for him; amongst the rest, the Executioner did on his knees desire forgiveness of his death, who did very courteously forgive him, and put into the hand of the Executioner four sovereigns of gold, and eighteen shillings and six pence of silver. This done, the duke kneeling down, and the dean of Paul's with him, he made his Prayers to God, and read the 51st Psalm, saying on to the last Verse save one, viz. Build up the Walls of Jerusalem; he paused and said, 'The Walls of England, good Lord.' That Psalm finished, he began to read another; and at the seventh Verse of the Psalm, he paused and said, I had almost forgotten, but not too late; I ask all the world forgiveness, and I forgive all the world. The Psalm finished, and other prayers; he said, In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum, Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Then he arose up and pulled off his velvet gown, his black satin doublet, and his velvet night-cap, and gave them to the Executioner; and being in a white fustian waistcoat, he said to Mr. Dean of Paul's, This is the white satin doublet I made to die in, which the Preacher did speak of; and so kneeling at the block, he laid down himself, and rose again, and laid the straw and other things in such sort, as he might in a more convenient manner yield himself for the speedier Execution. This done, his eyes and hands lifted up, Mr. Dean desired the people's silence, and said, Now all together, with one voice, pray for him, saying, 'Lord Jesus receive thy soul.' The Duke yielding himself to the block, refusing to have any handkerchief before his eyes, his head was at one chop cut off, and shewed to all the people; and afterwards his corpse was put into a coffin appertaining to Barkin church, with the head also, and the burial-cloth laid over him, and so was carried by four of the lieutenant's men, and was buried in the chapel of the Tower by the Dean of St. Paul's.

57. The Trial of Mr. ROBERT HICKFORD, (Servant of the Duke of Norfolk), at the Queen's-Bench, for High Treason: 14 ELIZ. February 9, A. D. 1571. [MS. Brit. Mus. 1427.]

AFTER the reading of the Indictment, being asked by the Clerk of the Crown, if he were Guilty or Not Guilty? He answered to this effect; being admonished to speak higher, whereunto he excused himself by the lowness of his voice:

Hickford. I am here indicted of divers points of High-Treason, part whereof I deny, for that I was never privy to the same: my fact, such as it is, I am ready to confess, and declare as I have already confessed it. I am not learned in the law. I know not in what form to answer unto it. This only I require to be heard to declare the truth, so far as the matter toucheth me: I here protest before your honours, and in the presence of God, that I bring a conscience untouched with any intent of hurt, ever conceived by me against the queen's majesty's person or my country; I never meant any such thing in my heart: I know the law hath not intent to the conscience, or intent of men; but is to judge only of the mind, according to the appearing of outward facts; so the law cannot accept my intent for my purgation. Therefore I shall declare the truth of my doing, and upon that further open unto you at large my dealing in the matters contained in the Indictment. First, For the matter of moving of Sedition, I did never know that any such thing was meant by my lord, or any other; and whatsoever was by him, or any other intended, I was not privy unto it. I do confess indeed, that the Articles mentioned in the Indictment were sent to my lord, my late master, which by his commandment I deciphered, for they were brought in cipher. Then my lord read them, and folded them up, and put them in the pocket of his hose, and said, The bishop of Ross will never be quiet, and then he went to supper; and from that time I never saw that Writing till it was showed me in the Tower. What Answer my lord made to them, or whether he answered them or no, I know not.

C. J. Catlin. Hickford, you seem to be a man of knowledge and learning, you have been indicted, and are now arraigned according to order of law; you must follow order, you must answer to the Indictment, confess or deny it, you shall be heard after to say your mind. You must plead unto it Guilty or not Guilty.

Hickford. I do confess the law hath not respect to man's intent, but judgeth according to his fact. I confess I saw these Articles and deciphered them, I shewed them to my lord; I revoked them not, as in duty I ought to have done, and therefore I think myself Guilty.

Catlin. The Indictment containeth divers clauses of Treason, therefore answer, if you be guilty, to any special matters contained in the Indictment, or that you will confess yourself Guilty of the whole.

Hickford. I may not confess of myself that wherof my conscience doth not accuse me, some parts I am not privy to; the first point, concerning stirring of Sedition, I do not know that ever any such thing was meant by my lord. What intention he had, God and his own conscience knoweth it. As touching the matter of Rodolph's going over to the king of Spain, to the pope, and the duke of Alva, and the Instructions of that voyage contained in the thing, that by my lord's commandment I deciphered: I answer, as I have before said, that I never knew of any proceeding, nor dealt therein afterwards; and my lord, when he read it deciphered, he answered as I said before, The bishop of Ross will never be quiet. I thought he had burnt that Paper, as a thing that he liked not; but what he did with it, or in the matter afterward, I cannot tell.

Catlin. You must answer more roundly and directly to the matter; for these circumstances and points, you shall be heard afterward. In the mean time answer plainly, if you be Guilty or not Guilty.

Southcote. Mr. Southcote spake to the same effect, and told him, That if he pleaded Not Guilty, these his Declarations should be heard at large upon the evidence.

Hickford. To part of the indictment I concess myself Guilty, which concerneth the deciphering of the letters by my lord's procurement and commandment; after which time I never dealt in it.

Southcote. You were best to plead Not Guilty to the whole Indictment; and for such matters and parts of the Indictment as you can clear yourself, the Jury may find you Not Guilty, and find you Guilty for the rest.

The Lord Chief Justice, and Mr. Attorney advised to the same effect.

Hickford. I am Guilty. I know under how merciful a queen I live; I submit myself wholly to her majesty's mercy. I will not stand long upon that wherof mine own conscience condemneth me.

Catlin. Confess you Guilty to the whole Indictment?

Hickford. Yea.

Attorney. (Mr. Gilbert Gerrard.) Are you Guilty of adhering to and comforting the queen's enemies, and the conveying of the French Packet and Money that was sent to relieve them?

Hickford. I confess myself Guilty.

Serj. Then, after some pause, Mr. Serjeant Barham spake to this effect: Forasmuch as Robert Hickford hath been indicted of High-Treason, and, among other things, that he hath adhered to and comforted the queen's enemies, and the same Indictment hath been read unto him, and he hath confessed the treasons; I am to pray your lordships on the queen's majesty's behalf, that his Confession may be entered, and Judgment given for the queen against him, according to the law.

Hickford. May I now declare to what points I am not Guilty?

Attorney. There are two points in the Indictment that concern yourself; the dealing in the matter about Rodolph's Voyage, and the Instruction for the same; and the adhering to and comforting of the queen's enemies: are you not Guilty of these?

Hickford. I am Guilty.

Catlin. If you will yet wave and forsake your confession, we are content to admit you to do so, and you may yet plead Not Guilty, and you shall have your Trial.

Hickford. No, I will submit me wholly to her majesty's mercy: I know under how merciful a prince I live, though my deserts be far unworthy, by my master's means and procurement. I know I bring, as I said, a conscience untouched with any intent or meaning of hurt to her majesty's person, or to my country. And this I say before God and in the presence and witness of you all; howbeit the law accepteth not, nor judgeth by secret intents, for so might every man clear himself.

Catlin. Hickford, thou hast heard the Indictment read, where by the oaths of a Jury thou art found and presented guilty of divers High-Treasons: thou hast been arraigned thereof, and confessed thyself guilty, and submitted thyself to her majesty's mercy. The queen's majesty's Serjeant hath, on her behalf, required

Confession to be entered, and Judgment to be given against thee, according to the order of the laws; so nothing resteth now but Judgment to be given against thee, and that thou hear thy Judgment. A few words for good admonition shall serve: Thou art a gentleman, wise, and well learned, I would to God there had been in thee as much loyalty and truth, as there is learning, and other good qualities and gifts of God, then hadst thou not fallen into this great fault and misery. But there have been evil enticers, evil school-masters, evil seedsmen, as one called them here last day; they have brought thee from truth and good estate, to untruth, treason, and wretchedness; where before thou and others were of good name and fame, they have brought you to infamy; of loyal, good, and true subjects, they brought you to the name and state of disloyal traitors: A great blot to be a Traitor, and the greatest infamy that can be. It is the chiefest point of the duty of every natural and reasonable man, which by the gift of reason differeth from a beast, to know his prince and head, to be true to his head and prince. All the members are bound to obey the head; every man is bound to repair life, to lay out and expend goods, lands, and possessions, to forsake father, mother, kindred, wife, and children, in respect of preserving the prince; for in defending the prince, they preserve father, mother, kindred, wife, children, and all. It was well and wisely spoken here the last day, by one that stood at the bar, that was learned and as wise as you are, upon his confessing of himself guilty of Treason against his prince; I would he had had as much truth and loyalty, as he had of learning and understanding, in few words, he comprehended a great heap of matter concerning the duty of the subject to the prince. All the duties, said he, to father, mother, friends, kindred, children, yea to a man's wife, that is his own flesh, are all inferior to the duty that a subject oweth to his prince, for this duty comprehendeth them all. In respect of duty to the prince, and preserving the prince, neither wife, parent, nor other are to be regarded, they must all stand behind. If in any case, any respect shall allure a man from loyalty and truth to his prince, they must be forsaken, they must come behind; it must be said, Vade post me, Satana. We must first look unto God the high prince of all princes, and then to the queen's majesty the second prince, and God's deputy, and our sovereign prince on earth. In these few words he comprehended much matter, he satisfied the hearers for their duty to the queen's majesty. You are wise and learned as he was, and for knowledge of duty and understanding as much bound to God as he; but the evil seedsmen, the evil enticers and seducers have wrought evil effect in you both, the great good seedsmen hath sowed in you good gifts, learning, knowledge, and good quality, to serve him, your prince and your country withal, as it is said in the gospel, Bonus seminator seminavit semen bonum; but supervenit inimicus et seminavit zizavia: the good seedsmen sowed good seed; but there came the enemy, the evil seedsmen, and he sowed darnel, cockle, and noisome weeds. Such wicked seedsmen have been in England; if they had sown the right seed for their own use, the seed of hemp, and felt of it, they had received according to their deserving. God hath sown in you good gifts and qualities, meet to have served any prince in Christendom; but supervenit inimicus, the devil and his ministers, wicked seedsmen, sowed in you darnel and cockle, treason and disloyalty; they have made you forget your duty to your natural prince and country. If these had been handled as they have deserved, they should long ago have had of their own due seed, hemp bestowed upon them, meet seed for such seedsmen; such mischievous seedsmen they be, that corrupt men, otherwise well indued, that sow treason so abundantly in this realm. O strange matter! that such Treasons should be, and so ripe in this realm; a common slander to this realm of England, the Treasons of England are every where talked of among strange nations: For proof of it they refer us to our histories of H. 2. Ed. 2. Ric. 2. Ed. 5. and so prove the oft practices in this realm to murder and depose our princes, to the great infamy and slander of our country. The very regard of our country's fame, that this great slander of treason should not by your fault have been renewed and increased against us, if nothing else would, it should have staid you from so foul dealing in treason. But is this sowing of treason lawful for any? May ambassadors be such seedsmen? Be these the parts of ambassadors? They have their articles in law, by which they are bound, let them do as law will let them. If they will transgress these, and fall to treason, and procure the danger of princes, let them feel as law will. I can shew you a precedent and history for it within memory, about 37 or 38 years ago, about the 25th Hen. 8. it was done by the duke of Milan. The French king, that then was, Francis, grand-father to the French king that now is, sent one M. de Marveilles to the duke of Milan as his ambassador: this M. de Marveilles, the French king's ambassador, conspired Treason against the state and the duke of Milan; the duke understood it, he caused him to be arraigned after the order of their law, and being found guilty, he beheaded him: and this jure gentium was lawfully done. May Messengers conspire Treason against princes to whom they be sent? Treason to princes is not their message, it is no lawful cause of their sending; if of their own heads they presume it, they must by law be touched and taught to keep them within their duties. As for them that seek fame by Treason, and by procuring the destruction of princes, where shall sound that fame? Shall the golden Trump of Fame and good Report, that Chaucer speaketh of? No; but the black Trump of Shame shall blow out their infamy for ever. Again, these that follow such heinous Treasons, that bring forth the fruit of such seeds as such wicked seedsmen have sown, are in foul fault, and justly to be condemned, and worthy extremely to feel it. For that you are in misery, men may have pity and compassion of your misery, and so forbear to grieve you with due rehearsal, else men might aggravate your offence, with setting out the particulars of it at length, and as they should have fallen out, if you had stood in Trial: but you have confessed it, and yielded yourself guilty, and submitted yourself to the queen's majesty's mercy. Therefore I will leave to aggravate your faults, and will proceed, as the order of law requireth, to Judgment. I pray God to give you grace to make a good end. I need not give you long exhortation, I am no doctor of divinity; you are learned yourself, your knowledge is great I would your loyalty and truth had been as great. But because we are to do with law, we must follow the order of law, one must speak for all, and so I, for all the rest, shall proceed to judgment.

Then my Lord Chief Justice pronounced the Judgment usual in Treason, concluding it in these words; 'God be merciful unto you, and give you grace to make a good end.'

Then Hickford answered to this effect: I humbly thank your lordship for your good admonition; I know and confess, that I ought unto the queen's majesty a much greater and higher duty than to my master. And as it is said of your lordships to have been wisely spoken, so was it truly said, that the duty of all subjects to the prince, is a much greater duty than a man oweth to his master, or to any other; yea, or to those that bare him into the world. I confess I have neglected that duty to my prince, howbeit I did it by my lord, my late master's procurement and commandment, and for good intent, as my master bare me in hand and persuaded me, whereof I pray your lordships I may declare the truth. When first my lord made choice of me to wait on him in the Tower, as I would to God he had rather made choice of any other, within short time he received a Letter from the Scottish queen in Cipher. He made me privy to it, and willed me to acquaint myself with that Cipher, for the deciphering of the like hereafter. At that first time I said little unto it: within three weeks after there came another Letter to him from the Scottish queen, and then I began to mislike the matter. Then my lord walking on the leads, (having so much liberty granted him) sir Henry Nevil and Mr. Lieutenant being present upon the leads, and departing a little aside, my lord called me to him, and after other matters entered into talk of the Scottish queen. I said unto him, I would ask a question of you, if I might without offending you. He asked me what? I said I would show him, so that he would not be offended, for otherwise I durst not. After he had assured me he would not be offended, I said unto him, My lord, I marvel much at your doings; you are here, as you know, committed upon high displeasure of the queen's majesty, for dealing with the Scottish queen without the queen's majesty's consent.

Now in proceeding further by Letters between you, the contrivance of this dealing must much aggravate her highness's displeasure against you. He answered me, Tush fool, thou art a fool, thou understandest not the matter. I answered, I presumed to say this unto you, upon your assurance that you would not be offended, and that maketh me ask, why you continue this dealing with the Scottish queen? He answered me again, Thou art a fool, thou seest not my case; I hold a wolf by the ears, I can neither let go without danger, nor hold without peril. Unhappy man I was when I was first committed; for if I could then have come to the speech of the prince, I would have laid it all at her feet, and I trust I should have found grace to have obtained favour: But now, on the one side, I am entered into my prince's high displeasure; on the other side (a), if I should pull the Scottish queen, and all her friends upon me, and make them mine enemies, then were I in worse case than ever I was. If I could once recover my prince's favour, then would I soon shake off all dealing with the Scottish queen. In the mean time, till her majesty's favour may be recovered, I am driven to this hardness that you see. I answered him again, You are yourself much wiser than I am; but, in my poor opinion, the sooner you rid yourself of this dealing the better. Then because I was persuaded that he trusted to recover the queen's majesty's favour, I was in the mean time contented to decipher the Letters from time to time, as they passed between them. Shortly after he had so much favour and liberty, that his men had recourse unto him freely into the Tower: whereupon we conceived hope of his short delivery, but it fell contrary, and so continued till Midsummer. Then was he advised to make submission to the queen's majesty, and promised that if he would submit himself, and renounce all dealing with the Scottish queen, there was hope that the queen's majesty would receive him to grace. Whereupon he wrote a Submission, he sent it, it was delivered, and, as we heard, it was very well liked of. Within a fortnight after he had the liberty of the Tower, and comfortable Letters came. I looked and had hope that he should have been delivered presently; it came not so to pass, the cause God knoweth.

Here the Lord Chief Justice offered to interrupt and end this course of speech as impertinent, when he yet proceeded further, and said:

Hickford. I beseech you, my lord, let me use a few words, to declare the course of my doing. My lord was not then delivered: shortly after it happened, that by occasion of a sickness, and being sick of the plague in the Tower, my lord was removed to his own house at the Charter-house; then we had great hope that we should shortly be received into her majesty's favour, and come to the court again, and so continued till the Cipher came from the bishop of Ross, before which time and since I was never privy to that matter. The cause why I was never afterward made privy, was this; My lord being at home at his house at Charter-house, I told him, I liked not his doing; it would not have good end.

Att. Why did you then still follow? Why left you him not?

Hickford. He answered me, Thou art a fool, thou understandest not.

Catlin. He told you truth, that you were a fool, for you played the fool indeed.

Hickford. I would then have gone from him, and I sought to depart; he would never give me leave, as Mr. Bannister well knoweth.

Catlin. Why? he was not your prince, you were not so bound that he could compel you to tarry with him.

Hickford. Otherwise I dealt not with the bishop of Ross.

Catlin. In following him, the hurt was yours; if you had been a good subject, and had regard of your duty, you might and should have taken other course; but you had higher hope, to have seen your master in higher state to advance you; you had more respect to your master than to your mistress. But this is nothing to the matter.

So his purposed longer Speech was cut off, and then he said shortly thus:

Hickford. I humbly thank your lordship again for your good admonition; and as your lordship hath rehearsed the History of the French ambassador to the duke of Milan, so I would and pray God, that he that hath brought my lord to this, may have the like success. I humbly submit myself to the queen's majesty's mercy. I know I have lived under a most gracious and merciful queen. I wish God long to preserve her majesty, and this little time that I have left I will spend in prayer for her preservation; and I beseech God have mercy upon me.

Whereunto the Court, and all that were present, said, Amen; and some said secretly, he had then shewed himself a wiser man than his master. And so the lieutenant was commanded to avoid the prisoner.—God save Queen Elizabeth.

58. The Arraignment of EDMUND CAMPION, SHERWIN, BOSGRAVE, COTTAM, JOHNSON, BRISTOW, KIRBIE, and ORTON, for High Treason: 24 ELIZ. A. D. 1581. Now first published. [MS. in Bib. Cott. 1014. Phoenix Britannicus, 481.]

THE 12th of November, 1581, at the King's<sup>o</sup> bench, in Westminster, the parties abovenamed were indicted of High Treason, namely, that they in the days of the last March and April anno 22d Eliz. at Rheimes in Champaign, Rome, and other places beyond the seas, had conspired the death of the queen's majesty, the overthrow of the religion now professed in England, the subversion of the state, and that for the attempt thereof they had stirred up strangers to invade this realm; moreover that the 8th of May next following, they took their journey from Rheimes towards England to persuade and seduce the queen's subjects to the Romish religion, obedience to the Pope, from their duties and allegiance to her highness, and that the 1st of June they arrived in this country for the self-same purpose.

Whereupon the parties mentioned were brought from the Tower to the bar to hear this Indictment which was read unto them.

Campion. I protest before God and his angels, by heaven and earth, and before this tribunal, which I pray God may be a mirror of the judgment to come, that I am Not Guilty of these Treasons contained in the Indictment, or of any other whatsoever; and to prove these things against me it is merely impossible.

Lord Chief Justice, (sir Christopher Wray.) The time is not yet come wherein you shall be tried, and therefore you must now spare speech and reserve it till then, at which time you shall have full liberty of defence, and me to sit indifferent between her majesty and yourself, wherefore now to the Indictment whether you be Guilty or Not.

Then they were arraigned, severally and severally; every one pleaded Not Guilty. The 30th of Nov. next following, the said persons were led to the bar for their Trial, the Jury was demanded, which presently appeared. The Clerk of the Crown read the Indictment, and declared the charge to the jurors was, That if they found the parties here indicted Guilty of the treasons, or to have fled for any of them, they should then enquire what lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, they had at the time of the treasons committed or at any time since, and if they found them Not Guilty, then to say so, and no more.

Campion. My lord, for as much as our surmised offences are severally, so that the one is not to be tainted with the crime of the other, the offence of one not being the offence of all, I could have wished likewise that for the prevention of confusion, we might also have been severally indicted, and that our Accusations carrying so great importance, and tending so nearly unto us as our lives, each one might have had one day for his trial. For albeit I acknowledge the Jurors to be wise men and much experienced in such causes, yet all the Evidence being given or rather handled at once, must needs breed a confusion in the Jury, and perhaps such a misprison of matters, as they may take the Evidence against one to be against all, and consequently the crime of the one for the crime of the other, and finally the guilty to be saved, and the guiltless to be condemned; wherefore, I would it had pleased your lordship that the Indictment had been several, and that we might have had several days of trial*.

Hudson. It seemeth well Campion that you have had your counsel.

Campion. No counsel but a pure conscience.

Lord Chief Justice. Although if many be indicted at once, the Indictment in respect of them all containing all their names be in it, yet in itself being framed against several persons it cannot be but several at the trial, whereof evidence shall be particularly given against every one, and to the matters objected every one shall have his particular answer, so that the jury shall have all things orderly; notwithstanding I would have wished also, that every one should have had his several day assigned him, had the time so permitted, but since it cannot be otherwise we must take it as it is.

Whereupon the queen's counsel Mr. Anderson, Mr. Popham (Attorney General) and Mr. Egerton (Solicitor General) prepared to give in Evidence, and first Mr. Anderson spake in effect as followeth:

Anderson. With how good and gracious a prince the Almighty hath blessed this land, continuing the space of 23 years, the peace, the tranquillity, mercies and abundant supplies, but especially the light and success of the gospel, wherewith since her majesty's first reign this realm hath flourished above all other, most evidently doth manifest; the which, notwithstanding they ought to have stirred us up into a most dutiful affection and zealous love unto her crown, for whose sake and by whose means, next under God, we enjoy these prosperities; yet hath there not from time to time, been wanting amongst us mischievous and evil disposed enemies of her felicity, which either by insolent and open denouncing of war or by secret and privy practices of sinister devices, have ambitiously and most disloyally attempted to spoil her of her right, and us of these blessings: yet such hath been God's incomparable puissance against them, so tender his care over her, so favourable his mercy towards us, that neither they thereby have been bettered, nor her estate impaired, nor our quiet diminished, for who knoweth not of the rebellions and uproars in the North, who remembereth not the tragical pageant of Storie, who still seeth not the traiterous practices of Felton? Prevailed they against her, was not their strength vanquished, were not their policies frustrated, did not God detect them and protect her to her safety and their perdition? The matter is fresh in remembrance. Their quarters are yet scarce consumed; they were discovered, they were convicted; they suffered, we saw it. If you ask from whence these Treasons and seditious Conspiracies had their first offspring, I ask from whence they could have it but from the well itself the pope? For if we inspect the Northern seditions, he it was that was not only the encouragement, but also being put to flight was their refuge. If we mean Storie, he it was that was the sworn liege and lord of so perjured a subject; if we look to Felton, he it was that excommunicated the queen and all the commonalty that did her obedience. Finally, if we recount all the Treasons and Rebellions that have been conspired since the first hour of generation, he it was and principally he, that suborned them. What, then, are we to think these latest and present conspiracies to have been done either unwitting or unwilling the pope? Shall we deny either Campion or his companions without the pope's assent or consent to have conspired these matters beyond the seas themselves? Why? had they no entertainment at his hands? Did he bestow nothing upon them for their maintenance? was there no cause which either he should do for them or they for him, they papists, he pope; they flying their country, he receiving them; they Jesuits, he their founder; he supreme head, they sworn members; he their chief provost, they his dearest subjects; how can it be but he was privy, privy! nay the author and setter on? We see that other treasons have been squared to his platforms, and had he no direction in this, came all the rest from him and came not this near him? It is impossible. An enemy to the crown, a professed scourge to the gospel, envying the tranquillity of the one, impatient of the success of the other, what would he not do to subvert them both? He hath been always like himself, and never liker in ought than in this, He knew well enough no foreign hostility was convenient. The Spaniard would be discovered: the Frenchman would be suspected, the Roman not beloved. How then? Forsooth, men born and bred in our own nation, perfect in our own tongue and language, instructed in our own Universities—they and only they must endeavour our overthrow. In what order? They must come secretly into the realm, they must change their habit and names; they must dissemble their vocations, they must wander unknown—to what end? To dissuade the people from their Allegiance to their prince, to reconcile them to the pope, to plant the Romish Religion, to supplant both prince and province—by what means? By saying of Mass, by administering the Sacrament, by hearing Confessions. When all these things were purposed, endeavoured, and practised by them, whether were they guilty of these treasons or no? If not, then add this, for them they were parties to the rebellion in the North, they were instruments to the practices of Storie, they were ministers to execute the Bull sent from Pius Quintus against her majesty. How appeareth that? How should it appear better, than by your own Speeches and Examinations. They highly commended the Rebellion in the North; they greatly rejoiced in the constancy of Storie; divers of their counsel and conferences was required for the Bull. Yea, and which is more and yet sticketh in our stomachs, they afforded such large commendations to Saunders, liking and extolling his late proceedings in Ireland, that it cannot be otherwise intended but that thereof they also have been partakers. To conclude, what lenity may we hope for from the pope, what fidelity from their hands that have vowed themselves unto him, what trust may the country repose in them that have fled and renounced their country? How can their return be without danger, whose departure was so perilous? Note all circumstances, note all probabilities, not one amongst all, but note them for traitorous; and so being, it is reason they should have the law and the due punishment ordained for traitors, the which in her majesty's behalf we pray that they may have, and that the Jury upon our allegation may pass for the Trial.

This Speech, very vehemently pronounced with a grave and austere countenance, dismayed them all, and made them very impatient and troublesomely affected; for it seemed by their distemperature that it sounded very criminously to their Trial, and therefore utterly denying all that was alledged, they protested themselves true and faithful subjects; only Campion bare it out best, and yet somewhat amazed, and demanded of Mr. Anderson, whether he came as an orator to accuse them, or as a pleader to give in evidence.

L. C. Justice. You must have patience with him and the rest likewise; for they being of the Queen's Council they speak of no other intent than of duty to her majesty; and I cannot but marvel that men of your profession should upon any such occasion, be so much distempered, for as concerning the matters which my brother Anderson hath alledged, they be but inducements to the point itself, and thereto every one shall have his several Answer.

Whereupon, Campion for himself and his Companions answered unto Mr. Anderson's Speech as followeth:

Campion. The wisdom and providence of the laws of England, as I take it, is such as proceedeth not to the trial of any man for life and death by shifts of probabilities and conjectural surmises, without proof of the crime by sufficient evidence and substantial witnessnes. For, otherwise, it had been very unequally provided that upon the descanting and flourishes of affected speeches, a man's life should be brought into danger and extremity, or that, upon the persuasion of any orator or vehement pleader without witness viva voce testifying the same, a man's offence should be judged or reputed mortal. If so, I see not to what end Mr. Serjeant's oration tended, or if I see an end, I see it but frustrate, for be the crime but in trifles, the law hath his passage, be the theft but of an halfpenny, witnesses are produced, so that probabilities, aggravations, invectives, are not the balance wherein justice must be weighed, but witnesses, oaths, &c.—Whereto, then, appertaineth these objections of Treason? He barely affirmeth, we flatly deny them. But let us examine them, how will they urge us? We fled our country, what of that? The pope gave us entertainment, how then? We are Catholics, what is that to the purpose? We persuaded the people, what followeth? We are therefore Traitors. We deny the sequel, this is no more necessary than if a sheep had been stolen, and to accuse me you should frame this reason, My parents are thieves, my companions suspected persons, myself an evil liver, and on it laid the mutton, therefore I stole the sheep. Who seeth not but these be odious circumstances to bring a man in hatred with the Jury, and no necessary matter to conclude him guilty? Yea, but we seduced the queen's subjects from their allegiance to her majesty! What can be more unlikely? We are dead men to the world, we only travelled for souls; we touched neither state nor policy, we had no such commission. Where was, then, our seducing? Nay, but we reconciled them to the pope; nay, what reconciliation can there be to him, since reconciliation is only due to God? This word soundeth not to a lawyer's usage and therefore is wrested against us unaptly. The reconciliation that we endeavoured was only to God, and as Peter saith reconciliatio Domine; what resteth then against us? That we were privy to the Rebellion in the North, instruments to Storie, ministers to Felton, partakers with Sanders. How so? forsooth, it must be presumed. Why? because we commended some, some we rejoiced at, concerning some we gave counsel and conference. How appeareth that? by our own speeches, nothing less. God is our witness we never meant it, we dreamed it not. These matters ought to be proved and not urged, declared by evidence and not surmised by fancy, notwithstanding it ought to be so, yet must all circumstances note us for Traitors. Indeed, all yet that is laid against us, be but bare circumstances, and no sufficient arguments to prove us Traitors, in so much that we think ourselves very hardly dealt with, that for want of proof we must answer to circumstances. Well, circumstances or other as I remember, this was all; and if this were all, all this was nothing. Wherefore, in God's behalf we pray that better Proof may be used, and that our lives be not brought in prejudice by conjectures.

Queen's Counsel. It is the use of all Seminary men at the first entrance into their Seminaries to make two personal Oaths; the one into a book called Bristow's Motives for the fulfilling of all matters therein contained; the other unto the pope to be true to him and his successors: of the which Oaths, there is neither but is traitorous, for how can a man be faithful to our state and swear performance to those Motives; a true liege to his sovereign, and swear fealty to the pope, forasmuch as the one is quite contrary to our laws and government, the other the most mortal enemy her majesty hath?

Campion. What Oaths Seminary men at their first entrance take, or whether Bristow's Motives be repugnant to our laws or no, is not any thing material to our Indictment, for that we are neither Seminary men nor sworn at our entrance to any such motives; but were it so that any Seminary Men stood here for trial, this matter could prove no great Evidence against them, for that none are sworn to such Articles of Bristow's, but young striplings that be under tuition; whereas unto men of riper years and better grounded in points of Religion (as most of England are before they pass the seas) that Oath is never administered, and then many a study else flourisheth in Rome wherein both Seminary men and others are far better employed than they otherwise could be in reading English pamphlets.

Kirbie. I think of my conscience there be not four Books of these Bristow's Motives in all the Seminaries.

Thereupon they all cried, if whereas they were indicted of Treason they feared lest under vizard of that they should be condemned of Religion, and to prove that Campion framed a reason in manner following:

Campion. There was offer made unto us, that if we would come to the Church to hear Sermons and the Word preached, we should be set at large, and at liberty: so Pascall and Nicolls, otherwise as culpable in all offences as we, upon coming to the Church and acceptance of that offer, were received to grace and had their Pardon granted; whereas if they had been so happy as to have persevered to the end, they had been partakers of our calamities. Wherefore, if liberty were offered to us on condition to come to Church and hear sermons, and that could we not do by professing our Religion, then to change our religion and to become Protestants, that forsooth was that that should purchase us liberty. So that our Religion was cause of our Imprisonment and the consequence of our condemnation.

Attorney General. All these matters at the time of Nicoll's enlargement were altogether unknown, and not once suspected; neither can we now conjecture that he was guilty of any such drift or purpose, in that he stood not, as you do, stubbornly in that religion which might be any cloak or colour of such Treasons.

Queen's Counsel. All you jointly and severally have received money of the pope to spend in your journeys. Some two hundred crowns, some more, some less, according to your degrees and conditions. Was such liberality of the pope's without cause? No: it had an end; and what end should that be, but by your privy inveigling and persuasions to set on foot his devices and treacheries.

Campion. We received of him according to the rate he thought best to bestow it. We saw neither cause why to refuse it, neither means how to come hither pennyless; it was his liberality that supplied our need. What would you have us do? We took it, was that Treason? But it was to an end: I grant had it been to no end, it had been in vain; and what end should that be, merely to preach the Gospel? no treacheries, no such end was intended.

There was a Witness produced named J. Caddy, or Cradocke, who deposed, generally, against them all, that being beyond the seas he heard of the Holy Vow made between the pope and the English priests, for the restoring and establishing of Religion in England; for the which purpose, two hundred priests should come into the realm, the which matter was declared to Ralph Shelley an English knight, and captain to the pope, and that he should conduct an army into England, for the subduing of the realm unto the pope, and the destroying of the Heretics. Where to sir Ralph made answer, that he would rather drink poison with Themistocles than see the overthrow of his country: and added further, that he thought the catholics in England would first stand in arms against the pope before they would join in such an enterprize.

Queen's Counsel. The matter is flat: the Holy Vow was made, two hundred priests had their charge appointed, the Captain General was mentioned, our destruction purposed. If, then, we confer all likely heads together, what is more apparent than that of those two hundred priests, you made up a number, and therefore be parties and privy to the Treason.

Campion. Two hundred priests made an Holy Vow to labour for restoring of Religion. It seemeth, by all likelihood, that we made up the number, and therefore privy and parties to the Treason: here is a conclusion without any affinity to the premises; first an Holy Vow, then an establishment of Religion. What colour is there here left for Treason? All the treason rehearsed is imputed to sir-Ralph Shelley; not one syllable thereof was referred to the priests. But granting, and which the witnesses have not deposed, namely, that we were some of these two hundred priests; you see sir Ralph Shelly a Catholic, the Pope's captain, a Layman, would rather drink poison than agree to such Treason, it is like that priests, devotaries and dead men to the world, would in anywise consent unto, that this Deposition is more for us than against us.

Then was order taken that every man's Evidence should be particularly read against himself, and every one to have his several answer; and first against Campion.

Queen's Counsel. About ten years since you, Campion, were received into conference with the cardinal of Sicily, concerning the Bull wherein Pius 5 did excommunicate the Queen, the nobility, and commonalty, of this realm; discharging such of them as were Papists from their obedience to her majesty, the which Conference cannot otherwise be referred, than to the putting in execution of the Bull; so that the Bull containing manifest treason, whereto you were privy. Doth that prove you a Traitor?

Campion. You, Men of the Jury, I pray you listen. This concerneth me only, and thereto this I answer. True it is, that at my first arrival into Rome (which is now about ten years past) it was my hap to have access to the said cardinal, who having some liking of me, would have been the means to prefer me to any place of service, whereunto I should have most fancy; but I being resolved what course to take, answered, that I meant not to serve any man, but to enter into the Society of Jesus, thereof to vow and to be professed. Then being demanded further, what opinion I had conceived of the Bull; I said, it procured much severity in England, and the heavy hand of her majesty against the catholics. Whereunto the cardinal replied, that he doubted not but it should be mitigated in such sort, that the catholics should acknowledge her highness as their queen without danger of excommunication: and this was all the speech I had with the cardinal, which can in no wise be construed as an offence, and therefore, much less as the least point of Treason.

Queen's Counsel. We can impute no more by your words than a mitigation of the Bull against the catholics only; so that the principal, which was the excommunication of her majesty, was left still in force, not detected by you, and therefore your privy thereto concludeth you a Traitor.

Campion. My privy thereto enforceth not consenting; nay, rather it proveth my disagreement, in that I said it procured much severity, and therefore being here published before I could detect it (for who knew not that the queen of England was excommunicated) it excused my privy and exempted me from Treason.

Queen's Counsel. You had conference with the bishop of Ross, a professed papist and a mortal enemy to the state and crown of England; and to what end should any such communication be had; but for the practising of such Treasons as had been conspired?

Campion. What the bishop of Ross is, either for religion or affection, I think little pertinent to me, much less to this purpose; but as for the Conference past between him and me, I utterly deny that ever there was any, and therefore let it be proved.

The Clerk of the Crown read a Letter sent from Dr. Allen unto Dr. Sanders in Ireland, wherein Allen sheweth why the Insurrection in the North prevailed not, was in two respects, either that God reserved England for a greater plague, or for that the catholics in other places had not intelligence of the purpose; for otherwise, that could not so badly have succeeded; in this Letter moreover was contained that ——— feared the war as a child doth the rod, and that ——— at all times will be ready with 200 to aid him.

Queen's Counsel. What an army and host of men, the Pope by the aid of the king of Spain and the duke of Florence had levied for the overthrow of this realm, the destruction of her majesty, and the placing of the Scottish queen as governess in England, could not any ways have escaped your knowledge; for being sent from Prague, where your abode was, to Rome, and then by the Pope charged presently towards England, what other drift could this, such a sudden ambassage; portend, than the practising and execution of such a Conspiracy? Whereof you are also the more to be suspected, for as much as in your coming from Rome towards England, you entered into a certain privy conference with Dr. Allen to break these matters to the English Papists to withdraw the people from their due allegiance and to prepare them to receive these foreign powers.

Campion. When I was received into the Order of Jesuits, I vowed three things, incident to my calling, Chastity, Poverty and Obedience. Chastity in abstaining from all fleshly appetites and concupiscences. Poverty in despising all worldly wealth lying upon the devotion of others. Obedience in dutifully executing the commandment of my superiors. In respect of which Vow inveighing obedience, I came, being sent for from Prague to Rome, having not so much as the smallest inkling of these supposed armies, nor the least inclination to put any such thing in practice, but there rested for eight days attending the pleasure of my provost, who at last according to my Vow (which, by the grace of God, I will in no case violate) appointed me to undertake this Journey into England, which, accordingly, I enterprized, being commanded thereunto not as a Traitor to conspire the subversion of my country, but as a priest to minister the Sacraments, to hear Confessions; the which ambassage I protest before God I would as gladly have executed and was as ready and willing to discharge, had I been sent to the Indians, or uttermost regions in the world, as I was being sent into my native country. In the which voyage I cannot deny but that I dined with Dr. Allen at Rheims, with whom also after dinner I walked in his garden, spending our time in speeches which referred to our old familiarity and acquaintance; during the whole course thereof (I take God to witness) not one iota of our talk glanced to the crown or state of England; neither had I the least notice of any Letters sent to Sanders, nor the smallest glimmering of these objected platforms.—Then, as for being Procurator from the pope and Dr. Allen, I must needs say there could no one thing have been inferred more contrary, for as concerning the one, he flatly with charge and commandment excused me from matters of state and regiment; the other sought no such duty and obedience unto as to execute matters repugnant to my charge. But admitting (as I protest he did not) that Dr. Allen had communicated such affairs unto me: yet for that he was not my superior it had been full apostacy in me to obey him. Dr. Allen for his learning and good religion I reverence, but neither was I his subject or inferior, nor he the man at whose commandment I rested.

Queen's Counsel. Were it not that your dealing afterwards had fully bewrayed you, your present Speech perhaps had been more credible; but all afterclaps make those excuses but shadows, and your deeds and actions prove your words but forged; for what meaning had that changing of your name, whereto belonged your disguising in apparel, can these alterations be wrought without suspicion? Your name being Campion, why were you called Hastings? You a priest and dead to the world, what pleasure had you to royst that? A velvet hat and a feather, a buff leather jerkin, velvet venetians, are they weeds for dead men? Can that beseech a professed man of religion which hardly becometh a layman of gravity? No; there was a further matter intended; your lurking and lying hid in secret places, concludeth with the rest, a mischievous meaning: had you come hither for love of your country, you would never have wrought in—; or had your intent been to have done well, you would never have hated the light, and therefore this beginning decyphereth your Treason.

Campion. At what time the primitive church was persecuted and that Paul laboured in the propagation and increase of the Gospel, it is not unknown, to what straits and pinches he and his fellows were diversely driven, wherein though in purpose he were already resolved rather to yield himself to martyrdom, than to shrink an inch from the truth he preached; yet if any hope or means appeared to escape, and if living he might benefit the church more than dying, we read of sundry shifts whereto he betook him, to increase God's number and to shew persecution; but especially the changing of his name was very oit and familiar, whereby as opportunity and occasion was ministered, he termed himself now Paul now Saul; neither was he of opinion always to be known, but sometime thought it expedient to be hidden, least being discovered persecution should ensue, and thereby the Gospel greatly forestalled. Such was his meaning, so was his purpose, when being in penance for points of religion he secretly stole out of prison in a basket. If these shifts were then approved, why are they now reproved in me? he an Apostle, I a Jesuit.

Were they commended in him, are they condemned in me, the same cause was common to both, and shall the effect be peculiar to the one? I wished earnestly the planting of the gospel. I knew a contrary religion professed. I saw if I were known I should be apprehended. I changed my name: I kept secretly. I imitated Paul. Was I therein a traitor? But the wearing of a buff jerkin, a velvet hat, and such like is much forced against me, as though the wearing of any apparel were treason, or that I in so doing were ever the more a traitor. I am not indicted upon the statute of Apparel, neither is it any part of this present arraignment. Indeed, I acknowledge an offence to God for so doing, and thereof it did grievously repent me and therefore do now penance as you see me.

He was newly shaven, in a rug gown, and a great blacking strap covering half his face, &c.

The Clerk of the Crown read a Letter sent from Campion unto one Pound a catholic, part of the contents whereof was this, "It grieveth me much to have offended the catholic cause so highly, as to confess the Names of some gentlemen and friends in whose houses I had been entertained: yet in this I greatly cherish and comfort myself, that I never discovered any secrets there declared, and that I will not, come Rack, come Rope."

Queen's Counsel. What can sound more suspiciously or nearer unto Treason, than this Letter? It grieveth him to have bewrayed his favourers the catholics, and therein he thinketh to have wrought prejudice to Religion. What, then, may we think of that he concealeth? It must needs be some grievous matter and very precious, that neither the Rack nor the Rope can wring from him. For his conscience being not called in question nor sifted in any point of religion, no doubt, if there had not been further devices and affairs of the state and commonwealth attempted, we should as well have discovered the matter as the person; wherefore, it were well these hidden secrets were revealed, and then would appear the very face of these treasons.

Campion. As I am by profession and calling a priest so have I singly vowed all conditions and covenants to such a charge and vocation belonging, whereby I sustain an office and duty of priesthood that consisteth in sharing and hearing confessions, in respect whereof at my first consecration (as all other priests so accepted must do) I solemnly took and vowed to God never to disclose any secrets confessed. The force and effect of which vow is such as whereby every priest is bound, under danger of perpetual curse and damnation, never to disclose any offence opened nor infirmity whatsoever committed to his hearing. By virtue of this profession and due execution of my priesthood, I was accustomed to be privy to divers mens secrets, and those not such as concerned State or Commonwealth, whereunto my authority was not extended, but such as so charged the grieved soul and conscience whereof I had power to pray for absolution. These were the hidden matters, these were the secrets in concerning of which I so greatly rejoiced, to the revealing whereof I cannot, nor will not be brought, come Rack, come Rope.

Thereupon the Clerk of the Crown read certain Papers containing in them Oaths to be ministered to the people for the renouncing their Obedience to her majesty and the swearing of Allegiance to the pope, acknowledging him for their Supreme Head and Governor, the which Papers were found in divers houses where Campion had lurked, and for Religion been entertained.

Queen's Counsel. What can be more apparent than this? These Oaths; if we went no further, are of themselves sufficient to convince you of Treason; for what may be imagined more traitorous than to alien the hearts of the subjects from her majesty, renouncing their obedience to her, and swearing their subjection to the pope? And therefore these Papers thus found in houses were you where, do clearly prove that for ministering such Oaths, you are a Traitor.

Campion. Neither is these, neither can there be any thing imagined more directly contrary or repugnant to my calling, as upon any occasion to minister an Oath: neither had I any power or authority so to do: neither would I commit an Offence so thwart to my profession, for all the substance and treasure in the world. But admit I were authorized, what necessity importeth that reason, that neither being set down by my hand writing nor otherwise derived by any Proof from myself, but only found in places where I resorted, therefore I should be he by whom they were ministered. This is but a naked presumption (who seeth it not) and nothing vehement nor of force against me.

Anderson. It could not otherwise be intended but that you ministered those Oaths, and that being found behind you it was you that left them.—For if a poor man and a rich man come both to one house, and that after their departure a bag of gold be found hidden, for us much as the poor man had no such plenty, and therefore could leave no such bag behind him, by common presumption it is to be intended, that the rich man only and no other did hide it. So you a professed papist, coming to a house, and there such reliques found after your departure, how can it otherwise be implied than that you did both bring them and leave them there, so it is flat they came there by means of a papist; ergo by your means.

Campion. Your conclusion had been necessary if you had also shewed that none came into the house of my profession but I; but here you urge your conclusion before you fraine your minor; ergo it proveth not.

Anderson. If here as you do in schools you bring in your minor and conclusion, you will prove a fool; but minor or conclusion, I will bring it to purpose anon.

Queen's Counsel. You refuse to swear to the Supremacy, a notorious token of an evil willer to the crown; insomuch as being demanded by the Commissioners, whether the Bull wherewith Pius the 2nd, had excommunicated her majesty, wherein your opinion of force or no, you would answer nothing, but that these were bloody questions, and that they which sought these, sought your life: also resembling the Commissioners unto the Pharisees, who to entrap Christ propounded a dilemma, whether tribute were to be paid to Cæsar or no; so that in your Examination you would come to no issue, but sought your evasions and made Answers aloof, which vehemently argueth a guiltiness of conscience, in that the truth would never have sought covers.

The two Commissioners, Mr. Norton and Mr. Hamon, were present, and certified the matter as the Queen's Counsel had urged it.

Campion. Not long since it pleased her majesty to demand of me whether I did acknowledge her to be my queen or no. I answered that I did acknowledge her highness not only as my queen but as my most lawful governess, and being further required of her majesty whether I thought the pope might lawfully excommunicate her or no, I confessed myself an insufficient umpire between her majesty and the pope, for so high a controversy, whereof neither the certainty is as yet known, nor the best divines in Christendom stand fully resolved. Albeit I thought that if the pope should do it; yet it might be insufficient, for it is agreed clavis errare potest, but the divines of the catholic church do distinguish of the pope's authority, attributing unto him ordination and inordination, potestatem, ordinatem, whereby he proceedeth in matters merely spiritual and pertinent to the church, and by that he cannot excommunicate any prince or potentate, Inordinatem, when he passeth by order of law, as by Appeals and suchlike, and so as some think, he may excommunicate and depose princes. The self same Articles were required of me by the Commissioners, but much more urged to the point of Supremacy and to further suppositions than I could think of. I said, indeed, they were bloody questions, and very pharisaical, undermining of my life; whereunto I answered as Christ did to the dilemma, Give unto Cæsar that is due to Cæsar, and to God that to God belongeth! I acknowledge her highness as my governess and sovereign. I acknowledged her majesty both facto et jure, to be queen. I confessed an obedience due to the crown as to my temporal head and primate. This I said then, this I say now. If, then, I failed in ought, I am now ready to supply it. What would you more? I willingly pay to her majesty what is hers, yet I must pay to God what is his. Then, as for excommunicating her majesty, it was exacted of me, admitting that Excommunication were of effect, and that the pope had sufficient authority so to do, whether then I thought myself discharged of my allegiance or no? I said this was a dangerous question, and they that demanded this demanded my blood. But I never admitted any such matter, neither ought I to be wrested with any such suppositions. What, then, say they, because I would not answer flatly to that which I could not, forsooth I sought corners; mine answers were aloof. Well, since once more it must needs be answered, I say generally that these matters be merely spiritual points of doctrine and disputable in schools, no part of mine Indictment, not to be given in evidence, and unfit to be discussed at the King's Bench. To conclude, they are no matters of fact; they be not in the Trial of the country, the Jury ought not to take any notice of them; for although I doubt not but they are very discreet men and trained up in great use and experience of controversies and debates pertinent to their callings, yet they are laymen, they are unfit judges to decide so deep a question.

Eliot, a Witness, deposed against Campion, that he made a Sermon in Berkshire, his text being of Christ weeping over Jerusalem, wherein Campion sheweth many vices and enormities here abounding in England, and namely heresies, wherewith he was sorry that his countrymen were so blinded; but hoped shortly there would hap a day of change comfortable to the catholics, now shaken and dispersed, and terrible to the heretics here flourishing in the land.

Queen's Counsel. See, what would you wish more manifest. The great day is threatened, comfortable to them, and terrible to us, and what day should that be, but that wherein the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Florence have appointed to invade this realm.

Campion. O Judas! Judas! no other day was in my mind, I protest, than that wherein it should please God to make a restitution of faith and religion. For as in all other Christian commonwealths, so in England, many vices and indignities do abound, neither is there any realm so godly, no people so devout, no where so religious, but that in the same very places many enormities do flourish, and evil men bear sway and regiment. Whereupon, as in every pulpit every protestant doth, I pronounced a great day, not wherein any temporal potentate should muster, but wherein the terrible Judge should reveal all men's consciences, and try every man of each kind of religion. This is the day of change, this is the Great Day which I threatened, comfortable to the well-being, and terrible to all heretics. Any other day than this, God he knows, I meant not.

Munday, a Witness, deposed that he heard the Englishmen, as the Doctor and others, talk and conspire of these Treasons against England, and that Campion and others afterward had conference with Dr. Allen.

Campion. Here is nothing deposed against me directly, and as for any Conference with Dr. Allen, that hath appeared when and what it was.

Evidence was next given against Sherwin, who before the Commissioners had refused to swear to the Supremacy, neither would answer plainly what he thought of the Pope's Bull, but confessed that his coming into England was to persuade the people to the catholic religion.

Queen's Counsel. You well knew that it was not lawful for you to persuade the queen's subjects to any other religion, than by her highness's instructions is already professed, and therefore if there had not been a further matter in your meaning, you would have kept your conscience to yourself, and yourself where you were.

Sherwin. We read that the apostles and fathers in the primitive church have taught and preached in the dominions and empires of ethnical and heathen rulers, and yet not deemed worthy of death. The sufferance perhaps and the like toleration I well hoped for in such a Commonwealth, as where open Christianity and godliness is pretended, and albeit in such a diversity of religion, it was to be feared lest I should not discharge my conscience without fear of danger, yet ought I not therefore to surcrease in my functions, although that conscience is very wandering and unsteady which with fear of danger draweth from duty.

One of the Judges. But your case differeth from theirs in the primitive church, for that those apostles and preachers never conspired the death of the emperors and rulers in whose dominions they so taught and preached.

The Clerk of the Crown read a Letter which sheweth that by the fireside in the English seminary beyond the seas, Sherwin should say, That if he were in England he could compass many things. That there was one Arundle in Cornwall who at an instant could levy a great power, and that if an army were to be sent into England the best landing would be at St. Michael's Mount.

Sherwin. I never spake any such matter, God is my record; neither ever was it the least part of my meaning.

Bosgrave's Opinion was read, wherein he had denied the Supremacy, and staggered without any perfect answer to the Bull, but said that he came into England to persuade and teach, acknowledging her majesty his queen and temporal head. In which Examination he confessed, that beyond the seas he heard it reported how the pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Florence would send a great army into England to deprive the queen's majesty both of life and dignity, for the restitution of the catholic religion.

Queen's Counsel. The keeping close and not detecting of Treason maketh the bearer of it to become a Traitor, and therefore, in as much as you concealed what you heard, and made not information of it to her majesty, the council, nor the commonalty of this realm, you became thereby privy and party unto it, and therefore in these respects you are a Traitor.

Bosgrave. What? am I a traitor because I heard it spoken?

But Campion perceiving Bosgrave merely daunted with the matter, spake to excuse him in manner as followeth:

Campion. My lord, it is not unknown to your honour how brittle and slippery ground fame and reports are wont to be built on; the which as for the most part they are more false than credible, so ought they always to make men wary and fearful to deal with them, inso-much that the broacher of rumours and news, is he that commonly getteth least credit or thanks for his labour. The cause is the property and nature of fame, which is never but uncertain and sometime but forged; for who findeth it not by daily experience, how that in every city, every village, yea, and in most barber's shops in all England, many speeches both of estates and commonwealths be tossed which were never meant nor determined of in the court: If it be so in England, shall we not look for the like in Italy, Flanders, France, and Spain? Yes truly; for though the countries do differ, yet the nature of the men remaineth the same, namely, always desirous and greedy of news. Many things there be diversely reported and diversely canvassed by the common sort which never were intended by the bearers of rule and principality. Were it not then a great point of credulity for a man divided from England by many seas and lands, upon a matter only blazed among the vulgar people, either by journey or letter to certify the queen's counsel or commonality of things never purposed, much less put in practice. I think rather Mr. Bosgrave's discretion to have been greater in passing such dangerous occasions with themselves, than otherwise it had been in using means to bewray them. But, suppose he had done as you would have had him, and what he heard there he had signified here? What had come of it, marry then, greater danger for slandering the realm, and here little thanks for his false information. So that if he would deal either wisely or safely, how could he deal better than to do as he did?

Attorney General. There is no cloth so coarse, but Campion can cast a colour on it. But what was it not Bosgrave's own confession that he arrived into England to teach and persuade the people, and what persuasions should they be but to prepare a readiness for these wars?

Campion. These be but faint and bare im-plications, which move but urge not, affirm but prove not; whereas you ought not to amplify and gather upon words when a matter concerneth and toucheth a man's life.

Cottam in his Examination would neither agree to the Supremacy, nor answer directly concerning the pope's authority.

Queen's Council. You came into England at or near the same time that the rest came; so that it must needs be intended a match made between you, for the furtherance of those which were then brewing, and how answer you thereunto?

Cottam. It was neither my purpose nor my message to come into England, neither would I have come had not God otherwise driven me, for my journey was appointed to the Indians, and thither had I been, had my health been thereto answerable, but in the mean whiles, at pleased God to visit me with sickness, and being counsel by the physicians for my health's sake to come into England for otherways as they said either remaining there or going elsewhere I should not recover it. I came upon that occasion and upon no other into this realm.

Campion. Indeed the physicians in Rome have held for certainty that if an Englishman shall fall sick amongst them, there is no better nor scarce any other way for his health, than to repair into England, there to take his natural air which best agreeth with his complexion.

Cottam. And that only was the cause, and not any determinate intent either to persuade or dissuade, being otherwise by my provost charged to the Indians. Neither after my arrival here did I hide myself nor deal otherwise, than might beseem any man that meddled no more than I did. I lay for the most part in Southwark, I walked daily in Paul's. I refrained no place, which betokened my innocency.

Queen's Council. Did you neither persuade nor dissuade? was there not a Book found in your budget, the contents whereof tended to no other purpose, the which was made by one Dr. Espigneta intitled Tractatus conscientia, containing certain Answers unto the Supremacy, how superficially to frustrate any kind of demand, with a further method how you ought to demean yourself in every kind of company, whether it were of Protestants or Puritans, and what speeches you should use to convert them both; as unto the Protestants highly commending them and shewing that they are far nearer the right way then the Puritans, and whom you should utterly dispraise unto the Puritans, likewise in commending the Protestants and persuading them to the obedience of the pope? to what end then should you carry this book about you if you were not purposed to do as it prescribeth?

Cottam. I protest before God I knew nothing of that Book, neither how nor when it came to me.

Then Campion, seeing him driven to so narrow an exigent as to deny that which was manifest, answered for him to this effect following:

Campion. Many casualties and events may happen whereby a man may be endangered ere he beware, by the carrying of a thing whereof he knoweth not, as either the malice of others that privily convey it amongst other his provisions, or his own negligence or over sight which marked not attentively what he took with him, whereof both are to be judged his errors yet not deemed an offence. And therefore this cannot be maintained to be done by Mr. Cottam on purpose, which we see stably to be out of his knowledge. But, suppose that purposely he brought the book with him, yet what can that make against him for Treason? It treateth of conscience; it toucheth good demeanour; it sheweth how to make the unbelieving faithful matters wholly spiritual, points of edification, preparing to Godwards, where is then the Treason? But were these reasons impertinent, yet it is a custom with all students beyond the seas, when any man learned or well thought of draweth a treatise touching either conscience or good behaviour to copy it out and to carry it about with them, not thereby aiming at any faction or conspiracy, but for their own proper knowledge and private instruction.

Johnson would neither grant to the Supremacy, neither held any resolute opinion of the pope's authority in his Bulls and Excommunications.

Eliot, a Witness, deposed against Johnson, that at Christ's Nativity come two years being at my lady Peter's house, he fell into acquaintance with one Pain a priest, that exercised the office of a steward in the house, who by reason that he was appointed to be his bedfellow grew into a further familiarity with him, in so much that at length he ventured to dissuade him from his Allegiance to her majesty, and to become subject to the Pope; affirming, that her highness could not live for ever, and that shortly after her days the Catholic religion should be restored. For the furtherance whereof the Catholics beyond the seas had already devised a practice, which is this, that fifty of them (whereof either should know other) should come to the court furnished with privy coats, pocket dagger and two-handed swords, attending until her majesty should take the air or go on some petty progress, and then some of them should set upon her majesty, some upon the Lord Treasurer, some upon the earl of Leicester, some upon sir Francis Walsingham, and others upon others the favourers of this heretical religion, there to kill her majesty and take her by the hair of the head unto an horse to be lugged and haled up and down to the joy of all Catholics and distress of all heretics, of which so Pain asked this deponent if he would be one; adding further that if he had place and opportunity convenient he would stab her majesty with a dagger himself, for he thought it no more unlawful to kill her than to kill a brute beast. After which communication Pain not finding this Deponent so conformable unto him as he hoped, and receiving a bitter and flat refusal of his ungracious proffer, conveyed himself away and was no more to be heard of. Whereupon this Johnson now arraigned came to the Deponent and enquired what was become of Pain, to whom he answered, that he knew not. Then said Johnson, he is gone beyond the seas for fear you would discover his secrets, and therefore here I forewarn and conjure you not to disclose any thing that Pain hath told you, for if you do you stand in state of damnation.

Johnson. I never in my life had any such talk with him, nor uttered any such speeches tending to any such matter.

Bristowe's Examination was read, wherein he had acknowledged her majesty his lawful queen and governess, and that notwithstanding ought that the pope had done or could do, she was his Supreme Head.

Queen's Counsel. What was then the cause of your coming into this realm? for it seemeth by your sudden arrival and journeying with the rest that that you were also a party, and furtherer of their purpose.

Bristow. I have to my mother a poor widow, who besides had one other son, with the company of whom during his life she was well paid; but it pleased God afterwards to dispose him at his mercy and to deprive my mother of his future succour. She taking the matter very heavily, used what means she might possible for my return, she sent letters after letters, and those so importunate that while I could, I must needs come home. The which was the only cause of my arrival and not any other, God is my witness.

Munday. Anthony Munday deposed against Bristow, that he should say he was cunning in fire works, and that shortly he would make a confection of wildfire, wherewith he would burn her majesty when she were on the Thames in her barge, and the deponent swore further, that he heard it spoken beyond the seas, that whosoever had not the watchword, which was "Jesus Maria," should be slain.

Bristow. I call God to witness I never suffered such thoughts, nor never had any such cunning in fire works, and therefore he sweareth the greatest untruth that may be.

Kirbie in his Examination for the Supremacy and the pope's authority, was of no other opinion than was Campion.

Steldon, a Witness, deposed against Kirbie that being beyond the seas this Kirbie came to his bedside and counselled him to beware how he dealt with any matters in England, for there would come a great day wherein the pope, the king of Spain and the duke of Florence, should make as great an alteration as ever was. He deposed, that Kirbie was at a sermon of Dr. Allen's, who then persuaded the priests and seminary men to take their journey into England, to remove the Englishmen from their obedience to her highness, and to persuade them to aid the pope and his confederates. He deposed, moreover, that beyond the seas he spake with one Tedder a familiar friend of Kirbie's, of whom he Deponent demanded, whether he were of kin to her majesty, for that his name was Tedder, whereunto he answered, that if he knew himself of kin to that Whore of Babylon, that Jezebel of England, he would think the worse of himself as long as he lived, but one day he would make a journey into England, and if it were possible dispatch her out of the way.

Kirbie. As I hope to be saved at the last Doom, there is not one word of this Deposition, that concerneth me, either true or credible, neither at any time made I the least mention of that alledged day, neither was I present at any Sermon so preached, but I always bore as true and faithful heart to her majesty as any subject whosoever did in England, insomuch that I never heard her majesty evil spoken of, but I defended her cause and always spake the best of her highness: it is not unknown that I saved English mariners from hanging, only for the duty I bore to her majesty with the love and good will which I bore to my country, but you that have thus deposed, when was this Sermon (that you talk of) so preached? at what time of the day?

The Witness answered, that the same day there were three philosophic Disputations, after the which the Sermon was preached.

Orton would neither agree to the Supremacy, or openly affirm what authority the pope had, nor whether he thought the excommunication sent from pope Pius V. to be of force or no.

Munday, a Witness, deposed against Orton, that he being at Lions in France said unto this deponent, that her majesty was not lawful queen of England, and that he ought her no kind of obedience: the deponent said further, that this Orton made suit unto Dr. Allen, that he might be one of the pope's Pensioners, whereunto Dr. Allen would not agree, unless Orton would become a priest or seminary man, which he refused.

Orton. I utterly deny that I ever had any speech with the Witness, either at Lions or elsewhere, but he manifestly forswearth himself as one that having neither honesty nor religion, careth for neither.

The same all the parties indicted did affirm, and that he was an Atheist; for that beyond the seas he went on pilgrimage, and received the Sacrament, making himself a Catholic, and here he taketh a new face and playeth the Protestant, and therefore is an unfit and unworthy Witness to give in evidence or depose against life.

Munday, the Witness, answered, That in France and other places he seemed to favour their religion, because he might thereby undermine them and sift out their purposes.

The Prisoners took exception to another of the Witnesses, which of them I know not, for that he was a murderer, and had slain two men already well known by his own Confession and acknowledgment: for the which reason he was no sufficient nor allowable Witness.

These matters thus sifted, and that the Jury should pass, one of the Justices said to the Jurors, All the matter resteth in this, whether to believe the Prisoners that speak for their lives, or the Witnesses that come freely to depose as they are demanded, the Witnesses affirm sufficient Proof against them; they deny whatsoever is alledged.

Lord Chief Justice. You that be here indicted, you see what is alledged against you. In discharge whereof, if you have any more to say, speak, and we will hear you until to-morrow morning. We would be loth you should have any occasion to complain on the court, and therefore, if ought rest behind that is untold, that is available for you, speak and you shall be heard with indifference.

They all thanked his lordship, and said they could not otherwise affirm but that they had found of the Court both indifference and justice.—Whereupon Campion made this Speech to the Jurors.

Campion. What charge this day you sustain, and what accompt you are to render at the dreadful Day of Judgment, whereof I would wish this also were a mirrour, I trust there is not one of you but knoweth. I doubt not but in like manner you forecast how dear the innocent is to God, and at what price he holdeth man's blood. Here we are accused and impleaded to the death; here you do receive our lives into your custody; here must be your choice, either to restore them or condemn them. We have no whither to appeal, but to your consciences; we have no friends to make there but your heads and discretions. Take heed, I beseech you, let no colours nor inducements deceive you; let your ground be substantial, for your building is weighty. All this you may do sufficiently, we doubt not if you will mark intently what things have been treated, in three distinct and several points. The speech and discourse of this whole day consisteth, first, in Presumptions and Probabilities; secondly, in matters of Religion; lastly, in Oaths and Testimonies of Witnesses. The weak and forceless Proof that proceedeth from conjectures are neither worthy to carry the Verdict of so many, nor sufficient evidence for trial of man's life. The constitutions of the realm exact a necessity, and will that no man should totter upon the hazard of likelihoods; and albeit the strongest reasons of our accusers have been but in bare and naked Probabilities, yet are they no matters for you to rely upon who ought only to regard what is apparent. Set circumstances aside, set presumptions apart, set that reason for your rule which is warranted by certainty. But Probabilities were not the only matters which impertinently have been discussed, they were also points of doctrine and religion, as excommunications, books, and pamphlets, wherein a great part of the day hath been as unfitly consumed. Inasmuch as this very day, you have heard not only us, but also the pope, the king of Spain, the duke of Florence, Allen, Sanders, Bristow, Espigneta, and many more arraigned. What force excommunications be of, what authority is due to the bishop of Rome, how mens consciences must be instructed, are no matters of fact, nor triable by Jurors, but points yet disputed and not resolved in Schools, how then can be determined by you, though wise, yet lay, though otherwise experienced, yet herein ignorant. But were it so that for your knowledge and skill in divinity ye might seem approved censurers of so high a controversy, yet are they no part of all our Indictment, and therefore not to be respected by the Jury. You perchance would ask of me, if these prove nought against us, what then should we enquire of, for these, set aside the rest, is almost nothing? pardon me, I pray you, our innocency is such that if all were cut off, that hath been objected either weakly or untruly against us, there would indeed rest nothing that might prove us guilty, but I answer unto you, that what remaineth be Oaths, and those not to rest as proofs unto you but to be duly examined and fully considered, whether they be true and their deponents of credit. In common matters we often see witnesses impealed, and if at any time, their credit be little, it ought then to be least when they swear against life. Call I pray you to your remembrance how faintly some have deposed, how coldly others, how untruly the rest; especially two who have testified most. What truth may you expect from their mouths, the one hath confessed himself a murderer, the other well known a detestable Atheist, a profane heathen, a destroyer of two men already. On your consciences would you believe them? They that have betrayed both God and man, they that have left nothing to swear by, neither religion nor honesty. Though you would believe them, can you? I know your wisdom is greater, your consciences uprighter; esteem of them as they be, examine the other two, you shall find two of them precisely to affirm that we or any of us have practised ought that might be prejudicial to this state or dangerous to this commonwealth. God give you grace to weigh our causes aright, and have respect to our own consciences, and so I will keep the Jury no longer. I commit the rest to God, and our convictions to your good discretions.

The Jury departed under their Warden's custody, where they staid an hour, and then returned and pronounced all Guilty.

Anderson. Forasmuch as these Prisoners here indicted and arraigned in their Arraignment undertook to be tried by God and their country, and by the Verdict of a whole Jury, directly and by most sufficient and manifest Evidence, are found Guilty of the said Treasons and Conspiracies: we pray your lordship to accept of the Verdict, and in her majesty's behalf to give Judgment against them as Traitors.

Lord Chief Justice. Campion and the rest, what can you say, why you should not die.

Campion. It was not our death that ever we feared. We knew that we were not lords of our own lives, and therefore for want of answer would not be guilty of our own deaths. The only thing that we have now to say is, that if our Religion do make us Traitors we are worthy to be condemned; but otherwise are and have been as true subjects as ever the Queen had any.*

Lord Chief Justice. You must go to the place from whence you came, and there to remain until, &c. from thence, &c. you must be drawn &c. unto the place of execution. †

All the Prisoners, after this Judgment given, stormed in countenance, crying they were as true and faithful subjects as ever the queen had any. Only Campion suppressed his affection and said thus:

[Here follows a rhapsodical collection of scraps of texts of Scripture, and of heads of arguments for and against some Doctrines of the church of Rome. It is not inserted, because the MS. is in some places illegible, in others unintelligible, and because no part of it's contents, seems to have any peculiar relation to the Trial.]

* "Edmund Campion was born in London 1540, and educated at Christ's Hospital, where he delivered an oration before queen Mary at her Accession. He was afterwards elected to St. John's College Oxford, by Wite, the Founder, and received great applause for an oration which he spoke before queen Elizabeth, when she visited the University. In 1568 he went to Ireland, and wrote an History of the country, in two books; but the suspicion of favouring the Catholic tenets rendered him unpopular, and he fled to the Low Countries. Here he renounced Protestantism, and entered into the body of the Jesuits at Douay, and from thence passed to Rome, where he was received as a true and useful convert. He wrote a tragedy called 'Nectar and Ambrosia,' which was acted before the Emperor at Vienna, and for six years he taught Rhetoric and Philosophy at Prague, till he was commissioned by Pope Gregory xiii, to pass over to England in 1580. In this delicate employment he used all the arts of cunning and insinuation, but though he seems to have challenged the English clergy to a trial of skill, yet he discovered too much vehemence and impetuosity, and when discovered by the emissaries of Walsingham, he was dragged to the Tower, and being found guilty of High-Treason for adhering to the Pope, the Queen's enemy, he was hanged and quartered at Tyburn, 1st Dec. 1581." CONFESSIONS of EDMUND CAMPION, and other condemned Priests, his Associates, relating to their traitorous Practices against Queen Elizabeth: A. D. 1582. [Morgan's Phoenix Britannicus, 481.]

A PARTICULAR

Declaration, or Testimony,

OF THE

Undutiful and Traiterous Affection, borne against her Majesty,

BY

EDMUND CAMPION, JESUIT.

AND OTHER CONDEMNED PRIESTS, WITNESSED BY THEIR OWN CONFESSIONS; IN REPROOF OF THOSE SLANDEROUS BOOKS AND LIBELS, DELIVERED OUT TO THE CONTRARY, BY SUCH AS ARE MALICIOUSLY AFFECTED TOWARDS HER MAJESTY AND THE STATE.

“ Submit yourselves unto all manner of Ordinance of Man for the Lord's sake, whether it be unto the King, as unto the Superior; or unto Governors, as unto them who are sent of him, for the punishment of Evil Doers, and for the praise of them who do well.” 1 Pet. ii. 13.

Published by Authority.

Imprinted at London, by Christopher Barker, Printer to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty. A. D. 1582.

To all her Majesty's good and faithful Subjects.

ALTHOUGH the course of proceeding in the late Indictment, Arraignment, Trial, Judgment, and Execution of Edmund Campion, and others, being as well upon sundry of their Writings, Letters and Confession, as also, upon other good and manifest proofs, found Guilty of High Treason, was such as ought, in truth and reason, to satisfy all indifferent persons, and well-affected subjects, to whom her majesty's merciful and gracious inclination towards offenders, is so well known: yet hath it been found, that some disloyal and unnatural subjects have untruly spread abroad sundry rumours and reports; and have published divers slanderous Pamphlets, and seditious Libels, as well in this realm, as in foreign parts, in sundry strange languages, in excuse and justification of the said Traitors, so justly executed; with purpose to defame her majesty's honourable course of justice, so much as lieth in them: setting out those condemned persons as men of singular virtue and holiness, and as her highness's true, loyal, devoted, and obedient subjects; and in no wise spotted with any stain of ill-disposed affection towards her majesty; being not otherwise to be charged, than with certain points of Religion, which concerneth only matters of conscience, which were no way prejudicial to her majesty's state and government; with divers like untruths, which are

meant shall be answered hereafter more at large; whereby, both the malice of the writers may be made known to the world, and her majesty's most merciful and gracious government may be preserved from the malice of such unnatural and undutiful subjects.—In the mean time, notwithstanding the lords and others of her majesty's most honourable Privy Council, being desirous that the dutiful subjects, may be preserved from the undermining of such seditious slanderers, whereby, otherwise, they might haply, by such wicked illusions, be carried into some hard conceits, touching the due and lawful Proceeding against the said Traitors; have found it very expedient, that as well certain Confessions taken of the said Campion, and others, before his Arraignment, as also, certain Answers, lately made to certain Articles propounded to those who were, at the same time, condemned of High Treason, but yet spared from Execution, should be published truly and sincerely, in such precise form of words as the same have been acknowledged and subscribed, not only with the proper hands of certain persons of public calling and credit, who were present at their Examination, and have subscribed thereunto; but, also with the proper hands of the Offenders themselves (Hart only excepted) as appeareth by the Originals extant to be shewed; whereby it may be most evidently seen, even by themselves, still persisting in their most traitorous affection, how untruly the said persons are reported to have been, and to be true and faithful subjects, in matter of her majesty's State and Crown; and how justly they were condemned for Treason, and not for Points of Religion: being those, who having been, by her majesty's clemency, so long spared, upon hope of repentance, continue yet still in such traitorous disposition of heart towards her highness; two of them only now acknowledging their duty of Allegiance, though, in points of Religion, not reconciled: as also one other, named Edward Rishton, who did before, openly, at the bar, at the time of the Arraignment, varying from Campion, and the rest of his fellows, therein, acknowledge his said duty and allegiance to her majesty; towards whom, to the end it may appear unto the world, that the said Campion, and the rest who were executed, were not put to death for Points which concerned matters of Conscience, but for Treason, her majesty doth mean to extend her grace and mercy; hoping, that as it hath pleased God to frame their consciences to acknowledge towards her that duty of allegiance, which, by the laws of God and man, they owe unto her, as their most lawful prince and sovereign, so he will, hereafter, open their eyes, to see how dangerously they have been hitherto, through false and erroneous doctrine, seduced, as well in matters concerning their duty towards God, as in their allegiance towards their prince.—It is also looked for, that all such as make profession to be dutiful, and well-affected subjects, howsoever they be affected in Religion, seeing the most dangerous and pernicious Opinions which are held and maintained by these Jesuits, and Seminary-men, sent into this realm, will, hereafter, as well in respect of the duty they owe unto her majesty, as for the care they ought to have, as good members of this realm, to preserve the tranquillity thereof, as a thing which importeth every man's particular duty, not only refuse to receive and harbour such disloyal persons, but also do their uttermost endeavour to apprehend them, and to present them to justice, whereby they may receive such condign punishment, as is meet to be inflicted upon disturbers of the public peace in realms and kingdoms.

DR. SANDERS reporteth: That in the year 1569, Pius Quintus, (the pope) Pontifex Maximus, sent Nicholas Morton, an Englishman, doctor of divinity, into England, to admonish certain catholic noblemen; That Elizabeth, which then governed, was a Heretic, and, for that cause, hath, by very law, lost all dominion and power which she usurped over the catholics, and may freely be accounted, by them, as a heathen, and publican; and that they are not, from thenceforth, bound to obey her laws or commandments.—Whereupon he saith, That many noblemen adventured to deliver their brethren ab hereticorum tyrannide; from the tyranny of the heretics. And, although things fell not out to their expectation, yet he saith; The purposes, or endeavours of these noblemen were to be praised, which wanted not their certain and happy success. For though they were not able to draw the souls of all their brethren out of the pit of Schism, yet both they, themselves, nobly confessed the Catholic faith, and many of them gave their lives for their brethren, which is the highest degree of charity; and the rest of them rescued themselves from the bondage both of schism and of sin, into that freedom wherewith Christ hath made us free.

FOR a full Answer to them all, although the very naming of our catholic martyrs, even of this our time, to any reasonable man, may suffice; as the bishop of Rochester, sir Thomas More, the monks of the Charter-House, with many more under king Henry: and now, of late time, all our holy martyrs, who have been and daily are made, by loss of their livings, by poison, by whipping, by famishing, by banishment, bishops, priests, deans, arch-deacons, knights, esquires, gentlemen, laymen of all sorts; canons, ecclesiastical persons of all sorts; so many, likewise, who have openly suffered; the good earl of Northumberland, D. Story, Felton, the Nortons, M. Woodhouse, M. Plumtree, and so many hundreds of the northern men: such men, both in their life, and at their death, as neither the enemies have to stain them, as their own consciences, their own talk, and the world itself doth bear good witness. Many of them, also, and therefore all of them (because of their own cause) being by God himself approved by miracles most undoubted. Although, I say, no reasonable man will think those stinking martyrs of the heretics worthy, in any respect, to be compared with these most glorious martyrs of the Catholics, yet supposing, &c.

SPEAKING of the Northern Commotion, he saith; Verily, this must needs be imputed to a miracle, that whereas near 500 men of those who took arms for the faith, were taken, and put to death by the heretics, yet there hath not been found any one of them, which hath either forsaken the Catholic faith, or hath accused of any blame the authors of that war.—And a little after, there suffered also a noble martyrdom, in the same cause, two worshipful gentlemen, of the house of Nortons, of whom, the one was called Thomas Norton, the other Christopher; and Christopher was Thomas's brother's son, and Thomas was Christopher's uncle; who both could neither be removed, from their faith, nor be brought to confess Elizabeth to be lawful queen.

Sanders, lib. 7. p. 734.

AFTER a long recital of the Causes which moved Pius Quintus to excommunicate her majesty, he saith; of the fulness of apostolic power, hath declared the said Elizabeth a heretic, and a favourer of heretics: and that such as adhere unto her, in the premises, have incurred the Sentence of Anathema, accursed. Moreover, that she is deprived of her pretended right of the said kingdom; and also, of all and whatsoever dominion, dignity, and privilege. Furthermore, that the nobles, subjects, and peoples of the said realm, and all other which, in any wise whatsoever, have taken oath unto her, are assoiled for ever from such oath, and utterly from all duty of allegiance, fidelity and obedience, even as he then assoiled them by authority of his sentence, and deprived the said Elizabeth of her pretended right of the kingdom, and all other things above-said. And, he hath commanded and forbidden all, and every the nobles, subjects, peoples, and other aforesaid, that they be not so bold to obey her, or her advertisements, commandments, or laws; and whosoever otherwise do, he hath bound with like sentence of curse.

Bristow, in his 6th Motive, fol. 31.

WHEREBY it is manifest, that they do miserably forget themselves, who fear not Excommunications of Pius Quintus, of holy memory, in whom Christ himself, to have spoken and excommunicated, as in St. Paul, they may consider, by the miracles that Christ by him, as by St. Paul, did work.

In his 40th Motive, under the Title, 'Obedient Subjects.'

AND, if at any time it happen, that after long toleration, humbly beseeching, and often admonition, of very wicked and notorious apostates and heretics, no other hope of amendment appearing, but the filthy wretch, daily more and more defiling himself and others, to the huge great heap of their own damnation; that after all this, the sovereign authority of our common pastor in religion, for the saving of souls, do duly discharge us from subjection, and the prince-offender from his dominion: with such grief of the heart it is both done of the pastor, and taken of the people, as if a man should have cut off from his body, for to save the whole, some most principal, but rotten part thereof.

UNDER this title, Insigne Martyrium Johannis Feltoni, &c. he saith of Felton in this manner: For he, let with the love and zeal of the Catholic faith, when he saw, that the (in a manner) desperate health of his country could not be restored but by some most bitter medicine, would not suffer that this sentence of the sovereign pastors should be hidden from his countrymen and neighbours.—And after the farther report of this fact, thus: But when most diligent inquiry was made thereof, John Felton being at length apprehended, shewed himself a worthy witness of Jesus Christ, and of the Supremacy by him ordained.—Under this title; Illustre Martyrium Johannis Sturmi Angli, &c. In the year of our Lord 1571, the 25th of May, being brought to the bar, he was arraigned of High-Treason, as he who had conspired with certain men, in the Low Country, in the city of Antwerp, against Elizabeth, and had attempted to change the schismatical religion, which now reigneth in England, into the Catholic religion. Being permitted to speak for himself, he only pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, denying that the Judges themselves had any power over him, who was now no subject to the English queen, but rather to the king Catholic.—And after farther discourse, of the speech of Dr. Story, and of his Condemnation, he added thus: Story two days after, writing to his wife, who then remained at Lovain, and complaining of the injustice of this Sentence, he advertised her, that he could easily (if the matter had been tried before other Judges) confute what was objected against him, touching the Conspiracy made against Elizabeth; whereof he alledged for witness those with whom he was said to have dealt at Antwerp about this matter: but, because he could not be ignorant of that which he well knew, he could not otherwise plead than he had pleaded. His meaning was, that he well knew, that the pretended queen of England, by the declaratory sentence of the pope, was for manifest Heresy, deprived from all right of the kingdom, and from dominion, and that therefore, no magistrate created by her, and adhering to her, could be acknowledged by him, least himself also should be bound with the same curse.—And in the end: Therefore the first day of June so great a Martyr of God, was thrown upon a hurdle, and drawn to the place of execution. And so concludeth with the report of his Execution*.

The First of August, 1581.

EDMUND CAMPION being demanded: Whether he would acknowledge the publishing of these things before recited, by Sanders, Bristow and Allen, to be wicked in the whole, or in any part: and whether he doth, at this present, acknowledge her majesty to be a true and lawful queen, or a pretended queen, and deprived, and in possession of her crown only de facto? He answereth to the First: That he meddleth neither to nor fro, and will not farther answer, but requireth that they may answer. To the Second he saith: That this question dependeth upon the fact of Pius Quintus, whereof he is not to judge; and therefore refuseth farther to answer. EDMUND CAMPION. This was thus answered and subscribed by Edmund Campion, the day and year above written, in the presence of us, Owen Hopton, Robert Beal, Jo. Hammond, Thomas Norton,

Short Extracts out of Briant and Sherwin's Confessions.

Alexander Briant.—He is content to affirm, that the queen is his sovereign lady; but he will not affirm, that she is so lawfully, and ought so to be, and to be obeyed by him as her subject, if the pope declare or command the contrary. And he saith, that this question is too high, and dangerous for him to answer.—The 6th of May, 1581, before Owen Hopton, kn. John Hammond, and Thomas Norton. Whether the pope have authority to withdraw from obedience to her majesty, he knoweth not. ALEXANDER BRIANT. The 7th of May, 1581.

Being asked; Whether the pope's Bull of Deprivation of the queen, were a lawful Sentence or no? He refuseth to answer.—Being asked; Whether the queen be his lawful sovereign, and so ought to continue, notwithstanding any sentence that the pope can give? Whether the queen's majesty be a lawful queen, and ought to be obeyed by the subjects of England, notwithstanding the Bull of Pius Quintus, or any other Bull or Sentence that the pope hath pronounced, or may pronounce, against her majesty? 3. Whether the pope have, or had power, to authorize the earls of Northumberland and Westmorland*, and other her majesty's subjects, to rebel, or take arms against her majesty, or to authorize Dr. Saunders,† or others, to invade Ireland, or any other her dominions, and to bear arms against her, and whether they did therein lawfully or no? 4. Whether the pope have power to discharge any of her highness's subjects, or the subjects of any christian prince, from their allegiance, or oath of obedience to her majesty, or to their prince, for any cause? 5. Whether the said Dr. Saunders, in his book of the 'Visible Monarchy of the Church, and Dr. Bristow‡, in his Book of Motives (writing in allowance, commendation, and confirmation of the said Bull of Pius Quintus) have therein taught, testified, or maintained a truth, or a falsehood? 6. If the pope do, by his Bull, or Sentence, pronounce her majesty to be deprived, and no lawful queen, and her subjects to be discharged of their allegiance, and obedience unto her; and after, if the pope, or any other, by his appointment and authority, do invade this realm, which part would you take, or which part ought a good subject of England to take?

Luke Kirby's Answer.

To the 1st he saith, that the resolution of this Article dependeth upon the general question; Whether the pope may, for any cause, depose a prince; Wherein his opinion is, that, for some Causes, he may lawfully depose a prince, and that such a sentence ought to be obeyed.—To the 2nd, he thinketh, that, in some cases (as Infidelity, or such like) her majesty is not to be obeyed, against the Pope's Bull and Sentence; for so, he saith, he hath read, that the pope hath so done, de facto, against other princes.—To the 3rd, he saith, he cannot answer it.—To the 4th, that the pope (for Infidelity) hath such power, as is mentioned in this Article.—To the 5th, he thinketh, that both Dr. Saunders, and Dr. Bristowe might be deceived, in those Points of their Books; but whether they were deceived or not, he referreth to God.—To the last, he saith, that when the case shall happen, he must then take counsel, what were best for him to do. Thomas Cottom's Answer.

To the first, in this and all other questions, he believeth as the Catholic church (which he taketh to be the church of Rome) teacheth him. And other Answer he maketh not, to any of the rest of these Articles, By me THOMAS COTTOM, Priest. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

Lawrence Richardson's Answer.

To the Fifth Article, he answereth, That so far as Dr. Saunders, and Dr. Bristowe agree with the Catholic doctrine of the church of Rome, he alloweth that doctrine to be true. And touching the first, and all the rest of the Articles, he saith, that, in all matters not repugnant to the Catholic Religion, he professeth obedience to her majesty, and otherwise maketh no Answer to any of them; but believeth therein, as he is taught by the Catholic church of Rome. LAW. RICHARDSON. (Witness) John Popham, Tho. Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

Thomas Ford's Answer.

To the first, he saith, That he cannot answer, because, he is not privy to the circumstances of the Bull; but, if he did see a bull published by Gregory the 13th, he would then deliver his Opinion thereof.—To the 2nd, he saith, That the pope hath authority to depose a prince, upon certain occasions: And, when such a Bull shall be pronounced against her majesty, he will then answer, what the duty of her subjects, and what her right is.—To the 3rd, he saith, He is a private subject, and will not answer to any of these questions.—To the 4th, he saith, That the pope hath authority, upon certain occasions (which he will not name) to discharge subjects of their obedience to their prince.—To the 5th, he saith, That Dr. Saunders, and Dr. Bristowe be learned men, and whether they have taught truly in their books mentioned in this Article, referreth the Answer to themselves, for himself will not answer.—To the last, he saith, That when that case shall happen, he will make answer, and not before. THOMAS FORD. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewis, John Hammond.

John Shert's Answer.

To all these Articles, he saith, That he is a Catholic, and swerveth in no point from the Catholic Faith, and in no other sort to any of these Articles he refuseth to answer. JOHN SHERT. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

Robert Johnson's Answer.

To the first, he saith, He cannot answer.—To the 2nd he saith, He cannot tell what power and authority the pope hath, in the points named in this Article.—To the 3rd, he saith, he thinketh, That the pope hath authority, in some cases, to authorize subjects to take arms against their prince.—To the 4th, he thinketh, That the pope, for some causes, may discharge subjects of their allegiance, and obedience to their natural prince.—To the 5th, he saith, The Answer to this article dependeth upon the lawfulness of the cause, for the which, the pope hath given sentence against her; but if the cause was just, then he thinketh, the doctrine of Dr. Saunders, and Dr. Bristowe to be true: Whether the cause were just or not, he taketh not upon him to judge. To the last, he saith, That if such deprivation, or invasion, should be made for temporal matters, he would take part with her majesty; but, if it were for any matter of his faith, he thinketh, he were then bound to take part with the pope. ROBERT JOHNSON. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

John Hart's Answer.

To the first he saith, That it is a difficult question, and, that he cannot make answer thereto.—To the second, he saith, That her majesty is lawful queen, and ought to obeyed, notwithstanding the Bull supposed to be published by Pius Quintus. But whether she ought to be obeyed, and taken for lawful queen, notwithstanding any Bull, or sentence that the pope can give, he saith, he cannot answer.—To the third, he cannot answer, and farther saith, That he will not meddle with any such questions.—To the fourth, he saith, He is not resolved, and therefore he cannot answer.—To the fifth, he saith, He will not deal with any such questions, and knoweth not, whether Saunders or Bristowe have taught well herein, or not.—To the last, he saith, That when such a case shall happen, he will advise what becometh him to do, for presently he is not resolved. This he did acknowledge to us, after he had fully perused the same; but refused to subscribe to it. (Witnesses) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

William Filbee's Answer.

To the first, he saith, The pope hath authority to depose any prince; and such sentences, when they be promulgated, ought to be obeyed by the subjects of any prince; but touching the Bull of Pius Quintus, he can say nothing; but, if it was such, as it is affirmed to be, he doth allow it, and saith, That it ought to be obeyed.—To the second, he saith, It is a hard question, and therefore, he cannot answer it; but, upon farther advisement, he answereth, as to the first.—To the third, He knoweth not what to say thereunto.—To the fourth, he saith, That so long as her majesty remaineth queen, the pope hath no authority to warrant her subjects to take arms against her, or to disobey her; but if he should depose her, then he might discharge them of their allegiance and obedience to her majesty.—To the fifth, he saith, He will not meddle with the doctrine of Dr. Saunders, and Dr. Bristowe.—To the last, When this case

James Bosgrave's Answer.

To the first, he saith, That in his conscience, and as he shall answer before God, he thinketh, that the Bull, or sentence of excommunication of Pius Quintus against her majesty, was at no time lawful, neither was at any time, or is of any of her majesty's subjects to be obeyed.—To the second, he saith, That her majesty is lawful queen of this realm, and so ought to be taken, notwithstanding any Bull, or sentence that the pope either hath, can, or shall hereafter give. To the third, he thinketh, the pope had no power or authority to license the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, or any other of her majesty's subjects, to rebel, or to take arms against her majesty; and like he saith of Dr. Saunders, but he holdeth both Dr. Saunders, and all others, who shall, upon such warrants, take arms against her majesty, to be traitors and rebels.—To the fourth, he saith, That the pope neither hath, nor ought to have any authority to discharge any of her majesty's subjects, or the subjects of any other Christian prince from their allegiance, for any cause whatsoever; and so he thinketh in his conscience.—To the fifth, he affirmeth in his conscience, that Dr. Saunders and Dr. Bristowe, in the books here mentioned, and touching the point here specified, have taught, testified and maintained an untruth, and a falsehood.—To the last, he saith, That whatsoever the pope should do, he would in this case take part with her majesty against the pope, what cause soever he should pretend; and this he taketh to be the duty of every good subject. And this to be his opinion, in all the points above recited, he will be ready to affirm upon his oath. JAMES BOSGRAVE. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. Lewes, John Hammond.

Henry Orton's Answer.

To the first, he saith, That he thinketh the Bull of Pius Quintus, was at no time a lawful sentence, or of force, to bind any of her majesty's subjects, and that notwithstanding, her majesty was, and is to be obeyed by every of her subjects.—To the second, he thinketh, that her majesty is to be holden for lawful queen of this realm, and ought to be obeyed by all her subjects, notwithstanding any thing that the pope either hath done, or can do.—To the third, he thinketh the pope neither hath, nor had authority to warrant any of the persons here named, to do as they have done, or any other of her subjects, to take arms against her majesty; and that those who have taken arms against her, upon that, or the like warrant, have done unlawfully.—To the fourth, he thinketh, the pope hath no authority to discharge any subject from his allegiance and obedience to his prince.—To the fifth, he thinketh, that Dr. Saunders and Dr. Bristowe have, in the points mentioned in this article, taught and maintained an untruth and a falsehood.—To the last, he saith, That, in the case here supposed, he would take part with her majesty against the pope, or any other invading the realm by his authority. HENRY ORTON. (Witness) John Popham, Thomas Egerton, Da. The several CONFESSIONS OF THOMAS NORTON, and CHRISTOPHER NORTON, two of the Northern Rebels, who suffered at Tyburn, and were drawn, hanged, and quartered for Treason, May 27, 1570. Imprinted at London, by Wm. How, for Rd. Jones.

The Confession of THOMAS NORTON which he made at his Death, in form as hereafter followeth.

ON Saturday, being the 27th day of May, Thomas Norton, and Christopher Norton, of Yorkshire, being both condemned of High-Treason against the queen's majesty's person, were delivered, by the lieutenant of the Tower, to the sheriffs of London; and were both laid on a hurdle, and so drawn from the Tower, through the city of London, to Tyburn (the place of execution) having besides many officers, and a multitude of others, a godly preacher riding beside them, always comforting, and earnestly exhorting them, all the way, to acknowledge their fact, to discharge their conscience, and to be truly repentant, and heartily sorry for the same.—And, being come to the place of Execution, proclamation was made of the cause of their death. Thomas Norton, the elder man, was first executed, who took his death in this wise. He being come up, and standing upon the cart, with the rope about his neck, the preacher requested him, earnestly, to acknowledge his offence, in rebelling against God and his prince, and to ask God mercy for his sins, and of the queen's majesty forgiveness for his disobedience. He answered; That for the offence made and committed towards the queen's majesty, he had the law for it, and therefore must suffer death, and to that end he was come thither, and so asked God forgiveness for his offences. Then, he being requested by the preacher, to say the Lord's prayer, he immediately began to say the same in Latin. And, being disturbed by the preacher, who willed him to say it as God hath commanded, and, as every true christian ought to do (that is to say) in the vulgar tongue, that all the audience might bear witness how he died a true Christian. Sir, (quoth he) and answered very obstinately, that he would pray in Latin, and therefore prayed him that he would not molest his conscience. Then the Secondary bad him, if he would needs say it in Latin, to say it then secretly to himself; and so he did. His Latin prayers being ended, the preacher, not neglecting his duty, exhorted him very earnestly, to say the Lord's prayer, and the Belief in English, from the bottom of his heart, as every true Christian ought to do. At last, after much exhortation, he granted to say it in English; and so said the Lord's prayer in English, whereunto he added the Ave-Maria, and then the Belief. And then he desired, not only the audience, but also all the Saints in Heaven, to pray for him, both then, and at all times, as well after his death, as then he being alive. Then the preacher bade him put his whole hope and trust in the death and blood-shedding of Christ our Saviour, and by him only hope to be saved. With that the cart was drawn away, and there he hung a certain space, and then was taken down, and quartered, in the presence of his nephew, Christopher Norton, who then presently must drink of the same cup.

The End and Confession of CHRISTOPHER NORTON, who, as it seemed, died more repentant, and more Christian-like, than his Uncle did.

CHRISTOPHER NORTON, the younger man, after he had beheld the death of his uncle, as well his quartering, as otherwise, knowing, and being well assured, that he himself must follow the same way, seemed to be very repentant, and heartily sorry for his offence, and immediately kneeled down on the ground, before he came up to the cart, with his face Eastward, and made his prayers unto God; and afterward, stepping up to the cart and then being asked by the preacher, Whether he did believe, and hope to be saved by Christ's death, and blood-shedding? he made Answer; That he did verily so believe, and hoped to be saved by no other means; and, therefore, besought all the audience, who then were present, to bear witness, that he there died a true Christian. And being asked, Whether he did acknowledge, and confess that he had deserved to die? and whether he had not both offended God, and the queen's majesty; he made answer, That he had worthily deserved that death, and therefore besought God, and all men to forgive him. And further, did earnestly exhort all men, to take example by him, for committing the like.

And immediately he did inquire; Whether any there did know one Philip Shurley, who now is captain in Scotland? There were some made Answer; that they did know him. Then he declared, how he was the causer of his death, nevertheless, he did forgive him; and, moreover, besought any who knew him, when time would serve, to let him understand it. This talk being ended, he desired the people that they would pray with him; and when he and the people had said the Lord's Prayer together, then he made his Confession to God in thiswise:—
 ' I Christopher Norton, who am come hither
 ' to take my death, being justly condemned, by
 ' the laws of the realm, being sound of body,
 ' and of a perfect remembrance, do here ac' knowledge and confess, my good Lord and Sa' viour, before the Throne of thy majesty, my ' heinous offence, by me committed between
 ' God and my prince; desiring thee, good ' Lord, from the very bottom of my heart, to ' have mercy on me, miserable and wretched
 ' sinner, who am now coming to thee, being ' here now ready to die. O most merciful Lord,

' receive me, a sinful wretch, and refuse me
 ' not, but hearken to my voice.'—With that, the hangman executed his office; and, being hanged a little while, and then cut down, the butcher opened him, and as he took out his bowels, he cried, and said, ' Oh, Lord, Lord, have mercy upon me!' and so yielded up the ghost. Then being, likewise, quartered, as the other was,
 and their bowels burned, as the manner is,
 their quarters were put into a basket, provided for the purpose, and so carried to Newgate, where they were parboiled; and afterwards, their heads set on London-Bridge, and their quarters set upon sundry gates of the city of London, for an example to all Traitors and Rebels, for committing High-Treason against God and their prince. God grant it may be a special warning for all men; and God turn the hearts of all those who are maliciously bent against Elizabeth, our queen and sovereign of this realm, and send her a triumphant victory over all her enemies. Amen. God save the Queen.

The END and CONFESSION of JOHN FELTON, the rank Traitor, who set up the traitorous Bull on the Bishop of London's gate. Who suffered, before the same gate, for High Treason, against the Queen's Majesty, the 8th day of August, 1570. By J. Partridge. Imprinted at London, by Rd. Johnes, and Tho. Colwell, 1570.

JOHN FELTON, he who set up the traitorous Bull on the bishop of London's gate, being attainted of High Treason, and, on Friday, being the 4th of August, 1570, was arraigned, and condemned for the same offence, at the Guild-hall in London; and being there, was then judged to be drawn, hanged and quartered, as most worthily he had deserved. He was had from thence to Newgate, where he remained till Tuesday, being the 8th day of the same aforesaid month of August. The same Tuesday morning, before he came out of Newgate, came to him two or three godly and learned preachers, who diligently counselled him, yea, and very earnestly exhorted him, persuading him, as touching his opinion, by divers good and learned arguments, as well out of diverse and sundry places of the Scriptures, as also, out of the Ancient Fathers, the Doctors of the Church; and he, with much arrogance, answered them, as well as his opinion served him, till, at last, he saw it was so plain, by the manifest scriptures by them alledged; and so, being overcome, he could say no more. And, moreover, his subtle and crafty dealing, being laid to his charge, concerning those whom he had deceived, and was yet indebted to, he made light of it, and said little, or nothing to the matter. Then, being ready to go down to the burdle, the preachers willed him to reconcile himself to God, and the queen; to take his death patiently; and to acknowledge his heinous fact to be most wicked and detestable, in that he did, so maliciously, set up the traitorous and malignant scroll, termed a Bull; and, moreover, most traitorously denied the Queen's

Supremacy; with other heinous, and traitorous words against the queen's majesty, not worthy to be rehearsed; as plainly it did appear at his Arraignment. He answered wilfully, and very obstinately; as for that, he knew well enough what he had done; howbeit, he said, he was sorry for it. Another willed him to remember himself, and put his trust in Christ's death, and thereby only hope to be saved. He answered arrogantly, and contrary to Christ's doctrine, which is the true and sincere religion, That he believed the ancient, and catholic faith, which the holy father, the pope, hath long defended, and said, Whosoever believed any other faith, or held any other opinion, it was most wicked, and erroneous.—Then he came down the stairs, having on a satin doublet, and a gown of grograin; and, being come down to the stairs-foot, he desired the people to pray for him, and besought God, and all of them, to forgive him. Then he was laid upon the hurdle, and drawn along the Old-Bailey, to Paul's Church-yard, where he must suffer; and, by the way, he said the De profundis, in Latin, to himself. And, being exhorted by master Young to call for mercy, and only hope to be saved by Christ's death, and bloodshedding, he answered never a word that could be heard or perceived. Then master Beechar the sheriff, said; Ask God mercy, and thy prince, and be sorry for thy Treason committed. Quoth Felton, I am sorry for it; and I ask God heartily mercy. Then being come to the place of execution, he was loosed off the hurdle by two sergeants, and then stripped by the hangman of his grograin gown, and satin doublet. Then he standing up, quivering and shaking with fear, said, ' Ah, ah, Lord have mercy upon me !' Then being led by the hangman to the foot of the ladder, master sheriff Beechar commanding silence, willed master Christopher, the Secondary of the Compter in the Poultry, to publish a Proclamation, in form and effect as followeth :

' The queen, our sovereign lady, Elizabeth, by the grace of God, queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the true, ancient, and catholic faith, straitly chargeth and commandeth, by us her said officers, all, and every her loving subjects, on pain that shall full thereof, that all, and every of them, whosoever, not appointed to the Execution of John Felton, late attainted of High Treason, and thereof found Guilty, by the oath of 12 honest and discreet men, according to her highness's Laws, to depart the place; that is to say, twenty foot from this place, where the said John Felton must receive Execution for his High Treason, according to his Judgment; which said John Felton is here ready to receive Execution, according to the tenor of the Judgment to him appointed. Thus willing all and every one, to depart (as aforesaid) that each officer, according to his office, in this matter appointed, may do his, or their office, without let or disturbance in this behalf. And thus, God save the queen.'

At which words, all the people, being there then assembled, as it were, with one voice, cried, ' God save the queen !' And, moreover, many wished all those who mean otherwise, might come to the same end. Then Felton hung down his head, and said nothing, that either might be heard, or supposed by sight. The Proclamation being ended, he kneeled down, and said the 51st psalm, in Latin. Then he stepped up the ladder, and turned his face to the Bishop's gate, and said; ' Good people

I desire you all to bear witness, that I take it on my death, that I never meant hurt, or harm, or any Treason toward my prince, but only that, which I did, in setting up the Bull.' Then master Young said; Lo, will ye see how he would clear himself of the heinous Treason by him committed? Then the Secondary said; Felton, thou hast been attainted of High-Treason, and found Guilty by the oath of twelve true and honest men, and therefore, acknowledge thy Treason and be sorry for it, and ask God and thy prince forgiveness. And then master Beechar the sheriff, openly, before all the people, said; Thou wast justly condemned of High Treason, and surely so thou art the rankest traitor that ever I heard of; and therefore, ask the queen forgiveness, and I pray God that he may forgive thee. Then Felton said; I desire you good Mr. Sheriffs, to show the queen's majesty, that I never meant any Treason against her grace. Mr. Beechar said; She shall be certified as we have found by thee. Then Felton willed them to show to her grace, That he was most heartily sorry for his fact that he was condemned for, and that he besought her grace to forgive him. That is well said, quoth master sheriff Beechar, and bad him will all the people to forgive him, and to pray for him; and even so he did. And then he said, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, in English; and as he was saying it in Latin, In manus tuas Domine, he was turned off the ladder; and hanging there six turns, he was cut down, and carried to the block, and there his head was smitten off, and held up, that the people might see it: whereat the people gave a shout, wishing that all Traitors were so served. Then he was quartered, and carried to Newgate to be parboiled, and so set up as the other rebels were.—God save the Queen.

59. Arraignment, Judgment, and Execution of JOHN STORY, for Treason: 14 ELIZ. A. D. 1571. [Extracted from a Declaration of the Life and Death of John Story, late a Roman Canonical Doctor, by Profession. Imprinted at London, by Thomas Colwell, 1571. Seen and allowed, &c. A. D. 1598.]

AFTER the death of queen Mary, so soon as our most dear sovereign lady came to the possession of the crown and that she had called a parliament, chiefly for the restitution of God's blessed Word, and the true administration of the Sacraments to God's high honour, and also for the amendment of the decayed state of this realm; John Story, being of the Parliament House, who was an enemy to all godly Reformation, did with great vehemency speak against the Bill that was there exhibited for the Restitution of the Book of Common-Prayer, and said these words: ' I did often-times, in queen Mary's time, say to the Bishops, that they were too busy with Pecora campi (for so it pleased him to term the poor commons of England) chopping at twigs, but I wished to have chopped at the root; which if they had done, this here had not come now in question: and herein most traiterously he meant the destruction of our dear and sovereign lady queen Elizabeth For which words spoken, in such an audience and in such vehement manner, there was no honest nor true heart that heard him but did utterly abhor him.—And soon after that he had declared his traiterous heart to the queen's highness, and his conscience accusing him, he fled and lurked about in sundry corners, as did Cain when he had murdered his brother Abel. But at the last he was taken in the West-Country, riding before a mail in a freize coat like a serving-man, and was apprehended in the highway by one Mr. Ayleworth, a gentleman, one of the queen's servants, and brought before the Council, and after sent to prison to the Queen's-Bench (for more than suspicion of Treason) in the first year of her highness's reign.—And after the said Story had remained there a while, he espying his time and by the help of his friends (as commonly such lewd papists lack none) he broke the said prison, and fled again beyond the seas, namely into Flanders, and there not only practised divers wicked and traitorous enterprizes towards our sovereign lady the queen's majesty and the state of this realm, by sundry conferences that he had with such as have of late rebelled and conspired the destruction of the same; but also he became an open and common enemy to every good subject of this realm of England, and obtained in Flanders, of the duke of Alva, a commission and authority to practise his old cruelty, and to arrest and apprehend all such Englishmen's goods as should arrive in those countries, or who did traffique out of England into those parts, or from thence into England, and to confiscate the same, by reason of which authority he used there such extremity, that he was the spoiler and undoer of divers merchants, and of more would have been, if he had longer continued; wherefore the said merchants were enforced to study and devise some remedy, and to practise some way or means how to remove this cumbersome man from them.

And among other devices, they having experience of him to be a greedy and ravenous wolf, put into his head (by such as he suspected not) that there was a prey for him of English goods, in a ship that lay in a certain place which was named unto him, where he should find such a treasure of goods to be confiscated, as would be sufficient for him during his life. The wolf being hungry and desirous of this great prey, set forward, and came into a ship that promised to bring him to the place where the prey was. But, to be short, as soon as he was entered the ship, the same brought him clear away out of Flanders into England, and landed him at Harwich, in the month of August last past.

And soon after, knowledge being given to the queen's honourable Council of his landing, he was brought to London, and there he was committed to prison to the Lollards Tower, in Powles, where he continued a while, that he might well peruse that place wherein he had most cruelly tormented many a good Christian. But he lacked there one thing, which was the monstrous and huge Stocks, that he and Bonner, his old faithful friend, had used to turmoil and persecute the poor and innocent Christians in, hanging some therein by the heels so high, that only their heads lay on the ground: some were stocked in both feet and arms; some also were stocked by both their feet and by both their thumbs, and so did hang in the stocks: and some also were stocked by both their feet, and chained by the neck, with collars of iron made fast behind them to a post in the wall, and such other devilish and tyrannous engines and devises by him practised. These at his being in the Lollards Tower he missed, and great pity it was that he had not tasted of them: but alack, the good bishop Grindel, late bishop of London, had burned and consumed them with fire.

After that Story had continued a certain of time in the Lollards Tower, and had been divers times examined, he was from thence removed to the Tower of London, where he remained until the 26th of May 1571. And then was he brought from thence into Westminster-Hall, before the Judges of the Queen's-Bench, and there arraigned: and after the Indictment had been read unto him, the effect whereof was: That whereas, Richard Norton, Thomas Markenfield, Christopher Nevill, Francis Norton and Thomas Jenny, alias Jennings, with other Traitors, after their offences committed in the North, and being thereof indicted in the 12th year of the queen's highness's reign; before the right honourable Thomas earl of Sussex, lord president of the queen's council in the North parts, John lord Darcy, &c. they after their Indictment did the 23rd of June, in the year aforesaid, embark themselves in sundry ships and fled this realm, unto Antwerp in Brabant, which is under the government of king Philip, and there, contrary to their allegiance, did lead their lives; and the aforesaid John Story, D. W. P. and J. P. being born in England and the queen's subjects, did with them conspire, compass, and imagine the queen's death, and her highness to depose and deprive.—And by divers persuasions and letters did also procure Strangers to invade this realm of England, did receive comfort and help them at Antwerp aforesaid, against their Allegiance, &c.

And after the Indictment read, he being called upon by the Court to answer to the same, pleaded that he was not the queen's subject, nor had not been these seven years, but was the subject of the most catholic and mighty prince king Philip, king of Spain, to whom he was sworn, and had in fee of him one hundred pounds by the year; therefore, said he, I am not bound to answer to that Indictment, neither will I answer unto it. And here he used many pretty taunts, as well to the Judges as also pleasing himself with giving of pretty nips and girds. And very stoutly he maintains his former Plea, affirming also, that they were not his lawful Judges, neither that they had law to proceed against him, being none of the queen's subjects. And then, being demanded where he was born? he answered, In England. Then, said they, it followeth that you are subject to the laws of this realm, and should be so to our queen. Whereunto he replied, and said, That God commanded Abraham to go forth from the land and country where he was born, from his friends and kinsfolk into another country; and so he following his example, for conscience sake in Religion did forsake his country and the laws of this realm, and the prince also, and had wholly given himself to the service of a foreign governor, king Philip, king of Spain. And hereupon he stood very stoutly, but to small purpose.

Then when he perceived that they would proceed in Judgment against him, he said, They had no law so to do. And with that he turned him about to the people, and said, Good people, I trust ye see how violently I am used; and how unjustly, and contrary to all justice and equity they use me. And he added, That he had good hope, that he was not destitute of some friends there; who would give notice and knowledge to the most Catholic prince his master, how cruelly they dealt with him. And then again, being called upon to answer, one said unto him, Master Story, because you think it violence that is shewed unto you, instead of law and justice; you shall know that we do nothing but that we may do, both by law and equity.

And then one of the Judges said, This is Scarborough's Case. Nay, said Story, my Case is not Scarborough's Case, but indeed I had Scarborough's warning to come to this Arraignment; for I knew nothing thereof until seven of the clock in the morning.

Then there was a Book delivered him to read, wherein he might see what they might do by law: and after he had read it, the Judge demanded of him how he liked it? and he answered, God have mercy upon me. Then the Lord Chief-Justice gave him Judgment, to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; and so was he again sent unto the Tower.

And as he went by the way, certain persons in several places met with him, and one said, O Story, Story! thou art a strange Story: remember master Bradford, that godly man; his blood asketh vengeance on thee, Story; repent in time. Another cried on him and said, Story, call to mind the rigour thou shewedst upon master Read, a gentleman, whom thou didst utterly destroy: ask God forgiveness, Story, for that wicked deed. Another cried unto him and said, Blessed be God, Story, who hath made thee partaker of such bread as thou wast wout to deal to the innocent members of Jesus Christ. Another also cried out upon him, and said, Story, Story, the abominable cup of fornication and filthiness, that thou hast given others to drink; be heaped up topful, that thy plagues may be the greater at the terrible day of God's wrath and vengeance, unless thou ask mercy for thy filthly, corrupt and stinking life. And yet again, another cried out unto him and said, I pray God that thy heart be not hardened, as was Pharaoh's, and made harder than the adamant-stone, or the steel; that when he would he could not repent and call for grace.

And among all the rest, one came to him, at London-Stone, and saluted him with this Metre, saying;

Master doctor Story,
For you they are right sorry,
The court of Lovaine and Rome:
Your holy father, the pope,
Cannot save you from rope,
The hangman must have your gown.

To whom he answered not one word.

The 1st day of June, the said Mr. Story was drawn upon a hurdle from the Tower of London unto Tyburn; where was prepared for him a new pair of gallows, made in triangle manner. And by the way, as he went, many people spake unto him, and called unto him to repent his tyranny and wickedness; and willed him to call upon God for mercy: but he lay as though he had been asleep, and would not speak to any person. And when he was taken from the hurdle, and set in a cart, he made there a solemn Protestation, and said:

"I am come hither to die: and truly, if this death were ten times more fierce and sharp than it is, I have deserved it: I have lived the space of threescore and seven years; and now my body must abide this temporal pain and punishment, provided for me here in this life, by means wherof, my days shall be cut off. But, where at the first I stood in fear of death, I thank God, this night passed I have been so comforted with God and godly men, that the fear of death is taken from my sight. And now I appeal to God the Father, trusting in the Passion of his Son Jesus Christ, and hoping, by the shedding of his blood only to be saved. And although of a long time I could not apply the virtue of his Passion and Death to the use and benefit of my soul, because of my long hovering in fear; yet now, I thank God, I know how to apply this medicine; as for example: an Apothecary may have a medicine in his shop seven years, that may help a sick or diseased man, by the counsel of a physician; but if this medicine be not applied to the patient, but still remaineth in the Apothecary's shop, it profiteth nothing. No more, said he, could the benefit of Christ's death help me; because, though I knew the medicine good, I did not apply it unto my soul's health: but now it hath pleased Almighty God to call me to account of my 67 years, which now must have an end, and this corrupt body must feel a temporal punishment, for my sins have deserved it (as I said before) I am now come to the proof of this medicine. David, when he had committed adultery with Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, (whose husband also he caused to be put into the front of the battle, and so was murdered:) he for that trespass felt a temporal punishment, by the loss of his son, which he loved tenderly. Also, when he numbered his people, he greatly displeased God: and for his offence and transgression, he felt a temporal pain: and choice was given unto him from above, to chuse one of these three temporal and bodily punishments: that is to say; three days Pestilence: the Sword; that is to say, Bloody Battle seven years; or Famine seven years. And he thought to chuse the least; and he chose three days Pestilence: but this scourge took away an infinite number of his subjects. So now as my sins deserve a temporal pain, which here have an end, even in this flesh; I am of the same mind that the prophet David was: and with him I agree, saying, Invoco te Domine, &c. Lord, I call upon thee in this day of my trouble, hear me, O Lord, out of thy dwelling place, &c.

"But now to speak a little of my Arraignment: when I was at Westminster, I alledged in my Plea, That I was no subject of this realm; as I did likewise before the queen's commissioners, sir Tho. Wroth, Mr. Tho. Wilbrabam, late Recorder of London, Mr. Peter Osborne, Mr. Marshe, and Mr. Dr. Wattes; where the Recorder of London made the like demand as was demanded of me at Westminster: and that was, whether I was born in England, or no? whereunto I answered, I was. Then said he, it followeth that you are and ought to continue the queen's faithful subject. Whereunto I replied then, as I do now, saying; I am sworn to the noble king, defender of the ancient Catholic faith, king Philip, of Spain: and he is sworn again by a solemn and corporal Oath, to maintain and defend the University of Lovaine, whereof I am a member; and therefore no subject of this realm, nor yet subject to any laws thereof; For it is well known, that I departed this realm being freely licensed thereunto by the queen, who accounted me an abject and cast-away; and I came not hither again of my own accord, but I was betrayed. And although I had an inkling given me before of such a thing pretended towards me, yet I could not shun nor esape it: for sure it was God who made dim my understanding, and blinded mine eyes, so that I could not perceive it. But Holy Writ commandeth me to love my enemies; and here I forgive them freely with all my heart; beseeching God that they take no harm for me in another country; I would be right sorry they should, although they betrayed me. I travelled with them from ship to ship, by the space of eight days, and mistrusted no peril to be at hand, until I was clapped fast under the hatches. But sure, sure, it was God who wrought it: yea, and although I was accounted a poller of the Englishmen of your country, I stand now here before God, and by the death I shall die, I had never out of any ship more than two pieces of gold, and forty dollars that were laid in my hand.

"But once again, to my arraignment; where there were certain Letters laid to my charge, wherein I should go about to provoke the Nortons, the Nevills, and others to rebel; I never meant it: yet will I discharge my conscience freely and frankly, and tell you truth. There was a Commission for like matter sent into Scotland, which I wrote with mine own hand: but it contained a Proviso, wherein the queen of England and her dominions were excepted.

"There are yet two things that I purpose to talk of: namely, for that there are here present a great number of youth; and I would to God I might say or speak that which might bring all men to the unity of the church; for there is but one church, one flock, and one shepherd: if I could this do, I would think myself to have wrought a good work. The first point toucheth my Cruelty, wherewith I am sore burthened: and the second concerneth my Religion. As touching the first: There were three in Commission, of which I was one who might do least, for I was the last of the three. And though I might, by persuasion, assay to cause them to revoke the Articles which they had maintained, and to confess the presence, wherem I stand: ye know that he who chideth, is not worthy to be condemned for fighting; no more am I worthy to be counted cruel for chiding. It was the bishop who pronounced the sentence (Excommunicamus) and against that I could not do, for I was one of the laity. Yet oftentimes the Bishop, to whom I was a servant, was bold with me, when he had so many prisoners that he could not well bestow them. For at one time the lord Kitcher sent him out of Essex 28, and at another time 16, and 14, and some of them were sent to me, whom I kept in my house with such fare as I had provided for myself and my family, at mine own cost and charge.—And to prove that I was not so cruel as I am reported to be, let this one tale suffice: there were at one time 28 condemned to the fire, and I moved the dean of Paul's to tender their state, who after was Abbot of Westminster, a very pitiful minded man, I think most of you know him; it is M. Feckman, and we went by and persuaded with them, and, we found them very tractable; and master Feckman and I laboured to the lord cardinal Poole, shewing that they were rescissentes quid fecerunt.—The cardinal and we did sue together to the queen, and laid both the swords together, and so we obtained pardon for them all, saving an old woman who dwelt about Paul's church-yard; she would not convert, and therefore she was burned. The rest of them received absolution, and that with all reverence. Search the Register and you shall find it. Yea, and it was my procurement that there should be no more burned in London; for I saw well that it would not prevail, and therefore we sent them into odd corners into the country. Wherefore, I pray ye, name me not cruel; I would be loth to have any such slander run on me: but sith I die in charity, I pray you all of charity to pray for me, that God may strengthen me with patience to suffer my death: to the which I yield most willingly.—And here I make a Petition to you my friends, who would have bestowed any thing on me: I beseech you, for charity-sake, bestow it yearly on my wife, who hath four small children, and God hath now taken me away who was her staff and stay: and now my daughter Weston and her three children are gone over to her, and I know not how they shall do for food, unless they go a begging from door to door for it: although, indeed, no English persons do beg but of English, being helped by the lady Dorm, and sir Francisco. I have good hope that you will be good unto her, for she is the faithfullest wife, the lovingest and constantest that ever man had: and twice we have lost all that ever we had, and now she hath lost me, to her great grief, I know.

“The second Point that I thought to speak of is concerning my Religion, for that I know many are desirous to know what faith I will die in: the which I will briefly touch: I say with St. Jerome, that ancient father and pillar of the old ancient, catholic, and apostolic church, grounded upon the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, that in the same faith that I was born in, I purpose to die in. And as the Ark that Noah and his family did possess, figured the ship of Christ's Church, out of which ship whosoever is cannot be saved, in that ship am I: example, A ship that is tossed on the floods is often in danger of loss on the sands, and sometimes on the rocks: but when the men who are in the ship espy present peril at hand, there is a cockboat at the tail of the ship, whereunto they fly for succour: so likewise, I being in the ship of Christ, once fell out of the same ship and was in present peril and great danger: but then I, following the example of a good mariner, took the cockboat, thinking for to land; and at the last, being in the boat, I espied three oars, that is to wit, Contrition, Confession, and Absolution; and I held all these fast, and ever since I have continued in the ship of Christ, of which the Apostle Peter is the guide and principal, and in the faith Catholic of my king I die.”

Then said the earl of Bedford; Are you not the queen's subject? No, said Story, yet I do not exclude the queen, but I pray for her, her council, and the nobility of this realm long to continue. Then said the lord Hunsdon, Are you not the queen's subject? You was born in England. Then said Story, Every man is free-born, and he hath the whole face of the earth before him to dwell and abide in where he liketh best; and if he cannot live here, he may go elsewhere. Then was there (as I think) one of the ministers hearing him to make so light of our noble queen and country, demanded of him, Whether she were not next, and immediately under God, Supreme Head of the Churches of England and Ireland? whereunto he answered, I come not hither to dispute, but if she be, she is: My Nay will not prevail to prove it otherwise.

And then they cried, ‘Away with the cart.’ And so he was hanged according to his Judgment.

60. The Trial of Dr. WILLIAM PARRY,* at Westminster, for High Treason: 26 ELIZ. Feb. 25, A. D. 1584.

THE Commissioners were, Henry lord Hunsdon, Governor of Berwick; Sir Francis Knolles kn. Treasurer of the queen's majesty's household; Sir James Croft kn. Comptroller of the same household; Sir Christopher Hatton kn. Vicechamberlain to her majesty; Sir Christopher Wray kn. Chief Justice of England; Sir Gilbert Gerrard kn. Master of the Rolls; Sir Edmund Anderson kn. Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; Sir Roger Manwood kn. Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and Sir Thomas Henshage kn. Treasurer of the Chamber.

* “In the beginning of this year, queen Elizabeth discovered a Conspiracy of which William Parry was the author. He was a gentleman of Wales, member of the house of commons, and had signalized his zeal for the Catholic religion in opposing alone a Bill which was preferred in the lower house against the Jesuits. He spoke upon that occasion with so much passion and vehemence, that he was committed to custody; but his submission being made he was in a few days admitted to his place in the house again. Hardly was he at liberty when Edmund Nevil, who laid claim to the inheritance of the earl of Westmoreland lately deceased in the Low Countries, accused him of conspiring against the queen; whereupon he was sent to the Tower. He owned that he had a design to kill the queen, and was persuaded thereto by Morgan an English Catholic refugee in France: that he held intelligence with Jesuits, the pope's nuntios and cardinals: that the better to deceive the queen and get free access to her person, he returned from France into England, and discovered the whole Conspiracy to her: that afterwards, repenting of his wicked intention, he left off his dagger every time he went to her, lest he should be tempted to commit the murder: but that at length cardinal Allen's book, wherein he maintains it to be not only lawful, but honourable to kill princes excommunicated, falling into his hands, he read it, and felt himself strongly encouraged to pursue his first design: that Nevil his accuser coming to dine with him, proposed the attempting something for the deliverance of the queen of Scots, to which he answered, he had a greater design in his head: that a few days after Nevil coming to see him, they resolved to kill the queen, as she rode abroad to take the air, and swore upon the Bible to keep the secret: but that in the mean while, Nevil hearing the news of the earl of Westmoreland's death, accused him, in hopes of procuring thereby the earl's inheritance to which he laid claim. Upon this confession, he was condemned to die, and executed accordingly.” Rapin.

The Court being sat; First, three Proclamations for silence were made, according to the usual course in such cases. Then the Lieutenant was commanded to return his precept; which he did, and brought the Prisoner to the bar: to whom Miles Sandes esq. Clerk of the Crown, said, William Parry, hold up thy hand: and he did so. Then said the Clerk of the Crown, Thou art here indicted by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men of the county of Middlesex, before sir Christopher Wray, knight, and others, who took the Indictment by the name of William Parry, late of London, gentleman, otherwise called William Parry, late of London, doctor of the law; for that thou, as a false Traitor against the most noble and Christian princess queen Elizabeth, thy most gracious sovereign and liege lady, not having the fear of God before thine eyes, nor regarding thy due allegiance, but being seduced by the instigation of the devil, and intending to withdraw and extinguish the hearty love and due obedience which true and faithful subjects should bear unto the same our sovereign lady, didst at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, on the first day of February, in the 26th year of her highness's reign, and at divers other times and places in the same county, maliciously and traitorously conspire and compass, not only to deprive and depose the same our sovereign lady of her royal estate, title and dignity, but also to bring her highness to death, and final destruction, and sedition in the realm to make, and the government thereof to subvert, and the sincere religion of God established in her highness's dominions to alter and subvert. And that whereas thou Wm. Parry, by the Letters sent unto Gregory bishop of Rome, didst signify unto the same bishop thy purposes and intentions aforesaid, and thereby didst pray and require the same bishop to give thee Absolution; that thou afterwards, that is to say, the last day of March, in the 26th year aforesaid, didst traitorously receive Letters from one called cardinal de Como, directed unto thee Wm. Parry, whereby the same cardinal did signify unto thee, that the bishop of Rome had perused thy Letters, and allowed of thine intent; and that to that end he had absolved thee of all thy sins, and by the same Letter did animate and stir thee to proceed with thine enterprize; and that thereupon thou, the last day of August, in the 26th year aforesaid, at St. Giles in the Fields, in the same county of Middlesex, didst traitorously confer with one Edmund Nevil esq. uttering to him all thy wicked and traitorous devices, and then and there didst move him to assist thee therein, and to join with thee in those wicked Treasons aforesaid, against the peace of our said sovereign lady the queen, her crown and dignity. What sayest thou, William Parry, Art thou guilty of these Treasons whereof thou standest here indicted, or Not Guilty?

Then Parry said, Before I plead Not Guilty, or confess myself Guilty, I pray you give me leave to speak a few words; and with humbling himself, began in this manner: God save queen Elizabeth, and God send me grace to discharge my duty to her, and to send you home in charity. But touching the matters that I am indicted of, some were in one place, and some in another, and done so secretly as none can see into them, except that they had eyes like unto God; wherefore I will not lay my blood upon the Jury, but do mind to confess the Indictment. Containeth it but the parts that have been openly read, I pray you tell me? Whereunto it was answered, that the Indictment contained the parts he had heard read, and no other. Whereupon the Clerk of the Crown said unto Parry, Parry, thou must answer directly to the Indictment, whether thou be Guilty or not.

Then said Parry, I do confess that I am Guilty of all that is therein contained; and further too, I desire not life, but desire to die. Unto which the Clerk of the Crown said, If you confess it, you must confess it in manner and form as it is comprized in the Indictment. Whereunto he said, I do confess it in manner and form as the same is set down, and all the circumstances thereof. Then the Confession being recorded, the queen's learned counsel being ready to pray Judgment upon the same Confession, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain said, These matters contained in this Indictment, and confessed by this man, are of great importance; they touch the person of the queen's most excellent majesty in the highest degree, the very state and well-being of the whole Commonwealth, and the truth of God's Word established in these her majesty's dominions, and the open demonstration of that capital envy of the Man of Rome, that hath set himself against God and godliness, all good princes and good government, and against good men. Wherefore, I pray you, for the satisfaction of this great multitude, let the whole matter appear, that every one may see that the matter of itself is as bad as the Indictment purporteth, and as he hath confessed. Whereto in respect that the justice of the realm hath been of late very impudently slandered, all yielded as a thing necessary to satisfy the world in particular, of that which was but summarily comprized in the Indictment, though in the law his Confession served sufficiently to have proceeded thereupon unto Judgment. Whereupon the lords and others the commissioners, her majesty's learned counsel, and Parry himself agreed, that Parry's Confession, taken the 11th and 13th of Feb. 1584, before the lord of Hunsdon, master vice-chamberlain, and master secretary) and cardinal de Como's Letters, and Parry's Letters to the Lord Treasurer and Lord Steward, should be openly read.

And Parry, for the better satisfying of the people and standers-by, offered to read them himself; but being told that the order was, the Clerk of the Crown should read them, it was so resolved of all parts. And then Master Vice Chamberlain caused to be shewed to Parry his said Confession, the Cardinal's Letter, and his own Letter aforesaid; which after he had particularly viewed every leaf thereof;

he confessed, and said openly they were the same.

Then said Master Vice-Chamberlain; Before we proceed to shew what he hath confessed, what say you, said he to Parry, is that which you have confessed here true? and did you confess it freely and willingly of yourself, or was there any extort means used to draw it from you? Surely, said Parry, I made that Confession freely without any constraint, and that is all true, and more too; for there is no Treason that hath been since the first year of the queen, any way touching religion, saving receipt of Agnus Dei's, and persuading of others, wherein I have not much dealt, but I have offended in it. And I have also delivered mine opinion in writing, who ought to be Successor to the crown, which is said to be Treason also.

Then his Confession of the 11th and 13th of February, all of his own hand-writing, and hereafter particularly set down, was openly and distinctly read by the clerk of the crown.

The Voluntary CONFESSION of William Parry, doctor of the laws (now prisoner in the Tower), and accused of Treason by Edmund Nevil, esq. promised by him (with all faith and humility) to the queen's majesty, in discharge of his conscience, and duty towards God and her: before the lord Hunsdon, lord governor of Berwick; sir Christopher Hatton knight, vice-chamberlain; sir Francis Walsingham knight, principal secretary; the 13th of February 1584.

"In the year 1570, I was sworn her majesty's servant, from which time until the year 1580, I served, honoured, and loved her with as great readiness, devotion and assurance, as any poor subject in England. In the end of that year, and until Midsummer 1582, I had some trouble for the hurting of a gentleman of the Temple.* In which action I was so disgraced and oppressed by two great men (to whom I have of late been beholden) that I never had contented thought since. There began my misfortune, and here followeth my woeful fall.—In July after, I laboured for licence to travel for 3 years, which (upon some consideration) was easily obtained. And so in August, I went over with doubtful mind of return; for that being suspected in Religion, and not having received the Communion in 22 years, I began to mistrust my advancement in England. In Sept. I came to Paris, where I was reconciled to the Church, and advised to live without scandal; the rather, for that it was mistrusted by the English catholics, that I had intelligences with the greatest counsellor of * Parry having committed a great outrage against Mr. Hugh Hare, of the Inner-Temple, with an intent to have murdered him in his chambers, was tried for the same and convicted; which prompted him to go beyond sea, where becoming acquainted with Jesuits, they engaged him in a design to kill the Queen.

England. I staid not long there, but removed to Lyons (a place of great traffic) where, because it was the ordinary passage of our nation to and fro, between Paris and Rome, I was also suspected.

To put all men out of doubt of me, and for some other cause, I went to Milan, from whence, as a place of some danger, (though I found favour there) after I had cleared my conscience, and justified myself in Religion before the Inquisitor, I went to Venice. There I came acquainted with father Benedicto Palmio, a grave and learned jesuit. By conference with him of the hard state of the catholics in England, and by reading of the book 'De Persecutione Anglicana,' and other discourses of like argument; 1. I conceived a possible mean to relieve the afflicted state of our catholics, if the same might be well warranted in religion and conscience by the pope, or some learned divines. I asked his opinion; he made it clear, commended my devotion, comforted me in it, and after a while made me known to the nuncio Campeggio, resident there for his holiness. By his means I wrote to the pope, presented my service, and sued for a passport to go to Rome, and to return safely into France. Answer came from cardinal Como, that I might come, and should be welcome. I misliked the Warrant, sued for a better, which I was promised: but it came not before my departure to Lyons, where I promised to stay some time for it. And being indeed desirous to go to Rome, and loth to go without countenance, I desired Christophoro de Salazar, secretary to the catholic king in Venice, who had some understanding by conference of my devotion to the afflicted catholics at home and abroad, to commend me to the duke di Nova Terra, governor of Milan, and to the count of Olivaris Embi, then resident for the king his master in Rome: which he promised to do effectually for the one, and did for the other. And so I took my journey towards Lyons, whither came for me an ample passport (but somewhat too late) that I might come and go, in verbo Pontificis per omnes Jurisdictiones Ecclesiasticas, absque impedimento. I acquainted some good fathers there, of my necessity to depart towards Paris by promise, and prayed their advices upon divers points; wherein I was well satisfied. And so assuring them that his holiness should hear from me shortly, it was undertaken that I should be excused for that time.—In October I came to Paris, where (upon better opinion conceived of me amongst my catholic countrymen) I found my credit well settled, and such as mistrusted me before, ready to trust and embrace me. And being one day at the chamber of Thomas Morgan a catholic gentleman (greatly beloved and trusted on that side) amongst other gentlemen, talking (but in very good sort) of England, I was desired by Morgan to go up with him to another chamber; where he brake with me, and told me that it was hoped and looked for, that I should do some service for God and his Church. I answered him, I would do it, if it were to kill the greatest subject in England; whom I named, and in truth then hated. No, no, said he, let him live to his greater fall and ruin of his house.—2. It is the queen I mean. I had him as I wished, and told him it were soon done, if it might be lawfully done, and warranted in the opinion of some learned divines. And so the doubt once resolved, (though as you have heard I was before reasonably well satisfied) I vowed to undertake the enterprize, for the restitution of England to the antient obedience of the See Apostolic. Divers divines were named: Dr. Allein I desired, Parsons I refused; and by chance came master Watts a learned priest, with whom I conferred, and was over-ruled.—3. For he plainly pronounced (the Case only altered in name) that it was utterly unlawful; with whom many English priests did agree, as I have heard, if it be not altered since the Book made in Answer to the "Execution of the English Justice" was published, which I must confess hath taken hard hold in me, and (I fear me) will do in others, if it be not prevented by more gracious handling of the quiet obedient Catholic subjects, whereof there is good and greater store in England, than this age will extinguis. Well, notwithstanding all these doubts, I was gone so far by Letters and Conference in Italy, that I could not go back, but promised faithfully to perform the Enterprize, if his holiness, upon my Offer and Letters would allow it, and grant me full remission of my sins.—4. I wrote my Letters the 1st of Jan. 1584, by their computation; took advice upon them in confession of father Anibal à Codreto, a learned Jesuit in Paris; was lovingly embraced, commended, confessed, and communicated at the Jesuit's at one altar with the cardinals of Vandosmi and Narbone, whereof I prayed certificate, and enclosed the same in my letter to his holiness, to lead him the rather to absolve me; which I required by my letters, in consideration of so great an enterprize undertaken without promise or reward.—5. I went with Morgan to the nuncio Ragazzoni, to whom I read the Letter and Certificate enclosed, sealed it, and left it with him to send to Rome; he promised great care of it, and to procure Answer: and so lovingly embraced me, wished me good speed, and promised that I should be remembered at the Altar.—6. After this I desired Morgan, that some special man might be made privy to this matter, lest he dying, and I miscarrying in the execution, and my intent never truly discovered, it might stick for an everlasting spot in my race. Divers were named, but none agreed upon, for fear of betraying.—7. This being done, Morgan assured me, that shortly after my departure, the lord Fernelhurst (then in Paris) should go into Scotland, and be ready upon the first news of the queen's fall to enter into England with 20 or 30,000 men to defend the queen of Scotland (whom, and the king her son, I do in my conscience acquit of any privy, liking, or consent to this, or any other bad action, for any thing that I ever did know.) I shortly departed for England, and arrived at Rye in Jan. 1585, from whence I wrote to the court, advertised some, that I had a special service to discover to the queen's majesty.—8. Which I did more to prepare access and credit, than for any care I had of her person, though I were fully resolved never to touch her (notwithstanding any Warrant) if by any device, persuasion, or policy she might be wrought to deal more graciously with the Catholics than she doth, or, by our manner of proceeding in parliament meaneth to do, or any thing yet seen. I came to the Court (then at Whitehall) prayed audience, had it at large, and very privately discovered to her majesty this Conspiracy, much to this effect, though covered with all the skill I had. She took it doubtfully, I departed with fear. And amongst other things, I cannot forget her majesty's gracious speech then uttered touching the Catholics, which of late after a sort I avowed in parliament: She said to me, that never a catholic should be troubled for Religion or supremacy, so long as they lived like good subjects, whereby I mistrusted that her majesty is borne in hand, that none is troubled for the one or the other. It may be truly said, that it is better than it hath been, though it be not yet as it should be.—In March last, while I was at Greenwich (as I remember) suing for St. Catharine's, came Letters to me from cardinal Como, dated at Rome, the last of January before; whereby I found the Enterprize commended and allowed, and myself absolved, in his holiness's name, of all my sins, and willed to go forward in the name of God. That letter I shewed to some in Court, who imparted it to the queen; what it wrought, or may work in her majesty, God knoweth; only this I know.—9. That it confirmed my resolution to kill her, and made it clear in my conscience, that it was lawful and meritorious. And yet was I determined never to do it, if either policy, practice, persuasion, or motion in parliament could prevail. I feared to be tempted, and therefore always when I came near her I left my dagger at home.—10. When I looked upon her majesty and remembered her many excellencies; I was greatly troubled: and yet I saw no remedy, for my Vows were in heaven, my Letters and Promises in earth; and the case of the Catholic Recusants, and other, little bettered. Sometimes I said to myself, Why should I care for her? What hath she done for me? Have I not spent 10,000 marks since I knew her service, and never had penny by her; It may be said, she gave me my life. But I say (as my case stood) it had been tyranny to take it; and I fear me it is little less yet. If it pleased her graciously to look into my Discontentments, I would to Jesus Christ she had it, for I am weary of it. And now to come to an end of this Tragical Discourse: in July I left the Court, utterly dejected, discontented, and as her majesty might perceive by my passionate Letters, careless of myself. I came to London: Dr. Allein's Book was sent me out of France.—11. It redoubled my former conceits; every word in it was a warrant to a prepared mind: It taught that kings may be excommunicated, deprived, and violently handled; It proveth that all wars civil or foreign undertaken for Religion, are honourable. Her majesty may do well to read it, and to be out of doubt (if things be not amended) that it is a warning, and a doctrine full dangerous. This is the Book I shewed, in some places read, and lent it to my cousin Nevil (the Accuser) who came often to mine house, put his finger in my dish, his hand in my purse; and the night wherein he accused me, was wrapped in my gown, six months at least after we had entered into this Conspiracy: In which space her majesty, and ten princes in several provinces, might have been killed. God bless her majesty from him; for before Almighty God, I joy and am glad in my soul, that it was his hap to discover me in time, tho' there were no danger near.—And now to the manner of our Meetings. He came to me in the beginning of August, and spake to me in this or like sort. Cousin, let us do somewhat, sithence we can have nothing. I offered to join with him, and gladly heard him, hoping because I knew him to be a Catholic, that he would hit upon that I had in my head; but it fell not out so. He thought the delivery of the queen of Scotland easy, presuming upon his credit and kindred in the North: I thought it dangerous to her, and impossible to men of our fortunes: He fell from that to the taking of Berwick. I spake of Quinborough and the Navy, rather to entertain him with discourse, than that I cared for those motions, my head being full of a greater matter.—12. I told him that I had another matter of enterprize, more honourable and profitable to us, and the catholic's Commonwealth, than all these, if he would join in it with me, as he presently vowed to do: He pressed to know it; I willed him to sleep upon the motion: He did so, and (belike overtaken) came to me the next morning to my lodging in London, offered to join with me, and took his oath upon a Bible, to conceal and constantly to pursue the Enterprize for the advancement of Religion; which I also did, and meant to perform: the killing of the queen was the matter.—The manner and place, to be on horseback, with eight or ten horses when she should ride abroad about St. James's, or some other like place. It was once thought fit in a garden, and that the escape would be easiest by water into Sheppy, or some other part; but we resolved upon the first.—This continued as agreed upon many months, until he heard of the death of Westmoreland, whose land and dignity (whereof he assured himself) bred belike this conscience in him to discover a Treason in February contrived and agreed upon in August. If it cost him not an ambitious head at last, let him never trust me. He brought a tall gentleman (whom he commended for an excellent pistolier) to me to Chanon-Row, to make one in the match: but I refused to deal with him, being loth to lay my head upon so many hands.—Master Nevil hath (I think) forgotten, that he did swear to me at divers times, that all the advancement she could give, should serve but for her scourge, if ever time and occasion should serve; and that though he would not lay hand upon her in a corner, his heart served him to strike off her head in the field. Now leaving him to himself, this much (to make an end) I must confess of myself, I did mean to try what might be done in parliament, to do my best to hinder all hard courses, to have prayed hearing of the queen's majesty to move her (if I could) to take compassion upon her Catholic subjects: and when all had failed, to do as I intended. If her majesty by this course would have eased them, though she had never preferred me, I had with all comfort and patience borne it.—13. But if she had preferred me without ease or care of them, the Enterprize had held. PARRY.—God preserve the Queen, and incline her merciful heart to forgive me this desperate Purpose; and to take my head (with all my heart) for her better satisfaction.

After which, for the Letter manifesting of his Treasons, on the 14th of February, last, there was a Letter written by him to her majesty, very voluntarily, all of his own hand, without any motion made to him; the tenour whereof, for that which concerneth these his traitorous dealings, is as followeth:

A LETTER written by Parry to her Majesty.

"YOUR majesty may see by my voluntary Confession, the dangerous fruits of a discontented mind; and how constantly I pursued my first conceived purpose in Venice, for the relief of the afflicted Catholics; continued it in Lyons, and resolved in Paris to put it in adventure for the restitution of England to the ancient obedience of the See Apostolic. You may see withal, how it is commended, allowed, and warranted in conscience, divinity, and policy, by the Pope and some great divines: though it be true or likely, that most of our English divines, less practised in matters of this weight, do utterly mislike and condemn it.—The Enterprize is prevented, and Conspiracy discovered by an honourable gentleman, my kinsman and late familiar friend, master Edmund Nevil, privy and by solemn oath, taken upon the Bible, party to the matter, whereof I am heartily glad, but now sorry, in my very soul, that ever I conceived or intended it, how commendable or meritorious soever I thought it. God thank him, and forgive me, who would not now, before God, attempt it, if I had liberty and opportunity to do it, to gain your kingdom. I beseech Christ, that my death and example may as well satisfy your majesty and the world, as it shall glad and content me.—The queen of Scotland is your prisoner; let her be honourably entreated, but yet surely guarded.—The French king is French, you know it well enough, you will find him occupied when he should do you good ; he will not lose a pilgrimage to save you a crown. I have no more to say at this time, but that with my heart and soul I do now honour and love you ; am inwardly sorry for mine offence, and ready to make you amends by my death and patience. Discharge me à culpâ, but not à peccâ, good lady. And so farewell, most gracious, and the best-natured and qualified queen that ever lived in England. From the Tower, the 14th of February, 1584. W. PARRY."

This done, the cardinal di Como his Letter in Italian was delivered unto Parry's hand, by the direction of Mr. Vice-chamberlain ; which Parry there perused, and openly affirmed to be wholly of the cardinal's own hand-writing, and the seal to be his own also, and to be with a cardinal's hat on it : And himself did openly read it in Italian.

A mon Signore, mon Signore Guglielmo Parry.

" MON signore, la santità di N. S. ha veduto le Lettere di V. S. del primo con la fede inclusa, et non puo se non laudare la buona dispositione et resolutione che scrive di tenere verso il servizio et beneficio publico, nel che la santità sua lessorta di perseverare, con farne riuscire li effetti che V. S. promette : Et acciòche tanto maggiormente V. S. sia ajutata da quel buon spirito che l'ha mosso, le concede sua Beneditione, plenaria Indulgenza et Remissionne di tutti li peccati, secondo che V. S. ha chiesto, assicurandos si che oltre il merito, che n'havera in cielo, vuole anco sua santità costituirsi debitore a riconoscere li meriti di V. S. in ogni miglior modo che potra, et cio tanto piu, quanto che V. S. usa maggior modestia in non pretendere niente. Metta dunque ad effetto li suoi santi et honorati pensieri, et attenda astar sano. Che per fine io me le offero di core, et le desidero ogni buono et felice successo. Di Roma a 30 di Gennaro, 1584. Al piacer di V. S. N. CARDINALE DI COMO."

The words bearing sense as it were written to a bishop, or to a man of such a degree, it was demanded of him by Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, Whether he had not taken the degree of a Bishop ? He said, No : But said at first, those terms were proper to the degree he had taken. And after said, That the cardinal did vouchsafe, as of a favour, to write so to him. Then the Copy of that Letter in English was in like manner openly read by the Clerk of the Crown ; which Parry then acknowledged to be truly translated.

Cardinal de Como's Letter to Wm. Parry, January 30th, 1584, by account of Rome.

" MON signor, the holiness of our Lord hath seen the letter of your signory, of the first, with the assurance included, and cannot but commend the good disposition and resolution, which you write to hold towards the service and benefit public : Wherein his holiness doth exhort you to persevere, with causing to bring forth the effects which your signory promiseth. And to the end you may be so much the more holpen by that good spirit which hath moved you thereunto, his blessedness do grant to you plenary indulgence and remission of all your sins, according to your request ; assuring you, that besides the merit that you shall receive therefore in Heaven, his holiness will further make himself debtor, to re-acknowledge the deservings of your signory in the best manner that he can : And that so much the more, in that your signory useth the greater modesty, in not pretending any thing. Put therefore to effect your holy and honourable thoughts, and attend your health. And to conclude, I offer myself unto you heartily, and do desire all good and happy success. At the pleasure of your signory,

N. CARD. OF COMO."

And thereupon was shewed unto Parry his Letter of the 18th of February, written to the Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Steward : which he confessed to be all of his own hand-writing, and which was read accordingly.

William Parry's Letter to the Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Leicester.

" MY lords, now that the Conspiracy is discovered, the fault confessed, my conscience cleared, and mind prepared patiently to suffer the pains due for so heinous a crime ; I hope it shall not offend you, if crying Miserere, with the poor publican, I leave to despair with cursed Cain. My case is rare and strange, and, for any thing I can remember, singular : A natural subject solemnly to vow the death of his natural queen, so born, so known, and so taken by all men, for the relief of the afflicted Catholics, and restitution of Religion. The matter first conceived in Venice, the service, in general words, presented to the Pope, continued and undertaken in Paris ; and lastly, commended and warranted by his holiness, digested and resolved in England, if it had not been prevented by accusation, or by her majesty's greater lenity, and more gracious usage of her catholic subjects. This is my first and last offence conceived against my prince or country, and doth, I cannot deny, contain all other faults whatsoever. It is now to be punished by death, or most graciously, beyond all common expectation, to be pardoned. Death I do confess to have deserved ; life I do, with all humility, crave, if it may stand with the queen's honour, and policy of the time. To leave so great a Treason unpunished, were strange : to draw it by my death in example, were dangerous. A sworn servant to take upon him such an enterprize, upon such a ground, and by such a warrant, hath not been seen in England : To indict him, arraign him, bring him to the scaffold, and to publish his offence, can do no good : To hope that he hath more to discover than is confessed, or that at his Execution he will unsay any thing he hath written, is in vain : to conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were very hard, and against former experiences. The question then is, Whether it is better to kill him, or (lest the matter be mistaken) upon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine own opinion, though partial, I will deliver you my conscience. The Case is good queen Elizabeth's, the offence is committed against her sacred person, and she may (of her mercy) pardon it without prejudice to any. Then this I say, in few words, as a man more desirous to discharge his troubled conscience, than to live. Pardon poor Parry, and relieve him; for life without living is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous, or dishonourable to the queen's majesty (as by your favours, I think it full of honour and mercy) then I beseech your lordships (and no other) once to hear me before I be indicted, and afterwards, if I must die, humbly to intreat the queen's majesty to hasten my Trial and Execution, which I pray God (with all my heart) may prove as honourable to her as I hope it shall be happy to me; who will while I live (as I have done always) pray to Jesus Christ for her majesty's long and prosperous reign.—From the Tower, the 18th of February, 1584. W. PARRY."

These matters being read openly, for manifestation of the matter, Parry prayed leave to speak: Whereto Mr. Vice-Chamberlain said, If you will say any thing for the better opening to the world of those your foul and horrible facts, speak on; but if you mean to make any excuse of that which you have confessed, which else would have been and do stand proved against you, for my part, I will not sit to hear you.

Then her majesty's Attorney-General Popham stood up and said, It appeareth before you my lords, that this man hath been indicted and arraigned of several heinous and most horrible Treasons, and hath confessed them, which is before you of record; wherfore there resteth no more to be done, but for the Court to give Judgment accordingly, which here I require in the behalf of the queen's majesty.

Then said Parry, I pray you hear me for discharging of my conscience. I will not go about to excuse myself, nor to seek to save my life: I care not for it; you have my confession of record, that is enough for my life: And I mean to utter more, for which I were worthy to die. And said, I pray you hear me, in that I am to speak to discharge my conscience.

Then said Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, Parry, then do thy duty according to conscience, and utter all that thou canst say concerning those thy most wicked facts.

Then said Parry, My cause is rare, singular, and unnatural, conceived at Venice, presented in general words to the pope, undertaken at Paris, commended and allowed of by his holiness, and was to have been executed in England, if it had not been prevented. Yea, I have committed many Treasons, for I have committed Treason in being reconciled, and Treason in taking absolution. There hath been no Treason since the first year of the queen's reign touching Religion, but that I am guilty of, (except for receiving of Agnus Dei's, and persuading, as I have said, and yet never intending, to kill queen Elizabeth) I appeal to her own knowledge, and to my Lord Treasurer's, and master Secretary's.

Then said my lord Hudson, Hast thou acknowledged it so often, and so plainly in Writing under thy hand, and here of record; and now, when thou shouldst have thy Judgment according to that which thou hast confessed thyself guilty of, dost thou go back again, and deny the effect of all? How can we believe that thou now sayest?

Then said Master Vice-Chamberlain, This is absurd; thou hast not only confessed generally, that thou wert Guilty, according to the Indictment, which summarily, and yet in express words, doth contain, that thou hadst traiterously compassed and intended the Death and Destruction of her majesty; but thou also saidst particularly, that thou wert guilty of every of the Treasons contained therein, whereof the same was one, in plain and express Letter set down, and read unto thee. Yea, thou saidst that thou wert guilty of more Treasons too besides these. And didst thou not upon thy Examination, voluntarily confess, how thou wast moved first thereunto by mislike of thy state after thy departure out of the realm, and that thou didst dislike her majesty, for that she had done nothing for thee; how by wicked Papists and Popish Books thou wert persuaded that it was lawful to kill her majesty; how thou wert by reconciliation become one of that wicked sort, that held her majesty for neither lawful queen nor christian, and that it was meritorious to kill her? And didst thou not signify that thy purpose to the Pope by letters, and receivedst Letters from the Cardinal, how he allowed of thine intent, and excited thee to perform it, and thereupon didst receive absolution? And didst thou not conceive it, promise it, vow it, swear it, and receive the Sacrament that thou wouldst do it? And didst not thou thereupon affirm, that thy vows were in heaven, and thy letters and promises on earth to bind thee to do it? and that whatsoever her majesty would have done for thee, could not have removed thee from that intention or purpose, unless she would have desisted from dealing, as she hath done, with the catholics, as thou callest them? All this thou hast plainly confessed; and I protest before this great assembly, thou hast confessed it more plainly and in better sort than my memory will serve me to utter: and sayest thou now, that thou never meantest it?

Ah, said Parry, your honours know how my Confession, upon mine Examination, was extorted.—Then both the lord Hudson and Master Vice-Chamberlain affirmed that there was no torture or threatening words offered him.—But Parry then said, that they told him, that if he would not confess willingly, he should have torture: whereunto their honours answered, that they used not any speech or word of torture to him. You said, said Parry, that you would proceed with rigour against me, if I would not confess it of myself.—But their Honours expressly affirmed, that they used no such words. But I will tell thee, said Master Vice-Chamberlain, what we said. I spake these words: If you will willingly utter the truth of yourself, it may do you good, I wish you to do so; if you will not, we must then proceed in ordinary course to take your examination. Whereunto you answered, that you would tell the truth of yourself. Was not this true? Which then he yielded unto.

And hereunto her majesty's attorney-general put Parry in remembrance what speeches he used to the lieutenant of the Tower, the queen's majesty's serjeant at law, master Gawdie, and the same attorney, on Saturday the 20th of February last, at the Tower, upon what he was by them then examined by order from the lords; which was, that he acknowledged he was most mildly and favourably dealt with in all his Examinations: which he also at the bar then acknowledged to be true.

Then Mr. Vice-Chamberlain said, that it was a wonder to see the magnanimity of her majesty, which, after that thou hadst opened those traitorous practices in sort as thou hast laid it down in thy confession, was nevertheless such, and so far from all fear, as that she would not so much as acquaint any one of her highness's privy council with it, to his knowledge, no not until after this thine enterprize discovered and made manifest. And besides that which thou hast set down under thine own hand, thou didst confess, that thou hadst prepared two Scottish daggers, fit for such a purpose; and those being disposed away by thee, thou didst say, that another would serve thy turn. And withal, Parry, didst thou not also confess before us, how wonderfully thou wert appalled and perplexed upon a sudden, at the presence of her majesty at Hampton-Court this last summer, saying, that thou didst think thou then sawest in her the very likeness and image of king Henry 8.? And that therewith and upon some speeches used by her majesty, thou didst turn about and weep bitterly to thyself? And yet didst still call to mind that thy vows were in heaven, thy letters and promises on earth; and that therefore thou didst say with thyself, that there was no remedy but to do it? Didst thou not confess this? The which he acknowledged.

Then said the Lord Hunsdon, sayest thou now, that thou didst never mean to kill the queen? Didst thou not confess, that when thou didst utter this practice of treachery to her majesty, that thou didst cover it with all the skill thou hadst, and that it was done by thee, rather to get credit and access thereby, than for any regard thou hadst of her person. But in truth thou didst it, that thereby thou mightest have better opportunity to perform thy wicked enterprize. And wouldst thou have run into such fear as thou didst confess that thou wert in, when thou didst utter it, if thou hadst never meant it? What reason canst thou shew for thyself?

With that he cried out in a furious manner, I never meant to kill her: I will lay my blood upon queen Elizabeth and you, before God and the world. And thereupon fell into a rage and evil words with the queen's majesty's attorney-general.

Then said the lord Hunsdon, this is but thy popish pride and ostentation, which thou wouldst have to be told to thy fellows of that faction, to make them believe that thou diest for popery, when thou diest for most horrible and dangerous Treasons against her majesty, and thy whole country. For thy laying of thy blood, it must lie on thine own head, as a just reward of thy wickedness. The laws of the realm most justly condemn thee to die, out of thine own mouth, for the conspiring the destruction both of her majesty, and of us all: therefore thy blood be upon thee; neither her majesty nor we at any time sought it, thyself hast spilt it.

Then he was asked, What he could say, why Judgment of Death ought not to be awarded against him? Whereunto he said, he did see that he must die, because he was not settled.—What meapest thou by that? said Mr. Vice-Chamberlain. Said he, look into your Study and into your new Books, and you shall find what I mean.—I protest, (said his Honour) I know not what thou meapest: thou dost not well to use such dark Speeches, unless thou wouldst plainly utter what thou meapest thereby. But he said, he cared not for Death, and that he would lay his blood amongst them.

Then spake the Lord Chief Justice of England, being required to give the Judgment, and said: Parry, you have been much heard, and what you mean by being settled, I know not; but I see you are so settled in popery, that you cannot settle yourself to be a good subject. But touching that you should say, to stay Judgment from being given against you, your speeches must be of one of these kinds, either to prove the indictment (which you have confessed to be true) to be insufficient in law: or else to plead somewhat touching her majesty's mercy, why justice should not be done of you. All other speeches wherein you have used great liberty, is more than by Law you can ask. These be the matters you must look to, what say you to them? Whereunto he said nothing.

Then said the Lord Chief Justice: Parry, thou hast been before this time indicted of divers most horrible and hateful Treasons, committed against thy most gracious sovereign and native country: The Matter most detestable, the Manner most subtle and dangerous, and the occasions and means that led thee thereunto most ungodly and villainous. That thou didst intend it, it is most evident by thyself. The matter was the destruction of a most sacred and an anointed queen, thy sovereign and mistress, who hath shewed thee such favour, as some thy betters have not obtained; yea, the overthrow of thy country wherein thou wert born, and of a most happy commonwealth whereof thou art a member, and of such a queen, as hath bestowed on thee the benefit of all benefits in this world, that is, thy life, heretofore granted thee by her mercy, when thou hadst lost it by justice and desert. Yet thou her servant, sworn to defend her, meant'st, with thy bloody hand, to have taken away her life, that mercifully gave thee thine when it was yielded into her hands: This is the Matter wherein thou hast offended. The Manner was most subtle and dangerous, beyond all that before thee have committed any wickedness against her majesty: For thou making shew as if thou wouldest simply have uttered for her safety the evil that others had contrived, didst but seek thereby credit and access, that thou mightest take the apter opportunity for her destruction. And for the occasions and means that drew thee on, they were most ugly and villainous, as the persuasions of the pope, of Papists, and popish books. The pope pretendeth that he is a pastor, when as in truth he is far from feeding of the flock of Christ, but rather as a wolf, seeketh but to feed on, and to suck out the blood of true Christians, and as it were thirsteth after the blood of our most gracious and Christian queen. And these Papists and Popish Books, while they pretend to set forth divinity, they do indeed most ungodly teach and persuade that which is quite contrary both to God and his Word; for the Word teaches obedience of subjects towards princes, and forbiddeth any private man to kill; but they teach subjects to disobey princes, and that a private wicked person may kill; yea, and whom? A most godly queen, and their own natural and most gracious sovereign. Let all men therefore take heed how they receive any thing from him, hear or read any of their books, and how they confer with any Papists. God grant her majesty, that she may know by thee, however she trust such like to come so near her person. But see the end, and why thou didst it, and it will appear to be a most miserable, fearful, and foolish thing; for thou didst imagine that it was to relieve those that thou callest catholics, who were most likely amongst all others to have felt the worst of it, if thy devilish practice had taken effect. But sith thou hast been indicted of the Treasons comprised in the Indictment, and thereupon arraigned, and hast confessed thyself guilty of them, the court doth award, that thou shalt be had from hence to the place whence thou didst come, and so drawn through the open city of London upon an hurdle, to the place of execution, and there to be hanged and let down alive, and thy privy parts cut off, and thy entrails taken out and burnt in thy sight; then thy head to be cut off, and thy body to be divided in four parts, and to be disposed of at her majesty's pleasure: And God have mercy on thy soul.

Parry (persisting still in his rage and passion) said, I here summon queen Elizabeth to answer for my blood before God.

Whereupon the lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to take him from the bar, and so he did: and as he was going away the people cried out, 'Away with the Traitor, away with him:' whereupon he was conveyed in a barge to the Tower again by water. Upon the 2d of March ensuing he was delivered by the lieutenant of the Tower, early in the morning, to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who received him at Tower-hill; and according to the Judgment caused him to be forthwith set on an hurdle, on the which he was drawn through the midst of the city of London unto the place for his execution in Palace-yard Westminster, where having long time of stay permitted him before his execution, he impudently denied that he was ever guilty of any intention to kill queen Elizabeth; and so (without any request to the people to pray for him, or using any outward prayer himself) he was turned off, and executed according to the Sentence.

61. Inquisition of a Jury of the City of London before the Coroner, had upon occasion of the Death of the Earl of NORTHUMBERLAND: With a Report of his Treasons: 27 ELIZ. A. D. 1585. [Somers' Tracts. 4 Coll. vol. 3. p. 420.]

[THIS Article, though not strictly a Trial, is republished from the Somers's Tracts, because the earl of Northumberland who is the subject of it, had been before found Guilty, by his own Confession, of conspiring to deliver the queen of Scots out of the earl of Shrewsbury's custody; and also because at the time of his death, he was imprisoned under a charge of Treason. The transaction throws some light upon the History of queen Elizabeth, and Mary queen of Scots.]

A true and summary Report of the Declaration of some part of the Earl of Northumberland's Treasons, delivered publicly in the Court at the Star-Chamber by the Lord Chancellor and others of her majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and Council learned, by her majesty's special commandment; together with the Examinations and Depositions of sundry persons, touching the manner of his most wicked and violent Murder, committed upon himself with his own hand, in the Tower of London, the 20th day of June, 1585. In ædibus C. Barker, Printer to the queen of England, her most excellent majesty.

To the READER.

MALICE, among other essential properties

appertaining to her ugly nature, hath this one not inferior to the rest and the worst, Incredulity, wherewith she commonly possesseth the minds and affections of all those that are infected with her, so blinding the eyes and judgment of the best and clearest sighted, that they cannot see or perceive the bright beams of the truth, although the same be delivered with never so great purity, proof, circumstance, and probability. It is said, that no truth passeth abroad unaccompanied with her contrary, and as they go, truth is ever constrained to yield the precedence and pre-eminence to her yoke-fellow falshood, whose lodging is always first made and prepared without a bargainer in the corrupt nature of mankind by whom he is first received, entertained and harboured at all times: whereof in our daily experience there happen many and dangerous demonstrations, especially in matters of the highest moment, tending to excuse or accuse the actions of the greatest personages.—There was of late delivered in publick by persons of honour, credit and reputation, a large Declaration of certain Treasons practised by the late earl of Northumberland, of the manner of his untimely Death, being with his own hand murdered in the Tower, and of the causes that wrought him thereunto: the particularities whereof are such and so many, as for the help of my memory (coming then to the Star-chamber by occasion, and not looking for any such presence of the nobility and privy council as I found there at that time, and not looking for any such cause of that nature to have been handled there that day) I took notes of the several matters declared by the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Attorney, and Solicitor-Gen-ral, the Lord Chief Baron, and Mr. Vice Chamberlain: for, as I remember, they spoke in order as they are here marshalled, and therefore I place them in this sort, and not according to their precedence in dignity.—Upon hearing of the Treasons, with their Proofs and Circumstances, and the desperate manner of the earl's destruction delivered in that place, and by persons of that quality, I supposed no man to have been so void of judgment, or the use of common reason, that would have doubted of any one point or particle thereof, until it was my chance (falling in company with divers persons at sundry times, as well about the city of London as abroad) to hear many men report variously and corruptly of the manner and matter of this publick Declaration, possessing the minds and opinions of the people with manifest untruths: as, that the earl had been unjustly detained in prison, without proof or just cause of suspicion of Treason; and that he had been murdered by device and practice of some great enemies, and not destroyed by himself. These slanderous reports have ministered unto me this occasion to set forth unto thy view and consideration, gentle reader, this short collection of the said Treasons and Murder, as near unto the truth as my notes taken may lead and permit me, with the view of some of the examinations themselves concerning this cause, for my better satisfaction since obtained: which I have undertaken for two respects; the one, to convince the false and malicious impressions and constructions received, and made of these actions, by such as are in heart enemies to the happy estate of her majesty's present government: the other, because it may be thought necessary for the preventing of a further contagion, like to grow, by this creeping infection, in the minds of such as are apt, though otherwise indifferent, in these and the like rumours, to receive the bad as the good, and they the most in number. Wherein, if I have seemed more bold than wise, or intermeddled myself in matters above my reach, and appertaining unto me, I crave pardon where it is to be asked, and commit myself to thy friendly interpretation to be made of my simple travail, and dutiful meaning herein.

Upon the 23rd day of June last, assembled in the Court of Star-chamber, sir Thomas Bromley, knt. Lord Chancellor of England, William Lord Burleigh, Lord High Treasurer of England, George earl of Shrewsbury, Lord Marshal of England, Henry earl of Derby, Robert earl of Leicester, Charles lord Howard of Effingham, Lord Chamberlain, Henry lord Hunsdon, Lord Governor of Berwick, sir Francis Knollis knt. Treasurer, sir James Crofte, knt. Comptroller of her Majesty's Household, sir Christopher Hatton, knt. Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen's Majesty, the Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Bench, the Master of the Rolls, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and others; the audience very great of knights, esquires, and men of other quality, the Lord Chancellor began briefly and summarily to declare, that whereas Henry late earl of Northumberland, for divers notable Treasons and Practises, by him taken in hand, to the danger, not only of her majesty's royal person, but to the peril of the whole realm, had been long detained in prison, and looking into the guilt of his own conscience, and perceiving by such means of intelligence, as he, by corrupting of his keepers, and other like devices, had obtained, that his Treasons were by sundry Examinations and Confessions discovered, grew thereby into such a desperate estate, as that thereupon he most wickedly destroyed and murdered himself; which being made known to the lords of her majesty's Privy Council, order was thereupon taken, and direction given to the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, and the Lord Baron of the Exchequer, to examine the manner and circumstances of his Death, which they with all good endeavour and diligence had accordingly performed. And lest, through the sinister means of such persons as be evil-affected to the present estate of her majesty's government, some bad and untrue conceits might be had, as well of the cause of the earl's dettainment, as of the manner of his Death, it was therefore thought necessary to have the truth thereof made known in that presence: and then he required her majesty's learned council there present, to deliver at large the particularities, both of the Treasons, and in what sort the earl had murdered himself. Then began John Popham, esq. her majesty's Attorney General, as followeth :

THE earl of Northumberland, about the time of the last Rebellion in the North, in the 11th year of her majesty's reign (then called by the title of Henry Piercy, knt.) had undertaken the conveying away of the Scottish queen; for the which, as appeareth by a record of the 14th year of her majesty's reign, in the court of her majesty's Bench he was indicted, he confessed the offence, and put himself to her majesty's mercy. At which time, upon his said Confession, Submission, and faithful promise of his duty and allegiance to her highness from thenceforth, the queen's majesty, of her merciful nature, was pleased not to look into his offence with the extremity of her laws, but dealt therein, as by way of contempt only, as may appear by the Record; the effect whereof was then shewed in court, under the hand of one of the Clerks of her majesty's said Bench, in hæc verba :

' Middlesex.

' Mem. That Henry Piercy, late of Tinmouth, ' in the County of Northumberland, knt. was ' indicted in the term of Easter, in the 14th ' year of her majesty's reign, for that he, with ' divers others, did conspire for the delivering ' of the queen of Scots out of the custody of ' the earl of Shrewsbury: upon which Indict- ' ment the same Henry Piercy did confess the ' offence, and did put himself to the queen's ' mercy, and thereupon Judgment was after ' given by the court, that the said Henry should ' pay to the queen for a fine for his said offence, ' 5000 marks, as appeareth by the Record ' thereof in court Per Micha. 14 & 15 Elizab. ' Regine, Rotulo quinto inter placista Regine. ' Concordat cum Recordo. Per Jo. IVE.

By this Record it may appear, that the earl had his hand in that Rebellion. But for a further proof thereof, it is most manifestly discovered in a certain Tract, written by the bishop of Ross, wherein he sheweth how faithfully he behaved himself in the managing of those Treasons, at and about the time of that Rebellion, that the said earl was, in effect, as far plunged into the same, as the late earl his brother, howsoever he wound himself out of the danger at that time.—Notwithstanding these traitorous practices, the queen's majesty was contented to remit all within a short time, and then accepted most graciously of him both in honour and favour, though unworthily bestowed upon him; for that he utterly forgetting those graces and favours received at her majesty's merciful hands, with a graceless resolution was contented to enter into a new Plot, now lately contrived, not only for delivering the Scottish queen, but for the invading of the whole realm, the overthrow of the government, as well concerning the State of Religion, as otherwise, the danger of her majesty's sacred person, and advancing of the said Scottish queen to the regal crown and scepter of this realm, whereunto her majesty is lineally and lawfully born and descended, and wherein God of his mercy continue her long, in happy state of government, to the increase of her own glory, and the comfort of her loving and obedient subjects.

Then did master Attorney enter into the particularities of the Treasons, leaving many parts thereof untouched, because the case stood so as it was not then convenient to reveal them, as he said, in respect that they touched some other persons undeak withal at that time, shewing that Throckmorton's Treasons were not old, but fresh in every man's memory, and how far forth they reached unto the earl, he declared. And for that the Treasons of Throckmorton tended especially to the invading of the realm with foreign forces, the purpose of that invasion long before intended, is proved by sundry Examinations and Confessions taken here within the realm, as well of her majesty's own subjects as others, by letters intercepted, written from and to the conspirators abroad and at home, and by other good advertisements and intelligences had from foreign parts, discovering the same. He declared, that in a Letter, written from Dr. Sanders to Dr. Allen out of Spain, in the year 1577, it is set down, among other things, that the State of Christendom stood upon the stout assailing of England.—That in a Letter sent to the same Allen from Rome, touching audience given by the Pope to the ambassadors of certain foreign princes, between the pope and whom a league was agreed on against the queen's majesty, there were inclosed certain Articles, containing in effect, that the realm should be invaded with 20,000 men, at the charge of the said pope and princes, that her majesty should be deposed, and some English catholic elected king.—That it was confessed, that the coming over of so many priests into the realm, was to win great numbers to the catholic party, to join (if opportunity served) either with foreign invasion, or with tumult at home.—That at Narbonne in Provence, there was met an Englishman, being the head preacher there, who gave intelligence to one of her majesty's subjects, that the realm should shortly be invaded by a foreign king, and the popish religion restored: and said further, that priests came into England, and dispersed themselves in counties, to make their party strong.—A message was sent in Nov. 1581 to Dr. Allen, from a subject of this realm, by a seminary priest then returning beyond the seas, that whereas he had received word from Allen at Allhallow-Tide before, that men and all things were in a readiness, if the place of landing might be known; that Allen should forthwith send word whether things were in such readiness or not; and if they were, he would then send him such perfect instructions as he could.—One Payue, executed for Treason, confessed, that this realm could not continue in the state wherein it was; for that the pope had a special care thereof, and would in a short time, either by foreign princes, or by some other means, work a change of things here.

From hence, Mr. Attorney fell into the Treasons confessed by Francis Throckmorton, shewing, that the state of this realm had been often presented to the consideration of a foreign prince, who, after long hearkening to the motion, had resolved to yield what furtherance he might, and to give all aids necessary for the reforming of religion, so they might be backed by such as were well affected within this country.—That the duke of Guise had solicited for two years together the pope and other princes, to supply him with forces: But being crossed by the death of a great personage, it was now grown to this pass, if there could be a party found in England to join in that action, and convenient places and means for landing, and other things necessary, there should be a supply for Guise of foreign strength.—Francis Throckmorton was recommended from beyond the seas to don Bernardino de Mendoza, ambassador resident for the Spanish king here in England, who acquainted Throckmorton what plot was laid for the enterprize of the duke of Guise, and that he was willed to confer with Throckmorton in the matter: who thereupon acquainted the said ambassador with the plot of the havens, and with the noblemen and gentlemen that he had set down as fit to be dealt withal in that cause.—Throckmorton said, That the bottom of this enterprize (which was not to be known to many) was, that if a toleration of religion might not be obtained without alteration of the government, that then the government should be altered, and the queen removed.—That the Scottish queen was made acquainted from the duke of Guise with the intencion to relieve her by these forces.—It was in Debate between Throckmorton and the Spanish ambassador, how the Scottish queen might be delivered, as by an enterprize to be made with a certain number of horse: And that it was told Francis Throckmorton by his brother Thomas Throckmorton, that it was a principal matter in debate, beyond the seas, how she might be delivered with safety; the lack of resolution wherein was the principal stay of the execution of the attempt of invasion.—Mendoza told Francis Throckmorton about Bartholomew-Tide 1583, that one Moape was come into England to sound the earl of Northumberland and other principal men in Sussex; and about the end of September following, the same Mendoza told him, that Moape was Charles Paget, and that he came not only to sound the men, but to view the places, the havens, the provisions and means, and nearness and commodity of men's abidings that should join with the foreign forces.—It was devised, that such noblemen and others as would be contented to assist the foreign forces (being justices of peace and of credit in their counties) might, by colour of their authority, levy men as for her majesty's defence, and yet employ them to assist the foreign forces. The lord Paget was made acquainted with this devise, and answered, that it was a good course, and that he had thought upon it before.—Mendoza told Throckmorton, that Charles Paget had been in Sussex, and had spoken with those that were there, and that he came to move the earl of Northumberland and others.—The night before Throckmorton was apprehended, he came to the lord Paget, and desired him that he would not acquaint the earl of Northumberland and certain others (whom he named) with such matters as had passed between them two, touching the practice of this invasion: And the lord Paget willed him to deal as wisely for his part as he would for himself, and all should be well: But, quoth the lord Paget, the earl of Northumberland knoweth you well enough.—It was once agreed among the confederates, that the duke of Guise should land in Sussex, being over against Diepe and Normandy; which after was misliked, because those parts lay too near to her majesty's greatest force and store, and that the people thereabouts for the most part were protestants. Master Attorney shewed further, That in Summer last, there was taken upon the seas, sailing towards Scotland, a Scottish Jesuit, about whom there was found a discourse, written in Italian, of a like enterprize to be attempted against England, which should have been executed in September or October then last past; wherein assurance is made, that the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, Dacres that is dead, whom they termed lord Dacres, and of all the catholic lords and gentlemen in the North parts; where the invasion should have been attempted, setting it down that it is not said by conjecture that these men are assured; but that it is certainly known that they will join with the foreign forces. In the said discourse it is also affirmed, that the priests dispersed in the realm can dispose of the other catholics of the realm as they shall be ordered; and that the pope's excommunication should be renewed, and pronounced against her majesty, and all those that shall take her part; and that all such should be holden traitors that did not join with that army by a day.

When master Attorney had thus proved the purpose of Invasion, he proceeded to the proof of Charles Paget's coming over about the practice and prosecution of that enterprize. And first, That Paget came to Petworth, in Sept. 1583, was secretly received, and brought in the night late to the earl of Northumberland, into his gallery at Petworth, by one of the earl's servants; where the earl and he had secret conference together by the space of a large hour: from thence Paget was likewise conveyed back into the town by the same servant, and there lodged all that night; and the next night following was conveyed secretly to a lodge in the earl's park, at Petworth, called Conigar Lodge, where he was kept with the like secrecy by the space of eight days, or thereabouts, and the servant by whom Paget was thus conveyed, was by the earl enjoined and commanded in no wise to discover

Paget's being there.—The earl of Northumberland upon the arrival of Charles Paget, sent for the lord Paget, with the privy of this servant, who was made believe, that Charles came over to set things in order, and to pass certain deeds and conveyances between the lord Paget and him. The lord Paget came to Petworth, staid there two nights, lodged in the earl's house, conferred with Charles Paget and with the earl together sundry times.—The earl, after his apprehension, being at several times examined what causes or affairs had passed between the lord Paget and Charles his brother, when they were together at Petworth; answered one while, that they passed certain deeds and conveyances; and another while, that there was only a will or testament signed and sealed between them: he confessed that he set his hand to the will, but knew not what the same contained. All which appeared to be false; for that it hath fallen out by occasion of seizure of the lands and goods of the lord Paget (after his departure out of the realm) that he had disposed of his lands and goods by another course of assurance executed at London; and therefore, their pretence of the passing of deeds and will at Petworth, was but a device to shadow their traitorous conspiracies. And for better proof thereof, it was alledged by Master Attorney, that Charles Paget returning from Petworth to the house of one William Davis, near to the place where Paget had landed in Sussex, and took shipping again at his departure beyond the seas, sent to William Shelley, esq. residing then at his house at Michelgrove, distant about a mile from the house of William Davis, to come unto him (who within few days before had been at the lodge at Petworth, with the said Paget:) and now at their meeting in a coppice near to Davis's house, Paget entered into speech and discourse with him of divers matters; and at the last, among other things, he began to be inquisitive of the strength and fortification of Portsmouth, and what forces and strength her majesty had in the other parts westward.—Paget broke out, and declared to him, that foreign princes would seek revenge against her majesty of the wrongs by her done unto them, and would take such time and opportunity as might best serve them for that purpose; and said, that those princes disdained to see the Scottish queen so kept and used here as she was, and would use all their forces for her delivery. That the duke of Guise would be a dealer therein; and that the earl of Northumberland would be an assistant unto them; willing Shelley, whatsoever should happen, to follow the earl of Northumberland; affirming, that there was not a nobleman in England of conflict and government like to the said earl: saying further, that the earl of Northumberland was affected to the Scottish queen, and would do what he could for her advancement.—That the duke of Guise had forces in a readiness to be employed for the altering of the state of religion here in England, and to set the Scottish queen at liberty.—Shelley gathered by these, and other speeches which passed between him and Paget, that Paget had dealt with the earl as a chief party, and a man forward in these actions; and Paget confessed that he came over to break, and deal in these matters.—Paget delivered further, that the Catholics would all join for so good a purpose; for that it would be a means to reform Religion.—He said, the stir should be in the North parts, because Sussex was not convenient, as well for that there were no safe landing places, as for that it was so near London, where the queen's majesty would be ready to resist them; and that whensoever any stir should be, the earl of Northumberland would not stay in Sussex, but would go into the North parts.

When master Attorney-General had in this sort laid down the particularities of the Treasons and traitorous practices of the confederates for this purposed invasion, then Thomas Egerton, esq. her majesty's Solicitor, to prove the earl guilty of these Treasons by the circumstances of his own proceedings, shewed, that the earl, knowing how far he himself was touched with the said Treasons, and in what degree of danger he stood if they should have been revealed, found his only hope of safety to consist in the cunning concealing of them; and therefore he endeavoured to cover them by all the possible means he could devise.—And first, by conveying away of the lord Paget, a man not only privy to the practices and Treasons handled by Francis Throckmorton, but also to the Treasons of his brother Charles; wherein the earl and the lord Paget were doubtless both confederates with Charles, made acquainted by him with the causes of his coming over, as principal men with whom he dealt in those matters at Petworth.—The occasion that provoked the earl to convey away the lord Paget, grew upon the apprehension of Throckmorton, who being committed to the Tower, and charged with high matters, was in case to be dealt withal by way of extremity, to be made to confess the treasons charged upon him; in revealing whereof, Charles Paget's coming to Petworth; and the cause of his repair thither, could not be concealed.—No man at this time within the realm could accuse the earl of these confederacies, but the lord Paget only, who stood in danger to be discovered by Francis Throckmorton: The safety therefore of the earl rested altogether upon the lord Paget's departing out of the realm, which was procured by the earl with so great expedition, as that Throckmorton being committed to the Tower about the 7th of Nov. 1583, the earl made means the 12th to have the lord Paget provided of shipping in all haste by William Shelley: wherein the earl used such importunate intreaty, and sent so often to hasten the preparation of the ship, that the same was provided, and the lord Paget embarked by the 23d day of the same month following, or thereabouts.—The departure of the lord Paget was soon after discovered, and how, and by whom he was conveyed away: Her majesty, upon good cause taking offence thereat, the earl, being then at London, had notice thereof, and of the confessions of Throckmorton (who began to discover the treasons) came presently down to Petworth, sent immediately for William Shelley, who coming to him to Petworth the next day about dinner-time, met the earl in a dining parlour, ready to go to his dinner. The earl took Shelley aside into a chamber, and as a man greatly distracted and troubled in mind, entered into these speeches: 'Alas! I am a man cast away;' and Shelley demanding what he meant by those speeches, the earl answered, 'The actions I have entered into, I fear, will be my utter undoing;' and thereupon desired Shelley to keep his counsel, and discover no more of him than he must needs.—The earl, moreover, at this meeting intreated William Shelley to convey away all such as he knew to have been employed, and were privy to the lord Paget's going away, and of Charles Paget's coming over, which was accordingly performed by Shelley: And the earl, for his part, conveyed away a principal man of his own, whom he had often used in messages into France, and had been of trust appointed by the earl, to attend on Charles Paget, all the time of his stay at Connigar Lodge.—Master Solicitor, pursuing the matters that made the earl's practices and devices for the concealing of his Treasons manifest, declared further, That after the earl and Shelley had obtained some liberty in the Tower after their first restraint, the earl found means to have intelligence with Shelley, and was advertised from him of all that he had confessed in his first examinations, taken before they were last restrained: Sithens which time, the earl, by corrupting of his keeper, hath practised to have continual advertisements as before, as well of things done within the Tower as abroad; inso-much as by his said keeper he had sent and conveyed twelve several letters out of the Tower, within the space of nine or ten weeks, and one of those on Sunday the 20th day of June in the morning, when he murdered himself the night following.—By the same corruption of his keepers, he sent also a message to William Shelley, by a maid-servant in the Tower, by which he required him to stand to his first confessions, and to go no further; for so it would be best for him, and he would keep himself out of danger. Whereunto Shelley returned answer, by the same messenger, that he could hold out no longer, that he had concealed the matters as long as he could, and willed the earl to consider, that there was a great difference between the earl's estate and his; for that the earl, in respect of his nobility, was not in danger to be dealt withal in such sort as he the said Shelley was like to be, being but a private gentleman, and therefore to be used with all extremity to be made to confess the truth: wherefore he advised the earl to deal plainly, and to remember what speeches had passed at his house at Petworth, when Charles Paget came last thither.—James Price, by the same corruption of the earl's keeper, came to William Shelley on the Friday or Saturday before Trinity-Sunday last, and told him, that the earl was very desirous to understand how far he had gone in his confessions: And at Price's instance, Shelley did set down in-writing the effect of the said confessions, and sent the same to the said earl, who, upon the sight thereof, perceiving the Treasons revealed and discovered, and knowing thereby how heinous his offences were, fearing the justice and severity of the laws, and also the ruin and overthrow of his house, fell into desperation, and so to the destruction of himself; for confirmation whereof, it was confessed by one Jaques Pantins, a groom of the earl's chamber, who had attended on the earl in the Tower, by the space of ten weeks before his death, that he had heard the earl often say, that master Shelley was no faithful friend unto him, and that he had confessed such things as were sufficient to overthrow them both: That he was undone by Shelley's accusations, affirming, that the earl began to despair of himself, often with tears lamenting his cause, which the earl said to proceed only of the remembrance of his wife and children; saying further, that such matters were laid to his charge, that he expected no favour; but to be brought to his trial, and then he was but a lost man; repeating often that Shelley had undone him, and still mistrusting his cause, wished for death.

Herewith master Solicitor concluded; and then sir Roger Manwood, knight, Lord Chief Baron of her majesty's Exchequer, entered into the description of the earl's Death, and in what sort he had murdered himself; shewing first, how the same had been found by a very substantial Jury, chosen among the best Commoners of the City, empaneled by the coroner, upon the view of the body, and diligent enquiry by all due means had according to the law, and declared, That upon the discovery of the intelligence conveyed between the earl and Shelley, it was thought necessary, for the benefit of her majesty's service, by such of her highness's most honourable privy council as were appointed commissioners, to examine the course of these treasons; that Jaques Pantins, attending upon the earl, and the earl's corrupt keepers should be removed: Whereupon Thomas Bailiff, gentleman, sent to attend on the earl of Northumberland, upon the removing of Palmer and Jaques Pantins from about the said earl (who from the beginning of his last restraint attended on him) for the reasons lastly before-mentioned, was by the lieutenant of the Tower, on the Sunday about two of the clock in the afternoon (being the 20th of June) shut up with the earl, as appointed to remain with him, and serve him in the prison for a time, until Palmer, Pantins, and Price, then committed close prisoners, might be examined how the earl came by such intelligences as were discovered to have passed between the earl and Shelley, and between the earl and others. Bailiff served the earl at his supper, brought him to his bed about nine of the clock; and after some services done by the earl's commandment, departed from the earl to an outer chamber, where he lay part of that night: And being come into his chamber, the earl rose out of his bed, and came to the chamber-door, and bolted the same unto him in the inner side, saying to Bailiff, he could not sleep unless his door were fast. About twelve of the clock at midnight, Bailiff being in a slumber, heard a great noise, seeming unto him to be the falling of some door, or rather a piece of the house: The noise was so sudden and so great, that he started out of his bed, and crying unto the earl with a loud voice, said, My lord know you what this is? The earl not answering, Bailiff cried, and knocked still at the earl's door, saying, My lord, how do you? But finding that the earl made no answer, continued his crying and calling, until an old man that lay without spake to him, saying, Gentleman, shall I call the watch, seeing he will not speak? Yea, quoth Bailiff, for God's sake. Then did the old man rise, and called one of the watch, whom Bailiff intreated, with all possible speed to call master lieutenant unto him. In the mean time, Bailiff heard the earl give a long and most grievous groan, and after that, gave a second groan; and then the lieutenant being come called to the earl, who not answering, Bailiff cried to the lieutenant to break open the earl's chamber-door, bolted unto him on the inner side, which was done, and then they found the earl dead in his bed, and by his bedside a dagge, wherewith he had killed himself.

Sir Owen Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, knight, examined upon his oath, affirmed, That on Sunday last at night, less than a quarter of an hour before one of the clock after midnight, he was called up by the watch to come to the earl of Northumberland, who had been called unto by master Bailiff his keeper, and would not speak (as the watch told him: Whereupon the said sir Owen went presently to the earl's lodging, opened the outer doors till he came to the chamber where master Bailiff lay, which was next to the earl's bed-chamber. Bailiff said to this examinee as he came in, that he was wakened with a noise as it were of a door, or some great thing falling, and that he had called on the earl, and could have no answer: And this examinee going to the earl's chamber-door, finding the same bolted fast on the other side, within the earl's lodging, so as he could not go in to the earl, this examinee called unto the earl, telling him the lieutenant was there, and prayed his lordship to open the door: But this examinee having no answer made unto him, and finding the door fast bolted on the inner side of the earl's chamber with a strong iron bolt, so as they could not enter into the same out of the lodging where the said Bailiff lay, without breaking up the chamber-door, caused the warders who were with this examinee, to thrust in their halberds, and to wrest the door thereby, as much as they could, and withal to run at the door with their feet, and with violence to thrust it open, which they did accordingly. And when this examinee came into the chamber, in turning up the sheets he perceived them to be blooded; and then searching further, found the wound, which was very near the pap, not thinking at the first sight, but that it had been done with a knife. This examinee went thereupon presently to write to the court, and took the warders into the outer chamber, and left them there until he returned, bolting the door of the earl's bed-chamber on the outside; and as soon as this examinee returned from writing of his letter to the court, he searched about the chamber, and found a dagge on the floor, about three feet from the bed, near unto a table, that had a green cloth on it, which did somewhat shadow the dagge: And, after turning down the bed-cloaths, found the box, in the which the powder and pellets were, on the bed under the coverlet; and saith, that the chamber where the earl lay, hath no other door but that one door which was broken open as aforesaid, save one door, that went into a privy, which hath no manner of passage out of it; and that the earl's lodging chamber, and the entering to the privy, are both walled round about with a stone wall, and a brick wall; and that there is no door or passage out of or from the said earl's bed-chamber or privy, but that only door which was broken open by the appointment of this examinee. The warders that were with this examinee at the entry into the prison, and the breaking up of the earl's chamber-door, and the doing of the other things aforesaid, were Michael Sibley, Anthony Davis, William Ryland, and John Potter, and one John Pinner, this examinee's servant, was there also.

For the Proof and Confirmation of the several parts and points of this Déposition, Sibley, Davis, Ryland, Potter, and Pinner were deposed, and they visa voce affirmed so much thereof to be true, as was reported by the examination of the lieutenant, concerning the coming of the lieutenant to the earl's chamber, the breaking up of the door, being bolted with a strong bolt on the inner side, the finding of the earl dead upon his bed, the dagge lying on the ground, the powder and pellets in a box on the bed under the coverlet, with the rest of the circumstances thereunto appertaining. They affirmed also, that there was but one door in the earl's chamber, saving the door of the privy, which, together with the chamber, was strongly walled about with stone and brick: And further, as I remember, the lord chief baron confirmed the same, having viewed the chamber himself where the earl lodged, and was found dead.

Jaques Pantins, in his Examination on the 21st of June, confesseth, that James Price delivered the dagge to the earl his master in this examinee's presence; Whereupon he presently suspected, that the earl meant mischief to himself, and therefore did his endeavour to persuade the earl to send away the dagge, and told the earl that he knew not how the devil might tempt his lordship, and that the devil was great; but could by no means prevail with the earl in that behalf: And saith moreover, that the earl required him to hide the dagge, and he thereupon hanged the same on a nail within the chimney in the earl's bed-chamber, where the earl, thinking the same not to be sufficiently safe in that place, it was by the earl's appointment taken from thence, and put into a slit in the side of a mattress that lay under the earl's bed, near to the bed's head; and that the same Sunday morning that the earl murdered himself at night, he saw the dagge lying under the earl's bed's head. The dagge was bought not many days before of one Adrian Mulan, a dagge-maker, dwelling in East Smithfield, as by the said Mulan was testified  viva voce upon his oath, in the open court, at the time of the public declaration made of these matters in the Star-Chamber.

All these Particularities considered, with the Depositions and Proofs of the Witness concerning the earl's death, first, how he came by the dagge: secondly, how long he had kept the same, and in what secret manner: thirdly, the earl's bolting of his chamber-door on the inside: fourthly, the blow of the dagge: fifthly, the breaking up of the earl's chamber-door by the lieutenant of the Tower: and lastly, the finding of the earl dead as aforesaid. Who is he so simple, that will think or imagine, or so impudent and malicious, that will avouch and report, that the earl of Northumberland should have been murdered of purpose by practice or device of any person, affecting his destruction in that manner; if men consider the inconvenience happened thereby, as well in matter of state, as commodity to the queen's majesty, lost by the prevention of his trial; who can in reason conjecture the earl to have been murdered of policy or set purpose, as the evil-affected seem to conceive? If the earl had lived to have received the censure of the law for his offences, all lewd and frivolous objections had then been answered, and all his goods, chattels and lands, by his attainder, had come unto her majesty, and the honour and state of his house and posterity been utterly overthrown: the consideration and fear whereof appeareth without all doubt to have been the principal, and only cause that made him lay violent hands upon himself. If objections be made, that to murder him in that sort might be a satisfaction to his enemies, who could be pacified by no means but with his blood; that seemeth to be as improbable; for that it is commonly discerned in the corrupt nature of man, that when we are possessed with so profound a hatred, as to seek the death of our enemy, we imagine, and wish his destruction to be had with the greatest shame and infamy that can be devised. Think you not then, that, if the earl of Northumberland had any such enemy, who knew the danger wherein he stood, and that his trial and conviction by law, would draw upon him the loss of his life, lands, and goods, fame, honour, and the utter subversion of his house, and would be so kind hearted unto him, as to help to take away his life only, and save him all the rest; I suppose there is no man of judgment will believe it.

But to return to the Manner of the earl's Death: It was declared by the lord Hunsdon, and the Lord Chief Baron, that the dagge wherewith the earl murdered himself was charged with three bullets, and so of necessity with more than an ordinary charge of powder, to force that weight of bullets to work their effect. The earl lying upon his back on the left side of his bed, took the dagge charged in his left-hand (by all likelihood) laid the mouth of the dagge upon his left pap (having first put aside his waistcoat) and his shirt being only between the dagge and his body, which was burned away the breadth of a large hand, discharged the same, wherewith was made a large wound in his said pap, his heart pierced and torn in divers lobes or pieces, three of his ribs broken, the chine-bone of his back cut almost in sunder, and under the point of the shoulder-blade, on the right side within the skin, the three bullets were found by the lord Hunsdon, which he caused the surgeon in his presence to cut out, lying all three close together, within the breadth and compass of an inch, or thereabout: the bullets were shewed by his lordship at the time of the publication made in the court of the Star-Chamber.

And whereas it hath been slanderously given out to the advantage of the earl, as the reporters suppose, that he was imprisoned, and kept in so streight, narrow, and close a room, with such penury of air and breath, that thereby he grew sickly, and weary of his life; and that to have been the cause chiefly why he murdered himself, (if it were so that he died by the violence of his own hand, which they hardly believe;) to answer that peevish and senseless slander, there was much spoken by the lord chief baron, who had viewed, and caused very exactly to be measured the chambers and rooms within the prison where the earl lay, being part of her majesty's own lodging in the Tower: the particular length and breadth of the said chambers and rooms, and the quality of the lights and windows, expressed by the said Lord Chief Baron; I cannot repeat; but well I do remember, it was declared, that all the day-time the earl had the liberty of five large chambers, and too long entries, within the utter door of his prison: three of which chambers, and one of the entries, lay upon two fair gardens within the Tower-wall, and upon the Tower-wharf, with a pleasant prospect of the Thames, and to the country, more than five miles beyond. The windows were of a large proportion, yielding so much air and light as more cannot be desired in any house; note, therefore, how maliciously those that favour traitors and treasons can deliver out these and the like slanderous speeches, to the dishonour of her majesty, noting her counsellors and ministers with inhumananity and uncharitable severity, contrary to all truth and honesty.

When the Lord Chief Baron had finished this discourse of the manner of the earl's Death, with the circumstances, and had satisfied the court and auditory concerning the quality of the prison where the earl remained, sir Christopher Hatton, knight, her majesty's Vice-Chamberlain, who as it seemed, had been specially employed by her majesty, among others of her privy council, in the looking into and examining of the Treasons aforesaid, as well in the person of the earl as of others, and at the time of the earl's commitment from his house in St. Martin's to the Tower of London, sent unto him from her majesty, to put the earl in mind of her majesty's manifold graces and favours, in former times conferred upon him, proceeding from the spring of her majesty's princely and bountiful nature, and not of his deservings; and to advise him to deliver the truth of the matters so clearly appearing against him, either by his letters privately to her majesty, or by speech to Master Vice-Chamberlain, who signified also unto him, that if he would determine to take that course, he should not only not be committed to the Tower, but should find grace and favour at her majesty's hands, in the mitigation of such punishment as the law might lay upon him. And here Master Vice-Chamberlain repeated at length the effect of her majesty's message at that time sent to the earl, beginning first with the remembrance of his practice undertaken for the conveying away of the Scottish queen about the time of the last rebellion (as hath been declared in the beginning of this tract) and that he confessing the offence being capital, her majesty nevertheless was pleased to alter the course of his trial by the justice of her laws, and suffered the same to receive a slight and easy punishment by way of mulct, or fine of 5000 marks, whereof before this his imprisonment, as it is credibly reported, there was not one penny paid, or his land touched with any extent for the payment thereof; which offence was by her majesty not only most graciously forgiven, but also most christianly forgotten; receiving him not long after to the place of honour that his ancestors had enjoyed, for many years before him, and gave him such entrance into her princely favour and good opinion, that no man of his quality received greater countenance and comfort at her majesty's hands than he; insomuch that in all exercises of recreation used by her majesty the earl was always called to be one, and whenever her majesty shewed herself abroad in public, she gave to him the honour of the best and highest services about her person more often than to all the noblemen of her court.

But the remembrance of these most gracious and more than extraordinary favours and benefits received, nor the hope given unto him by Master Vice-Chamberlain, of her majesty's disposition of mercy towards him, nor the consideration of the depth and weight of his Treasons against her majesty, her estate, her crown, and dignity, with the danger thereby like to fall upon him by the course of her highness's laws, to the utter ruin and subversion of him and his house (standing now at her majesty's mercy) could once move his heart to that natural and dutiful care of her majesty's safety that he ought to have borne towards her, and she most worthily had merited at his hands, or any remorse or compassion of himself and his posterity? but resting upon terms of his innocence, having, as you may perceive, conveyed away all those that he thought could or would any way accuse him, he made choice rather to go to the Tower, abide the hazard of her majesty's high indignation, and the extremity of the law for his offences: a notable augur of his fall, and that God, by his just judgment, had, for his sins and ingratitude, taken from him his spirit of grace, and delivered him over to the enemy of his soul, who brought him to that most dreadful and horrible end, whereunto he is come: from the which, God of his mercy defend all christian people, and preserve the queen's majesty from the Treasons of her subjects, that she may live in all happiness, to see the ruin of her enemies abroad and at home; and that she, and we, her true and loving subjects, may be always thankful to God for all his blessings bestowed upon us by her, the only maintainer of His Holy Gospel among us.

62. Proceedings against ANTHONY BABINGTON, CHIDIOCK TITCHBURN, THOMAS SALISBURY, ROBERT BARNEWELL, JOHN SAVAGE, HENRY DONN, and JOHN BALLARD, at Westminster, for High Treason: 28 ELIZ. the 13th and 14th of September, A. D. 1586.

THE Commission of Oyer and Determiner of all manner of Treasons, Rebellions, Felonies, Offences, Routs, Riots, &c. was directed to William lord Cobham, Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports; Thomas lord Buckhurst; sir Francis Knowles; sir James a Croft; sir Christopher Hatton; sir Francis Walsingham;

sir Christopher Wray, Lord Chief Justice of England; sir Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; Mr. Dr. Dale; Mr. Rugby, Master of the Requests; serjeant Fletwood, Recorder of London; Mr. Brograve, Attorney of the Dutchy; Mr. Randall; Mr. Cook; Mr. Wrathe. By force whereof was a precept directed to the Lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him to have the bodies of Anthony Babington, esq. Chidoock Titchburne, esq. Thomas Salisbury, esq. Robert Barnewell, gent. John Savage, gent. Henry Donn, gent. and John Ballard, clerk, before the said Commissioners, the day and year aforesaid. At which day, before the Commissioners abovesaid, (excepting sir Francis Knowles, sir Francis Walsingham, and sir Christopher Wray) sir Owen Hopton, Lieutenant of the Tower, returned his precept in effect, That the said Prisoners were committed to his custody by commandment of the Privy-Council, there to be safely kept. Whereupon Mr. Vice-Chamberlain demanded of the queen's learned counsel, what order they would take in Arraigning the Prisoners; and Answer was by them given, that they would proceed to the Arraignment of Savage first, forasmuch as he meddled first in these matters.

Savage's Arraignment, Indictment and Confession.

Then Savage being brought to the bar, and the other Prisoners removed, the Clerk of the Crown said;

Sands, Clerk of the Crown. John Savage, gent. hold up thy hand: Thou hast been before this time indicted by virtue of commission, directed to sir Edmund Anderson knight, &c. (and so read his Indictment) which in effect was, That William Gifford, D.D. maliciously moved him at Rhemes in the country of Champagne, traitorously and wickedly to kill and murder the queen's most excellent majesty, his liege sovereign and natural prince; affirming to the said Savage, that the killing of her majesty was an action lawful, honourable and meritorious: and that thereupon the said John Savage did traitorously agree, conspire and swear to murder the queen's most excellent majesty, his own natural prince. And afterwards, that is to say the first day of April 1586, at St. Giles's in the Fields in the county of Middlesex, did falsely conspire to murder her said majesty, to disinherit her of her kingdom, to stir up sedition in the realm, and to subvert the true Christian Religion: and that to perform this malicious practice, devised with John Ballard how to bring the same to pass; and afterwards, the last day of May, did receive letters from Morgan, William Gifford, and Gilbert Gifford, whereby they did persuade and provoke the said Savage to execute and fulfil his said purpose and determination. How sayest thou, Savage, art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Savage. For conspiring at St. Giles's, I am Guilty; that I received letters, whereby they did provoke me to kill her majesty, I am Guilty; that I did assent to kill her majesty, I am not Guilty.

C. J. Anderson. Whether thou didst conspire at St. Giles's, or not, is not the substance of the Indictment; but, whether thou didst conspire or no, is the matter, and the rest is but circumstance: moreover thou must say, either that thou art Guilty or not Guilty, for so hath the law ordained every one to answer; and if thou answer not so, thou refusest to be tried by the law, and so shalt be causer of thy own death.

C. B. Manwood. Whosoever refuseth to answer directly, the law pronounceth grievous punishment to such, and they are murderers of themselves, which is abominable before God.

Holton. To say, that thou art Guilty to that, and not to this, is no plea; for thou must either confess it generally, or deny it generally: wherefore delay not the time, but say either Guilty, or not; and if thou say Guilty, then shalt thou hear further; if not Guilty, her Majesty's learned counsel is ready to give evidence against thee.

Savage. Then, Sir, I am Guilty.

Then her majesty's Counsel said, Albeit there were nothing now further to be done, but to proceed to Judgment upon his own Confession; yet forasmuch as they desired that the hearers should be satisfied, and all the world know, how justly he was to be condemned, they crave licence to give such Evidence as would sufficiently and fully prove the Indictment. Which being granted, the Clerk of the Crown did read Savage's own Confession, taken before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, and Mr. Secretary; which particularly in substance was,

That the said John Savage served in the camp of the prince of Parma, and from thence he departed towards Rhemes, where falling acquainted with one Hodgson, and talking with him about exploits of services, it chanced Dr. Gifford over-heard them, and coming to them, said, 'but a better service could I tell you than all this' (moving the murder of the queen of England): but Savage seemed to object how dangerous and difficult it was. So they went to supper, and after supper ended Gifford declaring unto them, how necessary, how just and meritorious, the committing of the murder should be, said, that peradventure he stuck to do the fact, forasmuch as he, percase, was not resolved whether the killing of a prince were lawful or not. Whereupon he desired him to advise himself, and to ask opinions of others: and Savage having heard others affirm, that the murder was lawful, forasmuch as in their pretence she was an heretic, an enemy to true Religion, and a schismatic person: at last, after three weeks, wherein he had not seen Gifford, he answered, That he was contented to do any thing for his country's good. Then said Gifford, Assure yourself you cannot do a greater good unto your country, nor whereby the country should be more beholden, especially all the Throckmortons and Giffords. At last Savage, overcome with their persuasions, gave his assent and oath, that he would put the same in practice. When he had given his oath to murder her, Gifford declared unto him, how, and in what place her majesty might be slain: and therefore Gifford charged him to said sir Thomas Gerrard, the 29th of July, in the year aforesaid, went to St. Giles's aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously to conspire how and by what means your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass. And thereupon the last day of July, at St. Giles's aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, you the said Anthony Babington, and the said sir Thomas Gerrard, did agree, that thou the said sir Thomas Gerrard should join with thee the said Anthony Babington, for the delivery of the said Mary queen of Scots from the custody wherein she was, and for the aiding and assisting of the foreign enemies which should invade this realm. And furthermore, that thou the said John Ballard didst traitorously go to Southampton-house in Holborn, within the county of Middlesex, traitorously to confer with John Charnock, gent. and other false traitors in this conspiracy, how your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass; and there didst confer and had speech by what means your treasons might be performed: and afterwards the 2nd day of August at Southampton-house aforesaid, the said John Charnock did traitorously assent to perform the best he could in fulfilling of your treasons, contrary to your allegiances you owe to the queen's most excellent majesty, her crown and dignity, and contrary to divers statutes in such case provided.

Sandes. How sayest thou John Ballard, art thou Guilty of these Treasons whereof thou standest indicted, or not?

Ballard. That I practised the delivery of the queen of Scots, I am Guilty; and that I went about to alter the Religion, I am Guilty; but that I intended to slay her majesty, I am not Guilty.

Sandes. Answer directly, art thou Guilty according to the purport of the Indictment?

Ballard. I answer as my case is.

C. J. Anderson. Either deny the Indictment generally, or confess it generally.

Hutton. Ballard, under thine own hand are all things confessed; therefore now it is much vanity to stand vain-gloriously in denying it.

Ballard. Then, sir, I confess I am Guilty.

Sandes. How sayest thou, Anthony Babington, art thou Guilty of the Treasons contained in the Indictment?

Babington. Then began Babington with a mild countenance, a sober gesture, and a wonderful good grace, to declare the beginnings and proceedings of his Treasons, which was according as he was indicted, and according to Savage's Confession, and Ballard's Indictment. In the end he laid all the blame upon Ballard, for bringing him to his destruction.

Hutton. A very fit author for so bad a fact!

Babington. Very true, sir, for from so bad a ground never proceeds any better fruits; he was he that persuaded me to kill the queen, and to commit the other Treasons, whereof now I confess myself Guilty.

Sandes. How sayest thou, John Savage, art thou Guilty of the Treasons contained in the Indictment?

Savage. I am Guilty.

Sandes. How sayest thou, Robert Barnewell, art thou Guilty? &c.

Barnewell. I never intended harm to her majesty's person, but I confess I knew thereof, and I held it not lawful to kill the queen: howbeit, for my other actions, forasmuch as I know I am within the danger of the law, I plead Guilty.

Sandes. How sayest thou, Chidiok Titchbourne, art thou Guilty? &c.

Titchbourne. That I knew of these Treasons and concealed them, I must confess that I am Guilty; but unto the rest, I am not Guilty.

Sandes. You must either answer Guilty, or not Guilty.

Titchbourne. What I am guilty of, I plead Guilty, and I will confess no more.

Hutton. Then you may plead not Guilty.

Titchbourne. Then, sir, I say, that I am not Guilty.

Hutton. Very well, stay then till we have asked as much of Salisbury and Donn, and then you shall be tried.

Sandes. How sayest thou, Henry Donn, art thou Guilty? &c.

Donn. When I was moved, and made privy to these Treasons, I always said that I prayed unto God, that that might be done, which was to his honour and glory.

Hutton. Then it was thus, that they said the queen should be killed, and thou saidst, God's will be done.

Donn. Yea, Sir.

Hutton. O wretch, wretch! thy conscience and own confession shew that thou art Guilty.

Donn. Well, sir, then I confess I am Guilty.

Sandes. How sayest thou, Thomas Salisbury, art thou Guilty?

Salisbury. For killing of the queen's majesty, I protest I always said I would not do it for a kingdom.

Sandes. You are indicted, that you practised the delivery of the queen of Scots, the invasion of this land with foreign forces, and of stirring up rebellion and sedition in this realm; are you Guilty of that?

Salisbury. Then I am Guilty of that I stand indicted of.

Sandes. Chidiok Titchbourne, thou hast pleaded not Guilty, how wilt thou be tried?

Titchbourne. I beseech you, my lords, give me leave to speak.

Hutton. Say what you will.

Titchbourne. I thank your honours: My good lords, in the beginning of this broil I had sent for my horses to ride into the country; and the occasion of my longer abode in London, was for that I had a lame leg. Then what probability may it be, that I went to kill the queen here hard by London; when, had it not been for my lame leg, I had been in Hampshire.

C. J. Anderson. Well then, if you plead not Guilty, we will proceed to your Trial.

Sandes. How sayest thou, art thou Guilty, or not Guilty?

Titchbourne. I will confess a truth, and then I must confess that I am Guilty.

Then albeit nothing were to be done but Judgment to be given; yet for satisfying all the people, her majesty's learned Council gave in such Evidence, as would sufficiently prove the Indictment; First Savage's own Confession according to his former Arraignment, how that Gifford hearing them talk of services at Rhemes, said, I know not what service you mean. But what say you to such a service, meaning the cutting of the throat of the queen of England, and of the earl of Leicester? saying, he should never do more good than kill an excommunicate person, and that to do the same were a far better service than to study divinity. And Gifford said moreover, that if Savage failed to do it, others should do it. And how that Ballard going over into France at Lent last, did meet with one Grateley, who brought him to Charles Paggett, who told him that the pope would reform the state here in England; and how that Barnardino de Mendoza said the king of Spain his master would invade this realm. And that thereupon Ballard should be sent into England to know what friends they could make, and thereupon Ballard took an oath to perform the same; and how that he had in mind to move Babington in that behalf before he came, and that he came over about Whitsuntide last. And breaking the same with Babington, who thereupon said that the invasion would never come to effect during her majesty's life; whereupon Ballard said that would easily be removed, and then made him privy to Savage's practice: and that thereupon Ballard sent to Savage to speak with him on Lambeth side, and there told Savage of Babington's practice, and brought him to Babington, who was not friends with Savage before. Then Ballard went into the North to solicit the people, and at his coming up, said he had made 500 sure more than he knew of before. Furthermore, it was declared that during Ballard's abode in the North, Babington did write Letters to the Queen of Scots, a true copy of which letters written with Babington's own hand were read in the court: wherein he began, "Most high and mighty princess, his true and sovereign liege, to whom alone he oweth fidelity; declaring how he was her servant, and that he studied to devise her one good day's service; and how himself with ten gentlemen, and an 100 horse, would work her delivery from the custody wherein she was, being in the guard of a Puritan knight, a mere Leicestrian. And how that he had appointed six noble gentlemen for dispatch of the wicked competitor, declaring also at large the remainder of his treasons, and what means he had invented to compass the same." And then Ballard returned from the North; and before it was determined that Savage should have gone to the North, but he could not go, because he had sworn to kill the queen. And therefore when Babington had devised that six should kill the queen, Savage would not agree, except himself were one: and how in the mean season, Ballard on Thursday the 4th of August, about 11 of the clock, was apprehended. Then Babington went to Titchbourne's lodging, where not finding him, he went to a barber's without Bishopsgate, where were his own, Titchbourne's and Savage's pictures; and on Babington's picture was written, 'Hi mihi sunt Comites, quos ipsa pericula jungunt.' But then misliking that, was written; 'Quorsum hæc alio properantibus.'—Then Babington went to Smithfield, and there walked with Titchbourne, and there said unto him, I had rather than 500*l.* thy leg were whole, for then this matter should be dispatched. Also Salisbury confessed how Babington, Titchbourne, and he had communication as concerning the sacking of the city of London. Also it was proved by their Confession, how that to provide themselves of money for this practice, they had devised to rob all the richest men in England, and to set fire on the ships (although Babington misliked to fire the ships), and to cloy all the great ordnance. And all the indictment was sufficiently and most plainly proved by their Confessions, accordingly as they were intended.

Sandes. John Ballard, thou hast been indicted of High-Treason, and thereupon arraigned, and hast pleaded Guilty; what hast thou to say for thyself, wherefore Judgment and Execution of Death should not be given against thee?

Ballard.—spake something, but not to any effect.

Sandes.—demanded of Babington in like manner.

Babington. Who said he was Guilty of the Treasons, according to his Confession, for killing of the queen, and the rest, by Ballard's persuasion.

Hatton. O Ballard, Ballard, what hast thou done? A sort of brave youths otherwise endued with good gifts, by thy inducement hast thou brought to their utter destruction and confusion.

Babington. Yea, I protest before I met with this Ballard, I never meant nor intended for to kill the queen; but by his persuasions I was induced to believe that she was excommunicate, and therefore lawful to murder her.

Ballard. Yea, Mr. Babington, lay all the blame upon me, but I wish the shedding of my blood might be the saving of your life: howbeit, say what you will, I will say no more.

Hatton. Nay, Ballard, you must say more and shall say more, for you must not commit High-Treasons and then huddle them up; but is this thy Religio Catholica? Nay rather, it is Diabolica.

Sandes. John Savage, thou hast been indicted of High-Treason, &c. (ut sup. to Ballard.)

Savage answered nothing, neither did Titchbourne, being demanded in like sort also.

So Sandes demanded of Robert Barnwell in like manner.

Barnwell. Forasmuch as I have offended against the law, I am contented to suffer punishment.

nishment according to the law; howbeit, I here protest what I have done, was only for my conscience-sake, neither did I ever intend violence to her majesty's person.

Hatton. O Barnewell, Barnewell, didst not thou come to Richmond, and when her majesty walked abroad, didst not thou there view her and all her company, what weapons they had, how she walked alone? and didst traverse the ground, and thereupon coming back to London, didst make relation to Babington, how it was a most easy matter to kill her majesty, and what thou hadst seen and done at the court? yes, I know thou didst so: how canst thou then say, that thou never didst intend to lay violent hands on her majesty? Nay, I can assure thee moreover, and it is most true which I say, that her majesty did know that thou didst come to that end, and she did see and mark thee how thou didst view her and her company; but had it been known to some there, as well as unto her, thou had never brought news to Babington. Such is the magnanimity of our sovereign, which God grant be not over-much, in not fearing such Traitors as thou art.

Bornevell. What I did was only for my conscience-sake, and not for any malice, or hatred to her majesty's person.

Hatton. Thou wouldst thou have killed the queen for conscience. Fie on such a conscience!

Sandes. Henry Donn, thou hast been indicted of High-Treason, &c. ut supra to Ballard; What canst thou say for thyself wherefore Judgment and Execution of Death should not be pronounced against thee?

Donn. What I have done herein, was for my religion and conscience sake; and since it is counted treason, I must abide the punishment, and therefore Fiat voluntas Dei.

Sandes. Salisbury, What canst thou say wherefore judgment, &c.

Salisbury. I beseech her majesty's most merciful Pardon for my offence.

Then Mr. Attorney began to declare at large the sum of their Treasons: How they had conspired her majesty's Death, and to make the queen of Scots queen of England; and if peradventure she miscarried in these hurliburles as to be slain, then would they set up the king of Scots, if he were a Catholic; if he were not a Catholic, then would they enforce the king of Spain to take the crown and set it on his head, and derive him a title from the house of Clarence. But because that title would be but slender, the pope should dispense, and so make it clear without question. Furthermore he declared, how priests continually had been the beginning of all the treasons committed against her majesty; he began at the rebellion in the North, and so proceeded till the Treasons of Throckmorton and Parry, and so ended.

Then began Sir Christopher Hutton, and made an excellent good speech, in opening and setting forth their Treasons, and how they all proceeded from the wicked priests the ministers of the pope. And first he shewed, How these wicked and devilish youths had conspired to murder the queen's most excellent majesty; secondly, To bring in foreign invasion; thirdly, To deliver the queen of Scots, and make her queen; fourthly, To sack the city of London; fifthly, To rob and destroy all the wealthy subjects of this realm; sixthly, To kill divers of the Privy Council, as the earl of Leicester, the Lord Treasurer, Mr. Secretary, sir Ralph Sadler, sir Amias Paulett; seventhly, To set fire on all the queen's ships; eighthly, To cloy all the great Ordnance; ninthly and lastly, To subvert religion, and the whole state of government. The inventers and beginners whereof were these devilish priests and seminaries, against whom he doubted the parliament had not yet sufficiently provided, who, now-a-days, do not go about to seduce the antient and discreet men, for they (as the priests say) be too cold; but they assail, with their persuasions, the younger sort, and of those, the most ripe wits, whose high hearts and ambitious minds do carry them headlong to all wickedness. In the end, he concluded with remorse for the youth of some of these unhappy men, and with detestation of the facts of Ballard; and also shewed forth a notable proof of the falsehood of these lying papists, which was a book printed at Rome, and made by the papists, wherein they affirm, That the English Catholics which suffer for religion, be lapped in bear-skins, and bated to death with dogs; a most monstrous lie, and manifest falsehood.

Then spake my lord Anderson to the like effect, almost in every point, in abhorring the abomination of the Jesuits and Seminaries; and in the end concluded with an Exhortation for the health of their souls; and last of all pronounced the Sentence of their Condemnation.

*Mr. Babington's LETTER to the QUEEN after his Condemnation, sent from the Tower and delivered by his Wife.**

"Most gracious Sovereign; If either bitter traces, a pensive contrite heart, and doleful sighs of a wretched sinner, might work any pity in your royal breast, I would wring out from my drained eyes as much blood as in bewraying my dryery-tragedy should lament my fall, and somewhat, no doubt, move you to compassion; but since there is no proportion between the quality of my crime and any humane consideration, shew, sweet queen, some miracle on a wretch that lieth prostrate in your prison most grievously bewailing his offence, and imploring such comfort at your anointed hands, as my poor wife's misfortune doth beg, my child's innocency doth crave, my guiltless family doth wish, and my heinous treachery least deserve. So shall your divine mercy make your glory shine far above all princes, as my most horrible practices are most detestable amongst your best subjects, with whom that you may long live and happily govern, I beseech the Mercy-Master to grant for his sweet Son's sake Jesus Christ. Your majesty's unfortunate because disloyal subject, ANT. BABINGTON."

63. The Trial of EDWARD ABINGTON, CHARLES TILNEY, EDWARD JONES, JOHN TRAVERS, JOHN CHARNOCK, JEROME BELLAMY, and ROBERT GAGE, at Westminster, for High Treason: 28 ELIZ. 15th of September, A. D. 1586.

ON Thursday the 15th of September, the Commissioners came, and the cryer commanded silence, and the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to bring forth the Prisoners, which were Edward Abington, Charles Tilney, and Edward Jones, esquires; John Travers, John Charnock, Jerome Bellamy and Robert Gage, gentlemen; and Elizabeth Bellamy, widow. All which the lieutenant of the Tower had ready at the bar, and there informed the Court, the woman's name was Catharine and not Elizabeth: whereupon the Lieutenant was commanded to take her from the bar, and bring her to some other place. Whereupon Sandes, Clerk of the Crown, began in sort ensuing; Edward Abington, Charles Tilney, Edward Jones, John Travers, John Charnock, Jerome Bellamy and Robert Gage, hold up your hands: which being done, he proceeded,

Clerk of the Crown. Before this time ye were indicted, that where Bernardyne de Mendoza, a Spaniard, Charles Paget and John Ballard, the 9d day of April, in the 28th year of the reign of our sovereign lady the queen's majesty, that now is, at Paris in France, did confer in what place this realm of England most aptly might be invaded, and what aid and assistance might be procured for the same, and how and by what ways and means Mary queen of Scots might be delivered from the custody wherein she was. And that thereupon it was resolved by the counsel of Morgan, a most notorious Traitor, that the said Ballard should pass into this realm of England to understand what help might be procured, and to prepare ports to land the enemies, for to invade the realm, and to prepare ways and means how Mary queen of Scots might be delivered; and thereupon the said John Ballard, coming into England, you the said Edward Abington, Charles Tilney, Edward Jones and John Travers, together with Anthony Babington, John Ballard, John Savage, Henry Donn, Thomas Salisbury, Chidioc Titchbourne and Robert Barnewell, as false Traitors, the 8th day of June, in the 28th year of the reign of our sovereign lady the queen's majesty that now is, at St. Giles's in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, did conspire the queen's most excellent majesty, not only from her crown and dignity to depose, but also her to kill and slay, and to stir up Sedition and Rebellion in the realm, and slaughter among the subjects for to make, and the government and religion to subvert, and the whole estate for to destroy, and divers strangers, her majesty's enemies, to invade the realm, did procure and stir up. And afterwards, the twelfth day of June, in the year aforesaid, thou the said

Charles Tilney and Anthony Babington, Robert Barnewell, and Chidioc Titchbourne, went to St. Giles's aforesaid, to confer by what ways and means your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass; and there, the same day, had speech, and did confer how your Treasons might be performed: And on the said 12th day of June, in the year aforesaid, at St. Giles's aforesaid, did conclude, that thou the said Charles Tilney, and Robert Barnewell, and Chidioc Titchbourne, would kill the queen, and aid the foreign enemies that should invade the realm; and that thou Edward Jones, with Thomas Salisbury, to perform your traitorous imaginations, the 13th day of June, in the 28th year aforesaid, went to St. Giles's aforesaid, to confer how your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass. And thereupon thou the said Edward Jones, with the said Thomas Salisbury, the 15th day of June, in the year aforesaid, at St. Giles's aforesaid, did conclude and agree traitorously to join with the said Thomas Salisbury, for the delivery of the said Mary queen of Scots, and for to aid and assist the foreign enemies which should invade this realm: And that thou the said John Travers, to fulfil thy traitorous compassed imaginations, the 15th day of June, in the 28th year aforesaid, traitorously didst go to Clerkenwell, within the county of Middlesex, to confer by what means your treasons might be brought to pass: And the same 15th day of June, at Clerkenwell aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, had speech, and did confer how your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass. And the 16th of June at Clerkenwell aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, didst appoint and conclude, with the said Thomas Salisbury, to join with him for the delivery of Mary queen of Scots, and in aiding and assisting the foreign enemies which should invade this realm. And further, that thou John Charnock, with Thomas Gerrard knight, John Ballard and Anthony Babington, the 27th of July, at St. Giles's aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, didst conspire the queen's most excellent majesty, not only from her crown and dignity to depose, but also her to murder and slay, and to make sedition and rebellion, and slaughter of her majesty's subjects, and the true and christian religion to subvert, and the whole estate and government to alter. And that thou John Charnock traitorously didst go to Southampton House in Holbourn, within the said county of Middlesex, the last day of July; and the same last day didst confer there with John Ballard, how your traitorous compassed imaginations might be brought to pass; and thereupon, the 2d day of August at Southampton House in Holbourn aforesaid, didst conclude and agree to do the best thou couldst for performance of the Treasons aforesaid. And that thou Jerome Bellamy and Robert Gage, knowing that the said Anthony Babington, Robert Barnewell and Henry Donn, had committed High-Treason at Harrow on the Hill, in the county of Middlesex, did receive and aid them, contrary to your allegiance you owe to our sovereign lady the queen, her crown and dignity, and contrary to divers statutes in such case provided. How sayest thou, Edward Abington, art thou Guilty of the Treasons whereof thou standest indicted, or not Guilty?

Abington. Not Guilty.

Sandes. How wilt thou be tried?

Abington. By God and my good country.

Sandes. Thou must say, by God and my country.

Abington. Yea Sir, by God and my country.

Sandes. How sayst thou, Charles Tilney, art thou Guilty, &c.?

Tilney. In no sort Guilty, no more Guilty than you are.

Sandes. Answer me directly, art thou Guilty or not Guilty?

Tilney. No Sir, I am not Guilty; and that I am ready to answer and prove.

Sandes. How wilt thou be tried?

Tilney. By God and honest men.

Hutton. What answers are these? Abington says, By God and my good country; and thou sayst, By God and honest men. Thou must say, By God and my country.

Tilney. Yea Sir, so I say.

In like manner, Jones, Travers, Charnock, Bellamy, and Gage pleaded Not Guilty.

Thereupon was an Inquest of Middlesex called, who appeared at the Bar, and their Names were, Rd. Martin, Wm. Fleetwood, Jasper Cholmeley, Wm. Kempton, Robert Loshe and John Barnes, esqrs. John Hill, Rob. Wood, Tho. Hargrave, Tho. Clark, John Chawkellett and John Draper, gentlemen.

Then said Sandes to the Prisoners, Have you any Challenge?

Tilney. No, not I; for I know them not.

Anderson. Lieutenant of the Tower, take away Gage and Bellamy to some other place out of the hearing of the court.

So the Lieutenant did.

ABINGTON'S TRIAL.

Then said Abington, I beseech your honours I may have a pair of writing-tables to set down what is alledged against me, that I may yield a sufficient Answer therunto.

Sandes. It was never the course here.

Hutton. When you hear any thing you are desirous to answer, you shall speak an Answer at full, which is better than a pair of tables.

Serj. Puckering. Well Sir, then will we give Evidence. And first, because it falls out that, Abington and Tilney were acquainted with Savage's Conspiracy, we will shew a little that which yesterday was opened at full; and therefore, by Ballard's Confession, this summer was twelvemonth, Ballard went into Scotland to understand of the willingness of the people, and Tilney offered to go with him.

Tilney. Yea Sir, so I did: What can you prove by that?

Puckering. Soft, I will tell you when I come to give Evidence against you. After Christmas, Ballard went into the North, and afterwards had speech with Tilney to go over beyond the seas, and Tilney agreed and was contented. Ballard went over and sent letters to Tilney, desiring to stay till Ballard came over back, and he would tell him more. When Ballard came over, Tilney was acquainted with Savage's purpose, and Abington too: But then Ballard fell acquainted with Babington, and so came a greater conspiracy. And Abington put forth a proposition to surprize the queen, and Tilney was privy: And it is under Babington's hand, that Tilney, Tichbourne, Barnewell and Savage undertook to kill the queen. Jones, at London, talked with Salisbury, and stayed for him, and was privy to a writing that was sent for Salisbury's apprehension. And Jones repaired unto Salisbury at midnight, being in Jones's house, and told him, That he had undone them all, and lent him his own horse, and his man's cloak. Charnock, the same day that Ballard was taken, was moved by Babington to be one of the six to kill the queen; and he assented, and afterwards lent Babington apparel to fly in. Whereupon was Ballard's confession read, which was, that he confessed, That he conferred with Paget about the state of our country; and that Ballard said, It is now more easy to invade the realm than before, because the earl of Leicester, with the best of our captains, were in Flanders: and that they two talked with Mendoza; who asked them, what armed men they could make, and what ports they could yield to the invaders for to land in; and Mendoza told them, his master had a greater preparation than ever he had by sea, but he knew not for what matter; but he said, He cared not whether they have any help of them or no: but said, If you will not assist us herein, we will be as conquerors when we come, and use him also like enemies. For when it came to the brunt, they always shrank, only he had a great care for the delivery of the queen of Scots, and so sent Ballard into England; and said, His master, the king of Spain, had vowed to lose his crown, and the pope his life, but they would convert England, and deliver the queen of Scots. After Ballard arrived, he talked with Babington, and he seemed willing: Also he confesseth the killing of the queen.

Attorney, (sir John Popham). Edward Abington, upon his Examination, denieth he knew Ballard; which we will prove to be false: Therefore read first his Denial, which was, That he denied the surprizing of her majesty; he denieth the knowledge of Ballard, Fortescue, or Brown; he denieth the delivery of the queen of Scots; and being told, that the Frenchmen would invade this land, he said, He would spend his life in her majesty's defence: He confesseth, that on Sunday was sevennight, he and his brother lay on a hay-mow.

Solicitor, (sir Thomas Egerton). Whoso is guiltless will speak truly and directly, but the counterfeit must speak untruths. Thereupon was another Examination of his read, which was, That Ballard being brought to his face, said, That Ballard was not with him since Whitsantide; but he confesseth, he knew him some years ago at Chertsey, Abington's brother confesseth, that Ballard was twice at Edward Abington's lodging at Charing-Cross; and at one of the times his brother Ballard talked secretly in one end of the chamber: And Ballard was first acquainted with Thomas Abington at Rheims; and Ballard saith, That he made Edward Babington acquainted with these treasons, and he gave his consent. And Babington saith, that Abington moved first the surprize of the queen. Then was read the Confession of Babington, which was, that Edward Abington moved first the surprize of the queen to some strong place, and there to move her for reformation or toleration of religion. Tilney confesseth, That at the Three Tuns in Newgate-market, Babington moved a proposition for removing of the Lord-Treasurer and Mr. Secretary; and that Abington spake broad speeches concerning that matter; and that Tilney did reprove him for the same.

Tilney. I deny it, I never said so.

Puckering. Here is your own hand, and read it.

Tilney. It is mine own hand, but what did I mean? When I said concerning that matter, I must interpret mine own meaning, I meant to speak broad words concerning religion.

Attorney. Then belike you reprov'd Abington for religion?

Tilney. Yea, I reprov'd him for speaking broad words concerning religion.

Attorney. What matter did you talk of then but Treason? It is well the Jury doth hear your answers.

C. B. Manswood. Tilney, you are too hot, this Evidence is against Abington, you shall answer yourself when it comes to you.

Solicitor. Tilney confesseth that there was speech between him and Abington concerning a surprize of the queen; and that Abington said, he would ride to Thomas Salisbury, in to the country.

Then said the Queen's Attorney unto the Jury, You perceive how that Abington is found false for his acquaintance with Ballard.—Then was read Babington's Confession, that Abington and Tilney were disposed to kill the queen.

Attorney. Salisbury confesseth, that Abington desired him to make haste to his country; and said, He understood by Babington of certain matters, and that he would come to Salisbury's country for things to be done shortly.

Solicitor. He confesseth himself, that he was privy unto it, and concealed it.

Then was read Babington's Confession before the lords, which was, That when certain Seminaries in Rome came to take leave of the pope, and to kiss his foot, the pope asked what they were; and it was told him, that they were Englishmen, which went to spend their lives for reformation of religion in their country. The pope said, it was a good slow way; but said, that he would make a bridge over that ditch into England ere it were long. Also he confesseth, That he and Babington heard Edward Abington use speech to the same effect.

So you hear how Babington sets down Abington to be one of the six to kill the queen. Also here is Ballard's own hand, that Babington appointed six to kill the queen, Abington, Titchbourne, Tilney, and others.

Abington. It is very well, if I be at Babington's commandment; I protest I never knew thereof.

Solicitor. Here is Babington's Letter to the queen of Scots, which proveth you to be one.

The Letter was read; among other, this Sentence was in: There be six noble gentlemen which have undertaken the tragical Execution, meaning the murdering of the queen of England, only it resteth, that their attempt be honourably rewarded.

Abington. I protest before heaven and earth, as I am a true Christian, I never knew thereof.

The Letter went further, and contained this; All the actors have vowed, either to die, or else to perform their purpose.

Abington. This is Babington's brag, to get credit with the queen of Scots.

Attorney. We will prove, Abington, that thou didst provide armour of proof too for your brother and yourself, and one for another person.

Then was Foster's Examination, an armourer in Holborn, read, which proved so much directly.

Attorney, to Hatton. Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, you desired Abington to set down the truth of these things, thereupon he set down a great deal in writing, and yesterday he tore it in a hundred pieces; and here Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower hath given me the pieces, and here they be.

Hatton. Abington, you be very obstinate, and seem indurate in these treasons.

Abington. I will answer what is laid against me: My first acquaintance was with Savage, by reason that my brother and he were both of Bernard's-Inn, and by him came I acquainted with Savage, who talking with me, he told me of a Book written at Rheims, which inveighed against the earl of Northumberland, Throckmorton and Parry, for that they intended violence against her majesty's person, which Book I liked; yea, but, said Savage, it may be but for a colour. Then he told me, that it was written but for to blind the counsellors in England, and make them secure and careless, when in very deed they at Rheims desire to thing more than the murder of the queen of England. Then I answered, He that allows of Parry's actions, savours not of divinity. And this I protest is true. For Ballard's acquaintance, true it is, he came unto my chamber, and I knew him not; and then he told me, he had seen me four years ago at Chertsey. So then I asked, What news? And he told me of an invasion intended against this country. Whereunto I gave such cold Answers, and such cold entertainment, as I never saw him since. For my doings with Babington, his lodging was right in my way to go from Charing-Cross, through the fields to London; and true it is, he made me privy to his treasons, and that I concealed them: and when he told me strangers would invade this realm to reform religion, I protested to Babington, I had rather be drawn to Tyburn by the heels for my religion than to have it reformed by strangers. And for Babington's Accusation, what force can it be of? for he having committed and confessed Treason in the most high degree, there was no hope for him but to accuse.

Hatton. For Babington's hope thereof, I am persuaded he hath no hope at all; and my lords here can assure there is no hope at all of his life: but he confessed what he knew for discharge of his conscience; and what he did, he did it willingly and voluntarily: for had not Babington voluntarily named Abington, who could have named Abington? And had he not also willingly accused Tilney, who could have accused Tilney?

Abington. Well then, Sir, to you my lords the Judges I do now speak: There is a statute in the first and thirteenth of this queen made, That who shall conspire, &c. it shall be Treason, &c. provided, that he shall have two lawful witnesses, face to face, to avow it, &c. Now may it please your honours to have two lawful witnesses, to testify against me. As for Babington, what witness can he be, a condemned man, Savage a condemned man also, and Ballard a condemned man likewise? So then there is no witness against me; but I stand not upon this point, I stand upon mine own not guiltiness. Furthermore, it is not proved that Babington and I would be one to kill the queen, but that he had appointed me to be one; and it is not proved that I knew thereof: and that I said to Salisbury, I would come into the country to understand of things to be done, I protest I remember not; for what needed any coming into the country to understand, when as Salisbury and Babington did ride to St. Albans in Babington's coach?

C. B. Manwood. You answer by arguments, and not by answers.

Abington. If it be true, that they rode together, as it is most true, what needed those speeches?

C. B. Manwood. That only answereth that Babington might confer; but it doth not answer, that you needed not to go into the country to understand of things to be done, for you rode not in the coach with them.

Abington. I protest before God, I remember not that ever I said so.

C. B. Manwood. Let the Jury consider of this Answer.

Anderson. For answer to you, Abington, for the point of the statute, true it is, had you been indicted on the Statute of the 1st and 13th of this queen, two Witnesses ought to have been produced; but you stand indicted by the common law, and the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, which is, who shall intend the death of the king, &c. and in that statute is not contained any such proof.

Tilney. The statute of 25 Edw. 3 is, who shall compass or imagine, &c.

Anderson. Very well, and not contained to prove by witnesses, as you would have it.

Solicitor. See how they would acquit themselves for want of Witness; and if it should be as they would have it, then could never any Treason be sufficiently proved. The statute of 1 Eliz. is so, the Overt-Act must be proved by two Witnesses; but the statute of 25 Edw. 3 is, Who shall imagine: how then can that be proved by honest men, being a secret cogitation which lieth in the minds of traitors? And such traitors will never reveal their cogitations unto honest men, but unto such as themselves, and they I hope be no honest men; so then they would have their treasons never revealed.

Abington. For answer that I lay in a Hay-mow, it is most true I was in Herefordshire, when my house in Worcestershire was in searching; and there I heard how my house was searched; and coming to Worcestershire, the country hearing of the horribleness of the things wherewith I was charged, I knew none would receive me nor entertain me; and so I was constrained to lie in a Hay-mow. And for preparing mine armour, I protest I had the same in Shoe-Lane, and would have had it ready against the going over of the earl of Leicester; and hearing him in Holborn to be commended for the most singular man in England in his trade, I sent to him to have it finished.

Then said the Attorney to the Jury, You have heard how Babington confesseth Abington would be one to kill the queen, and you have heard his Answer thereunto.

Abington. If Babington ever moved it to me, let me die for it.

Attorney. It is Babington's own Confession, that six, whereof Abington was one, were disposed to kill the queen.

Abington. If ever I imagined, or any part thought of the indictment which you have alleged, I beseech God I sink as I stand in this place.

Anderson. You had a seminary priest in your house.

Abington. He was only with me, but not in mine house.

Hatton. Before Babington was taken, Ballard did voluntarily declare, that you two, Abington and Tilney, were disposed to kill the queen.

Anderson. The Jury hath heard the Indictment and your Answers, let them consider thereof in their Consciences

TILNEY'S TRIAL.

First was read his Confession, wherein he denied Ballard's acquaintance, and he denied that ever he heard Ballard say, we should have a new world shortly. Then was read Ballard's Confession, which was, That before Christmas last, Ballard did confess Gage and Tilney at a house in Holborn.

Tilney. I denied Ballard's acquaintance, because, by the last statute, he is a Traitor, and not for my guilt or crime. And for that I was confessed by him, it was no otherwise than all the subjects of the realm of England were confessed in the days of king Henry 7.

Solicitor. But now is the estate of this realm quite other than it was in the days of Henry 7. For now the pope is the greatest enemy her majesty hath, but it was not so then.

Tilney. How know I the pope is her greatest enemy?

Hutton. Know not you how he invaded the realm of Ireland?

Attorney. Know not you how he induced Mary?

Tilney. No, Sir, in my conscience wherein I shall die, I never conspired any treason.

C. B. Manwood. Were not you sworn when you were made a pensioner? How far different is it to these actions, to be confessed, and to conceal Traitors?

Tilney. Yes, Sir, but I was not then a Catholic, but now I am; for which I thank God most heartily.

Puckering. Did not you say, if her majesty would forgive you this, you would never deal more with any seminary priest; but if there were any old priest in England, you would have him, if he were to be gotten for money?

Tilney. But what is this? This only concerneth my religion, which I was promised I should not be charged withal.

Attorney. No more you are for lands nor goods, this is only an introduction to the Treason.

Then was read Tilney's own Confession, wherein he confessed (which also was given in evidence against Abington) that Abington said, Why might not her majesty be as well surprised as the queen of Scots? Which words he spake at the Three Tuns in Newgate-market. He confessed, Ballard came to his chambers in Westminster, in his withdrawing-chamber (as it was termed), where Ballard told him, He had provided a pension for Windsor in France, and would do so for him; and told him of an invasion intended against this realm: He confesseth, he would have gone to Scotland to have lived there among the Catholics, when Ballard went thither; and said, that Windsor made him acquainted with Ballard.

Tilney. These things I confess, but yet it is no Treason to hear treason talked of by others; as for myself, what presumptions may there be if I should be guilty, being her majesty's sworn servant, (whose highness God grant long to reign) a young man of small ability, neither in lands nor goods able to make any power at all? For religion, I confess I am a catholic, which I thank God for it, but that I am not now to be charged withal. As for Ballard's coming to me, I do confess it; but it was in such public manner, as no man in the world could judge his coming for any such intent as Treason: for he came openly in the day-time, not in the night, and never came disguised.

Solicitor. Tilney, you say true; he came not disguised, but I will tell you how he came; being a popish priest, he came in a grey cloak laid on with gold lace, in velvet hose, a cut sattin doublet, a fair hat of the newest fashion, the band being set with silver buttons; a man and a boy after him, and his name captain Fortescue.

Tilney. All this concerneth my religion only.

Solicitor. You confess that you were privy to these Treasons; then we will prove directly that you did assent thereunto.

Then was read Ballard's Confession, wherein Ballard thinketh that Tilney did assent to kill the queen, for he saw him not dissent when he told him these Treasons: likewise Tilney requested him for some pension in France when he came over.

Tilney. I stand upon the assent.

Solicitor. Ballard affirmeth it; Babington said that you Tilney were one of the six.

Tilney. Babington told him so! That proves that Babington forsooth will be a statesman, when God knows he is a man of no gravity.

Solicitor. Abington's Confession is, that Tilney and Abington were disposed to kill the queen.

Puckering. Babington said yesterday at the bar, that Tilney would have had her majesty set upon in her coach.

Tilney. No, I said not so; only at the Three Tuns in Newgate-market, I said it might be her majesty might be set upon in her coach, and I said no more. But that proves not I did consent.

Attorney. You have said enough, if we had no other evidence against you.

Tilney. How so?

Attorney. Because you have confessed High Treason.

Tilney. I tell you no, there is no such matter intended in my words.

C. B. Manwood. Your censure was your assent, and your censure was to kill the queen in her coach.

Hutton. Your words prove that you were concluded upon the matter, and were devising on the manner.

Attorney. Babington and Ballard reckoned Tilney for one of the six to kill the queen, as by their confession appeareth.

Tilney. The first time that I knew Babington, was, that he came to my chamber in Westminster, to crave mine acquaintance; I used him courteously, as appertained to a gentleman. The second time was at the Three Tans in Newgate-market. And the third time was in the fields, and I never saw him else: that I should trust him in so high a matter for three times acquaintance, is altogether improbable. As for Babington himself, albeit he be very wise, yet is he altogether vain.

Hutton. Babington declared all this voluntarily, for who could accuse Tilney before Babington named Tilney?

Tilney. I will tell you how I meant my words in Newgate-market. If a servant which is faithful, knowing where his master's money is, do say; If I would be a thief, I could rob my master, for in such a place his money is; this proves not that he would rob his master, albeit he used such words. And so, although I said she might be set upon in her coach, it proveth not that I assented to the same; for I protest before God, I never intended any Treason in my life.

Anderson. But if a servant, knowing where his master's money is, among thieves which are devising to take away the master's money, do say, This way my master's money may be taken, and be in view when it is taken; I say that he is accessory. And you, Tilney, being amongst traitors, that were devising how to kill her majesty, to shew by what means her majesty might be slain, it manifestly proveth your assent. Therefore let the Jury consider of their Evidence.

Tilney. Then said Tilney unto the jury, My very good friends and countrymen of the Jury, forasmuch as I am charged highly to have offended against the law, I am now to be tried according to the law by you. And therefore if you shall find this Evidence sufficient to prove my guilt, you ought to find me Guilty; but if you see in your consciences that I have answered fully each objection laid unto my charge, I charge you to find me not Guilty, as you will answer me at the dreadful Day of Judgment.

THE TRIAL OF JONES.

First was read his Confession, That he said to John Travers at Jones's house in Denbighshire, Salisbury hath brought us all to destruction. What remedy? said Travers: it is then time for us to be packing. But Jones lent Salisbury his horse to ride away with. Salisbury confessed he acquainted Jones with the foreign invasion, and delivery of the queen of Scots, desiring his aid, which he promised him in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields: and how that Salisbury fled upon Jones's relation of Babington's apprehension. Also Salisbury confessed that he caused Jones to protest he would not discover him. Jones saith in his Examination, that Salisbury never asked his assent, because he always thought himself assured of him. Also Jones said to Salisbury, What have you done? You have undone us all. This was the effect of the Evidence which was given against him.

Jones. For concealing of the Treason, I put me to her Majesty's mercy; I confess I hastened Salisbury away.

C. B. Manswood. Then you deny not but that you horsed him away?

Jones. Then said Jones to the Jury, I confess this, and put me to her majesty's mercy; my case was hard and lamentable, either to betray my dearest friend, whom I loved as my ownself; and to discover Thomas Salisbury, the best man in my country, of whom I only made choice; or else to break my allegiance to my sovereign, and so undo myself and my posterity for ever. And this was my case.

TRAVERS'S ARRAIGNMENT.

Salisbury confessed he acquainted John Travers with his Treasons, and that he consented unto him. And Travers said unto him, he would go beyond the seas with him. Salisbury confesseth he exacted no Oath of Jones and Travers when he acquainted them, but that they protested they would not discover him. Also it was proved that when Jones intended to have gone to Ireland, now lately when it was to have been inhabited by the Englishmen, Travers asked him what he meant to go now, when his presence was necessary; and said, if Mr. Salisbury came home, he would surely stay him.

Then was read Culey's Confession, That Travers and Salisbury fled, and Travers called his name Lacon, and Salisbury called his name Johnson, and that Culey would not change his name, because he had changed it before.

Travers. I fled and changed my name, because I was a Catholic, and doubted to be troubled for my religion and conscience.

Solicitor. Nay, Travers, thou didst fly for Treason; for when Jones told you Salisbury had undone you all, thou saidst what remedy, and that it was time to be packing; and you had your chaplain with you, Culey I mean.

Travers. If he be a priest, I honour him for his priesthood. And he said little else, as one that seemed not to care what Evidence came against him, but was resolute to be hanged.

He confessed nothing in his examination, he denied he had any speech with Babington, saving salutations. He confessed he served in the Spanish camp, and there was acquainted with Savage; and it was proved against him, that he said Savage's sudden bravery would bewray all their matters.

CHARNOCK'S TRIAL.

Charnock. I confess that Ballard did make me acquainted with the invasion of the realm, and the other Treasons, and thereupon I sounded Savage, who answered he was not his own man, but said there was one in the court who should have done that long since, and that he was a Morganist.

Then was read Babington's Confession, that Charnock promised him to be at his commandment, and Babington told him the queen of Scots liked of their actions. And Ballard's Confession was read, That he told Charnock at large, and Charnock liked very well, and said he would do the best he could herein. And Savage's Confession was read, which was, that Babington moved Charnock to be one of the six, and Charnock told Savage that Babington moved him also.

Charnock. That I said to Babington I would be at his commandment, it is very true; for Babington was my good friend in divers respects, and therefore I thought it pertained to courtesy, to say I remained at his commandment.

Solicitor. Nay, thou didst offer to be at Babington's commandment in this action of Treason.

Then was Babington's Confession read, which was, That he talking in Paul's with Charnock of the Queen's death, Charnock promised to be disposed by him in this action, and that he offered to spend his life, wherein Babington should direct him. Then was read Charnock's own Confession, wherein he confessed he lent apparel to Savage to fly in, and that he fled into the woods himself.

Charnock. Savage and I were acquainted when he was of Barnard's-Inn, and I of Furnival's-Inn, and we both served in the Spanish camp together, and Savage brought me acquainted with Ballard. As for Savage, because I knew he was an excellent soldier, a man skilful in languages, and learned besides: when I met him here in England, I was glad to renew old acquaintance with him. That I should consent to Ballard the 2d day of August, see (if you please) what probability there is to the contrary: For on the 4th of August Ballard was apprehended, and before his apprehension Ballard sent a letter to Mr. Secretary, offering to discover all; myself was the bearer of the letter, and delivered it to one of Mr. Secretary's men: what likelihood is it then, that I knowing of this letter after that Ballard was taken, would consent to Babington to kill the queen, or that I consented to Ballard the 2d of August; Ballard being apprehended the 4th of August, and before that time had written to Mr. Secretary, and myself was the messenger?

Hutton. Savage confronted thee to thy face, and avouched these things to thy face.

Charnock. For flying away with my friend, I fulfilled the part of a friend therein.

Hutton. To perform thy friendship, thou didst break thy allegiance to thy sovereign.

Charnock. Therein have I offended.

Anderson. You of the Jury, you have now heard their several answers at large; go together and consider thereof in your consciences.

Then the Jury, upon this Evidence and their Answers, went up to a house to agree upon their Verdict; and those five Prisoners were sent away from the bar.

Then Bellamy and Gage were called to the bar, and a new inquest were called and appeared at the bar, and Evidence was given against the two Prisoners in sort ensuing.

VOL. I.

THE TRIAL OF GAGE.

First, was given in Evidence that Gage knew Ballard to be a priest, and was reconciled, and gave lodging unto Ballard, and attended Ballard as his man when he went into the North to provoke the people to rebellion: Also when all the matter was discovered, he lent Savage a horse to fly to Croydon, and directed him to one of Savage's father's men, who should help him away: Also that he lent Babington his apparel to fly in. Then was shewed forth his own confession, which was, that Ballard told him we should have a new world shortly, and that he lodged Ballard for his safety: Also he confessed, that during his flight he lodged in a barn: Also he confessed that he was reconciled by Ballard.—Also Charnock's Confession was read, That Gage borrowed apparel of him to fly in.

Then Gage was asked by the Lord Chief Baron Manwood, Wherefore he fled into the Woods?

Gage stoutly and fiercely answered, For company.

BELAMY'S TRIAL.

He confessed that the noise of the country was, that they (that is to say Babington, Barnewell and Donn) had conspired the queen's death, and how that after that he brought them meat into the woods, and lodged them in his house. Also Evidence was given, that one coming to Bellamy's house to seek for the traitors, telling him they conspired the queen's death, he denied he knew whom they were; whereas at the same time he had them in his house. Bellamy spake very little for himself, only he seemed to be a very clownish, blunt, wilful and obstinate papist.

Then this other Jury went up to a house to agree upon their Verdict, and by that time was the first Jury agreed, which came to the bar; and alderman Martin being their Foreman, spake for them, and said that they found all the five prisoners Guilty; and further, that they knew not what lands, tenements, goods or chattels the prisoners had, &c. So the Clerk of the Crown set down the Verdict, and discharged the Inquest of that service.

Forthwith was the other Inquest agreed of their Verdict, and found Gage and Bellamy also Guilty of the Treasons they were indicted of.

Then Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant, craved Judgment of Death against the Prisoners.

Sandes. Then said Sandes, the Clerk of the Crown: Edward Abington, thou hast been indicted of High Treason, and thereupon arraigned, and hast pleaded not Guilty, thy country hath found thee Guilty; what hast thou to say for thyself, wherefore Judgment and Execution of Death should not be given against thee?

Abington. My good lards, sithence I have been tried by the law, and am found Guilty of offence against the law, I am contented to abide the punishment due unto my guilt. The Inquest I cannot accuse, forasmuch as they thought in their consciences the Evidence sufficient to condemn me; howbeit, that brainless youth Babington, whose proud stomach and ambitious mind incensing him to commit most abominable Treasons, hath been the cause to shed the blood of others guiltless in his actions. But I cry not vengeance against him, for I am contented to die, being condemned to die. Only this one petition to you, my good lords, I make: I have one sister, whose preferment also hath miscarried; wherefore if it might please her majesty, with the revenues of my lands in some sort to provide for her: If I live, I will endeavour to be thankful; and if I die, I will pray for her.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded the like of Tilney; who said,

Tilney. And I, my good lords, am able to say nothing in deterring of my Judgment. This humble suit must I make to your honours; I owe in London about 2 or 300*l.* and I beseech your honours to procure my friends to pay it for discharge of my conscience.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded the like of Jones; who said,

Jones. I beseech your honours to be a means to her majesty for mercy, for I desiring to be counted a faithful friend, am now condemned for a false traitor. The love of Thomas Salisbury hath made me hate myself, but God knows how far I was from intending any Treason. But if mercy be not to be had, I beseech your honours this; I owe some sums of money, but not very much, and I have more owing me: I beseech that my debts may be paid with that which is owing me. Moreover, my good lords, the lands I have, which I had by descent from my father, at the marriage of a gentlewoman which is now my wife, were intailed unto me, and the heirs male of my body; I beseech you some consideration may be had of my posterity.

Hatton. Jones, did not you tell me that your lands were fee-simple, for an argument of your innocency?

Jones. Yea, sir, so my lands are; but at the time of my marriage they were intailed as I tell you.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded the like of Travers; who said,

Travers. I never committed any treason, but for my religion, I will die in it; only I owe 4*l.* or such a matter, I beseech you it may be paid out of the profits of my lands.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded the like of Charnock; who said, Charnock. I beseech your honour, Mr. Vice Chamberlain, to get her majesty to pardon me.

Hatton. Charnock, thy offence is too high for me to be an obtainer of thy pardon, but I am sorry for thee; if thou hadst applied thyself the best way, thou mightest have done thy country good service.

Charnock. I beseech you then, that six angels, which such a one hath of mine, may be delivered unto my brother to pay my debts.

Hatton. How much is thy debts?

Charnock. The same six angels would discharge it.

Hatton. Then I promise thee it shall be paid.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded the like of the rest, who answered little: whereupon they all received Judgment of Death, according to their demerits.

On the 20th of the same month, John Ballard, Anthony Babington, John Savage, Robert Barnewell, Chidioc Titchbourne, Charles Tilney and Edward Abington, were drawn on hurdles from the Tower to their Execution to St. Giles's Fields, being the place where they used to meet; where was erected a scaffold, and thereupon a gallows.

John Bullard the priest; the principal conspirator, confessed that he was guilty of those things for which he was condemned, but protested they were never enterprised by him upon any hope of preferment, but only, as he said, for the advancement of true Religion. He craved pardon and forgiveness of all persons, to whom his doings had been any scandal, and so made an end; making his prayers to himself in Latin, not asking her majesty forgiveness, otherwise than 'if he had offended.'

Anthony Babington also confessed, that he was come to die, as he had deserved; howbeit he (as Ballard before) protested that he was not led into those actions upon hope of preferment, or for any temporal respect; nor had ever attempted them, but that he was persuaded by reasons alledged to this effect, That it was a deed lawful and meritorious. He craved forgiveness of all whom he had any way offended; he would gladly also have been resolved whether his lands should have been confiscate to her majesty, or whether they should descend to his brother; but howsoever, his request was to the lords, and others the commissioners there present, that consideration might be had of one whose money he had received for lands, which he had passed no Fine for, for which the conveyance was void in law. He requested also, that consideration might be had of a certain servant of his, whom he had sent for certain merchandize into the East Countries, who by his means was greatly impoverished. For his wife, he said, she had good friends, to whose consideration he would leave her: And thus he finished, asking her majesty forgiveness, and making his prayers in Latin.

John Savage confessed his guilt, and said (as the other two before) that he did attempt it, for that in conscience he thought it a deed meritorious, and a common good to the weal public, and for no private preferment.

Robert Barnewell confessed that he was made acquainted with their drifts, but denied that ever he consented, or could be in conscience persuaded that it was a deed lawful. And being urged that he came to the court to spy opportunities for the achieving of their purposes, and that being there, her majesty observing his prying looks, acquainted before with their intents, she prayed God that all were well: To this he answered, That it was not unknown to divers of the council, that he had matters which he solicited, which was the cause of his being there at that time; but I confess, said he, at my return, Babington asked me what news; to whom I told, that her majesty had been abroad that day, with all the circumstances that I saw there; and if I have offended her majesty, I crave forgiveness; and assuredly, if the sacrifice of my body might establish her majesty in the true religion, I would most willingly offer it up. Then he prayed to himself in Latin.

Chidiok Titchbourne began to speak as followeth, viz. Countrymen and my dear friends, you expect I should speak something; I am a bad orator, and my Text is worse: It were in vain to enter into the discourse of the whole matter for which I am brought hither, for that it hath been revealed heretofore, and is well known to the most of this company: Let me be a warning to all young gentlemen, especially Generois adolescentulis. I had a friend, and a dear friend, of whom I made no small account, whose friendship hath brought me to this: he told me the whole matter, I cannot deny, as they had laid it down to be done; but I always thought it impious, and denied to be a dealer in it; but the regard of my friend caused me to be a man in whom the old proverb was verified, 'I was silent, and so consented.' Before this thing chanced, we lived together in most flourishing estate: Of whom went report in the Strand, Fleet-street, and elsewhere about London, but of Babington and Titchbourne? No threshold was of force to brave our entry. Thus we lived, and wanted nothing we could wish for: and God knows, what less in my head than matters of State? Now give me leave to declare the miseries I sustained after I was acquainted with the action, wherein I may justly compare my estate to that of Adam's, who could not abstain 'one thing forbidden,' to enjoy all other things the world could afford; the terror of conscience awaited me. After I considered the dangers whereinto I was fallen, I went to sir John Peters in Essex, and appointed my horses should meet me at London, intending to go down into the country. I came to London, and there heard that all was betrayed; whereupon, like Adam, we fled into the woods to hide ourselves, and there were apprehended. My dear countrymen, my sorrows may be your joy, yet mix your smiles with tears, and pity my case; I am descended from an house, from 200 years before the Conquest, never stained till this my misfortune. I have a wife and one child; my wife Agnes, my dear wife, and there is my grief, and six sisters left on my hand: my poor servants, I know, their master being taken, were dispersed, for all which I do most heartily grieve. I expected some favour, though I deserved nothing less, that the remainder of my years might in some sort have recompensed my former guilt: which seeing I have missed, let me now meditate upon the joys I hope to enjoy.—This done, he prayed first in Latin, and then in English, asking her majesty and all the world, heartily, forgiveness, and that he hoped steadfastly, now at this his last hour, his faith would not fail.

Charles Tilney said, I am a catholic, and believe in Jesus Christ, and by his Passion I hope to be saved; and I confess I can do nothing without him, which opinion all catholics firmly hold: and whereas they are, thought to hold the contrary, they are in that, as in all other things, greatly abused. To Dr. White, seeming to school him in points of religion, differing from those which he held, he spoke in anger, I came hither to die, Doctor, and not to argue. He prayed in Latin for himself, and after he prayed for queen Elizabeth, that she might live long; and warned all young gentlemen, of what degree or calling soever, to take warning by him.

Edward Abington said, I come hither to die, holding all points firmly that the catholic church doth; and for the matters whereof I am condemned, I confess all, saving the death of her majesty, to the which I never consented. He feared, as he said, great bloodshed in England before it were long. Sheriff Ratcliff said, Abington, Seest thou all these people, whose blood shall be demanded at thy hands, if thou, dying, conceal that which may turn to their peril; therefore tell why, or which way such blood should be shed? He said, All that I know, you have of record; and at last, said he, this country is hated of all countries for her iniquity, and God loves it not. And being urged by Dr. White to be of a lively faith; he answered, he believed steadfastly in the catholic faith. The Doctor asked him, how he meant, for I fear me, said he, thou deceivest thyself: he answered, That faith and religion which is holden almost in all Christendom, except here in England. Thus done, he willed them not to trouble him any longer with any more questions, but made his prayers to himself in Latin.

Ballard was first executed. He was cut down and bowelled with great cruelty while he was alive. Babington beheld Ballard's Execution without being in the least daunted: whilst the rest turned away their faces, and fell to prayers upon their knees. Babington being taken down from the gallows alive too, and ready to be cut up, he cried aloud several times in Latin, Parce mihi, Domine Jesu! Spare me, O Lord Jesus! Savage broke the rope, and fell down from the gallows, and was presently seized on by the executioner, his privities cut off, and his bowels taken out while he was alive. Barnwell, Titchbourne, Tilney and Abington were executed with equal cruelty.

On the next day Thomas Salisbury, Henry Donn, Edward Jones, John Charnock, John Travers, Robert Gage, Jerome Bellamy, were drawn to the place of Execution.

Thomas Salisbury said, Sithence it hath pleased God to appoint this place for my end, I thank his infinite Goodness for the same; I confess that I have deserved Death, and that I have offended her majesty, whom to forgive me I heartily beseech, with all others whom I have any way offended. I desire all true catholics to pray for me; and I desire them, as I beseech God they may, to endure with patience whatsoever shall be laid upon them, and never to enter into any action of violence for remedy. Then he said his prayers, looking earnestly with his eyes to heaven, and prayed in Latin a long while: When he had thus done, he cried in English and Latin, Father, forgive me!

Henry Donn said, Do the people expect I should say any thing? I was acquainted, I confess, with their practices, but I never did intend to be a dealer in them. Babington oftentimes requested me to be one, and said, for that he loved me well, he would bestow me in one of the best actions; which should have been the delivery of the queen of Scots, to which I could not for a long time agree; at length, by many urgent persuasions he won me, so as I told him I would do my best. And being asked, as he was ascending the ladder, whether he thought it lawful to kill her majesty? He answered, No, no; for I take her to be my lawful and natural prince. And (as Salisbury) he desired all catholics to endure with patience, and never to attempt any thing against her majesty, under whose government he had lived quietly, until within these ten weeks, that those things were first imparted unto him: and whereas he was indebted to divers, and divers in like manner to him, he forgave all that was owing to him, and craved forgiveness of what he owed. He desired God to forgive Babington, the only cause of his fall and death; and was right sorry for a gentlewoman, one Mrs. Bellamy, at whose house he, with the rest, were relieved after they fled; he prayed God, whom he had chiefly offended, next her majesty, and last of all the people, forgiveness; saying, No soul was more sorrowful than his, nor none more sinful; and prayed for her majesty, wishing she might live in all happiness, and after this life be eternized in everlasting bliss; and so he prayed in Latin and English.

Edward Jones said, I come hither to die, but how rightfully God knows; for thus stands my case: At Trinity term last, Mr. Salisbury made me acquainted with their purposes; and for that he knew me to be well horsed, he thought me as fit as any to attempt the delivery of the queen of Scots, and requested me to be one; which I utterly denied, altogether misliking their practices, and persuading him, by what means I might, from it; and told him, this was the haughty and ambitious mind of Anthony Babington, which would be the destruction of himself and friends, whose company I wished him to refrain; and for that I would have him out of his company, I have divers times lent him money, and pawned my chain and jewels to buy him necessaries to go into the country. And whereas I had made conveyance of my lands to divers uses, with some annuities, and placed my wife with my friends, and given over house-keeping, and by reason of my conscience thought to live at ease; I called my servants together again, and began to keep house more freshly, than ever I did, only because I was weary to see Salisbury's straggling, and for that I was willing to keep him about home; and never consented to any of his Treasons, but always advised him to beware; for though I was, and am a Catholic, yet I took it to be a most wicked act to offer violence to my natural prince. I did intend to go into Ireland, with Mr. Edward Fitton, and there to have served: until at length, very shortly after this, my determinate mind being not settled, I received a note of their names, amongst whom was the name of my dear friend: then I began to fear what hath happened; I heard that night he would be at my house; and indeed he came thither about twelve o'clock, and the door being opened him, as he was very familiar with me, he came running up to my bed-side with a candle in his hand, which he took from one of my men, saluting me with these words, Ned Jones, how dost thou? Ah! Tom, said I, Art thou one of them that should have killed the Queen? Yes, said he, what meanest thou by that? See, and read this, said I, giving him the Note wherein his name was; he seeing, turned about and said, there be many catholics in England as far in this act as we are: the more the worse, quoth I. Here is the sum of my fault, in which I know I have offended her majesty; first, because I did conceal it at London, and lastly, because I did not apprehend my dear friend Tom, being in my house; for which fault I am heartily sorry, and do ask her majesty forgiveness. There is one thing wherein I am to move you, concerning my Debts: I have set them down so near as I could what they are: good sir Francis Knowles, I shall intreat you to be a mean to her majesty, that there may be some care had of my creditors and debtors. The debts which I owe do amount, in the whole, to 980*l*. The debts which are owing me are 1600*l*. But who shall look into my compting-house shall find many of 100*l*. 200*l*. or 300*l*. whereof all is discharged, except some of 50*l*. and some 40*l*. and such like, without any defeasance, and lie only in my credit; so that unless some man of conscience enter into the action of my compting-house, it is like to be the utter undoing of a number; but God knows my mind, and I hope it shall not be laid to my charge; and so concluded with his prayers, first in Latin, and then in English, that the people might better understand what he prayed.

John Charnock and John Travers having their minds wholly fix on prayer, recommended themselves to God and the Saints. Gage extolled the queen's great grace and bounty to his father, and detested his own perfidious ingratitude towards his princess. And Jerome Bellamy, with confusion and deep silence, suffered last.

The Queen being informed of the severity used in the Executions the day before, and detesting such cruelty, gave express orders that these should be used more favourably; and accordingly they were permitted to hang till they were quite dead, before they were cut down and bowelled.

64. Proceedings against MARY Queen of SCOTS: 28 ELIZ. A. D. 1586, for being concerned in a Conspiracy against Queen Elizabeth; with some things previous thereto, and necessary to introduce and explain those Proceedings. [Cambden's Elizabeth. 1 Hardwicke State Papers, 224. 1 Burghley Papers, 558. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 779, 835.]

THE subjects of England finding the kingdom in danger of an invasion from abroad, and the life of the queen attempted by various plots at home, carried on by the papists, in prospect of a popish successor; voluntarily entered into an Association for the queen's safety, solemnly engaging and obliging themselves to each other, to revenge her death, on those who should be the occasion of it: which Association was as follows.

"Forasmuch as Almighty God hath ordained kings, queens, and princes to have dominion and rule over all their subjects, and to preserve them in the possession and observation of the true Christian religion, according to his holy word and commandment; and in like sort, that all subjects should love, fear, and obey their sovereign princes, being kings or queens, to the utmost of their power; at all times to withstand, pursue, and suppress all manner of persons, that shall by any means intend and attempt any thing dangerous or hurtful to the honour, state, or persons of their sovereigns.—Therefore we whose names are or shall be subscribed to this writing, being natural-born subjects of this realm of England; and having so gracious a lady, our sovereign Elizabeth by the ordinance of God, our most rightful queen, reigning over us these many years with great felicity, to our inestimable comfort: and finding lately by divers depositions, confessions, and sundry advertisements out of foreign parts, from credible persons well known to her majesty's council, and to divers others, that for the furtherance and advancement of some pretended title to the crown, it hath been manifested, that the life of our gracious sovereign queen Elizabeth hath been most dangerously designed against, to the peril of her person, if Almighty God, her perpetual defender, of his mercy had not revealed and withstood the same; by whose life, we, and all other her majesty's true and loyal subjects, do enjoy all inestimable benefit of peace in this land: do for these reasons and causes before alledged, not only acknowledge ourselves most justly bound with our lives and goods for her defence, and in her safety to prosecute, suppress and withstand all such intruders, and all other her enemies, of what nation, condition or degree soever they shall be, or by what counsel or title they shall pretend to be her enemies, or to attempt any harm upon her person; but do further think it our bounden duties, for the great benefit of peace, wealth, and godly government, we have more plentifully received these many years under her majesty's government, than any of our forefathers have done in any longer time of any of her progenitors, kings of this realm; to declare, and by this writing make manifest our bounden duties to our sovereign lady for her safety.—And to that end, we and every of us, first calling to witness the name of Almighty God, do voluntarily and most willingly bind ourselves, every one of us to the other, jointly and severally in the band of one firm and loyal society; and do hereby vow and promise by the majesty of Almighty God, that with our whole powers, bodies, lives and goods, and with our children and servants, we and every of us will faithfully serve, and humbly obey our said sovereign lady queen Elizabeth, against all states, dignities and earthly powers whatsoever; and will as well with our joint and particular forces during our lives withstand, pursue and offend, as well by force of arms, as by all other means of revenge, all manner of persons, of whatsoever state they shall be, and their abettors, that shall attempt any act, or counsel or consent to any thing that shall tend to the harm of her majesty's royal person; and will never desist from all manner of forcible pursuit against such persons, to the utter extermination of them, their counsellors, aiders and abettors.—And if any such wicked attempt against her most royal person shall be taken in hand, or procured, whereby any that have, may or shall pretend title to come to this crown by the untimely death of her majesty so wickedly procured (which God of his mercy forbid!) that the same may be avenged, we do not only bind ourselves both jointly and severally never to allow, accept or favour any such pretended successor, by whom or for whom any such detestable act shall be attempted or committed, as unworthy of all government in any Christian realm or civil state:—But do also further vow and protest, as we are most bound, and that in the presence of the eternal and everlasting God, to prosecute such person or persons to death, with our joint and particular forces, and to act the utmost revenge upon them, that by any means we or any of us can devise and do, or cause to be devised and done for their utter overthrow and extirpation.—And to the better corroboration of this our Loyal Band and Association, we do also testify by this writing, that we do confirm the contents hereof by our oaths corporally taken upon the holy evangelists, with this express condition, That no one of us shall for any respect of person or causes, or for fear or reward, separate ourselves from this association, or fail in the prosecution thereof during our lives, upon pain of being by the rest of us prosecuted and suppress as perjured persons, and as public enemies to God, our queen, and to our native country; to which punishment and pains we do voluntarily submit ourselves, and every of us, without benefit of any colour and pretence.—In witness of all which premises to be inviolably kept, we do to this writing put our hands and seals; and shall be most ready to accept and admit any others hereafter to this Society and Association.”

This Association, although entered into voluntarily by persons in their private capacities, was confirmed and established by a statute made 27 Elizabeth, 1585, entitled, ‘An Act for the Security of the Queen’s Royal Person, and the continuance of the realm in peace; and is as follows:

“Forasmuch as the good felicity and comfort of the whole estate of this realm consisteth only (next under God) in the surety and preservation of the queen’s most excellent majesty; and for that it hath manifestly appeared, that sundry wicked plots and means have of late been devised and laid, as well in foreign parts beyond the seas, as also within this realm, to the great endangering of her highness’s most royal person, and to the utter ruin of the whole commonweal, if by God’s merciful providence the same had not been revealed: therefore for the preventing of such great perils as might hereafter otherwise grow by the like detestable and devilish practices, at the humble suit and earnest petition of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same parliament; be it enacted and ordained, if at any time after the end of this present session of parliament, any open invasion or rebellion shall be had or made, into or within any of her majesty’s realms or dominions, or any act attempted, tending to the hurt of her majesty’s most royal person, by or for any person that shall or may pretend title to the crown of this realm after her majesty’s decease; or if any thing be compassed or imagined, tending to the hurt of her majesty’s royal person, by any person, or with the privy of any person that shall or may pretend title to the crown of this realm: that then by her majesty’s commission under her great seal, the lords and other of her highness’s privy-council, and such other lords of parliament to be named by her majesty, as with the said privy council shall come up to the number of four and twenty at the least, having with them for their assistance in that behalf such of the judges of the Courts of Record at Westminster as her highness shall for that purpose assign and appoint, or the more part of the same council, lords and judges, shall by virtue of this act have authority to examine all and every the offences aforesaid, and all circumstances thereof, and thereupon to give sentence or judgment, as upon good proof of the matter shall appear unto them. And that after such sentence or judgment given, and declaration thereof made and published by her majesty’s proclamation under the great seal of England, all persons against whom such sentence or judgment shall be so given and published, shall be excluded and disabled for ever to have or claim, or to pretend to have or claim the crown of this realm, or of any her majesty’s dominions; any former law or statute whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And that thereupon all her highness’s subjects shall and may lawfully by virtue of this act, and her majesty’s direction in that behalf, by all forcible and possible means pursue to death every such wicked person, by whom or by whose means, assent, or privy, any such invasion or rebellion shall be in form aforesaid denounced to have been made, or such wicked act attempted, or other thing compassed or imagined against her majesty’s person, and all their aiders, comforters and abettors.—And if any such detestable act shall be executed against her highness’s most royal person, whereby her majesty’s life shall be taken away (which God of his great mercy forbid); that then every such person, by or for whom any such act shall be executed, and their issues being any wise assenting or privy to the same, shall by virtue of this act be excluded and disabled for ever to have or claim, or pretend to have or claim the said crown of this realm, or any other her highness’s dominions, any former law or statute to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And that all the subjects of this realm, and all other her majesty’s dominions, shall and may lawfully, by virtue of this act, by all forcible and possible means pursue to the death every such wicked person, by whom or by whose means any such detestable fact shall be in form hereafter expressed denounced to have been committed, and also their issues being any wise assenting or privy to the same, and all their aiders, comforters and abettors in that behalf.—And to the end that the intention of this law may be effectually executed, if her majesty’s life be taken away by any violent or unnatural means (which God defend): be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the lords and others, which shall be of her majesty’s privy-council at the time of such her decease, or the more part of the same council, joining unto them for their assistance five other earls, and seven other lords of parliament at the least (foreseeing, that none of the said earls, lords or council be known to be persons that may make any title to the crown), those persons which were chief justices of either bench, master of the rolls, and chief baron of the exchequer at the time of her majesty's death, or in default of the said justices, master of the rolls, and chief baron, some other of those which were justices of some of the courts of records at Westminster at the time of her highness's decease, to supply their places; or any four and twenty, or more of them, whereof eight to be lords of the parliament, not being of the privy-council, shall to the uttermost of their power and skill examine the cause and manner of such her majesty's death, and what persons shall be any way guilty thereof, and all circumstances concerning the same, according to the true meaning of this act; and thereupon shall by open proclamation publish the same, and without any delay, by all forcible and possible means, prosecute to death all their aiders and abettors; and for the doing thereof, and the withstanding and suppressing all such power and force, as shall be any way levied or stirred in disturbance of the due execution of this law, they shall by virtue of this act have power and authority, not only to raise and use such forces as shall in that behalf be needful and convenient, but also to use all other means and things possible and necessary for the maintenance of the same forces, and prosecution of the said offenders. And if any such power and force shall be levied and stirred in disturbance of the due execution of this law, by any person that shall or may pretend any title to the crown of this realm, whereby this law may not in all things be fully executed, according to the effect and true meaning of the same; that then every such person shall by virtue of this act be therefore excluded and disabled for ever to have, or claim, or pretend to have or claim the crown of this realm, or of any other her highness's dominions, any former law or statute whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding.— And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every the subjects of all her majesty's realms and dominions, shall to the uttermost of their power aid and assist the said council, and all other the lords and other persons, to be adjoined to them for assistance, as is aforesaid, in all things to be done and executed according to the effect and intention of this law; and that no subjects of this realm shall in any wise be impeached in body, land or goods, at any time hereafter, for any thing to be done or executed according to the tenor hereof, any law or statute heretofore made to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.— And whereas of late many of her majesty's good and faithful subjects have in the name of God, and with the testimonies of good consciences, by one uniform manner of writing under their hands and seals, and by their several oaths voluntarily taken, joined themselves together in one bond and Association, to withstand and revenge to the uttermost all such malicious actions and attempts against her majesty's most royal person: now for the full explaining of all such ambiguities and questions, as otherwise might happen to grow by reason of any sinister or wrong construction or interpretation to be made or inferred of or upon the words or meaning thereof; be it declared and enacted by the authority of this present parliament, that the same Association, and every article and sentence therein contained, as well concerning the disallowing, excluding, or disabling any person that may or shall pretend any title to come to the crown of this realm, as also for the pursuing, and taking revenge of any such wicked act or attempt as is mentioned in the same Association, shall and ought to be in all things expounded and adjudged according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and not otherwise, or against any other person or persons."

The following year, 1586, Babington and others being convicted of a Conspiracy to assassinate queen Elizabeth; and the queen of Scots being charged with countenancing and encouraging that Conspiracy, a Commission was issued out, founded upon the abovesaid Statute, for the EXAMINATION and TRIAL of the said queen of Scots, to the effect following:

the 27th year of our reign, divers matters have been compassed and imagined, tending to the hurt of our royal person, as well by Mary daughter and heir of James 5th king of Scots, and commonly called queen of Scots, and dowager of France, pretending title to the crown of this realm of England; as by divers other persons, cum scientia, in English with the privity of the same Mary, as we are given to understand; and whereas we do intend and determine, that the act aforesaid be in all and every part thereof duly and effectually executed according to the tenor of the same, and that all offences abovesaid, in the act abovesaid mentioned, as aforesaid, and the circumstances of the same, be examined, and sentence or judgment thereupon given, according to the tenor and effect of the said act: to you, and the greater part of you we do give full and absolute power, faculty and authority, according to the tenor of the said act, to examine all and singular matters compassed and imagined, tending to the hurt of our royal person, as well by the aforesaid Mary, as by any other person or persons whatsoever, cum scientia, in English, with the privity, of the same Mary, and all circumstances of the same, and all other offences abovesaid in the act aforesaid, as aforesaid, mentioned whatsoever, and all circumstances of the same and of every of them: and thereupon according to the tenor of the Act aforesaid, to give Sentence or Judgment, as upon good proof matter shall appear unto you. And therefore we do command you, that you do at certain days and places, which you, or the greater part of you, shall thereunto fore-appoint, diligently proceed upon the premises in form aforesaid, &c.”

The most part of these Commissioners came the 11th of Oct. to Fotheringay-castle in the county of Northampton, seated upon the bank of the river Nen, where the queen of Scots was then kept. The next day the commissioners sent to her sir Walter Mildmay, Powlet, and Edward Barker, a publick notary: who delivered into her hands queen Elizabeth's Letter; which when she had read, she, with a countenance composed to royal dignity, and with a mind untroubled, said, It grieveth me that the queen, my most dear sister, is misinformed of me; and that I, having been so many years straitly kept in prison, and grown lame of my limbs, have lien neglected, after I have offered so many reasonable conditions for my liberty. Though I have thoroughly forewarned her of many dangers, yet hath no credit been given unto me, but I have been always contemned, though most nearly allied unto her in blood. When the Association was entered in, and the Act of Parliament thereupon made, I foresaw that whatsoever danger should happen either from foreign princes abroad, or from ill-disposed people at home, or for religion's sake, I must bear the whole blame, having many mortal enemies in the court. Certainly I might take it hardly, and not without cause, that a Confederacy hath been made with my son without my knowledge: but such matters I omit. As for this Letter, it seemeth strange to me, that the queen should command me as a subject, to appear personally in judgment. I am an absolute queen, and will do nothing which may prejudice either mine own royal majesty, or other princes of my place and rank, or my son. My mind is not yet dejected, neither will I sink under my calamity. I refer myself to those things, which I have protested before Bromley, now chancellor, and the lord Laware. The laws and statutes of England are to me most unknown; I am destitute of counsellors, and who shall be my peers I am utterly ignorant. My Papers and Notes are taken from me, and no man dareth step forth to be my advocate. I am clear from all crime against the queen, I have excited no man against her, and I am not to be charged but by mine own word or writing, which cannot be produced against me. Yet can I not deny but I have commended myself and my Cause to foreign princes."

The next day there returned unto her in the name of the Commissioners, Powlet and Barker, who shewed unto her this Answer drawn in Writing, and asked her, whether she would persist in the same. When she had heard it distinctly read, she commended it as rightly and truly conceived, and said, she would persist therein. But this, said she, I have forgotten, which I would have to be added thereunto: Whereas the queen hath written, that I am subject to the laws of England, and to be judged by them, because I have lived under the protection of them; I answer, that I came into England to crave aid, and ever since have been detained in Prison, and could not enjoy the protection or benefit of the laws of England; nay, I could never yet understand from any man, what manner of laws those were.

In the afternoon came unto her certain selected persons from amongst the Commissioners, with men learned in the civil and canon-law. But the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Treasurer declared their authority by patent, and shewed that neither her imprisonment, nor her prerogative of royal majesty could exempt her from answering in this kingdom; with fair words advising her to hear what matters were to be objected against her: otherwise they threatened, that by authority of law, they both could and would proceed against her, though she were absent. She answered, That she was no subject, and rather would she die a thousand deaths, than acknowledge herself a subject, considering, that by such an acknowledgement, she should both prejudice the height of regal majesty, and withal confess herself to be bound by all the laws of England, even in matter of religion: nevertheless she was ready to answer to all things in a free and full parliament, for that she knew not whether this meeting and assembly were appointed against her, being already condemned by forejudgings, to give some shew and colour of a just and legal proceeding. She warned them therefore to look to their consciences, and to remember, that the theatre of the whole world is much wider than the kingdom of England. She began then to complain of injuries done unto her: and the Lord Treasurer interrupting her, began to reckon up queen Elizabeth's kindnesses towards her, namely, that she had punished some, which impugned the claim she laid to England, and had been a means to keep her from being condemned by the estates of the realm, for the marriage sought with the duke of Norfolk, for the rebellion in the north, and for other matters. All which when she seemed little to esteem, they returned back.

Within few hours after, they delivered unto her, by the hands of Powlet and the Solicitor, the chief points of their Commission, and the names of the Commissioners, that she might see, that they were to proceed according to equity and right, and not by any cunning point of law, and extraordinary course. She took no Exceptions against the Commissioners, but most sharply excepted against the late law, upon which the authority of their commission wholly depended; as that it was unjust, devised of purpose against her, that it was without example, and such wherunto she would never subject herself. She asked, by what law they would proceed: If by the civil or canon-law, then said she, interpreters are to be fetched from Pavia, or Poitiers, and other foreign universities; for in England none are to be found that are meet. She added also, That it was manifest, by plain words in the queen's Letters, That she was already forejudged to be guilty of the crime, though unheard; and therefore there was no reason why she should appear before them: and she required to be satisfied touching some scruples in the said Letters, which she had for herself noted confusedly, and by snatches, severally by themselves, but would not deliver them written out; for it stood not, said she, with her royal dignity, to play the scrivener.

Touching this matter, the said selected Commissioners went unto her again, to whom she signified, that she did not well understand what those words meant, 'seeing she is under the queen's protection.' The Lord Chancellor answered, That this was plain to every one of understanding, yet was it not for subjects to interpret what the queen's meaning was, neither were they made commissioners for that end. Then she required to have her protestation shewed and allowed, which she had formerly made. It was answered, that it never had been, nor now was to be allowed, for that it was prejudicial to the crown of England. She asked, By what authority they would proceed? It was answered, by authority of their Commission, and by the common law of England.

But, said she, Ye make laws at your pleasure, whereunto I have no reason to submit myself, considering that the English in times past refused to submit themselves to the Law

Salique of France : and if they would proceed by the common law of England, they should produce precedents and cases, forasmuch as that law consisteth much of cases and custom ; and if by the canon law, none else ought to interpret the same, but the makers thereof. It was answered, That they would proceed neither by the Civil nor Canon Law, but by the Common Law of England : that it might nevertheless be proved by the civil and canon law, that she ought to appear before them, if she would not refuse to hear it. And indeed she refused not to hear it, but, as she said, by way of Interlocution, not Judicially.

From hence she fell into other speeches, That she had intended nothing to the destruction of the queen ; that she had been incensed with injuries and indignities ; that she should be a stone of offence to others, if she were so unworthily handled : that by Law she had offered her best means for revoking the bishop of Rome's Bull ; that she would have defended her innocency by letter, but it was not allowed her ; and finally, that all the offices of kindness, which she had tendered these twenty years, were rejected. Thus while she wandered far in these digressions, they called her back again, and prayed her to speak plainly, whether she would answer before the commissioners. She replied, That the authority of their delegation was founded upon a late law made to intrap her ; that she could not away with the queen's laws, which she had good reason to suspect ; that she was still full of good courage, and would not offend against her progenitors, the kings of Scots, by acknowledging herself a subject to the crown of England : for this were nothing else but to profess them openly to have been rebels and traitors. Yet she refused not to answer, so as she might not be reduced to the rank of a subject : But she had rather perish utterly than to answer as a criminal person.

Whereunto Hatton, Vice-Chamberlain to queen Elizabeth, answered : You are accused (but not condemned) to have conspired the Destruction of our lady and queen anointed. You say you are a queen : be it so. But in such a crime the royal dignity is not exempted from answering, neither by the Civil nor Canon Law, nor by the Law of nations, nor of nature. For if such kind of offences might be committed without punishment, all justice would stagger, yea, fall to the ground. If you be innocent, you wrong your reputation in avoiding a Trial. You protest yourself to be innocent, but queen Elizabeth thinketh otherwise, and that neither without grief and sorrow for the same. To examine therefore your innocency, she hath appointed for Commissioners most honourable, prudent and upright men, who are ready to hear you according to equity with favour, and will rejoice with all their hearts, if you shall clear yourself of this crime. Believe me, the queen herself will be much affected with joy, who affirmed unto me at my coming from her, that never any thing befel her more grievous, than that you were charged with such a crime. Wherefore lay aside the bootless privilege of royal dignity, which now can be of no use unto you, appear in judgment, and shew your innocency, lest by avoiding Trial, you draw upon yourself suspicion, and lay upon your reputation an eternal blot and aspersion.

I refuse not (said she) to answer in a full parliament before the estates of the realm lawfully assembled, so as I may be declared the next to the succession ; yea, before the queen and council, so as my protestation may be admitted, and I may be acknowledged the next of kin to the queen. To the judgment of mine adversaries, amongst whom I know all defence of mine innocency will be barred, flatly, I will not submit myself.

The Lord Chancellor asked her, whether she would answer, if her Protestation were admitted ? I will never (said she) submit myself to the late law mentioned in the Commission.

Hereupon the Lord Treasurer answered ; We, notwithstanding, will proceed to-morrow in the Cause, though you be absent and continue contumax.

Search (said she) your consciences, look to your honour, God reward you and yours for your Judgment against me.

On the morrow, which was the 14th of the month, she sent for certain of the Commissioners, and prayed them, that her Protestation might be admitted and allowed. The Lord Treasurer asked her, Whether she would appear to her Trial, if her Protestation were only received and put in writing, without allowance. She yielded at length, yet with much ado, and with an ill-will, lest she should seem (as she said) to derogate from her predecessors or successors ; but was very desirous to purge herself of the crime objected against her, being persuaded by Hatton's reasons, which she had weighed with advisement.

Soon after, the Commissioners which were present, assembled themselves, in the Presence-Chamber. At the upper end of the Chamber was placed a Chair of estate for the queen of England, under a cloth of estate. Over-against it, below and more remote, near the transom or beam that ran cross the room, stood a chair for the queen of Scots. At the walls on both sides, were placed benches, upon which sate, on the one side, the Lord Chancellor of England, Lord Treasurer of England, the earls of Oxford, Kent, Derby, Worcester, Rutland, Cumberland, Warwick, Pembroke, Lincoln, and the lord viscount Montacute ; on the other side, the barons of Abergavenny, Zouch, Morley, Stafford, Grey, Lumley, Sturton, Sandes, Wentworth, Mordant, St. John of Bletsbo, Compton, and Cheiney. Nigh unto these sate the knights of the Privy-Council, sir James a Croftes, sir Christopher Hatton, sir Francis Walsingham, sir Ralph Sadleir, sir Walter Mildmay, and sir Amias Powllet. Forward, before the earls, sate the two Chief Justices, and the Chief Baron of the Exchequer : and on the other side two barons, the other Justices, Dale and Ford, doctors of the Civil-Law; and at a little table in the midst sate Popham the queen's Attorney, Egerton the Solicitor, Gaudy the queen's Serjeant at Law, the Clerk of the Crown, and two Writers.

When she was come, and had settled herself in her seat, after silence proclaimed, Bromley Lord Chancellor turning to her, spake briefly to this effect: The most high and mighty queen Elizabeth, being not without great grief of mind advertised, that you have conspired the Destruction of her and of England, and the Subversion of Religion, hath, out of her office and duty, lest she might seem to have neglected God, herself and her people, and out of no malice at all, appointed these commissioners, to hear the matters which shall be objected unto you, and how you can clear yourself of them, and make known your innocency.

She rising up, said, That she came into England to crave aid, which had been promised her, and yet was she detained ever since in prison. She protested, that she was no subject of the queen's, but had been and was a free and absolute queen, and not to be constrained to appear before commissioners, or any other Judge whatsoever, for any cause whatsoever, save before God alone the highest Judge, lest she should prejudice her own royal majesty, the king of Scots her son, her successors, or other absolute princes. But, that she now appeared personally, to the end to refute the crimes objected against her. And hereof she prayed her own attendants to bear witness.

The Lord Chancellor, not acknowledging that any Aid had been promised her, answered, That this Protestation was in vain, for that whosoever (of what place and degree soever he were) should offend against the laws of England, in England, was subject unto the same laws, and by the late act might be examined and tried; the said Protestation therefore made in prejudice of the laws and queen of England, was not to be admitted. The Commissioners nevertheless commanded, that as well her Protestation, as the Lord Chancellor's Answer, should be recorded.

Then after the Commission was openly read, which was grounded upon the Act already often mentioned, she stoutly opposed her Protestation against the said Act, as enacted directly and purposely against her, and herein she appealed to their consciences.

When Answer was made by the Lord Treasurer, that every person in this kingdom was bound even by the latest laws, and that she ought not to speak against the laws: and that the Commissioners would judge, according to that law, what Protestations or Appellations soever she interposed, she said at length, that she was ready to hear and answer touching any fact whatsoever against the queen of England.

Gawdy now opened the law from point to point, affirming, that she had offended against the same; and hereupon he made an historical discourse of Babington's Conspiracy, and concluded, That she knew of it, approved it, assented unto it, promised her assistance, and shewed the way and means.

She answered with stout courage, That she knew not Babington, that she never received any Letters from him, nor wrote any to him; that she never plotted the destruction of the queen, and that to prove the same, her Subscription under her own hand was to be produced; that for her part she never so much as heard speak thereof; that she knew not Ballard, nor ever relieved him; but she understood from some, that the catholics in England took many things very hardly, and hereof she herself had advertised the queen by Letters, and besought her to take pity on them; that many also, which were to her utterly unknown, had offered her their help and assistance, yet had she excited no man to commit any offence; and being shut up in prison, she could neither know nor hinder what they attempted.

Hereupon it was urged out of Babington's Confession, that there had been intercourse by Letters betwixt her and Babington. She confessed that there had passed Conference by Letters betwixt her and many men, yet could it not thereby be gathered that she was privy to all their wicked counsels. She required that her own Subscription, under her hand, might be produced; and asked, what hurt it were, if she redemanded the Letters, which had been kept from her almost a whole year? Then were read the Copies of Letters between her and Babington, wherein the whole Conspiracy was set down.

The Scottish Queen's Letter to Anth. Babington.

' My very good friend, albeit it be long ' since you heard from me, not more than I ' have done from you, it is against my will;
' yet would I not you should think I have in ' the mean while, nor ever will be, unmindful
' of the effectual affection you have shewed
' heretofore towards all that concerneth me.
' I have understood, that upon the renewing of ' your intelligence, there were addressed unto ' you, both from France and Scotland, some
' packets for me; I pray you, if any be come ' to your hands, and be yet in place, to deliver ' them to the bearer hereof, who will safely
' convey them unto me; and I will pray to ' God for your preservation. Your assured
' good friend, MARY, Regina. June the 28th,

Anth. Babington's Letter to the Scottish Queen.

' Most mighty, most excellent, my dread
' sovereign lady and queen, unto whom I owe
' all fidelity and obedience; may it please ' your gracious majesty to admit excuse of my ' long silence, and discontinuance from those ' dutiful offices, intercepted upon the remove
' of your royal person from the antient place of ' your abode, to the custody of a wicked puritan,
' and meer Leicestrian, a mortal enemy
' both by faith and faction to your majesty and ' to the catholic estate: I held the hope of our country's weal depending (next under God) upon the life of your majesty, to be desperate, and thereupon resolved, to depart the realm, determining to spend the remnant of my life in such solitary sort, as the miserable and wretched estate of my country doth require; only expecting, according to the just judgment of God, the present confusion thereof, which God, for his mercy sake, prevent. The which my purpose being in execution, and standing upon my departure, there was addressed unto me, from the parts beyond the seas, one Ballard, a man of virtue and learning, and of singular zeal to the catholic cause, and your majesty's service. The man informed me of great preparations by the Christian princes, your majesty's allies, for the deliverance of our country from the extreme and miserable estate wherein for a long time it hath remained. Which when I understood, my especial desire was, to advise by what means I might, with the hazard of my life, and all my friends in general, do your sacred majesty one day's good service. Whereupon, most dread sovereign, according to the great care, which those princes have of the preservation and safe deliverance of your majesty's sacred person, I advised of means, and considered of circumstances accordingly, to and with so many of the wisest and most trusty, as with safety I might commend the secrecy thereof unto: I do find, by the assistance of the Lord Jesus, assurance of good effect, and desired fruit of our travail. These things are first to be advised in this great and honourable action; upon issue of which dependeth, not only the life of your most excellent majesty, which God long preserve, to our inestimable comfort, and to the salvation of English souls, and the lives of all us actors therein; but also the honour and weal of our country, far more dear than our lives unto us, and the last hope ever to recover the faith of our forefathers, and to redeem ourselves from the servitude and bondage, which hereby heretofore hath been imposed upon us with the loss of many thousand souls. First, for the assuring of invasions, sufficient strength on the invaders parts to arrive is appointed, with a strong party at every place, to join with them, and warrant their landing, the deliverance of your majesty, the dispatch of the usurping competitor. For the effecting of all, may it please your majesty to rely upon my service, I protest before the Almighty, who hath long miraculously preserved your royal person, no doubt to some universal good, that what I have said shall be performed, or all our lives happily lost in the execution thereof. Which vow all the chief actors have taken solemnly; and are upon assurance by your majesty to me, to receive the blessed sacrament thereupon, either to prevail in the church's behalf, and your majesty's, or fortunately to die for so honourable a cause. Now, forasmuch as delays are extreme dangerous, it might please your most excellent majesty, by your wisdom to direct us, and by your princely authority to enable us, and such as may advance the affairs: foreseeing, there is not any of the nobility, at liberty, assured to your majesty in this desperate service, except unknown unto us; and seeing that it is very necessary that some there should be to become heads to lead the multitude, who are disposed by nature in this land to follow nobility: considering withal, it doth not only make the commons and country to follow without contradiction or contention, which is ever found in equality, but also doth add great courage to the leaders. For which necessary regards, I would recommend some to your majesty as are fittest, in my knowledge, to be your lieutenants, in the west parts, in the north parts, South Wales, and North Wales, the countries of Lancaster, Derby, and Stafford. In all which countries, parties being already made, and fidelity taken in your majesty's name, I hold them as most assured, and of undoubted fidelity. Myself, with ten gentlemen of quality, and an hundred followers, will undertake the delivery of your person from the hands of your enemies: and for the dispatch of the usurper, from obedience of whom, by the excommunication of her, we are made free, there be six noble gentlemen, all my private friends, who, for the zeal they bear to the Catholic cause, and your majesty's service, will undertake the tragical execution. It resteth, that according to their infinite deserts, and your majesty's bounty, their heroical attempts may be honourably rewarded in them, if they escape with life, or in their posterity; and that so much by your majesty's authority I may be able to assure them. Now it remaineth only in your majesty's wisdom, that it be reduced into method, that your happy deliverance be first, for that thereupon dependeth the only good, and that the other circumstances concur; that the untimely end of the one do not overthrow the rest. All which your majesty's wonderful experience and wisdom will dispose in so good manner as, I doubt not, through God's good assistance, shall take deserved effect: for the obtaining of which every one of us shall think his life most happily spent. Upon the twelfth day of this month I will be at Litchfield, expecting your majesty's answers and letters, to execute what by them shall be commanded. Your majesty's faithful subject, and sworn servant,

ANTHONY BABINGTON.

As for these Letters (said she) it may be that Babington wrote them, but let it be proved that I received them: If Babington or any others affirm it, I say they lye openly; other men's crimes are not to be cast upon me. A Packet of Letters, which had been kept from me almost a whole year, came to my hands about that time, but by whom it was sent, I know not.

To prove that she had received Babington's Letters, there were read out of Babington's Confession the chief heads of certain Letters, which he had voluntarily confessed, that she wrote back unto him: wherein when mention was made of the earl of Arundel and his brethren, and the earl of Northumberland, the tears burst forth, and she said, Alas! what hath that noble house of the Howards endured for my sake? and shortly after, having wiped away the tears, she answered, That Babington might confess what he list, but it was an open lye, that she had devised such means to escape: That her adversaries might easily get the Cyphers, which she had used to others, and with the same write many things falsely: that it was not likely she should use Arundel's help, whom she knew to be shut up in prison; or Northumberland's, who was very young, and to her unknown.

There were read also certain points picked out of Savage's and Ballard's Confessions, who had confessed that Babington imparted unto them certain Letters, which he had received from the queen of Scots.

She affirmed, That Babington received none from her, yea that she was angry with some which had secretly suggested counsels unto her for invading of England, and had warned them to beware.

Now was there a Letter brought forth, wherein Babington's Plot was commended and approved.

' TRUSTY and well-beloved, according to the zeal and entire affection which I have known in you towards the common cause of Religion, and mine, having always made account of you as a principal and right worthy member to be employed both in the one, and in the other; it hath been no less consolation unto me to know your estate, as I have done by your last Letter, and to have further means to renew my intelligence with you, than I have felt griefs all this while past, to be without the same. I pray you therefore to write unto me hereafter, so often as you can, of all concurrents, which you may judge in any sort importunate to the good of mine affairs, wherein I shall not fail to correspond with all the care and diligence that shall be by possibility. For divers great and importunate considerations, which were here too long to be deducted, I cannot but greatly praise and commend your common desire to prevent, in time, the designment of our enemies, for the extirpation of our religion out of this realm, with the ruin of us all; for I have long ago shewed to the foreign catholic princes, what they have done against the king of Spain, and in the time the catholics here remaining, exposed to all persecutions and cruelty, do daily diminish in number, forces, means and power, so as if remedy be not thereunto speedily provided, I fear not a little but that they shall become altogether unable for ever to rise again to receive any aid at all whenever it is offered. Then for my own part, I pray you assure our principal friends, that

' albeit I had no particular interest in this case, that all that I may pretend unto, being of no consideration to me in respect of the public good of the state, I shall be always ready, and most willing to employ therein my life, and all that I have, or may look for in this world. Now to ground substantially this enterprize, and to bring it to good success, you must examine duly, 1. What forces, as well on foot as on horse, you may raise among you all; and what captains you shall appoint for them in every shire, in case a general cannot be had. 2. Which towns, ports, and havens, you may assure yourselves, as well on the North, West, and South, to receive succour, as well from the Low-Countries, Spain, and France, as from other parts. 3. What place you esteem fittest, and of most advantage to assemble the principal company of your forces at the same time, which would be compassed conform to the proportion of your own. 4. For how long pay and munition, and what ports are fittest for their landing in this realm; from the foresaid three foreign countries. 5. What provision of monies and armour, in case you should want, you would ask. 6. By what means do the six gentlemen deliberate to proceed. 7. The manner of my getting forth of this hold.—Which Points having taken amongst you who are the principal actors, and also as few in number as you can; the best resolution in my device is, that you impart the same with all diligence to Bernardin de Mendoza, ambassador lieger for the king of Spain in France, who besides the experience he hath of the estate on this side, I may assure you, will employ himself most willing: I shall not fail to write to him of the matter with all the recommendations I can, as also I shall do in any wise that shall be needful. But you must take choice men for the managing of the affairs with the said Mendoza, and others out of the realm of some faithful and very secret, both in wisdom and personage, unto whom only you must commit yourselves; to the end things may be kept the more secret, which for your own security I commend to yourself. If your messenger bring you back again sure promise, and sufficient assurance of the succours which you demand, then thereafter (but not sooner, for that it were in vain) take diligent order, that all those on your part make, secretly as they can, provision of armour, fit horses, and ready money, wherewith to hold themselves in a readiness to march as soon as it shall be signified unto you by the chief and principal of every shire: and for the better colouring of the matter, reserving to the principals the knowledge of the ground of the enterprizes, it shall be enough at the beginning to give it out to the rest, that the said provisions are made only for the fortifying of yourselves in case of need, against the Puritans of this realm, the principal whereof having the chief forces thereof in the Low Countries, as you may let the brait go disguised, do seek the ruin and overthrow at their return home of the catholics, and to usurp the crown, not only against me and all other lawful pretenders thereto, but against their own queen that now is, if she will not altogether submit herself to their government. These pretexts may serve to found and establish among all associations, or confederations general, as done only for your preservation and defence, as well in religion as lands, lives, and goods, against the oppression and attempts of the said Puritans; without directly writing, or giving out any thing against the queen, but rather shewing yourselves willing to maintain her and her lawful heirs after her, not naming me. The affairs being thus prepared, and forces in readiness, both without and within the realm, then shall it be time to set the gentlemen on work; taking good order, upon the accomplishment of their discharges, I may be suddenly transported out of this place, and meet without tarrying for the arrival of the foreign aid, which then must be hastened with all diligence. Now for that there can be no certain day appointed for the accomplishment of the said gentlemen's designment, to the end others may be in a readiness to take me from hence, I would that the said gentlemen had always about them, or at least at court, divers and sundry scoutmen, furnished with good and speedy horses, as soon as the design shall be executed, to come with all diligence to advertise me thereof, and those that shall be appointed for my transporting; to the end that immediately after they may be at the place of mine abode, before my keeper can have advertisement of the execution of the said designment, or at the least before he can fortify himself within the house, or carry me out of the same. It were necessary to dispatch two or three of the said advertisers by divers ways, to the end, if one be staid the other may come through: at the same instant it were needful also to assay to cut off the posts ordinary ways. This is the plot that I think best for this enterprize, and the order whereby we shall conduct the same for our common security: for stirring on this side before you be sure of sufficient foreign forces, that were for nothing but to put ourselves in danger of following the miserable fortune of such as have heretofore travelled in the like actions; and if you take me out of this place, be well assured to set me in the midst of a good army, or some very good strength, where I may safely stay till the assembly of your forces, and arrival of the said foreign succours. It were sufficient cause given to the queen, in catching me again, to include me in some hold, out of the which I should never escape, if she did use me no worse; and to pursue with all extremity those that assisted me, which would grieve me more than all the unhappiness might fall upon myself. Earnestly as you can, look and take heed most carefully and vigilantly to compass and assure all so well, that shall be necessary for the effecting of the said enterprize, as with the grace of God you may bring the same to happy end; remitting to the judgment of your principal friends on this side, with whom you have to deal; therein to ordain and conclude upon these points, which may serve you for an overture of such propositions as you shall amongst you find best: and to yourself in particular, I refer the gentlemen aforementioned, to be assured of all that should be requisite for the intire execution of their good-wills. I leave their common resolution to advice: in case the design do not take hold, as may happen whether they will or no, do not pursue my transport, and the execution of the rest of the enterprize. But if the mishap should fall out, that you might not come by me, being set in the Tower of London, or in any other strength, with strong guard; yet notwithstanding, leave not for God's sake to proceed in the enterprize: for I shall at any time die most contentedly, understanding of your delivery out of the servitude whereinto you are holden as slaves. I shall assay, that at the same time that the work shall be in hand, at that present to make the catholics of Scotland to arise, and put my son in their hands, to the effect, that from thence our enemies here may not prevail by any succour: I would also that some stirring were in Ireland, and that it were laboured to begin some time before any thing be done here, and then that the alarm might begin thereby on the flat contrary side: that the stroke may come from your designs, to have some general, or chief head, are very pertinent; and therefore were it good to send obscurely for the purpose to the earl of Arundel, or some of his brethren, and likewise to seek to the young earl of Northumberland, if he be at liberty, from over the sea; the earl of Westmoreland may be had, whose hand and name, you know, may do much in the North parts; also the lord Paget, of good ability in some shires thereabouts: both the one and the other may be had, amongst whom secretly some more principal banished, may return, if the enterprize be once resolute. The said lord Paget is now in Spain, and may treat of all that, by his brother Charles, or directly by himself, you will commit unto him touching the affairs. Beware that none of your messengers, that you send forth of the realm, carry any letters upon themselves; but make their dispatches, and send them either after or before them by some others. Take heed of spies and false brethren that are amongst you, especially of some priests, already practised upon by your enemies for your discovery: and in any case keep never a paper about you, that may in any sort do harm: for from like errors have come the condemnation of all such as have suffered heretofore, against whom otherwise nothing could justly have been proved. Discover as little as you can, your names and intentions to the French ambassador, now lierger at London; for although, as I understand, he ' is a very honest gentleman, yet I fear his master entertaineth a course far contrary to our designment, which may move him to discover us, if he had any particular knowledge thereof. All this while I have sued to change and remove from this house; and for answer, the castle of Dudley only hath been named to serve the turn; so as by appearance about the end of this summer, I may go thither: therefore advise so soon as I shall be there, what provision may be had about that part, for my escape from thence. If I stay here, there is but one of these three ways or means, to be looked for.

' The 1st, That at a certain day appointed for my going abroad on horseback on the Moors, between this and Stafford, where ordinarily, you know, but few people do pass, let fifty or threescore horsemen, well mounted and armed, come to take me away, as they may easily; my keeper having with him but eighteen or twenty horses, with only dogs.

' The 2nd means, To come at midnight, or soon after, and set fire on the barns and stables, which you know are near the house; and whilst my guardian servants shall come forth to the fire, your company having duly on a mark, whereby they may be known one from another, some of you may surprize the house, where I hope with the few servants I have about me, I shall be able to give you correspondent aid.

' And the 3rd is, Some there be that bring carts hither early in the morning, three carts may be so prepared; that being in the midst of the great gate, the carts might fall down, or overthrow; that thereupon you might come suddenly, and make yourselves masters of the house, and carry me suddenly away; so you might easily do before any number of soldiers, who lodge in sundry places forth of this place, some half a mile, and some a whole mile, could come to relieve. Whatsoever issue the matter taketh, I do, and shall think myself obliged, so long as I live, towards you, for the offers you make to hazard yourself as you do for my deliverance; and by any means that ever I may have, I shall do my endeavour to recognize my effects your deserts: therein I have commanded a more ample alphabet to be made for you, which herewith you shall receive. God Almighty have you in his protection. Your assured friend for ever. MARY, Regina.—Fail not to burn this privately and quickly.'

Of this Letter she required a Copy, and affirmed, That it proceeded not from her, but haply from her Alphabet of Ciphers in France: That she had done her best endeavour for the recovery of her liberty, which nature itself alloweth, and had solicited her friends to deliver her; yet to some, whom she listed not to name, when they offered her their help to deliver her, she answered not a word. Nevertheless, she much desired to divert the storm of persecution from the Catholics, and for this she had made earnest suit to the queen: for her part, she would not purchase the kingdom with the death of the meanest man of the common people, much less of the queen: That there were many which attempted dangerous designs without her knowledge; and by a very late Letter, which she had received, Pardon was asked of her by some, if they should enterprize any thing without her privity: That it was an easy matter to counterfeit the Ciphers and Characters of others, as a young man did very lately in France, which had vaunted himself to be her son's base brother: That she feared also lest this were done now by Walsingham to bring her to her death, who, as she heard, had practised against her life and her son's. She protested that she had not so much as thought the destruction of the queen; that she had rather most gladly spend her own life, than for her sake the Catholics should be so afflicted in hatred of her, and drawn to cruel death. And withal she shewed plenty of tears.

But (said the Lord Treasurer) no man which hath shewed himself a good subject, was ever put to death for Religion; but some have been for Treason, while they maintained the Pope's Bull and authority against the queen.—Yet I, said she, have heard otherwise, and have read it also in Books set forth in print.—The Authors, replied he, of such Books, do write also that the queen had forfeited her royal dignity.

Walsingham, who hath found himself taxed even now by her words, took opportunity, and rising up, protested that his mind was free from all malice: I call God, said he, to record, that as a private person I have done nothing unbecoming an honest man; nor as I bear the place of a public person, have I done any thing unworthy my place. I confess, that being very careful for the safety of the queen and realm, I have curiously searched out the practices against the same. If Ballard had offered me his help, I should not have refused it; yea, I would have recompensed the pains he had taken. If I have practised any thing with him, why did he not utter it to save his life?

With this answer, she said she was satisfied: She prayed him he would not be angry, that she had spoken freely what she had heard reported; and that he would give no more credit to those that slandered her, than she did to such who accused him: That Spies were men of doubtful credit, which dissemble one thing, and speak another; and that he would in no sort believe that she had consented to the queen's destruction. And now again she burst forth into tears; I would never, said she, make shipwreck of my soul, by conspiring the destruction of my dearest sister.

It was answered by the Lawyers, that this should soon be disproved by Testimony. Thus far in the forenoon.

In the afternoon, to disprove this, was produced the Copy of a Letter which Charles Paget had written; and Curle, one of her secretaries, had witnessed that she had received; touching a Conference betwixt Mendoza and Ballard, about the design for invading of England, and setting her at liberty.—This, answered she, was nothing to the purpose, and proved not that she had consented to the destruction of the queen.

The Lawyers proceeded further, to prove that she was both privy to the Conspiracy, and conspired also the Destruction of the queen, by Babington's Confession, and Letters also that had passed betwixt her and him; wherein he called her, his most dread and sovereign lady, and queen: And by the way, they mentioned that a Plot was laid for conveying the kingdom of England to the Spaniard. She confessed, that a priest came unto her, and said, That if she would not intermeddle, she and her son both should be excluded from the inheritance; but the priest's name she would not tell. She added, that the Spaniard did lay claim to the kingdom of England, and would not give place to any but to her.

Then pressed they her with the Testimonies of her Secretaries Naw and Curle, out of Babington's Confession, and the Letters sent to and fro betwixt her and Babington, and the whole credit of their Proofs rested upon their Testimony; yet were not they produced before her face to face. Curle she acknowledged an honest man, but not a meet Witness to be against her. As for Naw, he had been sometimes a Secretary, said she, to the cardinal of Lorain, and commended unto her by the French king, and might easily be drawn either by reward, or hope, or fear, to bear false witness, as one that had sundry times rashly bound himself by oath, and had Curle so pliable unto him, that at his beck he would write what he bade him. It might be that these two might insert into her Letters, such things as she had not dictated unto them. It might be also that such Letters came to their hands, which notwithstanding she never saw; and so she brake forth into such words as these; The majesty and safety of all princes falleth to the ground, if they depend upon the Writings and Testimony of Secretaries. I delivered nothing to them but what nature delivered to me, that I might at length recover my liberty. And I am not to be convicted but by mine own Word or Writing. If they have written any thing which may be hurtful to the queen my sister, they have written it altogether without my knowledge; and let them bear the punishment of their inconsiderate boldness. Sure I am, if they were here present, they would clear me of all blame in this Cause. And I, if my Notes were at hand, could answer particularly to these things.

Amongst these Speeches, the Lord Treasurer objected unto her, that she had purposed to send her son into Spain, and to convey her Title she claimeth in the kingdom of England, to the Spaniard.—To whom she answered, That she had no kingdom which she could convey, yet was 'it lawful for her to give those things which were hers, at her pleasure, and not to be accountable for the same to any.

Babington, the lord Lodouic and Fernihurst, were objected unto her out of Curle's Testimony; she denied not, but she had written out many: and amongst others, that for the lord Lodouic, when she had commended him and another to the dignity of a Cardinal; and that without offence, (she trusted) for that it was as lawful for her to have intercourse of Letters, and to negotiate her matters with men of her Religion, as for the queen with the professors of another religion.

Then pressed they her hard with the consenting Testimonies of Naw and Curle reiterated: and she reiterated her Answers, or else refelled their Testimonies by a flat denial; protesting again, that she neither knew Babington nor Ballard.

Amongst these Speeches, when the Lord Treasurer had mentioned, that she knew Morgan well, which had sent Parry privily to murder the queen, and that she had assigned him a yearly pension; she replied, that she knew not whether Morgan had done so, but she knew that Morgan had lost all for her sake, and therefore it concerned her in honour to relieve him; and she was not bound to revenge an Injury done the queen by a friend, that had deserved well at her hands? yet had she terrified the man from such wicked attempts: but contrarywise (said she) Pensions have been assigned out of England to Patrick Gray, and to the Scots my adversaries, as also to my son.

The Lord Treasurer answered, When the revenues of Scotland were by the negligence of the regents much diminished, the queen bestowed somewhat in bounty upon your son the king, her near kinsman.

Afterwards were produced the chief points of certain Letters sent to England, and the lord Paget, and to Bernardine de Mendoza, about foreign aid. But when she had answered, That these things made not to the destruction of the queen; and if foreigners laboured to set her at liberty, it was not to be laid to her charge; and that she had sundry times openly signified to the queen, that she would seek her own liberty: the matter was prorogued till the next day following.

The next day she returned her former Protestation, and required to have it recorded, and a Copy thereof delivered to her, lamenting, that the most reasonable conditions, which she had many times propounded to the queen, were always rejected, even when she promised to deliver her son and the duke of Guise's son for hostages, that the queen or kingdom of England should receive no detriment by her, so as she saw herself already quite barred from all hope of her liberty. But now she was most unworthily dealt withal, whose honour and reputation was called in question before foreign lawyers, which by wretched conclusions drew every circumstance into a consequence; whereas princes anointed and consecrate are not subject to the same laws that private men are. Moreover, whereas authority was granted to the Commissioners, to examine matters tending to the hurt of the queen's person: yet was the Cause so handled, and Letters wrested, that the religion which she professed, the immunity and majesty of foreign princes, and the private intercourse betwixt princes were called in question, and she herself made to descend beneath her royal dignity, and to appear as a party guilty before a tribunal seat: and all to no other purpose but that she might be quite excluded out of the queen's favour, and her own right to the succession; whereas she appeared voluntarily to clear herself of the matters objected against her, lest she might seem to have neglected the defence of her own honour and innocency. She called also to remembrance, how queen Elizabeth herself had been drawn in question about Wyat's Conspiracy,* whereas notwithstanding she was most innocent: religiously affirming, that though she wished the safety of the Catholics might be provided for; yet would she not that it should be effected with the death and blood of any one. For her part, she had rather play Hester than Judith; make intercession to God for the people, than deprive the meanness of the people of life. She expostulated, that her enemies had divulged abroad that she was irreligious; but the time was (said she) when I would have been instructed in the Protestant Religion, but they would not suffer me to be so, as if they cared not what became of my soul. And now concluding, When ye have done all ye can (said she) against me, and have excluded me from my right, ye may chance fail of your cause and hope. And withal making her appeal to God, and to the princes her kinsmen, and renewing her Protestation, she prayed that there might be another meeting about this matter, and that an advocate might be granted unto her to plead her Cause; and that seeing she was a princess, she might be believed in the word of a princess: For it were extreme folly to staid to their judgement, whom she saw most plainly to be armed with prejudice against her.

To these things the Lord Treasurer said, Whereas I bear a double person, one of a Commissioner, another of a Counsellor, receive first a few words from me as a Commissioner. Your Protestation is recorded, and a Copy thereof shall be delivered unto you. To us our authority is granted under the queen's hand, and the great seal of England, from which there is no appeal; neither do we come with prejudice, but to judge according to the exact rule of justice. The queen's learned Counsel do level at nothing else but that the truth may come to light, how far you have offended against the queen's person. To us full power is given to hear and examine the matter, even in your absence; yet were we desirous you should be present, lest we might seem to have derogated from your honour: We purposed not to object any thing unto you, but what you were privy to, or have attempted against the queen's person. The Letters have been read to no other purpose, but to discover your offence against the queen's person, and the matters to it belonging, which are so interlaced with other matters, that they cannot be severed. The whole Letters therefore, and not parcels picked out here and there, have been openly read, for that the circumstances do give assurance, what matters you dealt with Babington about.

She interrupting him, said, The circumstances may be proved, but never the fact: Her integrity depended not upon the credit and memory of her Secretaries, though she knew them to be honest and sincere men. Yet if they have confessed any thing out of fear of torments, or hope of reward and impunity, it was not to be admitted, for just causes, which she would alledge elsewhere. Men's minds, said she, are diversly carried about with affections, and they would never have confessed such matters against her, but for their own advantage and hope. Letters may be directed to others, than those to whom they are written, and many things have been often inserted, which she never dictated. If her papers had not been taken away, and she had her Secretary, she could better confute the things objected against her.

But nothing, said the Lord Treasurer, shall be objected, but since the 19th day of June; neither will your Papers avail you, seeing your Secretaries and Babington himself, being never put to the rack, have affirmed that you sent those Letters to Babington; which though you deny, yet whether more credit is to be given to an affirmation than to a negation, let the Commissioners judge. But to return to the matter: this which followeth, I tell you as a counsellor; many things you have propounded time after time concerning your liberty; that they have failed of success, it is long of you, or of the Scots, and not of the queen. For the Lords of Scotland flatly refused to deliver the king in hostage. And when the last Treaty was holden concerning your liberty, Parry was sent privily by Morgan, a dependant of yours, to murder the queen.

Ah (said she) you are my adversary. Yea (said he) I am adversary to queen Elizabeth's adversaries. But hereof enough, let us now proceed to Proofs. Which when she refused to hear; Yet we (said he) will hear them: and I also (said she) will hear them in another place, and defend myself.

Now were read again her Letters to Charles Paget, wherein she shewed him that there was no other way for the Spaniard to reduce the Netherlands to obedience, but by setting up a prince in England that might be of use unto him; and to the lord Paget, to hasten his auxiliary forces to invade England: and cardinal Allen's Letter, wherein he called her his most dread sovereign lady, and signified that the matter was commended to the prince of Parma's care.

As these Letters were in reading, she interposed these Speeches: That Babington and her Secretaries had accused her to excuse themselves; that she never heard of the six Executioners, and that the rest made nothing to the purpose. As for Allen, she held him for a reverend prelate; and she acknowledged no other Head of the Church, but the bishop of Rome. In what rank and place she was esteemed by him and foreign princes, she knew not; neither could she hinder it, if in their letters they called her queen of England. As for her Secretaries, seeing they had done contrary to their duty and allegiance sworn unto her, they deserved no credit. They which have once forsworn themselves, though they swear again with never so great oaths and protestations, are not to be credited. Neither did these men think themselves bounden by any oath whatsoever in court of conscience, forasmuch as they had sworn their fidelity and secrecy to her before, and were no subjects of England. That Naw had many times written otherwise than she had dictated unto him, and Curle wrote whatsoever Naw bade him. But for her part she was willing to bear the burden of their fault in all things, but what might lay a blot upon her honour. And haply also they confessed these things to save themselves; supposing that they could not hurt her by confessing, who they thought should be more favourably dealt withal as being a queen. As for Ballard, she never heard of any such, but of one Hallard, which had offered her his help; which notwithstanding, she had refused, for that she had heard that the same man had also vowed his service to Walsingham.

Afterwards were read certain brief Notes of her Letters to Mendoza, which Curle had confessed he had written in privy Cipher.

‘ I find myself greatly troubled what course to take a-new, for the affairs on this side the sea; Charles Paget hath a charge from me to impart unto you certain overtures in my behalf; whereupon I pray you deliver him freely, what you think may be obtained thereof, from the king your master. There is another point depending thereof, which I have reserved to write to your ownself, for to be by you sent unto the king your master on my behalf, no man else, if it be possible, being privy thereunto; that is, that considering my son’s great obstinacy in Heresy, and foreseeing hereupon the imminent danger and harm like to ensue to the Catholic Church, he coming to the Succession of this realm, I have resolved with myself, in case my said son do not reduce himself before my death to the Catholic Religion, (as I must tell you plainly, I have small hope so long as he shall remain in Scotland) to give and grant my right to the said king your master, in the Succession of this crown, by my last Will and Testament; praying him in consideration hereof from this time forward to take me wholly into his protection, likewise the state and affairs of this country: the which for discharge of my conscience, I cannot think I can put into the hands of a prince more zealous of our Religion, and able in all respects

‘ to re-establish the same on this side, as it imports all the rest of Christendom. Let this be kept secret, forasmuch as if it come to be revealed, it should be in France the loss of my dower, in Scotland a clear breach with my son, and in this country my total ruin and destruction.—Thank on my behalf the said king your master, for the favour and liberality extended to the lord Paget and his brother, which I pray him most earnestly to continue, and to gratify for my sake with some pension poor Morgan, who hath so much endured not only for me, but for the common cause.—I recommend likewise unto you Fulsambe (whom you know) to help him to some supply, above the Entertainment that I have allotted him, according to the small means I have.’

Out of these she was pressed as if she had purposed to convey her Right in the kingdom to the Spaniard, and that Allen and Parsons lay now at Rome for that cause. She complaining that her Secretaries had broken their allegiance bound by oath, answered, When being prisoner I languished in cares without hope of liberty, and was without all hope to effect those things which very many expected at my hands, declining now through age and sickness; it seemed good to some, that the Succession of the Crown of England should be established in the Spaniard, or some English Catholic. And a Book was sent unto me to avow the Spaniard’s Title; which when it was not allowed by me, I incurred displeasure among some: But now all my hope in England being desperate, I am fully resolved not to reject foreign aid.

The Solicitor put the Commissioners in mind what would become of them, their honours, estates and posterities, if the kingdom were so conveyed. But the Lord Treasurer shewed that the kingdom of England could not be conveyed, but was to descend by Right of Succession according to the laws; and asked her, if she would any more.

She required that she might be heard in a full parliament, or that she might in person speak with the queen, who would (she hoped) have regard of a queen, and with the council. And now rising up with great confidence of countenance, she had some conference with the lord treasurer Hatton, Walsingham, and the earl of Warwick, by themselves apart.

Proceedings in the Star Chamber.

These things being done, the assembly was prorogued to the 25th of October, at the Star Chamber at Westminster. Thus far touching this matter out of the Commentaries of Edward Barker, principal Register to the queen’s majesty; Thomas Wheeler, public Notary, Register of the Audience of Canterbury; and other credible persons which were present.

The said 25th day of October, all the Commissioners met, saving the earls of Shrewsbury and Warwick, which were both of them sick at that time; and after Naw and Curle had by oath, viz voce, voluntarily without hope of reward, before them avowedly affirmed and confirmed all and every the Letters, and Copies of Letters, before produced, to be most true; Sentence was pronounced against the queen of Scots, and confirmed with the seals and subscriptions of the Commissioners, and recorded in these words: 'By their joint assent and consent, they do pronounce and deliver their Sentence and Judgment, at the day and place last recited; and say, That after the end of the aforesaid session of parliament, in the Commission aforesaid specified, namely after the aforesaid 1st day of June, in the 27th year abovesaid, and before the date of the same Commission, divers matters have been compassed and imagined within this realm of England, by Anthony Babington and others, cum scientia, in English, with the privity, of the said Mary, pretending title to the crown of this realm of England, tending to the hurt, death and destruction of the royal person of our said lady the queen. And namely, That after the aforesaid 1st day of June, in the 27th year abovesaid, and before the date of the Commission aforesaid, the aforesaid Mary pretending title to the crown of this realm of England, hath compassed and imagined within this realm of England, divers matters tending to the hurt, death and destruction of the royal person of our sovereign lady the queen, contrary to the form of the statute in the Commission aforesaid specified.'

Concerning this Sentence, which depended wholly upon the credit of the Secretaries, and they not brought forth face to face, according to the first Act of the 13th year of queen Elizabeth, much talk there was, and divers Speeches ran abroad; while some thought them credible persons, and some unworthy to be credited. I have seen Naw's Apology to king James, written in the year 1605; wherein laboriously protesting, he excuseth himself, that he was neither author, nor persuader, nor the first revealer of the Plot that was undertaken, nor failed of his duty through negligence, or want of foresight; yea, that this day he stoutly impugned the chief points of Accusation against his lady and mistress: which notwithstanding appeareth not by Records. But the same day was there a Declaration made by the Commissioners and Judges of the land, That the said Sentence did derogate nothing from James king of Scots, in title or honour, but that he was in the same place, degree and right, as if the same sentence had never been pronounced.

Proceedings in Parliament.

Some few days after, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, begun by virtue of a certain power of vice-gerency, granted by the queen to the abp. of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the earl of Derby, and that not without precedent. In which Parliament the Proscription of the lord Paget, Charles Paget, sir Francis Englefield, Francis Throckmorton, Anthony Babington, Thomas Salisbury, Edward Jones, Chidioc Titchbourne, Charles Tilney, and the rest of the Conspirators, was confirmed, and their goods and possessions confiscate. The estates also of the realm, which had by their voices approved and confirmed the Sentence given against the queen of Scots, did with joint assent put up a Supplication to the queen by the hands of the lord chancellor, as follows:

'May it please your most excellent majesty, our most gracious sovereign, we your humble, loving and faithful subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, having of long time to our intolerable grief seen by how manifold most dangerous and execrable practices, Mary the daughter and heir of James 5, late king of Scots, dowager of France, and commonly called Queen of Scots, hath compassed the Destruction of your majesty's sacred and most royal person, in whose safety (next under God) our chief and only felicity doth consist; and thereby not only to bereave us of the sincere and true Religion of Almighty God, bringing us and this noble crown back again into the thraldom of the Romish tyranny, but also utterly to ruinate and overthrow the happy State and Commonweal of this most noble realm; which being from time to time by the great mercy and providence of God, and your highness's singular wisdom, foreseen and prevented, your majesty of your exceeding great clemency and princely magnanimity hath either most graciously passed over, or with singular favour tolerated, although often and instantly moved by your most loving and faithful subjects to the contrary, in times of your Parliaments, and at many other times; and hath also protected and defended the said Scottish queen from those great dangers which her own people, for certain detestable crimes and offences to her imputed, had determined against her: all which notwithstanding, the same queen was nothing moved with these and many other your majesty's most gracious favours towards her; but rather obdurate in malice, and by hope of continual impunity imboldened to prosecute her cruel and mischievous determination by some speedy and violent course; and now lately a very dangerous Plot being conceived and set down by Anthony Babington and others, That six desperate and wicked persons should undertake that wicked and most horrible enterprise, to take away your majesty's life, (whom God of his infinite mercy long preserve) she did not only give her advice and direction upon every point, and all circumstances concerning the same, make earnest request to have it performed with all diligence, but did also promise assurance of large reward and recompence to the doers thereof: which being informed to your majesty, it pleased your highness, upon the earnest suit of such as tendered the safety of your royal person, and the good and quiet state of this realm, to direct your Commission under the great seal of England, to the lords and others of your highness's privy council, and certain other lords of parliament of the greatest and most antient degree, with some of your principal judges, to examine, hear and determine the same cause, and thereupon to give Sentence or Judgment according to a statute in that behalf, made in the 27th year of your most gracious reign: by virtue whereof, the more part of the same Commissioners, being in number 26, having at sundry times fully heard what was alledged and proved against the said Scottish queen in her own presence, touching the said Crimes and Offences, and what she could say for her Defence and Excuse therein, did after long deliberation give their Sentence and judgment with one consent, that the Death and Destruction of your royal person was imagined and compassed by the said Anthony Babington, with the privy of the same Scottish queen: and that she herself did also compass and imagine the death and destruction of your most royal person. Now for us much as we your majesty's most humble, loyal and dutiful subjects, representing unto your most excellent majesty the universal state of your whole people of all degrees in this your realm, do well perceive, and are fully satisfied, that the same Sentence and Judgment is in all things most honourable, just and lawful; and having carefully and effectually, according to our most bounden duties, weighed and considered upon what ground and cause so many traitorous complots, and dangerous practices against your most royal person and estate, and for the invading of this realm, have for the space of many years past grown and proceeded, do certainly find, and are undoubtedly persuaded that all the same have been from time to time attempted and practised, by and from the Scottish queen, and by her confederates, ministers and favourers, who conceive an assured hope to achieve speedily by your majesty's untimely death that which they have long expected, and whereof during your life (which God long preserve to our inestimable comfort) they despair; to wit, to place her the said Scottish queen in the imperial and kingly seat of this realm, and by her to banish and destroy the professors and professing of the true Religion of Jesus Christ, and the antient nobility of this land, and to bring this whole state and commonweal to foreign subjection, and utter ruin and confusion: which their malicious and traitorous purpose they will never cease to prosecute by all possible means they can, so long as they may have their eyes and imaginations fixed upon that lady, the only ground of their treasonable hope and conceits, and the only seed-plot of all dangerous and traitorous devices and practices against your sacred person. And seeing also what insolent boldness is grown in the heart of the same queen, through your majesty's former exceeding favours and clemencies towards her; and thereupon weighing with heavy and sorrowful hearts, in what continual peril of such like desperate conspiracies and practices your majesty's most royal and sacred person and life (more dear unto us than our own) is and shall be still, without any possible means to prevent it, so long as the said Scottish queen shall be suffered to continue, and shall not receive that due punishment, which by justice, and the laws of this your realm, she hath so often and so many ways for her most wicked and detestable offences deserved: Therefore, and for that we find, that if the said lady should now escape the due and deserved punishment of Death for these her most execrable Treasons and Offences, your highness's royal person shall be exposed unto many more, and those more secret and dangerous Conspiracies than before, and such as shall not or cannot be foreseen, or discovered, as these her late attempts have been; and shall not hereafter be so well able to remove or take away the ground and occasion of the same, as now by justice may or ought to be done: We do most humbly beseech your most excellent majesty, that as well in respect of the continuance of the true religion now professed amongst us, and of the safety of your most royal person and estate, as in regard of the preservation and defence of us your most loving, dutiful and faithful subjects, and the whole commonweal of this realm; it may please your highness to take speedy order, That declaration of the same sentence and judgment be made and published by proclamation, and that thereupon direction be given for further proceedings against the said Scottish queen, according to the effect and true meaning of the said statute: Because upon advised and great consultation, we cannot find that there is any possible means to provide for your majesty's safety, but by the just and speedy execution of the said queen, the neglecting whereof may procure the heavy displeasure and punishment of Almighty God, as by sundry severe examples of his great justice in that behalf left us in the sacred scriptures doth appear. And if the same be not put in present execution, we your most loving and dutiful subjects shall thereby (so far as man's reason can reach) be brought into utter despair of the continuance amongst us of the true religion of Almighty God, and of your majesty's life, and the safety of all your faithful subjects, and the good estate of this most flourishing commonweal.

The Queen, with great majesty of countenance and voice, answered to this purpose: So many and so great are the bottomless graces, and immeasurable benefits bestowed upon me by the Almighty, that I must not only most humbly acknowledge them as benefits, but admire them as miracles, being in no sort able to express them. And though there liveth not any that may more justly acknowledge himself bound to God than I,

whose life he hath miraculously preserved from so many dangers, yet am I not more deeply bound to give him thanks for any one thing, than for this which I will now tell you, and which I account as a miracle: Namely, that as I came to the crown with the most hearty good-will of all my subjects, so now after 28 years reign, I perceive in them the same, if not greater good-will towards me; which if I once lose, well might I breathe, but never think I lived. And now though my life hath been dangerously shot at, yet I protest there is nothing hath more grieved me, than that one not differing from me in sex, of like rank and degree, of the same stock, and most nearly allied unto me in blood, hath fallen into so great a crime. And so far have I been from bearing her any ill-will, that upon the discovery of certain treasonable practices against me, I wrote unto her secretly, that if she would confess them by a private letter unto myself, they should be wrapped up in silence. Neither did I write thus in mind to entrap her, for I knew then as much as she could confess. And even yet, though the matter be come thus far, if she would truly repent, and no man would undertake her cause against me, and if my life alone depended hereupon, and not the safety and welfare of my whole people, I would (I protest unfeignedly) most willingly pardon her. Nay if England might by my death attain a more flourishing estate, and a better prince, I would most gladly lay down my life: For, for your sakes it is, and for my people's, that I desire to live. As for me, I see no such great cause why I should either be fond to live, or fear to die. I have had good experience of this world, and I know what it is to be a subject, and what to be a sovereign. Good neighbours I have had, and I have met with bad; and in trust I have found treason. I have bestowed benefits upon ill deservers; and where I have done well, have been ill requited. While I call to mind these things past, behold things present, and expect things to come, I hold them happiest that go hence soonest. Nevertheless against such mischiefs as these, I put on a better courage than is common to my sex, so as whatsoever befall me, death shall not take me unprepared.—And as touching these Treasons, I will not so prejudice myself, or the laws of my kingdom, as not but to think that she having been the contriver of the same treasons, was bound and liable to the ancient laws, though the late act had never been made; which notwithstanding was no ways made to prejudice her. So far was it from being made to entrap her, that it was rather intended to forewarn and terrify her from attempting any thing against it. But seeing it was now in force of a law, I thought good to proceed against her according to the same. But you lawyers are so curious in scanning the nice points of the law, and following of precedents and form, rather than expounding the laws themselves, that by exact observing of your form, she must have been indicted in Staffordshire, and have holden up her hand at the bar, and have been tried by a jury of twelve men. A proper course forsooth of trial against a princess! To avoid therefore such absurdities, I thought it better to refer the examination of so weighty a cause to a good number of the noblest personages of the land, and the judges of the realm; and all little enough. For we princes are set as it were upon stages, in the sight and view of all the world. The least spot is soon spied in our garments, a blemish quickly noted in our doings. It behoveth us therefore to be careful that our proceedings be just and honourable. But I must tell you one thing, that by this last act of parliament you have brought me to a narrow streight, that I must give order for her death, which is a princess most nearly allied unto me in blood, and whose practices against me have stricken me into so great grief, that I have been glad to absent myself from this parliament, lest I should increase my sorrow by hearing it spoken of, and not out of fear of any danger, as some think. But yet I will now tell you a secret (though it is well known that I have the property to keep counsel): It is not long since these eyes of mine saw and read an oath, wherein some bound themselves to kill me within a month: hereby I see your danger in me, which I will be very careful to avoid.—Your Association for my safety I have not forgotten, which I never so much as thought of, till a great number of hands, with many obligations, were shewed me; which as I do acknowledge as a strong argument of your true hearts, and great zeal to my safety, so shall my bond be stronger tied to a greater care for your good. But forasmuch as this matter now in hand is very rare, and of greatest consequence, I hope you do not look for any present resolution; for my manner is, in matters of less moment than this, to deliberate long upon that which is once to be resolved. In the mean time I beseech Almighty God to illuminate my mind, that I may foresee that which may serve for the good of his church, the prosperity of the commonwealth, and your safety. And that delay may not breed danger, we will signify our resolution with all convenience. And whatever the best subjects may expect at the hands of the best princes, that expect from me to be performed to the full."

The twelfth day after when she had thoroughly weighed the matter in her mind, being distracted with doubtful care and thought, and as it were in some conflict with herself what to do in so important a business, she sent the Lord Chancellor to the higher house, and Puckering to the rest in the lower house; praying them to enter into a new consideration upon so weighty a matter, and to devise some better remedy, whereby both the queen of Scots' Life might be spared, and her own security provided for.

After much and long deliberation, they judging that both the welfare and hurt of the prince belongeth to all, concurred again with one voice in the same opinion, and that for these Causes: For that the queen's safety could not be secured as long as the queen of Scots lived, unless she either seriously repented and acknowledged her offence, or were kept with a more streight guard, good assurance being given by bond and oath for her good demeanour, or delivered hostages, or else departed the realm. As for her Repentance, they were out of all hope of it, considering that she had ill requited the queen which had saved her life, and did not yet acknowledge her fault. As for a surer guard, streighter custody, bonds, oath, and hostages, they held them all as nothing, for that the queen's life being once taken away, these would presently vanish. And if she should depart the realm, they feared lest she would presently take arms to invade the same.

These Reasons the Lord Chancellor, and Puckering, Speaker of the lower house, opened more at large, in the manner following.

“ Unless execution of this just Sentence be done: 1. Your majesty's Person cannot any while be safe. 2. The Religion cannot long continue among us. 3. The most flourishing present state of this realm must shortly receive a woful fall. 4. And consequently, in sparing her, your majesty shall not only give courage and hardness to the enemies of God, of your majesty's self and of your kingdom; but shall discomfort and daunt with despair the hearts of your loving people; and so deservedly provoke the heavy hand and wrath of God.

“ And that summarily for the Reasons ensuing: I. For as much as concerns the Danger of your majesty: Both she and her favourers think she hath right, not to succeed, but to enjoy your crown in possession; and therefore as she is a most impatient competitor, (acquainted with blood) so will she not spare any means that may take you from us, being the only lett, that she enjoyeth not her desire.— She is hardened in malice against your royal person, notwithstanding that you have done her all favour, mercy, and kindness; as well in preserving her kingdom, as saving her life and honour.—And therefore there is no place for mercy, where there is no hope of amendment, or that she will desist from most wicked attempts.—The rather, for that her malice appeareth such as that she maketh, as it were, her testament of the same, to be executed after her death, and appointeth her executors to perform the same.—She affirmeth it lawful to move invasion: therefore, as of invasion victory may ensue, and of victory the death of the vanquished; so doth she not obscurely profess it lawful to destroy you.— She holds it not only lawful, but honourable also and meritorious, to take your life, &c. being deprived of your crown by her holy father, and therefore she will (as she hath continually done) seek it by all means whatsoever.

—She is greedy of your death, and preferreth it before her own life: For in her late direction to some of her complices, she willed, ‘ Whatsoever became of her, the Tragical Execution should be performed on you.’ There is by so much the more danger to your person since the sentence than before, by how much it becometh them, that would preserve her or advance her, to hasten your death now or never before execution done upon her; as knowing that you, and none else, can give direction for her death, and that by your death the sentence would lose the force of execution, and otherwise they should come too late if they take not the present opportunity to help her.—Her friends hold invasion unprofitable while you live, and therefore in their opinion your death is first and principally to be sought, as the most commendous way to ruin the realm by invasion.— Some of the eldest and wisest papists set it down for a special good drift to occupy you with conceit, that the preservation of her life is the safety of your own; and therefore you may be assured, that they verily think that her life will be your death and destruction.—2. For as much as concerns Religion: It is most perilous to spare her, who hath continually breathed the overthrow and suppression of the same; being poisoned with popery from her tender youth, and at her age joining in that false-termed Holy-League, and ever since and now a professed enemy of the truth. She reated wholly upon popish hopes to be delivered and advanced, and so devoted and doted in that possession, that she will (as well for satisfaction of others, as feeding her own humour) supplant the gospel where and whensoever she may. Which evil is so much the greater, and the more to be avoided, as that it slayeth the soul, and will spread itself not only over England and Scotland, but also into all parts beyond the seas, where the gospel of God is maintained? The which cannot but be exceedingly weakened, if defection should be in these two most valiant kingdoms.—3. Forasmuch as concerns the happy Estate of this Realm: The Lydians say, Unam Regem agnoscunt Lydii, duos autem tolerare non possunt: so we say, Unam Reginam Elizabetham agnoscunt Angli, duas autem tolerare non possunt. And therefore, since she saith, that she is queen here, and we neither can nor will acknowledge any other but you to be our queen: it will follow, if she prevail, she will rather make us slaves, than take us for her children; and therefore the realm sigheth and groaneth under fear of such a step-mother. She hath already provided us a foster-father and a nurse, the pope and the king of Spain, into whose hands if it should mishappen us to fall, what can we else look for, but ruin, destruction, and utter extirpation of goods, lands, lives, honour and all?—Whilst she shall live, the enemies of the state will hope and gape after your death. By your death they trust to make invasion profitable for them; which cannot be, but the same should be most lamentable for us: and therefore it is meet to cut off the head of that hope.—As she hath already, by her poisoned baits, brought to destruction more noblemen and their houses, and a great multitude of subjects, during her being here, than she would have done, if she had been in possession of her own country, and armed in the field against us; so will she still be continually cause of the like spoil, to the greater loss and peril of this estate: And therefore this realm neither can nor may endure her.—Her Secretaries do write and print, that we be at our wit's end, world's end, if she overlive your majesty; meaning thereby, that the end of our world is the beginning of theirs: and therefore, take her away, and their world will be at an end before it begin.—Since the sparing of her in the 14th year of your reign, popish Traitors and Recusants have multiplied exceedingly; and if you spare her now again, they will grow both innumerable and invincible also.—4. And therefore now in the fourth place:—Mercy in this case would in the end prove cruelty against all. Nam est quedam crudelis Misericordia. And therefore to spare her is to spill us. She is only a cousin to you in a remote degree, but we be the sons and children of this land; whereof you be not only the natural mother, but also the wedded spouse. And therefore much more is due from you to us all, than alone to her. It would exceedingly grieve and wound the hearts of your loving subjects, if they should see so horrible vice not condignly punished: if any be wavering, it will win them to the worser part, and many will seek to make their own peace. Wherefore as well for the comfort of the one, as stay of the other, and retaining of all, it is most needful that justice be done upon her.—Thousands of your loving subjects of all degrees, which have for special zeal of your safety made oath, before God, to pursue to death by all forcible and possible means, such as she is, by just sentence, found to be: cannot save their oaths, if you keep her alive; for then either we must take her life from her without direction, which will be to our extreme danger by the offence of your law; or else we must suffer her to live against our express oath, which will be to the uttermost peril of our own souls; wherewith no act of parliament, nor power of man whatsoever, can in any wise dispense. And therefore, seeing it resteth in you, by a most worthy and just execution of this sentence, to keep us upright and free us in both, we most humbly and earnestly beseech you, that speedy justice be done upon her, whereby yourself may be safe, the state of your realm preserved, and we not only delivered from this trouble of conscience, but also comforted to venture ourselves, and all ours, into whatsoever other peril, for the preservation and safety of you.—Lastly, God's vengeance against Saul for sparing Agag, against Ahab for sparing the life of Benhadad, is apparent; for they were both by the just judgment of God deprived of their kingdom, for sparing those wicked princes, whom God had delivered into their hands of purpose to be put to death by them, as by the ministers of his eternal and divine justice.—How much those magistrates were commended, that put to death those mischievous and wicked queens, Jezebel and Athaliah!—How wisely proceeded Solomon to punishment, in putting to death his own natural and elder brother Adonias, for the only intention of a marriage, which gave suspicion of treason! Whereas there is no more desired of your majesty, than the very pope, (now your sworn enemy) some of these late conspirators, and this wicked lady herself, have thought fitting to fall upon her. He in like case gave Sentence, Vita Conradini, mors Carolo; mors Conradini, vita Carolo. They in their best minds and remorse of conscience setting down the best means of your safety, said, 'He that hath no arms cannot fight, and he that hath no legs cannot run away, but he that hath no head can do no harm. Pisces primum a capite fatent.' She by her voluntary subscribing to the late Association, &c. gave this sentence against herself.—And after in her letters of these treasons to Babington, wrote, 'That if she were discovered, it would give sufficient cause to you to keep her in continual close Prison.' By which words she could mean nothing else but pains of death.—Therefore we seeing on the one side how you have, to the offence of mighty princes, advanced religion, with what tender care, and more than motherly piety you have always cherished us the children of this land, with what honour and renown you have restored the antient rights of the crown, with what peace and justice you have governed, and with what store and plenty you have reigned over us:—On the other side, seeing that this enemy of our felicity seeks to undermine our religion, to supplant us, and plant strangers in the place, to transfer the rights of the crown to that Italian priest, and the crown to herself, or to some other, from you; and therefore lieth in continual wait for to take away your life:—Therefore we pray you, for the cause of God, his church, this realm, ourselves and yourself; that you will no longer be careless of your life or sovereign safety; nor longer suffer religion to be threatened, the realm to stand in danger, nor us to dwell in fear: But as Justice hath given rightful sentence, so you will grant execution: That as her life threateneth your death, so her death may, by God's favour, prolong your life; and that this evil being taken away from the earth, we may praise God for our deliverance, and pray him for our continuance; and with the psalmist say, Dominus fecit Judicium, and, 'The ungodly is trapped in the works of her own hand.' And so pray God to incline your heart to our just desires, &c."—They concluded, that as it were injustice to deny execution of law to any one of her subjects that should demand it, so much more, to her whole people of England, with one voice and mind making humble and instant suit for the same.

The Queen then spake in this manner;

Full grievous is that way, whose going on, and end, yield nothing but cumber for the hire of a laborious journey. I have this day been in greater conflict with myself, than ever in all my life, whether I should speak, or hold my peace. If I speak and not complain, I shall dissemble: and if I should be silent your labour taken were all in vain. If I should complain, it might seem strange and rare; yet I confess that my most hearty desire was, that some other means might have been devised to work your security and my safety, than this which is now propounded.
 So as I cannot but complain, though not of you, yet unto you; that I perceive by your petitions, that my safety dependeth wholly upon the death of another. If there be any that think I have prolonged the time of purpose to make a counterfeit shew of clemency, they do me the most undeserved wrong, as He knoweth, which is the searcher of the most secret thoughts of the heart. Or, if there be any that be persuaded, that the commissioners durst not pronounce other sentence, as fearing thereby to displease me, or to seem to fail of their care for my safety, they but heap upon me most injurious con-ceits. For either those, whom I have put in trust, have failed of their duties, or else they signified unto the commissioners in my name, that my will and pleasure was, that every one should deal freely according to his conscience, and what they would not openly declare, that they should reveal unto me in private. It was of my most favourable mind towards her, that I desired some other means might be found out to prevent this mischief. But since now it is resolved, that my surety is, most desperate without her death, I have a most inward feeling of sorrow, that I, which have in my time pardoned so many rebels, winked at so many treasons, or neglected them with silence; must now seem to shew cruelty upon so great a princess.—I have, since I came to the crown of this realm, seen many defamatory Books and Pamphlets against me, accusing me to be a tyrant; well fare the writers hearts, I believe their meaning was to tell me news: and news indeed it was to me, to be branded with the note of tyranny: I would it were as great news to hear of their impiety. But what is it which they will not write now, when they shall hear that I have given consent, that the executioner's hands shall be imbrued in the blood of my nearest kinswoman? But so far am I from cruelty, that to save mine own life, I would not offer her violence; neither have I been so careful how to prolong mine own life, as how to preserve both: which that it is now impossible, I grieve exceedingly. I am not so void of judgment, as not to see mine own perils before mine eyes; nor so mad, to sharpen a sword to cut mine own throat; nor so careless, as not to provide for the safety of mine own life. But this I consider with myself, that many a man would put his own life in danger to save a princess's life.

 I do not say, so will I; yet have I many times thought upon it.—But seeing so many have both written and spoken against me, give me leave, I pray you, to say somewhat in mine own defence, that ye may see what manner of woman I am, for whose safety you have passed such careful thoughts; wherein as I do with most thankful heart consider your vigilant care, so am I sure I shall never re-quite it, had I as many lives as you all.—
 When first I took the scepter, I was not unmindful of God the giver, and therefore began my reign with his service, and the religion I had been both born in, bred in, and I trust shall die in. And though I was not ignorant how many perils I should be beset withal at home for altering religion, and how many great princes abroad, of a contrary profession, would attempt all hostility against me; yet was I no whit dismayed, knowing that God, whom only I respected, would defend both me and my cause. Hence it is, that so many treacheries and con-piracies have been attempted against me, that I rather marvel that I am, than muse that I should not be, were it not that God's holy hand hath protected me beyond all expectation. Then to the end I might make the better progress in the art of swaying the sceptre, I entered into long and serious cogitation what things were worthy and fitting for kings to do: and I found it most necessary that they should be abundantly furnished with those special virtues, justice, temperance, prudence, and magnanimity. As for the two latter, I will not boast myself, my sex doth not permit it: but for the two former,
 I dare say, (and that without ostentation) I never made a difference of persons, where right was one; I never preferred for favour, whom I thought not fit for worth; I never bent my ear to credit a tale that was first told, nor was so rash to corrupt my judgment with prejudice, before I heard the cause. I will not say but many reports might haply be brought me in too much favour of the one side or the other; for we princes cannot hear all ourselves: yet this I dare say boldly, my judgment went ever with the truth according to my understanding. And as full well Alcibiades wished his friend, not to give any Answer till he had run over the letters of the alphabet; so have I not used rash and sudden resolutions in any thing.—And therefore as touching your counsels and consultations, I acknowledge them to be so careful, provident and profitable for the preservation of my life, and to proceed from minds so sincere, and to me most devoted, that I shall endeavour myself all I can, to give you cause to think your pains not ill-bestowed, and strive to make myself worthy of such subjects.
 And now for your Pétition, I pray you for this present to content yourselves with an Answer without Answer. Your Judgment I condemn not, neither do I mistake your Reasons, but pray you to accept my thank-

'fulness, excuse my doubtfulness, and take in good part my answer answerless. If I should say, I would not do what you request, I might say perhaps more than I think : and if I should say I would do it, I might plunge myself into peril, whom you labour to preserve ; which in your wisdoms and discretions ye would not that I should, if ye consider the circumstances of place, time, and the manners and conditions of men.'

After this, the Assembly of the Estates was prorogued.

About that time were lord Buckhurst and Beale sent to the queen of Scots, to signify unto her that Sentence was pronounced against her ; that the same was approved and confirmed by act of parliament, as most just, and the Execution thereof instantly sued for by the Estates, out of a due regard of justice, security and necessity : and therefore to persuade her to acknowledge her Offences against God and the queen, and to expiute them before her death by repentance : letting her understand, that as long as she lived, the received Religion in England could not subsist. Hereat she seemed with a certain unwonted alacrity to triumph, giving God thanks, and rejoicing in her heart that she was holden to be an instrument for the re-establishing of Religion in this island. And earnestly she prayed, that she might have a Catholic priest to direct her conscience, and minister the Sacraments unto her. A bishop and a dean whom they commended unto her for this use, she utterly rejected, and sharply taxed the English nation, saying often, That the English had many times slaughtered their kings ; no marvel therefore, if they now also shew their cruelty upon me, that am issued from the blood of their kings.

Commission for the Execution of the Queen of Scots.

The publication of the Sentence was stayed a while by the intercession of L'Aubespine the French ambassador ;* but in the month of December, through the earnest instance of some courtiers, it was publicly proclaimed all over the city of London, the lord mayor, the aldermen, and principal officers and citizens being present, and afterward throughout the whole realm. In the Proclamation the queen seriously protested, that this publication was extorted from her not without exceeding grief of mind, out of a certain necessity, and the most vehement prayers and obtestations of the Estates of the Realm ; though there were, which thought this to proceed of women's cunning, who though they much desire a thing, yet will always seem rather to be constrained unto it.† Afterwards, on February the 1st, a

States in the last Parliament assembled, did not only deliberately, by great advice, allow and approve the same Sentence as just and honourable, but also with all humbleness and earnestness possible, at sundry times require, solicit, and press us to direct such further Execution against her person, as they did adjudge her to have daily deserved; adding thereunto, that the forbearing thereof was, and would be daily certain and undoubted danger, not only unto our own life, but also unto themselves, their posterity, and the public estate of this realm, as well for the cause of the gospel, and true religion of Christ, as for the peace of the whole realm: whereupon we did, although the same were with some delay of time, publish the same Sentence by our Proclamation, yet hitherto have forbore to give direction for the further satisfaction of the aforesaid most earnest requests, made by our said states of our parliament, whereby we do daily understand, by all sorts of our loving subjects, both of our nobility and council, and also of the wisest, greatest, and best devoted of all subjects of inferior degrees, how greatly and deeply, from the bottom of their hearts, they are grieved and afflicted with daily, yea hourly fears of our life, and thereby consequently with a dreadful doubt and expectation of the ruin of the present happy and godly estate of this realm, if we should forbear the further final execution as it is deserved, and neglect their general and continual requests, prayers, counsels and advices. And thereupon contrary to our natural disposition in such case, being overcome with the evident weight of their counsels, and their daily intercessions, importing such a necessity, as appeareth directly tending to the safety not only of ourself, but also to the weal of our whole realm, we have condescended to suffer Justice to take place; and for the Execution thereof, upon the special trusty experience and confidence which we have of your loyalties, faithfulness and love, both toward our person and the safety thereof, and also to your native countries, whereof you are most noble and principal members; We do will, and by Warrant hereof do authorize you, as soon as you shall have time convenient, to repair to our Castle of Fotheringay, where the said queen of Scots is in custody of our right trusty and faithful servant and counsellor, sir Amias Powlet, knt. and then taking her into your charge, to cause by your commaundment Execution to be done upon her person, in the presence of yourselves, and the aforesaid sir Amias Powlet, and of such other officers of justice as you shall command to attend upon you for that purpose; and the same to be done in such manner and form, and at such time and place, and by such persons, as to five, four or three of you, shall be thought by your discretions convenient, notwithstanding any law, statute or ordinance to the contrary. And these our letters patent sealed with our great seal of England, shall be to you, and every of you, and to all persons that shall be present, or that shall be, by you, commanded to do any thing appertaining to the aforesaid Execution, a full sufficient Warrant, and Discharge for ever. And further, we are also pleased and contented, and hereby we do will, command and authorize our Chancellor of England, at the requests of you all, and every of you, that the duplicate of our Letters Patent, he to all purposes made, dated and sealed with our great Seal of England, as these presents now are: In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Yeoven at our manor of Greenwich, the 1st day of February, in the 29th year of our reign.

N. B. This Letter from the Queen of Scots is thought to be the same which Mr Carte refers to in his History of England, vol. iii. page 828, published 1752: The Concealment and Discovery of which, as there represented, is entirely unsupported from any Evidence that is come to my knowledge. The Letter itself, in the Original, I found open amongst the other papers of the earl of Salisbury's Library, without any appearance of design to have it secreted. And the manner in which it was discovered, as Mr. Carte affirms upon the testimonies by him referred to, is a circumstance absolutely unknown to any one person in my lord Salisbury's family, as far as I can learn from the strictest enquiry I have made concerning it.

AMIAS, my most faithful servant, God reward thee treble-fold in the double of thy most troublesome charge so well discharged: if you knew, my Amias, how kindly, besides dutifully, my grateful heart accepts your double labours, and faithful actions, your wise orders, and safe regards, performed in so dangerous a charge, it would ease your travel, and rejoice your heart, in that I cannot balance, in any weight of my judgment, the value that I prize you at, and suppose no treasure to countervail such faith; and shall condemn myself, in that thought I never committed, if I reward not such deserts; yea, let me lack when I most need, if I acknowledge not such a merit with a reward, not omnibus datum; but let your wicked murderess know, how with hearty sorrow her vile deserts compel these orders; and bid her from me, ask God forgiveness for her treacherous dealing against my life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own: and yet not content with so many forgivenesses, but must fall again so horribly, far passing a woman's thought, much less a princess's; instead of excusing whereof, not one can serve it, being so plainly confessed by the author of my guiltless death. Let repentance take place, and let not the fiend possess her, so that the better part be lost, which I pray with hands lifted up to him, that can both save and spill, with my most loving adieu, and prayer for thy long life, your assured and loving sovereign, as heart, by good desert, indureth, ELIZABETH, Regina.

In pursuance of this Commission, she was executed the 8th day of February following, in which queen Elizabeth afterwards pretended she was surprized: the manner whereof is thus related by Camden.*

QUEEN Elizabeth, after some hesitation, having delivered a Writing to Davison, one of her Secretaries, signed with her own hand, commanding a Warrant under the great seal of England to be drawn up for the Execution, which was to lie in readiness in case of any dangerous Attempt upon queen Elizabeth, commanded him to acquaint no man therewith; the next day the queen changed her mind, and commanded Davison by Killegrew that the Warrant should not be drawn. Davison came presently to the queen, and told her that it was drawn and under seal already; at which she was somewhat moved, and blamed him for making such haste.† He notwithstanding acquainted the Council both with the Warrant and the whole matter, and easily persuaded them who were apt to believe what they desired, that the queen had commanded it should be executed. Hereupon without any delay Beale, who in respect of religion was the queen of Scots most bitter adversary, was sent down with one or two Executioners, and a Warrant, wherein authority was given to the earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Derby, Cumberland, and others, to see Execution done according to law; and this without the queen's knowledge. And though she at that very time told Davison, that she would take another course, yet did not he for all that call Beale back.

As soon as the earls were come to Fotheringay, they, together with sir Amias Powlet, and sir Drew Drury, to whose custody the queen of Scots was committed, came to her and told her the cause of their coming, reading the Warrant, and in few words admonished her to prepare herself for Death, for she was to die the next day. She undauntedly, and with a composed spirit, made this Answer; 'I did not think the queen, my sister, would have consented to my death, who am not subject to your law and jurisdiction: but seeing her pleasure is so, Death shall be to me most welcome; neither is that soul worthy of the high and everlasting joys above, whose body cannot endure one stroke of the executioner.‡

† This seems to have been one of that queen's artifices in order to excuse herself to the king of Scots; and though, to put the better colour upon it, she afterwards sacrificed her Secretary, yet the whole affair was (very probably) transacted with her knowledge and approbation, for which, see Davison's Apology in Camden. For the Proceedings against Davison, See No. 65 of the present Volume.

She desired she might have Conference with her Almoner, her Confessor, and Melvin, the Master of her Household: for her Confessor, it was flatly denied that he should come at her; and the earls recommended to her the bishop, or the dean of Peterborough, to comfort her; whom she refusing, the earl of Kent, in a hot burning zeal to religion, broke forth into these words among other speeches: 'Your life will be the death of our Religion, as contrariwise your death will be the life thereof.' Mention being made of Babington, she constantly denied his Conspiracy to have been at all known to her, and the revenge of her wrong she left to God. Then enquiring what was become of Naw and Curle; she asked whether it were ever heard of before, that servants were suborned and accepted as Witnesses against their master's lie?

When the earls were departed, she commanded supper to be hastened, that she might the better dispose of her concerns. She supped temperately, as her manner was; and seeing her servants, both men and women, weeping and lamenting as she sat at supper, she comforted them with great courage and magnanimity, bad them leave mourning, and rather rejoice, that she was now to depart out of a world of miseries. Turning to Burgoin, her physician, she asked him whether he did not now find the force of Truth to be great: 'They say,' quoth she, 'that I must die, because I have plotted against the queen's life; yet the earl of Kent tells me, there is no other cause of my death, but that they are afraid for their Religion because of me; neither hath my offence against the queen, but their fear because of me, drawn this end upon me, while some, under the colour of Religion, and the public good, aim at their own private respects and advantages.'

Towards the end of supper she drank to all her servants, who pledged her in order upon their knees, mingling tears with the wine, and begging pardon for their neglect of their duty; as she also in like manner did of them.—After supper she perused her Will, read over the Inventory of her Goods and Jewels, and wrote down the Names of those, to whom she bequeathed every particular. To some she distributed money with her own hand. To her Confessor she wrote a Letter, that he would make intercession for her to God in his prayers. She wrote also letters of recommendation for her servants to the French king and the duke of Guise. At her wonted time she went to bed, slept some hours; and then waking, spent the rest of the night in prayer.

The fatal day being come, which was the 8th of February, she dressed herself as gorgeously, as she was wont to do upon festival days, and calling her servants together, commanding her Will to be read; prayed them to take their legacies in good part, for her ability would not extend to giving them any greater matters.

Then fixing her mind wholly upon God in her Oratory, or ordinary place of prayer, with sighs and groans, and prayers, she begged his Divine Grace and favour, till such time as Thomas Andrews, sheriff of the county, acquainted her, that she must now come forth: And forth she came with state, countenance and presence majestically composed; a cheerful look, and a matron-like and modest habit; her head covered with a linen veil, and that hanging down to the ground, her prayer-beads hanging at her girdle, and carrying a crucifix of ivory in her hands.—In the porch she was received by the earls and other noblemen, where Melvin, her servant, falling upon his knees, and pouring forth tears, bewailed his hard hap, that he was to carry into Scotland the woeful tidings of the unhappy fate of his lady and mistress: She thus comforted him, ‘Lament not, but rather rejoice, thou shalt by-and-by see Mary Stuart freed from all her cares. Tell them, that I die constant in my Religion, and firm in my fidelity and affection towards Scotland and France. God forgive them, who have thirsted after my blood, as harts do after the fountain! Thou, O God! who art Truth itself, and perfectly and truly understandest the inward thoughts of my heart, knowest how greatly I have desired that the kingdoms of England and Scotland might be united into one. Commend me to my son, and assure him, that I have done nothing, which may be prejudicial to the kingdom of Scotland; admonish him to hold in amity and friendship with the queen of England; and see thou do him faithful service.’

And now the tears trickling down, she bade Melvin several times farewell, who wept as fast as she. Then turning to the earls, she prayed them that her servants might be civilly dealt withal: That they might enjoy their Legacies, that they might stand by her at her Death, and might be sent back into their own country with letters of safe conduct. The former request they granted, but that they should stand by her at her death, the earl of Kent shewed himself somewhat unwilling, fearing some superstition. ‘Fear it not,’ said she, ‘These harmless souls desire only to take their last farewell of me: I know my sister Elizabeth would not have denied me so small a matter, that my women should be then present, were it but for the honour of the female sex. I am her near kinswoman, descended from Henry 7, queen dowager of France, and anointed queen of Scots.’

When she had said this, and turned herself aside, it was at last granted, that such of her servants as she should name should be present. She named Melvin, Burgoin her physician, her apothecary, her surgeon, two waiting women, and others, of whom Melvin bore up her train. So the gentlemen, two earls and the sheriff going before her, she came to the scaffold, which was built at the upper end of the Hall, on which was placed a chair, a cushion, and a block, all covered with black cloth. As soon as she was set down, and silence commanded, Beale read the Warrant: She heard it attentively, yet as if her thoughts were taken up with somewhat else. Then Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, began a long Speech to her touching the Condition of her Life past, present, and to come. She interrupted him once or twice as he was speaking, prayed him not to trouble himself, protesting that she was firmly fixed and resolved in the ancient Catholic Roman Religion, and for it was ready to shed her last blood. When he earnestly persuaded her to true repentance, and to put her whole trust in Christ by an assured faith; she answered, That in that religion she was both born and bred, and now ready to die. The earls said they would pray with her; to whom she said, that she would give them hearty thanks, if they would pray for her: but to join, said she, in prayer with you, who are of another profession, would be in me a heinous sin. Then they appointed the dean to pray; with whom while the multitude that stood round about were praying, she fell down upon her knees, and holding the Crucifix before her in her hands, prayed in Latin, with her servants, out of the office of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

After the Dean had made an end of praying, she in English recommended the church, her son, and queen Elizabeth to God, beseeching him to turn away his wrath from this island, and professing, that she reposed her hope of Salvation in the blood of Christ: lifting up the Crucifix, she called on the Celestial Choir of Saints to make intercession to him for her: She forgave all her enemies, and kissing the Crucifix, and signing herself with the Cross, she said, ‘Achy arms, O Christ! were spread out upon the cross, so receive me with the stretched-out arms of thy mercy, and forgive my sins.’ Then the executioners asked her forgiveness, which she granted them. And when her women had taken off her upper garments (which she was eager and hasty to have done), wailing and lamenting the while, she kissed them; and signing them with the Cross with a cheerful countenance bid them forbear their womanish lamentations, for now she should rest from all her sorrows. In like manner turning to her men servants, who also wept, she signed them with the Cross, and smiling, bade them farewell. And now having covered her face with a linen handkerchief, and laying herself down to the block, she recited the Psalm, ‘In thee, O Lord! do I put my trust, let me never be confounded.’ Then stretching forth her body, and repeating many times, ‘Into thy hands, O Lord! I commend my Spirit,’ her head was taken off at two strokes: The Dean crying out, ‘So let queen Elizabeth’s enemies perish;’ the earl of Kent answering Amen, and the multitude sighing and sorrowing. Her body was embalmed and ordered with due and usual rites, and afterwards interred with a royal funeral in the cathedral church of Peterborough. A pompous obsequy was also performed for her at Paris, by procurement of the Guises.

The news of Mary's execution, says Rapin, being brought to Elizabeth, she appeared extremely concerned at it. Sighs, tears, lamentation and mourning were the signs she gave of her grief, which seemed immoderate. She drove the Privy Counsellors from her presence, and commanded them to be examined in the Star-Chamber, and Davison to be tried for his life for his disobedience. A few days after she sent the following letter to the king of Scotland (afterwards king James I. of England), by Robert Cary :

‘ My dearest Brother;
‘ I would to God thou knewest (but not that ‘ thou feltest) the incomparable grief my mind
‘ is perplexed with, upon this lamentable acci‘ dent, which is happened contrary to my mean‘ ing and intention, which, since my pen trem‘ bles to mention it, you shall fully understand ‘ by this my kinsman.* I request you, that as ‘ God and many others can witness my inno‘ cence in this matter, so you will also believe,

* He was kin to her by Ann Bullen her mother.

‘ that if I had commanded it, I would never ‘ deny it. I am not so faint-hearted, that for ‘ terror I should fear to do the thing that is ‘ just, or to own it when it is once done; no, I ‘ am not so, base and ignobly minded. But as ‘ it is no princely part, with feigned words to ‘ conceal and disguise the real meaning of the ‘ heart; so will I never dissemble my actions,
‘ but make them appear in their true and pro‘ per colours. Persuade yourself this for truth,
‘ that as I know this has happened deservedly ‘ on her part, so if I had intended it, I would ‘ not have laid it upon others; but I will never ‘ charge myself with that which I had not so ‘ much as a thought of. Other matters you ‘ shall understand by the bearer of this letter.
‘ As for me, I would have you believe there is ‘ not any which loves you more dearly, or takes ‘ more care for the good of you and your af‘ fairs. If any man would persuade you to ‘ the contrary, you may conclude he favours
‘ others more than you. God preserve you ‘ long in health and safety.’

Die Martis xvo Octobris 1586.

THE Commissioners being all (except the earls of Shrewsbury and Warwick, and sir Amias Paulet), assembled within the Star Chamber, a recapitulation was made by her Majesty's Privy Council, of all such proofs as had been made against the Scots queen, before them at Fotheringay, &c. After which Nau and Curle were brought personally before the Commissioners, and, in their presences, did avow and maintain all their Confessions, Examinations, and Subscriptions to be true, in such manner and form, as they have written and made the same. And they did, then and there, expressly affirm and maintain, That the Scots queen had received and read Babington's Letters, and that, by her direction and express commandment, the Answer unto all the points thereof, was returned unto Babington in her name, according as in the Letter is set down.—Also, that, the same 12th of July, she did write to the lord Paget, to Charles Paget, to Mendoza, to sir Francis Inglesfield, and to the archbishop of Glasgow, concerning Babington's Plot, &c. Whereupon the Lords and other the Commissioners, conferred together in secret, and afterwards, as it is said, concluded upon their judgment. And they called in the Queen's Serjeants, the Attorney and Solicitor, and before them, as it is said, gave their sentences, by which all the Commissioners present, except the lord Zouch, pronounced, that the Scots queen was privy, &c. and that she had compassed and imagined the Death of her Majesty our sovereign lady, only the lord Zouch, as it is said, gave his Sentence, that she was privy to the compassing, practising, and imagining of her Majesty's Death, but he could not pronounce that she had compassed, practised, or imagined the same, &c. And then Mr. Sanders was called for in, to take notice of this Sentence.—Note.—That the earl of Shrewsbury sent his Judgment in writing, containing his consent unto the same; and so afterwards did the earl of Warwick.—The Commission receiveth the Statute made in the 27th year of the Queen's Majesty's reign, and authoriseth the Commissioners to examine, whether Mary the Scots queen, since the first of June, the same 27th year, hath compassed or imagined any thing tending to hurt the Queen's Majesty's person; or whether she hath been privy, that any other person hath compassed or imagined any thing tending to the hurt of her Highness's person, and thereupon to give Sentence or Judgment, as upon good proof the matter shall appear.—She was directly charged by the Queen's Serjeants, that she had compassed and imagined the death and destruction of her Majesty, and also was privy and consenting to the conspiracies and Treasons of Anthony Babington, and John Ballard, and their confederates, and so was within the compass of both the said articles of the Statute and Commission. For declaration whereof; first, it was opened, That Ballard being a Seminary Priest, and one that, by the space of five or six years, had ranged through many parts of the realm, disguised in apparel, and under sundry several names, seducing the Queen's subjects, and withdrawing them from their due obedience, did go into France, in Lent last past; and about a week after Easter, had conference in Paris with Charles Paget, Thomas Morgan, and Bernardino de Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador there, touching the invading of this realm, by foreign forces, rebellion to be stirred amongst her Majesty's subjects, and a strong party to be made to assist and join with the invaders, and the Scots queen to be delivered. In which enterprize, Charles Paget affirmed, that there was no hope to prevail during her Majesty's life.—Hereupon, Ballard was sent into England, by direction from Charles Paget, and Mendoza, to solicit and practise the execution of this their Complot.—He returned to London upon Whitsunday, being the 22d of May, and within four or five days after, he conferred with Babington, and acquainted him with all the whole Plot of these Treasons.—In this Conference, Babington and Ballard resolved, That all foreign power and invasion were in vain, unless the Queen's Majesty were taken away. Whereupon they concluded, that six gentlemen should undertake the killing of her Majesty, and that Savage, who before that time was solicited at Rheims to execute that wicked action alone, and thereupon had vowed to perform that accordingly, and was come into England for that purpose, should forbear to attempt it alone, and should be one of the six: and at the time of the execution thereof, Babington, and certain others with him, should deliver the Scots queen.—These things, with many other material circumstances and parts of their Treasons, were directly and voluntarily confessed, by divers of the principal Conspirators, both before and at their Arraignment, as appears by the Record; whereupon, to their deserts, and the justice of the law, they were attainted and accused.—After this Declaration thus made, the Proof against the Scots queen was entered into, and prosecuted, as hereafter followeth.—First, was read a Confession made by Babington, written all with his own hand, and delivered to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Vice Chamberlain, voluntarily and frankly, before he was committed to the Tower; wherein he setteth down at large, about four years past, being in Paris, that he did there grow acquainted with Thomas Morgan, who brought him to the bishop of Glasgow, ambassador ledger in France for the queen of Scots, and they both recommended their mistress unto him, as a most wise and virtuous Catholic princess, declaring the certain expectation of her future greatness in this land, by reason of the undoubted title to this crown, as next in succession.—And after his return in England, they, by their Letters commended him to her service; whereupon, she wrote unto him a Letter of congratulation.—After which he was solicited by other letters from Morgan, to be an intelligencer for her, and convey her letters and packets.—This course of service he continued for the space of two years; and about a quarter of a year before her remove from the earl of Shrewsbury's keeping, left it off, and discontinued the same until July last. At which he received from her a short Letter in cypher, by a boy unknown unto him, signifying her discontent for breach of their intelligence, requiring the same to be renewed. And that she would send some packets unto him, which she had received from Thomas Morgan, in April last before.—He doth also set down at large what conference passed between Ballard and him, and the whole Plot of the Conspiracies and Treasons.—He declareth further, that he did write a letter to the Scots queen, touching every particular of this their Plot, and sent it by the same unknown boy.—Unto which she answered, twenty or thirty days after, in the same cypher, by which he wrote unto her, but by another messenger; the tenor of both which Letters he carried so well in memory, that he reported and set down fully all the principal points of the same, as upon conference of his said Declaration, with the copies of the same Letters, it appeareth.—He affirmeth also, that he shewed the letter of queen of Scots to Titchborne, who did assist him in the decyphering of the same; and that he shewed a copy thereof to Ballard and others.

After the reading of Babington's Declaration aforesaid, a part of Ballard's Examination was likewise read, concurring with the same: wherein he affirmeth, that Babington shewed him a copy of the Letter which he did write to the queen of Scots; and also a part of the Letter which the Scots queen did write for answer to him, the whole not being then decyphered; and setteth down, very certainly, divers material points of the same.

Titchborne and Dunne, in their several Examinations, do also affirm that Babington did impart unto them the same Letter from the queen of Scots; and do likewise report sundry particularities of the same, and Titchborne affirmeth farther, that he, at Babington's request, did write a great part of the same, as Babington did decypher it, and read it unto him.

After this was read a copy of the Letter written by Babington to the Scots queen, wherein these material and effectual parts were, and are to be noted. First, he termed her his 'dread sovereign lady and queen,' and acknowledged all fidelity and obedience to her only.—He signifieth unto her, that upon advertisement by Ballard from beyond the seas, of the purpose of certain foreign powers to invade this realm, he hath now staid on purpose to do her sacred majesty one day's good service.—That he communicated this his purpose to such of the friends as he best trusted; and saith, that upon conference with them, he hath found these things, first to be advised in this great and honourable action, upon the issue whereof depended her life, and the weal and honour of our country.

First, for assuring of the Invasion, sufficient strength in the invaders, ports to be appointed for the foreign princes to arrive at, with a strong party at every place to join with them, to warrant their landing. Then, the Deliverance of the Scots queen, and the dispatching of the usurping competitor, the effecting whereof he doth vow and protest, or else their lives to be lost in the execution thereof.—In all these particular points, he prayeth her direction, and for the avoiding of delay, that she by her princely authority would enable such as may advance the affair; seeing that it is necessary, that some there be that become heads, to lead the multitude, ever disposed by nature, in this land, to follow the nobility: he offereth also, to recommend some unto her, fit, in his knowledge, to be her lieutenants in the West Parts, North Wales, and the countries of Lancaster, Derby, and Stafford.—He promiseth that himself, with ten gentlemen, and 100 of their followers, would deliver her from her keeper.—And for the dispatch of the Usurper (from the obedience of whom he saith, that by the excommunication of her, they were made free), six noble gentlemen, all his private friends, would undertake that tragical execution.—He prayeth her, that by her wisdom it be reduced to method, and that her deliverance be first, for that thereupon depended their only good, and all other circumstances so to concur, that the untimely beginning of one, do not overthrow the rest.—He subscribeth: 'Your majesty's faithful subject, and sworn servant, ANTHONY BABINGTON.'

Then was read a Copy of the Scots queen's Letter to Babington, in answer of his, whereby she termeth him trusty and well-beloved; she commendeth his zeal and entire affection towards her; she accepteth and alloweth his offers; she declareth, that she hath long time dealt with foreign princes touching these actions, always putting them in mind how dangerous their delays were to the catholics. She willeth him to assure their principal friends, that albeit she had not in this cause any particular interest, that which she may pretend, being of no consideration unto her, in respect of the public good of the state, she would be always ready and most willing to employ herein her life, and all that she hath, or may ever look for in this world.—To ground substantially this Enterprize, she adviseth to examine deeply. 1. What forces they could raise within the realm, and what captains to be appointed in every shire, in case a chief general cannot be had. 2. Of what towns, ports, and havens, they could assure themselves, as well in the North as West and South, to receive succours from the Low countries, Spain and France. 3. What places they esteemed most fit, and of greatest advantage, to assemble their forces at, and which way and whither to march. 4. What foreign forces, as well on horse, as on foot, they required, and for how long pay. 5. What provision of money and armour, in case they wanted, they would ask. 6. By what means the six gentlemen did deliberate to proceed. 7. And the manner how she was to be delivered out of hold.—She deviseth, that after they had amongst themselves taken their best resolution, that then they should impart the same to Mendoza, and she promiseth to write unto him of the matter, with all the earnest recommendation she could; and also to any else that should be needful.—The affairs being thus prepared, and forces in readiness both without and within the realm, she saith, that then shall it be time to set the six gentlemen to work: taking order, upon the accomplishing of their design, that she should be suddenly transported from the place of her restraint, and all their forces to be at the same time in the field, and meet her, in tarrying for the arrival of the foreign aid, which must be hastened with all diligence.—And for that there can be no certain day appointed for the accomplishing of the said gentlemen's designment, she willeth, that others may be in a readiness to take her from thence; that the said gentlemen have always about them (or at the least at the court), four stout men, with speedy horses, to dispatch in divers ways, so soon as the said design should be executed, to bring intelligence to those which should undertake her deliverance, so that she might be taken from the keeper before he could hear of the execution of the said design, or at the least, before he could remove her to any other place, or fortify the place wherein she remained; and at the same instant to essay to cut off the posts ordinary ways.—She giveth earnest warning not to stir on this side, before they be well assured of foreign forces, nor to take her away, before they were well assured, to set her in the midst of a good army, or some very good strength, where she might safely stay for the assembly of their forces, and arrival of foreign princes.—She referreth to Babington to assure the gentlemen above mentioned, of all that shall be requisite of her part, for the entire execution of their good will.—She promiseth to essay, at the same time that the work shall be in hand in these parts, to make the catholics of Scotland to arise, and put her son into their hands, to effect that, from thence, her enemies here may not prevail of any succour.—She willeth also, some stirring in Ireland were laboured, for to begin some while before any thing were done here, to the end that the alarm might be given thereby, on the flat contrary side that the stroke should come.—That for a General, it were good to sound obscurely the earl of Arundel, or some of his brethren; and likewise to seek upon the young earl of Northumberland, if he be at liberty: and the earl of Westmorland, and the lord Paget, should be brought home secretly, and with them some more of the principal banished men should return.—She directeth three means for her delivery; viz. 50 or 60 to deliver her from her keeper when she was riding to take air on the moors between Chartley and Stafford.—Or to set fire in the barns and stables at Chartley, in the night-time, and when her guardian servants should go forth to quench the fire, then the others to enter and take her away.—Or to cause some of the carts, which came with provision very early, to be overturned in the great gates, by practice with the cart drivers, so that the gates could not be shut, and then those which were appointed for her delivery, to enter the house upon the sudden, and to take her away.—Finally, she requireth, for God's sake, that albeit they cannot compass her delivery, yet notwithstanding they should not let to proceed in the rest of the enterprize.—She concludeth, what issue soever the matter taketh, she will think herself obliged to Babington so long as she liveth, for his order to hazard himself (as he doth) for her delivery.

Both these copies of the two several before-mentioned Letters, were advisedly perused by Babington, and thereupon he did voluntarily confess the same to be the true Copies of his Letter to the Scots queen, and of her Answer to the same, and for affirmation thereof, he subscribed his name to every page of both the said copies with his own hand. In doing whereof, he was so circumspect and careful, that finding two or three words mistaken in the writing of the Copy of the Letters, he struck out the same, before he did subscribe it.

Hereupon it was urged and inferred by her majesty's learned Council, that if Babington's Letter came to the Scots queen's hands, then it was apparent that she was privy to the Conspiracy for the taking away of her majesty's life. And likewise if she did write unto Babington to such effect, as in his Declaration written with his own hand, and in the same copy recognized and subscribed by him, is contained, then it cannot be avoided, but that she did not only compass and imagine, but did also practise, the destruction of her highness, and so was directly within both the parts of the commission and statute.

Hereunto the Scots queen, after her Protestation, answered, that she never saw nor knew Babington; and denied that she received any such Letter from him, or that she wrote any such Letter to him, or that she was privy to his conspiracies, or that she did ever practise, compass, imagine, or was privy of any thing to the Destruction of her majesty, or to the hurt of her person; confessing nevertheless, that she had used Babington as an intelligencer for her, and for the conveying of letters and packets.—And she added further, that she was not to be charged, but either by her word, or by her writing, and she was sure they had neither the one nor the other to lay against her.

After which Answer so by her made, divers other matters were alledged, and shewed forth, to prove that she did receive the same Letters from Babington, and did also write Answer unto him, as the before-mentioned Copies did purport; with farther proof, as hereafter followeth:—First, it was inferred, that since both the Letters were written in the cypher used between the Scots queen and Babington, and all the points of Babington's Letter directly and effectually answered by the other, it cannot be, but that she received his Letter, and so made the Answer unto the same; and the Alphabet of the same Cypher being found amongst Papers, and shewed to Babington, he acknowledged and thereupon subscribed his name to the same, as it appeared.—Also, the imparting of the same Letter by Babington to Titchborne, who did help to decypher part of it, and to Ballard, Dunne, and others, when he was at liberty, and feared not the discovery of his Treasons, but hoped then, within short time, to bring the same to his desired effect, is a stronger proof of the same Letters.—Besides the voluntary Declarations and Confessions of the same Letters by Babington, Ballard, Titchborne, and Dunne, after their apprehension, and their constant persisting in the same, before and after the time of their Arraignment, and till their death, without retracting any part thereof, enforceth greatly the credit of the same.—And there is no likelihood or probability that Babington, or any one, would of himself devise and impute to others, a matter of so great importance and extreme danger.

Then it was added further, that besides the matters before mentioned, it was manifest, as well by the Declarations and Confessions of Nau and Curle, her servants and secretaries, subscribed with their own hands, without torture or constraint, and by their voluntary oaths verifying the same, that the Scots queen did receive the same Letter from Babington, and caused the same to be decyphered, and after advice, reading, and consideration thereof, caused the said answer to be written to Babington in her name.—And for proof thereof, it was alledged, that the Copies of the same Letters being showed by some of the lords of the council, to Nau and Curle, they, upon reading and perusing thereof, subscribed their names thereunto, affirming the same, and acknowledging that the Scots queen received the same from Babington, and thereupon she did give direction for the writing of the other unto him: which was verified, by shewing forth the same Copies so subscribed by them. And Nau setteth down in writing with his own hand, the 6th September, that the Scots queen did commonly hold this course, in receiving and writing of letters of secrecy and importunce, viz. That all letters written to her, were opened in her cabinet, in her own presence, and decyphered by her own commandment; and such letters as she did write to others, she did first either write the same in French with her own hand, or give direction to Nau to write the same; after which, the same being perused by her, or read unto her, if they were to be written in English, then did Curle translate them out of French into English, and did etsoons read them unto her, the same being so translated; which being done, Curle did put the same in cypher, and so they were sent away. He affirmeth farther in his said Declaration, That the Scots queen gave direction for the writing of the said Letter to Babington, and that in the writing thereof, the course aforesaid was holden.

4 I

There was also shewed forth a Paper written by Nau, containing short Minutes and Notes of the principal points of Babington's Letter, and of the Scots queen's Letter to Babington, which was found amongst her Papers at Chartley, which being shewed unto Nau by some of the lords of the council, he upon sight thereof confessed it to be his own hand, saying, that upon reading Babington's letter to the Scots queen, and her direction given for the answering of the same, he did set down the same Notes, to serve as a memorial for him, for the writing of other letters; and this his Confession, in that behalf, did he subscribe in the same paper, with his own hand, in presence of the said lords, and put his name thereunto; and after, in another Examination, affirmeth the same.

In this Paper, amongst other points, is contained Le Coup, which can hardly be construed to be meant otherwise, than the blow or stroke for killing of her majesty, being written upon some occasion, and to such end, as Nau hath declared, as is aforesaid.

Also, Curle perusing an abstract of the principal points of both the said Letters, did confess and affirm the same, and thereupon, before the said lords, did with his own hand subscribe his said affirmation, and put his name thereunto.

The same points were put into French by Nau, and written all with his own hand, and by him likewise confessed to be the matters contained in the same Letters, and thereupon also he did subscribe his name to the same.

Besides, Nau being examined before the lords aforesaid, the 21st of Sept., touching the said Letters, said that Curle did decypher Babington's Letter to the Scots queen, and after he (the said Nau) did read it unto her, and she resolved to make answer unto the same.

And saith further, That he took the points contained in the Scots queen's Letter to Babington, of her own mouth, from point to point, in the same manner as he put in writing; whereupon he did draw the Letter in French, and after brought it unto her, and she corrected it in such sort as it was sent to Babington. And saith, that the Scots queen delivered unto him by her own speech, these points following, for Answer of Babington's Letter, upon consideration of the same Letter from Babington, wherein the same points were contained, viz. What forces were to be had here, what havens and ports, what places fittest for the forces to assemble; what foreign forces they required; what provision, money, and armour; by what means the six gentlemen meant to proceed; and the manner how she was to be delivered out of hold.

He saith also, that the clause of the Association upon pretence to withstand the Puritans, was devised by the Scots queen herself, and was by her direction put into the said Letter; and so likewise, the other clause that the six gentlemen should have some stout men well horsed, to give speedy intelligence when the designment should be executed.

This Examination of Nau was first set down in English, according as he delivered it by speech, and being read unto him, he did subscribe his name unto the same, and after, upon perusal and further consideration thereof, he did set down in French with his own hand the substance thereof.

Curle being likewise examined before the said lords, the said 21st Sept., saith, That he decyphered Babington's Letter to the Scots queen, and then the same was read unto her by Nau, whereupon she directed Nau to draw an Answer unto the same, which he drew in French, and read it unto her; which being done, Curle put it into English by her commandment, and after, read it unto Nau, and then, by her commandment, Curle put it into cypher.—He saith, That the same her Letter to Babington had these parts, viz. What forces may be raised here; what havens and ports provided; what place fittest for the forces to assemble; what foreign forces they required; what provision, money, and armour, they would ask; by what means the six gentlemen meant to proceed, and how they meant to deliver her out of hold. And that the same letter contained a clause also, that the six gentlemen should have four stout men, well horsed, to give advertisement so soon as the designment should be executed; and contained three means, for her delivery out of hold; and had also a device for an Association to be pretended against the Puritans. He saith also, she willed him to burn the English Copy of the Letters sent to Babington.

These Examinations of Nau and Curle were subscribed with their own hands, and affirmed upon their oaths, voluntarily taken before the lords and judges, and so some of the said lords and judges did openly affirm.

All these Confessions and Declarations, Examinations and Subscriptions, of Nau and Curle, were verified by the oath of Mr. Thomas Powell, Clerk of the Crown, who was present when they did write and depose the same, and being shewed to the Scots queen, she confessed the same to be the hands of Nau and Curle; albeit, as she said, Nau had not written his name as he did usually accustom to sign; but she denied earnestly, that she did ever receive the same Letter from Babington, or write the other unto him, whatsoever Nau and Curle had said or deposed, saving she did take them to be honest men; but she did not know what apprehension, torture, fear or hope of favour, might make in them.

After these Proofs thus produced and shewed, it was alleged further, That the Scots queen had not only intelligence by Babington of Ballard's negotiation in France, from the agents in France, and with what direction, and for what purpose he was sent from thence into England, but had also the like intelligence out of France, from her agents there.

And thereupon was shewed forth a Copy of a Letter written to the Scots queen by Charles Paget the 26th of May 1586, stilo novo, which was decyphered by Curle, and being shewed to him by some of the lords, the 25th of Sept. he confessed the same, as well by speech, as by his own voluntary subscription, and putting his name thereunto. Whereby Charles Paget did signify what conference Ballard had with him and Mendoza; and what Plot they had levied for the invasion of the realm, and stirring of rebellion; and what directions Mendoza had given unto Ballard.

It was also alleged, That after the Scots queen had received the said Letter from Babbington, and had written Answer, point for point, to the same, and given direction, touching the whole Plot, promising withal to write to Mendoza, and to any else that should be needful, she did, accordingly, the 27th of July, make dispatch of five several letters, all touching the same action, viz. three into France, one to Mendoza, another to Charles Paget, and the third to the bishop of Glascow; and two into Spain, one to the lord Paget, and another to sir Francis Inglesfield.

She wrote to Mendoza, that she was so discouraged from entering into any new pursuits, seeing the small effect of those in times past, that she shut up her eyes to divers overtures and propositions that were made unto her by the Catholics within six months past, having no means to give them sound answer.—But upon that, which of late again she understood of the good intention of the king of Spain towards these quarrels, she had written very amply to the principal of the said Catholics, upon a design which she sent, with her advice upon every point, to resolve amongst themselves, for the execution thereof; and for fear of loss of time, she gave them order to dispatch unto Mendoza, with all diligence, one from among them, sufficiently instructed to treat with him, according to the general propositions which have been already made unto him, of all things which they were to demand of him in that affair with the king his master.—Further, she answereth him on their behalf, upon their faith and word given unto her, That they would faithfully and sincerely accomplish, with the hazard of their lives, that which they should promise by their deputy, and therefore prayeth Mendoza to give all credit therein, as if herself had dispatched him.—She saith further, that she would inform Mendoza with the means of her escape, which she would take upon her to perform, so as aforehand she may be assured of sufficient forces to receive and preserve her within the laud, whilst all the armies may assemble.

The original draught of this Letter written in French by Nau, and by him subscribed and confessed, was shewed to the Scots queen, which she confessed to be his hand, but said, it was nothing to this matter.—There is also a Copy of the same in English, of Nau's hand, and subscribed and signed by him.

She did write unto Charles Paget, That, upon return of Ballard, the principal of the Catholics did impart unto her, their intention and conference to that which Charles Paget wrote, but more particularly asking her direction for the execution of the whole, and that she made them a very ample dispatch, containing the device, point by point, in all things requisite, as well on this side, as without the realm, to bring their designment to good effect.

That she directed them, that for losing no time, having taken resolution amongst them, upon her dispatch, they would make haste to impart the same to Mendoza, sending over therewith, either the said Ballard, or some other the most faithful and secret they could find. That she promised to write to Mendoza, as she did presently, to give credit to the said messenger. So that if the pope and king of Spain had even intention to provide for the isle, the occasion is presently offered, very advantageous, finding all the catholics therein universally so disposed and forward, as there is more ado to keep them back, than put them forward.—That for all difficulties which Mendoza could alledge, as for getting her forth of hold, or otherwise, he should be thereof sufficiently cleared and satisfied.—That it resteth only to pursue, so hotly as can be, both in Rome and Spain, the grant of support requisite, of horsemen, footmen, arms, ammunition, and money.—That her opinion is, and that so she hath written to the catholics, that nothing be stirred on this side, before they have sufficient promise and assurance of the pope and king of Spain, for the accomplishment of that which is required of them.—That she would have sent to Paget, a copy of her dispatch to the catholics, were it not that she is sure, that, by the messenger, he should know more thereof than she can write, he being to carry into those parts the resolution of the whole, and for the same respect she referred the lord Paget to be thereof informed by Charles Paget.

She thanketh him for the sixty crowns he gave to Ballard, promising to make him reimbursed of the same, by the ambassador.—She requireth to know how he hath proceeded with the lord Claude, in the matter wherof she wrote unto him not long since, which being well effected, should well concur with the enterprise here.

Two original draughts of this Letter were shewed forth, one in French, written by Nau, the other in English, written by Curle, which they confessed by their subscriptions, and affirmed by their oaths, before some of the lords, as Mr. Thomas Powell did then depose.

She did write to the lord Paget, that she doubted not, but he had understood by his brother, the overture which a deputy for the catholics in this realm, had made on their behalf to Mendoza: whereupon, not long since she wrote very amply to the principal of the catholics, for to have, upon a plot which she had dressed for them, their common resolution; and for to treat accordingly with the king of Spain, she addressed them to the lord Paget.

She requireth him to consider deeply the said Plot, and all the particularities necessary for the execution of it; namely, for the supporting of men, armour, munition and money; which must be obtained of the pope, and of the king of Spain. She requireth to solicit the matter there, and to enter betime, because all negotiations in that court are drawn to great length.

This was also first drawn in French by Nau, and after put into English by Curle, and both the original draughts of their own hands were shewed forth, which they had confessed and subscribed before the lords, and affirmed the same by their oaths, as Mr. Thomas Powell did also depose.

She did write to sir Francis Inglesfield, to give thanks to the king of Spain, for the 12,000 crowns; assuring him, that the same should be employed to none other use, but to the accomplishment of her escape.—That she feareth the bruit which runneth, of a peace between the king of Spain and this queen, shall retire many to pursue the designment of an enterprize of new dressed here.—That the principal catholics of England having, about Easter last, made their complot together to rise in Leicester's absence (myself not having wherewith to give them a substantial answer), sent one from amongst them to Charles Paget, who made their messenger to declare their designment to Mendoza, to know if his master the king of Spain would hearken thereunto.—Whereupon all good hope being brought back again unto them, as they signified unto her, and finding the same in manner confirmed by Inglesfield's letter; she made them a very ample dispatch, by which, upon a plot which she had dressed for them, she gave them her advice, point by point, in every thing necessary for the execution thereof, and remitting them to take resolution thereupon.—That for to lose no time, without sending again unto her, they should dispatch, with all diligence, some one in their names, chosen, faithful, and sufficiently instructed, to Mendoza.—To impart unto him particularly the plot of their enterprize, and to require such support as is necessary of men on foot and horse, as also of armour, ammunition, and money: of which things, before they had sufficient promise and assurance, not to stir on this side.—That she had cleared the greatest difficulty, which has always been objected in the like enterprize, viz. her escape out of hold, and she hopeth to execute the same assuredly, as they shall design it.—That, if a peace be made in France, her cousin of Guise, having already great forces, may employ the same here, on a sudden, before the queen be aware.

Of this Letter there was also shewed for the two original draughts, one written in French by Nau, the other in English by Curle; which they had likewise confessed and subscribed before the lords, and confirmed by their oaths, as Mr. Powell deposed.

She did write another Letter to the bishop of Glasgow, which, for that, in these points, it did in substance concur with the former, containing also sundry other matters, not pertinent to this accord, was not read, but the first draught in French written by Nau, and by him confessed and subscribed before the lords, was only shewed forth, for the verifying of the same.

After that, the original draughts of these Letters to Mendoza, and Charles Paget, were shewed to the Scots queen, and were confessed by her, to be the hand-writing of Nau and Curle; she refused to see the draught of sundry other Letters hereafter mentioned, which were likewise offered to be shewed unto her, saying, She cared not whether the same were written by them or not, and acknowledging withal, that about that time she made several dispatches, to such effects as these Letters did purport, which was, concerning aid to be procured for her delivery, saying, that the same was nothing touching the matter wherewith she was charged.

Hereupon it was urged, that this Letter concurring directly, in matter and circumstances, with Babington's Letter to her, and her Answer to the same, did prove evidently that she received the one, and did write the other, and so was privy, and a compasser and practiser of the design of the Death of her majesty, and on this behalf these particularities were specially voted.

She writeth to Mendoza, Charles Paget, and the rest, That the Catholics did signify unto her their intentions, and that she made them an ample Dispatch, giving her advice upon every point, point by point, upon conference together of Babington's Letter to her, with her Answer to the same; this appeareth to be true, for by his, she hath intelligence of their plot and intention, and by the other she giveth her direction and advice, point by point.

In her Letter to Charles Paget, she writeth, That upon the return of Ballard, the principal of the Catholics had imparted unto her their intentions, conformable to that which Charles Paget wrote unto her; but more particularly upon conference of Babington's Letter with that of Charles Paget of the 29th of May, it appeareth, that Babington setteth down sundry particularities of the plot, more than are contained in Paget's Letter.

In her Letter to Babington, she promiseth to write to Mendoza, and others, and in those which she did write to Mendoza, Charles Paget, &c. she writeth, That she had given such direction; and accordingly Ballard was prepared and ready to have taken that journey, if he had not been prevented by his apprehension, as is confessed by Ballard, Babington, and Savage.

She writeth to Charles Paget, &c. that the difficulty which hath been objected, touching her delivery out of hold, is cleared, and that she hopeth to have it executed assuredly, according to her designment.

And accordingly, in Babington's Letter to her, and her answer to the same, the manner and means of her escape is set down at large.

In her Letter to Charles Paget, she saith, She hath written to the Catholics, that no stirring shall be on this side, before they have sufficient promise and assurance for the accomplishment of that which is required of the pope and king of Spain: and in this her Letter of answer to Babington, it appeareth, that she did write to that effect.

In her Letter to sir Francis Inglesfield, she writeth, That for Scotland, she is about to practise that her enemies may have no succour thence.

And accordingly, in her Letter to Babington, she writeth, That she would essay, at the time that the work should be in hand in these parts, to make the Catholics of Scotland to arise, and put her son in their hands, to the effect that from thence her enemies may not prevail of any succours; and withal willet, that some stirring in Ireland were laboured for, to begin some while before, to the end the alarm may be given on the flat contrary side that the stroke should come.

Both which her devices have not failed of their success, for there have been stirs and troubles both in Scotland and Ireland, the latter end of this summer.

And where the Scots queen confessed, That she had written to procure Invasion and Rebellion, and seemed to justify the same as lawful, for to obtain thereby her delivery, it was said, that being within the realm, and protected by the laws, and so subject to the same, she might not use those means to compass her delivery, whereby the queen's life was apparently sought; for invasion and destruction of her majesty are so linked together, that they cannot be single; for if the invader should prevail, no doubt they would not suffer her majesty to continue neither government nor her life; and in case of rebellion, the same reason holdeth.

It was further alledged, That, besides these several Letters before mentioned, she did, about the time that these things were in hand, write divers letters to sundry other persons beyond the seas, wherein she taketh herself to be the sovereign of this realm, containing sundry matters very dangerous as well to our sovereign the queen's majesty, as to the whole state of this realm. By which her intentions, in the matters wherewith she is now charged, may the better appear.

The 20th of May 1586, she did write to Charles Paget to practise with the Spanish Ambassador in France, to stir the king of Spain to invade the realm, and to take revenge on the queen's majesty.—That the surest and readiest way to rid himself altogether from this queen's malice, is, by purging the spring of the malign humours.—That by this long patience, he hath not prevailed any thing, and that there is no other means to set up again the king of Spain's affairs in the Low countries, and to assure his estate in all other parts, than in re-establishing this realm under a prince his friend.—That if he deliberate, to set in this queen, he assueth himself of Scotland, either to serve him, or to be so bridled, as not to serve his enemy.—That she will travel by all means, to make her son to enter into the enterprise, or, if he cannot be persuaded thereunto, then she will dress a secret league and hood amongst the Catholic lords of that country, to join with the king of Spain.—That she will make her son to be delivered into the hands of the pope, or king of Spain, with paction to set him at liberty whensoever she shall devise, or after their death, himself, being Catholic, shall desire, without that ever the king of Spain should pretend or attempt any thing to the prejudices of her son (if he yield him Catholic), in the succession of that crown.—That a Regent should be established in Scotland, to govern in the absence of her son, and for that purpose named the lord Claude Hambleton, alias Hamilton.—That she should write to the lord Claude to procure him to draw the Catholic lords of Scotland, to be at the king of Spain's devotion. That, after answer received from the king of Spain, conformable to this design, then Charles Paget to write plainly to the lord Claude, that he hath charge from her to deal with the lord Claude in this matter, shewing that it is needful to seize her son's person, if he cannot be willingly drawn to this enterprise; and that the next way were to deliver him in to the pope or the king of Spain.—That Charles Paget should indirectly put the lord Claude in hope, that she will make him to be declared lawful heir to the crown of Scotland, her son failing without children, and that she will procure the Catholic princes of Christendom to condescend thereunto.—She chargeth him not to communicate these things to any, either English, or French, or Scottish, and to pray Mendoza, and the lord Claude, to do the like.

The Letter was first drawn in French by Neo, and then translated in English, and after put into cypher by Curle, and an extract of the principal points thereof, was confessed and subscribed before some of the lords the 25th of Sept. which was openly read and shewed forth.

Then was read another Letter, which the Scots queen wrote to Mendoza, the same 20th of May, concurring with the former to Charles Paget, wherein she writeth, That Charles Paget had a large Commission from her, to impart to Mendoza certain overtures on her behalf.—That there was another point depending thereupon, which she had reserved to write to Mendoza himself, to be sent to the king his master, on her behalf; so men else, if it were possible, being privy thereunto, viz. That considering her son's obstinacy in heresy, and foreseeing the imminent danger like to ensue to the Catholic church, he succeeding in this crown; she resolved, in case her son were not reclaimed to the Catholic religion, as she had title to give and grant her right to the king of Spain, in succession of this crown, by her last will and testament, praying him to take into his protection, both her, and the state and affairs of this realm.—She willeth this to be secret; forasmuch, if it should be revealed, it should be in France, the loss of her dowry; in Scotland, the clear breach of her son; and in this country, her total ruin and destruction.

This Letter was first written in French by the Scots queen's own hand, and then translated into English, and put into cypher by Curle, as he confessed and subscribed the same the 25th of Sept. last.

Upon reading of these Letters, it was noted, That the Scots queen's intention was, to subject this crown and realm to the king of Spain, to the utter ruin and destruction, both of the queen's majesty, and of all the antient nobility, which purpose appeareth to be generally holden by the English fugitives and traitors beyond the seas, as Babington and Savage set down in their several Confessions and Declarations: and that their intention is, to procure the king of Spain title to this realm; to be confirmed and invested by the pope, to take away all objections against it. And as Babington saith, Dr. Allen and Parsons staid longer at Rome, to solicit the same.

After this was read, another Letter written to the Scots queen, by Dr. Allen, the 5th of Feb. wherein he writeth unto her, 'Madam, my good sovereign, for our resolution out of Spain, the whole execution is committed to the prince of Parma.' That father Parsons, Owen, and himself did bring the king's determination to the prince, who seemed as glad as they, that he might have the effectuating of it; and gave great sign to do it, strait upon the recovery of Antwerp, but harped still upon this string, that she should by money, or some means, put herself out of their hands.

Then was read the Scots queen's Letter to Dr. Allen the 20th of May 1586, wherein she called him 'Reverend Father,' and saith, 'they have overslipped many good occasions:' and wisheth, that they should not withal omit this new offer, pinching near by this queen.

Upon these Letters were inferred, that Dr. Allen did acknowledge her to be his Sovereign, and to be the queen of this realm in present possession, and she accepting the same, gave him the title of a bishop. Whereunto she answered, That though Dr. Allen, and divers other foreign princes, and the Catholics of this realm did so take her, yet she could not do withal; but for herself, she did not claim to be so.

It is also to be noted, that the resolution which was to be put in execution by the prince of Parma, and which the Scots queen was so careful should not be overslipped, cannot be thought to be other but matter of great peril to her majesty's person and this state. And so it may also be gathered by a Letter written by the prince of Parma to the Scots queen the 12th of Jan. 1586, where he writeth, that touching the great secret, he would keep it, as it becometh, and put to effect as much as she should command, and should be in his power.

Also, the Scots queen did write to Dr. Lewis, ult. April 1586, wherein she willeth him to impart her congratulations to the new elected pope, and her affection towards him, chiefly for that she understandeth his resolution bent, to follow, as near as he can, the traces and footsteps of good pope Pius 5, of whose memory she beareth a singular reverence, for the singular compassion he had of her present state, and his endeavour which he did manifest to relieve her.

Whereupon, it is to be noted, that her imaginations be against the queen's person and state, since she exciteth the pope to follow the steps of Pius 5, who published the bull of excommunication against her majesty, and thereby denounced her to be no lawful queen, and discharged her subjects of their obedience and allegiance; out of which root hath sprung all the traitorous practices that have since been attempted against her highness's person.

And for the verifying of these Letters before mentioned, written by the Scots queen; it is to be remembered, that the original draughts of all these Letters, saving that only which she wrote to Babington, which, as Curle affirmeth, she commanded to be burned, as is before mentioned, were found amongst her Papers at Chartley and put in a chest, sealed up by John Manners, esq.; sir Walter Ashton, knight, and Richard Bagot, esq.; which was first opened and unsealed, and the same draught taken out, by certain of the lords and others of her majesty's Privy Council.

After, on the 24th of Oct. the Lords and other Commissioners being assembled at the Star Chamber at Westminster, to confer of the said matters, and touching their Sentence, Nau and Curle were brought personally before them; and the Papers, Letters, and Writings, which they had before confessed and subscribed, and affirmed by their oaths, as is aforesaid, being then and there likewise shewed unto them, they did then estoons voluntarily acknowledge and affirm all that to be true, which they had before so confessed and subscribed, and that they had so confessed and subscribed the same, only in respect of the truth, frankly and voluntarily, without any torture, constraint, or threatening.

And the said Curle did then also further affirm, that as well the Letter which Babington did write to the Scots queen, as the draughts of her Answer to the same, were both burned at her command.

He said also, after the decyphering of the said Letter written by Babington, and the reading thereof to the Scots queen, he admonished her of the danger of those actions, and persuaded her not to deal therein, nor to make any answer thereunto: and she thereupon said she would answer it, bidding him do that which he was commanded, and which appertained unto him.

65. The Arraignment of W<sup>M</sup>. DAVISON (Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth) in the Star-Chamber, for Misprision and Contempt : 30 ELIZ. March 28, A. D. 1587. [MS. in Caius. Coll. Camb. Class A. 1090, 8. p. 267. MS. in the Bodleian Libr. sub. tit. Juridici, 7843. 862. p. 235.]

Before sir Christopher Wraye, Chief Justice of England, who for the time sate as Lord Privy-Seal; the archbishops of Canterbury and York; the earls of Worcester, Cumberland, and Lincoln; the lords Grey, Lumley; sir James Croft, the comptroller; sir Gilbert Gerrard, Master of the Rolls; the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Edmund Anderson; sir Roger Manwood, the Lord Chief Baron; and sir Walter Mildmay, the Chancellor of the Exchequer; For hearing of a matter of Misprision and Contempt against Mr. Davison, late one of her majesty's Secretaries, and one of her Privy-Council, by virtue of a Commission to them directed*.

WHEREUPON Mr. Popham, the queen's Attorney-General, spake in form following: My Lords, I am to inform your lordships in her majesty's behalf, of a certain great and grievous Contempt and Misprision against Mr. Davison, there prisoner at the bar, late one of her majesty's secretaries. The manifold and sundry practices committed by the Scottish queen are not unknown unto your honours, which were offences in the highest degree, and required to be looked unto with speed. It is well known unto your lordships also that thereupon, by earnest intreaty and intercession, her majesty at length condescended that the matter should be heard and decided according unto law. Whereupon, were those honourable proceedings had at Fotheringhay. But the residence which belonged thereunto, to-wit, the Execution, her majesty politicy neither consented unto, nor denied, esteeming no clemency in the former, nor wisdom in the latter. Which course, she held from the 23th of Oct. all Nov., Dec. and Jan. During which time, most horrible conspiracies against her majesty's sacred person were contrived, most false rumour that the Scottish queen was escaped, spread abroad, and bruited that foreigners were landed for invasion; all which, for preservation of the Scottish queen, and prejudice of ours. Upon these considerations, her majesty assented to sign the Warrant for her Execution, by whom such tumults were raised: notwithstanding, being moved to mercy by her great wisdom, she thought it necessary to have it in readiness, if any attempt should be begun, and yet not in haste to execute the same: this so signed, she left with Mr. Davison to carry the great seal, to have it in readiness as aforesaid. And he, after the sealing, and without her majesty's commandment, presented it unto the lords without her privity, contemptuously. Notwithstanding, upon the delivery thereof to him, her majesty bid him use secrecy. And upon question made by the lords whether her majesty continued in that mind for execution of the Scottish queen, he said, she held that course still; and upon farther question made, said her majesty would not be farther troubled with that matter. Whereupon the lords seeing no impediment, dispatched the Execution, wherein Mr. Davison did break the secrecy her majesty reposed in him, in delivering it unto the lords, and dealt very contemptuously in not making her privy, knowing her mind to be to the contrary. For her majesty sent Mr. Killegrew unto him, commanding him, if it were not sealed already, it should not be sealed; and after, when he told her majesty it was sealed already, she asked him what haste? This act so done by him, he being but a particular counsellor, her majesty doth take it a matter of high indignity and abuse of her counsellors, and a thing of the greatest moment that ever happened since her reign, since which time never any counsellor in matters of far less importance proceeded without her resolution or privity: which thing she leaves to your honours consideration for punishment thereof.

* Queen Elizabeth undertook to make the public believe that the execution (of the Queen of Scots) was done against her will, and without her knowledge; the way she went to work was thus: Davison was the instrument she made use of, without his knowing any thing of the matter, to act this sort of Comedy. A little before the Queen of Scots' sentence he was made Secretary of State; and it is very likely he was put into that post on purpose, that he might be drawn into the snare, and made accountable for Mary's death. Rapin, vol. ix. (Oct. Edit.) pages 105, 106. See also pages 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, for more particulars of this affair.

Davison, with a comely countenance, replenished with gravity, a fine deliverance of speech, but a voice somewhat low (which he excused by late sickness) discreetly answered in sort ensuing:—My Lords, I am right sorry, that an action of this nature, for the honourable Proceedings against the Scottish queen, than which never was any thing more honourable, should after the full and laudable performance thereof be called into question. Again, my lords, I am most sorry that her gracious highness should conceive such an high displeasure against me, as to trouble your honours with me at this present. But as in all mine actions heretofore, I have been most faithful and forward to do her majesty's commandments; so in this, by your honours favour, let me bear the testimony of my conscience, that I have done nothing either wittingly or willingly, but as became an honest man. And therefore, first, that I delivered it unto the lords without her commandment, or against her commandment; let it be lawful for me with your honours leave to protest the contrary.—To that the Attorney answered, I said not that you delivered it unto the lords against her commandment, but that you knowing her mind to be contrary to it.—Davison to that replied, Well, then, I desire to have the proofs: whereupon the Solicitor-General read his Examination, wherein to the sixth point he sayeth, That after the signing and sealing he made her not privy to the sending down.—Mr. Davison to that answered; My good lords, the Warrant for the execution was signed and sealed by her majesty's express commandment; which being so, I take it to be irrevocable in law. Whereupon, by the advice of the lords it was sent down, she not being privy to sending down, wherein I thought I dealt as beseeued me: for writs of execution do not use to come to her majesty. That I was so forward, I thought it my duty, and for no other reason I protest; for I never had any private grudge or hatred against the Queen of Scots, but in respect of my country and common-weal. The Warrant rested with me six weeks before I presented it, and when I presented it, my Lord Admiral will witness I was sent for. The place I held, I protested I never sought for: it pleased her majesty for some gracious opinion of me to prefer me thereunto. In which I am assured I have not committed any wilful error, but as an honest man should do; for nothing in the world is more dear to me than my reputation. I confess I said to some lords, I took it to be her majesty's pleasure to proceed therein, and I appeal to her majesty's own conscience if I had not cause to think so. But she is my most gracious sovereign; it is not my duty to say, if she gainsay; I will not stand in contestation with her, for it beseeues me not, and therefore I submit myself to what punishment your honours shall please to lay upon me.

To that the Solicitor (Egerton) answered; Mr. Davison, you do well to extol the honour of the Proceedings, for it beseeues you, and so the truth was. But I must tell you the more honourable the proceedings were, the more is your contempt in not making her privy. In reserving the Execution, I note her majesty's magnanimity, who not regarded the dangers of her own self, to continue the other's life. And yet her wisdom is therein to be commended, who thought good to have it in a readiness, with intention to have clemency to long as might be. In not contesting with her majesty you observe duty, but by your means was a great contempt; and further, she said to you, you should use it with great secrecy.

To which Mr. Davison said, I confess it; and the Solicitor replied, Why then that was a caution not to do it without her consent: so notwithstanding your intention was good, it was a foul error. Whereto Davison rejoined, She is my most gracious sovereign, as good a mistress unto me as ever any servant had, and what I have I had it at her hands, I hope therefore, my lords think me not so unwise as to offend her, unless by oversight; but that I did it wittingly or willingly, I protest I did it not. And notwithstanding she sent Mr. Killegrew that it should not be sealed, if it were not sealed already: yet it proves not but that she had a mind to do it when it was sealed. She said unto me, What haste? whereto I answered, I had done it by her majesty's commandment, and that such a thing might not be dallied withal. Now, my lords, the reasons to move me to think it was her majesty's meaning, were sundry and divers: first, the honour and justice of the cause: next, I knew of advertisement from beyond the seas of her majesty's imminent dangers. Also I was privy to the Proceedings at Fotheringhay. I was not ignorant of the doings in Parliament. Last of all, the rumour of Invasion, the cries and tumults in the realm, which moved me, having no express commandment to the contrary, to do as I did.—When he had said this, Mr. Solicitor read his Examination, where to the second he saith, When her majesty bade him use secrecy, he said he would be as careful and secret as should need: to the third, he confesseth Mr. Killegrew came unto him, telling him, if it were not sealed already it should not be sealed. To the seventh, after the Warrant was sealed, her majesty asked him, What haste? Whereto Davison answered, Though her majesty commanded me to keep it secret, and I told the council of it, how can I be thought ill of for that? For her majesty bade me expressly shew Mr. Secretary Walsingham thereof; my Lord-Chancellor must needs know it, forasmuch as he must seal it. And her majesty made my Lord-Admiral privy thereunto; why then might I not make it known to some others that were chief counsellors? To that said Mr. Attorney, Though Mr. Walsingham should know it, yet it was not general. Mr. Davison answered, Neither was I verbally commanded to conceal it from the rest. Then said the Solicitor, Another matter makes against you; my Lord Treasurer did ask you, whether it was her majesty's pleasure? And you answered, Yea. To that said Davison, I remember not that. The Solicitor replied, It is my Lord-Treasurer's testimony. And Davison rejoined, I reverence his testimony; and proceeded, saying, My lords, the cause is between her majesty and me; she is my gracious sovereign, and I her servant, it behoveth me not to say, if she gainsay; neither could I, as I said, contest against her: yet let me protest, that, in my own conceit, I have dealt as sincerely soundly, and honestly as any servant could do. Then spake the Lord Chief Justice of England, saying, By that if she asked you,

What haste? You might know it was her pleasure to defer it, and therefore you to do it without her commandment was a great offence.—Then spake Gawdie, the queen's Serjeant: My lords, four things I note that Mr. Davison confesseth; first that her majesty bade him use secrecy; next, the Warrant being sealed, Mr. Killegrew was sent unto him, that were it not sealed already, it should not be sealed at all. Thirdly he confesseth her majesty was content he should shew it Mr. Walsingham, which proves she minded to keep it from the rest. And it had been his duty to have known her pleasure: and therefore for so much as he Confesseth this, I take it to be a great contempt, Indignity and Misprision for him to say his intent was good; he thought it so, is no Answer: Possibly her majesty told him, she thought of some other course to be taken, and he gave her no Answer; besides, he confesseth he told the lords it was her majesty's pleasure upon such a demand made. Davison answered, that general demand was made. Gawdie replied here, It is the Lord Treasurer's testimony. Davison rejoined, Let me have right; it was but privately demanded between my Lord-Treasurer and me. I will not speak in excuse, but only to answer; I demand, whether the imparting of it to the Council be such a contempt: farther, there is difference between an express commandment, and an implied speech. The loss of my place, I do not esteem, neither weigh I this disgrace; only her majesty's disfavour is the thing that grieves me.—Then Puckering the queen's Serjeant began to speak, aggravating Davison's Offence, and forward to accuse, and yet seemed more pro forma tantum, than of any matter he had to charge him withal, more than had been spoken of before. Whereupon Davison answered, All this speech is answered, but that I made her not privy; whereto I say, I made her not privy in respect my lords of the council thought it not necessary, because it was not fit she should be privy to the Execution. I will not stand upon terms, as I say, for it becomes me not, but submit myself to your honours censures.

Then said Wraye, Mr. Davison, to say it was irrevocable you are deceived, for she might do it at her pleasure. Then said Davison, I beseech you, my lords, make means to her majesty that I may have her favour; and for the rest, I waver it not. Whereupon Wraye willed sir Walter Mildmay to deliver his opinion; who began in form following:

How honourable her majesty, our gracious sovereign, hath dealt in all justice, is known to all the world, against such Traitors, by whom her life should have been taken away; whereupon should ensue, subversion to the whole state, upon the proceedings whereof it appeared that the Scottish queen was chief author, dealing most ingratelously against her who before time had saved her from them that vehemently sought her destruction. And notwithstanding that her majesty might have proceeded against her as a private person, yet she granted her

VOL. I.

Commission to great persons to hear what she could alledge in her defence. And albeit that upon the hearing thereof she was declared to be Guilty, yet none could think Execution might be done without her majesty's express assent. Then he dilated of the proceedings of Parliament, the Petition, her Answer thereunto, wherein he noted her wisdom in not being hasty in so high a matter; he showed farther, how she was contented to hear ambassadors, if they could propound any thing in her defence. Afterward followed the Proclamation to notify the Proceedings passed unto the people; for people, said he, be desirous to hear of state-matters, and I warrant you itch to understand what we do here: herein, said he, was justice, mercy, and discretion. Afterwards, upon the . . . . and cries, she thought it necessary to look unto it; upon this she sealed her warrant, yet continuing her former clemency, not to put it in Execution; for as it was in her to grant that it should be done, so she might stay and defer it; which she so meaning, it behoved her to trust somebody, and so, said he, she did this gentleman, called unto her service upon trust, who, for the acquaintance that I have had with him, was worthy of that place. This trust she committed unto him, and I am sorry, said he, he was not in this so good a servant as in all other things. Surely he had notable cautions, not to have presumed in so great a matter to have done any thing without her commandment. His offence, said he, I interpret in two degrees; an abuse to the trust, and the Contempt: for the first she willed him to tell it Mr. Walsingham, and it is no excuse to say, she forbade you not the rest: for you ought not to have told it unto any but whom she would. Also, which aggravates your offence, you told the lords she was pleased. For the Contempt, the writ was not delivered unto you, but had it not been delivered unto them to whom it was directed, then had it been a commandment. Your good intention was no Answer, neither ought my lords to allow of it, albeit per case I could allow it, because I know you. Also your fault is the greater, which you know. Farther, you were near her, and had time convenient to shew her; hereof said he, hath followed a greater mischief to the queen's majesty, which may turn to all our hindrance, forasmuch as our welfare depends upon her well-doing. Next, said he, hath followed a dishonour to her majesty, that she having governed this land so long time in all obedience, a servant of hers in this age, should have so small regard. Now for my opinion of the Offence, it resteth to consider what punishment is behoveful in such a case. Punishments in this court are either corporal, or pecuniary, pecuniary by fines imposed upon offenders; and corporal, by punishments and such like. Now, said he, if the fine should be secundum quantitatem delicti, I think he should not bear it; for I know his estate. Surely less than ten thousand marks may not be sufficient, which though it be too great for his ability, yet is it too little for his fault. The qual-

fiction, whereof, resteth in them where I doubt not he shall find favour; next he must suffer Imprisonment during her majesty's pleasure, which must be reserved to her merciful mitigation.

And after him spake Manwood the Chief Baron, who in the beginning of his tale took so large a scope, as many did judge he would be tedious, as he was indeed. First, he declared how in the very beginning the queen of Scots bewrayed her malice against the crown of this land when she was queen of France, at which time she made letters patents as queen of England; she usurped her majesty's stile, and she quartered the arms of England. Then he descended unto her doings when she was dowager; how she excused her former offences by reason of coverture: then he declared her marriage with the lord Darnley; the murder of her husband, the practices with the bishop of Ross; her conspiracy with the duke of Norfolk. To conclude, he couched the whole history which any way concerned her life or manners. At last he came to Mr. Davison's offence, which he took in law to be a misprision; and yet not every commandment of the prince transgressed, is a misprision: But, said he, when one is put in trust in a point of justice, which is the government of the common-weal, there a commandment transgressed is a misprision. For example whereof, he cited a case there in that place decided; meaning sir John Throckmorton's case, as many deemed. Also, said he, if a sheriff exercise his office without an oath, that is a misprision. And, said he, if one have power by law to do a thing, if he prevent the time wherein it ought to be done, that is a misprision. And if a judge for expedition of justice should sit in judgment before the term, that is misprision. Now, said he, this is a misprision, because you prevented the time in doing it before you were commanded, although the thing were lawful: for you did fustum, but not juste. Farther, by naming Mr. Walsingham in specialty, it was a secluding the rest in generality. And, also, if the warrant were sealed, yet was it not lawful to kill her, because the direction was special, and not general. So then he concluded the contempt was great, and the punishment assessed by sir Walter Mildmay worthily deserved, wherunto he agreed.

After him, spake Anderson, Chief Justice, who said, The Proceeding had been honourable, which he would not speak of, being known unto all men, and having been spoke to before. But to come to the case in question; in the Accusation, said he, be two parts, first, that Mr. Davison, without her majesty's commandment, sent it down? and the second, that against her commandment he made the lords privy. For the first, he confessed; to the second he saith she bade him use secrecy. The causes alledged by him are good, and yet the proceeding therein, that which caused the offence, the words, 'use secrecy,' and not to cause it to be published or known to any. Then he being one of her majesty's Council, the fault is bad; and it is the worse, because by her saying 'what haste,' he might gather what her intent was. Mr. Davison saith, he excuseth it by love to the commonweal, which a man may term blind love, which is no excuse, but it remaineth a Contempt, and a Contempt is a Misprision; and yet is not every Misprision a Contempt? If a man do a thing without a warrant, it is a Contempt; and so he concluded this to be a great offence worthy the punishment inflicted upon him: and so ended.

After him spake the Master of the Rolls, agreeing with the censures of them that spake before; and that Mr. Davison's great zeal made him forget his duty: also saying, that the point did rest, whether he did know it was her majesty's pleasure it should be stayed, which, said he, appeareth by his own confession; and therefore, in fine, he agreed with the former censures.

Next spake sir James Croft, who said not very much, and yet spake somewhat: that he loved the man well, and so had cause, saying, that he had no lack of good-will; but yet had grievously offended. So he subscribed in opinion to the former judgment.

After him spake the lord Lumley, who divided the offence into two parts. First, The neglect of his duty; and secondly, The breaking of his duty: saying further, that the Judges had told the law, and we must believe them, that it is within the compass of a Contempt. The matter, said he, is evident: for first, her unwillingness in the Parliament was a signification of her mind, which he let slip. And farther, in saying, that she was of that mind still, surely you spake without the book, which was a very bold part; for you ought to have told them how dutiful it was; yet, sir, you took a worse course, that such a high matter by your persuasions, as it should seem, should be done without her privy. Why said he, what an abuse of the counsellors was this? Surely a great abuse! and if it were a fault against them, much more against her majesty: this is one of the highest offences, by my trowth, (for so he sware) that ever subject did against the prince; and though you were my brother and heir (before God I speak it) I think the punishment too little; yet with no offence to you, but for the quality of your fault. But, I say, had a greater Fine been imposed upon you, I would easily have agreed thereunto.

After him spake my lord Grey; who said, Two points were spoken of: the first, touching the queen of Scots; and the next, Mr. Davison's offence. For the first, said he, it is largely discoursed: for the last, my good lords, let me crave your farther examination. His offence is made the more for divers circumstances; the first circumstance is, for that it was for execution of a queen; but what queen? Surely such a queen as practised most horrible Treasons against our sove eign queen! such a queen, as conspired the overthrow of the whole state! yea, such a queen, that sought the subversion of Christ's true Religion, to bring our souls headlong to the devil! So then, my lords, the taking away such a queen, can no way aggravate his fate. The second circumstance is, his breach of secrecy, which he excuseth, that he told it but to the chief counsellors: whereas Mr. Walsingham, my Lord-Admiral and Lord-Chancellor, either by necessity, or commandment from her majesty, did know it undoubtedly. Whatsoever my lords before me have thought; his answer in the behalf doth satisfy me, so I am resolved. For the third point, she asking what haste? and he afterwards; to send it down without her privy, here, even here, is the full proof of the Contempt; here is that, that causes the offence, which he seemeth to acknowledge, yet with two considerations: the first, the seditious tumults within the realm; the next, advertisements from Ireland, and beyond the seas. Now, my lords, must not these considerations move him rather to put himself in her majesty's mercy by dealing without her commandment, than commit her majesty to the mercy of her foes by obeying her? For had that other thing happened (which God forbid), that her majesty would have miscarried, and then this Warrant signed and sealed had been found in Mr. Davison's hands, wanting nothing but execution, should we not then have judged him a traitor?—should we not have torn and rent him asunder? Surely, my lords, I should then have thought him more worthy of ten thousand deaths, than now of the least punishment that may be inflicted upon him; for each of us, in preservation of our country, ought to lose our lands, our livings, and sacrifice our bodies; howbeit, I excuse not his offence, neither do I agree it as a Contempt, and I agree with the punishment; and yet I think his fault proceeded from a very good zeal he bore unto his country; and I pray God, that that peculiar ornament of pity and compassion wherewith her majesty is singular, may be so extended towards him, that all good subjects, by his example, may neglect their own private hindrance or disgrace in respect of the furtherance of the weal public.

After him spake the Earl of Lincoln, who, for his opinion, thought it was but negligently done, and not contemptuously; but had it been done in contempt, he would have then thought Fine and Imprisonment no sufficient punishment for an offence of that quality; yet the Offence being as it is, for company, said he, I agree to the fine: but in mine opinion it is too much, saying that I know her majesty is merciful: and for the rest, I agree with my lord Gray.

The Earl of Cumberland repeated the case; neither aggravating nor denying the offence; but briefly concluded, he agreed in opinion with sir Walter Mildmay.

And the Earl of Worcester said nothing, saying that he was of the same mind with Mr. Chancellor, that spake first.

After him spake the Archbishop of York, speaking, as he was, like a Bishop, rather than a Judge, to decide a matter which did concern the State; for he inveighed against Mr. Davison's offence by places of Scripture: Obedience, said he, is the only virtue, and disobedience the contrary; and God requireth nothing else but obedience. St. Paul saith, 'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers,' &c. And when Joshua was appointed Ruler over Israel, the people said, 'They would obey him in all things.' If then they ought to obey a prince in all things, much more in those things which be good. I am sorry, said he, for Mr. Davison, for he did it neither wittingly nor willingly, as I think certainly, but of a good mind to cut off our common enemy: that it was a good deed, must needs be confessed; but that it was not well done, must needs be granted. To reveal secrets was bad: for her majesty imparts not each part of her counsel to every Counsellor; so then his offence was a disobedience, and a great fault. He allegeth in excuse, I think, a good intention, but that excuseth not the fault: for obedientia est melior quam sacrificium. And St. Paul saith, Non facimus malum ut inde veniat bonum. Therefore, said he, the offence was great, too dangerous; for, in such a case, one would be twice advised, if he were either honest or wise. Last of all, he concluded he agreed with the Punishment assessed, and so ended his sermon.

Then spake the Archbishop of Canterbury, That the matter had been opened; first, concerning the doings of the Scottish queen, whom he thought, living and dead, was ordained to disturb and trouble the State of England. Then concerning Mr. Davison's Offence, Albeit, said he, that which is done could be wished to be otherwise done, yet none, I hope, could wish it were undone; whatsoever he did, in my opinion, said he, he did it in the superabundant zeal of Religion unto her majesty, and love to the Commonwealth. These be great arguments, said he, and yet no excuse: for modus non factum efficit culpam; although the act were good, yet can I not excuse him in the circumstance; howbeit, said he, the mercy in the Prince in deferring it was severe; for there is a severe mercy, as well as a merciful severity: for, it is written, 'He slew Og the king of Basan, for his mercy endureth for ever.' Yet, said he, mercy in a Prince is not to be restrained; and therefore, because the example may be dangerous hereafter, that counsellors may presume to do without the commandment of the Prince, which is a mischief more intolerable than an inconvenience; therefore I agree to that punishment which is before agreed.

Last of all spake Wraye, Chief Justice, who shewed the Cause, and said farther, That to every Contempt a commandment was not necessary, which in my opinion was needful to be proved; for, said he, the bishop of Winchester came to the Parliament, and afterwards departed without licence, and therefore had a grievous Fine set upon him. Myself, said he, am a Justice of the King's-Bench; in the Term we hear of matters of Treason, by the reason of our office; and out of the Term, by Commission of Oyer and Terminer associate with others: if, said he, a Commission should be directed unto me and others of Oyer and Terminer for a matter of Treason, and we should arraign the person, and arjudge him to die, yet would I not put him to execution; and yet the Commission is to hear and determine. Surely, I think you meant well, and it was bonum, but not bene. Finally, he agreed the punishment should be as it was first of all assessed. But farther, said he, I must tell you, that for so much as the fault is yours, it declares her majesty's sincerity, and not privily in this action, and that she is offended therewithal. Farther, my lords, I must signify unto you from her majesty, that forasmuch as the Lords of the Council were abused by Mr. Davison's relation, in telling them she was pleased, and that which they did was for her safety, upon his wrong information, the lords be sorrowful because they were abused by him; therefore her majesty imputeth no fault to any of the counsellors, but only to him; and the rest she doth disburthen of all blame.

This said, Mr. Davison craved leave to demand one Question, and make one Petition. For your Question, said Wraye, I think it was never the order in this Court, after the matter is heard judicially, to answer any Question, (which sir Walter Mildmay affirmed;) but for your Petition you may speak. Truly, my lords, said Davison, my Question shall be such as in your own conscience shall seem reasonable. Whereat they neither gave him leave nor denied him.—Whereupon Davison said, If this Warrant, being signed and sealed, and left with me, and wanting nothing but execution, it should have fortun'd her majesty should have miscarried, whether then—Nay, said Wraye and Mildmay, now you enter into that which is discussed already: yea, said Manwood, that Question was moved by my lord Gray.

Well then, said Davison, I will not seek for present enlargement of my liberty, nor release of my Imprisonment, although my body be not well able to endure it; only let your honours clear me, I beseech you, of all blemish of dishonesty, and be mediators for me, that I remain not in her majesty's disfavour and disgrace: for I protest I shall be contented with any condition and state of life whatsoever, if I may have her majesty's favour.

Whereunto the Lords universally answered, he spake like a good subject. And so the Court arose.*

* "Davison thus excused himself in an apologetical Discourse of his to Walsingham: 'The Queen,' says he, 'after the departure of the French and Scottish ambassadors, of her own motion, commanded me to deliver her the Warrant for executing the Sentence against the Queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, she signed it readily with her own hand: when she had so done, she commanded it to be sealed with the Great Seal of England; and in jesting manner said, Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick, although I fear he will die for sorrow when he hears it. She added also the reasons of her deferring it so long, namely, lest she might seem to have been violently or maliciously drawn thereto; whereas in the mean time she was not ignorant how necessary it was: moreover, she blamed Pawlet and Drury, that they had not eased her of this care, and wished that Walsingham would feel their pulses touching this matter. The next day after it was under the Great Seal, she commanded me, by Killigrew, that it should not be done: and when I had informed her that it was done already, she found fault with such great haste; telling me, that in the judgment of some wise men, another course might be taken. I answered, that that course was always best and safest which was most just. But fearing lest she would lay the fault upon me, (as she had laid the putting of the duke of Norfolk to death upon the lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, protesting that I would not plunge myself any deeper in so great a business. He presently imparted it to the lord Burleigh, and the lord Burleigh to the rest of the council, who all consented to have the ' Execution hastened, and every one of them ' vowed to bear an equal share in the blame, ' and sent Beale away with the Warrant and ' Letters. The third day after, when by a ' dream she was told of the queen of Scots' ' Death, I perceived that she wavered in her ' resolution; I asked her, whether she had ' changed her mind? She answered, No: but ' another course, said she, might have been devised. And withal she asked me, whether I ' had received any Answer from Pawlet? Whose ' Letter when I had shewed her, wherein he ' flatly refused to undertake that which stood ' not with honour and justice; she waxing angry, accused him and others (who had bound themselves by the Association) of perjury and breach of their vow, as those that had promised great matters for their prince's safety, but would perform nothing; yet there are, said she, who will do it for my sake. But I shewed her how dishonourable and unjust a thing this would be; and withal into how great danger she would bring Pawlet and Drury by it: for if she approved the fact, she would draw upon herself both danger and dishonour, not without censure of injustice: and if she disallowed it, she would utterly undo men of great desert, and their whole posterity. And afterwards she gave me a light check the same day that the Queen of Scots was executed, because she was not yet put to death.'" Camden's Eliz. in 2 Kennet, 538.

Freebairn, in his Life of Mary queen of Scots, p. 269, says, "Queen Elizabeth sent orders to Pawlet, on whose obedience she could reckon with certainty, for committing of any act of barbarity to make away with his prisoner, the

THE Proceedings against Mr. Davison in the Star Chamber, by Commission not read, but directed to these thirteen following :

Queen of Scots; and pp. 270, 271 and 272, inserts a Letter from Walsingham and Davison (her two secretaries) to sir Amyas Pawlet, with his Answer, which were found among sir Amyas Pawlet's Papers; a Copy of which transcribed from the Originals, were sent to Dr. Mackenzie, by Mr. John Urry, of Christ-Church College, Oxford.

The Letter wrote to Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury.

' After our hearty commendations, we find by a speech lately made by her majesty, That she doth note in you both a lack of that care and zeal for her service, that she looketh for at your hands, in that you have not in all this time (of yourselves without other provocation) found out some way to shorten the life of the Scots queen, considering the great peril she is hourly subject to, so long as the said queen should live; wherein, besides a kind of lack of love towards her, she wonders greatly that you have not that care of your own particular safeties, or rather the preservation of religion, and the public good and prosperity of your countries, that reason and policy commandeth; especially, having so good a warrant and ground for the satisfaction of your consciences toward God, and the discharge of your credit and reputation towards the world as the oath of association, which you both have so solemnly taken and vowed; especially the matter wherewith she standeth charged, being so clearly and manifestly proved against her: and therefore she taketh it most unkindly, that men professing that love towards her that you do, should in a kind of sort for lack of the discharge of your duties, cast the burden upon her, knowing, as you do, her indisposition to shed blood; especially, of one of that sex and quality, and so near to her in blood as the said queen is. These respects, we find, do greatly trouble her majesty; who, we assure you, hath sundry times protested, that if the regard of the danger of her good subjects, and faithful servants, did not more move her than her own peril, she would never be drawn to assent to the shedding of her blood. We thought it meet to acquaint you with these speeches lately passed from her majesty, referring the same to your good judgments: and so we commit you to the protection of the Almighty.

' Your most assured friends, FRA. WALSHINGHAM, WILL. DAVISON.' London, February the 1st, 1586.

Directed thus :

To the Right Honourable Sir Amias Pawlet, knight, one of her Majesty's Privy-Council :

This Letter was received at Fotheringay the 2nd of Feb. at five in the afternoon; and, in another Letter from Mr. Davison, of the 1st of Feb. to sir Amias, he says, ' I pray you let both this and the inclosed be committed to the fire, which measure shall be likewise met to your Answer, after it hath been communicated to her majesty for her satisfaction.' And in a Postscript of another Letter from Mr. Davison to him, dated the 3rd of Feb. 1586, he says, ' I intreated you in my last Letters, to burn both the Letters sent you for the argument's sake; which by your Answer to Mr. Secretary (which I have seen) appeareth not to be done; I pray you let me intreat to make Heretics of the one and the other, as I mean to use yours after her majesty hath seen it.' And in the end of the Postscript, ' I pray you let me know what you have done with my Letter: because they are not to be kept, that I may satisfy her majesty therein, who might otherwise take offence thereat; and if you treat this Postscript in the same kind, I shall care not a whit.' But it seems none of them observed this; for amongst the same Papers, is the following Letter to sir Francis Walsingham :

' Sir; Your Letters of yesterday coming to my hands this present day, at 5 p. m. I would not fail, according to your direction, to return my answer with all possible speed; which I shall deliver unto you with great grief and bitterness of mind, in that I am so unhappy, as living to see this unhappy day, in which I am required by direction from my most gracious sovereign, to do an act which God and the law forbiddeth. My goods and life are at her majesty's disposition, and I am ready to lose the next morrow, if it shall please her; acknowledging, that I do hold them as of her meer and most gracious favour, and do not design to enjoy them but with her highness's good liking: but God forbid I should make so foul a shipwreck of my conscience, or leave so great a blot on my poor posterity, and shed blood without law or war-

The Sum of that which was proposed, and enforced against him by her majesty's Counsellors at the law.

The Matter laid against him is a great and heinous indignity, as her majesty taketh it, committed by him in this last Proceeding against the late Scottish queen, which although it were in itself most just and honourable, yet in the manner of dealing concerning it, Mr. Davison is charged by her majesty with want of duty, &c. For whereas by the manifold defects of the said queen, and that in the judgment of all the realm in parliament her life was now to satisfy the law, and thus necessary for the preservation of the whole realm, as was shewed; yet her majesty, of her natural most gracious and merciful disposition, after the so honourable condition and proclamation of the S. queen's guiltiness, notwithstanding so many important allegations and vehement intercessions, could not be brought to condescend to the Execution; rather desiring by all means possible, if there were any hope of amendment and reclaim, to spare where she might honourably spare; and in this mind she continued from October to the end of January. But when she saw that her malicious enemies daily increased their wicked attempts against her and the state, that rumours were spread and information given daily of attempts by invasion, by rebellions, by violence upon her royal person, to work a change and delivery of the said queen, she most wisely resolved at length to have a Bill or Instrument, signed according to law and justice, in a readiness; whereby upon all occasions or occurrences, she might be executed: and this of special choice and trust, she thought good to commit to Mr. Davison, willing him to carry it to the Lord Chancellor, to have it under the broad-seal, but withal charged him to keep it very secret, and not to make any acquainted with it. The very same day he carried it to the seal, and the next day after having received charge from her majesty, by the Lord-Admiral, that stay should be made, if it was not sealed; but he declared it was sealed the day before, &c. whereto the Queen replied, What needs that haste? The next day after this, (which was, I think, on Candlemas-day) my Lord Treasurer asked him, If he knew what mind the queen had towards the Execution? He answered, To have it go forward; and so shewed it to him, and after to the rest of the council, procuring their Warrant down to present execution, the queen having not notice nor knowledge of this; and after, when she conferred with him about another course to be taken, he concealed from her what had been done therein. These chief matters were proved by his own Confession in an Examination before taken and urged against him, both in respect of himself being bound to especial obedience, not only as a subject, but as a servant, a counsellor, a secretary so much trusted, and yet not to keep secret, where special charge was given him; and in respect of the queen, so good and gracious a prince, so well deserving of him, the fountain and head of all justice and authority amongst us, and yet not to be made privy of the doing of such an act of so great a quality and importance as that was, wherein she had shewed herself always, (and that most apparently) wherof Mr. Davison could not be ignorant, both backward and unwilling to yield to that which all her realm desired and sued for at her hands; yet Mr. Davison, contrary to her known mind, procured with such haste (of what good purpose in himself, this would not regard); but with apparent want of duty to his sovereign, which did more appear in his concealing his proceedings when she purposely talked with him of that matter as aforesaid; all which they left to the Counsellors to judge of.

'rant; trusting, that her majesty, of her accustomed clemency, and the rather by your good mediation, will take this my answer in good part, as proceeding from one who never will be inferior to any Christian subject, living in honour, love and obedience towards his sovereign; and thus I commit you to the mercy of the Almighty. Your most assured poor friend, A. PAWLET. From Fotheringay the 2nd of February, 1586.'

P. S. Your Letters coming in the plural number, seem to be meant to sir Drew Drury, as to myself; and yet because he is not named in them, neither the Letter directed unto him; he forbearth to make any particular answer, but subscribeth in heart to my opinion.

D. DRURY.

* In the above Trial, called Croft. But in the Trial of the earl of Arundel, A. D. 1589, he called A-Crofts. See No. 66.

Notwithstanding at the bar, whither he was brought by his Keeper, sir Owen Hopton, being faint by reason of his late sickness, and carrying his left arm in a scarf, benumbed I think by his late taken palsy, he spake somewhat faintly, unadvisedly; though being required by his Commissioners to speak higher, yet desired favour to speak as he could, which was to this effect: First, protesting that he was not guilty to himself of any wilful disloyalty, or breach of duty, but that he did always since his first employment in her majesty's service, endeavour to bear himself most serviceable and unblameable; and he took therein her majesty's own self and God to witness; confessing also, that his skill and experience was not yet great in this latter kind of service, whereto he was without his suit and above his expectation called; and for the matter protesting also, that he would not for any danger, nor present death, in justifying himself, disclose any private speech or commandment that passed betwixt her majesty and him; nor would he by any means enter into any affirmation or avowing, which could not stand with his dutiful regard to her majesty's honour, &c. but would admit all that against him: and farther, that he would not in any part disclaim my Lord Treasurer's Reports or testimony against him. But to the matters, he answered, first, That he was sorry that a fact of that importance and necessity, so honourable and profitable for the Commonwealth, should be so heavily taken against him; wherein he might take it on his soul, that he did nothing but that which in his understanding might be agreeable to her mind, neither did he otherwise conceive of her meaning and purpose; and that upon these inducements:—First, the consideration of the thing itself, so just, so necessary, so honourable, so vehemently sued for by the whole realm. Secondly, in consideration of her majesty, so gracious and wise a prince, so loving and careful of her subjects and commonwealth; and more strongly in consideration of her words, which she used at the first delivery of the Bill, 'Now you have it, let me be troubled no more with it.' Besides the sufficiency and perfectment of the said Instruments for the said purpose, which was had by her directions, viz. as under the Great-Seal, all which were in his understanding proof enough what her meaning was, neither was there any apparent and direct countermand, without the which he took that instrument to be irrevocable. For the charge of secrecy, he conceived her meaning was, that it should be kept from the common and public knowledge only; for she being a prince so wise, did in his judgment consider what violent attempts the favourites of the S. queen might by likelihood offer in that desperate plunge, if it should be known that such a Warrant was signed for her execution, and not from her Council. For her majesty's self after willed in his way to the Lord Chancellor, to impart it to sir Francis Walsingham, that then lay sick at his house at London; herself made my Lord-Admiral privy to it, in sending him to stay the seal ut supra, and my Lord Chancellor by sealing must needs have some knowledge of it; and then why should he think the Council should not know it, being Privy Counsellors and Counsellors of Estate, if he imparted it to none but to my Lord Treasurer, and he to the rest, and that excusably in regard of the great credit and trust that her majesty usually reposeth in my Lord Treasurer for matter of greatest moment and weight. Secondly, for sending down the Warrant, he did it not without the opinion of the Council, and therefore no presumption in him; and in his own judgment, he had sufficient warrant so to do by the first delivery of it from the queen herself. Then considering the troublesome rumours that were then abroad, and that information came daily from Ireland and Wales of forces of people in arms, and the report scattered abroad that Fotheringay-Castle was broken, the prisoners gone, that London was fired, and her majesty made away, amongst these terrors what should I do? Did I not that which any honest man and good subject would do in such a case? Further, it is not custom in court that particularities should trouble her majesty in the execution of any such bills: but when she hath given, by her royal assent, warrant, authority and life to it, the rest for the manner and means of execution is left to the council; and for all other circumstances of time, when; of place, where; of persons, by whom; especially in this cause when her majesty had said expressly that she would not be troubled any more with it. Thirdly, for the not imparting of it to her upon her communication with him, &c. 'I had it by me five or six weeks before she spake any thing more of it, and was very unwilling to trouble her any more with it, especially remembering her words.'

This was the effect of his Defence, not uttered continually, as I have set it down, but inter-ruptly to the particulars as they were objected, in much more forcibly large and choice terms; but I think that I have not left out anything of weight. After this, the Commissioners began to speak judicially unto the matter, whose Speeches I will by way of abridgement note, where any thing was spoken different from others, and especially notable; for most of them had the same beginning of the Scottish queen's demerits, &c.

1. The first that spoke was Sir Walter Mildmay.—He handled eloquently the great causes the Queen had to deal severely with the Scottish queen, and the importance of the Parliament thereto, and her majesty's patience in forbearing, her wisdom in being willing, her natural and accustomable clemency in being slow; and compared her slackness with Mr. Davison's haste, though he knew her mind herein very well. Then he shewed, that such things might not in any wise be extorted from princes, and that persuasions and entreaties are the uttermost that subjects can offer; for the prince's heart is in God's hand to dispose of. As for the Council, it is known that no prince's counsellors are farther made privy to any thing, than that it pleaseth the prince, and oftentimes that is imparted to one that is concealed from another with great cause; and therefore you should not presume farther than you had express leave, much less to have been an encouragement to the rest to proceed therein upon your own opinion, howsoever your desire was for the end good and honest, especially seeing there hath not been the like example. So he concluded that the punishment should not be in regard to the man's ability, but to the quantity of the crime committed; (by his judgment) ten thousand marks, and imprisonment during her majesty's pleasure. To which all after agreed.

2. Sir Roger Manwood, Lord Chief Baron.—The second, shewed at large the Scottish Queen's perpetual evil mind to our queen, to bereave her of her crown in her life-time, as her usurping the Arms and Sile of England in possession, when she was first (out of the shell) married into France, her dissembling of it in her widowhood, by laying the fault upon her late husband, and yet then seeking to be proclaimed heir apparent in the life of her eldest sister, (for she never called her dear sister) which was a dangerous step to her purpose. After, in her second marriage, her bloodiness in consenting to her husband's murder, and upon that, flight and deprivation; her protection here by our queen not only in life, but in honour; yet her assenting to the purposes of the duke of Norfolk; and yet after that, though then our queen would not suffer her for that to be touched, nor any way disabled, as many would have had her, not only agreeing to traitorous plots, but also complotting with them, and therein going beyond them all, so as we could never be in quiet, but we had a Somerville, and then an Alden, then a Throckmorton, then a Parry, and now lately Abington and Babington; her majesty at length was forced to use a little severity with her accustomed mercy, and one ounce of one with ten of the other. For even in this proceeding against her, she might have been by the statute of Edw. 3, by a Jury of esquires and gentlemen, attainted and burned, and her blood corrupt; yet her majesty did chuse by a new order to deal more honourably with her. Then he came to this fact of Mr. Davison's, which he amplified by the consideration of her majesty's mind in all this, proceeding as the other did before: the thing he took to be Misprision and Contempt in our law, punishable by fine and imprisonment; and he said, that Misprision and Contempt is to do any thing contrary to, or besides the prince's commandment in point of Justice, not in other things; as Justices of Westminster to sit out of Term, to raze Indictments or Records; and so he gave other examples, as in the Ministers of the Law, viz. Sheriffs to execute their offices, to return knights to the Parliament without their Oaths. So this thing then being so high a point of justice, was not in any respect to be done otherwise than her majesty's express commandment would bear, especially not with such haste, when she expressly declared her mind to the contrary; wherein Mr. Davison may seem by this haste, if her majesty had any other purpose, to have prevented her, and God might otherwise have turned her mind; for it is not strange to hear of mutation in her majesty in respect of this, as in the Execution of the duke of Norfolk, day and day was appointed, and often her majesty declared her unwillingness and lothfulness to have put him to death, if otherwise the law might have been satisfied. The commandment to impart it to sir Francis Walsingham in especiality, was an excluding the rest in generality; and farther, what he told my Lord Treasurer could not be gathered of her majesty's words, but rather the contrary; and the instrument was not so peremptory and irrevocable as he took it, nor a sufficient Warrant for any kind of proceeding against the Scottish Queen, neither for the associates, nor for any other:

for the last Statute, besides the condition and Proclamation, doth require the queen's direction, and that must be either general, that all men may do it, which is not here granted; or particular, who, or by what means: neither is there here any such, especially her majesty having no knowledge of the thing done. Further, she was the Queen's prisoner, and therefore no man might pretend to take her away, or deliver her without special privity from the queen: and lastly, he shewed, that the good intent was no warrant to transgress duty; whereof he put a case or two, as where Judgment of death is given against one, and the Sheriff, for that he is a notorious thief or traitor, will hang him presently, before the Justices depart out of town.

3. Lord Anderson.—He noted a difference in law between Misprision and Contempt, that one was larger than the other, and both in point of justice, and might be when the Warrant of a Justice, or a Commissioner's Letter in such matters is not directly and straitly observed; and urged, that a Secretary should be secret, and that it was his duty to have an express commandment.

4. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Master of the Rolls.—He handled the same matter that before is spoken by others, but somewhat otherwise.

5. Sir James A-Croft.—He shewed his mind indifferently, with protestations of his good-will and good opinion of the man; that it was a rare example, and committed, as he thought, for want of experience more than for want of duty.

6. Lord Lumley.—He was somewhat sharp. Such Commissions of execution are sent to Sheriffs; you no sheriff, ought to be very particular for such great personages; you had no more Commission than I, &c. and of likelihood you have hereby prevented other good purposes, which God might have put into her majesty's mind, and herein you have seduced so many grave Counsellors, &c. If you were my brother, I would think ten times so much to be little enough, &c.

7. Lord Gray.—He proposed very vehemently the great exigence the good gentleman was in at that time: My good lords, consider, quoth he, and call to mind in what case we were daily, there came advertisement of forces come and arrived in Ireland, in Wales, advertisements from abroad, from our provinces at home, even within 15 miles of this City, of rising, firing, breaking up holders, yea of the destruction of her majesty's royal person: if otherwise than well had come to her majesty's royal person, which of us would not have run to him, and torn him with our hands? My lords, why should Davison be more zealous and forward for his prince than we? After he replied to that of my Lord Chief Baron, that the telling of sir Francis Walsingham did not exclude the rest, as he proved, but rather implied and presupposed that the rest should know it: for without this especial information, he being sick in his house, and so absent from the Court, could not in any due time have knowledge of it. After he agreed to the Punishments but wished that her majesty should have compassion on him to encourage others that were zealous to deserve well of her and the state, and so he ended.—Vulgique secutum ultima marmor erat.

8. Earl of Lincoln said little to the purpose.

9. Earl of Cumberland was very short.

10. Earl of Worcester was short, and as before.

11. Archbishop of York discoursed theologically of the necessity and worthiness of the virtue of obedience, even strictly to princes in all things: and that non faciendum malum ut inde veniat bonum, adding the difference between bonum and bene, (as before my Lord Chief Justice of justum and juste, which I forgot afore to relate) and good intents do not make the fact excusable, and that he ought to have a direct, express, and iterated command; where-to he cited a Rule out of Civil Law, (wherein he said he was so sound and conversant) to this purpose, If the Prince commanded aliquid magnam de libera, tenta si persistat, et habe secundam jussionem: he concluded, he did agree to the punishment, but was sorry that Mr. Davison, of whom he had heard so well, should fall into this cause, he could not help it; a wiser man might have been led with zeal, and none of us would have it undone.

12. Archbishop of Canterbury, having said first somewhat of her who troubled us all both alive and dead, and theologically of misericordia puniens, as out of the Psalm, where God plagueth the enemy of his Church, 'for his mercy endureth for ever;' for this present matter, he said, non factum, sed modus, was in question, a thing done, as he thought, unfeignedly of zeal, and that which might have been better done in consideration of her majesty's purpose to forbear her death, which could not be unknown to Mr. Davison; for such things are by no means to be wrested from princes, God will extraordinarily move their hearts, and when it shall be most for his glory. This example he said, might be dangerous and inconvenient hereafter; and therefore he concluded it rather a mischief than an inconvenience, and so agreed to the punishment.

13. L. C. J. Wraye as chief, concluded the matter, and pronounced Judgment judicially upon the grounds alledged before of others, which he enforced, &c. And after, as from her majesty, spake somewhat to justify her proceedings in all these matters, and to declare that she did not for this impute any fault to her Council, for that they were misled by this man's undue suggestions.

Mr. Davison submitted himself to the judgment of the queen's mercy, and requested that he might propose a question, which he took upon his credit to be such as they would not dislike, and therefore he had leave; and a request. His question was, If this being in my hands, her majesty had miscarried, what should have become of me? To this, sir Walter Mildmay and my Lord Chief-Baron answered, that my lord Gray had moved it already. His request was not for mitigation of his Fine, nor for enlargement of Prison, although he could never in all his life worse bear it than now; much less for his former estate: than only that he might with her majesty's favour enjoy any condition whatsoever, requesting them to be intercessors for this. Nothing to this was said, but they arose and departed.

These I am sure are the principal matters by any of them uttered, so far as by myself, or by my conference I could recal to mind.

66. The Trial of PHILIP HOWARD, Earl of ARUNDEL, before the Lords, for High Treason: 31 ELIZ. 18th of April, A. D. 1589.*

FROM the outward Bar in the King's-Bench, there was a Court, made of 30 foot square, within which was a table of 12 foot square, covered with green cloth; and in the same Court were benches to sit upon, covered with green say. In the midst of the same Court, at the upper end, was placed a cloth of state, with a Chair and Cushion for the Lord Steward: from the midst of the same Court, to the midst of the hall, was built a Gallery for the Prisoner to come upon to the Court, in length 110 foot, and in breadth 15 foot, and in height from the ground 6 foot, railed round about, and going down with seven steps.—Between eight and nine of the clock in the morning, the earl of Derby, Lord Steward his grace, entered the Hall, attended by divers noblemen and officers, four Serjeants at arms, with their maces, waiting before him; next before his grace the earl of Oxford, Lord Great-Chamberlain of England. My lord of Derby's grace being seated in his chair of state, every nobleman was placed in his degree, by Garter king of Heraults. At his grace's feet did sit Mr. Winckfield, one of her majesty's Gentlemen Ushers, holding a long white wand in his hand, being accompanied with Mr. Norris, serjeant of the Garter. Before them did sit Mr. Sandes, the Clerk of the Crown of the King's-Bench.

Opposite against my lord's grace did sit the queen's learned Counsel, viz. 1. Serjeant Puckering. 2. Serjeant Shettleworth. 3. Mr. Popham the Queen's Attorney-General. 4. Mr. Egerton, the Queen's Solicitor.

The Names of the Commissioners on the Right-Hand sitting upon a lower Bench, under the Lords of the Jury. 1. Sir Francis Knowles, kt. Treasurer of the Household. 2. Sir James a Crofts kt. Comptroller of the Household. 3. Sir John Parrat, one of her majesty's most honourable Privy-Council. 4. Mr. Wolley, Secretary of the Latin tongue, of the Privy-Council. 5. John Fortescue, Master of the Wardrobe, and of the Privy-Council. 6. Dr. Dale, one of the Masters of Request to her majesty. 7. W. Fleetwood, Serjeant at Law, and Recorder of London. 8. Mr. Rockby, Master of Requests, and Master of St. Catherine's.

The Names of the Commissioners on the Left-Hand. 9. The Lord Chief Justice of England, sir Christopher Wray. 10. The master of the Rolls, sir Gilbert Gerrard. 11. The Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, Edmund Anderson. 12. The Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Roger Manwood. 13. Justice of the Common-Pleas, William Periam. 14. Justice Gawdy, of the King's-Bench. The Serjeant at arms, usually attending on the Lord Chancellor, named Roger Wood, was commanded to make an O Yes three times. Then Mr. Sandes, Clerk of the Crown, read the Commission. And sir Francis Knowles, kt. gave up the Verdict of the great Assize. Then was called Matthew Spencer, Serjeant at Arms, to return his Precept; which was returned and read.

After that the noblemen and peers of the Jury, for his Trial, were severally called by their names, as followeth: 1. William lord Burleigh, Lord Treasurer of England. 2. Edward earl of Oxford, Lord Great Chamberlain of England. 3. William lord marquis of Winchester. 4. Henry earl of Kent. 5. Henry earl of Sussex. 6. Henry earl of Pembroke. 7. Edward earl of Hereford. 8. Henry earl of Lincoln. 9. Henry lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain of her majesty's Household. 10. Peregrine Lord Willoughby of Eresby. 11. Lord Morley. 12. Lord Cobham. 13. Arthur lord Grey. 14. Lord Darcy, of the North. 15. Lord Sandes. 16. Lord Wentworth. 17. Lord Willoughby of Parham. 18. Lord North. 19. Lord Rich. 20. Lord St. John of Bletsho. 21. Lord Buckhurst. 22. Lord De la Ware. 23. Lord Norris.

Then the Lieutenant of the Tower was called to return his Precept, and to bring forth his Prisoner, Philip earl of Arundel. The earl came into the Hall, being in a wrought velvet gown, furred about with martins, laid about with gold lace and buttoned with gold buttons, a black sattin doublet, a pair of velvet hose, and a long high black hat on his head; a very tall man looking somewhat swarth-coloured. Then was the earl brought to the Bar, with the ax carried before him by Mr. Shelton, gent. porter of the Tower, being accompanied with sir Owen Hopton, kt. lieutenant of the Tower, sir Drew Drury, constable of the Tower for the time, Mr. Heury Bronkard, and others. At my lord of Arundel's coming to the Bar, he made two obeysances to the state, and to the nobles, and others there present. Then did Mr. Sandes, Clerk of the Crown, say he was indicted of several Treasons, and said unto him, 'Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, late of Arundel in the county of Sussex, hold up thy hand.' He held up his hand very high, saying, 'Here is as true a man's heart and hand, as ever came into this Hall.'

Mr. Sandes then read the INDICTMENT:

"That whereas divers traitorous persons, in the parts beyond the seas, being natural English-men, viz. Dr. Allen, Parsons, Champion, Mott, and divers others, have hitherto, divers and sundry times, with sundry persons, as well Englishmen as of other countries, practised to accomplish and bring to pass several dangerous and unnatural Treasons against the queen's majesty, her royal person, crown and dignity, viz. to subvert the state, invade the realm, to set up catholic Religion, to raise insurrections, &c. among which number of unnatural Traitors the earl of Arundel was well acquainted with that notorious Traitor Dr. Allen, by means of Bridges, Weston, Ithill, and other popish priests, with whom, divers times, sithence the 20th year of her majesty's reign, he hath had private and secret conference, and communication of several treasons; insomuch, that the earl of Arundel did presently dispatch his several Letters by Bridges aforesaid, to Dr. Allen, to wish him at any hand to do something concerning the Cause Catholick; wherein he promised to perform any thing that Dr. Allen should think fit for him to do. And whereas, the 24th day of April, in the 27th year of the queen's reign, he was flying by sea to Dr. Allen, that arch-traitor; and that the bishop of Rome, and the king of Spain, were thereupon solicited by Allen aforesaid, to raise war against this realm: And whereas also the earl of Arundel had understanding of a Bull, that Sextus the fifth, pope of that name, had sent into England for the Excommunication of her majesty, and for the invading of the realm, &c. And that at the Tower, the 21st of July, in the 30th year of her majesty's reign, he did imagine, with other traitorous persons, that the queen was an Heretic, and not worthy to govern the realm; and that he did move and procure one William Bennett, a seminary priest, to say mass for the happy success of the Spanish Fleet; whereupon he had mass, and did help to say mass himself, to that purpose: And having news of the conflict at sea betwixt the Spanish fleet and the English, he procured sir Thomas Gerrard, and divers others, then prisoners in the Tower, to say mass with him for the fortunate success of Spain: and that he made a prayer specially for that purpose to be daily used and exercised amongst them."

Hereupon Mr. Sandes asked the earl of Arundel, if he were Guilty, or not Guilty of the several Treasons comprised in the said Indictment? To this the Earl answered, he would fain know, whether the several Points in the Indictment contained were but one Indictment, yea or no? The Judges satisfied him, it was but one Indictment, and a matter he need not stand upon.

He desired to know, if they could proceed against him for the Treasons in the statute of 13 Eliz. after the six months were expired; to this he was answered, That they did not proceed against him on that statute, but on the 25th Edw. 3. After this, being called upon to plead, he pleaded Not Guilty; and said, he was well contented to be tried by his peers, and liked the Trial well, that he should be tried by such good noblemen there present, that knew his life: He said, he had been prisoner four years, and twenty-five weeks close prisoner, and that he had been sick and weak, whereby his memory might fail him; and therefore humbly desired my Lord Steward's grace, making three several obeysances on both knees, that he might be heard to make answer to every particular point.

My Lord Steward answered, that there was no other meaning nor intent, and that he should be heard deliberately.

Then did Mr. Serjeant Puckering deliver to the Lords of the Jury, the effect of the Indictment, and other Evidence at large as followeth:

First, that my lord had private and secret Conference with Bridges aforesaid, and divers other Traitors and Seminary priests; and that he had written his Letters to Dr. Allen, to find which way he might further the cause catholic. That he did fast twenty-four hours, and prayed for the happy success of the Spanish fleet. That Allen and others, being arrant Traitors, had taken order, that in the 22d year of her majesty's reign, there should be 50 men in privy coats, and pocket-daggers, to kill the queen; and that one Pain, and one Elliot, were put in trust to perform the same. That my lord was a catholic, and favoured their proceedings.

My Lord answered, He was no Catholic in the 22d year of the queen's reign.

That he secretly was flying out of the realm to Dr. Allen, being an Arch-Traitor; which doth argue my lord to be no good subject. That Throckmorton practising his Treasons by sounding the ports, he did set down in his Catalogue, that a South-west wind would serve from Spain to Arundel-castle in Sussex, and an easterly wind from the Low-countries. That in Throckmorton's Catalogue of all the names of all the noblemen and gentlemen of every shire that affecteth the Catholics; he began in Sussex, and set down the earl of Arundel's name the first. That further, one Mott a priest informed Throckmorton, that he was come over to sound the intents of the earls of Arundel and Northumberland, and others.

My Lord answered, when Mott was in Sussex, he never came there, but always attended at Court.

Mr. Puckering said, the Traitors have a good conceit of my lord of Arundel, in knowing him to be affected to the Catholic cause. It was defined, that the Catholic cause was mere Treason. Petro Paulo Rosetto came over to sound noblemen and gentlemen in England.

Then said my Lord, How prove you me to be a Traitor in these points?

Because, said Mr. Popham, you have confederated with Traitors by desiring Dr. Allen in your Letters to employ you any way, that concerned the cause Catholic: because you have been reconciled to the pope; and there was a law made in the 22d year of this queen, That whosoever was reconciled to the pope from the obedience of the queen's majesty, was in case of Treason.

My Lord confessed, That Bridges did confess him, but not reconcile him in any such sort, but only for Absolution of his sins.

Mr. Popham charged him, That he did once submit himself, but sithence fell from his Submission, and therefore practised new Treasons.

He confessed he was acquainted with the priests, and by two of them had been absolved and confessed.

Sithence which time, said Mr. Popham, he came to the church, and fell to the Catholic Cause again, which he cannot do by their order, unless he be reconciled.

My Lord denied, that ever he came to the church after that time.

There was a Letter sent to the queen of Scots by Morgan of France in commendation of two priests, wherein he saith, one of them had reconciled the earl of Arundel.

Edmonds a priest upon Examination, said, that Reconciliation was odious.

My Lord said, These be but allegations and circumstances, and that they ought to be proved by two Witnesses.

It was justified, he said, once in the Star-Chamber amongst the lords there assembled concerning a Libel there in question, That whosoever was a priest or papist was an arrant Traitor.

Mr. Popham said, it was a Discontentment made my lord a Catholic, and not Religion; and that he did disguise himself in shadow of Religion.

There was a Picture shewed, that was found in my lord's trunk, wherein was painted a hand bitten with a serpent shaking the serpent into the fire, about which was written this poesy, Quis contra nos? On the other side was painted a lion rampant, with his chops all bloody, with this poesy, Tamen Leo. My lord said, one Wilgrave's man gave him the same, with a pair of hangers for a New-year's gift.—One Jonas Meredith being examined, about his communication with a town's-man who commended my lord of Arundel for his forwardness, in that he had often observed my lord at Paul's Cross: this Jonas answered, that he knew he had often been at Paul's Cross in the forenoon, and hath heard a mass with him at the Charter-house, in the afternoon. To this my lord said nothing, but seemed to deny it. My lord being examined in the Tower, of his sudden going away to sea, he answered, To serve the prince of Parma, or whither Dr. Allen should direct him for the Cause-Catholic.

My lord said also, he was going away for fear some statute should be made in the 22d of this queen's reign against the Catholics in that parliament; and that Dr. Allen advised him that he should not go over, if he could tarry here in any safety, because he might be the better able to make a party in England, when they came.—Before my lord's going to sea, he wrote a Letter to be given to the queen after he was gone, wherein he found fault with her hard dealing in giving countenance to his adversaries, and in disgracing him; and that he was discontented with the injustice of the realm towards his great grandfather, his grandfather, and his father. My lord said, Holinshed* was faulty, for setting forth in his Chronicle, that his grandfather was attainted by act of parliament, but shewed no cause wherefore. He said in his Letter, his grandfather was condemned for such trifles, that the people standing by were amazed at it: he found fault also with the proceedings against his father.—Whereby it is apparent, said Mr. Popham, it was Discontentment moved my lord, and not Religion; and fearing lest his friends should think amiss of him, he left a copy of his Letter with Bridges a Traitor to be dispersed, to make the Catholics to think well of him; for, said Mr. Popham, being discontented he became a Catholic, and being so great a man he became a captain of the catholics, which is as much as to be a captain over Traitors. A counterfeit Letter was made 22 days before his going to sea, directed to one Baker at Lynn, there being no such man abiding; wherein was signified, that my lord was very hardily dealt withal by some of the council, and that he was gone into Sussex, and a farther voyage, and that he would come home by Norfolk. This was a counterfeit Letter, said Mr. Attorney, appointed by my lord to be dispersed, to make it known he was discontented. Also Allen sent a Letter to the queen of Scots in cyphers, shewing a great party in England. Allen sent my lord word, if he did come over, he must take a greater title than that of earl upon him, and therefore address my lord in this style, 'To Philip duke of Norfolk, earl of Arundel.' Balington in his Examination said, the queen of Scots sent him word that the earl of Arundel was a fit man to be a chief head for the Catholics. Allen sent word to Rome, that the bull which was last sent over into England, was at the intercession of a great man in England. My lord (said Mr. Popham) was one of the principallest, and acquainted thus far with Allen: Ergo, my lord of Arundel, that great man. Dr. Allen made a most villainous and slanderous Book, which was very hard to be got, in which was contained, That the earl of Arundel was a procurer of the last Bull, and the procurer of the Invasion also. The Bull itself was some part read, and the Book was part read also.—My lord being charged on his Confession, being examined, why he would be ruled thus by Dr. Allen, he excused it by saying, that he said he would be ruled by Allen in all things, saving in that did concern her majesty and the state; and thereupon appealed to my Lord Chancellor, and sir Walter Mildmay, who were not present. The Book aforesaid intended, that my lord was a practiser with Allen about the Invasion. Then said my lord, he would serve the queen against all princes, pope, or potentates whatsoever.

The Queen's Solicitor stood upon these Points; and because it was proved, that the earl of Arundel would be ruled by Allen in any thing that should concern the Catholic cause: And for that Dr. Allen hath since that time practised divers monstrous Treasons, and continually hath built upon the help of some chief man in England, there is none yet known of his degree, that hath any thing to do with Allen; and therefore my lord must needs be culpable of all the Treasons Allen hath practised and procured, in flying to Allen to serve the prince of Parma, ut antea.

My lord was charged with relieving of divers Traitors, as priests; and that he did converse, and was confederate, with divers and sundry Traitors attainted, indicted and suspected, being prisoners in the Tower, and that he had mass in the Tower; and that if the Spaniards should surprize the Tower, sir Owen Hopton should be put to the rack-house. He was also charged, That divers Papists, Seminars, and such like, being prisoners in Newgate, and other prisoners, reported, that they hoped to see the earl of Arundel king of England, and that cardinal Allen should direct the crown of England. Before the coming of the Spaniards Fleet, when our Commissioners were in the Low Countries, news was brought to the Tower, that we should have peace betwixt Spain and England; then would my lord of Arundel be pensive. When the Spanish Fleet was upon our coast, and news was brought to the Tower, that the Spaniards sped well, then the earl would be merry. Then when news came, the English Fleet sped well, the earl would be sorry. When news came, the Spanish Fleet was come upon the coast of Kent, my lord said, It is a great wood, and a puissant fleet, we shall have lusty play shortly, I hope we shall plague them that have plagued us. My Lord said, He would not fight against any that came to fight for the Catholic faith. He said, when the Spanish Fleet was at sea, he would have three masses a day for the happy success of Spain. He said also, He would have continual prayer without ceasing for a time, for the good success of Spain, viz. he would have every twenty-four hours five priests to pray two hours a-piece for the defect of laymen, and fourteen laymen to pray every one an hour a-piece for the happy and fortunate success of Spain. He made himself a special Prayer for that purpose, and caused copies in haste thereof to be made. Mr. Shelley, then Prisoner in the Tower, told my lord, That to exercise that Prayer were dangerous, and wished my lord to let it alone: therefore my lord called for the copy of the Prayer again, and would not have it copied. He was charged, That he did conjure sir Thomas Gerrard, knt. to keep counsel in all these matters before set down, who promised him, he would. Bennet also promised to keep his counsel, and divers others. Then were sir Thomas Gerrard, Mr. Shelley, Bennet the priest, and divers others, removed from the Tower to several other prisons, and upon examination confessed all as aforesaid.

My Lord hearing all these matters laid hard against him by Mr. Solicitor, grew into some agony, and called for his accusers face to face; which the learned counsel did not yet yield unto.

He was likewise charged, That he came once merrily to Bennet the priest in the Tower, saying, 'Come, Mr. Bennet, let us pray, that the Spaniards may beat down London-bridge;' and promised to give him a damask gown shortly, and that he hoped to make him dean of Paul's ere it were long: that the time of their delivery was at hand, and willed him in any wise to be secret, for, if he should reveal these things, he would deny them to his face.

When news came to the Tower, that the Spanish Fleet was driven away, my lord said, 'We are all undone; there is no hope for us this year, and the king of Spain cannot provide such a power again these five or six years, some of us may be dead and rotten ere that time.'

There were then brought into the Court, viz upon their several oaths, Anthony Hall, and Richard Young, a justice of the peace, who aimed something by hearsay to the Proof of the former matter. Also sir Thomas Gerrard, Wm. Bennet, Tucknon, Snoden, and Ithel, and divers others, were closely kept in a place over the King's-Bench, closed in with arras, and were thereupon severally called into the Court, viz upon their several oaths, to affirm that which is specified before: sithence Mr. Solicitor began to speak, how this Mark Bennet the priest was charged with a Letter written to my lord wherein he should be sorry for the opening of these matters as aforesaid against my lord. One Randal had writ this Letter in Bennet's name, by advice of my lord of Arundel, to blind his practices. Bennet openly denied the writing of that letter; whereupon my lord Grey and my lord Norris asked Bennet, if he knew of the Letter, yea, or no? For the better Evidence, Bennet confessed, he had been moved to such a matter, but he did it not.—Against sir Thomas Gerrard, my lord stood very stoutly in denial of what he witnessed, willing him to look him in the face, and charging him as he would answer before God, in whose presence he spoke, to tell nothing of him but truth. In answer whereof, sir Thomas referred himself to his Depositions before read, to which he said he was sworn; yea, twice sworn.

There were called into the Court two Witnesses more, viz. one Walton, and one Church, who justified Letters were brought from England to Rehnes, where they both were; which Letters were sent by one Hill, one of my lord's

Faction, that the earl of Arundel should be General of the Catholics, when the Tower should be surprised. To Walton, my lord took exception, affirming, that he was a naughty lewd fellow, who had sold that little land he had to three several men: and of the other witnesses he said, that some were attainted, some indicted, bad men and prisoners, and that their words were worth little credit.

Then said Mr. Popham, they were never tortured, but confessed all this willingly, and they are such, as you have accompanied.

Here ended every man's speech, and the noblemen and peers of the Jury went together.

My Lord humbly having submitted himself to the consideration of his peers, with protestation of loyalty; the Lieutenant brought him from the bar unto a seat near unto the court of Common-Pleas, where the Warders attended upon him.

My Lord Steward likewise withdrew himself a little while, as it seemed, to take some refreshment; having all the day for the time of his business, forbore to eat any thing; and presently returned to his seat of state.

Within one hour after, the noblemen of the Jury came every one back, and were again placed by Garret King at arms. Then Mr. Sandes asked every man of the Jury, severally, beginning at my lord Norris, the youngest baron, and proceeding to my Lord Treasurer, the foreman, whether the Prisoner were Guilty, yea, or no? Which every one of them, laying their hands upon their hearts, did protest in their consciences, and upon their honours, that he was Guilty.

Then was the Lieutenant called to bring his Prisoner to the bar, who was brought accordingly, attended as before. Then said Mr. Sandes unto him, That he had been indicted of several Treasons, and that he had put himself upon the trial of his peers, who had found him Guilty; and therefore asked, why Judgment should not be given against him.

Whereupon my Lord making three very low obeysances upon his knees, did humbly submit himself to my Lord Steward's Grace, and the favours of the rest of the nobles and peers there present, and besought them to be mediators for him, that he might obtain at her majesty's hands, to have order taken for his debts, and to have conference with his officers, and to talk with his wife, and to see his infant, born after his imprisonment, whom he had never seen.

Then my Lord's Grace pronounced Judgment, viz. That he should be conveyed to the place from whence he came, and from thence to the place of execution, and there to be hanged until he were half dead, his members to be cut off, his bowels to be cast into the fire, his head to be cut off, his quarters to be divided into four several parts, and to be bestowed in four several places: and so (said my Lord Steward) the Lord have mercy on thy soul!

To this the earl of Arundel said, as it were softly to himself, Fiat voluntas Dei. And so having made a low obeysance to the State, the

My lord said also, he was going away for fear some statute should be made in the 22d of this queen's reign against the Catholics in that parliament; and that Dr. Allen advised him that he should not go over, if he could tarry here in any safety, because he might be the better able to make a party in England, when they came.—Before my lord's going to sea, he wrote a Letter to be given to the queen after he was gone, wherein he found fault with her hard dealing in giving countenance to his adversaries, and in disgracing him; and that he was discontented with the injustice of the realm towards his great grandfather, his grandfather, and his father. He said in his Letter, his grandfather was condemned for such trifles, that the people standing by were amazed at it: he found fault also with the proceedings against his father.—Whereby it is apparent, said Mr. Popham, it was Discontentment moved my lord, and not Religion: and fearing lest his friends should think amiss of him, he left a copy of his Letter with Bridges a Traitor to be dispersed, to make the Catholics to think well of him; for, said Mr. Popham, being discontented he became a Catholic, and being so great a man he became a captain of the catholicks, which is as much as to be a captain over Traitors. A counterfeit Letter was made 22 days before his going to sea, directed to one Baker at Lynn, there being no such man abiding; wherein was signified, that my lord was very hardly dealt withal by some of the council, and that he was gone into Sussex, and a farther voyage, and that he would come home by Norfolk. Allen sent word to Rome, that the bull which was last sent over into England, was at the intercession of a great man in England. My lord (said Mr. Popham) was one of the principallest, and acquainted thus far with Allen: Ergo, my lord of Arundel, that great man. Dr. Allen made a most villainous and slanderous Book, which was very hard to be got, in which was contained, That the earl of Arundel was a procurer of the last Bull, and the procurer of the Invasion also. The Bull itself was some part read, and the Book was part read also.—My lord being charged on his Confession, being examined, why he would be ruled thus by Dr. Allen, he excused it by saying, that he said he would be ruled by Allen in all things, saving in that did concern her majesty and the state; and thereupon appealed to my Lord Chancellor, and Sir Walter Mildmay, who were not present. The Book aforesaid intended, that my lord was a practiser with Allen about the Invasion. Then said my lord, he would serve the queen against all princes, pope, or potentates whatsoever.

The Queen's Solicitor stood upon these Points; and because it was proved, that the earl of Arundel would be ruled by Allen in any thing that should concern the Catholic cause. And for that Dr. Allen hath since that time practised divers monstrous Treasons, and continually hath built upon the help of some other man in England, there is none yet known of his degree, that hath any thing to do with Allen, and therefore my lord must needs be culpable of all the Treasons Allen hath practised and procured, in flying to Allen to serve the prince of Parma, ut antea.

My lord was charged with relieving of divers Traitors, as priests; and that he did converse, and was confederate, with divers and sundry Traitors attainted, indicted and suspected, being prisoners in the Tower, and that he led a mass in the Tower; and that if the Spaniards should surprize the Tower, sir Owen Hoat should be put to the rack-house. He was also charged, That divers Papists, Seminars, and such like, being prisoners in Newgate, and other prisoners, reported, that they hoped to see the earl of Arundel king of England, and that cardinal Allen should direct the crown of England. Before the coming of the Spaniards Fleet, our Commissioners were in the Low Countries, when news was brought to the Tower, that we should have peace betwixt Spain and England; that would my lord of Arundel be pensive. When the Spanish Fleet was upon our coast, and news was brought to the Tower, that the Spaniards sped well, then the earl would be merry. When news came, the English Fleet sped well, then the earl would be sorry. When news came the Spanish Fleet was come upon the coast of Kent, my lord said, It is a great wood, and puissant fleet, we shall have lusty play shortly. I hope we shall plague them that have plagued us. My Lord said, He would not fight against any that came to fight for the Catholic religion. He said, when the Spanish Fleet was at sea, he would have three masses a day for the happy success of Spain. He said also, He would do continual prayer without ceasing for a time, for the good success of Spain, viz. he would do every twenty-four hours five priests to pray three hours a-piece for the defect of laymen, and fourteen laymen to pray every one an hour a-piece for the happy and fortunate success of Spain. He made himself a special Prayer for that purpose, and caused copies in haste to be made. Mr. Shelley, then Prisoner in the Tower, told my lord, That to exercise that Prayer were dangerous, and wished my lord let it alone: therefore my lord called for copy of the Prayer again, and would not have it copied. He was charged, That he did conjure sir Thomas Gerrard, knt. to keep counsel in all these matters before set down, who promised him, he would. Bennet also promised to keep his counsel, and divers others. Then were sir Thomas Gerrard, Mr. Shelley, Bennet the priest, and divers others, removed from the Tower to several other prisons, and upon examination confessed all as aforesaid.

My Lord hearing all these matters laid hard against him by Mr. Solicitor, grew into some agony, and called for his accusers face to face; which the learned counsel did not yet yield unto.

He was likewise charged, That he came once merrily to Bennet the priest in the Tower, saying, 'Come, Mr. Bennet, let us pray, that the Spaniards may beat down London-bridge;' and promised to give him a damask gown shortly, and that he hoped to make him dean of Paul's ere it were long: that the time of their delivery was at hand, and willed him in any wise to be secret, for, if he should reveal these things, he would deny them to his face.

When news came to the Tower, that the Spanish Fleet was driven away, my lord said, 'We are all undone; there is no hope for us this year, and the king of Spain cannot provide such a power again these five or six years, some of us may be dead and rotten ere that time.'

There were then brought into the Court, visâ voce, upon their several oaths, Anthony Hall, and Richard Young, a justice of the peace, who aimed something by hearsay to the Proof of the former matter. Also sir Thomas Gerrard, Wm. Bennet, Tuchinon, Snoden, and Ithel, and divers others, were closely kept in a place over the King's-Bench, closed in with arras, and were thereupon severally called into the Court, visâ voce, upon their several oaths, to affirm that which is specified before: since Mr. Solicitor began to speak, how this Mark Bennet the priest was charged with a Letter written to my lord wherein he should be sorry for the opening of these matters as aforesaid against my lord. One Randall had writ this Letter in Bennet's name, by advice of my lord of Arundel, to blind his practices. Bennet openly denied the writing of that letter; whereupon my lord Grey and my lord Norris asked Bennet, if he knew of the Letter, yea, or no? For the better Evidence, Bennet confessed, he had been moved to such a matter, but he did it not.—Against sir Thomas Gerrard, my lord stood very stoutly in denial of what he witnessed, willing him to look him in the face, and charging him as he would answer before God, in whose presence he spoke, to tell nothing of him but truth. In answer whereof, sir Thomas referred himself to his Depositions before read, to which he said he was sworn; yea, twice sworn.

There were called into the Court two Witnesses more, viz. one Walton, and one Church, who justified Letters were brought from England to Rebnas, where they both were; which Letters were sent by one Hill, one of my lord's

Faction, that the earl of Arundel should be General of the Catholics, when the Tower should be surprised. To Walton, my lord took exception, affirming, that he was a naughty lewd fellow, who had sold that little land he had to three several men: and of the other witnesses he said, that some were attainted, some indicted, bad men and prisoners, and that their words were worth little credit.

Then said Mr. Popham, they were never tortured, but confessed all this willingly, and they are such, as you have accompanied.

Here ended every man's speech, and the noblemen and peers of the Jury went together.

My Lord humbly having submitted himself to the consideration of his peers, with protestation of loyalty; the Lieutenant brought him from the bar unto a seat near unto the court of Common-Pleas, where the Warders attended upon him.

My Lord Steward likewise withdrew himself a little while, as it seemed, to take some refreshment; having all the day for the time of his business, forbore to eat anything; and presently returned to his seat of state.

Within one hour after, the noblemen of the Jury came every one back, and were again placed by Garret King at arms. Then Mr. Sandes asked every man of the Jury, severally, beginning at my lord Norris, the youngest baron, and proceeding to my Lord Treasurer, the foreman, whether the Prisoner were Guilty, yea, or no? Which every one of them, laying their hands upon their hearts, did protest in their consciences, and upon their honours, that he was Guilty.

Then was the Lieutenant called to bring his Prisoner to the bar, who was brought accordingly, attended as before. Then said Mr. Sandes unto him, That he had been indicted of several Treasons, and that he had put himself upon the trial of his peers, who had found him Guilty; and therefore asked, why Judgment should not be given against him.

Whereupon my Lord making three very low obeysances upon his knees, did humbly submit himself to my Lord Steward's Grace, and the favours of the rest of the nobles and peers there present, and besought them to be mediators for him, that he might obtain at her majesty's hands, to have order taken for his debts, and to have conference with his officers, and to talk with his wife, and to see his infant, born after his imprisonment, whom he had never seen.

Then my Lord's Grace pronounced Judgment, viz. That he should be conveyed to the place from whence he came, and from thence to the place of execution, and there to be hanged until he were half dead, his members to be cut off, his bowels to be cast into the fire, his head to be cut off, his quarters to be divided into four several parts, and to be bestowed in four several places: and so (said my Lord Steward) the Lord have mercy on thy soul!

To this the earl of Arundel said, as it were softly to himself, Fiat voluntas Dei. And so having made a low obeysance to the State, the

Lieutenant took him away; Mr. Shelton going before him with the edge of the ax towards him. Then there was an O yes made by the Serjeant at Arms, and the Court, together with any Lord Steward's Commission, dissolved: which done, my lord of Derby took the white wand out of Mr. Winkfield's hand, and broke the same in pieces; and every man cried, 'God save the Queen.'

Whereupon the earl of Arundel was carried back to the Tower, where after several reprieves he died a natural death, October 19, 1595, having been prisoner there ten years and six months; four years whereof passed before he was brought to his Trial.

"An Account" (the preceding) "of this Trial is in the first volume of the present Work" (i. e. the last edition of the State Trials) "with a reference in a note to Camden's Elizabeth, as if the Trial was extracted from that work. But the fact is, that they are different relations of the same Trial; and as Mr. Camden's account, though not so full, appears to us more clear and intelligible, and at the same time occupies little room, we thought that it would not be unacceptable to our readers. It is therefore here given from the English translation of Camden, in bishop Kennet's complete History of England. There are two other narratives of this Trial; one amongst the Harleian Manuscripts at the British Museum; the other in Mr. Collins's Peerage, under the title of The Duke of Norfolk. But on comparison, we find the former to be only an old translation from the Latin edition of Camden's Elizabeth. As to the latter, though Collins cites a Manuscript in the possession of the Howard family, yet he adds scarce any thing of consequence unnoticed by or different from Camden, except that Bennett, one of the witnesses against the earl, is represented previously to the Trial, to have addressed a Letter to him, in which he acknowledged, that he was forced into a confession to the injury of the earl, by fear of the rack, and therefore prayed his forgiveness. We endeavoured to procure access to the Manuscript cited by Collins, with an intention to have gratified our readers with a copy of it: but the application failed of success." Hargrave.]

On the 18th April 1589, was Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, arraigned in Westminster-hall, and tried by his peers, before Henry earl of Derby, who was created Lord-High-Steward of England on this particular occasion. The persons summoned to attend this Trial, were these following peers: William Cecil lord Burleigh, lord-high-treasurer of England; William lord marquis of Winchester; Edward earl of Oxford, lord-great-chamberlain of England; Henry earl of Kent, Henry earl of Sussex, Henry earl of Pembroke, Edward earl of Hertford, Henry earl of Lincoln, the lord Hunsdon, the lord

Willoughby of Eresby, the lord Morley, the lord Cobham, the lord Grey, the lord Darcy of the north, the lord Sands, the lord Wentworth, the lord Rich, the lord Willoughby of Parham, the lord North, the lord St. John of Bletnesho, the lord Buckhurst, the lord La-Ware, and the lord Norris.

Being ordered to hold up his hand, he did so, and moreover used this expression, 'Behold here a clean hand and honest heart!' The heads of his Impeachment were much the same with those mentioned before, Ann. 1586, viz. "That he held a very strict intimacy and correspondence with cardinal Allen, Parsons the Jesuit, and other conspirators, who attempted the ruin of their prince and country, by stirring up foreigners and the queen's natural subjects to bring in Popery, to the total destruction of both: that he had engaged by Letters conveyed by Weston, alias Burges a priest, to assist the said cardinal in advancing the catholic cause, and to that purpose had designed to withdraw privately out of the kingdom: that he was privy to the bull of Sixtus Quintus, which dethroned the queen, and made over her dominions to the Spaniards: that when he was a prisoner in the Tower, he had caused mass to be said for the happy success of the Spanish Armada, and had himself composed a special prayer on that occasion."

Being demanded to answer, whether he was Guilty or not Guilty? he turned himself to the Court and Judges, and made these challenges one after another, 'Whether such a number of Articles might lawfully be put into one and the same Impeachment?' They answered in the affirmative. Then he demanded, 'Whether presumptive arguments bore any weight in an Indictment?' He was answered, 'That he might except against them as far as be pleased.' Another demand was, 'Whether he could stand accused of those things charged to be Treason, in the 13th of queen Elizabeth, after the time limited in the said Act?' They then promised him, 'He should not be tried upon any other law or act of High-Treason, but an ancient one of Edw. 3.' In the last place, he demanded, 'If that were a fair Indictment, which failed grossly as to circumstances both of time and place?' The answer was, 'That these things signified little, if the matter of fact were proved.' After this, being asked a second time, whether he were Guilty or not? he answered Not Guilty, and submitted himself to God and his peers; but desired them to spare his memory, which was impaired by his imprisonment, and ill health, and not to over-charge it with too much variety.

Puckering, the Queen's Serjeant at Law, opened the first part of the charge, viz. That cardinal Allen having engaged with the Jesuits and others against his prince and country, upon which account he was banished the kingdom; yet he the said earl had kept up a correspondence with him by letters, and had expressly written to him to advance the Catholic interest, which, by a fair and modest construction, was a plain inviting of him to invade England. The earl made answer, That all he intended by it, was the promotion of that faith, by the accession of new proselytes. Popham, the queen's Attorney-General, endeavoured to prove, by the Confessions of Savage, Throckmorton, and Babington, that this could not possibly be understood of a free conversion upon the strength of argument; but of a publick invasion by force of arms. Shuttleworth, a Serjeant at Law, made it appear out of the form of the Proclamations put out against the Jesuits and Seminary priests, on what designs they were sent into England: That they were traitors, he proved from the earl's own words; who, upon the hearing of Valonger's cause in the Star-Chamber, in relation to a scandalous Libel of his, said publickly, 'That an hearty papist could not but be as thorough a traitor.' But for all this, men of this very principle were among the earl's greatest intimates. It was urged moreover, That he had espoused the faith of the Romish church, and became of consequence a subject to the Romish see; but this he flatly denied, and demanded that any Evidence might be produced to prove him a professed catholick. He acknowledged indeed, that he had in some instances made Burges his confessor; whereupon it was debated, that none were admitted to the sacraments of the church of Rome, but such as were reconciled to her doctrine and worship; but he was admitted by Gratley, a priest, and therefore a papist before, at least in his heart. This Popham laboured to prove from his own Letters, and that he intended likewise to withdraw beyond sea; that he was an absolute creature of cardinal Allen, and conformed entirely to his measures; for which he was guilty of High-Treason. He then produced Gratley's and Morgan's Letters to the queen of Scots, and made from thence this inference, that the earl owed his change in religion more to sourness and spleen, than to conscience and conviction. Then was produced an emblematical piece found in the earl's cabinet, which had on one side an hand shaking a serpent into the fire, with this motto, 'If God be with us, who shall be against us?' and on the other, a lion rampant, without claws, and with this inscription, 'Yet a lion.' He moreover added, That the earl designing to quit the kingdom, was persuaded by the cardinal to alter his purpose, as being a person likely to do the church of Rome more service by his stay in England, than his departure thence; that in a letter to the queen, the earl had reflected severely on the justice of the laws, in reference to the sentence of death denounced against his grandfather and father; that the queen of Scots had recommended him to Babington, as the great patron of the Catholick interest; that Allen had owned that the aforesaid Bull was procured by the applications of a person of figure in England; which could be no other than the earl, because no one nobleman besides, was so intimate with Allen as himself, and whom therefore Allen must needs know to be ill-affected to his country, by what he had heard pass before in the Star-Chamber. Then were read also the Confessions of the lord William, the earl's brother, with those of his sister, the lady Margaret, and his own letters, when he had thoughts of leaving the kingdom. And this gave occasion to magnify the queen's clemency afresh, who would not suffer him (at that very time) to be examined on an Article of Treason, but barely on a point of Contempt. To these Charges the earl answered in the gross, 'That as for the Picture, it was a trifle presented him by his man: That indeed he had promised to assist the cardinal in the promotion of the Catholick faith, but never at the expense of his prince and country: That what he had written in relation to the Sentence of his grand-father and father, was extant upon record, and so any one might read it: That he was not at all concerned in what the cardinal or the queen of Scots might write about him, since he stood clear as to fact: That it was impossible to restrain other mens pens: That he had indeed some design of acting under the prince of Parma, in the wars abroad, since the rigour of the laws against Catholicks made it not safe for him to stay at home: That the Attorney had managed the Letters and Confessions, at the same rate that spiders do flowers; that is, sucked all the poison out of them; but he, for his part, was able to extract out of them something more useful, might he be permitted to see them.' Then were read Allen's Letters to the queen of Scots, with those of the bishop of Ross, about invading England, that very year he designed to quit it; and the bull of Sixtus Quintus, and several remarks made on Allen's Memorial to the English, printed at Antwerp the year before. He was likewise charged with having assumed this title, Philip duke of Norfolk, which was found among his papers: and it was Allen's advice, that he should in some degree mend his title. These things were brought against him as convictions of Treason before his imprisonment. Egerton, the Solicitor-General, having summed up and repeated the particulars of the Charge, proceeded upon a threefold distinction of time, viz. 'Before the arrival of the Spanish fleet; at the instant of its coming; and after it fled: And that he had been guilty of treason since his confinement: Before the fleet appeared, he had been guilty of treason, in wishing it happy success; when it was arrived, in making a form of prayer suitable to his wishes, and causing the mass of the Holy Ghost to be said, and a course of devotions to be used for 24 hours together: And then when the fleet was gone, in lamenting its defeat with all the marks of an extraordinary sorrow; as if he had fixed his last hope, and best confidence, in the Spanish armada, which was fitted out with a design to ruin his prince and country.' These particulars were all made out against him by sir Tho. Gerard, kt. Will. Shelley, condemned for treason, ann. 1586, Bennet, a popish priest, and some other prisoners. He then muttered in a broken and imperfect kind of tone, that the prayers he made, and the masses he performed, were in order to deprecate a massacre he had heard was designed against the Catholics. Gerard's Evidence he roundly denied; and as he adjured him to declare nothing but the truth, and represented before him the dreadful solemnity of the last day, he so terrified and scared the Evidence, that he hardly was able to speak one word to the purpose. Bennet's attestations he endeavoured to invalidate, as being a man of a tarnished reputation, and who had contradicted himself in his confessions. The rest he taxed as persons impeached, and prisoners, and men likewise of a loose and profligate character; who were far from deserving credit, and who might be suspected to have the liberty of using his conversation with a design to ensnare him in the quirks of the law. Having received a check for this, as too indecent and bold a challenge: upon the Evidence for the queen, at the solicitor's motion, an ancient law of Richard 2nd was read, whereby it was declared, That the crown of England was under the command of none but God alone, and that the bishop of Rome had no manner of authority over it. It now growing towards night, and nothing being produced farther against him, the earl was ordered to withdraw: He threw himself wholly upon the Judgment of his peers, protesting his obedience to the queen, and heartily praying they might come to such an issue, as might be most for the glory of God, the safety of the queen, and the integrity of their own honour and consciences.

They then went aside, and held a debate, which lasted an hour, and in points of law they consulted the opinion of the Judges and Serjeants. Being returned to their seats, the clerk of the crown demanded of them, Whether they were Guilty or not? At which every one of them putting his hand to his breast, as the custom was, declared upon his honour and conscience, that he was Guilty. Then being asked if he had any thing farther to say, why sentence of death should not pass upon him? he only said the same words which his father had done before him, in the same place, God will be done. Sentence being pronounced, he desired leave to speak with his wife, and that he might see his young son, who was since his confinement; that he might have liberty to speak with his stewards, who had accounts of his estate, and that his debts might be discharged: He likewise humbly desired the queen would take his young son into her favour and patronage. Then the Lord Steward took his staff, the badge of his place; and this was carried back to the Tower, the ax being carried before him, with the edge towards him. There were a great many that most heartily lamented the untimely fall of this young man, (for he was not above 33 years of age at the most) and as many on the other side were ready to cry up the queen's wisdom and caution, who by this example had struck a kind of terror into the more powerful part of the Romish faction. The queen after allowing him his life, and was well enough satisfied, having lessened the power of so considerable a man, and one who was so great a bulwark of the Catholic cause.

67. The Arraignment of Sir RICHARD KNIGHTLY, and others, in the Star-Chamber, for maintaining seditious Persons, Books and Libels: 31 ELIZ. Feb. 31, A. D. 1588. [MS. in Case Coll. Cambridge, Class A: 1090. 8. p. 206.]

ON Friday, the 13th of February, were brought as prisoners to the bar, before the lords in the High-Court of Star-Chamber, sir Richard Knightly, Mr. Hales, sir — Wickstone,* and his wife, whose offences hereafter follow. And first,

Mr. Attorney-General Popham began, That the prosperous and happy state of her majesty was not unknown unto them all that were present, and so dilated thereon, &c. until two enemies had chosen to disturb this quietness, viz. the papists abroad, who by foreign arms, &c. and the seditious sectaries at home, whereof there are lewd people; next the Brownists and their fellows: but justice had been done on these men, and the law executed. But there is another sort of sectary, that are of no settled state, but seek to transform and subvert all. These men would have government in every several congregation, severally in every province, in every diocese, yea, in every parish; whereupon would ensue more mischief than any man by tongue can utter: they themselves cannot agree among themselves, but are full of envy and emulation; for what greater emulation than to fall to contention, and from contention proceed to violence? But they stay not here, nor contented with railing against the church and the state thereof, but proceed to court and the commonweal, that all things might contribute to preserve unity among the brethren; no law, no order left, all propriety of things taken away and confounded.—But of what sort of people are these sectaries? Of the very vilest and basest sort, and these must make confusion of all state, and so advance themselves in their congregations, this their course and this their purpose; so the head should govern the head, and not the head the heel, if these men be allowed, Her majesty, in her great wisdom duly considered the great danger of these inconveniences, took order that no pamphlets or treatises should be put in print, but such as should be first seen and allowed; and farther, lest that were not sufficient, she ordained that no printing should be used any where but in London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Notwithstanding, all this served not, but they would print in corners, and spread abroad things imprinted; wherefore her majesty set forth a proclamation in anno 25, that all Brownists books, and such other seditious books should be suppressed and burnt. Afterwards, when their new, seditious, and infamous libels were spread abroad, her majesty in February last set forth another proclamation, that all her subjects might take warning: but because no reformation is had, she now holds it necessary to proceed in justice: And therefore these men, now prisoners at the bar, but answer to their offences, and receive according to their demerits: and first for their faults. Sir Richard Knightly being a great man in his country, a deputy-lieutenant, who had the government thereof, a seditious and lewd rebel came unto him to have place and entertainment with him, and there sir Richard received him to print: Sir Richard doth confess that Penry told him he would set forth such a like book as he had beforetime set forth for the government of Wales. That book contains sedition and slander most opprobrious; and yet sir Richard was contented such a like book should be printed.—But farther, sir Richard sent his man a ring for a token to receive the press into his house, who did so, and there they printed the Epitome, Walgrave himself being the printer; this is a most seditious and libellous pamphlet, fit for a vice in a play, and no other: but then the parson of the parish having found out the printing, told sir Richard that it was very dangerous; whereupon sir Richard caused him to take it down; but neither disliked nor discovered it, but kept it secret, and read the books himself. Again, when it was told him that his house would be searched for the press, he said he would course them that come to search his house; beside, at his recommendation Walgrave was commended unto Mr. Hales, and there had entertainment, and there 'The Supplication to the Parliament,' was printed by Walgrave, and published by Newman, sir Richard's man; and another book, viz. 'Have you any Work for the Cooper?' was there printed likewise. Therein the sectaries themselves confess, that inconvenience would ensue of this government which they so sought to establish; but yet it must be brought in, because they were so determined. And from Mr. Hales's house in Coventry, these books and this press must be conveyed to sir — Wickstone's, where Martyn senior, and Martyn junior were both printed; wherein these libellers say, That all laws that any way impugn this doctrine of theirs are not to be obeyed in any cause: then if this be suffered, confusion and disorder must needs ensue. But farther, in these books they affirm that the time doth offer them a great opportunity, as though all things would be suffered in this so troublesome a time, rather than they should any way be disquieted. And for sir — Wickstone, albeit he knew the press was in his house, yet he kept secret, and would never discover it, but came many times, and did visit there at the press; and his wife, by whose procurement and persuasions with her husband, they were first received into his house, did often relieve them with meat and drink, and gave them money in their purses. This is the substance and sum of their Offence, which if they will deny, uncontestable and manifest proofs shall be produced against them. And so he concluded.

Hereupon sir Richard Knightly began to answer, and most humbly besought their lordships to consider of his simple wit, and weak capacity, not able to speak in such a place, and before so honourable an assembly: and said, that these mishaps which were now so aggravated against them, were a punishment imposed by God, to put him in mind of other his grievous crimes committed against the majesty of the most highest. He affirmed constantly that he was no sectary, but of that religion, that self-same religion, which he hoped all they which were then present were of, and so he trusted were all other her majesty's loving subjects. And if he should speak any thing amiss, he desired them not to impute it to his ill disposition, but to his wants, which were many, and the more, by reason, of his late imprisonment: and said, he was right glad that their honours were ordained by God, and appointed by her majesty to be his judges at whose hands he was sure to receive nothing but justice: wherefore he besought them to be an intercessor and mediator to her majesty in his behalf, against whom, for any offence committed, or against the state, to his knowledge, he was as clear as any present, and as good a subject as ever came to that bar. He utterly disclaimed the books, and denied to have any familiarity to his knowledge with those that were the writers of them; and shewed that the press was brought into his house upon this reason: there was a book that before-time was printed in Oxford, which to his knowledge was never called in; this book was written by one Mr. Penry, who requested sir Richard that this book might be printed again in his house, and in respect of the want of learning, which he knew to be in the ministry, he did the rather incline an ear unto. For although he must needs confess there were in the ministry some good, yet to his thinking, for one good, there were forty bad; yea, so had, as he thought them not worthy to sweep the church; and therefore his zeal for the furtherance of God's glory caused him to allow of this book. This, as he said, was about St. James tide was twelve-month, and he had heard nothing thereof again until All-hallow-tide following; and said, that the press was never in his own house, but in a house, at the farther end of the town. And he said, at Christmas following Walgrave came to him and desired the press, and said that Mr. Cartwright had wrote a book against the Jesuits, which he hoped to print. This is the truth, saith he. He wrote to Mr. Hales to defend a house for a poor man: all this was done before the Proclamation, since which time he never meddled therein, as he said; for my Lord Chancellor most honourably gave him warning to look unto that, which he hath accomplished like a good subject to her majesty to whom he confesseth himself most bounden, as he thinketh all the world is beside; and now hath learned of David, not so much as to touch the hem of the Lord's Anointed. He hopeth her majesty will likewise forgive him, as she hath forgiven greater offences: and besought them all to be good unto him, and he for his part would say with Moses and Paul, That he would rather desire to be wiped out of the Book of Life, than not perform his duty to her majesty. And so he concluded.

Mr. Hales began, That albeit it were a great grief unto him to be converted before their lordships, yet in this he joyed that they were his Judges, that were the governors and judges of the land, which could and would do him nothing else but justice; he confessed the blessing of God to be exceeding great unto the Commonwealth for placing her majesty over the same, by whose means we enjoy that peace which other nations want, and we happy that live under her: he disclaimed the books; but he had great reason as he thought to gratify sir Richard Knightly in any thing, to whom he owed much reverence, as him that had married his aunt. Sir Richard desired him to lend his house for a poor man, to the which he consented; but he knew not the man, nor his intent; he met with Penry in Coventry, at a sermon, who desired him to direct him to his house, there he had 'The Supplication to the Parliament' that was printed at Oxford; he told him he would print Mr. Cartwright's book 'against the Romish Testament': he was privy that there was a press there, but nothing else. It was an easy matter for a wiser man than himself to be thus overtaken; Penry himself was not indicted nor impeached. And he hoped, if a man ignorantly did receive a Traitor or Jesuit, that it was not treason, unless himself knew of it.

Attorney. You acknowledge you had a book of him?—Hales. I do.

Attorney. And you came to the maker of it?

Hales. It was before the Proclamation.

Attorney. It was after.

Hales. It was after the first, and before the second Proclamation. Hereupon was read the first Proclamation, made in 37 Eliz. against Schismatical and Seditious Libels, Dr. Brown, and such others.

Hales. But Mr. Penry's was no Libel, for he subscribed his name.

Attorney. There is no doubt but it is a Libel, though it be subscribed: whereunto

Hales said nothing. And then was read the other Proclamation in 31 Eliz. And the Order in the Star-Chamber, made in 28 Eliz. whereby printing was allowed only in London, Oxford and Cambridge.

Wickstone said, he was an ignorant man, and craved he might answer by counsel, which might direct him: whereunto the Lord Chancellor answered, that this was matter of fact which lay most properly within his own knowledge, and that he must provide to answer for himself, and that he needed no counsel.—Whereupon Wickstone confessed, That his wife desired him to permit them a home in his house, which he consented unto, knowing the purpose of them, and that was all.

Lady Wickstone confessed that the zeal of reformation in the Church caused her to give them entertainment in her house, and she was the cause that they came thither, not thinking that it had been any way hurtful or dangerous to the state; and she humbly besought, that what fault soever she had committed, her husband might not be punished therefore, since he was not privy, but only by her means and request.

Hereupon Mr. Puckering, the queen's Sergeant, began to lay open the enormities of these Books, which they had in court, and divers clauses of them were read. First, he affirmed they tended to the ruin of the whole state, next to the abolishing of all ecclesiastical government, to the removing of all manner of service, the overthrow of laws; and yet, say they, all laws which resist these men, are more to be allowed than those which maintain stewes. But Penry will never give that over, says, though the Spaniards were overthrown and discomfited by famine and by hunger, yet the Lord will raise them up again, and make a weak and feeble generation to overthrow us. So here was read a great part of the Epitome.

Puckering. This is most scornful and seditious; But what is their conclusion? They conclude, our parliament and councils be assembled where no truth beareth sway: which is most false and scandalous: but if this their government be not received, those of the parliament-house nor their seed shall never prosper, nor they ever bear any more rule in England. And I Penry will never leave, till either this be performed, or that the Lord in vengeance and blood do plague and punish us.—For the other book 'Have you any work for the Cooper?' therein is affirmed that our Church-Government is utterly unlawful: And albeit this form of theirs would be inconvenient in many points, yet every christian is bound to receive pastors, doctors, elders and deacons. For Martin junior, he affirms that it is unlawful to have any other government, that all human laws maintaining any other form are ungodly, and not to be obeyed: that the warrant that bishops have to maintain their authority, is no better than that which did maintain the stewes: that antichrist is the head of their doctrine, and they part of his body. For Martin's nior, he loudly termeth the book of common service, the . . . . . book at Lambeth, that 100,000 hands would sign to their positions and government which they seek. And further, that they are the strength of the land, that it were no policy to reject their suit at such a time when the land was invaded.

After which, they read sir Richard's Examination, wherein he confessed that Penry came unto him as befose; but when Sharp the minister told him the books were leud and dangerous, he caused them to be pulled down, and that he knew of no book but 'The Epitome.' He sent a ring to his man Jackson by Penry to receive a load of stuff into his house, which was the press and other necessaries for printing. Newman the cobler wore his livery, and Wastal his man helped Walgrave away from his house, to Mr. Hales at Coventry: Fox his schoolmaster, and Wastal his man, would commonly read the books in sir Richard's house, and scoff and scorn at John of Canterbury.

Sharp saith, that sir Richard conferred with Walgrave, as Newman told him The Epitome was printed there: that when it was told sir Richard his house would be searched, he answered, the knaves durst not search his house; and if they did, he would have coursed them.

The printer's man saith, that the 'Mind-All's,' were printed there, but sir Richard answered, he never knew so much before. 'Have you any work for the Cooper?' went in hand there, but they went away then to Coventry. The printer's man would have submitted himself long before, but sir Richard advised him not to do so in any case, for the lords were so incensed, as he should be hanged if he were caught. For Hales, 'Have you any work for the Cooper?' was printed at his house, he came once to the press as they were printing it. Mrs. Wickstone confesseth, Martin junior and Martin senior were printed in her house, she gave them entertainment, and placed them in a parlour; her husband knew it not till it was done; she told him, it was works of embroidering, and willed him to will his servants not to peep or pry into the parlour, since it pertained not to them: Hodgskins and two more printed them all. Hodgskins was desired to print more, but he refused. Hodgskins confesseth that he printed them two; and from Mr. Wickstone's they were conveyed to Warrington in Lancashire: She gave them 2s. 6d. at their departure, and her husband 2s.

Upon this Mr. Solicitor Egerton began to declare the danger of these Books, that they tended to confusion of all states, to take away her majesty's prerogative royal, to the diminution of her yearly revenue, where she at this time was forced to sell her revenues for maintenance of her realm and people, to the disherison of a great number of their patronages and advowsons and appropriations, to the abrogating of the common law and the civil law in many points: Whereupon he desired their lordships to proceed to sentence.

All the Lords agreed that the Books were most lewd, dangerous and seditious, and pernicious to the state, most scandalous in respect to our adversaries the Papists, who took occasion of our disagreement: that they were slanderous to her majesty, in accusing her for not maintaining religion. Whereas she for defence of religion only hath scared all the enemies of the state; that the sword of war had been drawn out against her for that cause; nay, the sword of death had compassed her chair in her own chamber [Mr. Parrie and Mr. Barnewell]: Notwithstanding she, nothing dismayed, being of princely magnanimity and fortitude, hath not feared any of these dangers only for religion sake. That they took away her majesty's regal power, disinherited noblemen and gentlemen, took away all property, abolished the reverend estate and calling of bishops, which are one of the three ancient estates of this land; and so they meant to pick out one stone after another, till they pulled the whole house on their heads. That the faults of them there present were gross and grievous; sir Richard, a man highly favoured of the queen, and much bounden more than ordinarily any of his state.

Yet notwithstanding, said Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, you be beloved of all of us, yet justice must be done without affection or compassion; for punitur hi, ne tu runiaris; let the magistrate punish offenders, lest himself be punished. And again, St. Augustine saith, percat unus ne percat unitus; let the offender rather be punished, than the unity of the church be confounded. That their ignorance was no excuse, that ignorance which was wilful and malicious only to escape the punishment of law, which is as high an offence as any privity. That it was a sillier answer of Mr. Wickstone, to say his wife desired him, a great folly to be ruled by her, and she passed the modesty of her sex to rule him. And sir John Parrot said expressly, he thought him worthy of the greater punishment for giving such a foolish, answer as that he did it at his wife's desire.

The Lord Chancellor gave the assembly that stood by to note, that these prisoners were not the devisers and makers of these books; for if they had, another place had been fit for them, and not this: that the county of Northampton did swarm with these Sectaries, and in one place there was a Presbytery planted among them, till at length one of the brethren had offended, wherefore the other would have punished him; but he, when he should be punished, fled, and complained to a justice of peace, and so their power surceaseth, and all revealed; whereby he noted the vanity of their government: yea, said he, it is proceeded so far in that country, that the people were offull contention, and in some places had risen in arms about that quarrel; whereby he concluded it was necessary to prevent such mischief, and to make example of it, and desired the judges to notify his action herein in their circuits abroad, to the end the whole realm might have knowledge of it, and the people no more seduced with these lewd libellers. For punishment, they all agreed that sir Richard should be fined 2,000*l.\; Mr. Hales, 1000 marks; Mr. Wickstone for obeying his wife, and not discovering it, 500 marks; Mrs. Wickstone a 1000*l.* and all of them Imprisonment at her majesty's pleasure.

* This sir Richard Knightly was divers times chosen member of parliament for the county of Northampton, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He was a great favourer of the Puritan party, and at the expence of printing their libels, as is reported, being influenced by Snape, and some other leading ministers of this county; these libels were printed by one Walgrave, who had a travelling press for this purpose, which was once brought down to Fawesley, and from thence by several stages removed to Manchester, where both the press and the workmen were seized by the earl of Derby. For this offence sir Richard Knightly, and his confederates, were cited into the Star-Chamber, and severely censured; but upon the intercession of archbishop Whitgift, whom they had most insulted, they were set at liberty, and had their fines remitted. But though thus zealous for the Puritan faction, he joined with sir Francis Hastings in presenting a petition to the house of commons, for granting a Toleration to the Papists. Bridges's Northamptonshire, by Jer. fol. p. 63.

† Camden says, That at this time several scurrilous pamphlets were published against the church of England by the dissenters; the great patrons and abettors were sir Richard Knightly and Wickstone, persons in other respects sober and pious, but drawn into the party by some instruments that were to make a private market of them. However the king had a pretty round fine laid on them in the Star-Chamber: but the archbishop of Canterbury was so generously good-natured, as to procure a remission of it at her majesty's hands. See Camden's Eliz. in the Complete History of England, vol. II. pag. 530.

68. The Trial of Mr. JOHN UDALL, a Puritan Minister, at Croydon Assizes, for Felony: 32 ELIZ. 24th July, A. D. 1590.

[Wrote by Himself.]

ON Tuesday the 13th of January, 1589, I appeared at my lord Cobham's house in the Blackfriars, before my lord Cobham, my lord Buckhurst, my lord Anderson, the bishop of Rochester, Mr. Fortescue, Mr. Egerton, the queen's Solicitor, Dr. Aubery, and Dr. Lewen. Then was I called in before them; whereupon my lord Anderson said unto me.

Anderson. How long have you been at Newcastle?

Udall. About a year, if it please your lordship.

Ander. Why went you from Kingston upon Thames?

Udall. Because I was silenced there, and was called to Newcastle.

Rochester. What calling had you thither?

Udall. The people made means to my lord of Huntingdon, who sent me thither.

Roch. Had you the allowance of the bishop of that diocese?

Udall. There was none at that time.

Roch. Then you should have gone to the archbishop.

Udall. There was no archbishop of York neither.

Ander. You are called hither to answer concerning certain Books, which are thought to be of your making.

U. If it be for any of Martin's Books (according as my Lord Chamberlain's Letters, that fetched me, import) I have already answered, and am ready so to do again.

Ander. Where have you answered and in what manner?

U. At Lambeth, a year and a half ago, I cleared myself not to be the author, nor know who he was.

Ander. Is this true, Mr. Beadle?

Beadle. I have heard that there was such a thing, but I was not there at it, if it please your lordship.

Aubery, Lewen. There was such a thing, as my lord's grace told us.

U. I am the hardlier dealt withal, to be fetched up so far at this time of the year. I have had a journey I would not wish unto my enemy.

Roch. You may thank your own dealing in matters that you should not have meddled withal.

Ander. It is more than I heard, that ever you were called to answer; but you are to answer concerning other books.

U. I hope your lordships will not urge me to any others, seeing I was sent for about those.

Ander. You must answer to others also: what say you to those books? A Demonstration or a Dialogue, &c. did not you make them?

U. I cannot answer thereunto.

Ander. Why would you clear yourself of Martin, and not of these, but that you are guilty herein?

U. Not so, my lord; I have reason to answer in the one, and not in the other.

Ander. I pray you let us hear what reason, for I cannot conceive of it, seeing they are all written concerning one matter.

U. This is the matter, my lord; I hold the matter proposed in them all to be one, but I would not be thought to handle it in that manner, which the former books do; and because I think otherwise of the latter, I care not though they should be fathered upon me.

Buck. But I pray you tell me, know you not Penry?

U. Yes, my lord, that I do.

Buck. And do you not know him to be Martin?

U. No, surely, neither do I think him to be Martin.

Buck. What is your reason?

U. This, my lord; when first it came out, he (understanding that some gave out that he was thought to be the author) wrote a Letter to a friend in London, wherein he did deny it, with such terms as declare him to be ignorant and clear in it.

Buck. Where is that Letter?

U. Indeed I cannot now shew you, for I have forgotten unto whom it was written.

Buck. You will not tell where it is.

U. Why, my lord, it tendeth to the clearing of one, and the accusing of none.

Buck. Can you tell where Penry is?

U. No, surely, my lord.

Buck. When did you see him?

U. About a quarter of a year ago.

Buck. Where did you see him?

U. He called at my door, and saluted me.

Buck. Nay, he remained belike with you?

U. No, indeed; he neither came in my house, neither did he so much as drink with me.

Buck. How came you acquainted with him?

U. I think at Cambridge, but I have been often been in his company.

Buck. Where?

U. At divers places, and namely in mine own house whilst I dwelt at Kingston.

Buck. What cause had you to be so often in his company?

U. He being a scholar and student in divinity, and one whom I always thought to be an honest man, your lordship may easily conceive the cause. Here was much to this same effect spoken about Mr. Penry, and my being at Mrs. Crane's house at Moulsey, and with her, &c. which I always answered, as in the like case concerning Mr. Horton of Richmond before the archbishop. Then Dr. Lewen reading my Answers to those Questions, that had been by the Archbishop propounded unto me concerning my Papers in my study, and namely the notes of my several Conferences with the bishops and their officers; I was asked, as I remember, by Mr. Fortescue:

Fortescue. Why did you pen such things, and keep them?

Roch. Because he and such like might apishly initate the martyrs of former times, and account themselves persecuted by us, as those were by the popish Bishops.

U. The cause is this, for that in the quickness of wit, and readiness of memory in youth, those things may be spoken, that in age will be more easily made use of in writing than otherwise, the memory of man not being infinite.

Ander. What say you, did you make these books, or know you who made them?

U. I cannot answer to that question, my lord.

Ander. You had as good say you were the author.

U. That will not follow; but if you think so, I cannot do withal.

Cob. Mr. Udall, if you be not the author, say so, and if you be, confess it; you may find favour.

U. My lord, I think the author, for any thing I know, did well, and I know that he is enquired after to be punished; and therefore I think it my duty to hinder the finding of him out, which I cannot do better than thus.

Ander. And why so, I pray you?

U. Because if every one that is suspected do deny it, the author at the length must needs be found out.

Ander. Why dare you not confess it, if you be the author of it? Dare you not stand to your own doings?

U. I professed before that I liked of the books, and the matter handled in them: but whether I made them or no, I will not answer; neither of any other book of that argument, whatsoever goeth without name, if you should ask me, for the reason alledged before: besides that if I were the author, I think that by law I need not answer.

Ander. That is true, if it concerned the loss of your life.

U. I pray your lordship, doth not the law say generally, no man shall be put to answer without presentment before justices, or things of record, or by due process, or writ original? &c. Anno 42 Edw. 3. cap. 5.

Ander. That is law, and it is not law.

U. I understand you not, my lord; it is a statute which is in force, if it be not repealed.

Ander. I tell you, by law you ought to answer in this case.

U. Good my lord, shew me this favour, to tell me in what book of the law I shall find it; for I profess to understand the Latin, French and English Tongues, wherein all the laws be written.

Fortes. You are very cunning in the law; I pray you by what law did you preach at Newcastle, being forbidden at Kingston?

U. I know no law against it, seeing it was the official Dr. Hone, who did silence me; whose authority reacheth not out of his archdeaconry.

Fortes. What was the cause for which you were silenced?

U. Surely I cannot tell, nor yet imagine, saving the secret suggestions of Mr. Harvie.

Fortes. To be ignorant of that, is crassa et supina ignorantia.

U. No, sir, the action was crassa et supina injuria.

Ander. Well, what say you to those books? who made them, and where were they printed?

U. Though I could tell your lordship, yet dare I not, for the reasons before alledged.

Roch. I pray you let me ask you a question or two concerning your book.

U. It is not yet proved to be mine; but I will answer to any thing concerning the matter of the book, so far as I know.

Roch. You call it a demonstration; I pray you what is a Demonstration? I believe you know not what it is.

U. If you had asked me that question when I was a boy in Cambridge of a year's standing, it had been a note of ignorance in me, to have been unable to answer you.

Roch. Surely it seemeth by the frame of the syllogisms and reasons in it, that you know it not, if you be the author of that book: I read none of it late, but in the parliament-time, sitting in a morning in the house, I read some of it; and it seemed to me in many things, not to conclude probably, much less demonstratively.

U. I will shew you, as I take it, why the author called it a Demonstration; because the reason which is usually brought to prove the conclusions, is commonly drawn from a place of scripture, which hath more force in it to manifest the conclusion Arduius, than any of Aristotle's proofs drawn, as they say, ex primis, veris, necessariis, et immediatis causis.

Roch. Indeed that which is proved by the Scriptures, is proved most demonstratively; but the proofs in that book are far from any such.

U. Let that be the question, and try it in some one.

Ander. My lord of Rochester, I pray you let us make short work with him, offer him a book; will you swear to answer to such things as shall be demanded of you in the behalf of our sovereign lady the queen?

U. I will take an oath of allegiance to her majesty, wherein I will acknowledge her supremacy according to statute, and promise my obedience as becometh a subject; but to swear to accuse myself or others, I think you have no law for it.

Ander. Mr. Solicitor, I pray you tell him the law in this point.

Then Mr. Solicitor (who had sitten all the while very soberly) noting what passed (and if a man's mind may be known by his countenance, seeming to mislike the course holden against me) upon my lord Anderson's commandment, stood up, and putting off his hat unto me, said:

Egrr. Mr. Udall, I am sorry that you will not answer, nor take an oath, which by law you ought to do: I can assure you, your answers are like the seminary priests answers; for they say, there is no law to compel them to take an oath to accuse themselves.

U. Sir, if it be a liberty by law, there is no reason why they should not challenge it; for (though they be very bad ones) they are subjects, and until they be condemned by law, may require all the benefits of subjects; neither is that any reason, that their answering so, should make the claim of less value for me, seeing that herein we are subjects alike, though otherwise of a most contrary disposition.

Buck. My lord, it is no standing with him thus: what sayst thou, wilt thou take the oath?

U. My lord, I have said as much thereunto as I can.

They then commanded me to go forth, and they consulted a little space, and called me again, at which time almost every one of them used many words to persuade me to confess a truth; saying the queen was merciful, and that otherwise it would go hardly with me: to whom I said, My lords, I know not that I have offended her majesty; when it is proved that I have, I hope her mercy will not then be too late: howsoever it be, I dare not take this oath.

Aubery, Leuca. You have heretofore taken it, and why will you not take it now?

U. Indeed you call to remembrance a good reason to refuse it; I was called to answer to certain articles upon mine oath heretofore, which I voluntarily did, and freely confessed that against myself, concerning my judgment and preaching of the points of discipline, which could never have been proved; and when my friends laboured to have me restored to my place, the archbishop answered, that there was sufficient matter against me, by mine own confession, why I should not be restored: whereupon I covenanted with mine own heart, never to be mine own tormentor in that sort again.

Ander. Whatsoever be the issue of it, you must do your duty, and deal plainly with the magistrate.

U. I take my duty to be in this case, not to answer, nor the magistrate's to require it of me; seeing the apostle saith, 'Receive not an accusation against an elder, under two or three witnesses:' which Semanca, the Spanish inquisitor, alledgeth to the same purpose.

Buck. What, you are an Elder, are you?

U. My lord, howsoever the word Elder be taken, whether so largely as I and my brethren that desire the discipline do take it, or only for a minister of the word, as our adversaries understand it, I am an Elder.

Roch. It is true, my lord, that an Elder in that place containeth all such as he is, but none else.

Buck. Yea, but they would have other Elders to govern the church; which desire of theirs, when it cometh to pass, I will give over my barony, and become an Elder.

U. If your lordship understood what great pains, and small worldly recompence belongeth to that office, you would never say so.

Roch. The day is past, and we must make an end: will you take the oath?

U. I dare not take it.

Roch. Then you must go to prison, and it will go hard with you, for you must remain there until you be glad to take it.

U. God's will be done! I had rather go to prison with a good conscience, than to be at liberty with an ill one.

Roch. Your sentence for this time is, to go to the Gate-house close prisoner, and you are beholden to my lords here, that they have heard you so long.

U. I acknowledge it, and do humbly thank their honours for it.

And when they were all gone, my lord Cobham stayed me to speak to me, who told me, that it might be he and others wished things to be amended as well as I, but the time served not, and therefore he wished me not to stand in it: and I praying his lordship's good favour, he promised to do for me what he could; for which I humbly thanked him, and so was carried to the Gate-house by a messenger, who delivered me with a warrant to be kept close prisoner, and not to be suffered to have pen, ink, or paper, or any body to speak with me. Thus I remained there half a year, in all which time my wife could not get leave to come unto me; saving only that in the hearing of the keeper she might speak to me, and I to her, of such things as she should think meet, notwithstanding that she made suit to the commissioners, yea unto the body of the council, for some more liberty: all which time my chamber-fellows were seminary priests, traitors, and professed papists. At the end of half a year, I was removed to the White Lion in Southwark, and so carried to the assizes at Croydon; where what was done, I will not mention, seeing there were present such as were both able, and I think willing to set down; unto whose report I refer those that would know the same.

Mr. Udall was called, and commanded to hold up his hand at the bar; who held up his hand accordingly. Then was his Indictment read, being thus: John Udall, late of London, clerk, thou art indicted, &c. The form of which Indictment was as against murderers: namely, That he not having the fear of God before his eyes, but being stirred up by the instigation and motion of the devil, did maliciously publish a slanderous and infamous libel against the queen's majesty, her crown and dignity. And being asked whether he were Guilty, or not Guilty, he answered thus:

U. My lords, may it please you to hear me a word or two?

Judge Clarke. Answer first to the Indictment, and then you shall be heard.

U. My lords, I beseech you hear me first a word or twain.

Judge. Say on.

U. My case is rare, and such as hath not been heard of heretofore, and consisteth upon divers points of law; I humbly crave of your lordship to grant me to answer by counsel, if it may be.

Judge Clarke. You cannot have it, and therefore answer to your Indictment.

U. Then I answer (my lords), that I am not Guilty.

Judge Clarke. How wilt thou be tried?

U. I do desire to be tried by an inquest of learned men; but seeing I shall not, I am contented to be tried by the ordinary course, as these men before me are, that is, as you use to say, by God and the country.

Then the Clerk of the Assizes said to the parties arraigned, after he had read the names of the Jury before them, These men whose names you have heard, are to go upon your lives and your deaths; look upon them when they are called to be sworn, and if you know any cause; take exception against them. Then the rest of the felons having nothing to say, Mr. Udall said, My lords, I am ignorant of the law in this point; I pray you therefore show me the manner of challenging the Jury; how many I may challenge, and whether I may render a reason for the same.

Judge. I think you will know a cause in your conscience, before you challenge any of them.

U. Then I pray you, my lord, how many am I by law permitted to challenge?

Judge. Nay, I am not to tell you that; I sit to judge, and not to give you counsel.

Then Mr. Udall keeping silence, Proclamation was made according to the manner: That if any man could give in Evidence against John Udall, prisoner at the bar, that they should come into the court and be heard. Then Mr. Daulton stood up: And in the mean while Mr. Udall said to the Judges thus; My lords, I beseech you answer me to one question before Mr. Daulton begin to speak.

Judge. Say on.

U. Is it permitted me by law to answer to those things in particular, which are brought to prove this Indictment?

Judge. It is permitted.

U. Then I humbly crave of your lordships to grant me two petitions, which I think will greatly further both him in speaking, me in answering, and also be a more ready help to the memory of the Jury, that they may be able to bear the matter away.

Judge. What are your petitions?

U. The first is, that when Mr. Daulton hath spoken to one point what he can, I may answer to that before he proceed any further, lest my memory being overwhelmed with multitude of matter, I should forget to answer to some points of importance, and the Jury made less able to discern of the particulars. The second is, that it might please you to grant me to answer without interruption.

Judge. You shall have them both granted.

Dault. Then Mr. Daulton said, Mr. Udall, you have these petitions granted you, I desire the same of you. And then he desiring leave of the Judges, before he should prove the Indictment, to say something touching this, that this man, and such as he is, do maintain, &c. After leave given him, he used a very long speech, to the great disgrace and slander of the cause, and those men that professed the same, especially of Mr. Udall: and making mention in the same his speech, of five several books of common-prayer, made by such as desire reformation; he affirmed, that in one of the said books there was horrible blasphemy, in these words of the consecration of the Lord's Supper, 'Take, eat, this is my body; drink, this is my blood.' Then he cried out, saying, 'Oh horrible blasphemy!' And taking occasion upon the variety of these books, he affirmed that there was no constancy in these men: And whereas one of the books doth allow, that over every congregation there should be a faithful pastor; that is, quoth he, a shepherd, whereby they may take the government out of her majesty's hand, and so bring her majesty to be one of their sheep; no, quoth he, her majesty is no sheep under any shepherd in the world, except Christ: and for the government that these men do seek for, I am assured there is none such to be found in the word of God.

U. Mr. Daulton hath used a very large speech, which doth nothing concern to prove the Indictment, or me in particular; and therefore seeing I am not called hither to dispute, as if I would, I should not be permitted, I will not answer it; only thus much will I say, if it please your lordships, that seeing Mr. Daulton is by profession a lawyer, and the cause is yet in question among the learned divines, methinks it had been more modesty for Mr. Daulton to have suspended his judgment until the controversy had been determined amongst them, to whose profession it belongeth: especially seeing Mr. Daulton knoweth in his conscience, that he hath heretofore carried some shew of liking to the cause, which now he speaketh against.

Judge. Sirrah, Sirrah, answer to the matter that Mr. Daulton hath against you; Mr. Daulton, proceed to the proof of the points of the Indictment.

Dault. My masters, you of the Jury, &c. I will prove, first, that he had a malicious intent in making of this book: secondly, That he is the author of it: and thirdly, That these matters contained in the indictment are felony by the Statute, 23 Eliz. cap. 2.

Then was Mr. Beadle the Register called, who was sworn, that these Examinations following were as the parties themselves confessed the same: and to prove the first, the clerk of the assizes caused Stephen Chatfield to be called into the court, to give in evidence against John Udall; but he appeared not at all, for which the Judges were offended; and serjeant Puckering said, there was a warrant sent for him: whereupon some standing by affirmed, that the warrant came after his departure from home. Then Mr. Daulton said, that he went out of the way of purpose; and judge Clarke said, Mr. Udall, you are glad of that. Mr. Udall answered;

Udall. My lords, I wish heartily he had been here; for as I am sure he never could say any thing against me to prove this point, so I have heard and am able to prove it to be true, that he is very sorry that ever he made any complaint against me, confessing he did it in his anger, when 'Martin' came first out; and by their suggestions, whom he hath proved since by experience to be very bad men.

Dault. It is no great matter whether he be here or no, for we have his Articles against you, and your own confession to prove this point sufficiently.

Then were Mr. Chatfield's Articles (that he brought to the archbishop against Mr. Udall) read by the clerk, containing a report of certain written papers; tending as he supposed, to the making of such a book as this is: and thereupon asked Mr. Udall whose writing they were; who answered, they are a friend's of mine: whereunto Chatfield replied, wishing him to take heed of them, and to rid his hands of them, and to return them to his friend from whom he had them, for he doubted they concerned the state. These Papers he saw in Mr. Udall's study at Kingston. Also he further saith, that at another time, he having conferred with Mr. Udall in a certain field by Kingston, called Little-field, about this putting to silence; he saith, that the said Mr. Udall uttered these words, that if they put him to silence, he would give the Bishops such a blow, as they never had.

U. May it please your lordships that I may answer these things in particular?

Judge. Say on, let us hear your answer.

U. I was accused this time two years upon the words of Chatfield, that these papers that he did see in my study, should be the matter of 'Martin-Mar-Prelate'; and because I cleared myself of that, it is now brought to prove another matter: but it proveth nothing, unless it were set down in particular what they were.

Dault. It proveth this, that you had a purpose to write this Book; and those things were collections from your friends, and preparations thereunto.

U. Let the Jury consider how that point is proved by it. Besides, it may be proved, that this Book was extant in men's hands before the Conference between Chatfield and me; therefore how can it be proved that this is the book that should give them such a blow?

Dault. But you cannot deny the second Point, that you had a pretended Malice, for it is extant in your own Confession: read his Answer to those Articles of Mr. Chatfield. Then the Clerk read his Answer, to this effect, That if the Bishops put him to silence, they would give him occasion and leisure to be employed in writing against them. Then said Mr. Daulton, Is not this most evident, what can be plainer than it is?

U. I pray your lordships give me leave to explain these things.

Judge. Say on, and be brief.

U. Mr. Chatfield told me, that he was commanded to come to Kingston and be resident there, of purpose that I might be put to silence, and that there might not appear any want of a preacher, I being put down; whereupon I said, in effect, as is above rehearsed: I pray you hear in what sense these words were uttered.

Judge. The matter is clear, and we see what you can say to it well enough; proceed, Mr. Daulton, to the Proof of the second Point, Dault. And that you be the Author of this slanderous and infamous Libel, it shall be proved clearly to the Jury before your face. Then said he to the clerk, read the Answer of Nicholas Thompkins, which was made upon his oath before her majesty's High-Commissioners. Then was read to this effect, that Thompkins knew that Mr. Udall was the Author of that Book called 'The Demonstration,' for he said that Mr. Udall himself told him so. Also that he saw either in Mr. Udall's house, or in some other place in Kingston, a Catalogue of all the Books that Mr. Udall had made, amongst which the Demonstration was one.

Judge. You see here that this is clear, and a sufficient Testimony.

U. It carried some shew, but it is nothing.

Judge. Do you call the Testimony of one being an honest man, and upon his oath, before the High-Commissioners, to be nothing? Can you answer it?

U. My lords, I answer it thus, denying it to be his Testimony; for if it be, why is he not present to verify it face to face, according to the law?

Judge Puck. It is verified to be his true Answer, under the hands of Dr. Auberie and Dr. Lewen, the latter whereof confirmed it before me upon his corporal oath.

Dault. You can take no Exceptions against that, and will you say he is not an honest man?

U. I am persuaded he was amazed, and answered he knew not what: for he hath reported it so diversely, that it seemeth he remembereth not what he said.

Judge. But the Oath of Thompkins is to be preferred before his bare Report.

U. My lords, I answer. I protest unto you, (and will verify it upon my Oath, if it please you) that he told me the day before I was committed, at his master's house, that he could not say, neither would he for a thousand pounds affirm any more than this, that he heard me say I would not doubt but set my name to that Book if I might have indifferent Judges. And further (if it please you, my lords) here are some Witnesses that upon their oaths will testify, how diversely he hath reported of his Confession to this thing, if it please your lordships to accept them. And the witnesses offering themselves to be heard, were answered, that because their Witness was against the queen's majesty, they could not be heard. And after other speeches passing, Mr. Udall said;

U. My lords, the speech of the Catalogue is most vain, and hath no sense in it; for can I have made so many Books, as that I need make a Catalogue of them? It may be, my lords, he saw a Catalogue of the Books in my study, wherein if that were one, it is rather an argument that I made it not; for men use not to put their own works in the Catalogue of those that they have in their study.

Dault. You of the Jury consider this, that Thompkins was Mrs. Crane's man, and one that was privy to all the printing that was at her house; and Mr. Udall used to go often thither.

U. All that is nothing to me: what if I used to go thither, she is of my acquaintance; I know her to be an honest gentlewoman; what can you gather by any of these things? Why is not Thompkins heretofore declare his testimony, and to say what he can?

Dault. He is beyond the seas about Merchandizes, sent away by Mr. Gore, who married Mrs. Crane's daughter.

U. How doth that appear? He is no merchant, but a serving-man; and if he were, what is that to me? But it cannot be proved that Mr. Gore did send him, so that here is nothing but bare papers to shew for evidence against me.

Then there was much said, to prove that the Testimony of a man absent was sufficient, if it were proved to be his upon the oaths of others. And then the Judge said,

Judge. What say you? Did you make the Book, Udall, yea, or no! What say you to it, will you be sworn? Will you take your oath that you made it not? We will offer you that favour which never any indicted of Felony had before; take your oath, and swear you did it not, and it shall suffice.

U. My lords, I pray you hear me to this: If I would have done so before the lords of her majesty's privy-Council that committed me, I had not come hither; but I neither then might, nor may do so now, whereof I pray you let me shew a reason to the Jury. I and many more do think the Book to be good, for any thing we can find in it, and to be written in defence of a cause which we take to be most true. Now the Author is sought for, that he may be punished for some speeches that may be wrested in the Book; therefore lest he should be found (if one after another that are suspected do deny it) it is thought best every one neither to confess nor to deny, yea though we suffer some punishment, rather than the author, being found out, should suffer extremity.

Judge. Nay, this is but a shift, I will go further with you; Will you but say upon your honesty that you made it not, and you shall see what shall be said unto you?

U. My lords, it is all one, I make a conscience of my word as of my oath, for I must give account for both. This is no direct course in this place.

Judge. You of the Jury consider this. This argueth, that if he were not guilty, he would clear himself, and consider well of it. And then speaking to Mr. Udall, he said, Do not stand in it, but confess it, and submit yourself to the queen's mercy, before the Jury find you guilty.

U. My Lord, I answer, that according to my Indictment I am not guilty, every point whereof must be proved, or else the whole is false. And I beseech your lordships give me leave, and I will be very brief: My conscience doth not accuse me that I have so much as offended her majesty, her council, or the meanest of her people in any thing I have done concerning this cause; for if I should, of all other I deserved the least favour, being one that professed to teach others loyalty to her majesty, and love to one another: and would you have me to confess a fault where there is none? No, I cannot do it, neither will I; wherefore proceed in your course begun.

Dault. We have yet more Proof than this, though yet this were sufficient of itself; wherefore read the other Examinations.—Then was read the Confession of Henry Sharpe of Northampton, who upon his oath, before my Lord Chancellor, had said, That he heard Mr. Penry say, that Mr. Udall was the Author of 'The Demonstration.'

U. Sharpe and I were never above once in company together (to my remembrance), neither knew he ever any of my dealings. This is nothing to prove me the Author of the Book: Reports be uncertain; and if reports be true, the Archbishop himself told me, that Mr. Penry made it; which is more forcible for me than any of Sharpe's reports can be against me.

Dault. You mistake the matter; the force of the point resteth in Mr. Penry's report, who was one of your great acquaintance and familiars; and you, and Walgrave, and he, were at Mrs. Crane's house.

U. Here is one man's saying that another said so; let the Jury consider of what force this proof is; if you have any more, let it appear.

Judge Clarke. You of the Jury have not to enquire whether he be guilty of the Felony, but whether he be the Author of the Book; for it is already set down by the Judgment of all the Judges in the land, that whosoever was Author of that Book, was guilty by the statute of felony, and this is declared above half a year ago.

U. Though it be so determined already, yet I pray your lordships give me leave to shew that which I have to say, and I will be very brief; and it is to prove, that though I were found to be the author, yet it cannot be within the compass of that Statute, Anno 23 Eliz. cap. 2. whereupon the Indictment is framed.

Judge. You shall be heard to say for yourself what you can, therefore say on.

U. Though I be not by profession a Lawyer, yet I think I can shew it clearly by these reasons following: 1. The intent of the law-makers (which always is to be regarded in these cases) is to be considered, which appeareth in the Preface of the Statute in these words, 'To frustrate the Malice of those that be evil affected to her highness.' Now I pray you consider this how can it be? Or how is it possible that a Preacher, of the same religion which her majesty professeth and maintaineth, who is known continually to pray unto God for her highness's prosperity and happiness, both of soul and body; how is it possible, I say, that such a one should be maliciously affected towards her? Therefore it is evident that the

Statute was made against the Papists, who use to slander her highness with the terms of Heretic, &c. and no way against us; for I dare boldly say of myself, and in the name of all my Brethren, Cursed is he of God, and he deserveth doubtless to be hated of men, that doth imagine the least hurt against her highness. 2. The Matter that maketh a man a Felon by that Statute, must proceed from a malicious intent against her highness, which I or any such as I can no way justly be charged with; partly for that which is said before, and partly for that my course of teaching and living in this country these nine years (saving this last year, wherein I have been absent) is known to have tended to no other end, than the provoking and perswading of the people to like of and yield obedience unto her majesty, and the religion received in her dominions: for the proof whereof, I refer myself to the consciences of all men in the country that have known me. And further, is it likely, that I who have been trained up in the Universities under her majesty's protection, and have always bended my studies to the advancement of the sincerity of the Gospel; so that those small crumbs of learning which I have gathered, I do acknowledge to have received by her majesty's means: these things considered, how can it be that I should be evil-affected towards her highness, whom I protest I unfeignedly reverence? And therefore the worst that the Author can be charged withal, is his overheat and too much vehemency, by reason of his zeal against the abuses, and not any malice against her majesty, or the meanest of her subjects. Again, the matter, to bring it within the compass of the statute, must be false: but this Book is written in the behalf of a most true cause. Lastly, The End of it must be either the Defamation of the queen's majesty, or stirring up of Insurrection, Sedition or Rebellion: for the former, I trust that the whole course of our behaviour, both in our ministry and conversation, declarerth itself to be so far from seeking to defame her highness, as it tendeth, to the uttermost of our powers, to the advancement of her honour. For I am persuaded that there is none of us that would refuse to undergo any pain, whereby her majesty might any way be the better honoured; yea, we would not refuse, if need so required, to lay down our lives for redeeming of the least aking of her majesty's little finger, wherewith she might be grieved. Now for the second end, which is the moving or stirring up of Rebellion, &c. I pray your lordships, and you of the Jury to consider this: There have been, since the first day of her majesty's reign, learned men that have desired the advancement of this Cause, and many of the people that affected it, and yet hath it never appeared, that by occasion hereof, there hath in all this time been any in any place that have raised any Insurrection or Sedition: yea this Book, which is now in question, hath been extant these two years; yet I trust neither your lordships, nor any here present can shew that any people in any corner of the land, nay it cannot be justly proved that any one person hath taken any occasion hereby to enterprize any such matter: and therefore the making of this Book cannot be Felony. Besides all this, if there had been any such thing meant by the Author, or received by the people, as the Indictment chargeth me withal, (which is the defamation of her highness's government) yet, as I take it, it should not be Felony by that Statute; for the whole course of it declareth, that it is only meant of them that defame her highness's person, and not her government, as it is manifest by the last proviso; wherein it is shewed, that the whole statute doth determine and end with her majesty's life. And we may not think their wisdoms that made the law to be so unadvised, as to make a law for the preservation of the prince's government, which is continual, to last no longer than the life of one prince, which is temporary: therefore it seemeth that the statute hath no further regard than this, that her highness's person might be preserved in that honour and dignity, which becometh her royall dignity and estate. And I do beseech your lordships to answer me, for I appeal to your consciences, as you will answer to God for my life; and I pray you tell the Jury, whether you do think the intent of the statute were in any sort meant against us, and not rather against the Papists.

Judge Puck. You do not well to charge us so with our consciences, which God only is to know. I answer you, the Intent of the Statute is against all, for so the words are.

U. The words, my lord, I confess are so; but is the principal intent so?

Judge. Yea, it is so.

Judge Clarke. We have heard you speak for yourself to this Point at large, which is nothing to excuse you; for you cannot excuse yourself to have done it with a malicious intent against the Bishops, and that exercising their government which the queen hath appointed them, and so it is by consequence against the queen.

U. My lords, I am persuaded that the Author did it not of any Malice against them; and for myself, I protest I wish them as much good as I do to my own soul, and will pray to God to give them repentance. But the cause why the Author did so earnestly inveigh against them was this, as it seemeth, because he perceived them not only to execute an authority which he taketh to be unlawful by the Word of God, but also for that they do not the tenth part of that good (even in those corrupt callings) which by law they might do; and I am persuaded that your lordships know in your own consciences, that they do not the tenth part of that they are bound to do.

Judge Clarke. That is true, they do not the good that they might do; but yet that doth not excuse you: for it is plain in your Book, that you writ not against them only, but you writ against the State; for is it not against the State, when you say, That it is easier to live in England a Papist, an Anabaptist, of the Family of Love, and what not? Yea, you say, I could live so in a Bishop's house, it may be these twenty years, and never be much molested for it. What is this but a plain slandering of the State? And mark the words, for you say, you could live so in England: And doth her majesty's laws allow of papists? This maketh evidently against you, and it is so plain that you cannot deny it.

U. My lords, if it might please you to hear me a word or two, I will shew the meaning of the Author of the Book; I beseech you to hear me, and I will be very brief; I know the laws of England do not allow of any such as are mentioned in that Book, for there are godly laws made for the punishing of them, if they were put in execution. But this I take to be the Author's meaning: That it is not spoken in respect of her majesty's Government and Laws, but in respect of the Bishops, whom your lordships know to be wholly employed in finding us out, and punishing of us, not regarding (in a manner) the punishing any sin else.

Judge. What, Sirrah, will you not confess any fault to be in the Book? You seek to excuse all.

U. My lords, I do acknowledge that there was never any work of man so perfect, but there have been imperfections in the same: and therefore there may be some fault in the manner, but surely none in the matter: for the Bishops themselves will confess that they may fail in their actions, and be partial (as they are men) in the manner of handling any thing. So also the Author of this Book being assured that the matter is without reproof, may err in the manner, in being over-zealous in the handling of it; and this fault I will easily confess to be in the Book, my lord: but I am sure the Author never had any malicious intent against her highness, or any of her subjects.

Judge Clarke. This Book hath made you to come within the compass of the Statute though your Intent were not so: for I am sure there was Mr. Stubbs, well known to divers here to be a good subject and an honest man; yet taking upon him to write a Book against her majesty touching Mounseir, he thereby came within the compass of Law, which he intended not in making of the Book; and I am persuaded, that he did it of a good affection towards her majesty; and yet if this law had been made then, which was made since, he had died for it: So you, though you intended not to come within the compass of the Statute, yet the law reacheth to your fact, as that did to his.

U. My lords, his Case and mine is not alike, for his Book concerned her highness's person; but the Author of this Book toucheth only the Corruptions of the Bishops, and therefore not the Person of her majesty.

Judge. But I will prove this Book to be against her majesty's person; for her majesty being the supreme governor of all persons and causes in these her dominions, hath established this kind of government in the hands of the Bishops, which thou and thy fellows so strive against; and they being set in authority for the exercising of this government by her majesty, thou dost not strive against them, but her majesty's person, seeing they cannot alter the government which the queen hath laid upon them.

U. My lords, we are not ignorant of this, that her majesty hath a care that all things might be well: and in that respect hath given them often in charge, (upon the considerations of these controversies) to see to it that nothing be amiss; and because she had a good opinion of them for their gravity and learning, she believeth them when they say all is well and in good case: whereas, if they had the grace to look into these things, and to make them known as they be, indeed her majesty and the state, I doubt not, would quickly repress them; and therefore was it that the author did so charge them.

Then the Judge proceeding farther in the Book to prove him to have offended: he took occasion by the same to speak against railing against magistrates; and speaking to Mr. Udall, he said, in effect, thus:

Judge Clarke. Sirrah, you that should have been a Teacher of her majesty's people, you should have taught yourself not to have railed upon the Rulers of the people; for do you not know what is written in the 23rd of Exodus, 'Thou shalt not rail upon the Ruler of the People, for whosoever doth so shall die the death.' And do you not know what is written in the 23d of Acts, where the Apostle Paul being before the High-Priest, called him a 'Painted Wall' and being smitten by one of the High-Priest's servants, it was said unto him, 'revisest thou the Lord's High-Priest?' To which Paul answered, 'I knew not, brethren, that he was the High-Priest.' Lo! thus did he acknowledge his fault: Do you know these things, Sirrah?

U. My lord, you know that we hold it not lawful for a Minister to be a Civil Magistrate, and there are at least 500 in this land, amongst whom I am the most unworthy, that are of the same judgment in this point.

Judge. But how if the Queen doth give it them?

U. They ought not to take it. And, my lord (if it please you), I will answer to your Proofs, though I came not hither to dispute. But in my answering, my purpose is not to give any liberty to any man to rail upon any that are in authority. Now to your Proofs; I say, my lords, that the place out of Exod. 23, doth rather concern your lordships, and such as are under her majesty for Judges, than any way to concern the Bishops: And touching the second place out of Acts 23, where the Apostle saith, 'Brethren I wist not that it was the High-Priest:' the meaning of that place is, as if he should say, I thought there had not been any High-Priest now, seeing Christ being come, the High Priesthood was to cease: so that the Apostle doth not acknowledge any fault in his Speech, for there was no lawful High-Priest of that time: neither did he acknowledge seeing they did end in Christ. And thus the best divines expound the place.

Then, after some farther Speeches at the Exposition, the Judge returned to the matter of the Book again, saying, That the Books concern the State, and said:

Judge. But, Sirrah, thou canst not so excuse thyself, as though it touched not the Queen and the State; for is it not written in thy Book, that this saying will not serve the purpose, The Queen and Council will have it whereby it is plain, that thou didst speak against the queen and the state.

U. My Lord, the Author only meant that. That when we are called before the Bar, they were often driven to use this argument (when they had nothing else to say for themselves), that they could be content many things were amended; but it must be so, for the Queen and Council will have it so: And so herein methinks they slander her highness, and we tell them, that however they be called out here before men, yet before God that excuse will not serve their turn.

Judge. Thou canst not carry it away: dost not thou plainly say, That they are not safe, though they have human authority on their side; but he that is on our side is mightier than they? Whereby thou both abasest her majesty, and also dost threaten them with some force and violence.

U. It is true, that whosoever doth unjustly is not safe in it, though all the princes in the world should defend him in it; and that is the meaning of the Author: But to say, that force and violence is threatened them, is far more doubtless from this meaning; for it is known to all the world, that we desire, by all good means, to commend this holy cause of Reformation to her majesty and the state, and do not look for neither, that ever it should by any force prevail, but that it would please God to honour her highness with the advancement of the same.

Judge. No, no, these are but excuses: these malicious speeches proceeded from them, and were the ground-work of all these Libels that have been dispersed since, and thou art known to be the ring-leader of this faction.

U. There is no reason to charge me with other men's doings, every man must answer for himself; but as for me (alas!), I am no better, there are five hundred Ministers in this land of my judgment in these things, the meanest of which I acknowledge to be far better learned than I am. But by the way, my lords, I pray your lordships give me leave to say one thing, which I being about to speak of before, was interrupted; and therefore seeing now it cometh into my memory, I pray you to hear me, though it be out of time, concerning the felony whereof I am accused; it maketh greatly for me.

Judge. What is it? Let us hear what you can say.

U. When I was before the lords of her majesty's Council at the time of my commitment, amongst other things that I alledged against the taking of an Oath to accuse myself, I said, that the thing was accounted criminal, and therefore by law I was not to answer: My lord Anderson said, that I said true, if the case had concerned either the loss of life or limb; whereby it is manifest, that then my case was not esteemed felony.

Judge. Though the Judges had not then concluded it, yet it was law before, or else it could not so be determined after; the violent course of others since, hath caused your case to be more narrowly sifted.

Then the Judge (having spoken to the like effect also) said to the Jury, That they should not need to trouble themselves to find him Guilty of the Felony, but only it was sufficient if they found him Guilty to be the Author of the Book: for, quoth he, it is already determined by all the Judges of the Land, that the Author of that Book was in the compass of the statute of Felony; and this, quoth he, was concluded before we came hither: Therefore you being ignorant of the law, and we being sworn, as well as you are, you are to hear us, and to take our exposition of the law. And after many other speeches, the Judges said, Go thy way, we will hear thee no longer, get thee hence; and shaking his hand, he called for the other Felons to hear their Causes.

Then the Jury said, What can we find?

Judge. Find him Author of the Book, and leave the Felony to us.

And after some other Speeches, Mr. Fuller said to the Jury, You are to find him Author of the Book, and also guilty of a malicious Intent in making it.

Whereat Mr. Daulton said, What have you to do with the matter, Mr. Fuller, to speak to the Jury?

Then there being some noise at the Bar, Mr. Udall could not any more be heard: Yet as he was ready to depart, he said to the Jury, You of the Jury, consider this, that you have not to consult about the Life of a Seminary and Popish Priest, but of a Minister of the Gospel. Then Judge Clarke shewed the Reasons to the Jury, why they must find him Guilty; saying, The Evidences are manifest for the first Point, that he is the Author of the Book; and the second is a Point in Law agreed upon by all the Judges, as I have said.

So the Jury, after they had heard the Evidences of the other Felons at the Bar, departed to consult about them; in which time of their consultation, there came two several messages, exhorting him to submit himself, and to yield unto the Judges before the Jury had given up their Verdict.

Unto whom Mr. Udall replied, willing them not to trouble him with any such matter; for he was clear in his conscience, and therefore he was not to accuse himself. In which time also the Jury divers times sent and received messages from the Judges; and at last, the Foreman of the Jury went himself unto them. Thus having debated of the Evidences of the rest of the Felons with Mr. Udall, after the Judges had dined, the Jury brought in their Verdict that he was Guilty of Felony.

After that baron Clarke had finished all other matters of law, and that the Juries had given their Verdicts on the Felons, finding some Guilty, and some Not Guilty, the Judge commanded all the Prisoners to stand forth and to answer to their names: who did so. And first, Mr. Udall was called, who stood forth at the bar; but the Judge commanded him for that time to stand aside, saying, That he would deal with him anon. Then some of the Prisoners which were saved by their Books, were burnt in their hands; and for that night there was nothing more done. Then the Judge commanding the jailor to bring the Prisoners betimes in the morning, commanded them to depart: and so for that time every man departed to his place.

The next morning, being the 25th of July, about four of the clock, the Prisoners were brought to the bar, who stayed till the coming of the Judges: who came thither by six of the clock, or thereabouts, and called the Prisoners by their names to receive Sentence of Death: and first, they began with Mr. Udall; who, after he was called, was commanded to stand aside till anon. And then were seven Felons that received Sentence of Death; who being taken aside, Mr. Udall was called the second time; and the Clerk of the Assizes said, 'John Udall, hold up thy hand, what canst thou alledge for thyself, why thou shouldst not receive Judgment to die?'

Udall. My Lords, notwithstanding my earnest pleading and protesting of mine innocency yesterday, which I could and would have done more clearly, but that I was so much interrupted; yet it hath pleased the Jury, upon their consciences, to find me Guilty of that, which, I thank God, never entered into my heart: now therefore must I plead another Plea, and therefore I crave of your lordships to grant me the benefit of the Pardon granted the last parliament.

Judge. I think you can have no benefit by it, for I am deceived if it be not excepted. Then said he to the Clerk, or some other, Reach me the Statute-Book: and whilst he looked in the same

Mr. Udall said, I pray your lordships consider the ground of my Plea, albeit indeed it seems to be excepted: your lordships confessed yesterday, and I shewed it by my lord Anderson's Speeches to me, that it was not thought Felony till of late: and therefore the things that be excepted, be such as be inquirable and punishable in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

- Judge. That is nothing; for if the lesser be excepted, much rather is the greater.

U. My lords, I refer it to your consciences and favourable considerations: the words are these in the Pardon, which he repeated: and they finding it to be as he had said, the Judge said, Here is no help for you. And after other Speeches between them of the meaning of the words of the Pardon, the Judge said, Mr. Udall, your counsel hath deceived you.

Udall. My lords, I have not received any counsel herein, for I have been close prisoner this half year, and therefore could not attain to have any counsel: but thus much have I gathered, which is my Judgment, out of the Book.

Judge. What can you alledge more for yourself? for this helpeth you not.

U. Nothing but mine own innocency, but that your lordships may proceed.

Judge. What say you? Are you contented to submit yourself to the Queen.

U. Yea, or else I were not worthy to live in her highness's dominions.

Judge. But will you acknowledge yourself to have offended her majesty in making this Book? She is gracious and full of mercy; it may be, that we, reporting your Submission unto her majesty, may procure her Pardon for you.

U. May it please your lordships to hear me; The cause for which I am called in question, I cannot forsake in any sort, for I hold it to be the undoubted Truth of God; but, &c. And then he was interrupted by Judge Puckering, who said,

Judge. Nay, stay there, you cannot go away with that speech unanswered, to buz into the people's ears such a conceit, that it is an undoubted Truth that you hold; for I hold it to be an undoubted falsehood. And then he proceeded further in a large set speech, the effect whereof was, That this land having been governed by sundry nations, hath yet kept her antient laws, which (he affirmed) would be overthrown, if this government that these men seek for, should be established: and then he further shewed, What inconveniencies (as he thought) would come by the same, viz. That we having Laws and Judges appointed to decide all Controversies, this presbytery which these men seek for, would overthrow all, and bring to their censure and government all men's causes, or else they would excommunicate them from their churches: yea, and they are so hot for this government, that they will not stay for the magistrate; and if the magistrate will not, they will reform themselves: and one of them writing in a letter to a friend of his, saith, Let us number out hot brethren, that we may know who will stand to it, for it is high time. So that it is plain, that if they cannot have it with her majesty's consent, they will have it, though it make our hearts to ake, as you say in your book. And whereas her majesty hath revenue belonging to her crown out of the church livings and cathedral churches, these men would have her majesty give unto them those revenues, for the maintenance of their presbytery, and they would allow her a stipend at their discretions; so that they would bring the queen and the crown under their girdles.—And some of these men have gone so far, that they say plainly we have no Church, no Sacrament, no Ministers, nor any Worship of God amongst us. If these things be not looked unto in time, what confusion shall we have in this land shortly? Many other things he spake against the cause of reformation, which I cannot particularly lay down; but this is in effect the substance of it: concluding, he said, Thus much, Mr. Udall, have your speeches enforced me to speak, lest the people here present (being deceived) should be carried away by it. To which Mr. Udall answered briefly:

U. My lords, it is bootless for me to enter disputation with you in this place touching this matter; only this I could wish you, to leave it to be first decided by the learned divines, to whose calling it belongeth. And although some weak men wanting judgment have been headily carried in seeking the furtherance of this cause, and so for want of this government have run into some errors: yet it is no reason to charge us with them; for your lordships know, that we have been the men that have taken the greatest pains to reclaim them to the joining of themselves with the church, from which they have separated themselves.

Judge Clarke. You are deceived; it is not a matter of Divinity only, but it is a matter of State, and within the compass of our profession; and it is not so greatly in controversy, as you would have us to believe it is.

U. It is diversly debated (my lords), and the greatest number of learned men in Christendom do maintain the same.

Judge. How do you know that? Have you been beyond the seas to know the greatest number of learned men to be of this judgment?

U. Your lordships know, that all the churches of France, the Low Countries, and of Scotland, do maintain the same, besides many hundred of learned men in this land.

Judge. Have you been in all these churches, that you can tell so much?

U. I know it to be true (my lords), for their practice doth shew them to be of this judgment.

Judge. Well, if you can alledge no more, neither will submit yourself to the queen's mercy, then hear your Judgment.

U. My lords, I was beginning to speak, but you interrupted me; I pray you hear me what I will say, and then do as God shall move you.

Judge. Let us hear what you will say.

U. As I said before, so I say now, I believe the Cause to be the undoubted Truth of God; and therefore in the matter, I cannot by any means yield: yet seeing, by your order of law, I am found to be guilty, neither can I (for the reverence I bear to her majesty's laws) take any Exceptions against you nor the Jury; but that which you have done, I acknowledge to be done in all equity and right. Seeing, I say, you have found me to be guilty, whereby I cannot live without her majesty's gracious and special favour, I acknowledge, that whatsoever I have done to the advancement of the Cause, I may offend in the manner; in which respect (if I have offended) seeing it hath pleased your lordships and the Jury to find me guilty, I do willingly submit myself, and heartily crave her majesty's Pardon.

Judge. But are you sorry that you have offended the queen's majesty?

U. I am sorry that the course of the law hath found me to have offended.

Judge. So is every thief that is condemned sorry, that his offence is found out, but not for the fact. This is a plain fallacy.

Judge. My lord, indeed if it were so as your lordship doth understand it, it were a plain fallacy: but I say farther, if in the manner of handling so good a Cause, there be found in me any offence against her majesty's laws, I acknowledge, that in the manner of handling it, her majesty may be justly offended, for which I am sorry. And I protest that I have never gone about to advance it by any other means, than by manifesting it to all men, and tendering it to them in authority; and that by such means as might not be contrary to the laws of this land, that so it might be received by her majesty and the state: and this is the care of us all, howsoever we be charged with factions.

Judge. You say, If there be found any Offence; whereby you call in question the equity of dealing in this court against you.

U. My lords, I do not, neither will I; let it be looked into by you and the rest whom it concerneth, I hope you would not deal otherwise than lawfully against me.

Judge Puck. You say, you seek no unlawful means: What can be meant but unlawful means in the words of your Book? 'If it come in by that means that will make all your hearts to ake, blame yourselves.' What good means can be meant by these words?

U. My lords, yesterday I shewed you what I took to be the meaning of the Author in some places of the Book alledged against me in the indictment; and then I would have spoken unto all, but you cut me off: I pray you therefore let me shew you the meaning of the Author in those words now.

Judge. Let us hear you how you expound it.

U. My lords, your lordships must understand, that the Author taketh it for granted, that the Cause is God's, and must prevail: and therefore, seeing God hath used all the means of his mercy to bring it in, in giving us a gracious prince, long peace, and abundance, and of stirring up some to exhibit supplications to the parliament; these things not prevailing in his mercy, he will bring it in by some judgment, as plague or famine, or some such-like punishment: and this is always the manner of God's dealing.

Judge. You cannot expound it so; for the words import another thing.

U. My lord, the Author himself expoundeth it so in the words following; where he saith, 'That it must prevail, for such a judgment will overtake this land, as shall make the ears of all that hear thereof to tingle.' So that he meaneth nothing but this, That God will bring it in by his own hand, by judgment, if by mercy he cannot prevail.

Judge. No, no; your meaning was, that it should be brought in by force and violence.

U. God forbid! Far be it from us to conceive any such imagination. The Author of that Book doth plainly shew, that he meant no such thing; and the words following, in the end of the Epistle, do declare the same; for there he sheweth by whom it is to be brought in, namely, by her majesty and her honourable counsellors, that they may see it, and establish the same.

Judge. Nay, the meaning is, That if the Queen will not, yet you say, it shall come in; for so the words are, 'That it must prevail, maugre the Heads of all that stand against it.'

U. Nay, my lords, the words are, 'Maugre the Malice of all that stand against it.' For there are many Heads that are not maliciously bent against it: there is great difference between Malice and Heads; for some are against the Cause through ignorance.

Judge. It is all one in effect.

U. Nay, my lords, there is great difference.

Judge Puck. Well, Mr. Udall, you were best to submit yourself to the queen's mercy, and leave these courses; for I tell you, that your Book is most seditious and slanderous against her majesty and the State; and yet I assure you, that your Book had been passed over, if there had not come forth presently after it such a number of slanderous Libels, as 'Martin Mar-Prelate,' 'Martin's Epitome,' 'Martin Jun.' or 'Theses Martinianæ,' 'Martin Sen.' and other such-like; of which your Book was judged to be the ring-leader.

U. My lords, those that are learned, and do maintain this Cause, do judge this book to be written very indifferently, howsoever it be hardly construed. But for 'Martin,' and the rest of those Books that you have named, they were never approved by the Godly learned: and I am fully persuaded, that those Books were not done by any Minister; and I think there is never a minister in this land, that doth know who 'Martin' is. And I for my part, have been inquisitive, but I could never learn who he is.

Judge Clarke. You will not acknowledge yourself faulty in any thing, and therefore it is in vain to stand any longer with you.

U. I will easily confess, that in manner the Author hath offended: for no man can handle a cause so well, but there will fault appear in it, as appeareth by Job, who having a good cause, handled it weakly: it is easier to handle an ill cause cunningly, than a good one well.

Judge. Nay, but you have maliciously offended in publishing this Book, which tendeth to the overthrowing of the State, and the moving of Rebellion.

U. My lords, that be far from me; for we teach that, reforming things amiss, if the prince will not consent, the weapons that subjects are to fight withal, are repentance and prayers, patience and tears.

Judge. Yea, you had done well if you had used these weapons, rather than to have made this book.

U. God forbid but that we should give unto her majesty that honour which justly is due unto her! For we have not taught the people to reform the state without the prince, and our practice hath proved the same; for we never taught any of her subjects to go before her, but to leave that honour as belongeth to her majesty.

Judge. Well, will you submit yourself or not? for else I must proceed to judgment, and I have no authority to favour you, neither will I stay sentence of death according to my office: what my brother hath I know not, and therefore shortly submit yourself, or else I am to pronounce sentence of death.

U. And I am ready to receive it: for I protest before God (not knowing that I am to live an hour) that the cause is good, and I am contented to receive sentence, so that I may leave it to posterity how I have suffered for the cause. But, my lords, the Cause excepted, I will submit myself in any thing.

Judge. Let the Cause alone, and tell us no more of it, but acknowledge yourself to have offended the queen's majesty.

U. I may not in any case yield in the Cause; I have almost ever since I was a Preacher of the Gospel professed it, and therefore I cannot be at this time changed.

Judge. Let (I say) the Cause alone, say what you will do.

U. I must needs profess it and mention it, lest it should be thought that I have started from it; but for any thing that I have done in the manner against law, I am heartily sorry for it: more than this I cannot say, do with me what you will.

Judge. But are you sorry for offending her majesty and her laws, and be you contented to amend, and to live in obedience as becometh a good subject?

U. I am content to seek the advancement of this cause by no other means, than that which may stand with the laws of this land, and the duty of a good subject.

Judge. I come not here to intreat you to submit yourself, but you shall do it willingly upon your knees, and crave her maj.'s mercy.

U. Then Mr. Udall kneeling down, saith, I refuse not any kind of Submission to her majesty: and I intreat your lordships to be a means to her majesty for me; and if I were worthy that my poor papers might come unto her majesty, or to her honourable council, I would write thus much unto them.

Judge. Nay, will you write thus much unto us, that we may first see it and commend it to her majesty?

U. I willingly do it.

Thus they dismissed him.

And this is the Sum of that which I with the help of others could remember, having not any intent to leave out or enlarge any thing further than the meaning of the speakers did intend:

notwithstanding many more things were said on both sides, especially the set Speeches of both the Judges, and of Mr. Daulton, to the disgrace of the desired Reformation, which could not well be expressed in particular, and therefore I have left them. Also many other things Mr. Udall proposed and begun to say, which they stopped, so that they could not be perceived.

The Assizes being thus ended, Mr. Udall was returned to the Prison of the White-Lion again, where he continued till the Sessions at Southwark, beginning the 18th Febr. 1590: during which time he wrote a Supplication of Submission to the queen's majesty as followeth:

"MOST gracious and dread Sovereign, the present and lamentable estate wherein I stand, being found guilty by Verdict, to be Author of a Book entitled, 'A Demonstration of Discipline,' and being, without your gracious Pardon, to die for the same; I humbly prostrate myself at your majesty's feet, submitting myself in most humble manner as becometh a dutiful subject, to such order as it shall please your highness to appoint, to whom God hath given so high and sovereign a power, as is able both to kill and to quicken, to bring to the Gates of Death, and to cause to return to the Comfort of Life again: Before whom standing thus convict, I am not to plead my innocency; yet I most humbly desire it may not offend your excellent majesty, that I protest (of the truth whereof I call God to witness, who knoweth all secrets, and will judge both the quick and the dead) that I had never any thought or imagination to publish, write, or do any thing maliciously, or tending to the dishonour or slander of your majesty's royal person or princely estate, under whose gracious government I have attained so many benefits and blessings; amongst which I most highly esteem the true knowledge and fear of God; in regard whereof, I have been always ready even to adventure my life, for the preservation of your most royal person and defence of your princely estate, and the same have also taught unto others, as a thing specially commanded by God: notwithstanding, fearing the severity of justice unto death, I fly for life unto your majesty's most gracious mercy, most humbly desiring your highness of your merciful compassion, for relief of my poor and miserable estate, to grant me your gracious and comfortable pardon, whereby I may be discharged, both of the offence and punishment, which the law hath laid upon me. Other hope than this have I none, but the trust I have in God, (according to his promises) that your majesty by a special gift of God is gracious and merciful, and have vouchsafed to shew mercy even unto such as were not only by imputation of law, but indeed malicious and mortal enemies to your highness; and therefore I hope that the same goodness of so princely a nature may be moved, and will shew forth itself in like gracious compassion on my behalf. Which gracious Pardon on my knees I most humbly crave your excellent majesty to grant unto me, by which special favour being raised as it were from the dead, I promise and vow to lead the rest of my life in all humble and dutiful obedience unto your majesty; praying continually for the preservation of your highness's precious life and happy government, to the honour of Almighty God, and the comfort of all obedient and dutiful subjects.

Further Proceedings against Mr. UDALL, at the Assizes in Southwark: 33 ELIZABETH, February 18, 19, 20, A. D. 1590.

BEING called the first day of the Assizes in the afternoon, serjeant Puckering said: We do not mean now to deal with you, only I must put you in mind that you have made a Petition, wherein you promise to submit yourself to such order as her majesty shall appoint; consider of it, and look that you do it, for I can tell you, it is looked for at your hands.

Udall. I know not, my lord, what you mean; I made a Petition to her majesty, and will willingly perform any thing promised therein.

Puck. Well, advise well with yourself, and look that you do it, I tell you beforehand.

U. Unless you mean that, I know not your meaning.

Justice Fenner dwelling in Surry, sat on the bench, and said: Mr. Udall, I must needs say something unto you; I have heard much good of you, and that you are learned; it were pity you should do otherwise than well; I pray you take heed that those good things which are in you be not marred for want of humility: I tell you humility is a special virtue in a man of your calling, the want whereof marreth all in them that want it; I pray you stand not in your own opinion too much: I have heard that you have done much good, let not humility be wanting, &c.

U. My lord, I acknowledge that humility is a virtue generally required in a man of my calling, without which all other gifts are nothing; for 'God resisteth the proud, and giveth wisdom to the simple:' and I desire that the same virtue may be found in me. But I trust your meaning is not thereby to persuade me to deny the Truth, which I trust the Lord will keep me from, whatsoever befall me.

Fen. I speak to you of good-will, I would not have you stiff in your own conceit.

Puck. Remember what I said unto you.

And so I was carried into a Chamber to be conferred with by some of the Bench, &c. And when that promise which the Judge so much spake of came to be examined, it was nothing but a Sentence in my Submission to her highness, the meaning whereof is (as the words going before it, and immediately following it, do declare) that I professed myself willing to live or die, according as that power which God hath given to her majesty shall appoint.—I having been dealt withal to this effect the first day of the Assizes (by certain of the Bench in private) as also the second day by some of them to this effect, that I would make such a Submission as would condemn the book in question, and justify the hierarchy; and perceiving that I was not to be heard till the last day, I intreated sir Wm. Moore and Mr. Bowyer to be a mean to the Judges for me; that, forasmuch as my case was rare, and I had (as I was persuaded) sufficient to alledge, why (notwithstanding the verdict against me) judgment ought to be stayed, I might be heard over night, that so (according to that good counsel given by them unto me, to advise with myself, and to consider what I would do) also they might have a night to think of what I had to say, and the next day to do with me as God should move them.

VOL. I.

Hereupon I was fetched forth before the Judges in private, immediately after dinner; who using many persuasions to draw me to relent (which being in private, I will not express) told me that they sent for me, for that they understood I desired to be heard over-night, which they were willing then and there to do. I answered, My lords, my meaning was not to desire private, but public, hearing, seeing I have nothing to say, but such as would prevent myself, and disappoint my public speech, if I should utter it in private: yet because they told me their other affairs would not permit them to have any time with me till the latter end of the assizes, I was rather willing that I should be prevented, than they should be constrained to determine on a sudden upon so weighty a matter: whereupon I did draw out a paper for each of them, containing these reasons following:

I humbly pray your Lordships to consider, whether these Reasons ought not in conscience to move you to stay the Sentence, notwithstanding the verdict against me, and to be means of my release.

1. It seemeth that my Case is not esteemed Felony by the Judges of the land, seeing they do usually sit in the High Commission Court, where the printing and dispersing of the same, and such like Books, are usually enquired after as transgressions of another nature. 2. No Judgment in law ought to be given in case of Felony, but upon a party first found Guilty thereof by a Verdict of twelve men; but I am not so: for proof whereof, I pray you it may be remembered, that your lordship gave the Jury in issue only for the trial of the fact, whether I were Author of such a Book, and freed them from enquiring the intent, without which there is no felony. 3. I humbly pray you call to mind by what means the Jury was drawn to give that Verdict they did, whether they were left wholly to their own consciences, or were wrought unto it partly by promise, assuring it should be no further danger unto me, but tend to my good; and partly by fear, as appeareth in that it hath been an occasion of great grief unto some of them ever since. And then I pray you to consider, whether upon such a verdict so drawn from twelve simple men, Christian judges, in a good conscience, may proceed to Sentence of Death? 4. In case the Verdict was never so free, yet your lordships being men of wisdom and knowledge, are to consider, whether the statute whereupon I am indicted, do agree to my Case in the truth and meaning of it, there being nothing in that book spoken of her majesty's person, but in duty and honour; and whether the drawing of it from her majesty to the bishops (as being a part of her body politic) be not a violent depraving and wresting of the statute? which if it be, you being christian Judges, cannot in a good conscience upon such a ground proceed to sentence, contrary to your own knowledge. 5. But if the Statute be to be taken so as it is urged, it ought to be considered that without a malicious intent against her majesty's person, the statute itself maketh no act forbidden by it to be felonious; wherein I appeal first to God, and then to all men that have seen the whole course of my life, and to your lordships own consciences, wherein I pray you to examine yourselves in the sight of God, whether either by yourselves, or the just report of any other, you can find me guilty of any act in all my life, that savoured of any malice or malicious intent against her majesty, or of any other behaviour than standeth with the allegiance and duty of a most dutiful and christian subject. Of which malice or malicious intent against her majesty, if your consciences clear me before God, the act wherewith I am charged being not felony without such an intent; I hope you will consider that you cannot with a good conscience proceed to judgment. 6. Yet if the statute and intent were such as it is said, in case of life the evidences ought to be pregnant, and full living witnesses (I am sure by the word of God, and I trust also by the laws of this land) were to have been produced face to face to charge me. But I have none such against me, neither any other thing, saving only papers and reports of depositions taken by ecclesiastical commissioners and others; which kind of proof the judges of the land cast away in case of lands, and by no means allow to be sufficient, and therefore are much less to be allowed in a case of life: which being so, your lordships ought to have a conscience, that upon so weak Evidences sentence of death be not pronounced. 7. But if the same that hath been given in for evidence in writing, had been testified by men living, standing out in the presence of the court, and of me the accused; I trust your lordships will consider that no one of the evidences do directly prove me to be the author of the book in question; which as it was, hath little force in it, as appeareth by this, that the author of the chiefest testimony is so grieved, that he is ashamed to come where he is known.

Whereupon, howsoever the jury have not discerned thereof, yet you being men of skill and understanding, are to have regard of it, and not upon so weak and impertinent proofs, to proceed to Judgment of Death. 8. If all these things were such as they ought to be, yet your lordships are to consider (supposing me to be the Author of the Book in question) that the said book for the substance of it containeth nothing but that which is taught and believed to be a part of the gospel of Christ, by all the best reformed churches in Europe; wherein nothing being diverse from them, I cannot be condemned, without condemning in me all such nations and churches as hold the same doctrine. In which (if there be no error in them) the offence commonly being in form, circumstance and manner of writing, which some men may think worthy an admonition, some more severe worthy correction and amercement, the sharpest cannot judge it to deserve more than some short time of imprisonment. But death for an error of such a kind, in terms and words not altogether dutiful of certain bishops, cannot be but extreme cruelty: Which seeing it ought to be far from any christian man that hath the bowels of Christ in him, surely christian judges professing the gospel, for a service of the gospel (saving some oversight in words and terms) ought not to proceed against me (who have endeavoured to shew myself a dutiful subject and faithful minister of the gospel) to give Sentence of Death. 9. My offence not being aggravated, but remaining as it was the last Assizes when my Submission was accepted, and Judgment thereupon staid; I trust your favour will be the same towards me now also, seeing I am ready to do the like.—If all this prevail not, yet my Redeemer liveth, to whom I commend myself, and say as sometimes Jeremy said in a case not much unlike; 'Behold I am in your hands, do with me what seemeth good unto you: but know you this, that if you put me to death, you shall bring innocent blood upon your own heads, and upon the land.' As the blood of Abel, so the blood of Udall will cry to God with a loud voice, and the righteous judge of the world will require it at the hands of all those that shall be guilty of it.

This is the Sum of that which I delivered to the Judges.

The Assizes being almost finished, and the other prisoners, that were called to the bar to have Sentence of Death, standing forth to hear the same; I was at the last called, and demanded what I could say for myself why I should not have Judgment to die. Hereupon I humbly craving audience, began to this effect:

U. My lords, I do acknowledge that I have been hitherto proceeded against by due course of law, and that a Verdict was given in against me the last Assizes as Guilty of Felony, &c. But I do not only, as heretofore, protest mine innocence, but also think that I have sufficient to alledge why (notwithstanding the Verdict) Judgment ought not to be given; wherefore I intreat to be heard.

Judge Puck. I pray you stay, you seem in the beginning to speak contraries; for first you acknowledge the course of law to be due, and afterwards stand upon it that you are innocent. How can a due course of law condemn the innocent?

U. These things agree well enough, as I will shew, if it shall please you to give me leave: it is by due course of law that I have been indicted, arraigned, have had a Jury impanelled upon me, been accused, heard speak for myself, and testimony produced against me: but in that the proof by witness was insufficient, and the Jury either in Judgment or affection misled; thereupon it hath come to pass, that (notwithstanding the due course of law) guiltiness is laid upon a guiltless person. But I pray you let me proceed to the Reasons that I have to alledge for myself.

Then I left the first Reason of purpose, seeing I did rather wish that they only should understand it (which they did by my Papers overnight) than to blaze it to the world; so that I did begin to speak according to the second Reason mentioned before: whereupon serjeant Puckering prayed baron Clarke to speak, seeing it did most concern him.

Judge Clarke. I must needs tell you, you do us and the Seat of Justice great wrong: indeed I told the Jury, what was the law in the opinion of all the Judges of the land; for it was not my private opinion, as I said also at that time.

U. It is not material, my lord, in this case, what the judges think; for though all the judges in the world thought so, our laws thought no man a Felon, or capable of sentence as a Felon, till he be convicted by the Verdict of twelve men.

Clarke. You are so convicted, as the Record will testify.

U. I acknowledge the Record against me, but I appeal to your lordship's conscience, whether you delivered not unto them speeches to this effect: 'As for the Felony you are not so much to enquire, but only whether he made the Book, leaving the Felony to us.'

Clarke. You do me great wrong, I only told them the law.

U. Well, I leave it to your lordship's favourable consideration; you perceive my reason.

Then I spake to the third Reason, whereupon it was said:

Puck. All that you say tendeth to the disgracing of the court of justice holden against you heretofore; the Jury were left to their own consciences, and did as they saw meet to do.

U. No, my lords, I speak not any thing to disgrace the Court of Justice; for I acknowledge both this course, and all others of the like nature, to be God's holy ordinance, which I ought to reverence; neither do I speak to defame the Jury, but only to give your lordships occasion why you may not proceed to Sentence thereupon: for if the Jury did well, why should it grieve any of them? If they did ill, your lordships may not proceed to Sentence thereupon.

Puck. We cannot remember the particular circumstances that then passed, neither are we to call in question the Verdict; but it is our office to give Sentence according to it.

U. I pray your lordships tell me one thing, Must the Judges always give Sentence according to the Verdict, or may there not be cause to stay it?

Clarke. Yes, there may be cause to stay the Verdict, such may the case be.

U. And I desire no other, but that my Reasons may be well weighed, whether my case be such or no.

Then I prayed, for so much as they had the Substance of that in Writing aforehand which I meant to say, it would please them to give me leave to say at once what I could, lest my memory (being so much weakened and dulled by Imprisonment) should fail me, and so I leave some material thing unspoken. Then I spake according to the fourth and fifth Reasons, whereunto little was replied, saving such things as were mentioned at my Arraignment: only baron Clarke used a very long speech, wherein he compared Mr. Stubb's Cause and mine together; and after the end of his speech, judge Puckering said,

Puck. Who taught you such law? I tell you, you are much deceived and abused in it; one may be within the compass of Felony, though he do not directly mean any such thing.

U. Your lordship knoweth I pleaded these points the last assizes, when I came from close Imprisonment to the bar: I understand English, which is the language wherein the Statute was written, and I profess myself a scholar; and therefore to have (through God's mercy) some understanding of the sense of that I read. It seemeth to me the most direct, and no otherwise to be taken than I understand it.

Then I spake according to the sixth and seventh Reasons, whereunto it was replied thus:

Puck. You are deceived, in that you think the Witnesses against you the less lawful, because the parties were not present. It is an ordinary thing to have Witnesses examined in the Chancery, and other such like courts, which do remain there of as sufficient credit for ever, as they were when the party's oath was taken upon the same.

U. Then would I have answered that the case was not alike, seeing the High-Commission is no Court of Record; but I was not then suffered to speak, for that it was said by the other Judge:

Clarke. Where do you find that there must needs (by the Word of God) be two Witnesses' fate to face?

U. It is so clear, as the Witnesses were also to have the first hand in executing the punishment upon the party offending.

Puck. That was according to Moses's Law, which we are not tied unto.

U. It is the Word of God, which hath a perpetual equity in it; for the life of man is so precious in the sight of God, as he would not have it taken away without most evident and manifest proof, such as in his law is set down.

Clarke. We are not now to call in question the Proofs, seeing the Jury did think them sufficient: this speech of yours tendeth to prove the Jury perjured.

U. Not so, my lord; I think of them, that they did according to their consciences: but being men unlearned, and the case being strange unto them, they may have done their best; and yet you being men of more knowledge and judgment, are to look further into the matter.

Puck. Whereas you say that none of the Witnesses did directly prove you the Author of the fact, that was not necessary; for if all laid together, and the circumstances considered, do prove it, it is as good a proof as if every witness were direct.

U. But the Law of God, from which I trust our laws disagree not, would that every proof be direct.

Puck. And do you think indeed, that the laws of this land are agreeable to the Word of God?

U. I do not profess to know them; but surely I have so reverent an opinion of them, that I trust the grounds of them are according to the Word of God, however in some particulars the proceedings may miss thereof.

Puck. Then the government by Arch-Bishops, and Lord Bishops, is according to the Word of God, seeing the laws of the land do allow them.

U. I pray you, my lord, take me not so general; for that will not follow upon my speeches.

Puck. Well, you may not now disgrace the Witnesses; you should have done it at your Arraignment.

U. I neither meant then, nor purpose now to disgrace the Witnesses, but to shew the insufficiency of their Testimony in this case, that your lordships may thereby see some reason to stay the Sentence. The first Testimony that was alledged, was that of Mr. Chatfield, who affirmeth, that it was not given in against me upon his oath; but only in his anger he set his hand to, but is now sorry for it.

Puck. You should have alledged this before; it is now too late.

U. It is alledged too late, to prevent the Verdict: but if there be any force in it, it ought to be considered to stay the Sentence: I could alledge it no sooner, because I knew it not till after the Verdict.

Puck. We may not suffer you to proceed so, to disgrace that which is passed already: if you have any other thing to say, speak on; otherwise we must do our office.

U. It is not my meaning, howsoever you take it, to disgrace any thing passed heretofore; only I pray you further to consider, that Thompkins, whose Testimony only carried some shew, protested before my commitment, that he would not for all the world affirm me to be the Author of the Book.

Puck. Why did you not plead these things to the Jury?

U. I did so, and offered to produce sufficient Proof for it; but your lordships answered, that no Witnesses might be heard in my behalf, seeing it was against the queen: which seemeth strange to me; for methinks it should be for the queen, to hear all things on both sides, especially when the life of any of her subjects is in question.

Puck. The Witnesses were then thought by the Jury sufficient to prove the matter, which we may not now call in doubt; therefore say on, if you have any more.

U. Then I spake according to the eighth Reason; whereupon it was said,

Clarke. I tell you, you are not called in question for the Cause (as you call it) nor for the body of the Book; but only for slanderous things in the Preface, against her majesty's government, and therefore you may let the Cause alone.

U. But it is for the hatred borne to the Cause, that I am thus entreated; for had not it been handled in the Book, such matter as is now made of the Preface, had never been objected against me, or any other.

Puck. Well, it is best for you to leave off all other Pleas, and submit yourself to the queen's majesty's mercy.

U. I will do so with all my heart.

Puck. But will you do it as you did the last Assizes?

U. Yes, that I will: And so I spake according to the last Reason; whereupon it was said,

Puck. You confessed that you were justly condemned.

U. I am not yet condemned.

Puck. I mean convicted by the Jury. Then you acknowledged that you had offended her majesty; that you were sorry for it, and promised that you would never do the like again.

U. My lord, it is not for me to oppose my word and credit (which is nothing) against yours; I refer it to them that heard it: only, I pray you, give me leave to speak of it, as I take it that it was. First, I did avow (and so I do now, and will do whilst I live) that the Cause handled in that Book, is an undoubted truth.

Clarke. How often shall we bid you leave the Cause, and tell you, that you are not troubled for it?

U. But it is the Cause that is sought to be defaced in my person, and therefore I must and will still profess it, and justify it, whatsoever disgrace I receive by it unto myself. I pray you let me proceed. Secondly, I did protest that I never had any purpose to deface, but ever to seek to honour her majesty and her government. Thirdly, I professed that the course of law against me was due; whereby what I have meant, you have heard. Fourthly, I said, that I never had any purpose to do any thing to the advancement of this Cause, but keeping myself, to the uttermost of my power, within the compass of the law. Lastly, I never confessed myself to be the Author of the Book. Then my Submission was this, That if I had done any thing to the advancement of so holy a Cause, which had brought me within compass of the law, or might justly offend her majesty, I was heartily sorry for it. If this be not it, let me have any other drawn, wherein the former points are justified, and I will set my hand unto it.

Puck. But all this is nothing to your Book in particular; what say you to it?

U. I say this, That though I hold the matter in it to be a most manifest truth; yet I confess the manner of handling, in some part, to be such as might justly provoke her majesty's indignation.

Puck. Because you stand so much upon the Cause, as you call it, you provoke me so, as I must needs say somewhat of it, lest the audience should think some matter in it, more than is.

U. My Lord, you understand my judgment therein: I beseech you speak not against it, unless you will give me leave to reply unto you.

Puck. I may not do so, you provoke me to it; your Discipline that you stand upon, whereupon is it grounded? Forsooth upon the saying of Christ, 'Tell the Church;' which never was expounded these 1500 years as you do within these few years.

U. My Lord, he did abuse you that told you so: Chrysostom expounded it, 'Tell the Church,' that is, the Governours of the Church.

Puck. He meant the Governours of the Jewish Synagogue.

U. How can that be, when he lived above 400 years after Christ?

Puck. Was there never any that could find it out before now, if it were a truth?

U. Yes; it hath Testimony sufficient, if it might be received.

Puck. And lest men should think that your matter were as good as you pretend, I will tell you what I know; as it is written in one of your Books, that without an Eldership there is no Salvation.

U. I am persuaded that cannot be shewed.

Puck. Yes, it is in 'Theses Martiniana.' One writ that it is time to number our hot brethren; another, Mr. Snape of Northampton by name, wrote that the Bishops should be put down all in one day.

These things he did discourse of at large, in an invective Speech, most bitter, tending to persuade the people that we meant to rebel, and set up the Discipline, and pull down the Bishops by strong hand; and went about to impair the queen's prerogative and patrimony. After which, with much ado, I got audience to this effect.

U. My Lord, I protest in the presence of God, and hearing of all this people, that neither I, nor any of my brethren, that ever I was acquainted with, to my knowledge, did so much as ever purpose, or speak of any such means as your lordship mentioned to bring in the Discipline; but only by prayer to God, supplication to her majesty, and such other peaceable means: this is my Answer to your large Invective. And whereas, my lord, you seem to be so hardly carried against the Cause, I would not doubt, but if I might privately confer with you, with the blessing of God, to persuade you to be a friend unto it.

And after some other speeches of other Books, and the aforesaid speeches in the Books mentioned already, Judge Puckering said,

Puck. Nay, I tell you there are as foul things in your own Book: for, do you not say, that the Church is committed to the Mistress of the Stews, and ruled by the laws of a Brothel-House?

U. It is spoken of the Popish Canon-Law; which is as unfit to rule the Church of Christ, as the laws of a Brothel-House to govern an honest woman.

Puck. And those laws are established by her majesty's laws.

U. It would trouble the learnedest lawyer in England to prove that.

Then baron Clarke began a voice, tending again to compare my Case to that of Mr. Stubbs, and to persuade me to submit myself, telling me what good I might do; but because he spake low, and I said I did not well hear him, he gave over, and prayed the other to speak, who told me his meaning: and then said,

Puck. We shall make short work with you: will you here acknowledge all the Laws Ecclesiastical and Temporal of this land, to be agreeable to the Word of God?

U. My Lord, I have disgrace enough upon me already: you may easily perceive what I think of the present Ecclesiastical Government. I pray you press me not with these things, I can yield no further than you have heard.

Puck. Then we must do our office, and pronounce Sentence on you.

U. God's will be done.

Puck. Yea, God's will be done on you indeed.

Then he gave Sentence upon me and the rest. After which I did purpose to speak according to the last Sentence, after the Reasons; but the clamours of the other Prisoners, calling to the Judges to be good unto them, disappointed me thereof. Thus was I returned to Prison; what will be the issue, I know not. The Lord turn it to his glory, the good of his church, and shame of his foes; and then welcome life or death.

I being reprieved (as the Sheriff said, by her majesty's own commandment), Dr. Bond, one of the queen's chaplains, came to me as from the queen herself, and from the Council, with the Submission that was tendered unto me; to confer with me in general, but especially to persuade me to yield thereunto, or to take the Reasons of my refusal. After two days conference, we agreed upon a Form of Submission, as followeth:

The Form of that Submission which was offered unto me, and I refused.

‘ I John Udall have been hitherto, by due course of law, convicted of Felony, for penning and setting forth a certain Book, called, ‘ A Demonstration of Discipline; wherein false, ‘ slanderous, and seditious matters are contained, against her majesty’s prerogative-royal, ‘ her crown and dignity, and against the laws ‘ and government ecclesiastical and temporal, ‘ established by law under her highness, and ‘ tending to the erecting of a new form of government, contrary to her said laws: all which ‘ Points I do now, by the grace of God, perceive ‘ to be very dangerous to the peace of this ‘ realm and church, seditious in the common- ‘ wealth, and justly offensive to the queen’s most ‘ excellent majesty; so as thereby I now seeing ‘ the grievousness of this my Offence, do most ‘ humbly on my knees, before God and this ‘ presence, submit myself to the mercy of her ‘ highness; being most sorry, that so deeply ‘ and worthily I have incurred her majesty’s ‘ indignation against me: promising, if it shall ‘ please God to move her royal heart to have ‘ compassion on me, a most sorrowful convicted ‘ person, that I will for ever hereafter forsake ‘ all such undutiful and dangerous courses, and ‘ demean myself dutifully and peaceably to all ‘ authorities both civil and ecclesiastical, established in this realm; for I do acknowledge ‘ them to be both lawful and godly, and to be ‘ obeyed of every faithful subject.’

The Form of that Submission whereunto I did consent, and set my hand.

‘ With these three Protestations I do submit myself in manner as followeth: 1. I hold the ‘ Cause of Discipline debated in that Book, to ‘ be an undoubted truth. 2. I never imagined any evil against her majesty’s person or ‘ estate; but have sought to honour them both. ‘ 3. I never proposed to do or persuade any ‘ thing, whereby the Discipline might be advanced, but by peaceable means; endeavouring to keep within the compass of law.’

‘ I John Udall have been by due course of law, convicted and condemned of Felony, for penning and publishing a certain Book, called ‘ The Demonstration of Discipline;’ in the ‘ Preface whereof, some matter, as also the ‘ manner of writing, I confess to be in some ‘ part so bitter and undutiful, as deserveth ‘ justly to be censured and punished, and justly ‘ offensive to the queen’s most excellent majesty: Wherefore the Trial of the law imputing unto me all such defaults as are in that ‘ Book, and laying the punishment of the same, ‘ in most grievous manner, upon me; and I seeing the grievousness of this offence, do most ‘ humbly on my knees, as in the presence of ‘ God, submit myself to the mercy of her highness, being most sorry that so deep and just

‘ occasions should be given to procure her majesty’s displeasure against me; promising that ‘ if it shall please God to move her royal heart ‘ to have compassion on me, a most sorrowful ‘ condemned person, that I will for ever hereafter forsake all undutiful and dangerous ‘ courses, and demean myself dutifully and ‘ peaceably, as becometh a minister of the gospel, and as a loyal subject to the queen’s most ‘ excellent majesty.’

At the same time that Dr. Bond was with me, I received a Letter from a friend of mine, that did solicit sir Walter Raleigh for me; wherein were these words:

‘ Sir Walter Raleigh willed me to let you understand, that her majesty is informed of you, that you hold that the Church of England is no Church, and the Sacraments of the same no Sacraments; and that all her Ecclesiastical Laws are against the Word of God, and so her Government; and that all Ecclesiastical matters ought to be governed by a Presbytery, and she herself to be subject to the censures thereof: And that for these things, and such-like, you are not worthy to live. But if you will write half a dozen Lines under your hand, unto sir Walter, concerning these Opinions, that he may shew it to her majesty, he hopeth to obtain your life. I know it is an easy thing for you to answer all these things; and therefore do it with speed, and in your writing to sir Walter, take knowledge that he hath sent you such word.”

Hereupon I wrote a Letter to sir Walter Raleigh, and what I hold in these Points, as followeth.

To the Right Honourable Sir Walter Raleigh, Kt. Lord Warden of the Stannary:

‘ My duty being remembered unto your lordship, I humbly thank your honour for your care and honourable care over me, and for my good; whereof I trust you shall never be ashamed: most humbly beseeching your good lordship to be a means to appease her majesty’s indignation conceived against me, by means of some Accusations untruly suggested. For, God is my witness, I have never had any earthly thing in so precious account, as to honour her highness; and to draw her subjects to acknowledge with all thankfulness, the exceeding blessings that God bestoweth upon them by her majesty’s happy government, whereof I trust mine Adversaries will be witnesses, when I am dead. I have sent unto your lordship (as in perplexity I could upon the sudden) what I hold concerning certain Points declared unto me, as from your lordship; praying that it would please you to make known the truth thereof unto her highness: And if neither my submission, heretofore delivered, nor these things now set down, will be accepted to draw her highness, of her gracious compassion, to pardon me, that yet it would please her majesty (that the land may not be charged with my blood) to change my punishment from Death to Banishment. Thus trusting your lordship will vouchsafe me this favour, and that it will please her majesty thereupon graciously to consider of me, I humbly take my leave, from the White-Lion, Feb. 22, 1590. Your Lordship's to command, JOHN UDALL, Prisoner."

1. 'I do believe, and have often preached, that the Church of England is a part of the true visible Church of Christ; and that the preaching of the Word and administration of the Sacraments therein, are the holy Ordinances of God, profitable and comfortable to every one that rightly partakes thereof: in which regard I have been, and do yet desire to be, a preacher in the same church; and have communicated in the Sacraments and Prayers therein, for the space of seven years at Kingston, and about a year at Newcastle upon Tyne, immediately before mine imprisonment: And therefore I do from my heart utterly renounce the schism whereinto the Brownists have fallen, in condemning the churches of England, and separating themselves from communicating in the public ministry thereof.—2. I know no other but that the statute-laws of this land do maintain the holy Ministry of the Word and Sacraments, in such manner, as any christian may, with a safe conscience, both administer therein, and communicate therewithal: Also that the law which requireth a Subscription to the articles of Religion, so far as they contain the Doctrine of Faith and Sacraments, is agreeable to the Word of God.—3. I do believe, that by the Word of God, her majesty hath, and ought to have a supreme authority over all persons, in all causes, both ecclesiastical and civil, to enforce every man to do his duty, and to be obedient in every thing that is not contrary to the Word of God. And if the Prince should command any thing contrary to God's Word, it is not lawful for the subjects to rebel or resist, no not so much as in thought, but with patience and humility, to bear all the punishments laid upon them; seeking only by prayer to God, and supplication to authority, and such like peaceable means, to have faults amended.—4. I do believe that by the word of God, the churches rightly reformed ought to be governed ecclesiastically by the ministers assisted with elders; and this is not my private judgment, but such as I have learned out of the Word of God, been confirmed in by the Writings of the most learned and godly men of antient and latter times, and have seen practised with much peace and comfort in the best reformed churches in Europe, and even by those Exiles which her majesty to her great honour hath hitherto protected.—5. I do believe that the censures of the Church ought merely to concern the soul, and may not impeach any subject, much less any prince, in the liberty of body, dominion, goods, or any earthly privilege whatsoever; and that therefore the papal excommunication that deposeth princes, and freeth their subjects from their allegiance, or any part of christian obedience to civil authority, is blasphemous against

God, injurious to all men, and directly contrary to God's Word: neither do I believe that a christian prince ought otherwise to be subject to the Censures of the Church, than our gracious queen professeth herself to be unto the preaching of the Word, and administration of the Sacraments, according to the doctrine of our Church, in Mr. Nowell's Catechism, and the Homilies of the right use of the Church, at this day appointed publicly to be read.—If I understand of any other thing that I am charged to hold as a strange and private opinion, I would be willing to shew my mind freely in it; for my desire is, that her highness might truly be informed of every thing that I hold; so should I be sure to obtain her gracious favour, without which I do not desire to live.'

These things thus passed, I remained as before, without any great hope of liberty, or fear of extremity, until the next Assizes drew near: at last there came Mr. Nowell, dean of Pauls, and Mr. Dr. Andrews with a new Submission, yet containing nothing (one clause excepted) which was not in the former, which I condescended unto; notwithstanding I refused presently to set my hand unto it (though they promised in the name of the council, that in yielding to it I should obtain pardon and liberty) because I would do nothing without good advice and consideration.

The Copy of the Submission given me by Mr. Dean of Pauls, with his name to it, as followeth:

'I John Udall have been heretofore, by due course of law, convicted and condemned of Felony, for penning and publishing a certain Book, called 'The Demonstration of Discipline;' in the preface whereof, some matter, as also the manner of handling of it, I confess in some parts to be so bitter and undutiful, as deserveth justly to be censured and punished according to the laws of this realm, established under her highness, and justly offensive to the queen's most excellent majesty: wherefore I now seeing the grievousness of this offence, do most humbly on my knees, and in the presence of God, submit myself to the mercy of her highness, being most sorry that so deep and just occasion should be given to procure her majesty's displeasure against me; promising that if it shall please God to move her majesty's royal heart to have compassion on me, a most sorrowful condemned person, I will ever hereafter forsake all undutiful, seditious and dangerous courses, and demean myself dutifully, and peaceably, as becometh a minister of the Gospel and a loyal subject of the queen's most excellent majesty.

'This is the true Copy of the Submission sent unto me from her majesty's most honourable Privy Council. ALEXANDER NOWELL.'

When I had weighed with myself, that the Clause which is added may admit a good interpretation, and the omitting of that which is left out of my former Submission, causeth no ill sense of that which is set down, I condescended (being also advised thereunto by my good and godly friends) to set my hand unto it; and thereupon wrote a Letter unto Mr. Nowell as followeth:

“ Right worshipful Mr. Dean,

“ I praise God with all my heart, that authority hath so good remembrance of my lamentable estate, and yet more that by the same I am for my Form of Submission to deal with a man of that piety and wisdom, that you have been worthily in the Church long ago esteemed to be of, and so have continued to this reverend age that you are come unto. It may please you, sir, to understand, that I have considered of the Form of Submission, that your worship brought unto me, and find nothing in it, but that in a good conscience I can yield unto; for it requireth not of me any denial or disallowance of the Cause of Discipline debated in the Book, for which I am in question; the substance of which doctrine I believe to be the undoubted Truth of God, and therefore ought never to deny or disallow it: notwithstanding with my persuasion I take God to witness, that I never purposed to do or persuade any thing, whereby it might be advanced, but by peaceable means, endeavouring to keep within the compass of law. Further also the said Form of Submission chargeth me not with any malice against her majesty, from which likewise I acknowledge as in the presence of our Saviour Christ, that is ready to come to judge the quick and the dead, that I have been always free, and have carried a Christian, loving and dutiful affection to her majesty's royal person and estate, as I know by the Word of God I ought to do; which being so, I have resolved to satisfy the authority from which you brought me the said Form of Submission, and at your good pleasure without further limitation simply to subscribe it.—Good Mr. Dean, in the bowels of Christ have compassion of my estate, more ways lamentable than I can in a few or many words express, or (as I think) any other but only the spirit that is taught to pray with groans that cannot be uttered: and in such Christian compassion, by your favourable and earnest mediation to the authority that may relieve me, procure my Pardon and free Discharge, of the dangers and troubles wherein I am; that I may say with the Prophet, ‘ I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.’—So shall not only my poor wife and children, but I hope many others praise God for you in that respect, and myself as beholden unto you in a case of life, continually pray for your good estate to the Lord of life blessed for ever. Amen.”

After I had thus set my hand hereunto, I advised also to write unto certain of the Council, and other honourable persons besides; partly to let them understand in what sense I had yielded hereunto, and partly to entreat their favour, and furthermore for my liberty: the copy of which Letter (for it was the same word for word to every one, the title of their several estates excepted) here ensueth.

“ My present lamentable condition enforces me, in most humble manner, to crave so much leisure of your lordships from the weighty affairs of the State, as to consider of these few lines. The reverend Mr. Nowell, dean of Paul's, and Mr. Dr. Andrews, a few days ago brought me a Form of Submission (as they said) from authority, with hope of favour for my life, if I would yield unto it. Whereof having considered, and finding nothing in it, but which I had heretofore yielded unto, when Mr. Dr. Bond was with me, one Clause excepted, to wit, That the faults do deserve to be punished according to the laws of the land: which yet hath no such words, but may bear so good a sense, as I think I may in such Form submit myself, without either condemning the suit for a further reformation, or myself as justly deserving by the laws to die; I cannot discern sufficient cause to refuse it, for by the hardest word that I have by the course of law been convicted and condemned: I understand the Form of Proceeding by Indictment, Arraignment, Jury, Witnesses and such like, as also by that Clause, That the manner of writing is in some part such, as deserves justly to be censured and punished by the laws of this land; I mean of such censures as the good laws of this land, administered with justice, do ordain for punishing of such Offences as the manner of writing; which cannot be of death, without malice against her majesty; from which (I take Almighty God to witness) I have been always free. In regard whereof, I feared lest I might be thought to stand too contentiously and undutifully with authority, and to be too careless of mine own estate, if I should not yield to such a Form of Submission as they brought unto me. Wherein having yielded, as far as in conscience I may, and as authority by their means requireth of me; my most humble suit to your lordships is, that in your Christian and honourable compassion of my most lamentable estate, that it may please your lordships, by your favourable mediation to her excellent majesty, to further my most humble suit, for my pardon and free discharge of these my grievous troubles. So shall I be bound yet more heartily to praise God for your honours, and to pray unto God for your prosperous estate long to endure, to the glory of Almighty God, and to your own everlasting comfort.”

Within four or five days after, Mr. Dr. Andrews returned unto me, signifying that all that was done was mistaken, for that was not the Submission that was meant of me, but another. Which when I had perused, I found it the same (only the last Clause left out) which was offered me by the Judges at the Assizes: And he said, the Clerk to whom the making of the Letter to Mr. Nowell was committed, put in one for another. And because I utterly refused to consult of it, as having yielded before to so much as I might, he prayed me to understand what I took exceptions against, and for what reasons. So we entered into many Discourses; as first, how the Discipline could be said to be against the queen's prerogative royal, seeing it was (as I said I did believe) expressed in the Scriptures, whereby all lawful privileges of princes are warranted. Then we debated whether the Supremacy of a Christian prince be the same with an heathen, or diverse from it. After that, whether the authority of princes in making church laws, be de jure, or de facto only: and lastly, of the most points of Discipline. Thus we continued five or six hours, and at last he would have no answer of me then, but he prayed me to advise of it, for he would come again. I answered, that the oftener he came, the welcomer he should be, but I told him I would not accept of it; yet he came twice after, and took my Reasons of my Refusal to yield thereunto; and promising me all the favour he could procure me, he departed.

After this the Assizes approaching, and the general report being that it would go hard with me; I being desirous to use any good means, did not only solicit the earl of Essex, and sir Walter Raleigh, who had heretofore dealt for me; but also I was advised to write again unto Mr. Nowell, earnestly charging him to take my case to heart, seeing he had promised to procure me favour: whereupon I wrote unto him this Letter following:

Right worshipful Mr. Nowell.

As I did rejoice when I perceived that you were employed to deal with me about my Submission, because of that reverend estimation that you have been so long, among the Worthies in the Church of God; hoping, that I should have found thereby, some comfortable means of mediation unto authority for my release: so I am now occasioned to fear that all that credit which you are of, shall be used as an instrument to further and hasten extremity upon me. For so much time being passed since I voluntarily yielded to that Submission which you brought unto me, and no liberty appearing from any place, but rather that being given out, that my Submission shall be a special means to hasten my death, and no way to procure my liberty; I am constrained to write unto you, to let you understand, that as I look for that end the next week at the Assizes at King-ton (where I have been a Preacher which hath so long been threatened but (to the doubling of my torments) deferred; whereunto I doubt not the Lord will strengthen me, as graciously he hath hitherto done: So I pray you, as you will answer unto God for my blood, which I am persuaded your credit being employed to the uttermost (as in the Word and Faith of a Christian you promised) might have preserved, that you would so take my case to heart, as it may inforce you to leave no stone unturned which may either further my liberty, or at least clear your conscience from being any way accessory to my death. For it will one day be an heavy thing to your heart, to think that you should be set on work, and the account that is worthily made of you employed under pretence, yea, and it were with assurance of life and liberty, to draw that from a Preacher and Professor of the Gospel, which afterward shall be used to hasten his end: and you will say it had been better that you had never been of any reckoning, than to be made an instrument to further such an action. This I write unto you, not in any troubled affection with the fear of death, for I thank God I am willing to end my days, and (if it please the Lord), even in this manner; and hope that my death shall further the cause for which I suffer, more than my life: but lest I should neglect any means which might seem to be a furtherance to prevent the same, or leave that duty unperformed unto you, which I take myself in conscience bound to discharge. The Lord make us willing and able to discharge every good duty, that he enjoineth us, to his glory, the good of his Church, and our own comfort, whether by Life or Death!

About the same time came a Letter from the king of Scotland to a Scottish merchant, one Mr. Johnson, lying in London, to be delivered to her majesty (as was said), being written in my behalf, as he had done once before when I was close Prisoner; this Letter did the merchant deliver to her majesty, and the dean of Paul's upon my Letter went to the Council; whereby whatsoever was wrought, as soon as the Judges heard that I was brought to Kingston, where the Assizes were then kept, I was immediately returned unto the White-Lion in the evening, before the first day thereof. Afterward Mr. Johnson had the Copy of the king's Letter sent unto him, which then appeared to be written not for me alone, but also for the rest of my brethren the Ministers in Prison for the same Cause of Discipline; the tenor of which Letter here followeth:

RIGHT Excellent, High and Mighty Princess, our dearest sister and cousin, in our heartiest manner we recommend us unto you: hearing of the apprehension of Mr. Udall, and Mr. Cartwright, and certain other Ministers of the Evangel within your realm, of whose good erudition and fruitful travels in the Church, we hear a very credible commendation; howsoever that their diversity from the bishops and others of your clergy, in matters touching them in conscience, hath been a mean by their dilation to work them your misliking; at this present we cannot (weighing the duty which we owe to such as are afflicted for their conscience in that profession) but by our most effectuous and earnest Letter interpose us at your hands, to any harder usage of them for that cause: requesting you most earnestly, that for our cause and intercession it may please you to let them to be relieved of their present strait, and whatsoever further accusations or pursuit depending on that ground, respecting both their former merit, in setting forth of the Evangel, the simplicity of their conscience in this defence, which can-

'not well be their lett by compulsion, and the 'great slander which could not fail to fall out
'upon their further straiting for any such oc'casione: which we assure us your zeal for re'ligion, besides the expectation we have of your 'good-will to please us, will willingly accord
'to our request, having such proofs from time 'to time of our like disposition to you, in any 'matters which you recommend unto us. And 'thus, right excellent, right High and Mighty
'Princess, our dear sister and cousin, we com'mit you to God's good protection. From
'Edinburgh the 13th day of June, 1591.

Presently upon these things fell out that wretched matter of that leud fellow Hacket, whereby the adversary did take occasion so to slander the truth, and to disgrace the professors of the same unto her majesty, that I thought it bootless to sue. And so I did little till the Lord Chancellor was dead, and forgotten by such as were sorry for it; so that about Easter term following, I sued for liberty to go to church, which was denied me, being a condemned man: but by the lord Treasurer's means, I got a copy of my indictment, which before I could not obtain.

Hereupon I getting a Pardon framed according to the Indictment, sent it with a Petition by my wife to the Council, who referred me to the Archbishop, unto whom I both had sent divers Petitions, and dutiful Letters, and also got many of my friends, both honourable personages and others, to sue him, yet could not his good-will be gotten. At last the Turkey merchants having my consent to go for a tyme into Guinea to teach their people that abide in that place, if they could procure my liberty, sent unto him for his consent, who promised his good-will, so that they would be bound that I should go indeed, when I had my liberty.

But when two of the antients of the company went unto him for his hand thereunto, he would not yield it, unless they would be bound not only that I should go (which they were willing unto) but also that I should tarry there, till I had her majesty's licence to come thence.—
This condition they could not yield unto, for that I denied to go upon any such ground; so was their suit, and my hope of liberty, at an end; saving that one Mr. Cavell, who had been the first beginner of it, and being to go into Turkey did most affect it, moved the dean of Paul's in it: who thereupon wrote to my lord Keeper, persuading him of the conveniency of that journey for me, and my fitness there-unto. Which letter when he received, he did so deal with the archbishop, as they both promised at their next meeting at court to deal with her majesty to sign my pardon, that so I might have liberty to go the voyage.—But her majesty never did sign the Pardon, and the Turkey ships going away without him, Uda-died in the Marshalsea prison about the end of the year 1592, quite heart-broken with sorrow and grief.

69. The Trial of Sir JOHN PERROT, Lord Deputy of Ireland, at Westminster, for High Treason: 34 ELIZ. April 27, A. D. 1592.

THE Commissioners were, the Lord Chamberlain, the lord Buckhurst, sir Robert Cecil, Secretary Woolley, Mr. Fortescue, the Master of the Rolls, sir Edmund Anderson, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Justice Periam, and Justice Gawdie, Justice Fenner, Mr. Rokeby, one of the masters of her Majesty's Court of Request.

Sir John Perrot being brought to the King's Bench-Bar, accompanied with the Lieutenant of the Tower, and sir Henry Lee; and proclamation for silence being made, the Lieutenant was commanded to return his writ of Habeas Corpus. Then was sir John commanded to hold up his hand. Here sir John Perrot made low obeysance, and desired he might be heard to speak before he held up his hand. He protested that he never had thought of Treason against her majesty, and desired that the witnesses might be good and sufficient: he knew well the place whereunto he was brought, and therefore he would submit himself humbly to their honours, and said, sithence it was God's will, and her majesty's, he gave God hearty thanks therefore.—Then was he bid to hold up his hand again. Whereunto he answered, Look what is to be done; and here is as true
a man's hand as ever came in this place.

The Effect of the INDICTMENT.

'That the last of January 1587, in the 30th
'year of the queen's majesty, he the said sir
'John Perrot falsely and traiterously, &c. did
'imagine in his heart to deprive, depose, and
'disinherit the queen's most excellent majesty
'from the royal seat, to take her life away, to 'make slaughter in her realm, to raise Rebel'lion in England and Ireland; and that he did 'procure a foreign power to invade the two 'realms.—That one James Eustace, viscount
'Baltinglas, being a false Traitor to her majes'ty and the state, sent Letters of Treason from 'Madrid to the said sir John Perrot by one
'Dennis Oroughan, an Irish priest. That the 'said sir John sent Letters of Treason to the 'said viscount Baltinglas into Spain, by the 'said Dennis Oroughan.—That whereas the 'queen's majesty, in April the 27th of her ma'jesty's reign, did write her Letters to the said
'sir John Perrot, signifying unto him that her 'pleasure was, that the said sir John should 'not proceed in any matters of government,
'without the advice of some of her majesty's
'council in Ireland, wherein she graciously ad'vised him not to murmur, but to take the
'same dutifully; and in good part; notwith-

‘ standing he the said sir John, shortly after the receipt of the said Letters, did send for the archbishop of Dublin, and reading the same Letters unto him, in a great fury said these words, ‘ If she will use men thus, she will have cold service, and some one day she will have need of me.’—That in the 20th year of the queen’s majesty he did maintain horrible and unknown Traitors, not doing justice upon them.—That pope Gregory 13, and the king of Spain prepared an Army to invade England; at which time the said sir John sent Letters to the king of Spain, promising him aid and assistance in the Army: which Letters Dennis Oroughan carried into Spain, and received of the said sir John divers sums of money therefore.—That sir Bryan Oriek, a notorious false Traitor, was procured and animated by the said sir John to move and stir up Rebellion in Ireland.’

Here again sir John desired to speak, and said that he was 64 years old, and had been long imprisoned, yet very honourably used at my Lord Treasurer’s, but found fault with his lodging in the Tower; and said he was by nature choleric, and knew not what imperfections his Imprisonment might work in him; and therefore if he should happen to fall into any extraordinary speeches in that honourable place, he craved pardon, alledging that the same should not proceed for want of duty or obedience.

Then Mr. Sands, Clerk of the Crown, asked him, If he were Guilty of this first Indictment. He answered, clapping his hand upon the Bar, in these words; I am not guilty of any part of that which is laid down.—Then was he willed to hold up his hand again: whereunto he said, (holding up his hand) What again? Here is a true man’s hand.

The Effect of the second INDICTMENT.

‘ That the 15th day of May, in the 27th year of the queen, sir John Perrot being at Dublin, received Letters from Alexander duke of Parma, craving his furtherance in giving Aid to the king of Spain’s power.—That the 20th of June, in the 28th year of the queen, he sent for sir Wm. Stanley to entreat and confer with him touching his traitorous purposes; and that on the 30th of June, 28 Eliz. he talked with the said sir William Stanley to that effect.’

Then he was asked if he were guilty of this Indictment: whereunto he answered these words, viz. Even as guilty as you are in speaking, Mr. Sands. Mr. Sands asked him by whom he would be tried. I will be tried, said sir John, by God and good men, and I shall not remember the most of the points.

Then said Mr. Serjeant Puckering unto him; You shall be remembered of every matter piece-meal.

Sir John Perrot said, I pray God the Lord be not angry with these courses; there is a judge in Heaven who knoweth all.

Here the Sheriff was commanded to return the precept directed unto him for the summoning of the Jury for our sovereign lady the Queen, and an O-yes made: that every Juror should answer to his Name.

The names of the Jurors were, Rd. Martyn, kt. John Machell, Henry Row, Rd. Weeks, Robt. Carr, John Padge, Henry Goodyer, Wm. Paggenton, Hugh Offley, esq. John Hautrey, Wm. Megge, Henry Holford, John Stone, John Vavasour, Wm. Hichcooke, Rd. Edlyn, Christ. Read, Wm. Kinton, Tho. Fowler, John Powell, Barth. Quenye, Humfrey Wyld, Tho. Russel, George Millot. Out of these 24 were 12 taken, whereof the foreman was Hugh Offley, esq.

Then Mr. Sands willed sir John to mark the Jurors well as they were called to be sworn, to see if he knew cause of challenge to any of them, before they were sworn between our sovereign lady the queen and him. Whereunto he answered: Woe is me that she is made a party against me! And then he demanded of my L. C. J. of the C. Pleas how many he might challenge. The Lord Chamberlain answered, That they of the Bench were not to give Counsel to the prisoner. Then said my lord Buckhurst unto sir John, If you have any just cause of challenge against any of them, you may challenge; if not, why should you challenge?

Then he challenged two of the Jurors, and said, Lord send me justice, and for God’s sake let me have good men; and wished he might have men of his own sort, and such as knew service, and feared God; and desired that none might go upon him that had any suit in law with sir Thomas Perrot his son; and wished for more good Aldermen: yet if they that were sworn feared God he cared not.

Here the Indictment was read unto the Jury, and after that an O-yes made, to know if any man were there to give Evidence against the Prisoner at the bar in behalf of her majesty.

Then Serjeant Puckering rehearsed to the Jury the principal Points contained in the indictment aforesaid. But before he handled the same, he opened unto the Jury, that the original of his Treasons proceeded from the imagination of his heart; which imagination was in itself High-Treason, albeit the same proceeded not to any overt fact: and the heart being possessed with the abundance of his traitorous imagination, and not being able so to contain itself, burst forth in vile and traitorous Speeches, and from thence to horrible and heinous actions; for Mr. Serjeant said, Es abundantia cordis os loquitur.

Then sir John prayed serjeant P. to lay aside words, and to proceed to the matter of the Indictment. Whereunto he answered, he would proceed by degrees; but would first begin with his contemptuous Words, which contained in them High-Treason.

Then serjeant Puck. shewed, That sir Nicholas Bagnol, marshal of Ireland, being with sir John Perrot in his house, and entering in communication together, and falling into hot words, sir John brake forth into these Speeches, ‘ If it were not for yonder pild and paltry sword that lieth in the window, I would not brook these comparisons.' Speaking of her majesty's Sword of Justice carried before him.

To this he answered, that he termed the same after that sort, because the scabbard of the same sword was old and worn; and within one week after he caused a new scabbard to be made. And then falling from that point to other idle discourse, my lord of Buckhurst told him, he was before a Bench very wise and learned, and before a wise Jury; and therefore if he spoke not to purpose, it would but hurt his cause, and give them all occasion to think that he had nothing to speak in his own Defence; for if he had, he would not go from the same, and follow other frivolous and unnecessary matters.

Then it was shewed that the queen having directed her Letters of commandment to sir John Perrot in the behalf of sir Tibert Butler, for the placing of the said sir Tibert Butler in the barony of Kaire, he the said sir John being moved therein by the said sir Tibert Butler, at the Council-Table in the castle of Dublin, used these speeches, 'Stick not so much upon the queen's letters of commandment, for she may command what she will, but we will do what we list.'

To this matter sir John answered; He remembered not what Speeches he then used, and said it might be he used some speeches cholericly, as naturally he used to do, for it was his disposition: but notwithstanding any speeches whatsoever, yet he said he executed her majesty's commandment therein: and added, that he did always from time to time execute her majesty's commandments or warrants in all things whatsoever.—Then said my Lord Chamberlain, You are not charged with not executing her majesty's commandments, but with contemptuous speeches used against her majesty in the matter.—Then sir John going from the matter, and speaking more than was needful, my lord Anderson willed him to have patience to hear all, and then to answer all.

Then it was shewed, that sir John calling a Parliament at Dublin, among other matters he moved to suppress the cathedral church of St. Patrick in Ireland; and her majesty then sending Letters to the contrary, he used these words with a stern countenance, 'Nay, God's wounds, I think it strange she should use me thus.' With these words the Bishop of Meath was moved, and found fault with his undutiful demeanour; and said, he spoke as though the kingdom were his own, and not the queen's.

To this matter sir John answered by way of Excuse, and said, that the abp. of Dublin was his mortal enemy, and that the reason why he was moved to suppress the said Cathedral Church, was to have an University erected thereupon; but, he said he was withstood by the said abp. because he and his children received by the said cathedral church 800 marks a-year: and he said further, that the said abp. bare him the greater malice, for that the queen's majesty sending her letters unto him for the discharging of many idle and unnecessary Petitions, he discharged among the rest one of the archbishop's sons.

It was then declared, That whereas the office of the Clerk of the Exchequer was void, and that Mr. Errington had made humble suit unto her majesty to be preferred to that office, in consideration of his good and dutiful service: her majesty directing her Letters to sir John for admitting the said Mr. Errington into the said office, he the said sir John Perrot used these undutiful Speeches upon the receipt of the said Letters, 'This fiddling woman troubles me out of measure; God's wounds, he shall not have the office, I will give it to sir Thomas Williams.' This was proved by the oath of Philip Williams.

Against Philip Williams sir John took exceptions; affirming the said Williams to be his mortal enemy: and said he was a naughty idle man, of no credit, and had abused my Lord Treasurer in a letter; for the which he said, he did beat him in his Chamber: and further he said, he did write to the Master of the Rolls and to Mr. Powle, touching the leud and undutiful behaviour of the said Williams.

Then it was shewed that sir John having received letters from her majesty, wherein she checked him for divers complaints, having read the same Letter, he used these undutiful Speeches; 'It is not safe for her majesty to break such unkind and sour bread to her servants; he being Lord Deputy, and a servant of trust. This was spoken to Philip Williams.

Afterwards Philip Williams being his Secretary writing to her majesty in sir John Perrot's name, among other things he said, 'He would be sacrificed for her;' which words sir John reading, bad Williams put them out; saying, 'He had little cause to be sacrificed for her;' adding, 'That he could not forget her ever since the time he could not get justice of her against some of her guard, for murdering some of his men.'

When it was bruited abroad that the Spanish Fleet was in preparation for the invading of England, sir John entering into communication with Philip Williams touching the said army, Philip Williams said, 'He hoped God would bless us for her majesty's sake;' whereunto sir John Perrot answered, 'God's wounds, and why for her sake? Never the more for her sake.' This was proved by the Deposition of Williams.

Here sir John called for Williams, that they might speak face to face: whereunto Mr. Attorney (sir John Popham) said, that Williams was in the Tower in the same state that he was, and was to answer to matters of his Treason as well as he.

Then it was shewed how the Queen sent him a Letter, wherein she wrote very favourably unto him, advising him to look well unto his Charge, about the time the Spaniards should come: whereupon he spake these words; 'Ah silly woman, now she shall not curb me, she shall not rule me; now, God's lady dear, I shall be her white boy now again; doth she think to rule me now?—Shortly after John Garland brought a Letter from her majesty to sir John Perrot, whereat he conceived great discontentment; insomuch that he broke forth into these undutiful terms following: 'God's wounds, this it is to serve a base bastard piss-kitchin woman; if I had served any prince in Christendom, I had not been so dealt withal.' Here he prayed the devil might take his body and soul; if ever he uttered such words, and exclaimed against Garland. Sir John talking with Nath. Dillan, Clerk of the Council of Ireland, asked him this question, viz. 'If her majesty should be distressed, dost not thou think that I am the fittest man in England to have the keeping of her body?' This was verified by the oath of Nath. Dillan.—Talking with the abp. of Dublin in his chamber touching the coming of the Spaniards, sir John said, 'God's wounds, let them do in England what they can, we shall do well enough in Ireland; if her majesty were gone, we should do here in Ireland better than they in England should do.' This was justified by the oath of the abp. of Dublin.

Whereunto he said, he renounced God's mercy if he ever spake any such words. And all this, serj. Puckering said, did declare his malice against her majesty. My lord Buckhurst told him that those speeches did shew a disloyal mind. Here sir John exclaimed against the Witnesses, calling them leud and wicked men, and saying he was bought and sold.—When sir John Perrot said, that he wrote his Letters to her majesty, desiring to be revoked and called home, and made suit to sir Francis Walsingham to that effect; Mr. Popham told him, that when he saw him curbed, as himself termed it, by the Council, and that he could do nothing without their privity; then he sought to come away, with an intent to make himself a ruler in Wales.

Mr. Attorney declared that Dr. Craugh being a known Traitor, and a man that had maintained religion from time to time, and had seduced many people in Ireland, and was a dangerous instrument to be suffered in those parts; and sir John being given hereof to understand, did not use that diligence in the apprehending of him, as became his place: for after he had given out warrants for the seeking of him, then he gave out a countermand they should use all diligence in apprehending of him in all places, except in the White Knights country, where sir John knew the said Craugh to be; which did manifestly shew he would not have him taken.

My lord Buckhurst said to sir John, that he granted Warrants to take him where he was not. Sir John said, there was a God that knew all; marvelling that he having known religion these 46 years, should be charged with favouring of Priests and Massmongers.

Mr. Attorney willed him not to stand upon Religion; for then, said he, we shall prove you irreligious. Will any man of Religion seek to have men murdered? Will any man of religion stab a man in the cheek, and after bring him to the fire to be roasted, to make him confess that he knoweth not, and afterwards hang him by martial law?—Mr. Attorney, to prove sir John of no religion, further shewed, that sir John being in his chamber at the Castle of Dublin, looked out at the window, and espied sir Dennys Oroughan, who knew all his secret Treasons, and willed his chamberlain to call unto him Stephen Seager; who being come, Sir John commanded away his chamberlain, and locked the chamber, and willed Seager to look out at the window, and said, Seest thou not one beneath in a black mantle? Seager said he saw none there; Sir John said, There is one there: you see how I am crost by some of the council here, and he is going to the North with letters from some of the council to move them against me; I would have thee take these letters from him, kill him, cast him aside, and bring those letters to me. Stephen Seager hereunto answered, that he would rob him of the letters, but he would not kill him with his hands; or if he would give commandment to hang him by martial law, he would see it done. Whereupon sir John said, 'Go thy ways, thou art a paltry fellow; I did it but to prove thee.' This was proved by the oath of Seager.

Sir John then called for Seager, to speak with him face to face, who justified all that he had said.—My lord Chamberlain said, Now you see you bad him kill one.—Then said sir John, Because he hath sworn it, I will not reprove him; it may be I spake such words, but I remember it not.

Mr. Attorney said, we have alledged these matters against you, to shew you to be a man of no Religion.—Whereat sir John stormed and was angry; saying, they went about not only to make him a traitor to his prince, but a traitor to God; which, he said, they should never do.—Mr. Solicitor (Egerton) told him that all the Papists desired his government there.

Mr. Attorney then declared further, That one Richard Morrice, a priest, a notorious Traitor, being a passer from Ireland to viscount Baltinglas in Spain, and from thence to Rome, to confer of Rebellions and Invasions for England and Ireland, sir John Perrot knowing the said Morrice to be a most dangerous person to the state, would not give order for the taking of the said Morrice, as he should have done: but the bishop of Cashell caused him to be apprehended of his own authority, and sent him to Mr. Poor, the sheriff, to be sent to the Castle of Dublin, whereupon the friends of the said Morrice told them that Morrice had better friends than all they had; and shortly after Morrice was discharged, and never called more in question. And all this was affirmed by the Oath of the abp. of Cashell, and of the said Poor, visá voce.—Then said Mr. Attorney, that Halie being a man that conversed with Craugh, and dealt with him in his Treasons, told him that Poor had a warrant to apprehend him and others: Whereupon he told him, that he could be better trusted than twenty such as Poor was that should take him; presuming upon the favour of sir John Perrot.—The abp. of Cashell did complain to sir John that the said Halie was a notorious Traitor, and thereupon delivered to sir John Articles against him and others, and desired sir John to grant him a Commission for the apprehending of them; praying him in the mean time to keep the said Articles secret until they were apprehended: Notwithstanding, before they could be apprehended, within three days, the self-same Articles were taken from one Patrick Young, being a partner with the said Halie in his Treasons; and thereupon they all escaped.

Mr. Solicitor then said unto the Jury, You see, Halie was accused of Treasons, and the Accusations being delivered to sir John in secret, he sent them to Halie before he could be apprehended; which was plain Treason. And this was verified by the bishop of Cashell's Oath.

The lord Chamberlain said, You ought to have acquainted nobody with the cause, until they had been apprehended. Sir John protested, and took God to his record he was ignorant what was become of him.

Then Mr. Attorney turning to the Jury said, By this which hath been proved, you may see how he hath always been a confederate and maintainer of notable Traitors against her majesty; namely these three, Craugh, Morrice, and Halie, with others their confederates.

At what time a Rebellion was raised in the North part of Ireland divers of the said rebels made rhymes of her majesty, wherein they shewed themselves rebels and traitors, as concerning her birth; traitors, as concerning her person; and traitors to her royal dignity: which rhymes came to the hands of sir Rd. Bingham, and the rhymers taken and committed to prison, and one of the said rhymers sent to sir John Perrot by Woodhouse. Sir Rd. Bingham sent them to sir J. Perrot, certifying him what he had done, and prayed sir John Perrot to write his pleasure what should be done with them: whereupon sir John sent him word to discharge them all. Howbeit sir Richard detained the chiefest of them in prison; but sir John afterward sent a special warrant to the said sir Richard to discharge him, taking bonds of him for his appearance by a day: All which he confessed to be true, saying, that by virtue of his patent he might pardon them. This was proved to be true by Marbury and Woodhouse, visâ voce.

Whereunto Mr. Attorney answered, that he could pardon no Traitors to her majesty's person, but ought rather to have proceeded in justice against them. And here he willed the Jury to consider upon this point.

Sir John then said to Mr. Attorney, By God, I never saw such a man since I was born, I pray you sit down, and let me speak; and so he turned his talk to Woodhouse, and said he had spoiled the North part of Ireland, with other frivolous speeches.

Sir Brian Orurke, a notable Traitor, and executed of late at Tyburn, about that time, at a Christmas, disposing himself to villainy, took down a Picture, and did write Elizabeth thereupon; and using the same in most contemptuous and despitelful manner, tied the same to a horse-tail, and he with others dragged it in the dirt, and hacked it with gallow-glass axes, signifying how they would have used her majesty if they had her in their power. This traitorous act being made known to sir John Perrot, he would not give order for the apprehending of the said Orurke, to do justice upon him for so horrible a Treason; whereas he might have had him, if he had sent but his horse-boy for him, and after he was known to be in company with him. To this he said little.

Sir Dennis Oroughan being called to testify against sir John Perrot, and the book being offered him to swear, Sir John said it was no matter whether he were sworn or not, for his word and his oath were all one; for there was neither truth nor honesty in him.—My lord Buckhurst said he must be sworn, for it was for the queen.

The said Dennis Oroughan told Mr. Perrot that he had been in Spain, and had brought letters from viscount Balinglas to Feugh Mackheugh in Ireland, and divers others; and said that he had news to tell the lord deputy, that would save the queen 100,000*l*. Poor discovered this to sir John Perrot, and Dennis was committed to prison in the Castle of Dublin.—Sir John knowing that Dennis was in prison sent for him, to come unto his bed-chamber, where he had conference with him, and told sir John he had brought him a letter from viscount Balinglas in Spain.—Sir John demanding of Dennis why he gave him not the letter at his first coming out of Spain? He answered, For fear of being executed, as one doctor Halie late was: and he sent a letter and a token to his wife, that she should bring him the same which was in a box; which letter and box Margaret Leonard, wife of sir Dennis, did shortly after deliver to sir John Perrot in his bed-chamber. For proof whereof one Rice Thomas and Margaret Leonard both deposed, that the said letter was delivered to sir John Perrot as declared. Feugh Mackheugh's wife affirmed, that Dennis brought her husband a letter from Balinglas in Spain.—Now Dennis being known to have had conference with a notable Traitor in Spain, and to bring two notable Traitors into Ireland, and committed to the Castle for Treason, was nevertheless set at liberty in the castle, and had access to sir John early; and they sat for a long time together, and he had his meat and drink in the porter's lodge in the withdrawing chamber, next to his bed-chamber, and other places, and commandment to have wine and whatsoever he wanted, and had a private way to his bed-chamber. This did sir Dennis testify himself; to whom sir John said, A mischief on thee, I pray God! Woe be to the time that ever thou wert born, or that ever I saw thee! One John London also justified, that the said Dennis had the favour and maintenance of sir John Perrot for half a year together.

Here sir John Perrot being pressed by the queen's Counsel, said unto them, No one man can answer such three grave learned men as you are; you cloy me now I cannot speak.—Then said my lord Buckhurst unto him, Truth will answer itself, and innocency defend itself.—Then my lord Chamberlain said, That never was any man that came to that place dealt withal so favourably as he was; and greater men than he have not had that favour, as to bring their Writings and Letters with them.

Then sir John said, He thanked God and the Nurse of Mercy, the queen's majesty, whom he called the Handmaid of Jesus; and said, he always carried so reverend an opinion of her, that had she not been a queen, he would have made her one, if it had lain in his power.

Then was touched the extreme Malice sir John shewed against the Cavener: and the better to execute his purpose, sir John found means that the Cavener should offend the law, by making an escape out of prison; and so being escaped, was after taken and hanged. This matter being urged against sir John, he said, You win men's lives away with words. My Lord Chamberlain said, I fear me the Cavener's blood will light upon you.

Now sir John Perrot began to discredit the Testimony of Dennis the priest, saying he had changed his religion five times in six years; and he did counterfeit himself a regish bishop.

The queen's Attorney then said, If he were so leud a man of his life, I marvel you would commerce with him, and repose yourself so much upon his honesty.—A man of no religion can be no Witness, said sir John; he is a sorcerer and a witch. To which he was answered, If he were so defamed, why did you favour him so much? How many pardons have you given him? It was said he had given him two.

Sir John proceeded against sir Dennis, and said he had counterfeited his hand above eight times; was a common drunkard, a common liar, and had been forsworn a thousand times.

The Attorney then said, If he were the worst man in the world, yet was he worse for sir John Perrot.

Dennis was then called again, and said, That sir John delivered him two Letters to carry to the king of Spain, signifying that he would be a mean to help him to England and Ireland, so he might have Wales: but he would have it as the princes of Germany have their dukedoms, that is jure regio; to be a prince and lord himself, and not to depend on any other. And berewithal he delivered to the said Dennis 50*l.*, and so the said Dennis departed to Ross.—The said Dennis did farther swear, That sir John Perrot and sir Brian Orurke were confederates together in the parliament; and that each of them swore to other to further the king of Spain in the action of England.

Here sir John Perrot waxed hot against sir

Dennis, and said, He was a lousy villain, and a rogue, and had the pox upon him.

One Francis White, and others of Ross, said, that true it was that the said Dennis was at Ross, ready to go for Spain, and came to him to change silver into gold; but after fearing and suspecting some body in the ship, he would not go himself, but procured one Davie to carry the said letters into Spain, with great charge for the safe delivery thereof, and gave him five pounds for his pains. It was further declared, that sir John having conference with sir Wm. Stanley in Ireland, sir John wished him to revolt, assuring him that the Irish-men would live and die with him. Sir Wm. Stanley going from Ireland, to have 1600 men for the Low-Countries, Feugh Meckheugh, being a known traitor, brought him certain men, and bad his men do as sir Wm. Stanley would have them to do, whether it were right or wrong; and thereupon they shook hands and parted.—To this sir John Perrot said, If Stanley be a Traitor, what is that to me?

It was proved that sir Thomas Williams sent Letters from Ireland into England, to sir John Perrot, with strict charge given to the bearer that he should deliver them safely to his own hands; and made them to be sewed to the lining of his doublet within his bosom; which letters were delivered to sir John Perrot at York house.—John Burgh of Abson had conference with sir Wm. Stanley at the Groine, who amongst other speeches asked him what places in England were fittest for landing, if the king of Spain should invade England again? Burgh answered, Portsmouth. Sir Wm. Stanley disliked of that, saying he knew nothing, but rather thought Milford-haven the fittest place; affirming they should find better friends in Wales than the queen had, and some of them were near the queen.—Letters were sent from the duke of Parma to sir John Perrot by one Browne, and an Answer from the said sir John to the said duke by the said Browne, to whom the duke gave a bark. It was likewise proved that he sent letters to sir Wm. Stanley. When sir John Perrot was to come to England, he went about to get a pardon for all his actions before he would come over, wherein he shewed his guilty conscience.

Here the queen's learned Counsel prayed the Jury to consider well of that which had been said, and willed them to go together. Then sir John Perrot willed them to consider their Charge, and have a conscience in the matter; and to remember that his blood would be required at their hands, if they dealt further than their conscience did warrant them. Then the Jury departed from the bar, and within three quarters of an hour returned to the bar; and being demanded whether the Prisoner were guilty or not of the several Treasons comprised in the Indictment, they answered, Guilty.

Then serjeant Puckering in the queen's name began to pray Judgment; and sir John Perrot desired most humbly that he might speak with some of their honours before Sentence should be pronounced. Wherunto they condescended, and commanded he should be brought to talk with them in the Chancery; where after some communication had among them, they all repaired to their places, and sir John came to the court of King's-Bench being with them, and Judgment was stayed, until her majesty's pleasure were further known. Then was the Court adjourned to the 2nd of May; and so the Court ended, and every man said, God save the queen!

For the better understanding of the aforesaid Arraignment of sir John Perrot and the Judgment that followeth, it is to be known that at the time of his Arraignment, being the 27th of April, anno 34 Eliz. Mr. Puckering was the queen's serjeant at law, Mr. Popham the Attorney General, and Mr. Egerton Solicitor.

But before the day he was brought to receive Judgment, her majesty's said learned Counsel were removed as followeth; that is to say, Mr. Puckering was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; Mr Popham L. C. J. of the Queen's-Bench, and Mr. Egerton Attorney General. This making and removing of Officers was done at the court of Greenwich on the 28th of May 1592. My Lord Keeper went to Westminster to take his oath very honourably with lords, knights and gentlemen, on the 4th of June 1592, and that day sat first in the Chancery. And on the 8th he first sat in the Star-Chamber.

On the 26th of June sir John Perrot appeared before the Commissioners; who were, the Lord Chamberlain, the lord Buckhurst, sir Robert Cecil, secretary Woolley, Mr. Fortescue, the L. C. J. of the C. Pleas, justice Gawdie, justice Peunel, Mr. Rookesbie, one of the Masters of the Court of Requests.

First the said sir John Perrot that morning was brought in a coach from the Tower to the Old Swan, and thence conveyed by water to Westminster-bridge. Between the hours of 8 and 9 he landed at Westminster-bridge, and was brought into Westminster-hall, being accompanied with Mr. Croke, son-in-law to the Lieut. of the Tower, on his right hand, and Mr. Blunt, son to the Lieut. on his left hand, and being strongly guarded by divers of the yeomen of the guard, with halberds, and the lieutenant's men with weapons all round about him; and in that sort he was brought up to the Queen's-bench bar, where he stood for a quarter of an hour bare-headed, expecting the coming of the Commissioners. But Mr. Rookesbie, one of the Commissioners, was sent, who had taken his place before the coming of sir John Perrot into the Hall, and tarried for the coming of the rest of his associates.—The said sir John Perrot was clothed in a doublet and hose of black sattin plain, and a gown of wrought velvet furred, and a square or flat crowned black felt hat, with a small band, and a white ruff. The said Mr. Croke and Blunt supplied the room of the Lieutenant, for that he was sick, and could not be there in person.

Divers of the queen's Commissioners, and her learned Counsel being come to the Hall, staid until the coming of the Lord Chamberlain, at whose coming they all took their places and sat in judgment. Then an O-yes was made, and the Lieut. of the Tower called to return his Writ, or Warrant directed unto him for the bringing of the prisoner forth. Then Mr. Croke having the said Warrant, which was written in parchment, and having four or five seals of red wax annexed to the same by slit labels, delivered in the same to the Court; and humbly craved that the lieutenant might be excused for his absence, and declared the cause thereof. Whereupon Mr. Sands, Clerk of the Crown, taking the said Writ, and turning his face to the Lord Chamberlain, read the return thereof, being in Latin, the common and ordinary return of an Habeas Corpus.

Then Serjeant Snagg for the Queen, being one of her majesty's learned Counsel, moved the lords to this effect, That whereas sir John Perrot was before that time indicted of Treason and arraigned, pleaded not guilty, and put himself on the country, who found him guilty of High Treason, therefore he prayed, on her majesty's behalf, that Judgment might be given accordingly.

Then Sands, Clerk of the Crown, spake unto sir John, saying, Thou hast been heretofore indicted of High Treason by the name of John Perrot late of London, knight, and being thereupon arraigned thereunto didst plead not guilty, and didst put thyself upon the country, who found thee guilty of High Treason: what hast thou now to say for thyself, why thou shouldst not have Judgment to die?

Sir John making low obeisance, answered; first, whether he might be permitted to take any Exception against the Indictment, and if he might, then he requested he might be thereunto permitted.

To this the L. C. J. Anderson answered, he might not be permitted.

Then sir John made a Protestation of a quarter of an hour long, wherein he included the mercy of her majesty toward him, extolling her to be the only Mirror of Mercy of all the princes in the world; and said, God forbid that ever his heart should imagine Treason, or utter such unreverend speeches of her sacred majesty, who had exalted him so highly from the estate of a gentleman, and of whose bounty and gracious favour he had so liberally tasted; but complained of the hard and false dealings of the witnesses towards him in these causes, who, he said, falsely, maliciously, and perjuringly accused him; but said he found no fault in the proceedings of the law, but that he had good and orderly proceedings therein: and then again extolling her majesty's great mercy and favour towards him, protested his innocency in the cause to be such, that he forsook God's mercy and his Saviour's merits, if ever he meant any treason or treachery towards that gracious queen Elizabeth; and said, that he knew her majesty's great clemency and mercy towards him proceeded from her majesty's own heart, by the mere providence of God, who knew his innocence in this cause, in staying him so long from judgment, which he affirmed to be now six times; especially after such heinous matters being proved against him, but, as he said, most falsely and untrue.

Whereupon my Lord Chamberlain conceiving these words to tend, that her majesty had so long deferred Judgment, being persuaded thereunto of his innocency in the fact, and that her majesty was persuaded that he had been hardly dealt withal, and unworthily condemned: wherefore my Lord Chamberlain said, he was much to blame to use any such speeches to that end or purpose; and said, That the conceit of his innocency was not the cause her majesty deferred his Judgment so long; and used very vehement Speeches against the said sir John Perrot in that point, saying his Treasons were most manifest and apparent, and for his Trial he received more favour than any other Traitor that ever he saw, and there were more Witnesses of his own men and others than ever he saw against any other Traitor.

Whereupon sir John said, I pray your lordship interrupt me not: for the Lord Chamberlain began these Speeches in the midst of sir John's matter.

Then said my Lord Chamberlain, You must be interrupted in this point; and proceeded more vehement and earnest against him than before.

Sir John Perrot prayed his lordship not to misconstrue his meaning, and said he meant no such matter touching her majesty's conceit of his hard usage, as his lordship took his words to be: for, said he, I can recite my words again, which in effect were, that her majesty being the only prince of mercy, had dealt with him most graciously, in forbearing thus long with him for his Judgment.

Mr. Egerton, now Attorney, then stood up, and directing his Speeches to my Lord Chamberlain and the rest of the bench, said, he had thought to have moved their lordships touching sir John Perrot's Speeches in that point, which, as he said, were by protesting his innocency to seduce and deceive the audience to think him innocent, and not guilty of Treason, and that he had been injuriously condemned; whereas it was most manifest that he was most justly condemned of most heinous Treasons; and that in his Trial he received most favourable hearing.

Whereunto sir John Perrot replied and said, Mr. Attorney, You did me wrong now, as you did me before. I never did you wrong, said Mr. Attorney. You did me wrong, said sir John. Instance wherein I did you wrong, said Mr. Attorney. You did me wrong, said sir John. I never did you wrong, said Mr. Attorney. All these Speeches were spoken with great vehemency each to the other.

My Lord Buckhurst directed his Speeches

towards sir John to the like effect, touching his Guiltiness and Trial, as my Lord Chamberlain had said before; adding further, That whereas he went about to persuade the audience, that the cause which moved her majesty to defer his Judgment, was her conceit of some hard proceeding against him at his Arraignment, which was not the cause indeed, that therein he did injury to the Judge, Jury and Witnesses; and said it was very evilly done of him, to utter any Speeches to any such end: saying further, that my lord himself had been at and upon the Trial of divers Traitors before that time, far sir John's betters, and said he had seen divers Traitors condemned of Treason upon a tenth part of the evidence that was against him, and yet justly condemned of Treason; and you, sir John, are condemned justly of a mass of Treasons; and the said lord said, in his conscience he thought him guilty of most heinous Treasons, and that he was worthily condemned: and he said also, that divers and sundry witnesses very sufficient had proved Treason against him most manifest; and said withal, sir John, would you have all these, being so many in number, as testified against you, to be all perjured, and you only believed? No, no, it is not possible to be true, neither will any man believe it, Sir John.

My Lord Chamberlain spake again and said, There had been thirty Witnesses produced against him at his Arraignment, who proved Treason against him; and that he was a Traitor worthily condemned of Treason; and said he never saw any Traitor have such indifferent Trial, and such sufficient proofs produced against him: adding further, that he might speak his will, but no man would believe him; and that he had spoken much already, but not a true word of all he spake.

Then sir John alleged that the matter was set forward and followed by his enemies in Ireland, and that he was condemned by Irish Witnesses all, and that no one English Witness had proved Treason against him. My Lord Buckhurst said, He had both Irish and English Witnesses, and those his own men. Sir John said, It was more than he knew. Sands said, Philip Williams was an Englishman. Sir John Perrot said, He proved no Treason: and further he said, That the Irish Witnesses had no respect of an oath; and that for a small value, a man might procure a number to swear any thing. And for proof thereof, he appealed to some of the bench that had been in Ireland, and threw his hand towards Mr. Rookesby, that they knew the same to be true; he also said, that God would plague the prosecutors of this cause against him for their corrupt dealing therein.

He also, with great protestation in the midst of his Speeches, utterly denied that ever he intended or meant to murder any man, as he was falsely accused; and said, that now lately he had found among his Writings a Letter of that wicked fellow's that accused him thereof, Stephen Seager, and he said that he had that

Letter about him to prove his Testimony false; and said that that matter grieved him more than any other matter. He also with great protestation denied that he was ever a Papist in heart or soul, or ever favoured any of them, but was of a sound Religion these 45 years, ever since the 2nd year of king Edward: and for trial thereof, he referred himself to divers there present, that were old Parliament-men, of his Speeches touching Religion in divers Parliaments.

My Lord Chamberlain answered him, That he was not charged for murdering or intending to murder any person, although the same was proved to his face by his own man. Sir John said, Although the same was not objected to his Charge, it was laid open against him to make him infamous to the world, which grieved him most of all; and said, that Seager in the end denied it again. My Lord Chamberlain said, he denied it not, but justified it to his face.

Sir John said, that Seager said sir John told him that he did it but to prove him what he would do.

Then Anderson, L. C. J. of the C. Pleas, asked him whether he had any thing to say in arrest of Judgment? Sir John answered, Seeing it pleased God and the queen he should come to that pass, he had nothing to say, but humbly submitted himself to the law and their lordships. My lord Anderson then asked if he had the queen's Pardon? Then he said, he had no Pardon.

Then my lord Anderson proceeding to pronounce Judgment, began with a long discourse, reciting divers good blessings of God upon this realm, namely, the establishing of true Religion, and to be governed with so gracious a prince, and many other good blessings of God bestowed upon us; yet notwithstanding, divers wicked and traitorous persons, discontented with the state, had practised divers and sundry treasons, which by the great and mighty Providence of God, had been from time to time revealed. And omitting divers foreign Treasons, many treasons had been practised here at home; and said, That he himself had been at the arraignment of divers, as namely of Babington, Abington, with others; adding, that the Treasons of sir John Perrot far surpassed them all, most wickedly conspiring her majesty's death and deprivation, and invasion of this realm by foreign enemies, and taking in the Spaniards, to the destruction of so many thousands of good and natural subjects. Lord Anderson consented with the two other lords, that he was worthily and justly condemned of Treason, of good and sufficient proof; and said, that at his Arraignment he had indifferency with favour, and commended the goodness and substantialness of the Jury that tried him at his Arraignment. And then he proceeded to Judgment, which was by him pronounced to this effect: 'That he should be carried by the Lieutenant of the Tower, to the Tower, which was the place from whence he came, and from thence to be drawn upon a hurdle through the city of London to the place of execution, and there to be hanged and to be cut down alive, and his bowels to privy-members to be cut off, and cast in fire in his sight, his head to be cut off, and his body to be cut in four quarters, to be dispersed at the Queen's pleasure, and God have mercy upon thee.'

Then said sir John, Seeing it pleased God and the Queen that he should be thus judged, his life stood in her majesty's merciful hands, whose life he wished, and prayed God that it might be three times, yea five times as long as she hath lived already; with divers other godly wishes to her majesty: and he praised God that among her subjects the innocent lambs might be known from the scabbed goats, and if the living God who knew his innocence would put it into her princely heart to be merciful unto him for his life, that he would, as always heretofore he did, serve her majesty most faithfully against her malicious enemies, yea and to stop the mouth of a cannon, to fight against the dogs the Spaniards; and as he knew her majesty to be the Fountain of Mercy, and wished that utter destruction to ensue to him and his progeny, if ever he merited Treason against queen Elizabeth: which words he uttered and wished divers times before and after; and said, that shortly God doubtless would make manifest his innocence, and that to her majesty and the world.—He also said, that he wished not now to live, by reason of his infamy in his country, and that his name and blood was corrupted, which had been of antient continuance, and never before that time spotted: and said, Woe be unto me that am the first of my house and name that ever was attainted or suspected, and shook his hand: and having a carnation in his hand, he said, I care not for death the value of the flower, I fear it not; and wished that he had never offended God more than he had offended the queen's majesty. Which words he pronounced contrary at the first, but presently reformed them.—Then he declared he had certain Petitions, which he humbly desired the lordships to move her majesty in on his behalf. The first Petition was, That it would please her majesty of her abundant mercy to pardon his life, that he might have a better room, for his lodging was a short chamber, only room for his bed and a table, and that he never went out of doors, nor had any air to comfort him.—To this my lord Chamberlain answered, That this room was such as was fit for such a man as he was.—The second Petition was, That he might have a Preacher appointed unto him, and that he might be permitted to receive the Sacrament, which he said he did not since his commitment to the Tower, but said he received the same in my lord Treasurer's house.—To this Petition my Lord Chamberlain answered, That he never heard that he desired or wished any such thing before, which if he had, it might have been granted him. Sir John Perrot said, that he had requested the Lieutenant for the same twenty times; and said, Here is a man that knoweth the same, meaning and pointing at Mr. Crooke, standing next him on his right hand: which thing Mr. Crooke voluntarily and without-asking disavowed; and said he knew no such thing. Then said sir John, Mr. Lieutenant well knoweth it, and will confess the same.—My Lord Chamberlain said, he should have his Petition herein granted: And that they, the Justices and Commissioners, had authority to grant the same without moving her majesty therein.—The third Petition was, That if he should suffer death, that then their lordships would be humble suitors to her majesty, that seeing he was a gentleman born, and that he had been advanced to place and calling by her majesty, and served her majesty in place of honour, he might die a gentleman's death, and be spared from drawing through the streets, and the rest of the Judgment; and said, he was a gentleman of ancient descent, and but a gentleman.—The fourth Petition was, That they would move her majesty to be good and gracious to his son, meaning sir Tho. Perrot, and that they would put her majesty in remembrance of her gracious promise made unto sir Philip Sidney and sir Tho. Perrot, that her majesty would be good to them; especially that her majesty would be good to that virtuous and gracious lady my lady Dorothy: and then said, that he never received any penny of her marriage, nor ever assured her any jointure, for which he was now very sorry; and said, that something moved him so to do, which now grieved him very sore.—He also said, that he had made estates of his lands, a dozen, sixteen, and twenty years past; for that he had children by divers venters, and that he would have his lands to remain in his name, and now he had but one son, the other having died in her majesty's service. He said, Peradventure holes may be now found in the same; therefore he again requested that their lordships would move her majesty to be good to his son and his wife, and as he heard to a little son which they had, and which hereafter may do her majesty service.

He also oftentimes protested with great protestation that he never meant evil, and wished confusion to him and his posterity if he were guilty of Treason. And if he were, he utterly renounced the merits and mercy of his Saviour Jesus Christ. And then speaking to my Lord

Chamberlain, said, he excepted his lordship, for that he was Commissioner for her majesty, otherwise he was as true a subject as any in England whosoever; and herewith clapped his hand upon the bar mightily. And as he was departing from the bar, he returned again towards the lords, and said, he could not dispend 1,200*l.* a year, although it was bruited he could dispend many thousands. He also made mention he was in debt.

Then was he conveyed away from the bar in the same manner he was brought thither, and brought by water to the Old Swan, for that he could not shoot the bridge, and all the guard and others attending him in wherries; and from the Old Swan he was conveyed in a coach into the Tower, as he was brought from the Tower to Westminster that morning. He also seemed in his speeches to refer all things to God, who, as he said, best knew the secret of this cause. Again and very zealously he wished and hoped that all things should be by him made manifest; and in all his protestations and speeches referred him and his to God alone.

Then the Lords and Commissioners sitting a little space after sir John's departure, and until he took barge, an O-Yes was made, and the Commission of Oyer and Terminer was determined by Proclamation made in these words following: All manner of persons of England and Ireland, that had any thing to do before my Lords the queen's majesty's Justices of Oyer and Terminer in this present cause, may depart hence in God's peace, and the queen's majesty's, and keep their day again upon a new summons, for my lords the queen's justices do determine their commission; and then they all cried, God save the queen! Amen. Then my lords arose, and it was at the stroke of ten of the clock at night.

Afterwards the queen began to be appeased towards him, and was often heard to applaud that Rescript of Theodosius, Honorius, and Arcadius: 'If any person speak ill of the emperor through a foolish rashness and inadvertency, it is to be despised; if out of madness, it deserves pity; if from malice and aversion, it calls for mercy.' But while he thus had hopes of his life, he fell sick, and died in the Tower in September following; but the queen granted his desire, in suffering his estate to go to his son, who had married the earl of Essex's sister.

70. The Trial of ROBERT Earl of ESSEX, and HENRY Earl of SOUTHAMPTON, before the Lords, at Westminster, for High Treason: 43 ELIZ. Feb. 19, A. D. 1600.

A SPACIOUS Court was made in Westminster-hall, where the Lord Treasurer Buckhurst sat as High Steward of England, under a canopy of state; where sat also about the table, the earls, barons, and judges of the land, according to their degrees. The Judges were these; the L. C. J. Popham, and the L. C. J. Anderson.

The L. C. B. sir Wm. Periam. Justices Gawdie, Fenner, Walmesley, Warburton, Kingsmill, and Mr. Baron Clarke.

These sat all in the Court next the bar, before the High Steward, seven Serjeants at Arms came in with maces before the High Steward, and laid them down before him in the Court.

The king at Arms stood on the one side of the High Steward by his chair of estate, and one of her majesty's gentlemen ushers with his white rod in his hand on the other side. The Clerk of the Crown and his assistant sat before him, to read the common Indictments and Examinations. The Captain of the Guard (sir Walter Raleigh) and forty of the queen's Guard were there to attend the service. Then the Serjeant at Arms made three O-yes! and Proclamation, That the Lord High Steward of England commanded silence, and to hear the Commission read, upon pain of imprisonment. Then the Clerk of the Crown read the Commission, whereunto the earl of Essex was very attentive. Another Proclamation was made, That the Lord High Steward of England commanded all Justices to whom any writs had been directed for this service, to bring them in, and certify the same. Another Proclamation was made by a Serjeant at Arms, That the Lieutenant of the Tower of London should return his Precept, and bring forth his prisoners, Robert earl of Essex, and Henry earl of Southampton.

Then the Lord High Constable of the Tower, the Lieutenant of the Tower, and the gentleman porter, who carried the ax before the prisoners, came first in, and the prisoners followed and made their appearance at the bar, the gentleman porter with the ax standing before them, with the ax's edge from them; and so the Lieutenant delivered his Precept into the Court. The two earls (which were prisoners) kissed one another's hands, and embraced each other. Another Proclamation was made, That the Serjeant at Arms to the queen's majesty do return his Precept of the Names of all the peers of Robert earl of Essex, and Henry earl of Southampton, the which he delivered into the Court accordingly. Another Proclamation was made, That all earls, viscounts, and barons, of the realm of England, which were peers of Robert earl of Essex, and Henry earl of Southampton, and summoned to appear this day, do make answer to their names, upon pain and peril that will fall thereon.

Then the Lords were called, and answered and appeared as followeth: Edward earl of Oxford, Gilbert earl of Shrewsbury, Wm. earl of Derby, Edw. earl of Worcester, George earl of Cumberland, Robert earl of Sussex, Edw. earl of Hertford, Henry earl of Lincoln, Charles earl of Nottingham. Tho. viscount Bindon, Tho. lord De la Ware, Edward lord Morley, Henry lord Cobham, Henry lord Stafford, Tho. lord Grey, Tho. lord Lumley, Henry lord Windsor, Wm. lord Chandois, Robert lord Rich, Tho. lord Darcy, George lord Hunsdon, Oliver lord St. John of Bletso, Tho. lord Burleigh, Wm. lord Compton, Tho. lord Howard, baron of Walden.

Then the earl of Essex desired to know of my lord chief justice, whether he might challenge any of the Peers or no; whereunto the lord chief justice answered, No: and Mr. Attorney General alledged a Case in Henry 8's time, of my lord Darcy. Whereupon the earl bad them go on. When the lord Grey was called, the earl of Essex laughed upon the earl of Southampton, and jogged him by his sleeve.

Then they were called to hold up their hands at the bar, which they did. And then the Clerk of the Crown read the Indictments. That being done, they were bid to hold up their hands again, which they did, and another Indictment was read, whereunto the earl of Essex was attentive. After which, the Clerk of the Crown asked them, whether they were Guilty, or not Guilty: they pleaded not Guilty; and for their Trials they put themselves upon God and their peers. They spake this severally. Then my Lord High Steward in a few words gave the peers a Charge, requiring them to have a due regard of their consciences.

Then Serjeant Yelverton opened the Evidence, shewed the effect of the Indictment, held it in his hand, and said as followeth:

"May it please your grace (speaking to the High Steward), about the 8th of Feb. last, my lord of Essex (there Prisoner at the bar) went about with armed men very rebelliously to disinheret the queen of her crown and dignity: which when it came to her majesty's ear, she of her abounding mercy sent to see if it were possible to stop Rebellion: and who did she send? She sent (my lord) no worse persons than my Lord Keeper; my L. C. Justice of England, the earl of Worcester, and sir Wm. Knowles; all which went in her majesty's name, and commanded the earls and their adherents very strictly to dissolve their Assemblies, and to lay down their Arms. But he knowing it, very treacherously imprisoned the said Lords and Counsellors by her majesty's sent, and altogether refused her majesty's authority: and divers of their Confederates cryed out, Kill them, kill them! thereby putting her majesty's council in fear of their lives; and withal, left them with sir Jo. Davis to keep safe, lest they themselves should miscarry in the city. But, my lord, I must tell you this by the way, that my lord of Essex can no way excuse nor shadow this his rebellious purpose, nor turn his actions to any other intent: for the sending of Temple his Secretary into London the night before, manifesteth his determination, without scruple or question; for by that means he was in hopes to have had the help of the citizens, her majesty's most loyal and loving subjects! and he used not only his best endeavours to strengthen himself abroad, but also fortified his house at home with strong defence and ammunition; all which were tokens of his inclinations to a sudden and unexpected Rebellion, and were confirmed in the opinion of all the world, when he withstood divers of her majesty's subjects standing in her highness's right, and defence of her peace, against him and his confederates. Good my lord, I beseech your grace and you my lords that are the peers, to understand, that if any man do but intend the Death of the king, it is death by the law: for he is the Head of the Commonwealth, and all his subjects as members ought to obey and stand with him. But as for this Rebellion, being duly considered, it contains in it many branches of Treason, which are and will be directly proved: which being found to be so, my lords, who are their peers, are to find them Guilty. Hereof need to be made no doubt, for it is more manifest than the sedition of Catiline to the city of Rome, and consequently England is in no less danger; for as Catiline entertained the most seditious persons about all Rome to join with him in his Conspiracy, so the earl of Essex had none but Papists, Recusants, and Atheists for his adjutors and abettors in their capital Rebellion against the whole estate of England. My lord, I much wonder that his heart could forget all the princely advancements given him by her majesty, and be so suddenly befitted, as to turn them all to rebellious ends; but it seems this overweighing a man's own conceit, and an aspiring mind to wished honour, is like the crocodile, which is ever growing as long as he liveth. Your lordships know in what sort they went into the City, with armour and weapons, and how they returned to Essex-House again, as you my Lord Admiral, and my lord of Cumberland, with others of their honourable peers do know; which makes me wonder they do not blush to be so forward to stand upon their Trials without Confession, when their intended Treasons are in all men's judgments palpable. For my part, my lord, I can conjecture nothing hereby; and it will not easily out of my own conceit, but that there is some further matter in it than as to you appears; but my hope is, that God of his mercy, that hath revealed their treasons, will not suffer the rest of his or any others to the hurt of the state, or prejudice to her majesty's most royal person, whom I pray God long to preserve from the hands of her enemies. Amen, cried the earl of Essex and the earl of Southampton, and God confound their souls that ever wished otherwise to her sacred person.

Attorney General, (sir Ed. Coke.) May it please your grace, the Lords Chief Judges, which are the fathers of the law, do know that the thought of Treason to the prince, by the law is death; and he that is guilty of Rebellion, is guilty of an intent (by the laws of the land) to seek the destruction of the prince, and so adjudged Treason: and I will prove this unto your lordships by two several Cases. First, he that raiseth power and strength in a settled government, the law will not suffer it, but it is construed as in cases of High Treason; he that doth usurp upon it, the law doth intend that he hath purposed the destruction of the prince; he that doth assemble power, if the king doth command him upon his allegiance to dissolve his company, and he continue it, without any question it is High Treason: he that doth levy forces to take any town in the prince's dominions, it is so likewise. But my lord of Essex hath levied power to take the Tower of London, and to surprize the queen's own Court; then this must needs be higher than the highest; and he that doth fortify himself against the prince's power, must needs be within the compass of Treason. And by your favour, my lord of Essex, I will now speak a word unto you, for I know you can speak as well as any man; that whereas you say the law of nature compelled you to do this, which in judgment you have, though most treacherously attempted, I will in a word disprove your own judgment, admitting you must make that freely your argument. 1st, I will open the Quality of your Rebellion; 2dly, the Manner of it; 3dly, I will touch the circumstances; and, lastly, I will observe the Person. The Quality hath High Treason; for which I think I shall not need to say any more. For the Manner of it, I hold it an unnatural act for a natural subject to commit Treason against his natural sovereign; and methinks it cannot be by any probability denied, but that this High Treason is, and must be, both against the law of God, nature, and reason. And under your grace's favour, my lord, the manner of it being of so high a nature as it is, must needs be High Treason, which was not only carried in their hearts, but, for a continual remembrance, kept in a black purse, which my lord of Essex wore on his breast next to his skin. Let me note unto you, my good lord, that they being both born under the government of this princess, and so highly advanced by her majesty's favour, should have trembled once to think of such a Rebellion as they have enterprized. Doth not my lord of Essex now enjoy his Earldom of Essex by the gift of Henry 8th to his father? Was not he made Master of her majesty's Horse at 22 years of age? one of her majesty's Council? to be earl marshal of England? general of her majesty's forces in Ireland? And lastly, hath he not received divers gifts and sums of money, to his own use, of her majesty's gracious and princely bounty, to the value of 30,000*l.*? Yet all these were as cleverly forgotten, as if they had never been.—Now shall I shew you the Person whom this concerns, even her majesty's sacred person, against whom their attempts have been, only for the undertaking of God's Cause, and exercising of Justice with admirable mercy; and though I cannot speak without reverent commendations of her majesty's most honourable justice, yet I think her overmuch clemency to some, turneth to over-much cruelty for herself: for though the rebellious attempts were so exceedingly heinous, yet out of her princely Mercy, no man was racked, tortured, or pressed to speak any thing farther, than of their own accord, and willing minds, for discharge of their consciences they uttered; and then, to see the mercy of God that will have the truth known, it is admirable beyond the conceit of man's capacity: for they being severally examined, notwithstanding, all agree directly, without varying. But when her majesty sent a counsellor of state to have the earl come before her, when she heard of his Rebellion, for no other end or purpose but for his admonishment, he refused to come; and having a guilty conscience, and sent to my house to have sir F. Gorges to come to him to Durham-house; and we fearing him to be a private enemy, would not suffer sir F. to go thither but returned answer, that he would meet him on the water upon equal terms: where sir W. Raleigh used the former speeches to sir F. Gorges, wishing him to leave our company, or else he would be undone. And whereas we are charged to have dealt with papists, I assure your lordship, and it is most true, that papists have been hired and suborned to witness against me; as by the means of one Sudall, who was a seminary priest, and sent into Ireland to deal with sir Christ. Blunt, whom he thought to be inward with me, to touch my honour and reputation. Then Bales, the Scrivener in the Old Bailey, hath confessed under his hand to forge and counterfeit my hand in at least two letters: and these two honest gentlemen can witness it.

Att. Gen. Ay, by my troth, this is true, but it was by the procurement of one of your own men.

Essex. Thou swearest it, but it is not on a book; that man thou sayest I procured to do it, his name is John Daniel, an errant thief, one that broke a standard of mine, and stole a casket of my wife's, and many other things. It is very probable that I should trust him so far, that had before betrayed me, is it not? But it is well known who set him at work to attempt against me so much as he hath done, to procure my hand to be counterfeited; and yet this man, by your judgment, must be a practiser in such matters by my own consent.* Well, Mr. Attorney, I thank God you are not my judge this day, you are so uncharitable.

Att. Gen. Well, my lord, we shall prove you

* The matter here referred to, as it came out upon a strict enquiry, was thus: The countess of Essex being apprehensive, that in those troublesome times some mischiefs might befall her husband and herself, put some Letters which she had received from him into a cabinet, and intrusted it into the hands of a Dutch woman called Ribove, who hiding them in her house, they were accidentally discovered by her husband John Daniel; who reading them over, and observing some passages in them, which might incense the queen and endanger the earl, caused them to be transcribed by a person expert at counterfeiting hands; and when the timorous countess was near her time of lying-in, he told her that unless she would give him 3000*l.* he would put them into the hands of her husband's enemies. The good lady, to prevent that threatening danger, immediately gave him 1,170*l.* and still the Impostor only gave her the counterfeit copies, and kept the originals to get another sum for them from the earl's enemies; for which he was sentenced in the Star-Chamber to perpetual imprisonment, fined 3000*l.* two of which were to be paid to the countess, and to stand with his ears nailed to the pillory with this inscription, 'A wicked Forger and Impostor.'

another what you are, which your pride of heart and aspiring mind, hath brought you unto.

Essex. Ah! Mr. Attorney, lay your hands upon your heart, and pray to God to forgive both.

Raleigh. That sir F. Gorges told me on the water, that my lord of Essex had put himself into a strong guard at Essex-house, and this is like to be the bloodiest day's work ever was, wishing him to go to court with speed for prevention thereof: then sir Walter wished sir F. Gorges to refuse their company, else he would be undone. To this sir Walter was sworn.

Essex. Whatsoever sir Walter hath said, I refereth altogether from that which sir Ferdinando told us at Essex-house, upon his return from the water.

Att. Gen. Well, my lord, what can you advise to say for sir John Davis, another of your adherents, that Papist? for he hath confessed that he is a Papist and a Catholic, and drawn in by sir Christ. Blunt, one of your chiefest counsel, and that he called for a Seminary priest upon his convertment to absolve him.

Essex. If sir John Davis were such a man it cannot be but strange to me to bear it; although I cannot search into the secrets of his heart to accuse him inwardly, yet I have seen him dutifully come to prayers, and to the service of God in my own house with me, and behaved himself very godlily: and of this I can be witness. And as for Blunt (God is my witness) I have been so far from Popery, as I have so earnestly dealt with him to reform himself, inasmuch that he hath told me, I have been very passionate. But whereas you say we have committed Treason, first prove that true.

Serj. Yelvert. Why, my lord, if you deny the raising the power, why should so many men come to your house that day?

Southampt. By your favour, Mr. Serj. Yelverton, a word, I hope; for my coming thither it was not strange news; and when I came that same morning to Essex-house, I protest I had not above 10 or 12 men attending me, which was but my usual company, therefore far from purposing to raise a tumult.

Att. Gen. Why, the reason of that was, first that you thought all London would have risen with you; but, good my lord, I beseech your grace to hear the Oath of sir F. Gorges: whose Evidence was read, and himself there in person did justify the same.

Sir Ferdinando Gorges his CONFESSIOES.

He depposeth, That in Jan. last the earl of Essex wrote to him a Letter, wherein he complained grievously of his misfortunes, and the miserable estate he stood in, whereof he proposed shortly to free himself, and therefore prayed sir F. Gorges to come up to London to him: who coming accordingly, the earl told him how mightily he was crossed and discredited by his private enemies, which he could not endure; for, saith he, I have 120 earls, be-

&c. And thereupon the Lord Keeper told the earl of Essex, that they were sent from her majesty, to understand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cause of grief against any persons whatsoever, it should be heard, and they should have justice.—Hereupon the earl of Essex with a very loud voice declared. That his life was sought, and that he should have been murdered in his bed; that he had been perfidiously dealt with; that his hand had been counterfeited, and letters written in his name; and that therefore they were assembled there together to defend their lives: with much other speech to like effect. Hereupon the L. C. Justice said unto the earl, That if they had any such matter of grief, or if any such matter were attempted or purposed against him, he willed the earl to declare it; assuring him that it should be truly related to her majesty, and that it should be indifferently heard, and justice should be done, whomsoever it concerned.—To this the earl of Southampton objected the assault made upon him by the lord Gray. Whereunto the L. C. Justice said, that in his case, justice had been done, and the party imprisoned for it. And hereupon the Lord Keeper did oftsoons wille the earl of Essex, that whatsoever private matter or offence he had against any person whatsoever, if he would deliver it unto them, they would faithfully and honestly deliver it to the queen's majesty, and doubted not to procure him honourable and equal justice, whomsoever it concerned: requiring him, that if he would not declare it openly, that he would impart it unto them privately, and doubted not but they would satisfy him in it.—Upon this there was a great clamour raised among the multitude, crying, 'Away, my Lord, they abuse you, they betray you, they undo you, you lose time.' Whereupon the Lord Keeper put on his hat, and said with a loud voice, My lord, let us speak with you privately, and understand your griefs: and I command you all upon your allegiance, to lay down your weapons, and to depart, which you ought all to do, being thus commanded, if you be good subjects and owe that duty to the queen's majesty which you profess. Whereupon they all brake out into an exceeding loud shout and cry, crying, 'All, all, all.'—And whilst the Lord Keeper was speaking, and commanding them upon their allegiance, as is before declared, the earl of Essex and the most part of that company did put on their hats; and so the earl of Essex went into the house, and the Lord Keeper, &c. followed him, thinking that his purpose had been to speak with them privately, as they had required. And as they were going, some of that disordered company cried, 'Kill them.' And as they were going into the great chamber, some cried, 'Cast the Great Seal out of the window.' Some other cried there, 'Kill them;' and some other said, 'Nay, let us shop them up.'—The Lord Keeper did often call on the earl of Essex to speak with them privately, thinking still that his meaning had been so, until the earl brought them into his back chamber, and there gave order to have the farther door of that chamber shut fast. And at his going forth out of that chamber, the Lord Keeper pressing again to have spoken with the Earl of Essex, the earl said, 'My lords, be patient a while, and stay here, and I will go into London, and take order with the mayor and sheriffs for the city, and will be here again within this half hour.' And so departed from the Lord Keeper, &c. leaving the Lord Keeper, &c. and divers of the gentlemen Pensioners in that chamber, guarded by sir John Davis, Francis Tresham, and Owen Salisbury, with musket-shot, where they continued until sir Ferdinando Gorges came and delivered them, about four of the clock in the afternoon.—In the mean time we did often require sir John Davis, and Francis Tresham, to suffer us to depart, or at the least, to suffer some one of us to go to the queen's majesty to inform her where and in what sort, we were kept. But they answered, 'That my lord (meaning the earl of Essex) had commanded that we should not depart before his return, which (they said) would be very shortly. THOMAS EGERTON. C. S. EDWARD WORCESTER. JOHN POPHAM.'

Att. Gen. Yea, my lord, you had 300 men in arms in your house; why did you not dissolve them, being commanded upon your allegiance from the queen to do it?

Essex. They hearing rumours of men about my house against them put them into such a fear and extasy, that it was not in my power suddenly to dissolve them, or to quench their passions: and the rather for that sir Walter Raleigh desired sir Ferdinando Gorges to leave their company, or else they would be all lost: so that they stood amazed, and knew not what to do.

Southampton. Mr. Attorney, you speak all this as if it were as true as the Gospel.

Essex. Good my lord, let me intreat you to mark the circumstances: word was brought that men were sent for into the country to take us in our own houses; then we conceiving the thirsty appetite of our private enemies, took ourselves to our arms, and were glad to stand upon our guard for our own defence. But as for the Lords of the council that came to my house, we being before advertised that we should be beset, thought it the securest way for those of the council to keep them there, not knowing what mischief would ensue.

Att. Gen. My lord, your grace sees that this is without colour or question: for my L. C. Justice had proved it plain, that they would not dissolve their company that was up in arms, being charged upon their allegiance so to do.

Essex. Good my lord, know whether it were in my lord of Southampton's power or in mine to withhold their purposes so suddenly: For, not long before sir Walter Raleigh had jects have used force for their mediation.—Being asked what should have been done by any of the persons that should have been removed from the queen? He answered, That he never found my lord disposed to shed blood; but that any that should have been found, should have had indifferent trial.—Being asked upon his conscience, Whether the earl of Essex did not give him comfort, that if he came to authority, there should be a toleration for religion? he confesseth, he should have been to blame to have denied it.

Sir Christopher Blunt's second EXAMINATION.

He saith, That four or five days before the Insurrection in London, the earl of Essex set down divers Articles with his own hand, with Petitions to the earl of Southampton, sir Cha. Davers, sir John Davis, sir Ferd. Gorges, Jo. Littleton, and this Deponent; which were to the effect before remembered. And further this Deponent remembereth, That the earl of Essex's purpose was (after these things should be over-passed and settled) to alter the state of government: and further this Deponent confesseth himself to be reconciled to the Pope: and moreover saith, that the earl of Essex said, He looked not that any should be troubled for Religion, and Liberty of Conscience; that he received letters from the earl of Essex the 30th of Jan. to come to London, whereupon he came.

The Earl of Rutland's EXAMINATION.

He saith, That being in London, with the earl of Essex, he heard him cry out in the streets, 'England is bought and sold to the Spaniard': and confesseth, when they had been possessed of London, their purpose was to have taken the Lord Keeper with them to the Court, with the earl of Essex's company; and that the earl of Southampton and sir John Davis were in special confederacy and trust with the earl of Essex in these causes. Lastly, That the earl of Essex said, he was sure of sheriff Smith: and this Deponent specially noted, the earl of Southampton was very much discontented.

He saith, He never heard of the matter till the same Sunday-morning, when the earl of Essex coming through Fleet-street, where this Deponent lay, and being sent for by a man of my lord's, he came into the street to him; where my lord and divers of his followers took him by the hand, and bade him welcome, praying him to go along with him; and the earl of Essex cried, It is for the good of the queen, and of you all, my masters. First, he went to the mayor's house, and then to sheriff Smith's house; and being in Gracechurch-street, and hearing of the Proclamation, the earl of Essex said, Where is the Sheriff? Let him bring muskets and pistols; for I am credibly informed out of Ireland, that the kingdom of England is sold to the Spaniard. And so upon the Proclamation the Deponent left him and his company.

He saith, He was sent for on Sunday morning, the same day, by the earl of Essex; and coming to Essex house, he found there but a few there: but in a short time after, came the earl of Southampton with the rest. This Deponent agreeth in divers other circumstances with former Examinations: he confesseth, he went with the earl into London, and came thither with him to Ludgate; and there being repaired, he heard my lord of Essex cry, Charge, charge! and call for his horse. And he saith, that sheriff Smith was as far in the matter as the best of them.

Mr. Attorney here urged, that there was a combination; and one Pashell affirmed the burning of a black purse by the earl of Essex, which my lord confesseth; but saith, that there was nothing in it, but a key of an iron chest, which he took out, and burnt a paper in the same purse, which did not contain above five or six lines of secret matter: and, for that he would not have so much as their names drawn into question, which were altogether ignorant of these occurrences, did throw the purse and paper into the fire. And also Pashell confesseth further, that when the earl of Essex came out of London to his house, he told them, that he was beloved in the city.

He saith, He had no foreknowledge of these matters; but followed the earl of Essex down Fleet-street, intending to go to the mayor, and so to his house in Seething-lane. And this Deponent being with the earl of Essex in Gracechurch-street, confesseth he did hear the earl (when the lord Burleigh came with the herald at arms) command some of his followers to bid the herald stay, for he would not hear him abuse the queen's name. He saith also, he went back with the earl to Ludgate, and they were repulsed.

Mr. Attorney. Now, my lord, I beseech your grace, and you, my lords, that be the peers, let the due consideration of these several Examinations and Depositions enter into your hearts; and do but note, they have all agreed and jumped together in each particular point, notwithstanding they were all severally examined; but I must needs think it the just judgment of God, in his mercy towards our sovereign, to have the truth so marvellously revealed; coming from them of their own accords, without rack or torture to any of them.

Essex. Mr. Attorney, I answer, then, this for that point; The self-same fear, and the self-same-examiner, may make these several Examinations agree all in one, were they never so far distant; but, good my lord, let me intreat your lordship to consider who they be that testify this against me: My lord, they are men within the danger of the law, and such as speak with a desire to live; but I think they have much to answer for between God and their souls and me. I see they charge me with the surprising of the Tower; but upon what ground do they speak? they had only some particular notes of my friends names, but ever very scornfully dashed at me: for when my friends persuaded me to any course, this was my purpose, to have come with eight or nine honourable persons, who had just cause of discontentment (though not equal with mine) unto her majesty, and so by petition, prostrating ourselves at her majesty's feet, to have put ourselves unto her mercy. And the effect of our desires should have been, that she would have been pleased to have severed some from her majesty, who, by reason of their potency with her, abused her majesty's ears with false informations; and they were Cobham, Cecil and Raleigh: for we thought my lord Cobham carried himself in such factious and dangerous courses, as he told her majesty many untruths: which was a principal cause (as I think) of withdrawing her favour from us. And to that intent, to remove such from her highness (I confess) was the only desire we had to present ourselves in all humility before her majesty, but without any purpose of hurt to her highness: for, I protest before God I do carry as reverent and loyal duty to her majesty, as any man in the world. But now, my lord, seeing that I have heard the testimony of sir Ferdinando Gorges, and himself here in court to testify it, I will say no more, but that if it please her majesty to be merciful unto him, I will be glad, and pray for it; yet whatsoever he hath said, let my life and his dealing testify the truth: and, sir Ferdinando, speak nothing to touch thyself, and speak what thou wilt to me; for I see thou desirest to live, yet speak like a man.

Lord Admiral. I desire, for the better satisfaction of myself and fellow peers, that Gorges might unfold openly what other secrets have passed between him and my lord of Essex, touching the State.

Essex. Ah! my Lord Admiral, assure yourself, in faith, no Treason: But yet, I pray thee, good sir Ferdinando, speak openly whatsoever thou dost remember; and with all my heart I desire thee to speak freely.

Gorges. All that I can remember, I have delivered in my Examination; and further, I cannot say.

Essex. Yes, Ferdinando, if ever you knew any other matter, which contained any thought of Treason or disloyalty, speak it; for they are things not to be forgotten.

Southampton. Good sir Ferdinando satisfy the Court what was intended among all our conferences, and talk of our enemies, and discontentments, and consultations, and what was our best course for our defence against them.

Gorges. Some delivered their minds one way, some another; but, by the Oath I have taken, I did never know or hear any thought or purpose of hurt or disloyalty intended to her majesty's person by my lord of Essex.

L. Admiral. I desire to know, for the better satisfaction of my conscience, whether my lord of Essex did at any time deliver out any Articles in writing under his hand, therein laying open the projects of his purpose for surprizing the court and Tower.

Southampton. It was a foolish action, I must needs confess, the going through the town, and that was suddenly passed over: but my lord's purpose to have men planted at the court, was in regard he feared hindrance by private enemies, that would have stopped his passage to the queen; which, I protest, he intended to no other end, but to prostrate himself at her majesty's feet, and submit to her mercy, as ye have formerly heard.

Cobham. My lord of Essex, let me know; I intreat you, why you lay such imputations upon me, as you have delivered.

Essex. My Lord, I have forgiven all the world, and therefore you shall not need to insist upon these circumstances; for I lay not my cause upon aught that shall do your lordship any harm for my sake: for, I protest, my heart bears you no malice, but what I spake was freely, and in God's presence, hoping her majesty would have heard us, and our complaints being but true. And I do further assure your lordship, that I never spake it out of fear of death, or desire of life.

Bacon. My Lord, may it please your grace, whatsoever my lord of Essex hath here denied, in my conceit it seemeth to be small. I speak not to any ordinary Jury, but to prudent, grave and wise peers: and this I must needs say, It is evident that you, my lord of Essex, had planted a pretence in your heart against the government: and now, under colour of excuse, you must lay the cause upon particular enemies. You put me in remembrance of one Pisistratus, that was come into a city, and doting upon the affections of the citizens unto him, he having a purpose to procure the subversion of a kingdom, and wanting aid for the accomplishing his humour, thought it the surest means for the winning of the hearts of the citizens unto him, and so in that hope entered the city, and cut his body over-thwart, to the end they might conjecture he had been in danger: and so by this means held the same conceit as you and your complices did; entering the city of London, persuading yourselves, if they had undertaken your cause, all would have gone well on your side. And now, my lord, all you have said, or can say, in answer to these matters, are but shadows; and therefore, methinks, it were your best course to confess, and not to justify.

Essex. May it please your lordship, I must produce Mr. Bacon for a Witness; for when the course of private persecution was in hand, and most assailed me, then Mr. Bacon was the man that proffered means to the queen, and drew a letter in my name, and his brother sir Nicholas Bacon's name; which letter he purposed to shew the queen, and Gosnal was the man that brought them unto me: wherein I did see Mr. Bacon's hand pleaded as orderly, and appointed them out that were my enemies, and directly as might be. Which Letters I know Mr. Secretary Cecil hath seen, and by him it will appear what conceit be held of me, and no otherwise than he here coloureth and pleadeth the contrary.

Bacon. My Lord, I spent more hours to make you a good subject, than upon any man in the world besides, but since you have stirred up this point, my lord, I dare warrant you this Letter will not blush: for I did but perform the part of an honest man, and ever laboured to have done you good, if it might have been, and to no other end; for what I intended for your good, was wished from the heart, without touch of any man's honour.

Essex. Well, my Lord, I do here protest before the living God, that an honourable, grave, and wise counsellor hath lamented and grieved at the courses he hath seen taken, and therewith hath wished himself often dead; and thus I speak upon credible and honourable information: but I can prove thus much from sir Robert Cecil's own mouth; that he, speaking to one of his fellow-counsellors, should say, That none in the world but the infants of Spain had right to the crown of England.

Here sir Robert Cecil stepped forth into the court, having kept himself private till then, and humbly desired leave to speak to Essex.

Sir R. Cecil. The difference between you and me is great; for I speak in the person of an honest man, and you, my lord, in the person of a Traitor: so well I know, you have wit at will. The pre-eminence hath been yours, but I have innocence, truth of conscience, and honesty, to defend me against the scandal of slanderous tongues, and aspiring hearts; and I protest before God, I have loved your person, and justified your virtues: and I appeal to God and the queen, that I told her majesty, your afflictions would make you a fit servant for her. And had not I seen your ambitious affections inclined to usurpation, I could have gone on my knees to her majesty to have done you good; but you have a sheep's garment in show, and in appearance are humble and religious: but God be thanked, we know you, for indeed your religion appears by Blunt, Davis and Tresham, your chiefest counsellors for the present: and by promising liberty of conscience hereafter. I stand for loyalty, which I never lost; you stand for treachery, wherewith your heart is possessed: and you charge me with high things, wherein I defy you to the uttermost. You, my good lords, counsellors of state, have had many conferences, and I do confess I have said the king of Scots is a competitor, and the king of Spain a competitor, and you I have said are a competitor: you would depose the queen, you would be king of England, and call a parliament. Ah, my lord, were it but your own case, the loss had been the less; but you have drawn a number of noble persons and gentlemen of birth and quality into your net of rebellion, and their bloods will cry vengeance against you. For my part, I vow to God, I wish my soul was in heaven, and my body at rest, so this had never been.

Essex. Ah Mr. Secretary, I thank God for my humbling; that you, in the rust of your bravery, came to make your oration against me here this day.

Cecil. My lord, I humbly thank God that you did not take me for a fit companion for you and your humours; for if you had, you would have drawn me to betray my sovereign, as you have done: but I would have you name the counsellor you speak of; name him, name him, name him if you dare, if you dare, I defy you; name him if you dare.

Essex. Here stands an honourable person (meaning the earl of Southampton) that knows I speak no fables; he heard it as well as I.

Cecil. Then, my lord of Southampton, I adjure you by the duty you owe to God, loyalty and allegiance you owe to your sovereign, by all tokens of true Christianity, and by the ancient friendship and acquaintance once between us, that you name the counsellor.

Southamp. Mr. Secretary, if you will needs have me name the Counsellor, it was Mr. Comptroller.

Whereupon the Secretary falling down upon his knees, said, I thank God for this day; and upon his knee desired the Lord High Steward, that a gentleman of the privy-chamber (or one that might have access to the queen) might go, and humbly intreat her highness to command Mr. Comptroller to come before his grace.

[Hereupon the Lord High Steward calling Mr. Knevet (a gentleman of her majesty's privy-chamber) said unto him, Go, Mr. Knevet, unto her majesty, and let her understand Mr. Secretary's demand.]

Cecil. Mr. Knevet, you shall have free access unto her majesty; tell her, that I vow before the God of Heaven, that if she refuse to send Mr. Comptroller, whereby I may clear myself of these open scandals, I will rather die at her foot, (as her subject and vassal) than live to do her any more service in this honourable degree, wherein her highness employs me. And withal, let me adjure you, Mr. Knevet, that you do not acquaint Mr. Comptroller with the cause why you come for him.

Mr. Knevet went, and not long after returned with Mr. Comptroller, to whom the Lord High Steward repeated the cause why he was sent for, and desired him to satisfy the lords, whether Mr. Secretary did use any such speech in his hearing, or to his knowledge.

Mr. Comptroller. I remember that once in Mr. Secretary's company, there was a Book read, that treated of such matters; but I never did hear Mr. Secretary use any such words, or to that effect.

Whereupon Mr. Secretary thanked God, that though the earl stood there as a Traitor, yet he was found an honest man, and a faithful subject: withal saying, I beseech God to forgive you for this open wrong done unto me, as I do openly pronounce I forgive you from the bottom of my heart.

Essex. And I, Mr. Secretary, do clearly and freely forgive you with all my soul; because I mean to die in charity.

Bacon. My lord, you may now perceive that my lord of Essex went about to procure matter, and to give over on the instant.

South. Well, I beseech your lordship, let me satisfy your lordship and the rest thus much, that for my own part, I did never know the laws. Now to shew the causes that made me adventure so far as I did: the first occasion that made me adventure into these courses was the affinity betwixt my lord of Essex and me, I being of his blood, and marrying his kinswoman; so that for his sake I should have hazarded my life: but what I have by my forwardness offended in act, I am altogether ignorant, but in thought I am assured never. And if through my ignorance in the law I have offended, yet I humbly submit myself to her majesty, and from the bottom of my heart do beg her gracious pardon, if it please her: and I hope that neither your lordship nor any of the peers will hold any of the former resolutions spoken of by these orators for any certainty, which depends no otherwise than one upon another. For if any foolish speeches have passed, I protest, as I shall be saved, that they were never purposed by me, nor understood to be so purposed by me, to the hurt of her majesty's person.

Essex. I beseech your lordship to understand me, and assure yourself, that what I now speak, is not with any desire (I protest) to spare one drop of my blood; and because some honourable persons are interested in the cause, I would (under favour) signify, because the point hath been so much urged by Mr. Attorney, that at our being in London when we were past Pauls, word was brought me, that the chain was drawn at Ludgate, and that my lord of Cumberland was there: which when I heard, I was right glad; for if there had been cause, I would have been glad to put myself into so honourable a person's hands as his: but it was a false report, for my lord was not then come thither. After which I went to sheriff Smith's house, and after my coming thither, I sent the Sheriff and Mr. Alderman Watts to my Lord Mayor, desiring him to come to us; if he would not, to send four of his aldermen to see if we demeaned ourselves loyally, with intent to put ourselves into their hands to use as they would, or to put us into any prison; yet in regard of our private enemies, and the fear of their treachery, we desired them to shut their gates: and this was the end for which we went into the city.

Attor. My lord, if you had no other purpose, why did you go into Gracechurch Street, and Fenchurch Street, crying out all the way you went, England is bought and sold to the Spaniard!

Southamp. Mr. Attorney, I protest (as I hope to have mercy in heaven) I never heard my lord speak any such word, neither did I hear of the proclamation you speak of, made by my lord Burleigh and the herald at arms; neither did I see them: and I deny (my soul and conscience bearing me witness) that I never knew of any intent and meaning, or did ever mean or intend any treason, rebellion, or other action against my sovereign or the state; but only what I did, was to assist my lord of Essex in his private quarrel; and therefore, Mr. Attorney, you have urged the matter very far, and you wrong me therein, my blood be upon your head. As for my lord of Rutland, whereas he inferreth against me to be a persuader and inviter of my lord of Essex to these actions, he wrongeth me exceedingly: for he was never the man that saw me once discontented, and therefore had small ground or reason so to say. And you, Mr. Attorney, whereas you charge me for a papist, I protest most unfeignedly, I was never conversant with any of that sort; I only knew one White, a priest, that went up and down the town, yet did I never converse with him in all my life.

Essex. My lord, and you that be our peers, I beseech you give me hearing thus far; not that I will speak it for the safeguard of my life, but with this my desire, I charge the souls of all them that be our censurers or triers: because out of a form and custom of speaking, these orators would make them more odious that come to the bar, that I may not be thought to have done this upon revenge: for within these few days I purposed to have received the communion, to be a testimony that I was far from bearing of malice to any, not so much as to my private enemies. But the falling out between the earl of Southampton and the lord Grey, happening on a Sunday, hindered my intent; for so soon as I knew of it, I found my affections to stir on it exceedingly: yet I have since that time laboured, and by my prayers to God earnestly desired, that I might be armed with patience to endure all afflictions. And here I protest before the ever-living God, as he may have mercy on me, that my conscience is clear from any disloyal thought or harm to her majesty; and my desire ever hath been to be free from bloodshed, as Mr. Dove can witness. But if in all my thoughts and purposes I did not ever desire the good estate of my sovereign and country, as of my own soul; I beseech the Lord then shew some mark upon me and my soul in this place, for a just vengeance of my untruths to all the world. And God, which knoweth the secrets of all hearts, knoweth that I never sought the crown of England, nor ever wished to be a higher degree than a subject. I greatly endeavoured to have brought my conscience to peace, only by seeking to secure my access to the presence of the queen, that I might speedily have unfolded my griefs unto her majesty against my private enemies; but not to have shed one drop of their blood: And this, my lord, I speak, to the end I might put off all imputation of being an hypocrite, or an atheist; for I was never-papist, neither did I ever favour any sectary (as my lord of Canterbury knoweth and can testify): for my religion, it is sound, and as I live, I mean to die in it.

Bacon. Well, my lord, may it please your grace, you may see how weakly he hath shadowed his purpose, and how slenderly he hath answered the objections against him. But, my lord, doubting that too much variety of matter may minister occasion of forgetfulness; I will only trouble your lordship's remembrance with this only point, rightly comparing this rebellion of my lord of Essex to the duke of Guise's, that came upon the Barricades at Paris in his doublet and hose, attended upon with 8 men: but his confidence in the city was such (even as my lord's was), that when he had delivered himself so far, and that the shallowness of his own conceit could not accomplish what he expected, the king for his defence taking arms against him, he was glad to yield himself, thinking to colour his pretexts, turned his practices, and alledged the occasion thereof to be a private quarrel.

Essex. My lord, I must confess it was my fault to stand out, and to maintain my house with defence and resisting; but I will not deny but that my lord of Southampton and sir Cha. Davers did persuade me to parley with my Lord General: which I hope your lordship will remember I did yield upon some indifferent terms and conditions; which were, 1. That I might have an honourable trial. 2. That I might deliver my griefs myself to the queen. 3. That I might go in safety. 4. That I might have my minister with me. And, lastly, (Which I chiefly beg of her majesty,) That she would be pleased to redeem some that were with me in the house, and guiltless, for knowledge, intent or action, of what was by me purposed. All which I thought good to remember, and so humbly submit the same to her majesty's gracious pleasure.

Serj. at Arms. Then Proclamation was made, Lieutenant of the Tower, withdraw your Prisoners from the bar. They being removed, the lords and peers went together into a private place made of purpose, behind the canopy and chair of estate; then the two Chief Judges and the L. C. Baron were sent for in to them, to deliver their Opinions in law, which they did upon two points; the one,* 'That in case where a subject attempteth to put himself into such strength, as the king shall not be able to resist him, and to force and compel the king to govern otherwise than according to his own royal authority and direction, it is manifest rebellion.' The other, 'That in every Rebellion† the law intendeth as a consequent the compassing the death and deprivation of the king, as foreseeing that the rebel will never suffer that king to live or reign, who might punish or take revenge of his treason and rebellion.' After half an hour they came all out again, and each man took his place; which being done, the Serj. at Arms begun at the puisne lord, and called Thomas lord Howard, who stood up bare-headed.

L. Steward. My lord Thomas Howard Whether is Robert earl of Essex guilty of this Treason whereupon he hath been indicted, as you take it upon your honour, or no?

L. Tho. Howard. Whereupon the lord Thomas Howard made answer, bending his body, and laying his left hand upon his right side, said, 'Guilty, my lord, of High-Treason.' After which manner all the peers found him guilty one after another, from the puisne to the highest, and so delivered in like sort upon their honours. Being called over a-new, they found Henry earl of Southampton guilty of High-Treason also.

Then the Serjeant at Arms commanded the Lieutenant of the Tower to bring his Prisoners to the bar again. Then the Clerk of the Crown speaking first to the earl of Essex, said: Robert earl of Essex, you have been arraigned and indicted of High-Treason; you have pleaded not Guilty, and for your trial you have put yourself upon God and your peers; the peers here (who have heard the Evidence and your Answer in your Defence) have found you Guilty: now what can you say for yourself, why you should not have judgment of death?

Essex. I only say this, That since I have committed that which hath brought me within the compass of the law, I may be counted the law's Traitor in offending the law, for which I am willing to die, and will as willingly go thereto as ever did any: but I beseech your lordship and the rest of the Lords here to have consideration of what I have formerly spoken, and do me the right as to think me a Christian, and that I have a soul to save, and that I know it is no time to jest: lying and counterfeiting, my soul abhorreth; for I am not desperate nor void of grace, now to speak falsely. I do not speak to save my life, for that I see were vain: I owe God a death, which shall be welcome, how soon soever it pleaseth her majesty. And to satisfy the opinion of the world, that my conscience is free from Atheism and Popery, howsoever I have been in this action misled to transgress the points of the law, in the course and defence of private matters, and whatsoever through the weakness of my wit, and dulness of memory, or through violent courses (if there be any violent that seek either life or death); or if I have omitted or may have uttered any thing otherwise; yet I will live and die in the faith and true religion which here I have professed.

Then the Clerk of the Crown demanded of Henry earl of Southampton, What he could say for himself, why Judgment of death should not be pronounced against him?

Southampton. My lords, I must say for my part, as I have said before, That since the ignorance of the law hath made me incur the danger of the law, I humbly submit myself to her majesty's mercy; and therefore, my Lord High Steward, and my Lord Admiral, I beseech you both, that seeing you are Witnesses I am ourdemned by the letter of the law, it would please you to let the queen know that I crave her mercy. I know I have offended her, yet if it please her to be merciful unto me, I may live, and by my service deserve my life. I have been brought up under her majesty, I have spent the best part of my patrimony in her majesty's service with danger of my life, as your lordships know; if there were any that could challenge me, that I have ever heretofore committed or intended Treason, or any other thing prejudicial to her majesty or estate, God let me never inherit his kingdom, neither would I desire mercy: but since the law hath cast me, I do submit myself to death, and yet I will not despair of her majesty's mercy; for that I know she is merciful, and if she please to extend it, I shall wish all humility receive it.

L. Steward. My lord of Essex, the queen's majesty hath bestowed many favours on your predecessors and yourself; I would wish therefore that you likewise would submit yourself to her majesty's mercy, acknowledging your offences, and reconciling yourself inwardly to her majesty, by laying open all matters that were intended to prejudice her majesty, and the actors thereof; and thereby no doubt you shall find her majesty merciful.

Essex. My lord, you have made an honourable motion; do but send to me at the time of my death, and you shall see how penitent and humble I will be towards her majesty, both in acknowledging her exceeding favours to my ancestors, and to myself: whereby I doubt not but the penitent suffering of my death, and sprinkling of my blood, will quench the evil-conceited thoughts of her majesty against me. And I do most humbly desire her majesty, that my death may put a period to my offences committed, and be no more remembered by her highness. If I had ever perceived any of my followers to have barboured an evil thought against her majesty, I would have been the first that should have punished the same, in being his executioner; and therefore I beseech you, my good lord, mistake me not, nor think me so proud, that I will not crave her majesty's mercy, for I protest (knéeing upon the very knee of my heart) I do crave her majesty's mercy with all humility: yet I had rather die than live in misery.

Then the Lord High Steward, after a few exhortations unto the earls to prepare themselves for God, told them, Seeing the law had found them guilty, it followed of course that he must proceed to Judgment.

The earl of Essex replied very cheerfully, and said; Yea, my lord, with a very good will I pray you go on.

Then the Lord High Steward gave Judgment as followeth: You must go to the place from whence you came, and there remain during her majesty's pleasure; from thence to be drawn on a hurdle through London streets, and so to the place of Execution, where you shall be hanged, bowelled, and quartered; your head and quarters to be disposed of at her majesty's pleasure, and so God have mercy on your souls.

Essex. My lord, I am not a whit dismayed to receive this Sentence, for I protest death is as welcome to me as life; and I shall die as cheerful a death upon such a testimony, as ever did man. And I think it fit my poor quarters that have done her majesty true service in divers parts of the world, should be sacrificed and disposed of at her majesty's pleasure; whereunto with all willingness of heart I have submitted myself. But one thing I beg of you, my lords, that have free access to her majesty's person, humbly to beseech her majesty to grant me, that (during the short time I shall live) I may have the same preacher to comfort me, that hath been with me since my troubles began; for as he that hath been long sick, is most desirous of the physician which hath been, and is best acquainted with the constitution of his body; so do I most wish to have the comfort and spiritual physic from the preacher which hath been and is acquainted with the inward griefs, and secret affections of my soul. And my last request shall be only this; that it will please her highness that my lord Thomas Howard and the Lieutenant of the Tower may be partakers with me in receiving the Sacrament, and be a witness of it, in token of what I have protested to be true in this life, for my loyalty, religion, and peace of conscience: and then whensoever it shall please her majesty to call me, I shall be ready to seal the same with my blood.

The lords promised they would move the queen for his requests.

Essex. I humbly thank your lordships.

Then the Serjeant at Arms stood up with the mace on his shoulder, and after proclamation was made, said thus: All peers that were summoned to be here this day, may now take their ease; and all other persons attending here this service, may depart in her majesty's peace, for my Lord High Steward is pleased to dissolve this Commission.

As the lords were rising, the earl of Essex said, My lord De la Ware, and my lord Morley, I beseech your lordships to pardon me for your two sons that are in trouble for my sake: I protest upon my soul they knew not of any thing that was or should have been done, but came to me in the morning, and I desired them to stay, and they knew not wherefore. And so farewell, my lords.

The earl of Southampton obtained a reprieve, but the earl of Essex was ordered for Execution.

On the 25th of February 1601*, which was the day appointed for his Execution, Thomas Mountford and William Barlow, doctors of divinity, with Ashton the minister of the church in the Tower, were sent unto him early in the morning to administer christian consolation to his soul. In presence of these men he gave thanks to Almighty God from the bottom of his heart, that his designs, which were so dangerous to the state, succeeded not. He told them, he had now looked thoroughly and seriously into his sin, and was heartily sorry he had so obstinately defended an unjust cause at the bar. He thanked the queen she had granted he should not be publicly executed, lest his mind, which was now settled and composed, might be disturbed by the acclamations of the people, protesting that he had now learned how vain a thing the blast of popular favour and applause was. He acknowledged how worthy he was to be spued out (these were his words) by the Common-wealth, for the wickedness of his enterprize, which he likened to a leprosy spread far and near, and that had infected many.

The Queen in the mean time wavered in her mind. One while relenting, she sent her commands by sir Edward Carey that he should not be executed; but then remembering his perverse obstinacy, that he scorned to ask her pardon, and had declared openly that his life would be the queen's destruction, she soon after sent a fresh command by Darcy that he should be put to death.

Then he was brought forth between the divines to a scaffold erected within the Courtyard of the Tower: Near which sat the earls of Cumberland and Hertford, viscount Howard of Bindon, the lord Howard of Walden, the lord Darcy of Cliche, and the lord Compton. There were present also some of the aldermen of London, and sir Walter Raleigh, who if we may believe himself, came with an intent to make answer if any thing should be objected against him by the earl at his death; but others thought he came to feed his eyes with a sight of the earl's sufferings, and to satiate his hatred with his blood. But being admonished not to press upon the earl at his death, which is the part rather of ignoble brutes, he withdrew himself further off, and beheld his Execution out of the armory.—The earl, as soon as he was come upon the scaffold, uncovered his head, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, acknowledged that many and great had been the sins of his youth, for which, with most fervent prayer (he begged pardon of the eternal majesty of God, through Christ his mediator; especially for this last sin, which he termed a bloody, crying, and contagious sin, wherewith so many had been seduced to sin against God, their prince and country. He besought the queen and her ministers to forgive him, praying for her long life and prosperous estate, protesting withal that he never intended to lay violent hands on her person. He gave God thanks that he had never been Atheist, or Papist, but had placed all his hope and confidence in the merits of Christ. He prayed God to strengthen his mind against the terrors of death; desiring the standers-by to join with him in a short prayer, which with broken sighs, and fervent affection of inward devotion, he presently uttered. Afterwards the executioner asking forgiveness he forgave him; He recited the Apostles Creed, and then laying himself down, placed his neck upon the block; and having repeated the first verses of the 51st Psalm, he said, 'In humility and obedience I prostrate myself to my deserved punishment: Thou, O God! have mercy on thy prostrate servant: Into thy hands, O Lord! I commend my spirit.'—His head was taken off at the third stroke, but the first took away all sense and motion.

71. Proceedings in Parliament against JOHN Earl of GOWRIE, ALEXANDER RUTHVEN his Brother, HENRY RUTHVEN, HUGH MONCRIEF, and PETER EVIOT, for High Treason: 42 ELIZ. Nov. 15, A. D. 1600, at Edinburgh. [Extracted from the authentic Records, and the principal Vouchers (which lie in public Custody in the Parliament-House, at Edinburgh) by George Earl of Cromerty, Keeper of the Records, Temp. Cor. 2. Also from the Somers' Tracts, 4 coll. vol. 1. p. 213.]

WILLIAM, earl of Gowrie, having been condemned at Stirling, and executed in the year 1584, with two others, for seditious practices, in seizing the king's person at Ruthven-House, when in his minority, and banishing from him all others who were not of their party, making him condescend to what they proposed, and levying forces to secure themselves and the king's person in their custody; occasioned the hot clergy of their party, both to preach and publish scandalous pamphlets against the king and government: this did beget a strict friendship between young Gowrie and the fac-tious clergy. Albeit, the king did, with great benignity, restore the earl of Gowrie to his father's honours and estate; yet, his two sons, the earl, and Mr. Alexander, were nursed up in such malice against the king, by some of his relations, (but especially by the Clergy), that neither the king's restoring him to his estate and honour, conferring also other marks of favour and trust on him, (and placing his sister as the first lady of honour to the queen, and making his brother Alexander one of his bed-chamber) could allay his revenge, till at last, he resolved to bring his long-designed purpose to effect. For, in August 1600, he devised and contrived the bringing the king from Falkland to his house in Perth; and there, with his fellow-conspirators, to have murdered the king.

On account of this Treason †, and several disorders, a Parliament was indicted to meet at Edinburgh on the first of November that year 1600, albeit the printed Acts bear its meeting to be on the 15th.

Accordingly, a Parliament was indicted, to be holden at Edinburgh on the 1st of Nov. 1600, and, as is ordinary, it was adjourned to the 4th. On which day, sir Thomas Hamilton, king's advocate, produced a summons of Treason duly executed against William Ruthven, brother and apparent heir to John earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven: calling also, in the summons, the tutors and curators of the said William, (if he had any) and all others, having pretence or interest in the matter, to hear it found; and declared, that the said earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander his brother, had committed Treason, in attempting to bereave his majesty of his life, at St. Johnston, on the 5th day of August last, by-past: The Summons and Executions being read, and the heralds and messengers sworn to the veracity of the executions, both at their private houses, mercat-crosses, and shoar and peer of Leith, &c. (which are the most public Intimations and Citations that can be given by the law of Scotland;) which Citations were given on the 28th of August and 29th ditto, in their respective places and mercat-crosses, and the Parliament was declared current daily.

On the 9th day, the said Summons and Executions were read over again, another summons of treason was produced, with their executions and verifications, made on oath in the face of the court, against Alexander and Henry Ruthven, sons to Alex. Ruthven of Frieland; and against Hugh Moncrief, brother to William Moncrief of that ilk; Patrick Eviot, brother to Colin Eviot of Balhousie; to hear and see themselves decerned, as guilty of High-Treason, and Lese-Majesty against the king at Perth, the 5th day of August last past. And likewise by warrant from the Parliament, one Andrew Henderson, who was prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, on accusation for the said crime, was brought by the baillie of Edinburgh, and sisted before the Parliament; he having received formal summons in the Tolbooth, on the 28th of August last past.

The summons being thrice called, the executions all verified, and none of the persons cited comparing, excepting Andrew Henderson the prisoner; the King's Advocate did take instruments: and likewise the king's advocate did then, and there, produce before the lords, our sovereign lord's letters of relaxation, given under his highness's signet at Edinburgh, relaxing all the persons so summoned from the horn, and from all the summons executed against them, at the instance of whatsoever persons; that so, they might have safety and freedom to compare: and which relaxations were promulgated, at the mercat-crosses of the shires where each person had his abode; and also at the mercat-cross at Edinburgh, and shoar and peer of Leith. And these executions and relaxations were registered in the records of the shires where the accused did reside: on which production the king's advocate did take instruments.

The Lords Commissioners in Parliament did remit the said Andrew Henderson to the Tolbooth for safe custody, and the Parliament adjourned until the 15th of Nov.: on which day, the Parliament having met, the said sir Thomas Hamilton, Advocate, produced the said summons of Treason and Executions; and the heralds and messengers having, of new, verified the executions upon oath formerly, &c. neither William, nor none for him, nor the others cited, comparing; the King's Advocate did take instruments thereon: only Mr. Thomas Henrison, one of the commissaries of Edinburgh, compared for the foresaid Andrew Henderson, and produced the Writ following, undersubscribed by the king's advocate. 'It is our will and we command you, that upon sight hereof, ye delete Andrew Henderson, chamberlain to umquhile John earl of Gowrie, his name furth of the summons of Treason and Forfaulture, raised and executed against him, for being art, part, redd, counsel, and counselling, of the late Treason conspired by the said umquhile earl, his umquhile brother, and complices, against our person; and as you will answer to us hereupon; keeping thir presents for your warrant. Subscribed with our hand at Holy-rood-house, the 9th of Nov. 1600. Sic subscribitur, JACOBUS R.' Conform whereunto, the advocate did delete his name.'

The Heralds and Messengers did, at that same time, again verify upon oath the executions given in; and the relaxations and executions against William, and Alexander, and Henry Ruthven, Patrick Eviot, and Hugh Moncrief; and the Parliament found the Dittay relevant: and then adjourned till the 15th of November, and remitted the examination of the witnesses to the Lords of Articles, which are a Committee of Parliament, according to the constant practice and custom in Parliament.—Note, the Lords of the Articles in that parliament, were two bishops and four abbots, all men of great worth and integrity; four earls, viz. Lennox, Errol, Marrischal, and Marr; four lords, viz. Seton, Livingstoun, Newbottle, and Fvie; seven barons, and nine commissioners of boroughs.

On the 15th of November, the Parliament did again meet, and the Advocate did again call the summons of Treason against all the fore-mentioned persons (except Henderson), for enterprizing the slaughter of the king, on the 5th of August last past: Being all three called, and none comparing, the hail estates did find both the summons, reasons and causes therein mentioned, relevant; and therefore admitted the same to the Advocate's probation. Whereupon the Advocate did produce the Letters of horning duly executed and endorsed, against Alexander and Henry Ruthven, Hugh Moncrief, and Patrick Eviot; bearing, that they were denounced rebels, and put to the horn, for crimes of Treason therein mentioned.

And the oaths and depositions of the Witnesses, let and adduced by the Advocate, for proving of the Treason against the defenders (taken before the Lords of Articles), viz. the Deposition of umquhile Mr. Thomas Cranstoun, and George Craingelt, when they were executed to death, for the foresaid crime of Treason: and likewise, the Advocate repeated the notoriety, with the circumstances of the matter of fact, to prove the points of the Libel; and produced the Depositions of all the witnesses, which were all read, as follows:

The DEPOSITIONS of the WITNESSES, examined in presence of the Lords of Articles, for proving of the said two Summonses of Treason.

THE Duke of Lenox, sworn and examined, depones, That upon the 5th day of August last by-past, this deponent, for the time being in Falkland in company with his Majesty, he saw Mr. Alexander Ruthven speaking with his grace before the stables, betwixt six and seven in the morning; and shortly thereafter, his majesty passing to the hunting of the buck, and having slain one in the Park of Falkland, his highness spake to the deponent, disyring him to accompany his majesty to Perth, to speak to the earl of Gowrie. And incontinent thereafter, this deponent sent his servant for another horse, and for a sword, and lap on, and followed his grace: and as this deponent overtook his grace, Mr. Alexander Ruthven was speaking with his majesty; and shortly after the deponent's coming to the king, his highness rode a-part, and spake with this deponent, saying, Ye cannot guess, man, what errand I am riding for; I am going to get a pose in Perth: and Mr. Alexander Ruthven has informed me, that he has fund a man, that has a pitchard full of coined gold, of great sorts. And in the mean time, his highness enquired of this deponent, of what humour he thought Mr. Alexander to be of? Who answered, that he knew nothing of him, but as of an honest discreet gentleman. And after that his highness had declared to this deponent, the hail circumstances of the man who had the said gold, the place where it was found, and where it was kept; this deponent answered, I like not that, sir; for that is not likely. And they riding beside the bridge of Erne, his majesty called to the deponent, that Mr. Alexander disyred him to keep that matter of the pose secret, and take nobody with him; and then his highness, both at that time, and thereafter at St. Johnstoun, within the earl of Gowrie's hall, said to this deponent, Take taint where I pass with Mr. Alexander Ruthven, and follow me.

And as his majesty was within a mile to Perth, after that Mr. Alexander had come a certain space with his highness, he rode away and galloped to Perth, before the rest of the company, towards his brother's lodging, of purpose (as the deponent believes), to advertise the earl of Gowrie of his majesty's coming there. And as his majesty was within two pair of butt-langs to the town of Perth, the earl of Gowrie, accompanied with diverse persons, all on foot, met his highness in the Inche, and saluted him; and immediately thereafter, his majesty, accompanied with this deponent, the earl of Mar, Inchechaffrey, sir Tho. Erskin, laird of Urquhil, James Erskin, Wm. Stuart, sir Hugh Herries, sir John Ramsay, John Murray, John Hamilton of the Grauge, and John Graham of Bagowie, past all together, in the earl of Gowrie's hall; the said earl of Gowrie, and the said Mr. Alex. Ruthven being both present with them. And after their entry, his majesty cry'd for a drink, which was a long time a-coming: and it was an hour after his first coming, before his majesty got his dinner. And in the time that his majesty got his desert, the earl of Gowrie came to this deponent, and to the earl of Mar, and remanent persous foresaid, and desired them to dine, which they did, in the hall; and when they had near hand dined, the earl of Gowrie came from his majesty's chamber to the hall, and called for wine; and said, that he was directed from his majesty's chamber, to drink his Scoll (the word used then for drinking a health) to my lord duke, and the rest of the company; which he did. And immediately after the scoll had pass'd about, this deponent did raise from the table, to have waited upon his majesty, conform to his former direction; and then the earl of Gowrie said to the deponent, that his majesty was gone up quietly, some quiet errand. And then, the said earl of Gowrie cry'd for the key of his garden, and pass'd in company with this deponent, to the garden, accompanied with Lindores and sir Hugh Herries, and certain others: and shortly after their being in the garden, Mr. Tho. Cranstoun came down to the garden, crying, the king's majesty is on horseback, and riding through the Inche: and then the earl of Gowrie cry'd, 'Horse, Horse.' And the said Mr. Thomas Cranstoun answered to him, Your horse is in town; to whilk the earl of Gowrie made him no answer, but cry'd, 'Ay, Horse, Horse.' And this deponent and the earl of Gowrie came first out of the garden, through the hall to the closs, and came to the oute gate; and this deponent speird at the porter, if the king was furth; who answer'd, that he was assured that his majesty was not come furth of the place. Then the earl of Gowrie said, I am sure he is first always; stay, my lord, drink, and I shall gang up, and get the verity and certainty thereof. And the said earl of Gowrie passed up, and incontinent came again to the closs, and he affirmed to this deponent, that the king's majesty was furth at the back-gate, and away. Whereupon, this deponent, the earl of Gowrie, and Mar, and hail company, past furth at the fore-gate of the lodging; and staid before the same gate, upon the street: and as they were standing there, advising where to seek the king, incontinent, and in the mean time, this deponent heard a voice, and said to the earl of Mar, This is the king's voice, that cries, be where he will; and so they all looked up to the lodging, and saw his majesty looking furth of the window, wanting his hat; his face being red, and an hand gripping his cheek and mouth; and the king cry'd, 'I am murder'd; Treason! My lord Mar, help, help.' And incontinent, this deponent, the earl of Mar, and their company, ran up the stair of the gallery chamber, where his majesty was, to have relieved him: and as they passed up, they found the door of the chamber fast; and seeing a ladder standing beside, they rasht at the door with the ladder, and the steps of the ladder brake: and sync, they send for hammers; and notwithstanding large forcing with hammers, they got not entry at the said chamber, while after the earl of Gowrie and his brother were both slain. That Robert Brown past about be the back-door, and came to his majesty, and assured his highness, that it was my lord duke and the earl of Mar, that was striking up the chamber door; and the hammer was given through the hole of the door of the chamber: and they within brake the door and gave them entry: and, at their first entry, they saw the earl of Gowrie lying dead in the chamber, Mr. Alexander Ruthven being slain, and taken down the stairs before their entry. And at their first entry within that chamber where the king's majesty was, the deponent saw sundry halberts and swords striking under the door of the chamber, and sides thereof, by reason the same was nae closs door; and knew none of the strickers, except Alexander Ruthven one of the defenders, who desired to speak with this deponent through the door, and speird at him, For God's sake tell me how my lord of Gowrie was. To whom this deponent answered, He is well: and the said deponent bad Alexander to gang his way; and that he was ane fool; and that he would get little thanks for that labour. And, in the mean time, as they were continuing to strick with halberts under the door, weikle John Murray, servant to Tullibardin, was stricken through the legg; and how soon the said Alexander Ruthven had heard the said lord duke speak, he and his haif complices past from the foresaid door, and made no more trouble thereafter thereat, and passed down to the closs, and stood there. And saw none of the remaneut defenders present, at the doing of the violent turns that day, except by report, but the said Alexander Ruthven: but says, that he saw Hugh Moncrief, Earn, and Alexander Daithvenies, and Patrick Eviot, with the earl of Gowrie, at the king's dinner that day; and that before and thereafter, looking over the chamber window, he saw George Craigie and Alexander Ruthven; and did see others of the earl of Gowrie's servants, whom this deponent knew not, standing in arms within the closs: and also saw other persons carrying ane joist from the town, to the closs of the earl of Gowrie's lodging: and declares, that there abode sundry persons within the said closs, and in the high street, before the said earl's lodging, crying and making tumult, to the space of two hours mair, next after the death of the said earl of Gowrie, and his brother. Sic subscribitur, LENOX.

The Earl of Mar, sworn and examined, depones, conform to the lord duke of Lenox's deposition, in all things substantial, except that his lordship saw not Mr. Alexander Ruthven in Falkland, while about ten hours the day libelled, shortly before the slaying of the buck: and also, overtook not his majesty that day, while his majesty was near the bridge of Erne: and, that after their dinner, my lord of Mar passed not to the yeard, in company with the earl of Gowrie, but passed to a chamber where the king dined, and saw nothing of the joist. Sic subscribitur, MAR.

Andrew Henderson, chamberlain of Scoon, sworn, depones, that he is of the age of thirty-eight years; declares, that upon Monday at night, the 4th day of August last by-past, this deponent being, after supper, in company with the earl of Gowrie and Mr. Alexander Ruthven, within my lord's own chamber; the earl of Gowrie enquired at this deponent, what he had to do to-morrow? To whom this deponent answered, that he had to do, to ride to Ruthven, to speak with the tements. Then the earl of Gowrie answered, stay that journey, you must ride to Falkland, in company with my brother Mr. Alexander; and take Andrew Ruthven with you; and that ye be ready to ride be four hours in the morning: and haste thou back with answer, as my brother orders you, by writ or otherways: and let Andrew Ruthven remain with my brother. And, in the morning, after four hours, they rode all three together to Falkland; and coming to Falkland, they lighted at John Barfour's house, and seeing that colonel Edmuud was there, they lodged in ane Law's house: and the master sent this deponent about seven hours in the morning, to see what the king's majesty was doing. And as he was within the place, he saw the king's majesty coming furth the mid-closs, booted; and then he returned back again to the master, and said to him, Haste you, the king's majesty is coming forth: and incontinent, the master followed his majesty, and spake with his majesty foranent the equirie; and the king laid his hand on his shoulder, and clapped him, where they spake together be the space of ane quarter of an hour. And thereafter, the master directed this deponent to ride to Perth in haste, as he loved the lord Gowrie's and his honour, and advertise his brother, that his majesty will be there, with a few number incontinent; and cause make his dinner ready. Then this deponent answered, Shall I ride presently? The master answered, no, but stay a-while, and follow the king and me, while I speak with his majesty again. And, as his majesty was riding through the sloop of the Park-dike, the master spake to his majesty; and immediately thereafter, the master bad this deponent to pass to St. Johnstoun, with all possible diligence, according to his former directions. And, at this deponents coming to Perth it was shortly after ten hours in the morning, he entered in the lord of Gowrie's chamber, where he saw his lord speak with George Hay and Mr. Peter Hay: and how soon my lord of Gowrie saw this deponent, he came aside to this deponent, and enquired secretly, what word he had brought from his brother? and if he had brought a letter? This deponent answered, that he had brought no letter: What answer then, said he, has he to me? This deponent answered, that the master his brother had tell his lordship, that the king's majesty would be there incontinent; and bad haste his dinner. Then the earl bad this deponent to follow his lordship to the cabinet, and speird at him, how his majesty had tane with his brother? He answered, that he was well tane with; and when he did his courtesy, the king laid his hand upon his shoulder. The earl speird, what number of persons was with the king at the hunting? who answered, that he knew not well; but that there were sundry of his own with him, and some English-men. And then the earl speird, what noblemen were with him? He answered, none but my lord duke. And thereafter, this deponent passed to his own house in the town, and took off his boots, and returned to the earl within an hour: and how soon the earl saw him in his chamber, he called upon this deponent, and bade him put on his secret, [a coat of mail] and plate-sleeves. The deponent enquired to what effect? The earl answered, I have an Highland-man to take in the Shoegate; and then the deponent passed to his own house, and put on his secret, and plate-sleeves, came back again to the earl of Gowrie's house; and about half an hour to one, the earl commanded this deponent, Take up my dinner; and this deponent passed, and took up the first service, by reason Charles Craingelt was sick. And incontinent the said earl passed to his dinner, accompanied with Mr. John Moncrief, laird of Petcrief, Mr. James Drummond, Alexander Peoples, baron of Findowne. And shortly after the first service was set down, my lord sitting at the table with the foresaid company, Andrew Ruthven came in from the master, and rounded to the earl, but heard not what he said; and shortly after, this deponent passing down to take up the second service, Mr. Alex. Ruthven and Wm. Blair came in to the earl, my lord sitting at his dinner: and hown soon my lord saw them, he and his hail company rose from the table; and then this deponent hearing my lord on foot bid this deponent send for his steel-bonnet and gantlet, believing that my lord was going to take the said Highland-man. And as this deponent perceiving my lord passing to the Inche, and not to the Shoegate, he sent home his steel-bonnet, and cast his gantlet in the pantry, and thereafter followed the earl to the Inche, where he saw the said earl with his majesty, the duke, and the earl of Mar, and came in all together to the earl's house. And after his majesty had come to the earl's house, the master of Ruthven speird at this deponent, where the key of the gallery-chamber was? Who answered, That he handled not the key since the earl came in Scotland. Then the master bid this deponent speak to Mr. William Rynd to give to him the said key: and the master passing up to the gallery, Mr. W. Rynd followed him, and gave to him the said key: and thereafter, immediately after his majesty's down-sitting to his dinner, Mr. Thomas Cranstoun came to this deponent,* and bade him gang to the earl of Gowrie; which this deponent did. And the earl of Gowrie, in the outer chamber, where the king dined, spake to this deponent secretly, and bad him pass to the gallery to his brother. So he passed up, and the earl follows him; and they being all three together in the gallery-chamber, (whereof he had the key from Mr. Wm. Rynd) the earl said to this deponent, Tarry still with my brother, and do any thing he bids you. Then this deponent came to the master, and speird, What will you with me, Sir? Then the master spoke to my lord, Let Andrew Henrison go into the round of the chamber, and I will lock him in, and take the key of the chamber with me; where this deponent abode half an hour or thereby, locked his alane, having his secret, plate-sleeves, sword and whinger with him, and wanting his steel bonnet. And all this time, this deponent feared some evil to be done: that, upon this, he kneeled and prayed to God; and about the end of the half hour, Mr. Alexander opens the door of the room, and entered first within the same, having the king's majesty by the arm, and puts on his hat upon his head, draws forth this Andrew Henderson deponent's whinger; and says to the king, having the drawy whinger in his hand, Sir, you must be my prisoner; remember on my father's death. And, as he held the whinger to his majesty's breast, this deponent threw the samen furth of Mr. Alexander's hands. And the time that Mr. Alexander held the whinger to his majesty's breast, the king was beginning to speak. The master said, Hold your tongue, sir, or, by Christ, ye shall die. Then his majesty answered, Mr. Alexander, Ye and I were very * Upon the information of Henderson, and other witnesses, Cranstoun and Craingelt were pannelled before the Justiciary at Johnstoun; and upon clear testimonies, and on their own confession at the bar (which they also adhered to on the scaffold) they were both executed: only alledging, that they did not know of the design to murder the king; but that they intended to force the king to make great reparations for the late earl of Gowrie's death: and that this earl of Gowrie was to be made a great man.

great together; and as touching your father's death, man, I was but a minor. My council might have done any thing they pleased. And farther, man, albeit ye bereave me of my life, ye will not be king of Scotland; for I have both sons and daughters, and there are men in this town and friends that will not leave it unrevenged. Then Mr. Alexander answered, swearing with a great oath, that it was neither his life nor blood that he craved. And the king said, what traiks, [what then] albeit ye take off your hat; and then Mr. Alexander took off his hat. And the king said, What is it ye crave, man, and ye crave not my life? who answered, Sir, it is but a promise. The king answered, What promise? The said Mr. Alexander answered, For, my lord my brother will tell you. The king said, Fetch hither your brother. And syne the said Mr. Alexander said to the king, Sir, you will not cry, nor open the window while I come again? and the king promised so to do. Then Mr. Alexander passed forth and locked, and passed not from the door, as he believes. In the mean time, the king entered in discourse with this deponent, How came you in here, man? And this deponent answered, As God lives, I am shot in here like a dog. The king answered, Will my lord of Gowrie do me any evil, man? This deponent answered, I vow to God I shall die first. And then the king bad this deponent open the window and he opened the window that looked to the Spy-tower: and the king answered, Fy, the wrong window, man! And thereafter, this deponent passing to the other window nearest his majesty, to open the same; before he got to the window, Mr. Alexander opened the door, and came in again, and said to his majesty, By God! there is no remedy; and then he louns to the king, and got him by both the hands, having a garter in his hands. Then the king answered, I am a free prince, man; I will not be bound: so his majesty cast loose his left hand from Mr. Alexander; and at that same time, this deponent draws away the garter from Mr. Alexander, and his majesty louns free from the said Mr. Alexander, and the said Mr. Alexander follows his majesty, and with his left hand about his majesty's craig, puts his right neeve [fist] in his majesty's mouth: so his majesty wrestling to be quite of him, this deponent put his hand out of his majesty's mouth. And thereafter, this deponent did put his left hand over his majesty's left shoulder, and pull'd up the broad of the window, whereunto the said Mr. Alexander had thrust his majesty's head and shoulders; and with the force of the drawing up of the window, presses his majesty's body about, his right side to the window: at which time his majesty cries furth, Treason! Treason! So the master said to this deponent, Is there no help with thee? Wo worth thee, thou villain! we all die. So twining his hand on the guard of his own sword; and, incontinent, the king's majesty put his hand on the master's hands, and staid him from drawing of his sword: and this ways they both being grasped together, come forth of the cabinet to the chamber: and, in the mean time, this deponent threw about the key; then standing in the door of the head of the turnpike, which entred to the chamber, and opened the door thereof, to eschew [escape] himself, and to let his majesty's servants in. And how soon he opened the door, John Ramsay came in at the said door, with an haulk on his hand, and passed to the king's majesty, and laid about him, and drew his whinger: and as he saw him minting with the whinger, this deponent passed furth at the said door, and passed down the turnpike. And, as this deponent passed through the close, and came to the fore-gate, this deponent saw the earl of Gowrie standing before the gate accompanied by sundry persons, of whom he remembers none; but remembers well, that the earl had this deponent's knapschaw, or head-piece, on his head, and two swords drawn in his hands: and incontinently thereafter, this deponent passed to his own lodging, where he remained while the king passed furth of the town; and then the deponent passed to the bridge, and walked up and down by the space of an hour, and returned not again to the earl's lodging. And the time of his entry to his house that night, this deponent's wife inquired at this deponent, What trouble was within the place? To whom he answered, Well is me of one thing, that if I had not been there, the king had been twice sticked this night: but wo is me for the thing that is fallen out. And this deponent being demanded by Mr. John Moncrief, after his returning from Falkland, where have you been with your boots on? answered, He had been two or three miles beyond Erne, and durst not tell him the verity, by reason the earl of Gowrie had discharged him to tell the errand, he sent him, to any body. And farther, this deponent declares, That when he saw the earl of Gowrie standing with the drawn swords before the gate, this deponent spoke not to the earl, neither yet the earl to him at that time, but he passed to his own house. Sic subscribitur, ANDREW HENDERSON.

The Abbot of Inchechaffrey, sworn and examined, depones, That, upon the 5th of August last by-past, this deponent being in Falkland, about seven hours in the morning, he met Mr. Alex. Ruthven, accompanied with Andrew Ruthven; and, at that time, only saluted the said Mr. Alex. Ruthven, without any conference farther at that time. And at that time, he saw the said Mr. Alexander enter into conference with his majesty, upon the green, betwixt the stables and the park: which conference enduring for the space of a quarter of an hour, and the said Mr. Alexander accompanied his majesty while they came to the meadow; and, at his returning from his majesty, this deponent desired Mr. Alexander to disjune with him, by reason his own could not be soon prepared. To whom Mr. Alexander answered, He might not tarry, by reason his majesty had commanded him to await upon him. And, as this deponent passed to Falkland, leaving Mr. Alexander behind him, met his horse with his man, coming from Falkland to him; and then this deponent, after he had disjuned in Falkland, he took his journey they high-way to Inchechaffrey, and the deponent being but a mile be-north Strameglo, he is incompanied with my lord Duke, Lindores, the laird of Urquhill, John Hamilton of the Grange, Finlay Tailzies; and Mr. Alex. Ruthven came by this Deponent, riding the high-way to Perth: Then incontinent this deponent horsed, and accompanied his majesty to Perth, where he saw the earl of Gowrie meet his majesty in the Inche, and passed in company with his majesty, and his noblemen, and servants, to the earl of Gowrie's lodging, where they dined all together. And after dinner, this deponent being in the chamber at the north-end of the hall, word passed through the hall, that his majesty was passed away, and ridden towards Falkland; and then this deponent, in company with the lord of Mar, and remanent present for the time, passed to the close, and from that to the high-street; and the earl of Gowrie being present with them, desired them to stay, while he returned and advertised them of the verity thereof. And incontinent the earl of Gowrie passed up the stair, and returned back, and certified the Deponent and his colleagues of his majesty's departure. Then the lord Duke, this deponent and remanent, cried for their horses to follow the king. Then, as they were standing upon the high-street, they heard ane cry, and a voice; and the Duke first declared, I am sure, yon is his majesty's voice, be where he will himself. And immediately thereafter, this deponent saw his majesty looking forth of a window of the round, wanting his hat, and his face red, crying, Fy, help, my lord Mar! Treason! Treason! I am murder'd! And, at the same instant, to his judgment, was pulled per force in at the same window. And, incontinent thereafter this deponent passed in haste up with the earl of Mar and my lord Duke, to the chamber within the gallery; where he saw, heard, and did in all things conform to the earl's Deposition. Sic subscribitur,

INCHECHAFFREY.

The Abbot of Lindores, sworn and examined, depones, conform to the lord Duke of Lenox, in all things: addendo, That after dinner, when word was of his majesty's departure towards Falkland, and that they had all altogether came down to the porter, and had inquired at him, gif the king's majesty was gone furth? the porter answered, He was not passed furth: and the earl of Gowrie affirmed, That he was passed furth at the back-gate: and the porter said to the earl of Gowrie, That cannot be, my lord, because I have the key of the back-gate. And, after that his majesty had cried furth of the window of the round, Treason! Treason! &c. this deponent saw James Erskin incontinently lay hands on the earl of Gowrie upon the high-street; and immediately sir Tho. Erskin gripped the earl of Gowrie; Fy, Traitor! this is thy deed, thou shalt die. Then the earl of Gowrie answered, I ken nothing of the matter. Then instantly the earl of Gowrie's men tugged the said sir Tho. Erskin and James Erskin from the earl of Gowrie: who incontinently ran the space of half ane pair of butt-lands from them, towards Glenurchie's house, and drew furth his two swords, and cried, I will either be at my own house, or die by the gate. And incontinently thereafter the said earl, accompanied with thirty persons, or thereby, passed within the said place, wherein his majesty was for the time; and shortly after, the deponent, as appeared to him, saw a multitude of people carrying a joist towards the place. Sic subscribitur, LINDORES.

Sir Thomas Erskin of the age of 36 years, sworn, depones conform to the lord Inchechaffrey, and lord of Lindores, addendo, That immediately after this deponent heard his majesty cry furth of the window of the round, Fy, help! I am betrayed, they are murdering me! he ran with diligence towards the place, to have helpen his majesty; and before his entry, seeing the earl of Gowrie, this deponent and his brother gripped him by the neck, and said to him, Traitor, this is thy deed. Whilk earl answered, What is the matter? I ken nothing. Immediately the earl's servants severed him from this deponent and his brother. And this deponent entered within the close, he forgathered with sir Hugh Herries, who demanded of the deponent what the matter meant; and, in the mean time, the deponent heard sir John Ramsay crying out at the turnpike-head, Fy, sir Thomas, come up the turnpike, even to the head! and, as this deponent had passed up five steps of the turnpike, he sees and meets with Mr. Alex. Ruthven blooded in two parts of his body, viz. in his face and in his neck; and incontinent this deponent cries to sir Hugh Herries, and others that were with him, Fy, this is the Traitor, strike him! and incontinent he was stricken by them, and fell; and as he was fallen, he turned his face, and cried, Alas! I had not the wyte of it; this deponent being standing above him in the turnpike. Thereafter, this deponent passed to the head of the turnpike, and entered within the chamber at the head of the gallery, where the king and sir John Ramsay were there alone present; and, at the first meeting, this deponent said to his majesty, I thought your majesty would have concredited more to me, nor to have commanded me to await your majesty at the door, gif ye thought it not meet to have taken men with you. Whereupon his majesty answered to this deponent, Alas! the Traitor deceived me in that, as he did in the leave; for I commanded him expressly to bring you to me, which he promised to me to do; and returned back, as I thought, to fetch you; but he did nothing, but stalked the door. Shortly thereafter, sir Hugh Herries followed the deponent into the chamber, and George Wilson, servant to James Erskin: and immediately thereafter Mr. Tho. Cranstoun, with his sword drawn in his hand, entered within the said chamber; and the earl of Gowrie followed him within the said chamber, with a sword drawn in every one of his hands, and a knapschaw on his head, who struck at this deponent and his colleagues a certain space. Likeas, they defended them and struck again: and at that same time, this deponent was hurt in the right hand by Mr. Tho. Cranstoun; and this deponent heard my lord of Gowrie speak some words at his entry, but understands them not. At last, sir John Ramsay gave the earl of Gowrie a dead straik; and then the earl leard him to his sword, and the deponent saw a man had him up, whom he knew not; and how soon the earl fell to the ground, Mr. Tho. Cranstoun, and the remanent who accompanied him, departed and passed down the turnpike. And the deponent remembers, that at that time, there were more persons in the chamber with the earl of Gowrie by Mr. Tho. Cranstoun, but knew none of them, except that he believes that a black man, that was there in company within the chamber, was Hugh Moncrief, brother to the laird of Moncrief; but the deponent knows not well, whether or not it was Hugh Moncrief. Sic subscribitur,

SIR THOMAS ERSKIN.

Sir John Ramsay, of the age of 23 years, or thereby, sworn, depones, That immediately after he had dined, the day libelled, in the earl of Gowrie's house he took his majesty's haulk from John Murray, to the effect the said John might have dined: and the deponent missing his majesty, and forgetting with the laird of Pittencrief, in the earl of Gowrie's hall; and demanding of Pittencrief, where his majesty was? the said laird first convoyed the deponent to the chamber where the king dined, thereafter to the yard, hoping that his majesty had been there: and missing his majesty in the yard, convoyed the deponent up to a fair gallery, where the deponent was never before; where having remained a certain space beholding the gallery, they came both down to the closs, where they met with Mr. Thomas Cranstoun in the midst of the closs, who said to them, that his majesty was away upon horseback, at the Inche: whereupon this deponent and Pittencrief sindered; and the deponent passed furth of the gate, to his stable, to have gotten his horse, and being standing at the stable door, he heard his majesty cry, knew his highness's voice, but understood not what he spake. Whereupon he comes immediately, within the closs, and finding a turnpike-door open, he enters within the samen, and runs up the turnpike, while he comes to the door upon the head thereof; and bearing a struggle and din of mens feet, he ran with his hail force at the door of the turnpike-head, which enters to the chamber at the end of the gallery; the deponent having in the mean time his haulk on his hand, and having dung open the door, he sees his majesty and Mr. Alex. Ruthven in others arms, striving and wrestling together, his majesty having Mr. Alexander's head under his arm, and Mr. Alexander being almost on his knees, had his hand upon his majesty's face and mouth: and his majesty seeing the deponent, cried, Fy! strike him laigh, because he has a pyne doublet upon him. Whereupon the deponent cast the haulk from him, and drew his whinger, wherewith he strake the said Mr. Alexander; and immediately after he was stricken, his majesty shot him down stairs wherat this deponent had entered. Thereafter, this deponent addresses himself to a window; and looking furth threath, and saw sir Thomas Erskin, the deponent cried, sir Thomas come up this turnpike, even to the head. In this mean time, his majesty did put his foot upon the haulkleash, and held her a lang time, while the deponent came and took her up again, and then sir Tho. Erskin entered. And in the rest depones conform to sir Thomas Erskin in all points; and further says, That when the deponent first entered within the chamber, he saw a man standing behind his majesty's back, whom he no ways knew, nor remembers what appareling he had on; but after that this deponent had stricken Mr. Alexander, he saw that man no more. Sic subscribitur,

SIR JOHN RAMSAY.

John Graham of Urquhill, sworn and examined, depones conform to the lord duke of Lennox and the earl of Mar in all things, reddens eandem causam scientie; adding, That this deponent the time that he was at dinner in the hall, with my lord duke and earl of Mar, he saw the king and Mr. Alex. Ruthven pass threw the hall up the turnpike, towards the gallery: and, as this deponent, John Hamilton, and others, were following, Mr. Alexander cried back, gentlemen, stay, for so it is his highness's will. Sic subscribitur,

JOHN GRAHAM, of Urquhill.

John Graham of Balgowne, of the age of 50 years, or thereby, married, depones, conform to the lord duke in all things: adding, that this deponent the day libelled, after the death of the earl of Gowrie and his brother, and hearing his majesty report, that Mr. Alexander pressed to have bound his highness's hands with a garter; this deponent found a garter at the cheek of the round door among the bent, and immediately thereafter this deponent presented the garter to his highness: and at the sight thereof, his majesty said, That the same was the garter wherewith Mr. Alexander pressed to have bound his hands; and then, sir Thomas Erskin gripped to the same garter, and said, That he would keep it, which he has yet in keeping. Sic subscribitur, JOHN GRAHAM of Balgowne.

I Mr. John Moncrief depones as follows, to wit, That day I was still present with my lord of Gowrie, unto the time I heard his majesty cry, Treason! and saw him put his arm furth of the window of the room, and then left him: for I conceived in my heart it was plain treason, conspired against his majesty, and was induced hereto in respect of these presumptions following: first, I saw the king's majesty and unquhile Mr. Alex. Ruthven my lord's brother go furth at the hall-door their alanes; whereas his majesty had no weapons, and Mr. Alexander had a sword. Next, I saw his majesty come in a quiet and sober manner to the town, wherethrough appeared he would have no evil purpose in his mind. Item, He said, Mr. Alexander riding to Falkland in the morning, was obscured from me and my brother Hugh where he was; and I having enquired of my brother Hugh where he was riding to, he knew nothing thereof; so that neither he nor I could get trial of the same. Item, I having enquired at Andrew Henderson himself, who rode to Falkland, and returned two hours before him, saluted me and answered, That he had been two or three miles above the town; and says, the said Andrew had another doublet on, more than he used commonly, and was more bulsom; and, as appears, might have contained ane secret. Item, That day being the council-day of the town, my lord excused himself, in respect of his advice. Item, I having pressed him to subscribe ane confirmation of ane lady's, first refused, in respect aforesaid; always passed it thereafter. Item, my lord tarried longer from his dinner nor he used: and albeit Andrew Ruthven, who was with the master, came and rounded my lord at the board, he made him to misknow all things, unto the time that the said Mr. Alexander came himself, and then raise from the board, and met his majesty. Item, My lord obscured altogether, that he knew of the coming of any man, while the master came. Item, Mr. Thomas Cranstoun was the first that I heard cry, The king's majesty is away. Item, After my lord duke and my lord Mar, and his majesty's servants were in the close, my lord of Gowrie came back again to the hall, saying, The king was away: so that, as I thought, he would have each man thinking so. And I thought his majesty was not received with that hearty complements as became. Item, after his majesty's riding away, my brother Hugh came to my house, and I enquiring of him what he thought of thir matters; answered, Before God, so far as I can perceive, I trow, it shall kyth ane plain treason on my lord's part. And I speiring at him, if he knew any things thereof? answered, he knew nothing; but he and Henry Ruthven, after all things were ended, fell in conference thereabout, and he thought things were likely. Lastly, Andrew Henderson's letter moves me most of all. And, upon my salvation and condemnation, I know no farther in this matter; nor yet can remember of any other circumstance or presumption, might have induced me to conceive the former, which I apprehend, in manner foresaid. Sic subscribitur, M<sup>r</sup>. JOHN MONCRIEF.

I Andrew Roy, one of the baillies of the burgh of Perth, be thir presents testifies upon my conscience in the sight of God, as I shall answer to him in the great day, that upon the fifth day of August, one thousand and six hundred years, I being in the unquhile earl of Gowrie's lodging, when his majesty was there, saw his majesty, after his dinner, accompanied with the master of Gowrie rise from the table, and gang furth of the chamber where he had dined; but, to what place, I know not; being beholding the said unquhile earl of Gowrie's entertainment of the noblemen, in drinking his majesty's scoll to them; which his majesty, before his rising from the table, had commanded him to do. And after this, the lords, viz. my lord duke, my lord of Mar, my lord Lindores, and my lord of Inchechaffery, with sundry of his majesty's gentlemen and servants, accompanied with the earl of Gowrie in person; and short space after dinner, had missed his majesty, and enquired where he should be; they went to the fore-gate, and speired at the porter, if he saw the king go furth at the fore-gate? and heard the porter answer, That his majesty was not gone furth that way. Also, that the earl of Gowrie said to the porter, Ye lie, knave, he is furth; and the porter replied, that he should give his head, in case his majesty was furth.

Yet, upon the earl of Gowrie's assurance, that his majesty was furth to the Inche, the lords issued out in haste at the fore-gate, and speiring where the king was, I saw ane ding up the long front-window, in the north-side of the turret, upon the high-gate; but who dang it up, I know not. And farther, saw clearly his majesty shut furth his head and arm at the foresaid window, and heard his majesty crying loudly, Fy, treason! treason! and murder! help, earl of Mar! Whereupon, I being very agast, and wonderfully astonished, at that cruel and terrible sight, and pitiful and woful cry, I not knowing what the matter meant, but perceiving his majesty in extrem and great danger, ran with all possible diligence thro' the streets, crying loudly, Fy, treason; treason against the king! for God's sake, all honest men, haste and relieve the king: and commanded to ring the common bell, that all might come in haste to his majesty's relief; and then I returned with all possible diligence, with a great number of the people with me, and came before the foresaid turret and window, where I saw his majesty first cry out; and then I cried out, How is the king? But my lord duke and my lord of Mar answered, The king is well, (praise be to God). Then I cried again up to his majesty, and shew his majesty, That the baillies and township were then come, in all haste, to supply and relieve his majesty: and therefore besought his majesty to command what was his majesty's will, and best to be done. And then his majesty beckoned furth his hand to me and to the people, commanding me to cause the people retire them to their lodgings. Which commandment I incontinent obeyed, and commanded all manner of men to retire themselves to their lodgings; and likewise passed to the mercat-cross, and, by open proclamation commanded in his highness's name, that all men should retire them to their lodgings, under the pain of treason, who obeyed not incontinent after my charge. And this I testify to be of verity, by the faith and truth of my body, so far as I justly can remember. In witness of which, I have subscribed these presents, with my hand, at Perth, the 13th of October, 1600, before these Witnesses, Mr. Patrick Gallowah, minister to his majesty; James Drummond of Letchel; Oliver Young, Constantino Wallace, Thomas Johnston, Baillies; Henry Elder, Clerk; Robert Anderson, Andrew Mowat, and William Jack, Burgesses of Perth. Sic subscribitur, ANDREW REY, Baillie, with my hand.—Mr. Patrick Gallowah; James Drummond; Oliver Young, Baillie; Thomas Johnston, Baillie; Robert Anderson; Andrew Arnolt; William Jack; Henry Elder, Scribe; Witnesses.

Robert Christie, porter to umquhile John earl of Gowrie, of the age of thirty years, solutus, depones, That he was porter to the earl of Gowrie, the fifth day of August libelled: sicklike he was by the space of five weeks before. And shortly after the dinner, this deponent saw my lord duke, the earl of Mar, the earl of Gowrie, come to the close: and my lord duke speird at this deponent, if his majesty was passed furth of the close? The deponent answered, that he was not furth. Then the lord of Mar said, Billy, tell me the verity, if his majesty be furth or not? And he answered, In truth he is not furth. The earl of Gowrie looking with an angry countenance, said, Thou lied, he is furth at the back-gate, and through the Inche. Then this deponent answered, That cannot be, my lord, for I have the key of the back-gate, and of all the gates of the place. Thereafter, this deponent heard and saw his majesty looking furth of the window of the round, and crying, Treason! Treason! fy, help, my lord of Mar! The SENTENCE and DOOM pronounced by the Lords and Estates of Parliament for High-Treason, against John Earl of Gowrie, and his brother Mr. Alexander Ruthven.

To repeat the Libel and Executions, or the Libels verbatim, would be uselessly tedious to Readers; therefore I insert the Doom or Sentence verbatim, pronounced on the 15th of Nov. 1600.

THE saids Lords and Estates of Parliament finds, decerns and declares, that the said umquhil John earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven his brother, committed and did open and manifest Treason against our said sovereign lord, in all points, articles and matter contained in the said summons: and therefore it was given for Doom, by the mouth of David Lindsay dempster of parliament, in manner and form as follows:

This court of parliament shoves for law, that the said umquhil John earl of Gowrie, and umquhil Mr. Alexander Ruthven his brother, committed the foresaid crime of Treason and Lese-majesty in their life-times, against our sovereign lord and his authority royal, in manner at length contained in the said summons: and therefore decerns and declares the name, memory and dignity of the said umquhil John earl of Gowrie, and umquhil Mr. Alex. Ruthven his brother, to be extinguished, and their arms to be cancelled and deleted furth of the books of arms and nobility; so that their posterity shall be unable, and incapable in all time coming to bruike, possess or enjoy any offices, dignities, honours, successions, possessions, and all goods, moveables and immoveables, rights, titles, hope of succession, and others whatsoever within this realm; and all goods, lands, rents, offices, benefits, honours, dignities, hope and appearance of succession, rights, titles, possessions, and other goods and gear, moveable and immoveable, and to theirs whatsoever, whilk is any ways pertain'd to the said umquhil John earl of Gowrie, and umquhil Mr. Alex. Ruthven his brother; or whilk is by any right, title, hope of succession, possession, or any other manner of way might have belong'd or pertain'd to them, to be confiscated, devolved in our sovereign lord, and to appertain to his highness: and in all time coming, remain in property with his majesty for ever. And farther, his majesty and estates foresaid, in detestation of the said horrible, unnatural and vile treason, attempted by the said umquhil John, some time earl of Gowrie, and umquhil Mr. Alex. Ruthven, against his highness's own life; decerns, statutes and ordains, that the said bodies of the saids traitors shall be carried, upon Monday next, to the publick cross of Edinburgh; and there to be hang'd, quarter'd, and drawn, in presence of the hail people: and thereafter, the heads, quarters and carcasses, to be affix'd upon the most patent parts and places of the burroughs of Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee and Stirling. And this I give for doom.

Besides the personal Sentence given against the earl of Gowrie, this Parliament did, by distinct Acts, disinherit and inhabilitate the brethren, and all the posterity of the earl of Gowrie, from enjoying any heritage, place or office within Scotland; and discharging all persons whatsoever to move or intercede for them, under high pains.—By another Act, the surname of Ruthven is appointed to be extinguish'd and abolish'd for ever; and such of them as were innocent of this Treason, were ordered to take other names, and to be inserted in publick Records.—By another Act, the 5th of August was appointed to be observed for thanksgiving, annually, and in all time coming, for the king's deliverance from the said Treason.—By another Act, the lands and estate of Ruthven were annexed to the patrimony of the crown. And, by several other particular acts, sir Thomas Erskin, (afterwards earl of

* For observations on this new Holiday, see Rapin (oct. edit.) vol. ix. p. 251.—Lord Chancellor Bacon in his Letter to the Marquis of Buckingham, dated Aug. 5, 1613, (See his Works, vol. iv. page 670) says, "I am here rejoicing with my neighbours the townsmen of St. Albans for this Happy Day."

Mr. Stephens in his Note on that passage in Lord Bacon's Letter, says, "The 5th of August being the Anniversary of the king's deliverance from the earl of Gowrie's Conspiracy, was by some call'd the Court Holy-Day, and ridicul'd as a fiction, though the truth thereof being deliver'd down by archbishop Spotswood, and other good Historians, I see no great reason to call it into question."

"In the Parliament which condemned John earl of Gowrie, and his brother Mr. Alexander in the year 1600, let it be considered, that a great part of the nobility, and many of the gentry, which did sit in that parliament, were descended of Gowrie's family, and nearly allied to it. As also the lords of the Articles, who did examine the Witnesses and Evidences, several were of near relation to the Panel, particularly Lenox and Levingston; and the barons and burghesses being elected members, not by the king and court, but by the barons and burroughs, and two bishops and four abbots, church-men, being also of that number; what ground remains for doubting their impartiality and veracity, in making a report of what was asserted and sworn so publicly by the witnesses? And all the Depositions, and written Evidences, being then recorded, do yet remain in publica custodia." Earl Cromerty's Account of the Conspiracies of the earls of Gowrie, page 13.

Kelly, sir John Ramsay, and sir Hugh Herries, and some others, who did most immediately preserve the king's person, had benefices and other favours conferr'd upon them in parliament.

The SENTENCE and DOOM pronounced by the Lords and Estates of Parliament, for High Treason, against Alexander and Harry Ruthvens, Hugh Moncreif and Patrick Eviot; who were actors in the same crime, and judged by the same Parliament, on the 15th day of November 1600.

' THE saids Lords and Estates of Parliament, finds, decerns, and declares, that the saids Alexander and Harry Ruthven, Hugh Moncreif, and Patrick Eviot, and ilk ane of them, committed, and did open and manifest treason against our sovereign lord in all points, articles, and manner contained in the said summons; and therefore it was given for doom by the mouth of David Lindsay, dempster of parliament, in manner and form as follows:

' This court of parliament shows for law,

' that the saids Alexander Ruthven, Harry Ruthven his brother, sours lawful to umquhil Alexander Ruthven of Freeland; Hugh Moncreif, brother to William Moncreif of that ilk; and Patrick Eviot, brother to Colin Eviot of Bulhousie; committed the crimes of Treason and Lese-majesty against our sovereign lord and his authority royal, in manner at length contain'd in the said summons: and therefore decerns and declares their persons, to underly the pains of Treason and Lese-majesty, and last punishment prescrib'd by the laws of this realm; and all their goods, moveable and immoveable, as well heritages as offices, benefices, and others whatsomever pertaining to them, or whilk is, might any ways belong, or appertain to them, to be confiscated to his majesty, and to remain with his highness in property for ever; and their posterity to be now, and in all time coming, incapable and unhabil to haik and possess within this realm, any honours, dignities, offices, benefices, successions, or other goods or gear, moveable or immoveable. And this I give for Doom.'

GOWRIE'S CONSPIRACIE: A Discovrse of the vnnatvrall and vyle Conspiracie, attempted against the King's Maiesties Person, at Sanct-Johnstovn, vpon Twysday the fifth of August, 1660. Edinbvrgh, printed, 1660, Cvm Privilegio Regio.

[From the Somers' Tracts, 4 Coll. vol. 1. p. 213.]

[This is one of the earliest Accounts of this remarkable Conspiracy, and therefore deserves to be reprinted, not only as it is very rarely to be found, but as it is very clear and elegant, with regard to the dialect in which it is written. In the language, though some passages may appear uncouth, no alteration has been made; both because we would not depart from the fidelity that we promised, nor, by changing expressions, give reason to suspect, that we take the same liberty with facts; and because the language may be, to some, no less an object of curiosity, than the events to others.]

HIS majestie having his residence at Falkland, and being daily at the buck-hunting, as his vse is in that season, vpon the fifth day of August, being Twysday, hee raid out to the park, betwixt six and seven hours in the morning, the weather beeing wonderfull pleasant and seasonable. But, before his maiestie could leap on horse-back, his hienes being now come downe by the equerie, all the huntis-men with the houndes attending his maiestie on the greene, and the court making to their horses, as his hienes self was; maister Alexander Ruthven, second brother to the late earle of Gowrie, being then lighted in the town of Falkland, haisted him fast downe to ouer-take his maiestie before his on-leaping, as he did: Where meeting his hienes, after a verie low courtesie, bowing his head vnder his maiesties knee (although he was neuer wont to make so low courtesy) drawing his maiestie a-part, he beginnes to discourse vnto him, but with a verie dejected countenance, his eyes euer fixed vpon the earth, how that it chanced him the euening before to be walking abroad about the fields, taking the air, solitarie allone, without the town of Sanct Iohnstoun, wher his present dwelling was with the lord his brother; and there by accident affirmed to haue recounted a base like fellow, vnkowne to him, with a cloke cast about his mouth; whome at as he enquired his name, and what his errand was, to be passing in so solitary a part, being from all waies. The fellow become at the suddain so amased, and his tongue so faltered in his mouth, that, vpon his suspicious behauiour, he begouth more narrowly to look vnto him, and examine him; and, perceauing that there appeared some thing to bee hid vnder his cloke, he did cast by the lappes of it, and so findes a great wyde pot to be vnder his arme, all full of coyned gold in great peeces. Assuring his maiestie, that it was in verie great quaintitie: Vpon the sight whereof, as hee affirmed, he took back the fellow with his burthen to the town; where he privately, without the knowledge of any liuing, took the fellow, and band him in a priue derved house, and, after lokking many durres vpon him, left him there, and his pot with him, and had haisted himself out of Sanct-Iohnstoun that day, by four houres in the morning, to make his maiestie aduertised thereof, according to his bound dutie: Earnestlie requesting his maiestie, with all diligence and secrecie, that his maiestie might take order therewith, before anie knew thereof; swearing and protesting, that he had yet concealed it from all liuing, yea, from the earle his owne brother.

His maiesties first answer was (after thanking him for his good-will) That it could not become his maiestie to meddle any wayes in that matter, since no mans treasure, that is a free and lawfull subiect, can by the lawe appertaine vnto the king, except it bee found hid vnder the earth, as this was not. Whereunto he answered, That the fellow confessed vnto him, that he was going to haue hid it vnder the ground, but could not take leasure at that time to enquire any further of him. Whereunto his maiestie replied, That there was great difference betwixt a deed, and the intention of a deed; his intention to haue hid it not beinge alyke as if it had bene found alreadie hid. Maister Alexander's answer was, That hee thought his maiestie over scrupulous in such a matter, tending so greatly to his maiesties profite: and that, if his maiesty deferred to meddle with it, it might bee, that the lord his brother, and other great men, might meddle with it, and make his maiestie the more a-doe: Whereupon the king, beginning to suspect that it had bene some forraine gold, brought home by some Iesuites, or practising Papists, therewith to sturre vp some newe sedition, as they have oftentimes done before, inquired of the said M. Alexander, What kinde of coine it was, and what a fellow hee was that carried it? His answer was, That, so far as hee could take leasure to see of them, they seemed to bee forraine and vncouth strokes of coine; and, although that the fellow, both by his language and fashion, seemed to bee a Scots fellow, yet hee could neuer remember, that hee had seene him before. These speaches increased his maiesties suspicion, that it was forraine coyne, brought in by some practising Papists, and to bee distributed into the countrie, as is before said. And that the fellowe, that carried it, was some Scots priest or seminarie, so disguised for the more sure transporting thereof. Whereupon his maiestie resolved, that he would send backe with the said Maister Alexander a seruand of his own, with a warrant to the prouost and baillies of Sanct-Iohnstoun, to receaue both the fellow and the money off maister Alexander's hand, and after they had examined the fellow, to retaine him and the treasure, till his maiesties further pleasure were knowne: Whereat the said maister Alexander sturred meruelouslie, affirming and protesting, that if either the lord his brother, or the baillies of the toun were put on the counsaill thereof, his maiestie would get a verie bad compt of that treasure; swearing, that the great loue and affection, he bare vnto his maiestie, had made him to preferre his maiestie, in this cace, both to himself and his brother. For the which seruice he humbly craued that recompence, that his maiesty would take the paines ouce to ryde thither, that he might bee the first seear thereof himself; which beeing done, he would remit to his maiesties owne honorable discretion, how far it would please his maiestie to consider vpon him for his seruice. His hienes beinge stricken in great admiration, both of the vncouthnes of the tale, and of the strange and stupide behaiour of the reporter; and the court beinge alreadie horsed, wondering at his maiesties so long stay with that gentleman, the morning beinge so fair, the game alreadie found, and the huntismen so long staying on the fields, on his maiestie, he was forced to breake off onlie with these words: That hee could not nowe staye any longer from his sporte, but that hee would consider of the matter, and, at the end of his chase, giue him a resolute answer, what order he would take therein. Whereupon his maiesty parted in haste from him towards the place where the game was. Maister Alexander parting from his maiestie verie discontent, that indelaiedlic he raid not to Sanct-Iohnstoun, as he desired him; protesting, that his maiestie would not finde euerie day such a choise of hunting, as he had offered vnto him; and that hee feared, that his maiesties long delay, and slowness of resolution, would breed leasure to the fellow, who was lying bound, to cry, or make such din, as would disappoint the secrecie of that hail purpose, and make both the fellow and the treasure to be medled with, before any word could come from his maiestie: As also, that his brother would misse him, in respect of his absence that morning; which if his maiestie had pleased to haste, he might haue preuented, arryuing there in the tyme of his brothers and the whole townes beinge at the sermon; whereby his maiestie might haue taken such secrete order with that matter, as hee pleased, before their outcomming from the church. But, his maiestie, without anie further answering of him, leaping on horse-back, and ryding to the dogs, where they were beginoing to hunt, the said maister Alexander stayed still in that place wher hee left his maiestie; and, hauing two men with him appointed by the late earle his brother, to carrie backe vnto him the certaine newes, in al haist, of his maiesties comming, as heerafter more particularlie shall in this same discourse be declared, hee directed one of them, called Andrew Henderson, chalmerlane to the said earle, to ryde in all haste to the earle; commanding him, as hee loued his brothers honour, that hee shoulde not spare for spilling of his horse; and that hee should aduertise the earle, that hee hoped to moue his maiestie to come thither, and that hee should not yet looke for him, the space of three houres thereafter, because of his maiesties hunting, adding these words: Pray my lord my brother to prepare the denner for vs.

But his maiestie was no sooner ridden vp to a little hil aboue the little woode, wher the dogs were laid on in hunting, but that, notwithstanding the pleasant beginning of the chase, hee could not stay from musing and wondering vpon the newes. Whereupon, without making anie bodie acquainted with this purpose, finding John Nesmith, chirurgian, by chance ryding beside him, his maiestie directed him back to bring maister Alexander with him; who being brought vnto his maiestie, and hauing newlie directed, as said is, one of his men, that was with him, back to my lord his brother, his maiestie, vnknowing or suspecting that any man liuing had come with him, then tolde him, that hee had bene aduysing with himself, and, in respect of his last wordes so earnest with him, hee resolved to ryde thither for that erand in his own person, how soone the chace was ended, which was already begun; lyke as his maiestie, vpon the verie ending of these wordes, did ryde away in the chace, the said maister Alexander euer following him at his back; no other liuing being with his hienesse, but hee, and John Hammliton of Grange, one of his maiesties maister-stablers, the reste of the court being all before in the chace, his maiestie onlie being casten back, vpon the staying to speak with maister Alexander, as is before said. The chace lasted from seuen houres in the morning, vntil alleuen and more, being one of the greatest and sorest chases, that euer his maiestie was at: All which tyme, the said maister Alexander was, for the most part, euer at his maiesties back, as said is. But there neuer was anie stop in the chace, or so small a delay, that the said maister Alexander omitted to round to his maiestie, earnestly requesting him to haist the end of the hunting, that he might ryde the sooner to Sanct-Iohnstoun: So as, at the death of the buck, his maiestie, not staying vpon the curie of the deir, as his vse is, scardelie took time to alight, awaiting vpon the comming of a fresh horse to ryde on, the greatnesse of the chace hauing wearied his horse. But the said maister Alexander would not suffer the king to stay in the parke, where the buck was killed, whil his fresh horse, which was already sent for, was brought out of the equery to him, although it was not two flight shot of bounds betwixt the part, where the buck was killed, and his maiesties equerie; but, with verie inportunitie, forced his maiestie to leap on againe vpon that same horse, that hee had hunted all the day vpon, his freshe horse beeing made to gallop a myle of the way to ouertake him; his maiestie not staying so much as vpon his sword, nor whil the duke and the earle of Mar, with diuerse gentlemen of his companie, had changed their horses: onlie saying vnto them, that hee was to ryde to Sanct-Iohnstoun to speak with the earle of Gowry, and that hee would bee presently back againe before euen. Whereupon, some of the court galloped backe to Falkland, als fast as they could, to change their horses, and could not ouertake his maiestie, whill he come within four myle of Sanct-Iohnstoun. Others raid forward with their horses, wried as they were, whereof some were compelled to alight by the way; and, if they had not both refreshed their horses, bled them, and giuen them some grasse by the way, they had not carried them to Sanct-Iohnstoun. The cause of his maiesties seruands following so fast, as desired by him, being onlie grounded vpon a suspicion they had conceaued, that his maiesties intention of ryding was for the apprehension of the maister of Oliphant, one who had lately done a vyle and proud oppression in Angus; for repairing of the which, they thought, that his maiestie had some purpose for his apprehension. But the said maister Alexander, seeing the duke and the earle of Mar, with diuers other of the court, getting fresh horses for following of his maiestie, earnestlie desired him, that hee would publish to his wyl traine, that, since he was to returne the same evening, as is before said, they needed not to follow him; especiallie, that he thought it meetest, that his maiestie should stay the duke and the earle of Mar to follow him, and that he should not take three or four of his owne meane seruants with him; affirming, that, if anie noble man followed him, hee could not answer for it, but that they would marre that whole purpose. Whereupon his maiestie, half angerlie, replied, That he would not mistrust the duke, nor the earle of Mar, in a greater purpose nor that; and that hee could not vnderstand, what hinder a man could make in that erand. But these last speeches of M. Alexanders maid the king to begin to suspecte what it could meane; wherevpon manie diuerse thoughts begouth to enter in the kings minde. But that his maiestie could neuer suspect anie harm to be intended against his hienes, by that young gentleman, with whome his maiestie had bene so well acquainted, as hee had, not long before, bene in sute to be one of the gentlemen of his chamber: So as the farthest, that the kings suspicion could reache to, was, that it might bee, that the earle his brother had handled him so hardlie, that the young gentleman, being of a hie spirit, had taken such displeasure, as he was become somewhat by himself, which his maiestie coniectured aswell by his raised and vnconth staire, and continuall pensiuenesse, all the time of the hunting, as likewise by such strange sort of vnlykelie discourses, as is already mentioned. Whereupon, his maiestie took occasion to make the duke of Lennox acquainted with the whol purpose, enquiring of him verie earnestlie, What he knew of that young gentlemans nature, beeing his brother in law? And, if he had euer perceiued him to be subject to any high apprehension? His maiestie declaring his suspiion plainelie to the said lord duke, that hee thought him not well settled in his wits; alwaies desiring my lord duke not to faile to accompanie him in to that house, where the alledged fellow and treasure was. The lord duke wondered much at that purpose, and thought it verie vnlikelie; yet he affirmed, that he could never perceiue any such appearance in that gentleman's inclination. But master Alexander, perceyuing his maiesties priue conference with the duke, and suspecting the purpose, as it appeared, came to the king, requesting his maiestie verie earnestlie, that he

shoulde make none liuing acquainted with that purpose, nor suffer none to go with his maiesty, where he should conuoy him, but himselfe onlie, vntill his maiestie had once seene the fellowe and the treasure: whereunto his maiestie half-laughing, gave answer, that he was no good teller of money, and behoued therefore to haue some to helpe him in that erand. His replye was, that hee woulde suffer none to see it, but his majesties selfe, at the first; but, afterward, hee might call in whom hee pleased. These speeches did so encrease his majesties suspicion, that then he begouth directly to suspect some treasonable devise; yet manie suspicions and thoughts ouerwhelming euery one another in his minde, his maiestie coulde resolve upon no certaine thing, but raid further on his journey, betwixt trust and distrust, being ashamed to seeme to suspect in respect of the cleannesse of his majesties owne conscience, except he had found some greater ground. The said maister Alexander still preasing the king to ride faster, although his owne horse was scarcelie able to keep companie with the king, for wearinesse, hauing riden with him, all the chase before. But, as the king was come two miles from Falkland, the said maister Alexander stayed a little behind the king in his way, and posted away the other seraund, Andrew Kuthven, to the earle his brother, aduertising him, howe farre the king was on his waye to come thither. Then, how soon soeuer the king come within a myle to the toun of Sanct-Iohnston, he said to his majesty, that he would poste in before, to aduertise the earle his brother of his majesties comming; who at his incomming to him, was sitting at the middes of his denner, neuer seeming to take knowledge of the king's comming, whill his brother told it him, notwithstanding of his two seruands aduertising him thereof before; and, immediatlie vpon his brothers reporte, rysin in haste from the borde, and warning al the seruands and friendes to accompanie him to meete his majesty, met him, to the number of three or four score, at the end of the Insh, his majesties whole companie and traine not exceeding the number of sixteene persons, and al without any kinde of armour, except swords; no, not so much as daggers, or whingears. His maiestie stayed an houre, after his comming to the said earles lodging, in Sanct-Iohnstoun, before his denner come in: the longsomnesse of the preparing of the same, and badnesse of the cheare, being excused, vpon the sodainty of his majesties comming vnlooked for there. During the which tyme, his maiestie enquiryed of maister Alexander, when it was tyme to him to goe to that priuate house, for that erand, whereof he had informed him? Whose answer was, that al was sure enough, but that there was no haste yet, for an houre, whill his maiesty had dyed at leisure; praying his maiesty to leaue him, and not to be seen to round with him before his brother, who hauing missed him that morning, might thereupon suspect, what the matter could mean: therefore his maiestie addressed him to the earle, and discoursed with him vpon sundrie purposes, but could get no direct answer of him, but halfe-words, and imperfect sentences. His maiestie beeing set down to the denner, the said earle stood very pensieue, and with a dejected countenance, at the end of his majesties table, oft rounding ouer his shoulder, whiles to one of his seruands, and whiles to another; and oftentimes went out and in to the chamber: which forme of behaiour he likewise kept before his majesties sitting downe to denner, but without any welcomming of his maiestie, or anie other hartlie forme of entertainement; the noblemen and gentlemen of the court, that was with his majesty, standing about the table, and not desired to dyne, as vse is, when his maiestie is once set down, and his first seruice brought vp, vntill the king's maiestie had almost dyed. At the which time, the earle conuoyed them forth to their dinner, but sate not downe with them himselfe, as the common forme is, but come back, and stood silent at the end of the kings table, as of before; which his maiestie perceauing did begin to entertaine the earle in an homelie manner, wondering that hee had not remained to dine with his guests, and entertaine them there. In the meane tyme, his majesty being ready to rise from the table, and his whole seruants beeing in the hal at their dinner, the said maister Alexander, standing behinde his majesties backe, pulled quietlie vpon him, rounding in his majesties eare, that it was tyme to goe, but that hee woulde haue faine bene quite of the earle his brother, wishing the king to send him out to the hall to entertaine his guests: wherupon the king called for a drinke, and in a merrie and homelie manner, said to the earle, that, although the earle had seen the fashion of entertainement in other countries, yet hee would teach him the Scottishe fashion, seeing hee was a Scottish man; and therefore, since hee had forgot to drinke to his maiestie, or to sit with his guests, and entertaine them, his majestie would drinke to him his owne welcome, desiring him to take it fourth and drinke to the rest of the company, and in his majesties name, to make them welcome. Wherupon, as he went fourth, his maiestie did rise from the table, and desired M. Alexander to bring sir Thomas Erskine with him; who, desiring the king to go forward with him, and promising that he should make anie one or two follow him, that he pleased to call for, desired his maiesty to command publikly, that none should follow him. And thus the king, accompanied onelie with the said maister Alexander, commes forth of the chamber, passes through the end of the hal, where the noble men and his majesties seruants were sitting at their dinner, vp a turne-pyke, and through three or four high chambers, the said maister Alexander ever lokking behinde him euery dore as he past, and then, with a more smyling countenance nor he had all the day before, euer saying he had him sure and safe enough kept; until at last his maiesty passing through three or four sondrie houses, and all the dore locked behind him, his maiestie entered into a little studie, where his maiestie did see standing, with a verie abased countenance, not a bound-man, but a free man, with a dagger at his girdle. But his maiestie had no sooner entered into that little studie, and maister Alexander with him, but maister Alexander looked to the studie dore behind him, and at that instant changing his countenance, putting his hat on his head, and drawing the dagger from that other mans girdle, held the point of it to the kings breast, avowing now, that the king behoued to be in his will, and vsed as he list: swearing manie bloody othes, that, if the king cried one word, or opened a windoe to look out, that dagger should presently go to his hart; affirming, that hee was sure, that now the kings conscience was burdened for the murdering of his father. His maiestie, wondering at so suddaine an alteration, and standing naked, without any kynde of armour but his hunting horne, which hee had not gotten leisure to lay from him, betwixt these two traitors, which had conspired his life, the saide maister Alexander standing, as saide his, with a drawne dagger in his hand, and his sword at his side, but the other trembling and quaking, rather like ane condemned man, then an executioner of such an enterpryse; his maiesty begouth then to dilate to the saide maister Alexander, howe horrible a thing it was to him to meddle with his maiesties innocent blood; assuring him it would not be left vnreunged, since God had giuen him children and good subiectes; and if there were no more, God would raise vp stocks and stones to punish so vyle a deed. Protesting before God, that hee had no burthen in his conscience, for the execution of his father, both in respect that, at the tyne of his fathers execution, his maiestie was but a minor of age, and guded at that time by a faction, which ouer-ruled both his maiestie, and the rest of the country; as also, that, whatsoever was done to his father, it was done by the ordinar course of law and iustice. Appealing the saide maister Alexander vpon his conscience, how well he, at al tymes since, had deserued at the hands of al his race: not only hauing restored them to al their landes and dignities, but also in nourishing and vphringing of two or three of his sisters, as it were, in his own bosome, by a continual attendance vpon his maiesties dearest bed-fellow in her privy chamber. Laying also before him the terrors of his conscience, especially that he made profession, according to his education, of the same religion which his maiestie has euer professed: and namelie his maiestie remembred him of that holie man, M. Robert Rollock, whose scholler he was, assuring him, that one day the said M. Roberts soule would accuse him, that hee had neuer learned of him to practise such vnnaturall crueltie. His maiestie promising to him, in the worde of a prince, that, if hee would spare his life, and suffer him to go out againe, hee should neuer reueale to any flesh liuing what was betwixt them at that tyne, nor suffer him to incur anie harm or punishment for the same. But his maiesties feare was, that hee could be for no spairing at his hand, hauing such crueltie in his lookes, and standing so irreuerently, with his hat on; whiche forme of ragefull behaiour could prognosticat no thing to his maiestie, but present extremitie. But, at his maiesties perswasive language, he appeared to be somewhat amased; and discovering his head againe, swore and protested, that his maiesties lyfe should be safe, if hee would believe himselfe quyetlie, without making noyes or crying; and that he would onlie bring in the earle his brother, to speak with his maiestie wherupon, his maiestie enquiring, what the earle would do with him, since (if his maiesties life was safe, according to promise) he could gaine little in keeping such a prisoner. His answer, onlie was, that hee could not leave his maiestie no more, but that his lyfe would be safe, in case hee behoued him self quyetlie the rest the earle his brother, whome hee was going for, would tel his maiestie, at his coming. And with that, as hee was going for his brother, as hee affirmed, hee turned back about to the other man, saying these worde vnto him: I make you heere the kings keeper, vntill I come back againe, and look that you keep him vpon your owne perill: and therewithall sayes to his maiestie, ye must content your selfe to haue this man nowe your keeper vntill my back-comming. And with these words he passes foorth, lokking the dore behinde him, and leauing his maiestie with that man he fand there before him. At whome his maiestie then enquired, if he was appointed to be the murtherer of him at that tyne? And how far he was vpon the counsell of that conspiracie? Whose answer, with a trembling and astonished voice and behaiour, was: that, as the Lord should judge him, hee was neuer made acquainted with that purpose, but that hee was put in ther perforce, and the dore locked behinde him, a little space before his maiesties comming; as indeede, al the time of the said maister Alexanders menassing his maiestie, he was ever tremblinglie requesting him for God's sake, and with manie other attestations, not to meddle with his maiestie, or to do him anie harme. But, because maister Alexander had, before his forth-going, made the king to swear, that he should not cry, nor open anie of the windoes, his maiestie commanded the saide fellow to open the windoe with his hand? which he readelic did; so that, although hee was put in there to vse violence ouer the king, yet God so turned his hart at that time, as hee become a slauie to his prisoner. While his maiestie was in this dangerous estate, and none of his owne seruants nor traine knowing in what part of the worlde he was in, as his maiesties traine was arysing in the hal from their dinner, the earle of Gowrie being present with them, one of the earle of Gowries seruants commes hastelic in, assuring the earle his maister, that his maiesty was horsed and away through the Inshe; which the earle reporting to the noblemen, and the rest of his maiesties traine that were there, they al rushe out together at the gate in great haste; and, some of his maiesties seruants enquiring at the porter, when his maiestie went forth? The porter affirmed that the king was not yet forth. Whereupon the said earle looked verie angerlie vpon him, and saide he was but a liar; yet, turning him to the duke and to the earle of Mar, said, hee should presentlie get them sure word where his maiestie was. And with that ran through the close, and vp the staire. But his purpose indeede was to speak with his brother, as appeared verie well by the circumstance of the tyme, his brother hauing at the same instant left the king in the little studie, and ran down the staire in great haste. Immediately thereafter the earle commeth back, running againe to the gate wher the noblemen and the rest were standing in a mase, assuring them that the king was out long since at the back-gate, and if they hasted not them al the sooner, they would not get him ouertaken, and with that cried for his horse: whereupon they rushe altogether out at the gate, and makes towardes the Inshe, crying al for their horses; passing al (as it was the prouidence of God) vnder one of the windoes of that studie, wherein his maiestie was. To whome maister Alexander verie spedelie returned, and, at his incomming to his maiestie, casting his hands abroad in a desperate manner, saide, hee could not mend it, his maiestie behoued to die; and with that offered a garter to bind his maiesties hands, with swearing he behoued to be bound. His maiestie at that word of binding said, hee was born a free king, and should die a free king. Whereupon hee gripping his maiestie by the wrist of the hand to haue hound him, his maiestie releued him selfe suddainlie of his grips; whereupon, as he put his right hand to his sworde, his maiestie, with his right hand, seized vpon both his hand and his sworde, and with his left hand clasped him by the throat, like as hee with his left hand clasped the king by the throat, with two or three of his fingers in his maiesties mouth, to haue staid him from crying. In this forme of wrestling, his maiestie, perforce, drewe him to the windoe, which hee had caused the other man before to open vnto him, and vnder the which was passing by at the same tyme the kings traine, and the earle of Gowrie with them, as saide is; and, holding out the right side of his head and right elbowe, cried, that they were murthuring him there in that treasonable forme; whose voice being instantly heard and knowne by the duke of Lennox, and the earle of Mar, and the rest of his maiesties traine there, but the saide earle of Gowrie cuer asking what it meant, and neuer seeming anie wayes to haue seen his maiestie or heard his voice, they all rushed in at the gate together, the duke and the earl of Mar running about to come by that passage his maiestie come in at, but the earle of Gowrie and his seruants made them for another way vp a quyet turn-pyke, which was euer condemned before, and was onlie then left open, as appeared for that purpose. And in this mean tyme his maiestie, with strugeling and wrestling with the saide maister Alexander, had brought him out perforce out out of that study, the dore wherof, for haste, he had left open at his last incomming, and his maiestie hauing gotten with long struggling the said maister Alexanders head vnder his arme, and him selfe on his knees, his maiestie did driue him backe perforce, hard to the dore of the same turn-pyke; and as his maiestie was throwing his sworde out of his hand, thinking to haue striken him therewith, and then to haue shotte him ouer the stair, the other fellow standing behinde the kings backe, doing nothing but trembling all the tyme; sir Iohn Ramsay, not knowing what way first to enter, after he had heard the king's cry, by chance finds that turn-pyke dore open, and following it vp to the head, enters into the chamber, and findes his maiestie and maister Alexander struggling in that forme, as is before, saide; and, after he had twice or thrise striken maister Alexander with his dagger, the other man withdrew himselfe, his maiestie still keeping his grips, and holding him close to him; immediately thereafter he tooke the said maister Alexander by the shoulders, and shotte him down the staire; who was no sooner shotte out at the doore, but he was met by sir Thomas Erskine, and sir Hew Hereis, who there, vpon the staire, ended him; the said sir Thomas Erskine being casten behinde the duke and the earle of Mar, that ran about the other way. by the occusion of his meddling with the said late earle vpon the street, after the hearing of his maiesties cry. For, vpon the hearing thereof, hee had clasped the earle of Gowrie by the gorget, and casting him vnder his feet, and, wanting a dagger to haue striken him with, the said earles men redde the earle their maister out of his hands; whereby he was casten behinde the rest, as said is; and missing the companie, and hearing the said sir Iohn Ramsayes voice vpon the turn-pyke head, ran vp to the said chamber, and cried vpon the said Hew Hereis and another seruant to follow him; where, meeting with the saide maister Alexander in the turn-pyke, he ended him there, as saide is; the said maister Alexander onely crying for his last words, Allace! I had not the wyte of it. But no sooner could the said sir Thomas, sir Hew, and another seruant win in to the chamber wher his maiestie was, but that the said earle of Gowrie, before they could get the dore shutte, followed them in at the back, hauing casten him directly to come vp that priue passage, as is before saide; who, at his first entrie, hauing a drawne sworde in euerie hand, and a steil bonnet on his head, accompanied with seuen of his seruants, euerie one of them hauing in like manner a drawn sworde, cried out with a great oath, that they shoulde all die as traitors. Al the which tyme his maiestie was still in the chamber, who seeing the earl of Gowrie come in with his swordes in his hands, sought for Alexanders sworde, which had fallen from him at his out-shutting at the dore, hauing no sort of weapon of his owne, as said is; but then was shot backe by his owne seruants that were there, into the little studie, and the dore shut vpon him; who, hauing put his maiestie in safete, re-encountred the said earle and his seruants; his maiesties seruants being onlie in number four; to wit, sir Thomas Erskine, sir Hew Hereis, sir John Ramsay, and one Wilsoun, a seruant of Iames Erskines, a brother of the saide sir Thomas; the said earle hauing seuen of his seruants with him: yet it pleased God after manie strokes on al hands to give his maiesties seruants the victorie, the saide earle of Gowrie being striken dead with a stroke through the heart, which the saide sir Iohn Ramsay gave him, without once crying upon God, and the rest of his seruants dung ouer the stair with many hurts; as in like manner the saide sir Thomas Erskine, sir Hew Hereis, and sir Iohn Ramsay were all three hurt and wounded. But, all the tyme of this fight, the duke of Lennox, the earle of Mar, and the rest of his maiesties traine, were striking with great hammers at the vtter doore, wherby his maiestie past vp to the chamber, with the said muster Alexander, which also he had lokked in his bycomming with his maiestie to the chamber, but, by reason of the strength of the saide double dore, the whole wall being likewise of bordes, and yeelding with the strokes, it did hyde them the space of halfe an houre and more, before they could get it broken and have entresse. Who, hauing met with his maiestie, and (beyond their expectation) his maiestie delivered from so imminent a perill, and the saide late earle, the principall conspirator, lying dead at his maiesties feete. Immediatlie thereafter his maiestie kneeling downe, on his knees, in the midst of his own seruants, and they all kneeling round about him, his maiestie out of his own mouth thanked God of that miraculous deliuerance and victory, assuring him selfe that God had preserued him from so dispaired a perill for the perfiting of some greater worke behinde to his glorie, and for the procuring by him the wel of his people, that God had committed to his charge. After this the tumult of the toun hearing of the slaughter of the saide earle of Gowrie, their prouost, and not knowing the manner therof, nor being on the counsell of his treasonable attempt, continued for the space of two or thre houres, thereafter, vntill his maiestie, by oft speaking out to them at the windowes, and bea-kening to them with his owne hand, pacifying them, causing the baylies and the rest of the honest men of the toun to bee brought into the chamber, to whom hauing declared the whole forme of that strange accident, hee committed the house and bodies of the said traitors, brethren, to their keeping, vntill his maiesties further pleasure were knowne. His maiestie, hauing before his parting out of that toun, caused to search the saide earle Gowries pockets, in case anie letters that might further the discouerie of that conspiracie, might bee found therein. But no thing was found in them, but a little close parchment bag, full of magical characters, and words of inchantment, wherin, it seemed, that he had put his confidence, thinking him selfe neuer safe without them, and therefore euer carried them about with him; beeing also obserued, that, while they were vpon him, his wound wherof he died, bled not, but, incontinent after the taking of them away, the blood gushed out in great abundance, to the great admiration of al the beholders. An infamy which hath followed and spotted the race of this house, for manie discentes, as is notoriouslie knowne to the whole countrie. Thus the night was far spent, being neir eight houres at euening before his maiestie could, for the great tumult that was in the toun, departe out of the same. But before his maiestie had ridden four myles out of the same towards Falkland, although the night was very darke and rainie; the whole way was cled with all sorts of people, both on horse and foote, meeting him with great ioy and acclamation. The frequencie and concourse of persons of al degrees to Falkland, the rest of the weeke, and to Edinburgh the next, from al the quarters of the countrie; the testimonie of the sobiects heartie affection and ioy for his maiesties deliuerie, expressed euery wher by ringing of bells, bonefires, shutting of gunnes of al sorts both by sea and land, &c. with all other things ensuing therupon, I haue of set purpose pretermitted, as well knowne to al men, and impertinent to this discourse; contenting my selfe with this plaine and simple narration; adding onlie, for explanation and confirmation therof, the depositions of certaine persons who were either actors, and eie-witnesses, or immediat hearers of those things that they declare and testifie; wherin, if the reader shall finde anie thing differing from this narration, either in substance or circumstance, hee may vnderstand the same to be vttered by the deponer in his owne behoof, for obtaining of his maiesties princelie grace and fauour.

In presence of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord Secretare, Lord Comptroller, Lord Aduocate, the Lord Incheffray, and sir George Home of Spot, knight.

JAMES Weimis of Bozy, of the age of 36 yeare, or thereby, sworne and examined vpon the form and manner of behauiour of late Iohn, earle of Gowrie, the tyme of his being with him at Strabran, or if he had heard the saide earle make anie motion of the treason intended against his maiestie, depones that hee neither heard nor sawe anie appearance of anie such intention in the said earle.

Demanded, if hee was in anie purpose with the said earle anent any matters of curiositie; depones, that at their being in Strabran, some of their company found an edder, which being killed, and knowledge therof comming to the earle, the earle said to this deponer, 'Bozy, if the edder had not bene slaine, yee should have seene a good sport; for I should haue caused her stand still, and she should not haue peissed away, by pronouncing of an Hebrew worde, which in Scottish is called 'hufinesse;' but the Hebrew worde the deponer remembers not of; and that the earle saide hee had put the same in practice oft before. And this deponer enquiring at the earle, Where hee did get the Hebrew worde? The earle answered, In a cabbalist of the Iewes, and that it was by tradition; and the deponer enquiring, What a cabbalist meaned? The earle answered, It was some wordes which the Iewes had by tradition, which wordes were spoken by God to Adam in Paradise, and therefore were of greater efficacie and force, nor anie wordes which were excogitate since by prophetes and apostles. The deponer enquiring, If there was no more requisite but the worde? The earle answered, That a firm faith in God was requisite and necessarie, and that this was no matter of maruel amongst schollers, but that all these things were naturall. And that the earle shew to this deponer, that hee had spoken with a man in Italie, and first hearing by report that hee was a nigromancer, and thereafter being informed, that hee was a verie learned man and a deep theologue, he entered a further dealing with him ament the curiosities of nature.

Depones further, that the said earle reported to him, that hee being at the musick, he fell in companie with another man, who stairing in the earles face, spake to the rest of the companie things of him, which he could neuer attain vnto nor be worthe of; and therefore that the earle reproached him, and desired him to forbear these speeches. And that he met again wth the saide man in a like companie, who did begin with the same language which he had spoken before; and that the earle saide vnto him, My friend, in case yee will not hold our peace from speaking lies of mee, I will make you hold your peace by speaking sootlof you; and saide unto him, Within such a space hee should be hanged for such a crine; and so it came to passe. This deponer enquiring of the earle, Who told him that? He answered merely, That he spake it begusse, and it fell out so. And that the earle saide further, That it was no thing to make an herb flesh, which would dissolve in flies; and nat, likewise, it was possible that the seed of nan and woman might be brought to perfection otherwise then by the matrix of the woman; and that this deponer counselled the earle to beware with whom he did communicate such speeches; who answered, that he would speak them to none but to great schollers, and that hee would not haue spoken them to this deponer, if he had not knowne him to be a fauourer of him, and a friend of his house, and would not reuale the same again, seeing he knew they would be euill interpreted amongst the common sorte.

In presence of the Lords Chancellor, Treasurer, Aduocate; sir George Home of Spot, sir Robert Melvill, and sir Iames Melvill, knights.

MAISTER William Rynd, sworne and examined, and demanded, where he first did see the characters, which were found vpon my lord; depones, that hee, hauing remained a space in Venice, at his returning to Padua, did finde in my lords pocket the characters which were found vpon him at his death; and the deponer enquiring of my lord, Where he had gotten them? My lord answered, That by chance he had copied them him selfe; and that the deponer knowes, that the characters in Latin are my lords owne hand write, but he knows not if the Hebrew characters were written by my lord. Depones further, that, when my lord would change his clothes, the deponer would take the characters out of my lords pocket, and would say to my lord, Wherfore serues these? And my lord would answer, Can yee not let them bee, they do you no euill; and further the deponer declares, that sometimes my lord would forget them vntill hee were out of his chamber, and would turn back as he were in an anger, vntill he had found them, and put them in his owne pocket; depones further, that he was sundrie times purposed to have burnt the characters, were not he feared my lords wrath and anger, seeing, when the deponer would purposelie leaue them sometimes out of my lords pocket, my lord would be in such an anger with the deponer, that for a certaine space he would not speak with him, nor could finde his good countenance; and that to this deponers opinion, my lord would neuer be content to want the characters off him selfe, from the first time that the deponer did see them at Padua, to the hour of my lords death.

Being demanded, For what cause my lord kept the characters so well? Depones, That in his opinion it was for no good, because he heard that, in those parts where my lord was, they would give sundre folks breeues.

Depones further, that M. Patrick Galloway did let this deponer see the characters, since he came to this town of Falkland, and that hee knowes them to be the verie same characters which my lord had.

Depones also, that, vpon Monday the 4th of August, the maister Andrew Hendersoun, and the deponer remained in my lords chamber, vntil about ten houres at enen, and, after a long conference betwixt the lord and the maister, my lord called for Andrew Hendersoun, and, after some speeches with him, dismissed them.

Denies that he knew of the maisters or Andrew Hendersouns ryding to Falkland, and after Andrews return from Falkland vpon the morrow, howbeit he did see him booted, yet he knew not that he was come from Falkland.

Depones that, my lord being at dinner when the maister came in, the deponer heard my lord say to the maister, Is the king in the Inshe? And with that he did rise, and said, Let us goe. But the deponer knowes not what the maister said to my lord.

Being demanded, if he did see anie kinde of armour or weapons, except swordes, in the kings companie, depones that he did see none.

It being demanded, how the deponer was satisfied with my lords answer made to him concerning the kings comming to Sanct. Iohnstoun, saying, that hee knewe not how hee come; declares, that hee thought my lord had dissembled with him, and that hee behoued to haue knowne it, seeing his brother was come with his maiestie before that hee demanded of him, and that he had confered with my lord priuile.

Depones, that hee knew not that the maister was ridden to Falkland, vntill after his maiesties comming to Sanct. Iohnstoun, that Andrew Ruthwen told him, because the deponer enqyred at Andrew Ruthwen, where the maister and hee had bene, and that Andrew answered they had bene in Falkland; and that, the maister having spoken with the king, his maiestie come forward with them, and that this conference betwixt the deponer and Andrew Ruthwen was in the yarde, when my lord was there. And Andrew Ruthwen shew to the deponer, that Andrew Hendersoun was directed by the maister to shew my lord that his maiestie was comming.

Depones also that, in his opinion, the maister could not haue drawne the king to my lords house, without my lords knowledge; and that, when hee heard the tumult, he was resolved in his heart the maister had done his maiestie wrong, and that no trewe christian can think otherwise, but that it was an high treason, attempted against his highnesse by the maister and the lord.

Depones also that, to his opinion, the kings whole companie was within a dozen of men.

Sic subscribitur, M. W. RYND.
22 August, 1600.

Maister William Rynd sworne and re-examined, if euer he heard the earle of Gowrie vtter his opinion anent the dotie of an wise man in the execution of an high enterprize? Declares that, being out of the cuntry, hee has diuerse times heard him reason in that matter; and that hee was euer of that opinion that hee was not an wise man, that, hauing intended the execution of an high and dangerous purpose, communicate the same to any but to him selfe, because, keeping it to him selfe, it could not be discouered nor disappointed; which the deponer declared before vn-required to the comptroller, and maister William Coper, minister at Perth; and, hearing the depositions of Andrew Hendersoun red, and being enqyred vpon his conscience what he thought of the fact that was committed against his maiestie, declares that upon his saluation that he beleuees Andrew Hendersoun has declared the circumstances trulie.

Apud Falkland, 20 August, 1600.

In presence of the Lords Chancellor, Treasurer, Aduocate, Comptrollar, and George Home of Spot, sir James Melville knights.

ANDREW Hendersoun, sworne and examined, and demanded what purpose was betwixt him and the earle of Gowrie, vpon Monday at night the fourth of this instant in the earles chamber? Depones, that the earle enqyred of him what he would be doing vpon the morrow, and hee answering that he was to ryde to Ruthwen; the earle said to him, You must ryde to Falkland with maister Alexander my brother, and, when hee directs you backe, see that ye returne with al diligence, if he send a letter or anie other aduertisement with you.

Depones, that the maister directed him to send for Andrew Ruthwen, to be in readinesse to ryde with them the morrow at four houres in the morning.

Declares, that, they comming to Falkland, about seuen houres in the morning, the maister stayed in a ludging beside the palace, and directed the deponer to see what the king was doing; and, the deponer finding his maiestie in the close comming forth, he past back and told the maister, who immediatlie addressed himselfe to his highnesse, and spake with his maiestie a good space beneth the equerie; and, after his maiestie was on horse-back the maister commes to the deponer, and commaundes him to fetche their horses, and bade him haste him, as he loued my lords honour and his, and aduertise my lord that his maiestie and hee would be there incontinent, and that his maiestie would be quiet; and, the deponer enqyring at the maister, if he should go resettle, hee did bid him leap on and followe him, and not go away vntill he spake with the king; and the maister hauing spoken with the king, at a breach of the park wal, he turned backe and bade the deponer ride away; and the deponer making his return in al possible haste to Sanct. Iohnstoun, hee found my lord in his chamber about ten houres, who left the companie hee was speaking with, and come to the deponer, and asked, Hath my brother sent a letter vnto you? The deponer answered, No, but they will be al heere incontinent, and bade the deponer desire my lord to cause prepare the dinner. Immediatlie thereafter, my lord took the deponer to the cabinet, and asked at him, How his maiestie took with the maister his brother? The deponer answered, Very well, and that his maiestie laide his hand ouer the maisters shouldier. Thereafter my lord enqyred, if there was manie at the hunting with the king? The deponer answered, that hee took no heed, but they who were accustomed to ride with his maiestie, and some Englishmen were there; and that my lord enqyred what special men were with his maiestie, and that the deponer answered, hee did see none but my lord duke. And within an hour thereafter, when the deponer came in from his owne house, the earle bid him put on his secreit and platsleeues, for he had an Heylandman to take, which the deponer did incontinent; and about twelve houres, when the deponer was going out to his owne house to his dinner, the steward came to him and shewe him that George Craigingelt was not well, and was lyne down, desired him to tary and take vp my lords dinner; and about half an hour after twelue my lord commanded him to take vp the first seruice; and, when the deponer was commanded to take up the second seruice, the maister and William Blair came into the hal to my lord.

The deponer remembreth him selfe, that Andrew Ruthwen came before the maister a certaine space, and spake with my lord quyetlie at the table, but heard not the particular purpose that was amongst them. And so soone as the maister came to the hal, my lord and the whole company raise from the table; and the deponer, hearing the noyes of their fourth-going, supposed they were going to makebreakes for makilduy; and the deponer sent his boy for his gantlet and steil bonnet; and seeing my lord passe to the Inshe, and not the Shoe-gate, the deponer did cast the gantlet in the pantrie, and caused his boy take his steil bonnet to his owne house; and he followed my lord to the Inshe, and returning back with his maiestie to the lodging, beeing directed to get drinke. And the maister came to the deponer, and bid him cause maister William Rynd send him vp the key of the gallerie chamber, who past up and deliuered the key to the maister; and immediatlie my lord followed vp, and did speak with the maister, and came downe againe, and directed maister Thomas Cranstoun to the deponer to come to his lordship in his maiesties chamber. And that my lord directed him to go vp to the gallerie to his brother; and immediatlie my lord followed vp, and commanded the deponer to byde there with his brother, and to doe anie thing that hee bade him. The deponer enquired at the master, What haue yee to do, sir? The maister answered, Yee must goe in heere, and tarry vntill I come backe, for I will take the key with mee. So he lokked the deponer in the rounde within the chamber, and took the key with him. Shortly thereafter, the maister returned, and the kings maiestie with him, to the saide cabinet in the rounde; and the maister, opening the dore, entered with the king into the said rounde; and at his verie entrie, couering his bead, pulled out the deponers dagger, and held the same to his maiesties breast, saying, Remember you of my fathers murder? yee shall now die for it; and minting to his hienes heart with the dagger, the deponer threw the same out of the maisters hand, and swore, that, as God shall iudge his soule, if the maister had retained the dagger in his hand the space that a man may go six steppes, he would have striken the king to the hilts with it: But wanting the dagger, and the kings maiestie giving him a gentle answer, hee saide to the kings maiestie with abhominable oathes, That, if hee would keep silence, no thing should aile him, if hee woulde make such promise to his brother as they would craue of him; and the kings maiestie enquiring what promise they would craue? He answered, that he would bring his brother. So he goes forth, and lokkes the dore of the rounde vpon his maiestie and the deponer, hauing first taken the king sworne that hee should not cry, nor open the windoe.

And his maiestie enquiring at the deponer what he was? He answered, A seruant of my lords. And his maiestie asking at the deponer, If my lord would do anie euill to him? the deponer answered, As God shall iudge my soule, I shall die first. And, the deponer preising to haue opened the windoe, the maister entered, and said, Sir, there is no remedie, by God, you must die; and, hauing a loose garter in his hands, pressed to haue bound his maiesties hands, and the deponer pulled the garter out of maister Alexanders hand. And then the maister did put one of his hands in his maiesties mowth, to haue staid him to speak, and held his other arme about his hienes neck: And that this deponer pulled the maisters hand from his hienes mowth, and opened the windoe: and then his maiestie cried out thereat, wherupon his hienes seruant came in at the gate, and this deponer did run and open the dore of the turnpyke heade, wherent Iohn Ramsay entered; and the deponer stode in the chamber vntill he did see Iohn Ramsay giue the maister ane stroke, and thereafter priuillie conuoyed him selfe downe the turnpyke to his owne house; and the deponers wife enquiring of him what the fraie meant? The deponer answered, that the kings maiestie would haue beene twice stikked, were not he releued him.

ANDREW HENDERSOUN, with my hand.

Further, the saide Andrew Hendersoun depones, That, after his returning from Falkland vpon the fifth of this instant, maister Iohn Montcrief enquiring of him where he had beene? He answered, That he had beene beyond the bridge of Erne; and sayes, that he gauē that answer to maister Iohn, because my lord commanded him to let no man knowe that he was to ride to Falkland; and that my lords direction to him was to come backe with his brother maister Alexanders answer, and to leave Andrew Ruthwen to await vpon the maister.

ANDREW HENDERSOUN, with my hand.

Further, the saide Andrew Hendersoun depones, that, when hee had taken the maisters hand out of the kings maiesties mowth, and was opening the windoe, maister Alexander said to him, Will thou not helpe? wo betyde thee, thou wilt make vs all die.

72. The Arraignment and Judgment of Captain THOMAS LEE, at the Sessions-house near Newgate, for High Treason: 43 ELIZ. A. D. 1600. [From an authentic MS. lent the Editor.]

The INDICTMENT.

‘THAT he plotted and compassed to raise Sedition and Rebellion to the queen’s majesty’s person, to deprive her of her crown and dignity, take away her life, commit her people to slaughter, alter the form of Government and Religion; and upon this wicked resolution, on the 12th day of Feb. 1600, in the afternoon about the hours of four and five, he the said captain Lee repaired to the chamber of one sir Robert Crosse, (sic MS.) * knt. in the parish of St. Giles in the Fields, of purpose to discover his plot to him, and to persuade the said sir Robert Crosse to consent to join with him; namely to go to the royal palace of our sovereign lady, being then at Westminster, and then and there to lay violent hands on her sacred person, and to take her prisoner; thinking by that means to set at liberty the earls of Essex and Southampton, and other Traitors now in prison. But the said sir Robert Crosse not consenting to that traitorous practice; this Thomas Lee himself repaired to the said royal palace between the hours of 8 and 9 in the same night, and pressed into the presence, even to the Privy-chamber door, with purpose to have taken the person of our said sovereign lady, and performed his other traitorous designs. But there in that manner was apprehended, and examined, and so committed to prison.’

To this being asked, whether he were Guilty, or not? He answered, Not Guilty in manner and form as there set down. And by whom he would be tried? Said, by God and the country, if he might see his Jury. He said farther, (protesting he was not Guilty of any ill intent) that my Lord Admiral had long sought his life, and now he was like to have it.

The Jury called, he took exception to one, saying, he liked not his face; but urged to shew other reasons, he challenged him peremptorily. But that, the Judges told him, could not be allowed in that case.

Capt. Lee. Then I am contented; proceed as you will.

My L. C. Justice, at the end of the calling and impannelling, advertised the Jury what Treason was; namely, to intend to lay violent hands upon her majesty, or to take away her life; to raise Rebellion even the intent was Treason, if it could be discovered by any overt-act.

Att. Gen. That he would prove him that stood at the bar, guilty of many foul Treasons.

Lee. Nay for all your wit and learning, you shall never do that. I care not what you can say. I have lost a great deal of blood in her majesty’s service, and done good service in Ireland.

* Though the name in the MS. is Crosse, yet I take it to be Crofts, as Camden writes it.

Att. Gen. That we shall see anon; and proceeded upon the Indictment: where he shewed how, in the late Rebellion of that Arch-traitor Essex. For, said he, all the nobility draw their honour and dignity of the Queen, as the Stars take the light from the Sun; and so when they enter into any rebellions and traitorous practices against her majesty, they deprive themselves of the light, as it were, of that glory and honour which before-time they received from her, the chief and fountain of all their light: and so he doubted not to call those persons traitors, who, whilst they stood, were noblemen; and now, failing of their allegiance, lost their titles. In the late Rebellion of this Traitor Essex, this Lee came flagrante crimine, and offered his service to the Lord-Admiral, and Mr. Secretary, as he pretended, to kill the earl, which he said he could do, as being well acquainted, and loved of the earl: but they refusing, he would needs have offered so much to the queen’s majesty; but with what mind, his practice will discover.

Lee. It is true, I would have been the first man should have gone against him whilst I thought him a traitor, and so would have adventured against any, to have defended the queen.

Att. Gen. How you meant it, that will be plain anon.—After this, he came to sir Henry Nevil, a gentleman of noble blood, and uttered his mind to him concerning the practice in the Indictment; and after that came to sir Robert Cross, as you shall hear, and opened his vile purpose at large to persuade him. That these worthy men deserving all honour for their loyalty, refused, and revealed his vile plot in good time. And thus much he had confessed under his hand.

Lee. What I have set my hand to, I cannot tell; but I am sure I had never such intent as you would persuade the jury I had.

Att. Gen. That is to be proved by sir Robert Crosse, what you meant when you went about to persuade him.

Lee. I persuaded him not; and he will not say so.

Att. Well; he shall speak it before your face.

Then sir Robert Crosse was sworn, and set in sight of the prisoner; and began to tell; That upon Thursday about 5 at night capt. Lee, came to his lodging, he being ready to go abroad, and told him, he should not go out, yet he must speak with him; and so taking him aside, he spoke to him of these matters of Treason, and said, that half a dozen resolute men, &c.

Lee here interrupted him, saying: Nay, good Robin Crosse, speak all the truth.

Mr. Attorney willed Lee to give him leave to speak upon his oath.

Lee replied, I would nothing but put him in mind of the circumstance; and said, Good Robin, remember how I began.

Sir Robert said he would. Thus then you spake to me:—I marvel what will become of these matters; a man might do a brave act to set those lords at liberty. Why how? quoth I, Marry sir Walter Rawleigh might get him eternal honour and love more than ever he can otherwise if he would procure her majesty's warrant to free them, which he might compass by undertaking her person. I answered, you may be sure he will not do it. Then Lee replied, If half a dozen resolute men, such as might have access to the presence, would step unto the queen, and kneel before her, and never rise till she had signed a warrant, and then send it by the Lord Admiral, and never stir till the earls of Essex and Southampton were brought to the queen's presence, they might do it. And then he named sir Henry Nevil, sir Jarvis Clifton, sir George Gifford, sir R. Weston, and themselves. I objected, how if some should offer to come upon us, and remove us from her majesty. He answered, we might keep any body out by shutting the door, and telling them that offered to come in, that if any harm came to the queen, if she should do otherwise than well, be it at their peril; and this was all. To which sir Robert answered, he would sleep upon it.

Lee. But I did persuade you, sir Robert, with protestation, saying, I never meant to be an actor myself, or persuade any other to it. And what a wretch am I, to be thought a villain for that I never meant? For my lord Essex, indeed, I loved and honoured him, so long as I thought him an honest man and a good-subject. I spake these words with an if; if such a thing could be done.

Attorney. Why pressed you to the Privy-chamber door at such a time, where you were not wont to come?

And then was shewed the Examination of William Poynes, (who was himself in the Fleet) to this purpose: That he saw capt. Lee press towards the Privy-chamber door, and stand very near, and mistrusting the worst, drew towards him. When he came near, he marked his colour, that was pale, his countenance stern, and his face having great drops of sweat standing on it.* When he came near to him, capt.

Lee lean'd hard upon him, and said, It was one of the wonders of God that I was not in this action with the earl of Essex. Why? said Mr. Poynes. I was so well acquainted, and so much with my lord of Essex, answered he. Then they paused. And capt. Lee asked, Whether the queen were at supper? Mr. Poynes answered, No.

Att. Mark, all the rest was but to bring in this.

Mr. Poynes told Lee farther, perhaps he might do good service, if he were so well acquainted with the earl, it was likely he knew somewhat of the Plot. Not I, answered Lee; but you shall hear more villainies and knaveries yet.

Att. Mark: what meant he by that speech?

To this capt. Lee could not deny but he spake it; but said, how was I there? had I any company? had I any dagger or any thing about me, that might shew I meant to do the queen any harm? No, I had not, neither did I mean any such thing; and for my being at the Privy-chamber door, I had been there 500 times, and never was noted. And what reason had I for my lord of Essex, to adventure any such thing. I have spent my blood in her majesty's service, and so would again.

Attorney. You mark, there was love between him and the traitor Essex. And then Mr. Attorney caused a Letter to be read, which was written in the behalf of Lee to the now deputy by the earl of Essex: "That he knew it was for one in place to do what he would; and farther, What an unreasonable thing it was for any to require that at his friends hands, that were out of time. He desired his lordship to take notice of the bearer capt. Lee, one near allied to him, and that suffered for him; one that did as good service as any, when himself was in Ireland, and one that was as well seated for service as any; thus, whatsoever he did for the bearer, he would acknowledge as for himself: and so he concluded."

Then likewise was read the Confession of mate with Tir-Oen, and an absolute creature of the earl of Essex's. This did Crofts immediately discover to the Council; insomuch that Lea was sought for, and found in the dusk of the evening about the door of the queen's Privy-chamber. He seemed very thoughtful, was extreme pale, and in a great sweat, and frequently asked, Whether her majesty was ready to go to supper? and, Whether the Council would be there? In this posture he was seized, and examined, the next day had his Trial, and by Crofts's Evidence and his own Confession, condemned, and carried away to Tyburn; where he owned that he had been indeed a great offender: but as to this design was very innocent; and having moreover protested, that he had never entertained the least ill thought against the queen, he was there executed. And this, as the times were, appeared a very seasonable piece of rigour." Camden.

* "On the 12th of February, Thomas Lea (a kinsman of sir Henry Lea, who had wore the honour of the garter) told sir Robert Crofts, captain of a man of war, that it would be a glorious enterprize for six brave mettled fellows to go to the queen, and compel her to discharge Essex, Southampton, and the rest that were in prison. He was a man himself of great assurance and resolution, had commanded a company in Ireland, was very inticapt. Lee to this purpose, That he loved and honoured the earl of Essex as much as any man in England, saving sir Henry Lee.

Att. This being but the prologue to an ensuing tragedy, he would give a taste of the practices and treasons of the earl of Essex, and his complices.

Lee. He doubted the treason would light on some of them that held the earl a traitor.

Whereat a confused noise there was, That he was a villain to defend a Traitor.

Mr. Attorney proceeded to shew the queen's great grace in sending to him the said earl, and the contempt and indignities offered to those honourable persons and counsellors sent to call him to his allegiance.

The L. C. Justice spake to this point, confirming of his own knowledge what the Attorney said, much after the manner it was delivered at the earl's Arraignment. The Attorney, continued he, would of his own knowledge affirm, that all the associates and complices of the earl in this practice, were of these three sorts: either Atheists, Papists, or men of broken estates: for he had looked into them all particularly. Then named he sir Christ. Blunt and sir John Davis, known Papists: Catesby and Tresham likewise; the last of which he said was a stock, that was genero minar Dei, and was he that abused the Lord-keeper in Essex house; Salisbury also he named to be a notable villain, and these seven years together laid out for by the Lord-Chief-Justice, and so of the rest he said he could speak.

Mr. Attorney. Besides in Ireland, it is plain to be proved, how he held intelligences with Seminaries and Priests, entertaining them to deal with the king of Spain and the pope, to make himself king of England.

Lee. Who! my lord of Essex deal with Seminaries and Priests? nay, it is well known he too much disliked those Pater-noster fellows to call them to a reckoning in any such matter.

Mr. Attorney said further, It is well known that the earl of Essex used this capt. Lee as a messenger to Tyrone; and Tyrone made him his bedfellow, and capt. Lee brought a message back to the earl of Essex, as he had confessed. Then there was some mention of a Letter between them; but I could not well hear what. Then was read capt. Lee's confession to that point, how sir Christ. Blunt, being marshal, sent him to Tyrone, and when he came, he found him very peremptory, using insolent speeches, and condemning our nation as a base people, and said the earl of Essex was sent to kill him, but he should not compass it; any of his slaves might easily kill the earl, but he would not take the life of any. And further, if he would (meaning the earl of Essex) follow his Plot, he would make him the greatest in England. Capt. Lee had them read out all; they left out much matter that should be known.

Mr. Attorney would not have any further thing read, and pressed further, the circumstances that Lee had confessed, that made him think the earl of Essex know of his going; namely, for that the marshal was well known not to do such things, of far less consequence without the earl's privity and consent. After the earl of Essex made a private sudden journey to the then house of the said Lee, where the said sir Christ. Blunt lay sick, and within a day after, sir Christopher sent him to Tyrone. To these Confessions read, capt. Lee answered nothing, as not belonging to the matter of his Indictment.

Mr. Attorney urged, That it was very hard that this man had been made acquainted with these late practices; which Lee with protestation denied.

Mr. Attorney. Nay, it could not be but he must have an ill meaning, that he should do as he did, to kill the earl of Essex, Aggravate crimine, in that sort, and after enter into the plot and practice. Mark, said the Attorney, he said they might 'force' her majesty to do it: mark this word, 'force,' (which, as I remember, was in some part of his own Confession) 'Go in unto her, and never leave her till she had done it.'

Lee. Why I did say, with an If; and that I am not a fool, but I know they must have been of a resolution that should have undertaken such a thing, and such as would not be to displease her majesty for half an hour, to please her all her life after: but I never meant to have been an actor myself.

The Court, affirmed it was Treason to undertake to 'force' her majesty to do any thing against her will.

Capt. Lee. I never undertook it.

Mr. Attorney urged his words to sir Robert Mansfield riding in his coach after he was apprehended, that shewed himself guilty, and so willed sir Robert should be sworn.

Sir Robert Mansfield affirmed, That capt. Lee should say, that he had humbly sued to her majesty this twelvemonth, that he might be employed in some service, wherein he might have some throats cut: and now he thought he had done somewhat to bring him to his end.—Capt. Lee seemed to take some exceptions against sir Robert Mansfield.

Sir Robert protested he would neither wrong him, nor any man; and but for this cause, he had no reason to think otherwise than well of capt. Lee.

Capt. Lee confessed he had lived in misery, and cared not to live, his enemies were so many and so great.

Mr. Attorney urged her majesty's pardon to him heretofore; for he said, he was a man many ways having passed the danger of the law, being full of cruelty and blood.

Capt. Lee answered, it was the worst thing her majesty did for him, to pardon him.

Mr. Attorney. Hark, how ungrateful he is!

Capt. Lee. Nay, I humbly thank her majesty for that her grace; but it had been better for me I had died then. I have lost a great deal of blood since, and now am like to end worse: and for that it is said I am a bloody man and cruel; I protest I have been in her majesty's service forward, and indeed in fair fight I would do the worst against her majesty's enemies: but when they submitted to my mercy, I ever used them but as became a soldier and a gentleman, as merciful as any.

My lord of London told him, he knew it was a common thing in Ireland, they would not believe a man was dead till his head were off; and so you would not have any body persuaded that you were a traitor, unless her majesty (God bless her) were dead.

Lee. No, my lord, I never meant any such thing. You know, my lord, it was ever my fault to be loose and lavish of my tongue; and that was my fault now, and I am like to pay for it.

Then the Jury were put together, who quickly found him Guilty.

Upon Verdict given, Mr. Attorney said, Now capt. Lee, you may do well to confess this matter, what you know, and who set you on.

Capt. Lee. What? I am not a fool to be set on like a dog upon a bear; nobody set me on, for I endeavoured nothing.

Mr. Recorder, with a very grave admonition to him, to make him see his fault and fly to God's mercy for pardon, pronounced Judgment; which he took patiently.

They asked him, what he had to say: he answered, nothing; but desired my lord of London, that he might have one sent to him, fit for a man in his case.

Lord of London. What? you would not have a Jesuit or a priest?

Capt. Lee. No, I am a Protestant: I never liked those Paternoster fellows; but I desire a minister, and to receive the Sacrament: and further I desire, my lord chief justice, that my son may have no wrong, and that he may have that little that he had got together, and should leave behind him; for it was his by right, and his son might prove an honest man, and do his country good service one day.

L. C. J. He should have his right; nobody should be wronged.—So the Court broke up: Captain Lee still protesting he never intended any such thing against the queen as was laid to his charge; which he continued to affirm afterwards to Mr. Pasfield, to whom he confessed his other sins very freely, even taking his death upon it. He died the next day at Tyburn very Christianly, confessing his other vices, but still denying this.

73. The Trial of Sir CHRISTOPHER BLUNT, Sir CHARLES DAVERS, Sir JOHN DAVIS, Sir GILLY MERRICK, and HENRY CUFFE, at Westminster, for High Treason: 43 ELIZ. March 5, A. D. 1600.*

THE Commissioners were, The earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral, the lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary Cecil, L. C. J. Popham, sir John Fortescue, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Herbert, and divers of the Judges.

The Commission being read, the Court proceeded to the reading of the Indictment. After which the Clerk asked them if they were Guilty of the Indictment, or not Guilty.

Sir Christ. Blunt. My lords, we desire to know whether we may not confess part of the Indictment, and plead Guilty as to the rest.

L. C. J. Your pleading must be general to the whole; either Guilty or not Guilty.

Whereupon they all pleaded Not Guilty; and a substantial Jury was impanelled, which consisted of Aldermen of London, and other gentlemen of good credit.

Sir C. Blunt, sir Charles Davers, and sir John Davis, confessed, That it was their design to come to the queen with so strong a force, that they might not be resisted, and to require of her divers Conditions and Alterations of Government; nevertheless they intended no personal harm to the queen herself, and that was the reason why they could not confess the whole Indictment, because the Indictment charges that they intended and compassed the Death and Destruction of the Queen.

L. C. J. Wherever the subject rebelleth, or riseth in a forcible manner to over-rule the royal will and power of the king, the wisdom and foresight of the laws of this land maketh this construction of his actions, that he intendeth to deprive the king both of crown and life; for the law judgeth not of the fact by the intent, but of the intent by the fact.

Queen's Counsel. This construction is no mystery or quiddity of law, but an infallible conclusion warranted by reason and experience: for the crown is not a garland, or mere outward ornament, but consists of pre-eminence and power; and therefore when the subject will take upon him to give law to the king, and to make the sovereign and commanding power become subject and commanded, such subject layeth hold of the crown, and taketh the sword out of the king's hand. The crown is so fastened upon the king's head, that it cannot be pulled off, but head and life will follow, as all examples both at home and abroad do manifest; and therefore when their words testify one thing, and their deeds another, they are but like the protestations used by Manlius, lieutenant of Catinus, who conspired against the state of Rome, and yet began his letter, * Duos hominesque testatur, nos nihil aliud, &c. denying they intended any thing against their country, but only to provide for their own safety.—But admitting that the Protestation of the prisoners was so far true, that they had not at that time in their minds a formed and distinct cogitation to have destroyed the queen's person, yet nothing is more variable and mutable than the mind of man; and especially Honores mutant mores; when they were once aloft, and had the queen in their hands, and were peers in my lord of Essex's parliament, who could promise of what mind they would then be? especially when it is considered that my lord of Essex at his arraignment defended his first action of imprisoning the privy counsellors, by pretence that he was forced to it by his unruly company: so that if themselves would not have had, or would not seem to have had that extreme and devilish wickedness of mind, as to lay violent hands on the queen's sacred person; yet what must be done to satisfy the multitude and secure their party, must then be the question. The example of Richard the third may be remembered, who (though he were king in possession, and the rightful inheritors but infants) could never sleep quiet in his bed till they were made away; much less is it to be expected, that a Catilinary knot and combination of rebels (who have made an insurrection without so much as the fume of a title) would ever endure, that a queen, who had been their sovereign, and had reigned so many years in such renown and policy, should continue longer alive, than should make for their own turn.

After this the aforesaid sir Christ. Blunt, sir Charles Davers, and sir John Davis said, That now they were better informed, and had entered into a deeper consideration of the matter, they were sorry they had given the Court so much trouble, and had not confessed the Indictment at first. However, the Queen's Counsel produced their Evidence to the Jury, which consisted principally of their several Confessions, and the rest of the Evidence used at the Trial of the earls of Essex and Southampton, as mentioned before in the said Trial.

Against Henry Cuffe was given in Evidence sir Charles Daver's Confession, who charged him, when there was a debating of the several enterprizes which they should undertake, that he did ever bind firmly and resolutely for attempting the court. Also the earl of Essex's Accusation under his hand avouched by him to his face, that he was a principal instigator of him in his Treasons. But the chief evidence was a declaration of sir Henry Nevil, which described and set out the whole manner of his practising with him.

Cuffe. If my being within Essex-House the day of the Rebellion be a foundation to charge me with High-Treason, you may as well charge a lion that is within a grate with treason; and for the consultation of Drury-House, it is no more treason than the child in the mother's belly is a child.

Solicitor General, (Fleming.) As to his being in Essex-House, he was not there by force and compulsion, but freely and voluntarily: there was a distribution in the action, — some were to make good the house, and others to enter the city; and the one part held correspondence with the other; and in treasons there can be no accessaries, all are principals. As to the Consultations at Drury-House, it was perfect Treason in itself, because the consulting the queen's Destruction, which by the consent of law was concluded and implied in that consultation, was Treason in the very thought and cogitation, so as that thought be proved an overt act: that same consultation was an overt act, though it had not been upon a paper of Names and articles in writing, much as being upon matter in writing: and again, going into the city was a pursuance and carrying on of the enterprize against the court, and not a desisting or departing from it.

L. C. J. If many do conspire to execute Treason against the prince in one manner, and some of them do execute it in another manner, yet their act, though different in the manner, is the act of all of them who conspire, by reason of the general malice of the intent.

Against sir Gilly Merrick the Evidence produced proved him guilty of open Rebellion for that he was a captain or commander of the house, and took upon him the charge to keep it and make it good as a place of retreat for those who issued out into the city; and fortified and barricadoed the same house, making provision of muskets, powder, pikes and other ammunition and weapons for the holding and defending it; and was a busy forward and noted actor in that defence and assistance, made against the queen's party brought against it by her majesty's lieutenant. It was further proved, that some few days before the rebellion, he had with great heat and violence displaced certain gentlemen who were lodged in an house close by Essex-House, and there posted divers of my lord Essex's followers and accomplices.—It was also proved that the afternoon before the Rebellion, Merrick with a great company of others, who were all afterwards in the action, had procured to be played before them the play of deposing king Richard the second; neither was it casual, but a play bespoke by Merrick: and when it was told by one of the players, that the play was out, and they should have loss in playing it, because few would come to it, there were forty shillings extraordinary given for it, and so it was played.

Upon this Evidence the Jury went from the bar, and after some time returned and brought them in all Guilty: and accordingly they received Sentence of Death; and were all executed at Tyburn, except sir Christopher Blunt, and sir Charles Davers, who, being nobly descended, were beheaded upon Tower-Hill.

On the 15th of March, Merrick and Cuffe were drawn to Tyburn: when they were come to the gallows, Cuffe spake as follows:

' I am brought hither to pay my last debt to ‘nature, and to suffer for crimes committed ‘against God, my prince and my country; and ‘as I cannot but discern the infinite justice of ‘God, when I reflect on the multitude of my ‘offences, so can I as little doubt but the severity ‘of my punishment will make way for my ‘admission into the embraces of his mercy.

‘We are exposed here as sad spectacles and ‘instances of human frailty; the death we are ‘to undergo carries a frightful aspect, (for ‘even the best of men desire life) besides, that ‘it is as full of ignominy as terror; however, it ‘is the portion of the best of saints, with ‘whom I assuredly hope to rise again in Christ:
‘not that I would be thought by any one to ‘depend on my own merits, which I absolutely ‘discard, but I place my entire trust and dependence
‘in the atonement of my Saviour’s ‘blood. I am fully persuaded, that whoever ‘feels a secret consolation within himself, ‘whilst he groans under the infliction of any ‘earthly punishment, is chastised by God with ‘a paternal tenderness, and not in an angry
‘and judicial way. But to come to the cause ‘of my death; there is nobody here can possibly ‘be ignorant what a wild commotion was ‘raised on the 8th of February, by a particular ‘great, but unadvised earl. I do here call God,
‘his angels, and my own conscience to witness,
‘that I was not in the least concerned therein,
‘but was shut up that whole day within the ‘house, where I spent the time in very melancholy ‘reflections.’

Here he was interrupted, and advised not to disguise the truth by distinctions, nor palliate his crime by specious pretences. Then he proceeded, ‘I confess it is a crime as black as ‘treason for a subject who lost his prince’s favour,
‘to force his way to the royal presence:
‘for my own part, I never persuaded any man
‘to take up arms against the queen, but am ‘most heartily concerned for being an instrument
‘in bringing that worthy gentleman, sir ‘Henry Nevil, into danger, and do most earnestly ‘intreat his pardon. And whereas I ‘said that one-and-twenty aldermen out of the ‘24 were devoted to the earl’s interest, I only ‘meant that they were his friends, and ready to ‘serve him, but not in the way of open rebellion.’

Here he was again interrupted, and so began to apply himself to his devotions, which he managed with a great deal of fervour: and then making a solemn profession of his Creed, and asking pardon of God and the queen, he was dispatched by the executioner,

After him sir Giles Merrick suffered in the same way, and with a most undaunted resolution:
for, as if he were weary of living longer,
he once or twice interrupted Cuffe, and advised him to spare a discourse, which however rational was not very seasonable, when he was taking leave of the world. He cleared the lord Mountjoy from having any acquaintance with the design; and intreated those noblemen who stood by, to intercede with the queen, that there might not be any farther proceedings against such, as had unwarily espoused this unhappy cause.

Five days after, March 18, sir Christ. Blunt and sir Cha. Davers were executed on Tower-Hill. Davers bore his death with a most Christian calmness and composure, having first craved God’s pardon and the queen’s, to whom he wished all prosperity; as also the lord Grey’s, who was there present, to whom he acknowledged he had been ill affected, not from any injury he had suffered from him, but purely on the earl of Southampton’s account, to whom the lord Grey profess an absolute enmity.

When sir Christopher Blunt came upon the scaffold, he expressed himself in the following manner:

‘My lords, and you that be present, although ‘I must confess that it were better fitting the ‘little time I have to breathe, to bestow the ‘same in asking God forgiveness for my manifold ‘and abominable sins, than to use any ‘other discourse, especially having both an ‘imperfection of speech, and God knows, a weak ‘memory, by reason of my late grievous wound:
‘yet to satisfy all those that are present what ‘course hath been held by me in this late ‘enterprise, because I was said to be an instigator, ‘and setter on of the late earl, I will ‘truly, and upon the peril of my soul, speak the ‘truth.—It is true, that the first time that ever
‘I understood of any dangerous discontentment
‘in my lord of Essex, was about three ‘years ago at Wansted, upon his coming one ‘day from Greenwich. At that time he spake
‘many things unto me, but descended into no ‘particulars, but in general terms.—After ‘which time he never brake with me any matter ‘tending to the alteration of the state, (I protest ‘before God) until he came into Ireland,
‘other than I might conceive, that he was of ‘an ambitious and discontented mind. But ‘when I lay at the castle of Tho. Lee, called ‘Reban, in Ireland, grievously hurt, and ‘doubted of my life; he came to visit me, and ‘then began to acquaint me with his intent.’

As he thus spake, the Sheriff began to interrupt him, and told him the hour was past.
But my lord Grey, and sir Walter Raleigh
captain of the guard, called to the Sheriff, and required him not to interrupt him, but to suffer him quietly to finish his Prayers and Confessions. Sir Christ. Blunt said, Is sir Walter Raleigh there? Those on the scaffold answered, Yea; to whom sir Christopher spake on this manner:

‘Sir Walter Raleigh, I thank God that you are ‘present; I had an infinite desire to speak with ‘you, to ask your forgiveness ere I died, both for ‘wrong done you, and for my particular ill
‘intent towards you: I beseech you forgive me.’
Sir Walter Raleigh answered, “That he most willingly forgave him, and besought God to forgive him, and to give him his divine comfort;”
protesting before the Lord, that whatsoever sir Christopher meant towards him, for his part he never had any ill intent towards him: And further said to sir Christopher, "I pray you without offence, let me put you in mind that you have been esteemed, not only a principal provoker and persuader of the earl of Essex in all his unadvised courses, but especially an adviser in that which hath been confessed of his purpose to transport a great part of her majesty's army out of Ireland into England, to land at Milford, and thence to turn it against her sacred person. You shall do well to tell the truth, and to satisfy the world." To which he answered thus: "Sir, if you will give me patience, I will deliver a truth, speaking now my last, in the presence of God, in whose mercy I trust." And then he directed himself to my lord Grey, and my lord Compton, and the rest that sat on horseback near the scaffold. "When I was brought from Reban to Dublin, and lodged in the castle, his lordship and the earl of Southampton came to visit me; and to be short, he began thus plainly with me: That he intended to transport a choice part of the army of Ireland into England, and land them in Wales, at Milford, or thereabouts; and so securing his descent thereby, would gather such other forces, as might enable him to march to London. To which I protest before the Lord God, I made this or the like answer; that I would that might consider of it, which I did. And the next day the earls came again; I told them that such an enterprise, as it was most dangerous, so it would cost much blood, and I could not like of it; besides many hazards which at this time I cannot remember unto you, neither will the time permit it. But I rather advised him to go over himself with a good train, and make sure of the court, and then make his own conditions. And although it be true, that (as we all protested in our Examinations and Arraignments) we never resolved of doing hurt to her majesty's Person; (for in none of our Consultations was there set down any such purpose) yet, I know, and must confess, if we had failed of our ends, we should (rather than have been disappointed) even have drawn blood from herself. From henceforward he dealt no more with me herein, until he was discharged of his keeper at Essex-House. And then he again asked my advice, and disputed the matter with me; but resolved not. I went then into the country, and before he sent for me (which was some ten days before his rebellion) I never heard more of the matter. And then he wrote unto me, to come up, upon pretence of making some assurances of land, and the like. I will leave the rest unto my confessions, given unto that honourable lord admiral, and worthy Mr. Secretary, (to whom I beseech you, sir Walter Raleigh, commend me) I can requite their favourable and charitable dealing with me, with nought else but my prayers for them. And I beseech God of his mercy to save and preserve the queen, who hath given comfort to my soul, in that I hear she hath forgiven me all but the sentence of the law, which I most worthily deserved, and do most willingly embrace, and hope that God will have mercy and compassion on me, who have offended him as many ways as ever sinful wretch did. I have led a life so far from his precepts, as no sinner more. God forgive it me and forgive me my wicked thoughts, my heinous life, and this right arm of mine, which (I fear me) hath drawn blood in this last action. And I beseech you all bear witness that I die a catholic, yet so, as I hope to be saved only by the death and passion of Christ, and by his merits, not ascribing any thing to mine own works. And I trust you are all good people, and your prayers may profit me. Farewell my worthy lord Grey, and my lord Compton, and to you all. God send you both to live long in honour. I will desire to say a few prayers, and embrace my death most willingly."

With that he turned from the rail towards the executioner; and the minister offering to speak with him, he came again to the rail, and besought that his conscience might not be troubled, for he was resolved; which he desired for God's sake. Whereupon commandment was given, that the minister should not interrupt him any further. After which he prepared himself to the block, and so died very manfully and resolutely.

A fuller Account of the Trial of SIR CHRISTOPHER BLUNT, SIR CHARLES DAVERS, SIR JOHN DAVIS, SIR GILLY MERRICK, and HENRY CUFFE. [From a MS. purchased at the Sale of the MSS. of Peter Le Neve, esq. Norroy King at Arms.*]

THE Commissioners were, the earl of Nottingham, Lord High-Admiral, the lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain, Mr. secretary Cecil, the L. C. Justice Popham, sir John Fortescue, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. secretary Herbert, with divers of the Judges.

The Commission being read, the Court proceeded to the Indictment, which was in substance as follows:

* Although in the Manuscript it is 'Sir Charles Davers,' yet on the margin is written in Mr. Le Neve's hand, 'Sir Charles Danvers;' and so it is in Camden.

'That on the 8th day of Feb. last, at Essex-house, they conspired the death and disherison of the queen's majesty, and on that day caused an insurrection of the subjects, and made war in London against the queen, and intended altering the government, state, and religion now established, and to surprize the court at Whitehall. The queen understanding of their intended Treasons, for preventing thereof, upon the 8th of Feb. sent the Lord Keeper, the earl of Worcester, sir Wm. Knowles, and the L. C. Justice, to Essex-house; they then commanded the earls of Essex and Southampton upon their allegiance to desist from their purposes, to disperse their forces assembled, and to demean themselves as dutiful subjects. But they refused to obey their command; and committed them the said Lord-Keeper, earl of Worcester, sir Wm. Knowles, and the L. C. Justice, to be strictly kept and detained in Essex-house, by the said sir John Davis, keeping them in by force; and these words being used by some, Kill them! Kill them! And that the earl of Essex, upon his going out of the house, commanded that if they should offer to deliver them out of their custody, or if the said earl should miscarry in London, then they should kill the said privy-councillors and the earl of Worcester. And that the same day they, with the number of 300 men, went into the city of London, seeking to stir up such citizens as they could move to their Rebellion. And that the said sir Charles Davers, sir Christ. Blunt, and sir John Davis, on the said 8th day of Feb. together with the earl of Essex, did fortify the said house, and armed themselves against the earl of Nottingham, the queen's Lieutenant, and against the queen's army and forces sent for the suppressing of the said Rebels.

The Prisoners being demanded, whether they were Guilty, or not Guilty, of the several Treasons whereof they were indicted? Sir Christ. Blunt confessed several of the things contained in the indictment, and would have pleaded not guilty to the rest*; but the Court told him he * Bacon, who by command of queen Elizabeth, published a Declaration touching the Treasons of the earl of Essex and his accomplices, in that part which relates to what passed at the Arraignment of Blunt, &c. says, "There were arraigned and tried by a Jury both of Aldermen of London, and other gentlemen of good credit and sort, sir Christopher Blunt, sir Charles Davers, sir John Davis, sir Gilly Merrick and Henry Cuffe; the three first whereof before they pleaded, asked this question of the Judges, Whether they might not confess the Indictment in part, and plead Not guilty to it in the other part? But being resolved by the Judges that their pleading must be general; they pleaded Not guilty, as did likewise the other two, without any such question asked. The reason of that question was, as they confessed; in respect of the clause laid in the Indictment; 'That they intended and compassed the death and destruction of the queen's majesty,' unto whose person (although they confessed at the bar, as they had done in their Ex-

must plead general, either Guilty or not Guilty to the whole Indictment; and upon evidence excuse himself in what parts he can. Whereaminations, that their meaning was to come to her in such strength, as they should not be resisted, and to require of her divers conditions and alterations of Government, such as in their Confessions are expressed), nevertheless they protested they intended no personal harm to herself. Whereupon, (as at the Arraignment of the two earls) so, then again the Judges delivered the rule of the law; that the wisdom and foresight of the laws of this land maketh this judgment, 'That the subject that rebelleth or riseth in forcible manner to over-rule the royal will and power of the king, intendeth to deprive the king both of crown and life: and that the law judgeth not of the fact by the intent, but of the intent by the fact.' And the queen's Council did again enforce that point, setting forth, that it was no mystery or quiddity of the common law, but it was a conclusion infallibly of reason and experience; for that the crown was not a ceremony or garland, but consisted of pre-eminence and power.—And therefore, when the Subject will take upon him to give law to the King, and to make the power sovereign and commanding, to become subject and commanded; such subject layeth hold of the crown, and taketh the sword out of the king's hands. And that the crown was fastened so close upon the king's head, that it cannot be pulled off, but that head and life, and all will follow, as all examples, both in foreign stories, and here at home, do make manifest. And therefore, when their words did protest one thing, and their deeds did testify another, they were but like the precedent of the protestation used by Manlius the lieutenant of Catiline, that conspired against the state of Rome, who began his letter to the senate with these words, Deus hominesque testor, Patres conscripti, nos nihil aliud, &c.—And it was said further, that admitting their protestations were so far true, that they had not at that time in their minds a formed and distinct cogitation to have destroyed the queen's person: yet nothing was more variable and mutable than the mind of man, and especially Honores mutant mores: when they were once a-lost, and had the queen in their hands, and were peers in my lord of Essex's parliament, who would promise of what mind they would then be? especially, when my lord of Essex, at his arraignment, had made defence of his first action of imprisoning the privy councillors, by pretence that he was enforced to it by his unruly company. So that if themselves should not have had, or would not seem to have had, that extreme and devilish wickedness of mind, as to lay violent hands upon the queen's sacred person: yet what must be done to satisfy the multitude, and secure their party, must be then the question. Wherein the example was remembered of Richard the 3rd, (who though he were king in possession, and the rightful inhe-upon he pleaded to the Indictment, Not Guilty: and put himself for his trial to God and his country. Sir Charles Davers made the like protestation, but was directed by the Court to plead to the Indictment: and so he pleaded Not guilty. Sir John Davis said, His case was different from the rest; but seeing he must plead negatively to all, he pleaded, Not Guilty. Sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe were arraigned upon another Indictment, but upon the points of the former Indictment, saving for levying of war in London and assaulting the queen's forces there, and conspiring and plotting at Drury-house.

Yelverton, the queen's Serjeant, began the Evidence and opened the Indictment, shewed the act itself to be Treason by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, therefore for the prisoners to pretend an intent to another purpose, is no excuse. To alter the state, change the religion, inforce the prince to settle power, and for subjects to sway things at their list, is crimen lese majestatis; and all Indictments term this treason: for that subject that will rule his prince, will never be ruled by his prince; and to rule with his prince, the world may as well bear two suns as the state suffer two such governments.—For particular proofs and plain convincing of the parties, there need no other but their confessions; which he protested, as he would be credited in the world, came voluntarily from every man examined, no man being racked or tormented.—It is not unknown with what clemency the queen let pass the offence committed by the earl in Ireland: some of as great place as he, have suffered for less offence than was proved against him at his convention before the lords. But such was her majesty's clemency towards him, as not to suffer him to be brought to public trial for those offences; but he, to shew the mind he bore, impatient to expect the queen's leisure and grace, gives himself wholly to think how he may wrest the queen to his fancy. He being prisoner in the Lord-Keeper's house, the queen was contented to let him take his choice of any country in England where to live, only confined with this, that he should hold himself a subject under her majesty's displeasure; yet left to be guarded only with his own discretion. This grace notwithstanding, he ceased not to plot with divers foreigners, he sends to the Low Countries, practises in Ireland, raises spirits at home in Drury-house and Essex-house, for suppressing the queen, calling of a parliament, taking the Tower, possessing of London; and this cannot be intended without the destruction of her ritors but infants) could never sleep quiet in his bed till they were made away. Much less would a Catilinary knot and combination of rebels (that did rise without so much as the fume of a title) ever endure, that a queen that had been their sovereign and had reigned so many years in such renown and policy, should be no longer alive than made for their own turn." Bacon's Works, vol. iv. p. 534.

majesty: and all these plots, by all their confessions, were conferred and disputed divers times. Being sent for to come to the lords of her majesty's privy-council, the earl refuses to come; and the same day sends for all his friends and followers to repair to him. The queen hearing of this, sends the lord-keeper, the earl of Worcester, sir William Knowles, and the lord chief justice unto him. These counsellors find the outward countenance guarded; these counsellors coming to the earl, commanded the earl and all his accomplices to lay down force, and desiring private conference with the earl; he refuseth, and saith he will go into London, and take order with the mayor and sheriffs of the city, and will then return to them again; so confident he was in his own strength and favour of the city. The other matters opened by Mr. Serjeant were the former points laid in the Indictment.

Mr. Attorney-General Coke, coming to ure the Evidence, desired, because the bar was pestered, to have sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe removed for a time, which was done. Then Mr. Attorney said, he was now to speak, not before common judges, nor of common matters, but the greatest and the weightiest cause that ever he had to deal in, though he had now served the queen some time.—The queen's Serjeant hath generally delivered the matter, and he was now to prove what had been opened, wherewith he had striven with himself to have spoken nothing of him that dead is; but unavoidable necessity forced to name him, but it should be with these two cautions: first, to speak nothing but what the very matter enforce; secondly, to say nothing but that without all contradiction was true. The question now is not to you, my masters of the Jury, whether sir Christopher Blunt is guilty of Treason, yea or no; for he confesses himself guilty of matter which is rebellion and insurrection, and that of itself is flat Treason.

Sir Christ. Blunt said hereupon, that he was now a man, what through weakness of his hurt, and through grief of his action, not himself, scarce compos mentis; therefore desired not to be concluded by what he said, for he hoped the lords had called him thither rather to confess his faults, than to excuse or defend them.

Mr. Attorney said, they must now proceed, and sir Christ. Blunt is not now alone in question: but as the earl is concerned and interested in this cause, for order of proceeding, there was no man in the world but must be ruled by reason and by precedent; therefore if by these all men must, then would he so proceed against him.—Sir Christ. Blunt desired them to proceed against the others, for he would confess all that had been said. But Mr. Attorney desired to be heard against him, ut pene sit paucis culpa ab aliis. Now, to shew this point of treason, the Indictment containeth the matters touching the queen's person. In private cases, if servants shall come to their masters with armed petitions, this is a shew of disobedience, and tendeth to destruction. To prove the point of notoria, 8 Hen. 8, the Labourers of Kent made an insurrection against the Statute of Labourers, for the increasing of their wages. Finieux, and all the Judges then, resolved this to be Treason. Trin. 37 Eliz. the Prentices in London making a rout in Southwark, upon information made against them in the Star-Chamber, some of them were sentenced to be whipped; whereupon others conspired to rise at Bunhill, and agree to whip the mayor for suffering the Prentices to be whipped. And this intending to rise and make an insurrection, was resolved by all the judges to be Treason.—39. Eliz. Bradshaw, and others in Oxfordshire, rising to overthrow closes, and to restore tillage; the rising was at Inslow-hill, the Indictment was of Treason and conspiring the queen's death, and adjudged Treason against the person of the queen. Now, if the law make this construction of the acts of mechanical men, what shall be thought of the acts of earls, and other strong persons intending to surprize the Tower, to take the city, possess themselves of the court, to call a parliament, to change government, to tolerate religion? These intents of force must needs tend to treason. The Prentices of London, the men of Oxfordshire, were hanged, drawn and quartered.

Chief Justice Popham delivered the reasons of all this to be, for that by force to compel the prince in any government, is in itself Treason.

The Attorney. He that conspires to take London, and to surprize the Court, this doth merely concern the State: but this Catiline company, to conspire against the queen herself, this concerns more! but the toleration of religion, this of all things concerns most! for from before her coming to the crown, her majesty having holden so constant profession of the religion now established, and since her reign so blessed of God in it; and for her now, by compulsion or otherwise, to be drawn to change it, what impiety and ingratitude against God were it to think it? This quarrel for the changing of religion, was the great cause of the Spanish Invasion intended in 88, and the many treacheries against the Queen's Person, by poisoning her gloves, the pomel of her saddle, and many other ways: therefore at the request or compulsion of a subject to change this true professed Religion, her majesty would rather lose her crown, and venture her person itself in defence thereof, than ever suffer or endure it. Adco periculosum is this to think? These things I have shewed for precedents. Now for story, see the Chronicles of our own kingdoms. Queen Isabel, in the time of king Edward 2: assembles great numbers, pretending for the good of the King and the Church; this was a glorious pretence! but she being upon the wings of her power, calling a Parliament in the name of the king, seeks the overthrow of the king, speciosaque nomina culpis imponis. But the catastrophe, the conclusion, was the smothering of the king, and putting to death the Treasurer and Chancellor: for, said she, the letter of the law is such, as we are all traitors, therefore so long as the king lives, we are all in danger. The story of Richard 2, the Act of 1 Henry 4, calling a Parliament, putting the king in Pomfret-Castle, and the king's Death following, are dangerous precedents, and too fitting these Indictments. This treason's bird hath been long a-hatching, like unto an elephant's whelp, long a-breeding, but bred in a hollow tree, and discovered before it was fledged.—It was forecast, that if they were few, it would not be acted, if they were many, it would not be concealed: therefore resolved few should know it. And upon the sudden, even when the matter was to be acted, then all to have notice of it. And for the tale of being to be murdered in his bed, or to be set upon by sir Walter Raleigh going to the Lord-Treasurer's, this was but a buz, and so invented by them for a buz: but on the other side, it shall be proved directly, that they intended to kill sir Walter Raleigh. It was objected, that the queen's forces that would be suddenly raised would be an impediment to this action; but to prevent this, it was resolved to pretend that the state generally was with them now, where it may be some may think themselves excusable of Treason, because they knew not of the Treason intended, though they were present in the thing acted. For the clearing of this, Mr. Attorney referred himself to the opinion of the Judges in the point; whereupon it was delivered by my Lord-Chief-Justice, 'That in case, where some pretended Treason, and others accompanied and assisted them in any action, though not knowing of the Treason intended, yet were they all offenders in Treason.'

And for the honour of the Indictment, and manifesting the due of their proceedings, Mr. Secretary desired their Judgments, whether in case, 'When men were actors and abettors in such a matter, whether the law charged them not in this point with direct Treason against the Person of the prince?' Which was affirmed by the Judges to be so, and the Indictment must so charge them.

Now, for several Proofs against every several person then arraigned, he would first begin with sir Christopher Blunt, and with his own Confession against him. The Confession of sir Christ. Blunt* contained this, That the 20th of Jan. he was sent for by the earl of Essex to come up to London; whereupon he came, and was at Drury-house when the conference was there the Sunday or Monday seven-night before the going into London. But came when the conference was ended. The reason of their going into London, as they did on Sunday the 8th of Feb. was, because the alarm was given at the Court, and knowing into what hazard the earl adventured, he went with him for safety of the earl's life, as far as there might be power in him, and thought it lawful for subjects to use force for their safety, and the settling of true religion. And being asked by Mr. Attorney, Whether he was privy to the purpose of taking the Court? Said, he was privy to the conference of going to take the court, but it was a thing first to be considered of, but not resolved. And being further asked by the Secretary, if in their conference it was not resolved, that if the earl prevailed, and came to the authority he shot at, he would have suffered Toleration of Religion? answered, That he thought so; and said, he should be to blame to deny it; for the earl had many times said to him, that he liked not the forcing of men's consciences; and in his usual talk would say, he misliked that any should be troubled for their conscience. And in a second Confession, he set down, that the earl, five days before his going into Loudon, wrote down with his own hand certain Articles to be disputed upon; whereof one was, whether they should take the Tower? another, touching the surprizing of the court? and that the earl usually spoke of this purpose to alter the government of the realm. But the examinant desired that might not have been set down, because it was no grace unto the rest.—Mr. Secretary desired to know the reason wherefore he would not have had this set down, which he understood to be, for that the confession was so liberal of matters so foul, as this being added, it would embroider the rest? But sir Christopher said, he was mistaken; but the altering of the Government being moved, and the removing of the secretary, he desired forbearance to express any further matter, for gracing of himself. And in the said Confession, sir Christopher seemed to dissuade from the attempt intended, but utterly disliked the taking of the Court at that time of the night.—For a farther Proof against sir Christ. Blunt, that he had wrought with the earl for a Toleration of Religion, and sought to seduce sir John Davis; the Confession of sir John Davis was read, wherein it was set down, that sir John Davis asking of sir Christ. Blunt, if the earl had promised Toleration of Religion, the Catholic Religion? Sir Christopher answered, that the earl gave good hope of it. And Davis in his Confession set down that principally by the persuasion of sir Christopher, he became a Catholic; therefore being taken and committed to Mr. Mompesson's, he desired Mr. Mompesson to help him to a priest. But at the bar, Davis said, that many times he had conference with sir Christopher touching Religion, but he was not the original persuader of him unto that religion; but being bred up in Oxford, his tutor, Mr. Allen, was a Catholic, and from him he took it, and hath ever lived free from giving offence by his profession; and saving this unhappy action, he hath always been loyal and obedient to law, hath accompanied the earl ordinarily at summons, and communicated with him; and the reason of his words upon his first commitment, was supposing Mr. Mompesson to have been a Catholic, did request him to help him to a priest, but grieved afterwards he was deceived in Mr. Mompesson. And the Lord-Admiral protested he knew that Mr. Mompesson was not affected to that Religion, which sir John Davis thought to be true: but said, Mr. Mompesson had not kept word with him, for he promised upon his credit not to reveal his request.

And to prove sir Christ. Blunt was an author and a chief stirrer of the rebellion in London, the Confession of lord Sands was read, wherein was set down, that he went with the earl to sheriff Smith's, but went not into the house; but being sent for by the earl, went with him, and came back with him, towards Ludgate; and sir Christ. Blunt and the lord Sands, at the chain before their coming to Ludgate, gave charge upon the queen's forces, and were both hurt at that place.

Sir Christ. Blunt at the bar confessed he was too forward in that action, and gave charge upon the pikes, but denied the killing of . . . . at that place, which Mr. Attorney charged him withal; but he desired Mr. Attorney to think charitably of him, and not to charge him with that man's blood.

Then Mr. Attorney proceeded to prove, that where it was pretended and given out for a buz, that sir Walter Raleigh should have sought to have murdered the earl, that indeed they sought to murder sir Walter Raleigh, to which purpose the Confession of sir Ferdinando Gorge was read; wherein was contained, that the earl and sir Christopher, that Sunday morning that sir Walter Raleigh had sent to speak with him, sir Christopher advised Gorge to kill him: and to this end, sir Christopher sent four shot after him when he went to speak with sir Walter Raleigh.—But Blunt said, that sir Ferdinando Gorge did much wrong him in so saying; but confessed, that in respect sir Ferdinando was to be one of the principal executioners in this business, he wished Gorge not to go naked to sir Walter, nor to go home to him, but to meet him upon the water, and to take some pistols with him, that in case sir Walter should not suffer him to come off, that then he should be of force to come away, and bring sir Walter with him; and this was his advice. And being asked by Mr. Secretary, whether he thought, or was persuaded that my lord Cobham, or sir Walter Raleigh intended any such thing against the earl? Sir Christopher answered, that he did not believe that they ever meant any such matter, nor the earl himself feared it not, only it was a word cast out to colour other matters.—Gorge also confessed, that the earl intended, after he had possessed himself of the court, then to have gone into London with some principal officers of the state, carried with him, and after a while to have called a parliament, and settled things to his liking. And Mr. Secretary said, that sir Ferdinando Gorge being confronted with the earl, had said as much; and to satisfy those questions, would have Gorge sent for.

To prove that sir Christopher Blunt would not take notice of the Proclamation published in London by an herald at Arms, the confession of capt. Edward Bromley was read, wherein was set down, that the earl coming from sheriff Smith's house, saw in Gracechurch-street an herald at Arms, and sent sir Christopher to him, to tell him, that he should not approach the earl, for he would not bear him abuse the queen's name. And to prove that sir Christopher was a chief director of things done in the house that Sunday-morning the 8th of Feb. it was shewed, that Mr. Killgrew of the Privy-chamber coming that morning to Essex-house, sir Christopher meets him in the Court, and Mr. Killgrew told him, that he had a message from the queen to sir William Knowles; and hearing by sir Christopher Blunt that sir William was gone, he would have gone back again, but sir Christopher said, he must not go; and smiling upon him, wished him not to take it discourteously, for he must stay him.—But sir Christ. Blunt said hereupon at the Bar, that the reason of the staying of Mr. Killgrew was this; Mr. Killgrew being a gentleman whom he knew the queen trusted, he told him, he would desire him to stay in the house, and hear the matter, and see their proceedings, that so he might truly inform the queen of that which he knew would be diversly and strangely spoken of. But against this, Mr. Killgrew himself said, that he was staid by sir Christopher by these words; 'I must deal somewhat unmannerly with you, and stay you now till you have spoken with my lord:' and sent sir John Davis to go tell my lord of Essex: whereupon the earl, accompanied with divers others, came to Mr. Killgrew.—Mr. Attorney perceiving some shiftings in sir Christopher Blunt's answers, willed him to confess things plainly, otherwise he would prove him guilty of the earl's death. Whereupon sir Christopher wished that his death were worthy to restore the earl to life again; but for his Confessions, they had always been plain and true from the first, and plain to all he knew: wherein he appealed to Mr. Secretary, if he had found other by him. Mr. Secretary acknowledged that he had always found him to deal honestly and plainly.

Now, to come to the great matter against sir Christ. Blunt, and the rest. The queen's majesty having intelligence of their intended treasons, yet graciously disposed to extenuate the offence of the earl, commands her privy-council to meet at the lord-treasurer's house on Saturday at night, and that night sends Mr. Secretary Herbert to the earl, to signify unto him, that it was the queen's pleasure he should repair unto her council there; but the earl refused to come. Mr. Secretary Herbert, the rather to invite his coming, offered to go in the coach with him alone without any light, or take boat and go by water, that they should go and come without being discerned by any; but the earl still refused. Sir Christ. Blunt confessed he heard of Mr. Secretary Herbert's coming, but wished to God he had dealt more peremptorily with the earl. Mr. Secr. Herbert said, he was not to be more peremptory with him than in the words of the queen's own message, which he delivered directly. Mr. Secr. Cecil affirmed, that such was the respect given to the earl, and that nothing should break out to the understanding of others, as it was once resolved all the council to have gone home to him to his own house. Sir Christopher said, that the earl kept very secret to himself the cause of his sending for to the Lords of the council, and what Mr. Secretary Herbert's message was; for being asked what it was, he said, that such was the queen's opinion of him, for all those disgraces, as her council being to consult of great matters, she had sent to have him amongst them, and to have his opinion.

Mr. Attorney further urged, That the queen's exceeding favour rested not there; but even the same Sunday morning before his going into London, the queen sent Mr. Sec. Herbert to him, to signify to him, that her pleasure was he should come before her council, which he refused again; and thus was it true with him, that constructio peccandi, did tollere sensum peccati. Her majesty notwithstanding, after both these refusals, vouchsafeth again the sending unto him, maketh choice of his best friends and nearest allies he had in the court; the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Chief-Justice, two that loved him exceedingly well while he stood a good servant and a true subject; the earl of Worcester and sir William Knowles his near kinsmen. These lords valiantly, (for so I will term it, and to their honours I will speak it, that it shall appear that in some gown-men there rests as valiant minds, where the cause requires it, as in them that wear swords:) The Lord-Keeper stoutly, in the midst of his armed troops, commands the earl upon his allegiance to desist from his purpose, and to lay down arms; when others in the tumult cried, My lord, my lord, you stay too long; others said, Kill them! kill them! and, at this time, Blunt advised the earl to imprison that, which is Treason in itself.

But sir Christ. Blunt said, that his advice to my lord then was, that the place was unfit to talk in, being openly in the court, and that therefore he would withdraw into some some private place.

But my L. C. J. Popham said, that he himself hearing the company tumultuously cry 'Away, away, you lose time;' hereupon he stept to the earl, and persuaded him to withdraw into some place private, and there to consult with them. And to manifest in what manner the lords were received and used, and how they found the house at their coming in, a Narrative was read, set down by my Lord-Keeper, all under his own hand-writing, which was thus: That coming to Essex-house the 8th of Feb., about ten of the clock in the morning, they found the gates shut. Upon their knocking, the wicket was opened, but none of their servants suffered to enter in with them, save only J. Hughs, who carried the great seal. From the gate to the house-door stood a guard of shot on both sides; at their coming in, the company assembled tumultuously together; before their coming to the hall-door, the earls of Essex, Rutland, and Southampton came and met them, and divers others flocked about the earl. The Lord-Keeper stepping to the earl of Essex, told him, that they were sent to know the cause of their grievance; if there was any, the queen would hear it; but hearing that he had assembled so many into that house, and not knowing for what cause, the queen had commanded them to command him to disperse those companies. The earl answered, that his life had been sought; he had been perfidiously dealt with, and for his defence that company of his followers and friends were gathered together. The Lord-Keeper answered, if any such matter was, he should be heard and relieved. Hereupon the earl of Southampton said, 'that he was assaulted in the street by the lord Gray.' The L. C. Justice answered, he had justice for that. The company gathering thick about them, the Lord-Keeper desired the earl of Essex to draw aside; and they conferring secretly, the company cried, All, all. The Lord-Keeper told the earl, that if he had any wrong done him, he should be honourably righted. Then the company cried, 'Away, away, my lord, they betray you, they undo you.' All this while they were bare, but hereupon the Lord-Keeper put on his hat, and commanded the earls upon their allegiance to desist, and lay down their weapons: and private conference being again desired, they were carried up into the great chamber, and as they went, some said, 'Throw the great seal out of the window;' some said, 'Kill them, kill them;' others cried, 'Away, away.' Then they were led into one of the earl's closets. The Lord-Keeper pressing to speak with the earl, he said, My lord, be patient a while; I will go take advice, speak with my lord-mayor, and the sheriffs of London, and will be with you again within this half hour. Then the earl departed, and left them to the custody of sir John Davis, sir Christ. Blunt, and sir Gilly Merrick. The lords being thus in custody, desired leave to be gone, or that they might send one to the queen to let her know how they were used; but this was denied them: and answered, that the earl would return shortly, and till his return they must not let them go.

The earl of Rutland's Confession being read after the former Narration of the Lord-Keeper's; thereby it appeared, that the earls of Essex and Southampton, and sir Christ. Blunt, of long time had been discontented, and that Blunt many times advised the earl to stand upon his guard; and it was the advice of the earl of Southampton, Blunt, and Davis, that the lords should be detained.

For the earl of Rutland himself, Mr. Secretary said, he thought him not to be acquainted with the Plot; and the earl of Essex himself had said, that the earl of Rutland was not privy to it: for his conceit of him was, and thus said, that the earl of Rutland knew it but two hours before. And, said Mr. Secretary, if equality of justice would suffer it, he wished that no blood more might be spilt: for it was not the blood of any man that was required, and the queen should gain more by their lives than by their deaths; and doubted not but her majesty, in this lamentable accident, would triumph in mercy, but where and when there should appear no other cause but merely her exceeding mercy. The earl of Rutland's Confession shewed further, that Blunt, when they going to the court was intended, said, O how fearful, and of how several humours shall we find them, when we come to the court!

Further, to enforce the hard usage of the lords, the Confession of one Whittington was read, who said, That after the Lord-Keeper and the other lords were in the inner room, other company coming up towards the place, swore they would stab and kill the counsellors; whereupon Whittington sent to the earl of Essex, how violently some men pressed, how cruelly they meant against the counsellors? Sir Christopher hearing these words, said, it was no time now to make orations. Whereupon the earl of Essex presently departed, and word left, that if the earl of Essex miscarried in London, or if they offered to escape before his return, then the Lord-Keeper and the Chief-Justice should be killed.

The L. C. J. hereupon asked sir Christopher, Why they stood at the great chamber-door with muskets charged and matches in their hands; which, through the key-hole, the L. C. J. said, he discerned? Davis answered, and said, he was charged with the custody of the lords, but against his will, for he much more desired to have gone with the earl into London, and that the earl of Southampton, sir Charles Davers, or some other might have kept them; but the earl of Essex said, No, he would but go take order with London, and come again within half an hour, in the mean time he should keep them. Then captain Salisbury having the guard of the muskets, was very violent and so disordered, as he doubted what he would attempt, and, contrary to the will of others, brought up the shot so near the door. And sir John Davis said, that lest the fury of Salisbury should attempt beyond that was meant, he sometimes passed amongst the shot, and to satisfy the lords that no harm was meant them, he came in to them, whom when he perceived in some fear, he assured them that there should be no force offered them.

But the L. C. Justice told sir John Davis at the bar, that he had no reason to think they were in fear, and bade him tell what words the Chief-Justice then used, which were these: If they did take their lives, it was but the cutting off of a few years; and when Gorge came, and would have let out the L. C. Justice only, he refused to go except they might all go; and said, as they came together, so they would go together, or die together.

And sir John Davis said, that the better to assure the lords that no harm was meant them, he went up to the ladies, and intreated the countess of Essex to come down, and be amongst them: she making some pause at it, saying, With what comfort can I go amongst them? He persuaded her to go and be amongst them, the better to assure them that no barbarous usage should be offered unto them. And that he behaved himself respectfully towards them, being uncovered before them, when others stood covered by them: and such provisions as the house had, he prepared for them, and set them a dinner.

But the L. C. Justice said, My lord-keeper and he told Davis, they would eat none of my lord's meat.

But at the coming down of the countess amongst the counsellors, sir John Davis said, that he perceiving the lords in great doubt what the earl meant, and hearing them say to my lady, What a strange course is this the earl of Essex taketh? Thereupon sir John Davis said, that if he did perceive that the earl intended any hurt unto the queen, his sword should be the first that should be drawn against him. And the L. C. Justice asking what was become of the earl all that while, they having then staid from eleven of the clock till it was almost two, said, the earl will be deceived of his purpose if he hope upon the City, for the citizens are faithful to the queen. Then Davis answered, the earl had good hope of the City. It being replied, That perhaps some loose people might fall into him, but he could have no good hopes of any that were substantial and good citizens; Davis said, my lord is sure of the city, for of 24 aldermen he is sure of 21, and my lord in this action will set such aids in the City in all places, as no spoil shall happen.

But to the honour of the City of London, Mr. Attorney often repeated, that of all the City, not one man, save only one sorry prentice, was found to take part with, and of Inns-of-court-men, not one man that followed him.

Sir John Davis being farther asked, when he first was made acquainted with this purpose of the earl's? He said he knew not of it till the Sunday sevennight before their rising, and then their purpose was to surprize the court. at such a time as he should have small opposition; and that they met twice that Sunday or Monday before their rising, at Drury-house, when they consulted about surprizing the Tower and the court. But debating long, they could not agree; whereupon breaking off, the earl said, he would set order for all himself, since they could not agree on it; which were the earl of Southampton, sir Christ. Blunt, sir Charles Davers, and sir John Davis.

Hereupon Mr. Secretary told sir Christopher that the earl had confessed that he had been a principal instigator of him to these acts, and a mover of him to plots more pernicious to the state than these.—Sir Christopher Blunt said,

Hath my lord that gone is, said so by me? Well, since I am so nearly touched in honour, and my reputation so far charged, I will tell you, Mr. Secretary, what I have counselled him, and what I have kept him from.—Mr. Secretary said, the earl for part of his sacrifice to God, had left it under his own hand all that he could disclose of all confederation in this matter.

Sir Christ. Blunt seemed ready at the bar to have disclosed farther matter against the earl, but referred to my Lord Admiral and Mr. Secretary, whether he should there utter it, or privily deliver it to them two? which afterwards he did, being brought into the Court of Wards to them after Judgment was given.

Mr. Attorney proceeding with his Evidence, desired attention, saying, That the last day he gave Evidence against the earl, since which time it had been rumoured, that though the letter of the law was strong against the earl, and his act expounded by the law to be Treason, yet his intention was not to touch the queen's person or her state. But the earl himself (whose soul he doubted not but was with God, for his end was most penitent and Christian) before his death revoked all his Justifications made at his arraignment, save only one original purpose, not to lay hands upon the queen; and took it upon his death, that he meant not to lay violent hands upon the queen's person; yet remembering the tumultuous behaviour of them in his company at his house, said, that he feared he should have been forced to some wrong against the queen's person.

Whereupon the Lord Admiral affirmed, that the earl of Essex said, It was fit he should die, for the queen could not live and he too.

Mr. Secretary also delivered how clear a Confession the earl had made of all things; how long time four of them of her majesty's privy-council at his intreaty had spent with him in the Tower upon Saturday before, and how he had revoked those imputations he had cast upon some men, and those asseverations he had in his own defence. Therefore, for his part, he must needs judge charitably of him, and forgive such wrongs as the earl had done him; and if the diabolical imputation which the earl at his arraignment cast upon him, further moved him to impatience than his wont was, or was fit, he desired them that heard it to pardon him, for the provocation made him to forget all bands of speech.

Now was read some parts of the earl's last Confession, which contained four sheets of paper, all written with the earl's hand; and it being shewed to Cuffe at the bar, he acknowledged it to be the earl's hand-writing. Out of the earl's Confession this was only read: That Blunt, Cuffe, Temple, and some others, though they were not present at Drury house, yet they were privy to more dangerous practices and plots than these. And Cuffe being brought face to face before the earl, the earl charged him to call to God for mercy, and deal truly with the queen; for he being to go out of the world, must deal truly with his soul. Cuffe said, it was long before he could be allowed pen and ink to write; else the earl himself would have cleared him, as he did in these things, that in a few words he set down; which being read to the earl, he said, true; and still as he read, he said true; out of which Cuffe would infer, that the earl being truly remembered of things passed, would have cleared, and not left an accusation upon him. But these seemed to be other matters than such wherewith the earl had charged him. And Cuffe denied not, but being confronted by the earl, the words aforesaid were used to him. Then was read an abstract of the earl's Confession in these words: "He thanked God that he was thus prevented, for otherwise he knew not what misery might have befallen this land. He said, that men would wonder, if they knew how many motions had been made unto him, to remove the evils of the commonwealth. He confessed that his rebellion was first plotted when he was prisoner at the lord-keeper's house; he intended to have surprized the court with a power of men, and afterwards the Tower, to have countermined his actions, and been a bridle to the city, and then to have called a parliament. He said, that London was a danger unto his soul, and the cause of his rebellion; for if he had not trusted to those of London, he had not taken this course. He called the men of London a base and cowardly people, saying, That he drove them from their barricades with two rapiers a-cross, and would undertake to sack London with 400 men. He called himself a burden unto the commonwealth to be spewed out. He called this his sin, a great sin, a bloody sin, a crying sin, and an infectious sin, infecting with a leprosy both far and near. He desired his life to be shortened, for that he knew the queen could not be safe so long as he himself was living. He desired private death, to avoid the acclamations of the people."

This abstract read, sir Christ. Blunt said, he must needs confess he was privy to the spleen that was carried against Mr. Secretary, and was too far consenting to his hurt; but never gave allowance, or was mover of the earl to this plot.—Mr. Secretary interrupting him, wished him to conceal nothing that tended to the discovery of these treasons. For matter of injury intended against him, he wished not the naming of them, he did forgive them.—Sir Christopher said, that was favour out of his charitable disposition, more than he himself was worthy of.

Mr. Attorney proceeding, said, the queen had charged those of her council to say nothing in this business, but what might plainly be proved, if it were objected; for she would go with her justice untouched: therefore he would open matters, and which though they of the Jury need not to take as any part of their Evidence; yet because they were true, and fortified the matter divulged and proclaimed through the realm, for the honour of the queen, though against an earl that was executed, he would disclose unto them how this Treason had a deeper root than most were aware of: wherefore you shall plainly have it proved unto you, That there was a correspondence betwixt the earl of Essex, sir Christ. Blunt, and the Arch Traitor Tyrone; and this shall be proved unto you by the earl's own creatures. Thus it fell out, after he had 16,000 foot, and 1,300 horse under his charge; such an army, as he himself said, should make the earth to tremble where he went. It was pretended by him that he would go into the north against the rebel, but never intended, as appeared; for Lee must go to the rebel, but the earl must not know it; and Blunt must suffer it, being Marshal, but give no warrant for it. Lee goes to Tyrone, finds the rebel up in proud terms against the English nation, railing against the earl of Essex, as that he sought his life, and hired some about him to perform; which was a baser thing than ever he had offered to his father, or would do against him: but these terms were after qualified. Lee returning, brings answer from Tyrone, that he desired conference with the earl, and would give his son for pledge; and sends word, that if the earl would follow his counsel, he would make him the greatest man that ever was in England. Lee being returned, the earl of Essex repairs to the place where Blunt lay, where this being told him, he shook his head at it; but said nothing. Now the earl of Essex gathers his army towards winter, takes his journey towards the north, goes with pretence to fight; but coming there, entertains a parley with the rebel; being jealous lest any should hear it, takes order that the earl of Southampton should keep all men from coming near, and he alone goes to parley with the rebel. The effect of this was confessed by Lee while he lived, and to make it evident, the plotting of Treason between those two earls, you shall understand it by an intelligence that passed, which, were it not the thing had been severally plotted, it had been impossible to have been advertised; for no bird upon her wing could have carried the news in that time. Sir Wm. Warren, a man most trusted by the rebel of any Englishmen, he went to Tyrone the 28th of September; the earl of Essex lauded in England but the 26th of September; and Tyrone could then tell Warren, that he should see a strange alteration in England shortly, and it should not be long ere he should see him have a good share in England. This passed in the north of Ireland. In the south of Ireland, one Mac Pueys, secretary, confessed, That it was agreed the earl of Essex should be king of England, and Tyrone viceroy of Ireland. In the middle of Ireland, Fitz-Maurice, sister's son to Tyrone, affirms the same, and says, that whensoever the earl of Essex should need men; then it is agreed, that Tyrone shall find him a continual supply of 8000 men; and Fitz-Maurice bearing these things agreed betwixt the earls, sends to know what he will have to do, lest he enter into attempt to the cross of their purposes. The earl of Essex being commanded by express letters that he should not come over, he notwithstanding comes over, brought all the strongest provisions away with him, left the kingdom at all adventures, only trusts the rebel Tyrone's word for the safety of that whole kingdom. It may be thought these things more fitly should have been urged against the earl himself; but the cause was, one, the shortness of time; another, because all the lords were satisfied, and said there was Treason full enough proved against him, and it satisfied to condemn him. And when I was there entering into this matter, the lord Steward said to me, Mr. Attorney, I perceive you have more to say, but I enjoin you silence for the rest.

Now for Proof of these things thus plotted in Ireland, the Confession of Lee was read, who was a man the earl had good opinion of, and he so devoted to the earl, as he wished his own head might have suffered for him. Lee confessed, that on the Sunday, when he heard they were proclaimed Traitors, he was mightily discontented and grieved at the imprisonment of the earls, and stuck not to profess unto some, that he could be contented to spend his life for their delivery, and thought it an easy matter to be performed, if six resolute gentlemen would undertake it, and named them. And whereas the earl denieth that ever he sent him to Tyrone, yet he thought the earl knew when Blunt sent him for this reason, that the marshal never did any great matter without the earl's privy: and that this matter was such, as the marshal would give him no warrant in writing for it. And when he was returned from Tyrone, the earl of Essex then made a secret journey to Blunt's house, where Blunt lay hurt. And Lee said, that at his coming to Tyrone, he found him proud, and railing at our nation, and said that the earl had hired some to take his blood; but afterwards told Lee that he had sent Essex a message by Snode his secretary, that if he would agree with him, he would make him the greatest that ever was in England. And Lee further confessed, that he knew Essex, Blunt, and Tyrone were all one, and all held one course.

Sir Christ. Blunt confessed, he knew of Lee's going to Tyrone, but denied that he had ever notice what he said to Tyrone. It was true, he gave leave unto Lee to go to Tyrone, and the earl of Essex was privy to it; yet the earl in his life denied it.

But my L. C. Justice noted, That it was a thing agreed upon betwixt them, that Lee and Blunt should take this upon them; and for the fact, Lee and Blunt should have a pardon granted them, which was done by the earl: this being about the 8th of August; yet the earl of Essex wrote over hither to the lords of the privy-council, the 14th of August, in these words: 'Your lordships would not think what cowardice these fellows are grown to; yet must these fellows be taught courage to fight, or else this rebel will never be subdued.'

Further was read, a Letter all of the earl's own writing, dated the 8th of Oct. written to the lord Mountjoy, after his being in Ireland, and the earl here in England; signifying 'that Lee is one so near to me, as I must needs intreat your lordship to do what you can for him; though it is not in your power to do what you would; you shall find him a man of better service than any is in Ireland. When I came thither, I found him in good place, and sometimes he entertained me to his great charge; which with your favour you must enable him to again. And let it be my suit to you, to do him what good you can.'

From out of these Letters, it was urged by Mr. Attorney, that Lee was a man wholly plotted for him. The 26th of Sept. the earl of Essex came to the court; the 28th of Sept. capt. Warren talks with Tyrone. Warren confesseth, that Tyrone swears, that within two months he should see the greatest alteration, and the strangest that ever he saw; but Warren understood him not. Then said Tyrone, I hope ere long to have a good share in England.

The Confession of one Knowd, secretary to Owney Mac-Rorey, taken the 16th of Feb. was read, wherein was set down, That Owney Mac-Rorey having secret intelligence of the plot betwixt the two earls, Essex and Tyrone, wrote and sent so twice, and desired to be advertised thereof, that he might do nothing contrary to their designs. But Tyrone grew suspicious, lest the matter should break out too soon: yet the effect of the answer was this, that the earl of Essex should be king of England and be viceroy of Ireland. And that for a while he should attempt nothing upon the English; and proved, that the earl had left sixteen barrels of powder in the north. And Knowd being asked by a gentleman, upon his returning out of the north, what news? Said, it was agreed, that Essex should be king of England, and Tyrone viceroy of Ireland.—Turlagh Mac-Davy O Kelly, being a messenger from the M . . . rebels, and brought the answer to . . . said, the earl of Essex was to go for England, and take that kingdom, and they to help him; and among those rebels it was reported, the earl of Essex wrote a letter to the earl of Tyrone, to follow his matter thoroughly: for now was the time.

The Confession of Thomas Wood, sister's son to James Fitz-Maurice, Baron of Lixnow, and a man in great credit with this baron, was read; wherein he sheweth, That being with James Fitz-Maurice at his house, about Michaelmas, when the earl of Essex came over from England, Fitz-Maurice asked him what friends the earl of Essex had in England? Who said, he knew not; but heard the earl was well beloved in England. Then Fitz-Maurice told him, that the earl of Essex was gone for England; had discharged many of the forces, and that the earl of Desmond had sent him word, that it was agreed the earl of Essex should be king of England, and Tyrone viceroy of Ireland.

Hetherington's Confession, and some others, were spared reading, because they only concerned the earl of Essex.

Now Mr. Attorney opened, that notwithstanding all those plots, practices, and treasons, were known to the queen; yet, after all this so graciously her majesty regarded him, and was pleased to cover his offences, as to have him privately to come before some of her privy-council only at the lord-treasurer's, sent one of her secretaries twice to him, offered to pass in all secrecy; nay, Mr. Secretary said, for saving his honour, that none should take notice of any thing. They once all proposed to have gone home to Essex-house to him, and during all the time of his restraint from court, his letters have always had free passage to the queen, and she ever gave the reading to any thing he sent. Wherefore, Mr. Attorney said, the action of breaking out into that it did, it was a great mercy of the queen's, that in flagrante crimine he was not, according to the martial law, presently put to the sword.

And then Mr. Solicitor General urged new Evidence against sir Charles Davers.

Mr. Solicitor Flemming beginning, said, He would prove sir Charles Davers guilty of all the Treasons charged against sir Christ. Blunt, and that he was a principal plotter, disputer, officer and actor in all their treasons. In fine, he was assigned to be keeper of the presence-chamber; where, upon a signal given, all the nobles to assemble, and passing to the privy-chamber to present themselves to the queen: and for making their way first, they should apprehend sir Walter Raleigh, captain of the guard; and afterwards some of the privy-counsellors, and some other lords. These being seized upon, they should afterwards have been put to an honourable trial, and afterwards a parliament should be called, and government established; and so principally did the earl of Essex count upon this gentleman, sir Ch. Davers, and so secret did he hold him to him, as that before Christmas last the earl discovered his intent to him, and told him he would lay such a plot for taking the court, as he would not be resisted. And when sir Ch. Davers was in the country, the earl would not enter into consultation about the business, until sir Ch. Davers came up; and messengers were dispatched presently for him. Upon his coming up, a meeting was had at Drury-house, where divers projects were made, Davis, Davers, Blunt, Gorge and Southampton being present, amongst whom it was agreed, the taking of the Tower to be very fit, for the better countenancing of the action.—The chiefest defence and pretence that sir Charles Davers used, was the great love he bore to the earl of Southampton, who heretofore had caused him his pardon, and having gained him his life, he thought he owed his life unto him in any thing he should command him.—But Mr. Solicitor said, it behoved him rather to have been grateful and serviceable to the queen, who gave him life, more than to him that sued for his life. But this was the just revenge had of God, that followed for the foul murder he had committed.—Sir C. Davers perceiving that his act had extended to Treason, although he intended no harm unto the queen's person, said he was sorry he had so far forgotten himself as to plead Not guilty; for it was not his purpose coming thither to defend, or deny any thing, but to confess all things that could be said against him: therefore confessed, that before Christmas the earl advised with him, how he might make his way so to the queen, as that his access to her should not be resisted. But this was not resolved till his return out of the country. When at Drury-house, they meeting, and Littleton coming thither; at the last, it was resolved, the plot set down by the earl's own hand, were first to take the Tower: for reason he yielded this, it would be a countenance to the action; the taking of the court, for which he would have so many able men, as they would at any time possess all the places of the court. The manner to be this: sir Christopher Blunt to have the gate: sir Gilly Merrick, the hall; sir John Davis, the great chamber; sir Charles Davers, the Privy-chamber; the earl himself should come all along by land: at his coming into the great chamber, he should put himself betwixt the halberts, (meaning that he should step to the corner where the guard usually set up their halberts against the wall) and possess himself of them, so as by them he would have no hurt, and perhaps he should find of the guard apt to take his part.—My Lord-Admiral said, it was a fair warning to the guard, that they use not that fashion of setting up their halberts in that manner.—When the earl was thus come into the great chamber, divers of the lords should come out of the presence thither, and saluting him, to welcome his coming to the court; then the earl with ten or twelve noblemen, to take their way into the Privy-chamber.—It being asked, what should be done with them that should make resistance to this attempt? it was answered, it was meant they should be seized upon. And the court being quieted, then to send to satisfy the city: and then not long after, to call a parliament.

A further Confession of sir Charles Davers being read, there were set down the substance of the earl's former Articles, and these questions farther propounded; as, whether the court and Tower should be attempted at one time; and whether this attempt should be with many, or with few; if with many, where the number should assemble; and whether it should not be fit for the earl and some others to be armed with privy-coats, and who were fittest persons to have custody of the lord-admiral and the secretaries?—These and some further matters also, sir Ferdinando Gorge confessed were disputed upon.

And said Mr. Secretary, since this is a world wherein princes must be accountable for their doings to their subjects, that men should not marvel why like proceedings were not had against sir Ferdinando Gorge as these, the reason of forbearance was not that he had deserved better, or was otherwise conceited of, than to be an Arch-Traitor: but because he was the instrument of saving and letting go those that were sent from the queen to Essex-house: and for this cause divers of her majesty's Privy-council had been suitors to her majesty for sparing his life for a time, though for their opinions of him, they held him an original and principal Traitor; and that he advised more mischievously than any other, for he would have had the Court fired upon the taking of it. Sir Charles Dayers still professed, as he had done often, that he was privy and a disputer of all these plots, but never was any deviser of any, or instigator of my lord in these things. Sir Christ. Blunt for further clearing himself, says, he knew not of this plot till his coming to London, upon the earl's sending for him; that they had allotted him to place, he knew: but to what office, he knew not. And the more to be commiserated, he besought the Lords Commissioners to remember what natural considerations were to tie him to the earl, having married his mother. Now to how many adventures the obligations of love, and following of that earl, had before carried him, the world did know; and how liberal, prodigal and venturous I was of this life of mine, while it was my own, good Mr. Secretary please to remember and report truly to the queen. I beg it of you, because I have most offended you, and have no cause to expect it, but from the bounty of your honour and charity.

Mr. Secretary told him he freely forgave whatsoever he conceived might give cause to him to be offended, and would truly perform for him what he desired, and would desire my Lord-Admiral to join with him in it; though he said he need not seek it of them, for the queen would require it at their hands to be truly informed of all their desires.

Then said sir Christopher, I must needs confess that heretofore, I having done much to her majesty's service, adventured my life many times, as the marks of this my wretched carcase will shew; hazarded my fortune when it was at the best, and all for the honour of her majesty, and in her service, and yet she never vouchsafed notice of me or my service: it gave no little discontentment to me, but this never had the power to have an ill thought against her majesty. Therefore once again I beseech you, that being as I was to that earl, you please to relate to her majesty what you find by me, and what I have said to you. And to stay any fury going upon me, I here confess myself guilty of all that can be said against me, and most worthy to have deserved death; wherefore renouncing all justification or extenuation of my offence, I wholly cast myself at her maj.'s mercy. Sir Charles Davers made the like protestation.

And so ended the Evidence against sir Charles Davers.

Against sir John Davis, Mr. Francis Bacon urged the Evidence, beginning with discourse upon the former ground of Mr. Attorney's, that every rebellion implied destruction of the prince, and that in the precedents of Edw. 2, and Hen. 4, the pretence in both was as in this, against certain subjects, the Spencers in one, and the Treasurer in the other. And this stile of protestation that no harm was intended to the person of the sovereign, was common in Traitors. Manlius, the lieutenant of Catiline, had that very protestation; but the proceeding is such in this, as no long discoursing needs to prove it Treason, the act itself was Treason. The principal offences charged upon sir John Davis were two, one that he was a plotter, and of the council at Drury-house: another that in the insurrection he had the custody of the Privy-Councillors in Essex-house, which had a correspondence with the action in the street. The plot and insurrection entered into, was to give laws to the queen; the preparation was to have a choice band of men for action; men not met together by constellation, but assembled upon summons and letters sent; for, said Mr. Bacon, I will not charge sir John Davis, although he be a man skilful in strange arts, that he sent spirits abroad, but letters were sent about this matter. The things to be acted were the matters consulted of, and then to design fit persons for every action; and for mutual encouragement there was a list of names drawn by the earl, and these counsellors out of them were to elect fit persons to every office. The second plot was in taking of the court, and in this consultation he was penna Philosophi-scribentis; you were clerk of that Council-Table, and wrote all: and in the detaining of the privy-counsellors, you were the man only trusted. And as the earl of Rutland said, you held it a stratagem of war to detain pledges, and was meant to have carried the lord-keeper with the Great Seal into London; and to have had with you the lord-chief-justice, a man for his integrity, honoured and well-beloved of the citizens; and this Achitophel plot you thought to have followed.

Sir John Davis hereupon told Mr. Bacon, that, If, with good manners I might, I would long since have interrupted you, and saved you a great part of labour; for my intent is not to deny any thing I have said, or excuse that I have done, but to confess myself guilty of all, and submit myself wholly to the queen's mercy. But in that you call me Clerk of that Council, let me tell you, sir Charles Davers was writing, but his hand being bad, I was desired to take the pen and write. But by and bye the earl said he would speed it himself; therefore we being together so long, and doing so little, the earl went to his house, and set down all with his own hand, which was formerly set forth, touching the taking and possessing of the court.

The Examination of sir John Davis was read, which was to the effect as before is set down touching their consultations of taking of the court; but added, it was agreed they should all come by land, and make their way to the queen's own person, and hoped to find way in the court indifferent.

The Lord-Admiral then charged sir John Davis again with the detaining of the lords in Essex-house, and his unwillingness to have let them go, though sir Ferd. Gorge came with a message, as he said, for letting them all go. And said the Lord-Admiral, the case was hard with these worthy counsellors: for by God he swore, though these counsellors had been in the house, yet being as he was, general of the forces, and sent to force the house, he must and would have battered and blown it up, though it had been the death of them as well as the rest; and had all his own sons been there, he would have done it.

It was also charged against sir John Davis, that not ten days before this action, sir John Davis and sir C. Davers were seen upon the top of the White Tower, within the Tower, viewing and surveying the place; but they said it was only for pleasure, to take view from thence, being there confessed, that they affirmed the Tower was a place of small strength.—And here ended the Evidence against sir John Davis.

Then Mr. Attorney took in hand the Evidence against sir Gilly Merrick and Mr. Cuffe. To Cuffe, Mr. Attorney said, that he was the arrantest Traitor that ever came to that bar; he was Poly . . . . . the very seducer of the earl; and since he was a scholar and a sophister, he would frame him a syllogism, and bade Cuffe deny what part he would. The syllogism was this, 'Whosoever commits rebellion, intends the queen's death; but you committed rebellion: ergo, you intended the queen's death.' For the polypragma, this fellow, the cunning coiner of all plots, how to intrap a worthy gentleman, whom I am sorry to see so overtaken, I must name sir Henry Nevil: this Cuffe hearing of sir Henry's landing out of France, watches his coming to London, presently comes to him, and tells him, he had commendations unto him from the earl of Essex, and secretly lets him know what private intelligence my lord had received from court by some his inward friends; that much mislike was taken at court with sir Henry's service in France; especially that at Bullen. Sir Henry Nevil said, it was more than he knew or had heard, but recommends his service with thanks to my lord. Shortly after sir Henry Nevil came to the court, the queen used him very graciously. The lords interpreted very well of his service; now at his next meeting Mr. Cuffe, sir Henry told Cuffe, he found no such matter at court as he told him. Hereupon Cuffe replied, Oh, sir, things are altered since I saw you last, and ere long you shall see a change: my lord is like to come in favour again, and be restored to his greatness; and using one other verse, concluded with this, Arma ferenti omnia dat, qui justa negat. Cuffe still making resort to sir Henry Nevil, finds opportunity when to disclose unto him all the earl's plot of going to the court; who hearing it, objects against it, that it was a thing could not be executed but by many, and all would not keep counsel. Cuffe answered, that for execution they had so many come in to them, that they knew not to entertain all. A further objection being made, that though all places in the court were possessed, yet Westminster would rise, and make force; Cuffe answered, we having the face of the state, all will follow and take with us.

For manifestation of all, the Narration penned by sir Henry Nevil himself, was read in these words: 'Their honours commanding him to disclose all, and his duty and conscience binding him to the same, he hath in that disclosed Narration set down all his knowledge. First, at his arrival out of France, he was told that he had ill offices done him in court by divers, and some of great place; and his actions at Bullen, and carriage there, greatly blamed, as causing the ill success of the peace. And by Cuffe it was told him, the earl would have him know he was wronged, because he was one that loved him. After this, Cuffe brought him a letter from the earl, thereby desiring his love, and to hold it to him, besides many other words only of compliment. To which letter sir Henry returns an answer suitable to so kind provocations. But all this while I never went to him; and being in the country within ten miles of the earl, yet I never went to visit him. But Cuffe came to me from him, and told me the earl was now at liberty, and all the world that would, might now freely come unto him: but still I put off my going, till at one time Cuffe came and told me my lord expected my coming to him, and such a day he would stay supper for me; and if I came, and be chanced not to be in the way, a gentleman of my lord's should attend my coming, and bring me to my lord's closet. About eight of the clock that night I came to my lord, and was met by a gentleman, and brought up to my lord; who entertained me kindly, and after a while, after many questions of his hopes, but used no undutiful words of the queen or state, I parted with my lord, there having nothing but ordinary terms of compliment passed us. Afterward Mr. Cuffe repairing often to me, I asked him at one time how his lord's matters stood in court. At one time he answered me, Well; and told me of great hopes conceived; at some other time he answered me very discontentedly in these things, saying, it made no matter, it would cause my lord to take other courses; and said, there was a pretext to lay up the earl of Southampton, which was a warning that they meant to lay up the earl of Essex after him: but my lord was resolved they should never curb him up any more. Then told me, my lord had in purpose some matters, but I should not embark myself further in them than I listed; and desired me to give a meeting to the earl of 'Southampton and sir Charles Davers. I said, 'I would, but with this limitation, that nothing 'was intended against the queen's person: 'which was promised. But I detained them 'at two meetings, which caused them to make 'an ill judgment of my meaning towards them 'and the intendment. Monday on Candlemas- 'day I standing in Serjeants-Inn Gate, the 'earls of Essex, Southampton, and sir Christo- 'pher Blunt passed by in a coach, whom I 'saluted passing, and was the first time I had 'seen them of long. Anon after, Cuffe coming 'to me, told me he had a commission to deli- 'ver a secret unto me; which was, that my 'lord finding his life sought by men potent 'about her majesty, he was advised to make his 'appearance to the queen, and go with strength 'for that purpose; describing the same manner 'of taking the court, and making way to the 'queen, as before is set down by others. This 'Cuffe said he was to impart to me, as one in 'whose love the earl was confident. (But Mr. 'Secretary said, as he was grieved to think of 'this gentleman's full respect, his worth and 'abilities to have done the queen great service, 'so this right he would do him, that however 'the earl was persuaded of him, yet he so far 'tendered his duty to the queen, that I think 'the first suspicion given of the earl's mind grew 'from this gentleman.) The matters being 'propounded unto me, I made many objec- 'tions, and put great difficulties in the execu- 'tion; easy perfecting of things being promis- 'ed, my answer was, Multa sunt quæ non lau- 'dantur nisi cum aguntur. When some per- 'sons were named for the actors, I objected, 'that if many knew it, it would not be con- 'cealed; if few were used, it would not be 'performed. The earl of Rutland being named 'for one, said they would not trust him long 'aforehand; for if he knew it but two hours 'before, he would tell. In conclusion, I was 'desired to think of the things propounded, in 'case they were shewed unto me. Afterward 'Cuffe came unto me, to whom I related all 'the speeches used in that conference, and told 'him I would not allow it, except they would 'conjure and take an oath to tempt nothing 'against the queen's person; and against Mr. 'Secretary, I would never do nor consent to 'any thing, for he was nearer unto me, there- 'fore they must duce pudice, spare me in that. 'Cuffe said to me, they would only have me 'present when things were doing; and if it 'fell out so, that I should be hastened to dis- 'patch into France before that time, I might 'defer it by feigning sickness. By their ap- 'pointment I should have been secretary.' (Here Mr. Secretary said, Cuffe, this was great 'presumption, for though to remove me had 'been no great matter, yet to take upon you to 'place another, this was high ambition.) 'Further, it was required that sir Henry Nevil 'should have sent a minister into London, to 'find how the city stood affected to the earl.' (Mr. Attorney here said, it was in their plot, to 'have had 300 ministers in the city and country, to have blazed in pulpits the sincerity of this 'earl's intentions.) 'Cuffe further told sir 'Henry Nevil of a buzz in many men's mouths 'in London, and that there had been warning 'given to the mayor and aldermen to look to 'the city; but of 24 aldermen he doubted not 'of 20 at the least.'

Mr. Secretary here speaking, opened what 'he found had resolved the earl to so free a Con- 'fession and discovery of all things that he did. 'Ashton, who was his minister, and as I may 'term him, his confessor, was a man much de- 'sired by the earl; her majesty was willing to 'yield any thing that might give comfort to the 'earl's conscience, and be good for his soul; sent 'Mr. Dr. Dove, a very worthy man, to confer 'with him, and prepare him to a christian end. 'He persuading confession as the way to repen- 'tance, and amongst other sins charging the earl 'with this offence, his taking arms against his 'prince, and refusing to come upon the com- 'mand of his prince; the earl answered, he 'thought that refusal no fault; and for instance 'shewed, that David refused to come to Saul in 'the like case, being sent for. Mr. Dove so suf- 'ficiently answered the earl in his arguments, 'and satisfied him in this example, how different 'it was from his case, and upon what ground 'that was, that the earl in a kind relenting and 'falling from defences, desired earnestly confes- 'sion with his own minister Ashton; which was 'yielded him. Ashton, like a godly and very 'learned man, and one deserving much for this 'service, dealt so roundly and feelingly with him, 'as that he made the earl know that there was 'no salvation for him to hope for, if he dealt not 'clearly with his own conscience in the confes- 'sions of his sins, and high offences in this kind. 'His words so pierced and moved, as that to this 'man he disclosed the very secrets of his heart, 'to the purging of his soul and conscience, from 'the concealment of any thing he knew; and 'afterwards spent all the time he had to live in 'holy meditations, and revealing the secrets con- 'cerning the state, and discoursing of the mis- 'chief intended; and most penitently sorrowed 'for the accusations and imputations he had cast 'upon others touching the conspiring with Spain 'and the infant of Spain.

And being asked touching some men sup- 'posed to be confederates in the taking of the 'city, he said that captain Bromley, brother to 'sir Henry Bromley, and sir John Scot, would 'assist him: and that sheriff Smith, being a col- 'onel of a thousand men, would bring them in 'aid of him. And confessed by the earl him- 'self, that at such time as the earl had purposed 'to lay down the thought of these ambitions, 'and had resolved contentedness in a private 'life, Cuffe comes to the earl, and tells him he 'had indignities offered him, and his sufferance 'was such, as his friends said he had lost his 'courage with praying and hearing of sermons, 'and now was become a coward. Whereupon 'Cuffe, persuaded him to let sir Charles Davers 'come to him, who would let him know the mind 'of his friends; and after such time as the earl had accused his confederates, being asked how he could prove the things discovered, answered, some of them have so much grace, as if I send but to them, they will confess it. Whereupon he wrote a ticket to the earl of Southampton, who upon view thereof confessed all to be true, and said my lord had the start of him; For if I had had pen and paper I had confessed these things first.

Whereupon Mr. Secretary said, that he must needs speak of a difference he found between noble and generous-minded men and others baser born: from the earls and other the gentlemen of birth and of good house, all their Confessions came freely and liberally from them without concealment or covering any thing with untruths. By Cuffe, and some others of baser sort, nothing would be confessed, but what they were convicted of, and shadowed with untruths so far as their wits could do it. The earl of Essex also in his life-time confessed to the lords, that Cuffe was a principal instigator of him; and though of these plots himself had been a principal contriver, yet sir Christ. Blunt, sir Ch. Davers and sir John Davis were privy to more dangerous and pernicious purposes than this action tended to; as might appear by their counsel given him that morning when he went into the city of London.

Cuffe being willed to speak for himself, said, The matters objected against him were many, and forced against him with all force of wit: therefore for the help of his weak memory, he would reduce all unto two heads: things plotted and things acted. For the first, in them, Mr. Attorney thinks he hath concluded me in mood and figure; but my answer is, that if a man may be excused of Treason by committing nothing, I am clear. Yet the number of matters heaped upon me, and the inferences and enforcements of the same used against me to make me odious, make me seem also as a monster of many heads in this business; but since by the law all accusations are to be believed, and facts weighed, as by evidence they are proved; and things are best proved being singled; I will beseech Mr. Attorney that we may insist upon some point certain, and not as in a stream have all things at once brought upon me with violence. For my being in Essex-house the Sunday, I hope it shall be construed as in the case of others. Then if those who only had their being within the walls of that house, and no hand nor head in that action, were not Traitors; I hope that in favour and in charity you will accordingly judge of me, who spent all that day locked up in my chamber amongst my books, and never appeared unto any man till all was yielded up to my Lord-Admiral. To conclude me to be a Traitor, because I was in the house where treason was committed; by the same reason if a lion had been there locked up in a grate, he had been in case of treason. But whereas your argument, Mr. Attorney, is this, That whosoever intends treason, and the same is afterwards acted by others, there the intender as well as the actor is a tra-tor; but I intended treason, and others acted it; Ergo, Mr. Attorney, it is not your meis that I deny, because my lords the judges have determined that; but I deny your minor; for the thing intended was the going to the court, yet the thing acted was the going into London.

But Mr. Attorney taking him short upon his own confession concluded him a Traitor; for a treason the very intent is treason, if the same can be proved. Now, it is confessed by Mr. Cuffe that he intended the taking of the court which in itself is treason.

Mr. Cuffe said, My lords, the matters forced upon me so amaze me, as I know not what to say; but I beseech you, even as yourselves shall be judged, judge so of me both by my words and deeds, for this is the law both of God and man, and let not the accusations of others, or arguments now forced, so far have power against me, as to take from me my just defence. I am further charged with contriving plots for restoring the earl to greatness. True, I must confess, as a servant that longed for the honour of his master, I have often wished to see his recovery to the court, and restored to her majesty's former favour; but beyond the limits of these desires, my thoughts never carried me, nor aspired to other greatness than to see him again in place of a servant and worthy subject, as before he had been. And whereas I stand accused to be as one that turned the wheel which else had stood, and to be the stirrer of his mind which otherwise had settled to another course; to clear this, I had written two lines, which you, Mr. Secretary, knew the earl would have subscribed, if he might have been suffered.

But Mr. Secretary affirmed he perceived no such purpose in the earl, neither remembered any such matter in that which is written.

Said Cuffe, You know, Mr. Secretary, my paper being read to the earl, as he read, he said still as he went, 'True, true.'

At the importunity of Mr. Cuffe, Mr. Secretary willed the paper should be read; but it tended only unto this, That if he knew of the earl's intent to go to the court, it was with such limitations as the earl had propounded, otherwise not, for he had not suggested any of these new practices.

Mr. Attorney still following the matters strongly against him, told Cuffe, that he would give him a cuff that should set him down, and called to have read the earl's Confession, and some part of sir Henry Nevil's Confession; which both were full plain and against him, as he had not to answer them. Only to the conference with sir Henry Nevil he said, Whereas Mr. Attorney would make me a Mercury, and a messenger only from the earl to sir Henry, herein Mr. Attorney errs, not knowing, or not respecting the antient familiarity and love that for these many years space have been betwixt sir Henry Nevil and me, for the delight we took together in conference of learning, and discourses of travels and states. And whereas I am charged with devising a lye, thereby to bind sir Henry Nevil faster unto the earl; it is well known to others, the earl first sent me to sir Henry Killigrew to tell him of it, and that from him it might come to sir Henry Nevil's ear. But sir Henry Killigrew not being in town, and I afterwards meeting with sir Henry Nevil, imparted it to him; therefore desired that he might not be wronged, and wished that juramentum cal . . . . . might be forborn as a fault in any man. And for the speech used of 21 aldermen in London that were sure to my lord, there were some at the bar as well as he, that had heard the earl use the speech; and vouched sir Gilly Merrick, but he denied it. For the buz that was given out, he said likewise, that sir John Davis heard what my lord said of this; but sir John Davis being asked, denied the hearing of it.

And Cuffe being asked by Mr. Secretary, what he meant by having a Parliament? He answered, that it was conceived these things would work great alteration; and for settling of all things, they thought, that shortly would follow a Parliament.

Mr. Attorney said, that it was meant that Cuffe should have been Speaker of that Parliament.

Against sir Gilly Merrick, Mr. Attorney urged first, That he was the man who fortified Essex-house against the queen's forces; and if God had not otherwise guided it, that day he had been the death of a noble person, the lord Burleigh, for he set one with a musket-shot to shoot at him, but missing the lord Burleigh, captain Lovel's horse was killed under him at Essex-gate with that shot. And the same day that the earl went, sir Gilly Merrick comes to Mr. Brown's house, being adjoining to the tennis-court, and shuts all his servants out of his house, and all that Sunday walked up and down the house, with musketeers following him. And the story of Henry 4th, being set forth in a play, and in that play, there being set forth the killing of the king upon a stage: the Friday before, sir Gilly and some others of the earl's train having an humour to see a play, they must needs have the play of Henry 4th. The players told them that was stale, they should get nothing by playing of that, but no play else would serve; and sir Gilly gives 40 shillings to Philips the player to play this, besides whatsoever he could get.—It was urged also, that the earl's purpose was to have against this time appointed men of his faction placed in all the houses near about him. To which end the confession of Arthur Smith, dwelling hard-by the tennis-court, was read; who said, that the week before, sir Gilly Merrick came to his house, and enquired who lay there. It was told him of a lodging there that was kept for sir Walter Harcourt; which being denied unto sir Gilly, he rail'd and reviled the good man of the house with foul words, and willed him to discharge sir Walter Harcourt of that lodging, for my lord would have his friends to lie about him. Now the men that sir Gilly would have lodged in that house, were Owen Salisbury, capt. Gwynne, and John Salisbury.

Then was read a Letter of sir Gilly Merrick writ to his brother John Merrick; the effect was to pay money to Mr. Devèreux, and himself to come up to London, and captain . . . . . and captain Damnye, to come up also, and my lord would take it thankfully.

The Confession of Thomas Johnson was read, who said he saw sir Gilly all that day walk in his doublet and hose up and down the house, with muskets following him, and went down to the banqueting-house in the garden with his hat full of shot.

Sir Gilly Merrick said, his going with muskets after him, was to keep the privy-counselors the safer from the fury of Owen Salisbury, who had sworn that if the house was forced, he would send them to go to the devil. And Johnson said, that he saw one Wever follow sir Gilly Merrick to the gate with a musket to have shot out there.

And by the Confession of one Watts, it appeared that there was a watch in the house all Saturday night, and none of the company went to bed, but for a while's rest threw themselves upon their beds in their cloaths; and that sir Gilly Merrick caused certain hogsheds to be broken up, to fortify against the tennis-court. That the earl had 100 muskets in the house, but wanted flasks and much other furniture for them.

And here ended the Evidence against sir Gilly Merrick and the rest.

Now, Mr. Attorney General desired to have a word unto all the prisoners at the bar, and that he might not misreport, desired to have a paper read, subscribed by the hand of Mr. Ashton, Dr. Mountford and Dr. Barlow, for that it was spoken in their hearing. The earl thanked God, that he had given him a deep insight into his sins, since his justifications used at the bar then before; thanked God that his course was prevented; acknowledged that all confidence in man was vain; that he was worthily spewed out: and further, as in the earl's confession. Now to conclude, at the earl's Arraignment I used a sentence, saying, O tempora, O mores! according to that against Catiline, Hic tamen vivit; for which saying, divers have since charged me, but I will say it again; and add this to it,

*Dixerat O mores, O tempora! Tullius olim, Romanum struerat cum Catilina nefas.
O tempora dicimus, &c.*

Et cur non dicimus, O mores!

Now the Jury went out to agree upon the Verdict, which after half an hour's time and more, they brought in, and found every of the five prisoners severally Guilty of High Treason. The Verdict being entered, and the Jury discharged, the queen's serjeant prayed Judgment. The Chief Justice then demanded of the prisoners, what they had to say for themselves, why Judgment should not be given against them?

Sir Christopher Blunt then said, My lords, for my high offence tending to Treason, in that I have risen in Rebellion against her majesty, I have nothing to say to excuse myself, or extenuate my fault. But of any intention of evil against her majesty's person, my own thoughts cannot accuse me. My deserved, but unfatal fall, I must needs impute to my over-much love to that unhappy earl. How I have followed him, how I have loved him, as being bewitched with too good an opinion of him, I now with grief feel it! But since this my too much fondness of him hath only led me into folly with him, and no other ambition, hope, or honour, I beseech your lordships, and you my Lord Admiral and Mr. Secretary especially, right me so much with your favours, as to relate truly to her majesty what my heart and words are before you this day, and let her majesty understand that it was the fair face of that earl's pretences, and my near ties unto him, I having married his mother, that carried and allured me to that I did, and no disloyalty or undutifulness of mind towards her. What the services be that I have done, and adventures made in service for her majesty, others have seen, and know what I have felt. This carcass of mine, when it shall be dissolved, will shew the marks, such was my readiness in all factions to the honour of her majesty; as when my fortune was at the best, so good as that I enjoyed 2,000*l.* a year at the least, beside other wealth by an honourable lady whom you all know I married, yet when no commands enforced me, for her majesty never commanded my going with the earl in any journey, yet voluntarily I left all to adventure with the earl in service for her majesty into Portugal, at Cales, the Islands, and in Ireland, I was with him. And although all this be nothing to weigh against this present fact, and so I have nothing of desert that may plead mercy for me, yet if her majesty, out of the abundance of her grace and mercy, shall afford me life, I doubt not but as I have done, so I may live to do; and if I live, I will be as ready as any subject the queen hath to do the service for her majesty which shall deserve my life. And this is all I wish, that since I have but a life to give unto her majesty, that I might give it to the performance of some more acceptable service rather than to this end. But if it be resolved, as I have deserved, that die I must, it is not life I care for; for a death I owe unto her majesty, and will yield it cheerfully. And since the earl that gone is, whose undue course hath brought us to this due punishment, hath left a blot upon me, and so far touched me in reputation and credit, as if I had been plotter and procurer of him to more dangerous practices than these, I must needs clear myself, that neither in foreign practices, which I count confederacies with Spain, nor in domestical dealings, which I count that with Scotland, in respect of their nearness to us, I have ever had to do so far, as to allow or advise any thing to the hurt of this state. Against you, Mr. Secretary, I cannot but con-

cess I have assented to too great wrongs, and beyond that I am worthy, it pleaseth your honour of your charitable disposition to forgive me: otherwise of the state I have never deserved evil. And for my further clearing, I desire humbly to be permitted to private conference with your honour, my Lord Admiral, and with Mr. Secretary.

Which was yielded to. And that night he was brought into the Court of Wards, after the Court rose.

Sir Charles Davers being demanded what he had to say, why Judgment should not be given against him, used these words: I have nothing to say in stay of Judgment, for it is but just that I be adjudged to die: only this I say, my greatest fault was to consent unto things propounded, for my intention was far from thought of hurt unto her majesty. I was never any persuader or instigator of the earl in these things; nay, till I was sent for purposely by the earl out of the country, I was a stranger to these purposes: then finding my lord of Southampton, to whom I owed my love and life itself, that he was so far engaged in the business, and desired my assistance, I yielded advice to him, and gave consent to that I now repent; for there was no reason in me to seek changes, the present being better to me than alteration could promise. Ambition I had none, for my estate was good; discontentment could not trouble me, for I had been well used: but by all this my offence was the greater, in giving offence to the queen, who had been so gracious unto me. Contrary to the resolution I came with, I have pleaded not guilty, but this grew through the error of my understanding; but to the justifying of what is found, I also confess myself guilty. And though I have no cause to hope, yet do I not despair of her majesty's mercy; and if it shall be her majesty's pleasure to shew mercy, your lordship and all here shall see, that none lives that shall better deserve life. But if her majesty's pleasure be to execute justice, I only request this with my best prayer, that I may die in her majesty's favour. And these few requests I have to make, which I recommended unto your lordships, my lord-admiral, and to your honour, Mr. Secretary, that if I must die, that I may have some time given me to settle my conscience, and resolve my soul, because hitherto my hoping having been much, my care hath been the less this way; and if it may be thought fit, I desire to have one of my servants to repair to me for ordering of some things I have to do. And lastly, that your honour, Mr. Secretary, remembering what your promise was to me, in respect of my descent and allegiance to some noble blood, you will so far grace me, as to beg the favour of her majesty, that I may be be-headed. And one request more, I beseech you, let me make suit to see the earl of Southampton before I die.

Sir Christopher Blunt upon this said, My lords, this weak, bruised head of mine mademé forget that which I minded to have begged; that in respect I have always professed arms, and been marshal of the field, a place of honour, I may have so much grace as to be beheaded.

My Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary told them both, they would remember it to the Queen.

Sir John Davis said, I have nothing to say, but only to appeal to mercy. I confess I have highly offended, yet if it please her majesty to extend mercy unto me, it shall not be to an unworthy servant: my former answers and disclosures have not been to purchase favour, but to discover truth; and though by this I challenge no mercy, yet it intimates desert of favour. My great remorse and grief is for my poor wife's estate, to think that I being so much benefited and advanced by her, must now be the means to undo her; for I hear all her estate is seized on. Wherefore I beseech this favour, that she be not afflicted for my offence, but may enjoy what was her own.

Mr. Secretary, upon occasion of this speech of Davis, what he disclosed, said, Though his place did appropriate that to him to be the deliverer and restorer of requests; yet in this business nothing had been done or said by any, but three at least of the chief counsellors of state have been privy to all that passed, and I only the register of things moved unto them. And this I will say, that during all the time of the earl's restraint from the court, his letters have always had free passage to the queen, and he might write what he listed, the queen would ever read that.

Sir Gilly Merrick. I have little to say; but let what I have done be considered, and my offence will be found less than others: but the law hath adjudged it treason, and I must die, and not unwillingly; for the tree being fallen, the branches must not stand. I did the office of a servant as my master bade me, but it was my fault to obey what was not just in him to command. My poor estate I pray you let be considered, it may be thought better of than it is. What it is, I shall set it down, and humbly pray that my poor wife and children may be pitied.

Cuffe confessed the jury had done but right, in discharging their consciences; yet it was true that Divines held, condempnatum cum aliquando faciunt quem dampnatum non faciunt. The gracious proceeding afforded, and all reasonable requests yielded, emboldeneth me to make some small request: When I was restrained, I had not about me above two shillings. I had 350*l.* of ready money seized upon in my chamber. When I came into the Tower, I was put into a dark place; but afterwards Mr. Lieutenant pitying me, relieved me, and put me in a better place. Wherefore I pray to be returned unto the same prison, for there I am now provided of things necessary: otherwise perhaps I may be caring for things of this world for necessary succour of life, whereas I would now more willingly spend all my thoughts in other meditations.—[This request was granted.]—My second request is to you, Mr. Secretary, that I may have the company of some divine repairing to me for the comfort of my soul, and crucifying of my flesh, that so at my farewell to this world with joyful arms I may embrace my Saviour; and for human respects, I desire the law may be satisfied with my life, without torturing or quartering my flesh; and the rather for favour's sake unto learning, though I have neither place nor great birth to speak for that. To plead for longer or other mercy I will not; but when my body shall be executed, sorrow be unto my soul, if ever I intended evil unto her majesty's person. Alas! it was my too much love unto my master that brought me unto this; but as that earl, my master, said, now the scales were taken from his eyes, and he saw his faults; so do I, but too late; heretofore in the course of my private state, things went so smoothly with me as I could desire; my religion was always sorting to the profession at this day. Some further things I would utter, but I desire to know whether now I must speak, or that I may be allowed pen and paper to write them hereafter.

It was allowed he should have means to write what he would.

Here ended all that passed before Judgment.

The Lord Chief Justice of England, (sir John Popham) being now to pronounce Judgment, used these words: "I am sorry to see any so ill affected to this state as to become plotters and practisers against the state, and that so strongly as you and others in this action have done. And my grief is the more in this, men of worth, service and learning are the actors in that conspiracy! Shall it be said in the world abroad, that we Englishmen, now after forty-three years peace under so gracious and renowned a prince, are become weary of the government of such a queen, whom all the world else admires for her government? Consider it well, whosoever had best hopes in this attempt of change, what would have followed upon it? Let me tell you of the smallest hurt, the blood of children, families and friends; for none of yourselves can otherwise think but this action would have cost much blood. And I am sorry to think, that Englishmen should seem to excuse themselves by ignorance of the law, which all subjects are bound to know, and are born to have the benefit of. Some of you now at the bar are Christians; Where, I pray you, did you ever read or hear that it was lawful for the subject to command or constrain his sovereign? It is a thing against the law of God, and all nations. God forbid but that by actions men should be allowed to expound intents. Now your actions tending to a sovereignty, cannot but by yourselves be expounded Treason. But your intents, if they were otherwise, as you pretend, yet are not they to expound the law. For know this, that the law which tends principally to the preserving of the prince's person, is more tender and precise in this than in any other point.—And although your example be pitiful, yet by this, let all men know and learn how high all actions treasonable do touch, and what they tend to. To leave off from further discourse, I should now remember one thing to you all, but I see you all careful of it; that is, the care of your souls, to keep them from death, whereof sin is the cause; and sin is not removed but by repentance, which being truly and heartily performed, then follows what the prophet David spake of, 'Blessed are they to whom God imputeth no sin!' There will be a course taken to instruct you how to kill sin in this world, which otherwise shall not be killed in the world to come; for as you leave this world, so shall it be with you in the life to come."

And then pronounced Judgment against every of them, as in case of High-Treason*.
